Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A Corr

I am thank brief note a published in zine, dated wherein you to some of o
have also dra
the Governm
ties being fa
of the paucity
I have to takes that crept into th
name of thi
yana Agril.
the Krishi C
District Advi
are run not Department
sity. The su
ists working all employee
but they w with the pe
partment of Haryana Go

A. S.
GEN

JANUARY

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A Correction

I am thankful to you for your brief note about this University published in your esteemed magazine, dated November 6, 1977, wherein you have briefly referred to some of our achievements and have also drawn the attention of the Government to the difficulties being faced by us on account of the paucity of funds. However, I have to point out some mistakes that have inadvertently crept into this note. Firstly, the name of this University is Haryana Agril. University. Secondly, the Krishi Gyan Kendras or the District Advisory Service Centres are run not by the Agriculture Department but by the University. The subject-matter specialists working in these centres are all employees of the University, but they work in coordination with the personnel of the Department of Agriculture of the Haryana Government. Again, the re:

SUNDAY NUMBERS

POLITICAL

DR BANPURI

Ur

It
ed
Ur
lc
y

O. K. Knan
New Delhi.

ppeal

A plan for publication of a commemoration volume on the late . Benoy Roy of Jawaharlal ehru University has, we understand, been undertaken by a friend- publisher. In this connection e urgently appeal to all friends nd admirers of the late Dr. Roy, n India and abroad, who had been onnected with him in the Indian eoples Theatre, Trade Union or ommunist movements as also with educational and social activities make this project a success by ding all relevant materials or ormation to :-

Smt. Jaya Roy,
43, Dakshinapuram,
Jawaharlal Nehru University
New Campus,
New Delhi-110057.

Ali Sardar Jafri, K. A. Abbas, lil Chaudhury, Utpal Dutt, Sova n, Suchitra Mitra, Hemango iswas. Subhash Mukhopadhyay, iti Banerjee, Sadhana Ray Chaudhury, Dilip Bose, Kali Banerjee, Shanta Gandhi, Dina Pathak, Dr. Vipin Gandhi etc

YOUR Rs. 5000
DEPOSITED WITH US IN ORIENTAL BANK
BECOMES Rs 40,480
AFTER 21 YEARS

FOR DETAILS PLEASE CONTACT OUR NEAREST BRANCH FOR SAVINGS AND SERVICE

THE ORIENTAL BANK OF
COMMERCE LIMITED

REGD. & HEAD OFFICE: HARSHA BHAWAN,
"E" BLOCK, CON. PLACE,
NEW DELHI—110001

A. S. SARAO
GENERAL MANAGER.

M. K. VIG
CHAIRMAN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A Cor

I am thank brief note a published in zine, dated wherein you
to some of o
have also dra
the Governm
ties being fa
of the paucity
I have to takes that crept into th
name of thi
yana Agril.
the Krishi C
District Advi
are run not Department
sity. The su
ists working all employee
but they wo
with the pe
partment of Haryana Go

A. S.
GEN

JANUARY

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

letters

A Correction

I am thankful to you for your brief note about this University published in your esteemed magazine, dated November 6, 1977, wherein you have briefly referred to some of our achievements and have also drawn the attention of the Government to the difficulties being faced by us on account of the paucity of funds. However, I have to point out some mistakes that have inadvertently crept into this note. Firstly, the name of this University is Haryana Agril. University. Secondly, the Krishi Gyan Kendras or the District Advisory Service Centres are run not by the Agriculture Department but by the University. The subject-matter specialists working in these centres are all employees of the University, but they work in coordination with the personnel of the Department of Agriculture of the Haryana Government. Again, the centre for [illegible]arming is located not at Paiwal but Bawal.

P. S. LAMBA
Vice-Chancellor
Haryana Agricultural University,
[illegible], Hissar.

The inadvertent mistakes are regretted—Editor.

Urdu Press

It is good that LINK has started a column on 'Urdu Press'. Urdu speaking people and all lovers of Urdu will welcome your move. Through your column, non-Urdu speaking people can have an idea of the problems in the way of Urdu's development.

O. K. Khan
New Delhi.

Appeal

A plan for publication of a commemoration volume on the late Dr. Benoy Roy of Jawaharlal Nehru University has, we understand, been undertaken by a friendly publisher. In this connection we urgently appeal to all friends and admirers of the late Dr. Roy, in India and abroad, who had been connected with him in the Indian Peoples Theatre, Trade Union or Communist movements as also with his educational and social activities to make this project a success by sending all relevant materials or information to :-

Smt. Jaya Roy,
43, Dakshinapuram,
Jawaharlal Nehru University
New Campus,
New Delhi-110057.

Ali Sardar Jafri, K. A. Abbas, Salil Chaudhury, Utpal Dutt, Sova Sen, Suchitra Mitra, Hemango Biswas. Subhash Mukhopadhyay, Priti Banerjee, Sadhana Ray Chaudhury, Dilip Bose, Kali Banerjee, Shanta Gandhi, Dina Pathak, Dr. Vipin Gandhi etc

YOUR Rs. 5000
DEPOSITED WITH US IN ORIENTAL BANK
BECOMES Rs 40,480
AFTER 21 YEARS

FOR DETAILS PLEASE CONTACT OUR NEAREST BRANCH FOR SAVINGS AND SERVICE

THE ORIENTAL BANK OF
COMMERCE LIMITED

REGD. & HEAD OFFICE: HARSHA BHAWAN,
"E" BLOCK, CON. PLACE,
NEW DELHI—110001

A. S. SARAO
GENERAL MANAGER.

M. K. VIG
CHAIRMAN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

INDIA

THURSDAY (Dec 22):

Opposition and Government leaders have reached consensus over the proposal that the fundamental right to life and liberty guaranteed by the constitution should not be suspended under any kind of emergency—internal or external.

FRIDAY (Dec 23):

The new industrial policy statement placed before Parliament on Friday seeks to promote cottage and small industries and guide the growth of the large scale sector on well demarcated lines keeping in view the country's socio-economic goals.

Presenting the statement, Industry Minister George Fernandes said so far the emphasis had been on large industries and cottage and small industries had been neglected. "It is the firm policy of this Government to change this approach," he said in the Lok Sabha.

SATURDAY (Dec 24):

President N. Sanjiva Reddy called for a national consensus on vital issues affecting the people such as rise in prices, unemployment, unrest among students, welfare of the economically weaker sections and social reforms.

Inaugurating a two-day conference of State Governors, the first to be held since he assumed the nation's highest office, Reddy said such consensus among parties sharing common ideals and goals would make legislation for social reform easy and smooth.

SUNDAY (Dec 25):

Mrs Indira Gandhi will preside over a "rebel AICC" session on New Year's Day, though it will be called a "National Convention of Congressmen." A formal announcement about the two-day "convention is expected to be made on Monday. Originally it was reported that Mr Kamlapati Tripathi would be the president.

MONDAY (Dec 26):

A split in the Congress seems certain with the suspension of Karnataka Chief Minister Devraj Urs from the party on Monday, following a formal announcement from Mrs Indira Gandhi's camp about the "rebel AICC" session called by her followers on January 1 and 2 in the guise of a "national convention of Congressmen."

TUESDAY (Dec 27):

The Indian National Congress split on the eve of its 92nd Birth Anniversary, as Mrs Indira Gandhi pulled her seven supporters out of the 21-member Working Committee, following a strong denunciation of her convention move by Congress president Brahmananda Reddy and Parliamentary Party leader Y B Chavan. The seven who resigned in protest against the suspension of Karnataka Chief Minister Devraj Urs from the Congress on Monday, were: Kamlapati Tripathi, P V Narasimha Rao, A P Sharma, Mir Qasim, Maragatham Chandrasekhar, Buta Singh and Virendra Verma.

WEDNESDAY (Dec 28):

The Congress Working Committee has by consensus came out against the "convention" move of Mrs Gandhi's followers.

ABROAD

THURSDAY (Dec 22):

An anti-apartheid group accused several West German and internationals firms of secretly supplying South Africa with equipment for a uranium enrichment plant.

Mongolian leader Yumzhagin Tsedenbal has launched a sharp attack on the Chinese leadership, alleging that it posed "an immense danger" to peace, Tass news agency said.

FRIDAY (Dec 23):

The Western Saharan Polisario Liberation Front will hand-over eight French hostages to United Nations Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim at the residence in Algiers of the representative of the UN Development Fund today, sources close to Dr Waldheim said.

SATURDAY (Dec 24):

The USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium has appointed Mr Yuli Vorontsov (48), who headed the Soviet delegation at the Belgrade conference on European security, as the USSR's new Ambassador to India.

President Anwar Sadat named Egypt's ambassador to Bonn Mohamed Ibrahim Kamel as Foreign Minister in succession to Mr Ismail Fahmi.

SUNDAY (Dec 25):

Premier Menachem Begin submitted to President Anwar Sadat Israel's proposals for a West Asia settlement during a full 20-minute session at their peace summit. Earlier, Mr Sadat and Mr Begin had talked alone for 55 minutes.

MONDAY (Dec 26):

President Anwar Sadat of Egypt and Israeli Premier Menachem Begin today failed to achieve any breakthrough on the main obstacle to a West Asia peace—the Palestinian question—despite two days of intensive talks in Ismailia. Begin later flew back to Jerusalem.

TUESDAY (Dec 27):

Begun Nusrat Bhutto, wife of former Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto and acting chairman of Pakistan Peoples Party, was detained in Lahore, police said.

WEDNESDAY (Dec 28):

President Anwar Sadat was quoted by Egyptian newspapers as saying Israel had not yet taken the tough decisions needed to produce West Asia peace.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

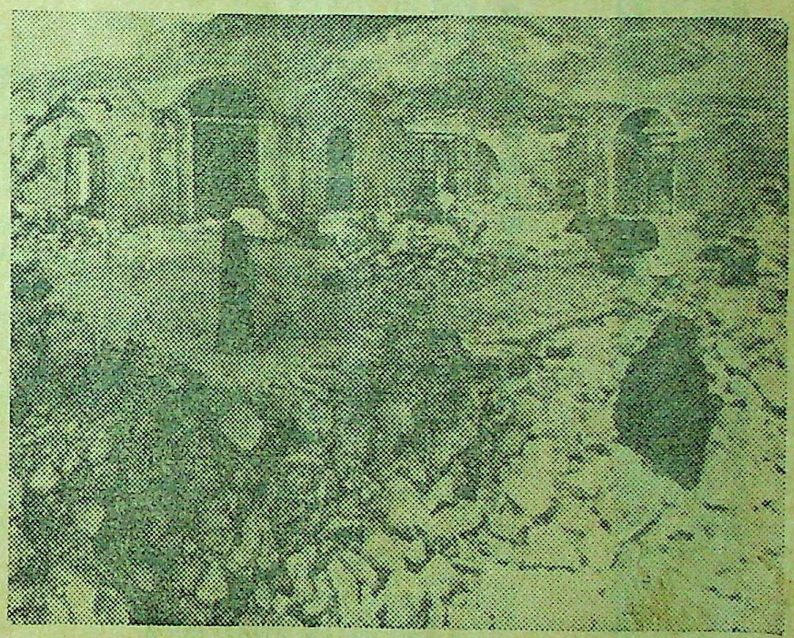
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

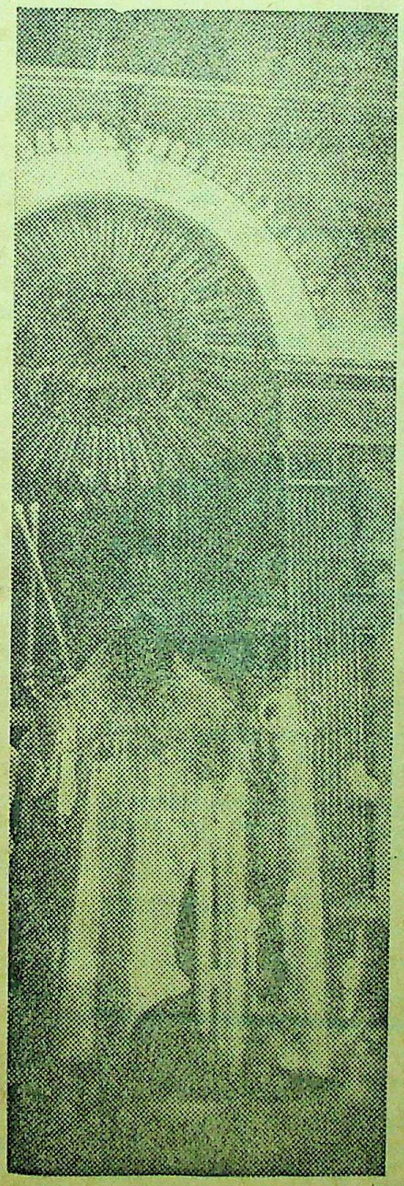
Master Peter Mark Andrew Phillips breaks into a half smile, as he is held by his mother, Britain's Princess Anne.

A veil clad woman mourns the loss of her family as she sits on the ruins of her home in the village of Bal-Tangol, epicentre of the recent earthquake in southern Iran.

Tanker 'Venoil' ablaze off Cape St. Francis.

Metropolitan Philaret, Exarch of the Muscovite Patriarchate for Berlin and Central Europe consecrating the renovated Russian orthodox church in Potsdam.





CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA PUBLICATIONS

USEFUL BOOKS

	Price
All India electric rate book State section
● No. 16 Punjab	Rs. 3.10
● No. 19 Tamil Nadu	Rs. 3.55
● No. 21 Uttar Pradesh	Rs. 4.50
● No. 23 Union Territories	Rs. 6.50
Report of the National Commission on Agriculture 1976
● Part I Review and Progress	Rs. 20.00
● Part II Policy and Strategy	Rs. "
● Part III Demand and Supply	Rs. "
● Part IV Climate and Agriculture	Rs. "
● Part V Resource Development	Rs. "
● Part VI Crop Production Sericulture and Apiculture	Rs. "
● Part VII Animal Husbandry	Rs. "
● Part VIII Fisheries	Rs. "
● Part IX Forestry	Rs. "
● Part X Inputs	Rs. "
● Part XI Research Education and Extension	Rs. "
● Part XII Supporting services and Incentives	Rs. "
● Part XIII Rural Employment and Special Area Programmes	Rs. "
● Part XIX Planning Statistics and Administration	Rs. "
● Part XV Agrarian Reforms	Rs. "
● Supplement for the years 1971-75 to the Catalogue of Government of India Civil Publications (subject, wise arranged) corr. up to 31st Dec. 1959	Rs. 1.50

Available from all authorised selling agents

FOR CASH SALE
KITAB MAHAL
Unit No. 21, State Emporia Building,
Baba Kharak Singh Marg,
New Delhi (Phone: 343708)

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BOOK DEPOT
8, K. S. Roy Road, Calcutta-700001
(Phone: 233813)

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BOOK DEPOT
Ground Floor, New C.G.O. Buidling,
New Marine Lines, Bombay-400020

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLICATION SALE COUNTERS IN NEW DELHI

- UDYOG BHAVAN (Phone: 372082)
- DEPARTMENT OF PUBLICATION CIVIL LINES, DELHI-110054.
- C.B.R. BUILDING, BAHADUR SHAH ZAFAR MARG

FOR MAIL ORDERS
CONTROLLER OF PUBLICATIONS
CIVIL LINES
DELHI-110054

NOTE:
Postal Charges extra for mail orders below Rs. 5/- in India @ 20% of cost.
Registration Charges extra if supply is desired by regd. post.

davp 77/373

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

LINK

VOL. 20 NO. 21
JANUARY 1, 1978

Political Parties	6	Agriculture	30
Kow-Touring to Carter	8	A Feature on Nepal	32
Cover	9	Africa	38
Major Events—1977	24	The West	39
The States	26	The Arts	41
Economy	29	Science	46
		Sports	48

the week

THE happy hordes of South Block are about to have their maddest and merriest hour, for President Carter will be upon them and us soon. Untilted, genuine nonalignment will be ours. (If there had been any tinge of a tilt, would not Carter have included Peking or Rawalpindi in the itinerary?) Was it not he who gave us the "chit" that we too are a great nation in our region, just as his own is the greatest in the world? Was it not he, alone among western statesmen who perceived that we are the "greatest" democracy? He was; and it was his America's New Year present to us.

He may be coming to inspect the true genuineness of our nonalignment. His mission may be to buy a pair of Palkhiwala chappals for his mother. He may be after us to lasso us and yoke us to America's world nuclear policy under which America should be the greatest nuclear power and can explode as many atomic, hydrogen and neutron bombs as it wants to, and people like us should merely look on and marvel and never try to imitate our betters, the nuclear "sahbs." These, however, will not be all the contents of the Carter wagon. There may be dollars too in the visit, because Mr Palkhiwala is in Washington and no one can beat him at wheedling.

Heralding Mr Carter, we are told, have come American folk singers, journalists, security people—and naturally CIA folk, because they never lose sight of their President, not because they suspect him but because wherever he is there may be chances too to do a little snooping-and-destabilizing. Almost a whole five-star hotel has been taken up by this advance team, making the Indian hearts beating anywhere near them gladder and merrier.

Naturally, all of us find ourselves asking, "What shall we give Carter when Carter gives us so much?" We shall give him boundless love, honour and esteem; but these can be faked. What he really would like more than all these is of course concrete changes in our foreign and defence policies. We have given indications already that we are ready to be part of the sub-continent as Washington would like to reorganize it. That is good; but not good enough for Washington which—all of us must remember, without of course mentioning it—has lost Vietnam. Can the Janata Party Government and Subramanian Swami, who is about to go to China, do something about this?

THE EDITOR

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

First Phase Of 2nd Congress Split

THE two-month-long suicidal struggle in the Congress landed it squarely in the first phase of the second split in the party on the eve of its 92nd birth anniversary this week. Indira Gandhi, checkmated in every move she made till then to oust the leadership and take over the party as a subservient tool, decided to step up the war of nerves she had waged. She pulled her seven supporters, several of them unhappy, out of the Congress Working Committee after setting the stage for her rebel "AICC" session on New Year's Day. Neither she nor the rump which stuck to her in a hangover of fear were willing to agree that they were splitting the party. Naturally, they were anxious to claim that they represented the real Congress.

The leadership headed by Brahmananda Reddy was not anxious to make any claims except to say it was not forcing anyone to leave the Congress. Indira Gandhi apparently banked on being able to provoke Reddy, Y B Chavan and other members of the party leadership to initiate disciplinary action and expel her and her supporters from the party so that she could then go before the "people" and say once again that she had been badly treated. Reddy, Chavan and their colleagues in the party High Command were not ready to provide her that opportunity. They decided to play it cool and let her get out of the party if she so decided for whatever reasons she had. The most commonly discussed was her desire to create a political shield for herself against any action the Janata Party Government might take on the basis of the reports of the enquiry commissions now going into various emergency excesses including her younger son's role in the most lurid or cruel of them.

The leadership appeared to have decided to ignore the resignation letters at least till they have had a clearer assessment of Indira Gandhi's intentions: this may come after the convention she has called, meets. In the meanwhile they will also know how the ordinary Congressman reacts—though even at midweek they were fairly sure that a majority of the Congress units in the various States and members of Parliament and legislatures were with them.

For Indira Gandhi herself, the response to the convention would show what she should do now—try to storm the AICC office with her firebrand followers or the goons hired by the caucus or leave the Congress and form a new party. The convention will thus mark the completion of the first phase of the second Congress split and the beginning of the more crucial second phase in which both sides may have to fight a grim protracted struggle to claim the party flag, the symbol and offices of the Indian National Congress—besides the allegiance of Congressmen across the country.

DISAPPOINTMENT

Indira Gandhi lost the first round of her challenge when she could not secure the support of more than seven members of the 21-member Working Committee. She must have felt disappointed when, even after personal telephone calls, several members declined to sign the joint resignation letter drafted by P V Narasimha Rao. Only her known followers—Kamlapati Tripathi, A P Sharma, Mir Qasim, Virendra Verma, P V Narasimha Rao, Maragatham, Chandrasekhar and Buta Singh — agreed to sign on the dotted line. The name of Shankar Dayal Sharma, all along known to have been close to her—though he never displayed this support in the manner the cruder "priests at her temple" like A R Antulay and V P Sathe—was missing from the list. Besides declining to sign the resignation letter, he announced his decision not to attend the convention called by her followers on January 1 and 2. Another notable name missing was that of K C Pant, who had carefully avoided taking sides in the current strife to maintain the neutral role of a peacemaker but who was expected by many to stand by Indira Gandhi when chips were down. Pant announced that he found no reason why he should resign and also that he would keep out of Indira Gandhi's convention. There was a report (unconfirmed till Wednesday) that like Mir Qasim, V P Naik may also end up on Indira Gandhi's side because of the personal and political equations in the Maharashtra Congress, if not for personal inclinations or antipathies. However, he also refused to quit the CWC at her behest or attend the convention.

Brahmananda Reddy and Mrs Gandhi at the AICC office after the Congress Founding Day flag hoisting.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A majority of the Working Committee members—13 against eight—thus stood by the party leadership till mid-week. That kept the party High Command solid as a block, which must have dashed Indira Gandhi's hopes of sharply dividing the Working Committee so that she could claim to be the leader of the "real" Congress and drag her rivals into a long-drawn court case. It does not, however, mean that she is going to give up the claim easily even now. Her whole effort now is likely to be directed to ensure that Reddy and Chavan cannot take their men to the forthcoming Assembly polls as Congressmen.

What must have further caused despair in Indira Gandhi's camp is the wide support received by Reddy and Chavan to their call for the boycott of her convention from Congressmen throughout the country. Immediately as AICC general secretary V B Raju released the two-page joint statement of Reddy and Chavan (characterising the convention as a "facade and camouflage" for splitting the party), messages began pouring in from a large number of MPs, AICC members, PCC presidents and other office-bearers as well as prominent Congressmen endorsing their call. Within a few hours, the PCC presidents of Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Maharashtra, Punjab, Haryana, West Bengal, Karnataka, Andhra Pradesh, Orissa and Assam as well as leaders of the legislature parties of several States announced their allegiance to the party High Command. Prominent Congressmen including K D Malaviya, Bhaktvatslam, Triloki Singh, Ramlakhan Yadav and many others came out strongly against the proposed convention. Of the four Congress Chief Ministers, only one, Karnataka's Devraj Urs, stood by her.

Thus, it appeared that even in the 639-member AICC, for which most of the men were hand picked by her at the time of the last organisational election in 1972, Indira Gandhi might not be able to secure majority support, particularly as many of Kamlapati Tripathi's followers in UP may desert him in the crucial battle. Senior UP Congressmen like Baldeo Singh Arya, Jagan Prasad Rawat, Dharam Dutt Vaidya, Lakshmi Shankar Yadav, Shiv Swaroop Singh and Shiv Nath Singh have already informed Reddy that they stand by the party leadership. There is still a possibility that if Tripathi mobilises all his men and resources, he may be able to secure a majority for Indira Gandhi among the AICC members in her home State. Another State where she expects to get a majority of AICC members on her side is Bihar, though many like Baliram Bhagat and Ramlakhan Singh Yadav say the majority of Congressmen in the legislature as well as the AICC will support the party High Command. Even in Karnataka, Urs himself expects only about 15 to 20 of the 32 AICC members to attend the convention.

Every move of hers since her outburst against Reddy and Chavan at the last AICC session is meticulously planned and precise in detail. There is thus reason to believe that she has a very definite plan for herself. As her close associates say, she had become suspect of Reddy's loyalty and intentions immediately after his election as the Congress president. She was unhappy about the resolution adopted at the AICC session held after the defeat of the party in the Lok Sabha poll. The resolution had referred critically to the emergency misuse of power. She was keen that the references be rescinded at an opportune time. She was also keen to ensure that those critical of the emergency excesses and misuse of power are not only denied any position of influence in the party but also gradually weeded out of it. Obviously, Reddy did not carry out her designs in this regard. This annoyed her much.

Perhaps, what annoyed her most was the unwillingness of Reddy and Chavan to use the Congress as a sheild to protect the guilty. She was unhappy about Reddy's refusal to take action against those who had recorded critical statements about emergency excesses with the Shah Commission investigators. She was also annoyed that Reddy and Chavan were not playing court to her as they used to in the past. Every decision Reddy or Chavan attempted to take independent of her angered Mrs Gandhi. This was particularly true in matters like constitution of the Andhra Pradesh and Karnataka PCCs. While all those grievances were building up inside her, she seemed to be becoming ever more desperate over what was happening around her, particularly the various enquiries into the emergency affairs relating to her and her close associates.

Obviously Reddy and Chavan were reluctant to allow her to use the Congress as a shield to protect herself and her emergency associates, including her son, Sanjay Gandhi. But they were unwilling to agree to her demand that the Congress defend the emergency in toto. They seemed to argue that the Congress can defend its policies and programmes and any mistakes committed in their implementation by the partymen or the Indira Gandhi Government. But the Congress could not be used to defend misuse of power.

STRATEGY

Her strategy at first was to confront the party leadership with the two equally undesirable alternatives of either surrendering to her wishes or facing a split in the hope that, fearing a split, they would finally crumble down before her. That was the objective behind the requisition move, which failed miserably. She changed her tactics and this time threatened possible split by resigning from the Working Committee while encouraging Urs to defy the party leadership. Her followers soon began preparing for a rebel AICC session. The proposal was later amended under the pressure of peacemakers like Swaran Singh, V P Naik, K C Pant and Hitendra Desai. Instead of calling a "rebel AICC" session, they began calling it a convention of Congressmen. Indira Gandhi had hoped that once Reddy accepts her resignation, she will find enough support from among the CWC members on the plea that a split in the party was being forced by him and Chavan and not by her. However, Reddy and Chavan resolved to keep a decision on her resignation pending on the suggestion of the peacemakers. Feeling that they were showing signs of weakness, Indira Gandhi decided to give a boost to the convention by agreeing to preside over its two sessions. All the preparations continued to be made as if it were a rebel AICC session.

Reddy and Chavan shocked her with their decision to suspend Urs from the Congress. She hit back hard by pulling her seven supporters out of the Congress Working Committee, leaving only the split to be formalised which might be done soon after the convention.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Kow-Towing To Carter

WE will never know the measurements Nani Palkhivala took of Lillian Carter's feet. But he has let the world know that the prospects of Indo-American relations measure truly up to the desire of all the like-minded people who would stoop to be conquered. He considers the possibilities unprecedented, and so do the official spokesmen of Washington. And, both sides stress their common grounds of hope.

It is striking that while, in the case of Indo-Soviet ties, both sides emphasize that the enduring friendship transcends all political barriers, both New Delhi and Washington should be harping on the point that Indo-American relations have reached a new phase of ardour with the recent changes of governments in the two countries. This may seem to imply a special kind of relations depending upon a selective bias, but it is actually sought to be projected as the correction of a past bias. The basic theme of the propagandists of the new tilt is that recent political changes have brought about a community of outlook between the two countries. It is claimed that both the Janata Government and the Carter Administration are committed to "democracy" and "decency in public life". The projection is then made from the international to foreign policies to posit that India has shifted to a stance of "genuine nonalignment" and the US to a more vigorous championship of "human rights".

President Carter's three-day visit to India, beginning on Sunday, it is rhapsodized, will herald a new age of joint Indo-American endeavour in the promotion of these hazy but high-sounding objectives. What this rhetorical camouflage conceals can help to reveal the shape of the concerted diplomatic and economic offensive directed against India's immediate and long-term interests.

IMPLICATIONS

What, in the first place, are the specific implications of "genuine nonalignment" or how in fact has it paved the way for better Indo-American relations? The first indication of change in this regard, noted approvingly by the Pentagon, was the Indian Government's decision to treat Diego Garcia as non-existent. If India had earlier aligned itself with the other littoral countries and the Socialist world in protesting against the building of a full-fledged imperialist military base in the Indian Ocean, posing a direct threat to it, it has now been decided to campaign against all "super-power presence" in the ocean—even though all absurd theories about the "Soviet presence" in the region have been disproved conclusively.

A second indication, of an even more serious nature, was Prime Minister Morarji Desai's off-the-cuff assurance that India would not conduct any more nuclear explosions even for peaceful purposes. It has since been clarified, following a public outcry, that this was not a policy announcement; but the men in Washington have continued to treat it precisely as such. Only recently, they ventured to suggest that since India had given up its right to conduct nuclear explosions on its own, it should have no objection to an international or American inspection of the Indian nuclear plants under construction also. New Delhi is reported to have rejected the proposal and pointed out that such an arrangement would amount to an encroachment on India's sovereignty. Undeterred, the Americans have gone on to express the hope that the Prime Minister's statement promises also to narrow the differences over the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

A third major proof of "genuine nonalignment" has been seen in India's ambiguous reaction to the Sadat mission to Israel. Somewhat in the style of the American establishment (where any outrageous foreign policy announcement is accompanied by media leaks about alleged differences between the White House, the State Department and the Congress about it), it was later said that it was only an official who had hailed the event, and that the Government itself has stuck to its position of not reacting to the situation — though clearly attempts were being made to disunite the anti-Zionist camp in West Asia and weaken the cause of the Palestinians.

CRUSADE

The heightened US commitment to "human rights" under Carter, similarly is beginning to be seen as an attempt to revive the cold war era of Dulles. The US rulers have revealed no new awareness of the threat to "human rights" posed by racism —the Black US permanent representative to the UN, Andrew Young, has in fact been sharply pulled up for talking too much about the subject, and American efforts are continuing to stall the peaceful settlement of the South African and Rhodesian issues. The mantra of "human rights", on the other hand, is being used as a cover for the stepped up activities of the military hawks and monopolist profiteers. A corollary to the theory of "human rights" has been a phenomenal increase in the US military budget under the new President. This has been accompanied by a new offensive to stall the dialogue with the Soviet Union on detente by making it conditional on Carter's right to pronounce frequently on Soviet internal affairs. It will be a genuine interpretation of the concept of nonalignment if the developing nations are not asked or expected to be neutral on such vital questions of world peace. But today's rulers of our country are not prepared to adopt such a position.

American propagandists preparing India for Carter are peddling the theory that the US foreign policy now represents a radical departure from the legacy of the Nixon-Ford-Kissinger years and seeks also to correct the "tilt" of that period against India. The basic change is spelt out in an official summary thus: "In the wake of the Vietnam experience and the domestic turmoil of the mid-1970s, Mr Carter realized that such an adjustment required the clearing away of some underbrush. This he did in an address to Notre Dame University on May 22, reminding the world that the United States was no longer paralyzed by self-doubt or governed by leaders infected with a 'covert pessimism' about the future of democratic systems".

It is against the perspective of this global role America under Carter is seeking to assert anew that the significance of the Carter visit has to be measured. The public emphasis on the occasion is likely to be put on the economic aspects of Indo-American relations (which will cover the proposal to activise the Indo-US Joint Commission in tune with the new Indian policy of indulgence towards multinationals). But no talk of "genuine nonalignment" can hide the dangerous political dimension of the special relationship that is being sought to be built.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

YEAR-END REVIEWS

Many Shocks, Many Questions

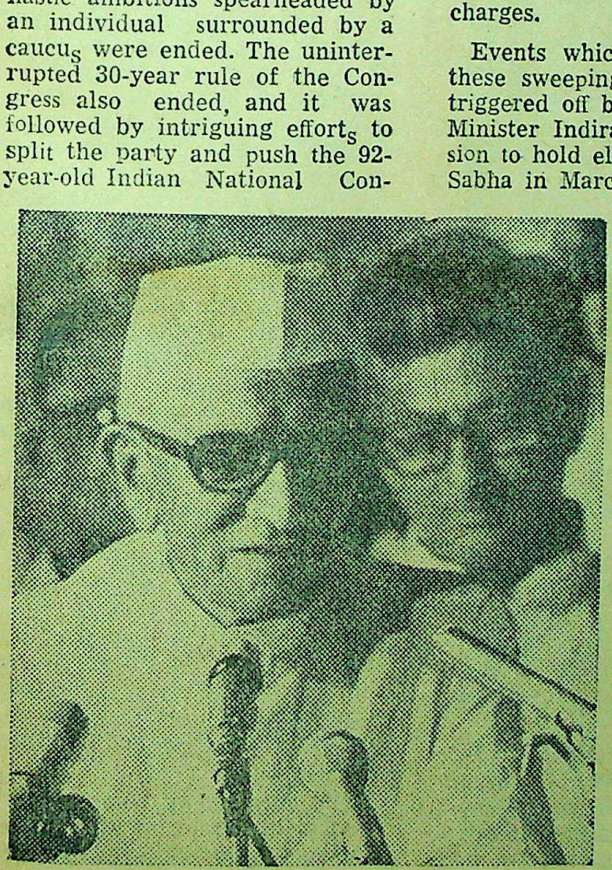
A YEAR of natural and other disasters, shocks, surprises, and collapse of an authoritarian regime the debri of which still clutters the political scene, mounting violence against the poor and growing disillusionment among the masses—1977 passes into history as the Indian horizon seems clouded by thick mists of uncertainty and anxiety. The polity is threatened with fragmentation, administration is in the doldrums; and in spite of a massive buffer stock and a comfortable foreign exchange position the economy is pulled in contradictory directions in bursts of passion and bigotry.

The year began under a continuing pull of emergency misrule, though it soon saw the people assert themselves at the first given opportunity with quiet determination, and with a vengeance, they rejected the emerging depotic structure. Dynastic ambitions spearheaded by an individual surrounded by a caucus were ended. The uninterrupted 30-year rule of the Congress also ended, and it was followed by intriguing efforts to split the party and push the 92-year-old Indian National Congress into a disastrous and uncertain future.

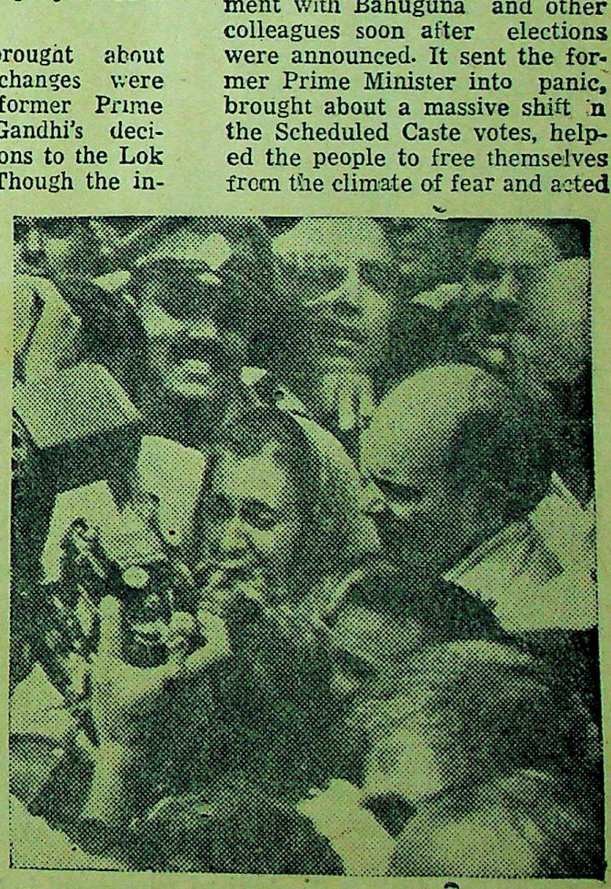
It was a year of poetic justice in that Neelam Sanjiva Reddy, whose candidature for the Presidentship of the Republic led to the 1969 split in the Congress, was installed as the head of the Republic with Congress support. Morarji Desai, whom historical forces had consigned to the political wilderness, emerged to assume the office of the Prime Minister which had sought for long and without success. And a recent fugitive from law and self-confessed planner of sabotage and subversion, George Fernandes became a member of the Central Council of Ministers. The Jayaprakash Narayan crusade against corruption out of which emerged the Janata Party failed to prevent the installation in the new Governments of persons involved before earlier Commissions of Enquiry on such charges.

Events which brought about these sweeping changes were triggered off by former Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's decision to hold elections to the Lok Sabha in March. Though the internal emergency proclaimed on fateful June 25, 1975, continued to be enforced, leaders of various political parties opposed to the Congress were released from jail. They managed to belie the expectation that their disperate groups — wedded to conflicting ideologies and pursuing divergent policies—would fail to put up a united front. By keeping them together in jail during the period of the emergency Indira Gandhi may have prepared the ground for their coming together. Their passion for revenge spurred them to push their differences under the carpet, and pursue single-mindedly the objective of pulling down Indira Gandhi from power.

But the one single development which electrified the atmosphere and finally tilted the scales against the Congress was Jagjivan Ram's decision to quit the Congress and the Government with Bahuguna and other colleagues soon after elections were announced. It sent the former Prime Minister into panic, brought about a massive shift in the Scheduled Caste votes, helped the people to free themselves from the climate of fear and acted



Prime Minister Morarji Desai after election as leader of the Janata Parliamentary Party.



Former Prime Minister Mrs Indira Gandhi after her release.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

as a morale booster for the newly-born Janata Party. The alliance of Jagjivan Ram, Bahuguna and their friends enabled the communalists and obscurantists in the Janata Party to hide their real face, helped the minorities and the poor—a sizable section of the Muslims and the Harijans—swing in its support. Even the rural poor were lulled into supporting the defenders of the landlords and the socially and economically dominant classes in the country.

And, when elections came, as if by a giant broom, the Congress was swept off the political scene in the vast northern stretch from Punjab to West Bengal and Orissa. Not only the Prime Minister and her son suffered ignominous defeats but the Congress drew a blank in Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, Haryana and Punjab. the two other Hindi-speaking States, Rajasthan and Madhya Pradesh—first managed to send one Congress member each to the Lok Sabha. South of the Vidhyas, the picture was different. Andhra, Karnataka and Maharashtra voted for the Congress decisively. The United Front in Kerala and Tamilnadu added to the Congress strength and enabled it to become the biggest Opposition in the Lok Sabha.

The rout in the North appeared largely to be a consequence of the excesses committed in Delhi which had become the laboratory for the experiments conducted by the caucus surrounding the former Prime Minister—experiments with human lives and liberty. Indira Gandhi appeared to have completely cut herself off from public opinion and all channels of democratic communication were blocked. The intensity of the wrath of the people — which they had carefully kept concealed — came as a shock to the vanquished. Even the visitors were surprised; in the wildest of their dreams, they did not expect such sweeping success. The fury with which the people were determined to oust the Congress from power was revealed not only in the Janata Party victory but also in the success of the CPM-led Left Front in West Bengal.

The Congress lost in the North because the Opposition succeeded in making democracy versus dictatorship the main issue. It won in the South where the battle assumed the character of a trial of strength between the rich and the poor.

Riding on the crest of its success in the Lok Sabha elections, the Janata Party lost no time in its bid to consolidate its hold in the States; it dissolved the Assemblies in nine States, without caring for criticism and protest and once again ripped a rich harvest. The success of Janata Party and its allies, the CP-M and the Akalis, in the State Assembly elections completed the first chapter of the post-emergency hurricane which swept the country. The victory of the ADMK in Tamilnadu and later Sheikh Abdulla's success in Jammu and Kashmir highlighted the emergence of regional forces.

Saddled with power, the Janata Party Government felt lost —except where the various passions of its constituents became the base for the reversal of major policies specially in the field of economy, education, science and technology and planning. During the first few weeks the people were served with a plethora of attractive promises; removal of destitution, unemployment, and illiteracy, and promise of a new deal for the villagers, generous assurances to the industrial workers and freedom all round. But the euphoria began to wane rapidly. Prices began to shoot up, housewives and consumers started complaining, workers' agitations began to be greeted with growing intolerance and repression. But the biggest change that came about was in rural India. The landlords, confident that their Government in power, let loose a reign of terror against the Harijans and other sections of the rural poor. Belchi, where 16 poor Harijans were burnt alive, became the symbol of numerous other incidents of inhuman atrocities against and repression of the socially and economically oppressed sections of society.

Not surprisingly, implementation of land reforms was pushed to the background, the food policy altered to suit the wishes of the traders; and in the field of economy multinationals and big business began to be wooed. The planning process came under attack and the concept of time-bound target-oriented five-year Plans were sought to be scrapped with the introduction of the rolling Plan. The autonomy of scientific research institutions was sought to be undermined; and the Government's renunciation of nuclear explosions even for peaceful purposes and research was viewed by the scientific community as a surrender to American pressure. A policy of freezing India's industrial development was paraded as homage to the development of small and rural industries. In fact the role of the backward-looking forces in politics reflected itself in the field of economic policy.

Acting President B. D. Jatti ad ministering the oath of office of the Prime Minister of India to Morarji Desai.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

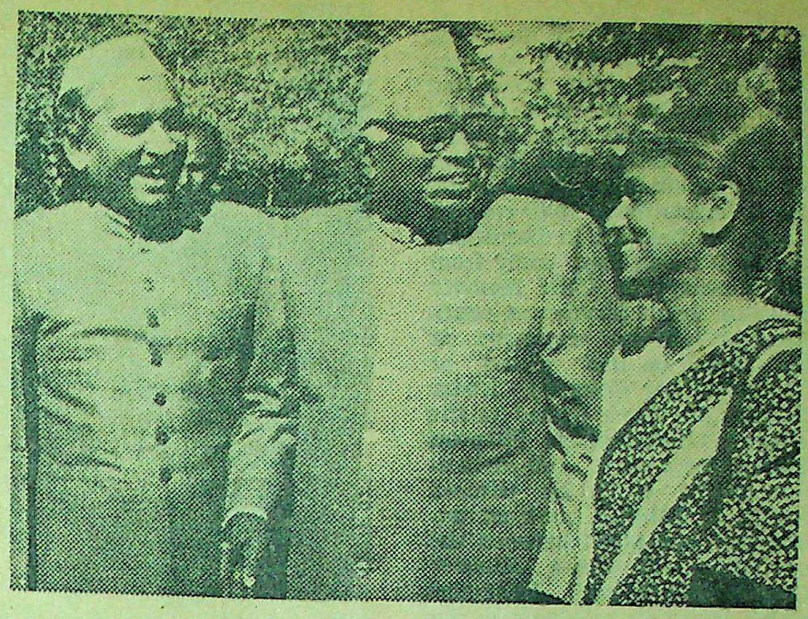
While power acted as a binding force and enabled the disperate components of the Janata conglomerate to remain together, tensions erupted in several States and even as the year ended, there were little signs of the Janata Party acquiring the feature of a viable and homogenous political force. By striking a bargain between themselves, the Jana Sangh and BLD succeeded in capturing the chief-ministership in the Janata-run States. But this alerted the other components who discerned in the emerging pattern a silly device on the part of RSS to spread its tentacles far and wide.

Apart from the personal ambitions of Charan Singh, who continued to covet the primeministership, differences began to become sharper within the Janata Party on several issues. Denigration and defence of Jawaharlal Nehru, attack and support for the public sector, pleas for industrial development and opposition, support and opposition for an open door policy towards multinational corporations, implementation and shelving of land reforms and several other controversies revealed the difference in approach and policy amongst the various Janata leaders. At one stage, it appeared that a serious confrontation might develop.

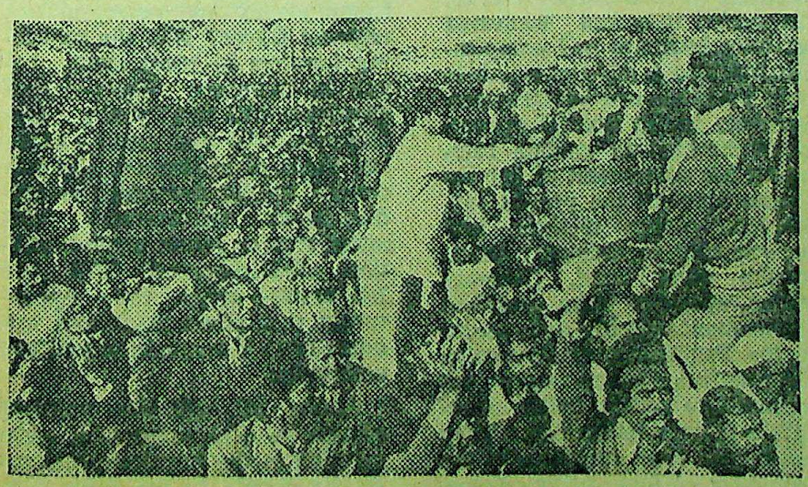


From left: H. N. Bahuguna, Jagjivan Ram and Nandini Satpathy.

The bungling evident in the arrest and release of Indira Gandhi and the volatile public reaction to it helped, on the one hand, the former Prime Minister to launch a big offensive to capture the Congress and, as a reaction, checked the process of differentiation between the various Janata Party groups. The fear of Indira Gandhi and the entire emergency retinue coming back to the forefront spurred the Janata leadership to patch up their differences at least for the time being.

Indira Gandhi, who drew big crowds during her visits to Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and Gujarat, launched a campaign to capture the Congress; and on meeting with resistance from the party leadership, she appeared determined to break it. While on the one hand she was engaged in forging a political instrument completely subservient to her, she simultaneously began a dogged legal battle on the question of the procedures followed by the Commission of Enquiry headed by Justice J. C. Shah. Depositions before the Commission included shocking allegations of atrocities, excesses, abuse of power, emergence of the extra-constitutional authority and actions that inflicted unheard of hardships on the poor, the weak and the defenceless. Commissions of enquiry were also set up to go into the affairs of the Maruti, the Nagarwala episode, allegations about amassing of wealth by former Defence Minister Bansi Lal.

While the proceedings of these commissions were given wide publicity (undoubtedly damaging the image of the former Prime Minister and her entourage) it did not help the Janata Party to maintain its hold on the popular mind or to keep its own house in order. From West Bengal, where the aged P. C. Sen refused to head the ad hoc State committee as a protest against the inclusion of allegedly undesirable elements in it, to Haryana where like his old foe Bansi Lal Janata Chief Minister Devi Lal was locked in a battle with the only woman Minister Shushma Swaraj, the Janata Party appeared to be in the grip of serious convulsions. A majority of the Janata



First Janata election rally at Ramlila grounds.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

legislators were demanding the ouster of the Chief Minister of Himachal Pradesh and the ailing Madhya Pradesh Chief Minister Kailash Joshi was struggling hard to survive the machinations of RSS strongman V K Saklecha (who had earlier been deprived of the chiefministership because the Socialists threw their support in Joshi's favour). In Rajasthan, the BLD group kept away from the Ministry and Chief Minister Bhairon Singh Shekhawat continued to postpone expansion of his Cabinet on one pretext or another. Bihar Cong(O) leader Satyanarain Singh waited in the wings as Chief Minister Karpoori Thakur went on a self-purification fast to repair his tattered image. In Uttar Pradesh an undeclared war raged between the supporters of Home Minister Charan Singh and Bahuguna which found its reflection in the defeat of the Janata Party in a by-election to the State Assembly from the Lucknow city constituency. Sensing that dissatisfaction was mounting within the Janata ranks against him and various constituent leaders were trying to isolate him, Charan Singh decided to demonstrate his strength by organising a massive rally on his birthday and staked the claims of the kisans to lead both the State and the Central Governments.

WARFARE

While the ruling Janata conglomeration was thus engaged in internicine warfare, the quality of the administration in the States continued to deteriorate. While a chain of about 500 railway accidents resulting in the death of over 250 people and injuries to an equal number led to the demand of Madhu Dandavate's resignation, many Janata legislators and others asked the Prime Minister to remove Charan Singh from the Home Ministry because of his failure to give effective protection to Harijans and other weaker sections. Deterioration in the administration was also reflected in the increasing incidents of communal and other disturbances. The Lucknow and the Varanasi riots were symbolic of the general failure of the administration. There was increasing evidence of intolerance towards working class agitations —the killings in Kanpur and Bhilai and the arrest of thousands of teachers in Madhya Pradesh were symptomatic of the Government's attitude.

While the Janata Party was struggling to acquire some coherence under these stresses and strains, the Congress for the greater part of the year was engaged in a bitter internal struggle By encouraging the move for the ouster of Brahmananda Reddy from the Congress presidentship and installing herself in that office, Indira Gandhi set in motion a process reminiscent in form of the split in the Congress in 1969. The script appeared to be the same—charges of a conspiracy with the Janata Party, radical rhetoric, grievance about the persecution of supporters, the move to requisition an AICC meeting, etc. There was a difference. Unlike in 1969 when she was the Prime Minister and she was helped to earn a radical image by a majority of Congressmen who had for long felt thwarted by old-time bosses, this time Indira Gandhi was out of power and the people had before them the experience of several years of her unchallenged leadership. During this period they had witnessed not only intrigues and conspiracies but also a wide chasm between promises and performance. However, Indira Gandhi appeared determined to gamble relying on her assessment of her influence amongst the people, specially the poorer sections, and her capacity to activate them. On the other hand, Congress leaders specially party president Brahmananda Reddy and leader of the Parliamentary Opposition Yashwantrao Chavan were not prepared to accept Indira Gandhi's supreme leadership. They insisted on the acceptance of the principles of inner-party democracy and collective leadership as enunciated by the All India Congress Committee immediately after the Lok Sabha elections. But anxious as they were not to split the party specially when Andhra Pradesh, Maharashtra, Karnataka, Assam and Meghalaya were go to the polls, senior Congress leaders continued to make desperate efforts to prevent a split.

Y. B. Chavan

LEFT UNITY

While the Janata Party and the Congress were thus embroiled in their own internal problems, hopes of left unity were yet to make any significant headway. The CPI, engaged as it was in a reappraisal of its policies and political postures during the last two years, gave a call for the unity of left and democratic forces. The CP-M, anxious to avoid a confrontation with the Centre, was not only acting as a regional status quo party in West Bengal but was also bending over backwards to keep itself on the right side of the Janata. Though Mr Namboodiripad's hope of pulling down the United Front Government in Kerala became somewhat subdued after Chief Minister A. K. Antony's victory in an Assembly by-election, the party continued to respond coolly to the offer of the evolution of a closer relationship between the two Communist parties.

As India enters the new year, the people face several challenges. Will the two major political parties be able to survive their internal strains? If they do not, will this lead to a new alignment of forces based on policies and programmes of secularism, socialism, commitment to democratic values, modernisation and rapid economic development through the instrumentality of planning and emphasis on the public sector? Does the country face the danger of political fragmentation and emergence of regional forces? Will the mounting tensions in rural areas result in increased violence and conflicts? Will the youth and students, who are again showing signs of restiveness (as evidenced by the disruption of studies in 42 universities) will again rise in revolt against political establishments? Will the left parties grasp the opportunity that offers itself and endeavour to emerge as a national alternative.

Above all, will the political system be able to provide some solution to the burning problems of the people before India enters the eighties?

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

New Tensions In Kashmir

THE ushering in of durable political stability, resulting from unprecedented popular participation in the Assembly elections, tops the credit column of the year's balance-sheet of events in Jammu and Kashmir, while the promulgation of the repressive Public Safety Ordinance tops the debit column. Between these two, State experienced Governors' rule for the first time since independence following the fall of the Sheikh Abdullah Government after the Pradesh Congress withdrew its support within a few days of the sudden changeover at the Centre. Within three months, Abdullah swept his National Conference back to power through an impressive election victory and once again established his position in the State's politics.

A significant outcome of the Assembly elections was that the prolonged controversy over the question of the State's accession has been buried deep. All parties and groups, including the extremist secessionists participated actively in the elections and no one even mentioned accession. Serious aberrations in the past on this account had hampered growth both in the democratic and socio-economic spheres. The change augurs well for the country and the State. Perhaps it was with this in view that President Neelam Sanjiva Reddy during his autumn visit to the State observed that the people of the State had once again put their seal of approval on accession and in the process proved that their historic decision taken in 1947 was correct.

The Janata Party set up its unit in the State just before the election and the senior leaders including Morarji Desai, Charan Singh and Jagjivan Ram sought to bolster its image. When the chips were down and the election results were announced it became clear that Kashmir soil is most unsuited for the growth of the Janata seed at least as long as it carries the stigma of RSS domination. The Congress too was mauled by Abdullah's regional National conference forcing it to vacate the seat of power. The fierce election rivalries however did not prevent Abdullah from offering a friendly hand to the Congress with one qualification: he favoured the Indira Gandhi faction.

EGO

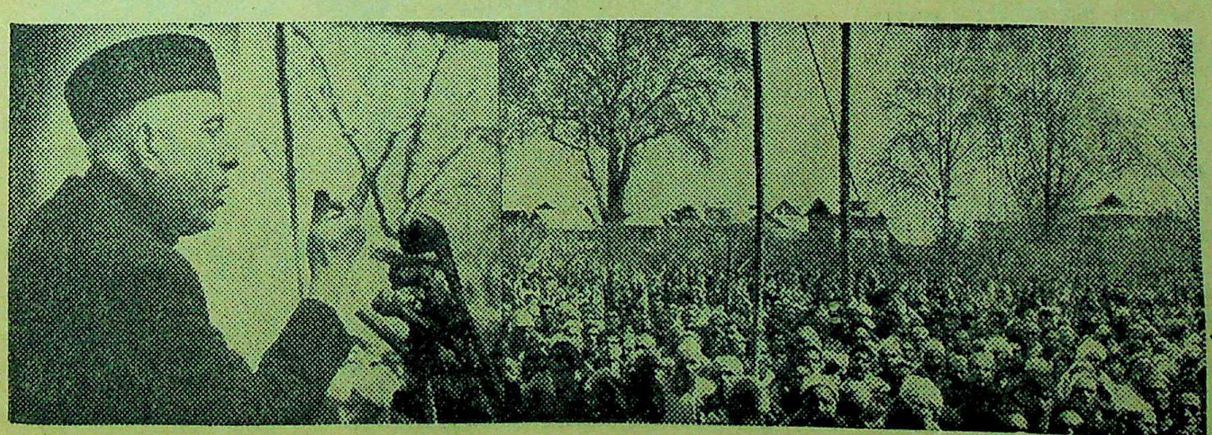
This in a way is an off-shoot of the Janata leaders' attitude towards Abdullah. He has not visited New Delhi even once during the last six months after assuming office. Relations between him and the Centre are anything but cordial known for his ego Abdullah sought to assert the State's autonomous powers vis-a-vis the Centre. He set up a six-member Cabinet sub-committee to review all Central laws extended to the State after August 1953. Whether he can achieve his purpose without the Centre's goodwill does not seen to bother him. He claims his Government is competent to reject Central laws found to be detrimental to the interests of the people of the State or encroaching upon the State's special status. Interestingly when the Congress managed to oust him from power in March. He tried his best to join hands with the Janata leaders but did not succeed. The Janata Party not only spurned him but went further to patronise every group and individual known to be opposed to Abdullah — of course, with disastrous results for the Janata Party. These developments left a trail of bitterness leading to strained Centre-State relations.

The promulgation of the Public Safety Ordinance, widely condemned for its repressive provisions has aggravated tensions. Abdullah's reply to Charan Singh's letter on the ordinance is an indication. Abdullah expressed surprise over the criticism of his action to "defend the security of the State and the country in which the Centre is also an equal partner".

While Abdullah has majority support in the Kashmir Valley, his position in Jammu and Ladakh is not all strong. Jammu's politics is in a melting pot with the Congress in disarray and the Janata in a shambles. Dr Karan Singh heads dissident Congressmen, while the RSS intrigues have split the Janata unit into three parallel bodies.

On the administrative front, Abdullah's Government took some bold decisions like the further reduction in food subsidy and introduction of the three language formula in educational institutions. But some of its actions have invited criticism. Denial of bonus to the industrial workers, the refusal to reinstate 14 office-bearers of the low-paid employees' federation who were dismissed summarily during the emergency and promulgation of the ordinance have created resentment. Abdullah has been accused of squandering the State's meagre resources by appointing an army of Ministers the Ministry with 24 members is the largest so far and acting vindictively against trade unions and the working class. Another disturbing feature is the manner in which Panchayat elections in the Kashmir Valley have been held. All Opposition parties have alleged large-scale rigging and violence, and the State Government has been unable to rebut this change effectively.

Among the distinguished visitors to the State during the year were,



Sheikh Abdullah addressing a mammoth rally at Hazrat-Bal.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Anti-price rise rally.

besides President Reddy, Indira Gandhi and West Bengal Chief Minister Jyoti Basu. Basu came to seek Abdullah's support for his autonomy demand, but the Kashmir leader did not oblige him. Abdullah would like to preserve his distinctive position in the matter. He believes the State already enjoys a constitutionally guaranteed special status, which may get diluted by joining hands with other States aspiring to achieve such a position themselves.

Decimation of the opposition parties at the hustings has adversely affected labour organisations. It was evident from the lack of support forthcoming from the political parties for their bonus demand, and their own failure to organise a well sustained movement in this regard. Political expediencies have deprived them of their right to achieve their legitimate dues.

From Bad To Worse

IT has been a year of overall decline in Gujarat with a series of policy reversals by two successive ministries. In fact, the year dawned on the State with an enormous opening balance of achievements, carefully accumulated during the nine-month President's rule. The surrender to vested interests began with the Solanki Ministry assuming power on December 24, 1976. In striking contrast to the President's rule, the Congress Ministry went on ignoring its own Central Government's 20-point programme. Consequently, the work on land reforms got stuck; rural poor got only more lip service. Though the Labour Minister made some earnest efforts to improve things, they were submerged in the simmering ministerial crisis.

During the Governor's rule wholesale and retail prices of all essential commodities were fixed. Cinema rates, tailoring charges and prices of various dishes and beverages served in hotels and restaurants were regularised. Strict vigilance was kept on them by both the official agencies and popular committees. But when it came back to power, the Congress Ministry unceremoniously abandoned all this in one stroke.

However, if the 14-week-long Congress Ministry had left any unpopular measure unimplemented, the Janata Party Ministry that came to power on April 11, 1977, completed it. In fact, the Janata Ministers flouted their own election manifesto in freezing the implementation of land reforms in the State. They first appointed a committee to suggest measures to remove certain "difficulties" being faced by the "farmers". Soon, another land commission was set up to review the entire gamut of agriculture, including even the concept of ceiling, the very need for land reforms and the agriculture labour wages which were fixed two years ago. Curiously, the panel does not have any representative from the farm labour organisations.

HARASSMENT

Under the Janata ministry, the worst sufferers are the agricultural labourers and Harijans. The village and district-level social justice committees set up during the governor's rule to enforce agricultural minimum wages, untouchability law, etc. are a thing of past now. Nobody cares about the minimum wages. The large army of officials, including mamlatdars, who were entrusted with the implementations of land reforms provisions, have now other jobs. Police officials have even been ordered not to register any complaints regarding harassment of Harijans without the consent of district collectors. As a result, only 50 cases of harassment of Harijans, including half a dozen major incidents, were reported during the first three months of Janata rule.

To placate the pro-kulak Kisan Mazdoor Lok Paksh group in the Morarji Desai with Gujarat Chief Minister Babubhai Patel.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

ruling party, the Babubhai Government even abandoned the groundnut oil levy with which a buffer stock was built last year, enabling the Government to supply oil to the weaker sections through fair price shops. This year the entire system has been abandoned with the result that the poor are forced to pay double the price for oil.

The Vallabhbhai group has been a constant irritation to the Ministry with occasional threats to topple it. For Babubhai, it has been a perennial worry with the Jana Sangh activists making determined bid to wrest control at all levels. In August last, two Jana Sangh Ministers even threatened to leave to force further favourable changes in portfolios. The situation today is that one has to approach the Sangh Ministers or their local satraps to get things done. Thus RSS elements are fast taking over everywhere even in police and public offices. However, the numerically stronger Cong(O) watch all this helplessly.

The Congress is really in an unenviable position with the two distinct groups wasting much energy in wranglings. The party, which had 110 MLAs at the beginning of the year, now has only 75. The fall of Indira Gandhi Ministry at the Centre touched off massive defections. In March-April alone, some 25 MLAs have defected to the Janata Party. It was in fact only a reverse flow. Most of those unscrupulous elements, who had defected to the Congress during emergency, have now gone back. In the process, the Congress has also lost many district panchayats. What has further damaged the Congress morale is the recent bid to split it.

A Violence Strewn Year In Bihar

NINETEEN SEVENTYSEVEN will be long remembered as the year which saw the end of the Congress monopoly of power in Bihar. But at the same time, it will be remembered for Belchi, Pathadda and Dharampura where the poor, the landless and the Harijans were burnt alive, shot down or mercilessly beaten only because they wished to live like human beings.

Increased atrocities on the poor, reversal of almost all progressive policies adopted by the previous Governments, all time rise in prices of almost all commodities and record rise in lawlessness marked the year which in the beginning promised to be eventful.

The victory of the Janata Party in both the Lok Sabha and Assembly elections made the exploiting classes more aggressive. They struck at Belchi and burnt alive over half a dozen people. This did shock the conscience of the people but the Janata leaders instead of drawing correct conclusions from it began comparing it with the atrocities during the Congress regime.

Pathadda followed. Here several Harijan farm workers were mercilessly beaten and their limbs were broken because they had the audacity to demand wages as per act. Again, the government evaded the problem. A minister even supported the perpetutators of violence.

In order to turn public attention from the economic issues involved in tension in the rural areas, a Harijan month was observed to seek social solution to an economic problem the result was Dharampura where landless were shot down by the landlords.

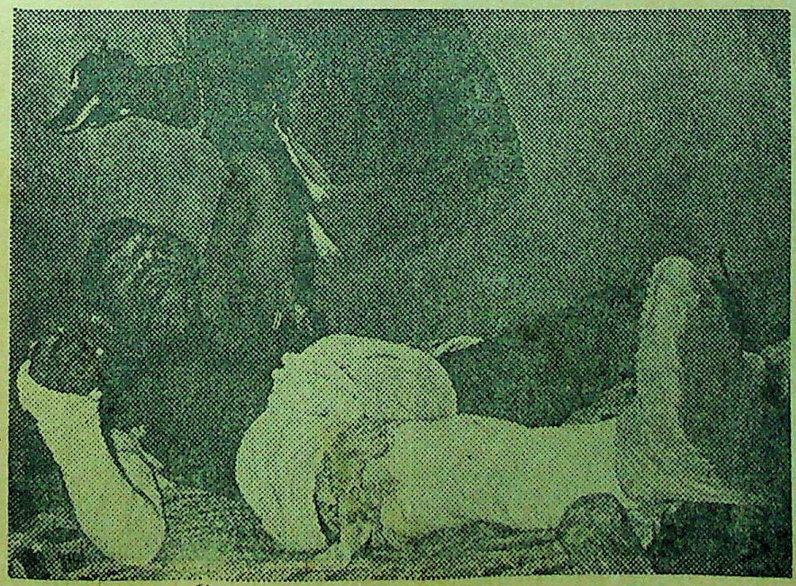
Meanwhile the police, the criminals and the landowners had formed an alliance. While in Barahiya the police and the criminals created a situation in which young boys were shot dead, the police and the landowners killed a Naxalite leader in the police custody and after initially suspending the involved police officers, the government offered them rewards for the "bravery" they had shown in beating to death an unarmed man in chains. This sums up the approach of the government that came to power riding the crest of popular democratic wave.

RELIEF

Implementation of the land ceiling act, minimum wages act for farm labour, debt redemption act all of which could give relief to the poor and go some way to change the socio-economic situation in the villages were given a go by.

Traders never had it so good. They cornered mustard oil and a host of other essential commodities pushing up their prices to an all time high and the government suddenly developed cold feet. It moved only when the situation became explosive. Raids were organized,, some stock seized but no body was arrested. In some cases certain erstwhile Jana Sangh Ministers stooped so low as to apologise to angry traders who demanded their stocks or their money back.

Corruption has also reached an all time high and the administration is paralysed. Minister's additional private secretaries are more powerful than the ministers. This is specially so in case of all but two Jana Sangh ministers because their additional private secretaries were senior to them in the RSS. And these additional private secretaries play havoc with the administration.



Parmeshwar Ravidas, a bonded labourer of Pathadda.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Freedom of press was perhaps one of the biggest achievements of 1977. But towards the end of the year a fresh threat to press freedom loomed large in Bihar

Standstill In Haryana

THE year 1977 has been a period of inactivity insofar as the development of Haryana is concerned. The latter six months particularly have recalled to mind the regimes of Rao Birender Singh and Bansi Lal in the late sixties and early seventies when both were fighting powerful political rivals. Chief Minister Devi Lal, unnerved by the reaction to his dismissal of Labour Minister Sushma Swaraj in November and facing growing dissidence in the Janata Legislature Party, was kept busy travelling to and from New Delhi.

The Ministry headed by B. D. Gupta, which ruled the State for the first four months, had at least maintained some semblance of activity at least until the Parliamentary elections were announced in February. Thereafter, of course, it paid no attention to the State's development; it was solely occupied in fighting the elections which it ultimately lost to the Janata Party. Once the Janata Party came to power at the Centre, it was a matter of time before it was ousted from power—facing frequent diatribes from Charan Singh's Home Department. The Gupta Ministry was dismissed and the way paved (as in half a dozen other States as well) for new elections—the second within three months. In the brief spell of Presidential rule that preceded the formation of the Devi Lal Ministry, Governor Jaisukhlal Hathi did take certain decisions which were at best aimed at maintaining the status quo if anything. And any measures it took concerning workers or employees were promptly revoked by the new Government. An example is the question of confirmation of 15,000 ad hoc employees.

FLOODS

Two major developments affecting the economic and political life of Haryana marked Devi Lal's six months in office. These were the unprecedented floods that followed heavy rains in August and September. They caused a severe setback to the State's economy. In the political field, the several "omissions and commissions" of the regime since the Janata Ministers could no more tolerate looking themselves in public mirror nor were in a position to reform themselves.

led 42 of the 74 Janata legislators, infuriated additionally by the Sushma Swaraj episode, to meet in Delhi to express their disapproval against the leadership. While the State survived the first shock which has nevertheless left deep scars on its economy, the second is proving too much to the Chief Minister.

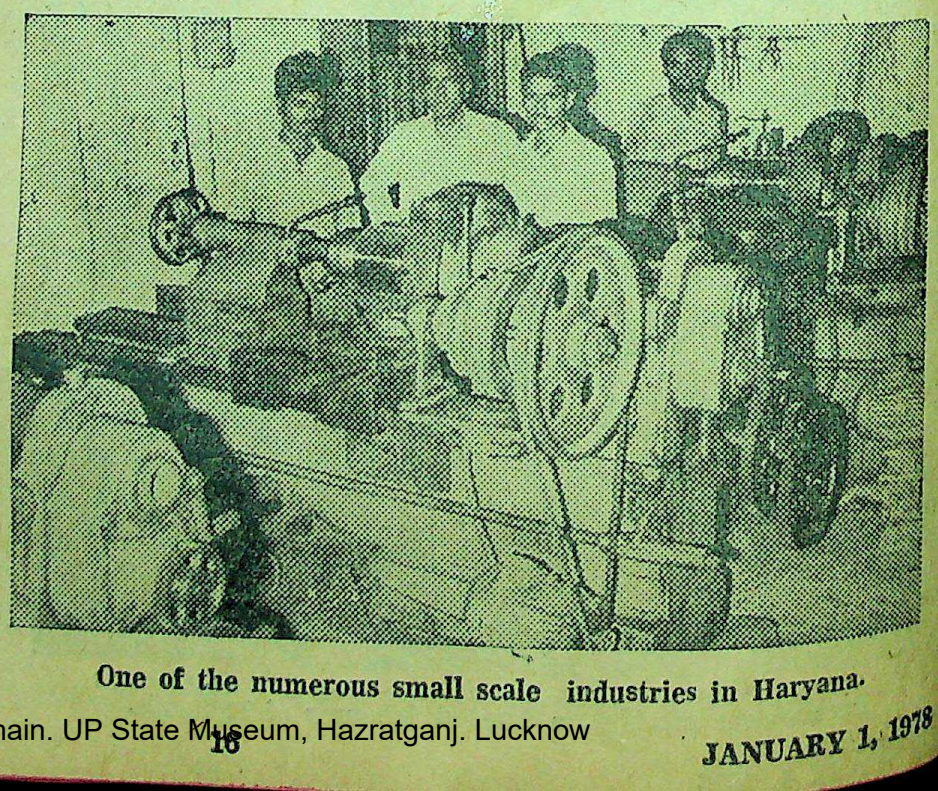
The dissidents have taken up their fight with renewed vigour, putting the ministerialists on extreme alert. Cornered, the Devi Lal group did its best to mobilize attendance for the two Delhi rallies and the Sangria visit of the Union Home Minister Charan Singh who is their main prop at the Centre. However, it is not clear how close they really are to the Home Minister. The rival faction consisting of Harijans and others, also worked for the rallies for a different reason—pledging allegiance to the Union Minister of State, Chand Ram.

Floods, which engulfed one-third of the State, demanded the new Government's attention for over two months. Ironically, it proved to be the most peaceful period for the Jat leader. For this once, all persons, including the dissidents disregarded their political differences and worked jointly in the relief programme. Barely had the Ministry recovered from the floods than it was faced by the Sushma Swaraj episode, which brought the leadership to the brink of ridicule. The Chief Minister, in his effort to stem the rot. Committed one political blunder after another. Ultimately Devi Lal was forced not only to readmit her to the Ministry but to promise to discipline his son and settle the grievances pointed out by the dissidents in separate meetings with members of the Parliamentary Board.

TALKS

One demand of the dissidents was for the resignation of some members from various State committees. With the reported high-level talks for the inclusion of some senior legislators in the Cabinet, it was thought that the political crisis would soon blow over. However, the talks have so far proved to be meaningless or at least half-hearted attempts at reaching agreement. Only two of the Chief Minister's relatives have resigned from the committees, while a score of others remain in office. The dissidents feel that with regard to the reconstitution of the Cabinet, the Chief Minister is trying to borrow time by keeping the aspirants guessing. But this cannot work as four of the five general secretaries of the State Janata unit are openly against the present leadership. Recent action against certain dissidents and their relatives has added fuel to the fire.

The Chief Minister's involvement with all this has left him hardly any time to grapple with the people's problems. The two-point programme, of arranging for drinking water supply to all villages and ending corruption, announced with much fanfare, has remained confined unimplemented though it is still used as a catchy slogan. Development is at a virtual standstill.



One of the numerous small scale industries in Haryana.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Disillusionment In U.P.

IT was a year of great changes for Uttar Pradesh. The people avenged the emergency excesses in March dethroning the Congress and Indira Gandhi from power at the Centre. Three months later they repeated the performance by electing the Janata Party to power, with an overwhelming majority, in the State.

However, by the time the Assembly polls came the electorate had started getting disillusioned with the Janata Party. Between the March and June polls the Janata Party votes fell by 20 per cent. A large section of voters—particularly the poorest and consequently the most exploited—were completely disillusioned and in the Assembly elections most of them voted for the Congress, which increased its voting strength by eight per cent within three months.

Significantly, the Harijans were the first to be disillusioned with the Janata Party. After centuries of exploitation they had seen a ray of hope in the land distribution programme of the Indira Gandhi Government. It did not solve their economic problem but the little land it provided gave them some hope for a brighter future. This hope was shattered when immediately after the Lok Sabha polls there was a large scale eviction of Harijans from the land allotted to them during the emergency. The Janata Party Government which came in power after the Assembly elections in June at first took it easy. However, when the voices of protest rose louder, they were shaken out of their apathy to state: "No Harijan will be ejected from the land allotted in a regular manner". The pretext for inaction was that in many places land was taken away from the people in an irregular manner and given to Harijans. The fact was that the most of the land distributed amongst Harijans was the property of village Panchayats, which were under the irregular occupation of big landholders or village toughs. Their plea was that since they had been occupying the land for a large number of years they had established their claim on it. Apparently the Janata Government in the State found some force in this argument. Despite repeated queries about the number of ejectment cases of Harijans from their land, the State Government has kept silent.

The disillutionment of Harijans was followed by widespread disillusionment amongst Muslims, an economically and educationally backward minority. The State has witnessed three large scale riots after the installation of the Janata Government in the State. In Lucknow and Kanpur the riots were touched off by sectarian disputes amongst Muslims themselves. In Varanasi it was a communal clash. However, the most significant fact in these riots was not the loss of life and property suffered by Muslims or the other community at the hands of rioters, but the loss of life and property at the hands of the police and PAC. The PAC in UP, according to Janata legislators themselves, behaved as gang marauders and indulged in looting and killing during curfew hours. Despite protests and complaints by Janata Party legislators, the Government has taken no action against the police and PAC men responsible for these acts.

AGITATIONS

There were agitations, demonstrations, hunger strikes, threats of violence by students and various sections of Government employees. Most of these agitations were withdrawn though the employees were not fully satisfied by the compromises which they had to accept. The biggest threat of a strike, averted at the last moment, was that of power workers, who accepted a compromise "in the interest of the people of the State", despite the graceless manner in which their demands were only partially conceded.

The UP Government, apparently decided to enter into a compromise with the power workers because their strike would have disrupted the economy of the State. But in the case of secondary school teachers there was no such worry and the State Government adopted a tough line with them, even though the education of millions of students was disrupted. The biggest tragedy was enacted in Kanpur where 11 workers were killed in police firing and two mill officers inside the mill were killed by workers. The workers of Swadeshi Cotton Mills were demanding arrears of their wages and their agitation led to tragedy.

With the workers and other weaker sections of society the Janata Government is tough but it is lenient towards traders and businessmen. The grain dealers were given various concessions, and the sales tax limits were raised besides concessions, in the assessment of sales tax. Traders were allowed even to assess in some cases the amount of sales tax for themselves.

Casteism, and factionalism in the ruling party started with the selection of the Chief Minister. 15 posts for "backward castes" were reserved though there are many more economically and educationally backward sections which were not granted

Ram Naresh Yadav being sworn in as the State Chief Minister.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Freedom of press was perhaps one of the biggest achievements of 1977. But towards the end of the year a fresh threat to press freedom loomed large in Bihar since the Janata Ministers could no more tolerate looking themselves in public mirror nor were in a position to reform themselves.

Standstill In Haryana

THE year 1977 has been a period of inactivity insofar as the development of Haryana is concerned. The latter six months particularly have recalled to mind the regimes of Rao Birender Singh and Bansi Lal in the late sixties and early seventies when both were fighting powerful political rivals. Chief Minister Devi Lal, unnerved by the reaction to his dismissal of Labour Minister Sushma Swaraj in November and facing growing dissidence in the Janata Legislature Party, was kept busy travelling to and from New Delhi.

The Ministry headed by B. D. Gupta, which ruled the State for the first four months, had at least maintained some semblance of activity at least until the Parliamentary elections were announced in February. Thereafter, of course, it paid no attention to the State's development; it was solely occupied in fighting the elections which it ultimately lost to the Janata Party. Once the Janata Party came to power at the Centre, it was a matter of time before it was ousted from power—facing frequent diatribes from Charan Singh's Home Department. The Gupta Ministry was dismissed and the way paved (as in half a dozen other States as well) for new elections—the second within three months. In the brief spell of Presidential rule that preceded the formation of the Devi Lal Ministry, Governor Jaisukhlal Hathi did take certain decisions which were at best aimed at maintaining the status quo if anything. And any measures it took concerning workers or employees were promptly revoked by the new Government. An example is the question of confirmation of 15,000 ad hoc employees.

FLOODS

Two major developments affecting the economic and political life of Haryana marked Devi Lal's six months in office. These were the unprecedented floods that followed heavy rains in August and September. They caused a severe setback to the State's economy. In the political field, the several "omissions and commissions" of the regime led 42 of the 74 Janata legislators, infuriated additionally by the Sushma Swaraj episode, to meet in Delhi to express their disapproval against the leadership. While the State survived the first shock which has nevertheless left deep scars on its economy, the second is proving too much to the Chief Minister.

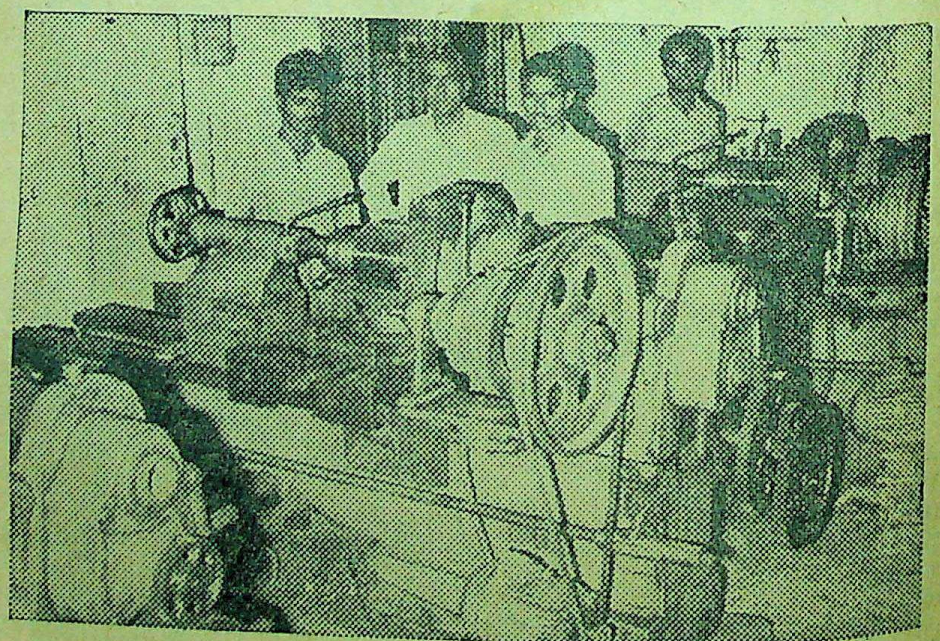
The dissidents have taken up their fight with renewed vigour, putting the ministerialists on extreme alert. Cornered, the Devi Lal group did its best to mobilize attendance for the two Delhi rallies and the Sangria visit of the Union Home Minister Charan Singh who is their main prop at the Centre. However, it is not clear how close they really are to the Home Minister. The rival faction consisting of Harijans and others, also worked for the rallies for a different reason—pledging allegiance to the Union Minister of State, Chand Ram.

Floods, which engulfed one-third of the State, demanded the new Government's attention for over two months. Ironically, it proved to be the most peaceful period for the Jat leader. For this once, all persons, including the dissidents disregarded their political differences and worked jointly in the relief programme. Barely had the Ministry recovered from the floods than it was faced by the Sushma Swaraj episode, which brought the leadership to the brink of ridicule. The Chief Minister, in his effort to stem the rot. Committed one political blunder after another. Ultimately Devi Lal was forced not only to readmit her to the Ministry but to promise to discipline his son and settle the grievances pointed out by the dissidents in separate meetings with members of the Parliamentary Board.

TALKS

One demand of the dissidents was for the resignation of some members from various State committees. With the reported high-level talks for the inclusion of some senior legislators in the Cabinet, it was thought that the political crisis would soon blow over. However, the talks have so far proved to be meaningless or at least half-hearted attempts at reaching agreement. Only two of the Chief Minister's relatives have resigned from the committees, while a score of others remain in office. The dissidents feel that with regard to the reconstitution of the Cabinet, the Chief Minister is trying to borrow time by keeping the aspirants guessing. But this cannot work as four of the five general secretaries of the State Janata unit are openly against the present leadership. Recent action against certain dissidents and their relatives has added fuel to the fire.

The Chief Minister's involvement with all this has left him hardly any time to grapple with the people's problems. The two-point programme, of arranging for drinking water supply to all villages and ending corruption, announced with much fanfare, has remained confined unimplemented though it is still used as a catchy slogan. Development is at a virtual standstill.



One of the numerous small scale industries in Haryana.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Disillusionment In U.P.

IT was a year of great changes for Uttar Pradesh. The people avenged the emergency excesses in March dethroning the Congress and Indira Gandhi from power at the Centre. Three months later they repeated the performance by electing the Janata Party to power, with an overwhelming majority, in the State.

However, by the time the Assembly polls came the electorate had started getting disillusioned with the Janata Party. Between the March and June polls the Janata Party votes fell by 20 per cent. A large section of voters—particularly the poorest and consequently the most exploited—were completely disillusioned and in the Assembly elections most of them voted for the Congress, which increased its voting strength by eight per cent within three months.

Significantly, the Harijans were the first to be disillusioned with the Janata Party. After centuries of exploitation they had seen a ray of hope in the land distribution programme of the Indira Gandhi Government. It did not solve their economic problem but the little land it provided gave them some hope for a brighter future. This hope was shattered when immediately after the Lok Sabha polls there was a large scale eviction of Harijans from the land allotted to them during the emergency. The Janata Party Government which came in power after the Assembly elections in June at first took it easy. However, when the voices of protest rose louder, they were shaken out of their apathy to state: "No Harijan will be ejected from the land allotted in a regular manner". The pretext for inaction was that in many places land was taken away from the people in an irregular manner and given to Harijans. The fact was that the most of the land distributed amongst Harijans was the property of village Panchayats, which were under the irregular occupation of big landholders or village toughs. Their plea was that since they had been occupying the land for a large number of years they had established their claim on it. Apparently the Janata Government in the State found some force in this argument. Despite repeated queries about the number of ejectment cases of Harijans from their land, the State Government has kept silent.

The disillutionment of Harijans was followed by widespread disillusionment amongst Muslims, an economically and educationally backward minority. The State has witnessed three large scale riots after the installation of the Janata Government in the State. In Lucknow and Kanpur the riots were touched off by sectarian disputes amongst Muslims themselves. In Varanasi it was a communal clash. However, the most significant fact in these riots was not the loss of life and property suffered by Muslims or the other community at the hands of rioters, but the loss of life and property at the hands of the police and PAC. The PAC in UP, according to Janata legislators themselves, behaved as gang marauders and indulged in looting and killing during curfew hours. Despite protests and complaints by Janata Party legislators, the Government has taken no action against the police and PAC men responsible for these acts.

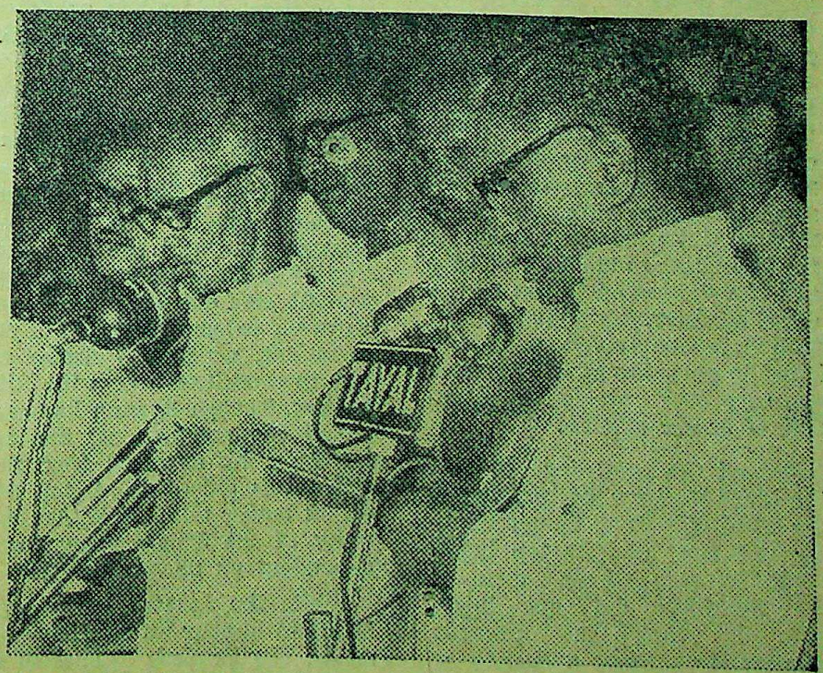
AGITATIONS

There were agitations, demonstrations, hunger strikes, threats of violence by students and various sections of Government employees. Most of these agitations were withdrawn though the employees were not fully satisfied by the compromises which they had to accept. The biggest threat of a strike, averted at the last moment, was that of power workers, who accepted a compromise "in the interest of the people of the State", despite the graceless manner in which their demands were only partially conceded.

The UP Government, apparently decided to enter into a compromise with the power workers because their strike would have disrupted the economy of the State. But in the case of secondary school teachers there was no such worry and the State Government adopted a tough line with them, even though the education of millions of students was disrupted. The biggest tragedy was enacted in Kanpur where 11 workers were killed in police firing and two mill officers inside the mill were killed by workers. The workers of Swadeshi Cotton Mills were demanding arrears of their wages and their agitation led to tragedy.

With the workers and other weaker sections of society the Janata Government is tough but it is lenient towards traders and businessmen. The grain dealers were given various concessions, and the sales tax limits were raised besides concessions, in the assessment of sales tax. Traders were allowed even to assess in some cases the amount of sales tax for themselves.

Casteism, and factionalism in the ruling pzrty. started with the selection of the Chief Minister. 15 posts for "backward castes" were reserved though there are many more economically and educationally backward sections which were not granted



Ram Naresh Yadav being sworn in as the State Chief Minister.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

such concessions. Reservations were made for the "backward castes" not because they were backward but because socially they were treated to a lower in status in society.

Factionalism was introduced in the Government on the very day of the formation of the State Government. The two major groups in the party, the Jana Sangh and BLD, combined to exclude others from power which led to tension on the very first day. It has become more acute. Even C. B. Gupta is disgusted with factional fights inside the party. There were demands from the ranks of the ruling groups for the replacement of Ram Naresh Yadav and at one stage Charan Singh also wanted to drop him.

The Janata Party had come in to power on the basis of freedom of expression and democratic rights. But its State Government has adopted the policy of penalising the press and papers which do not toe its line. In the present atmosphere they cannot do much, but they can deprive the critics of Government advertisements.

The doings of the Janata Party would have proved to be its undoing, but the rival opposition party, the Congress, was in disrray. There was division in the Congress at the State level as well as Centre, But the State level division would have been resolved had it not been for the differences at the Centre. That the Congressmen did not lack courage was well proved during the June electoral contest. But the differences and the infighting amongst the leaders paralysed them and they were unable to give any lead to the workers, students, Harijans and minorities who were struggling against the Janata Party Government.

An Unpopular Team

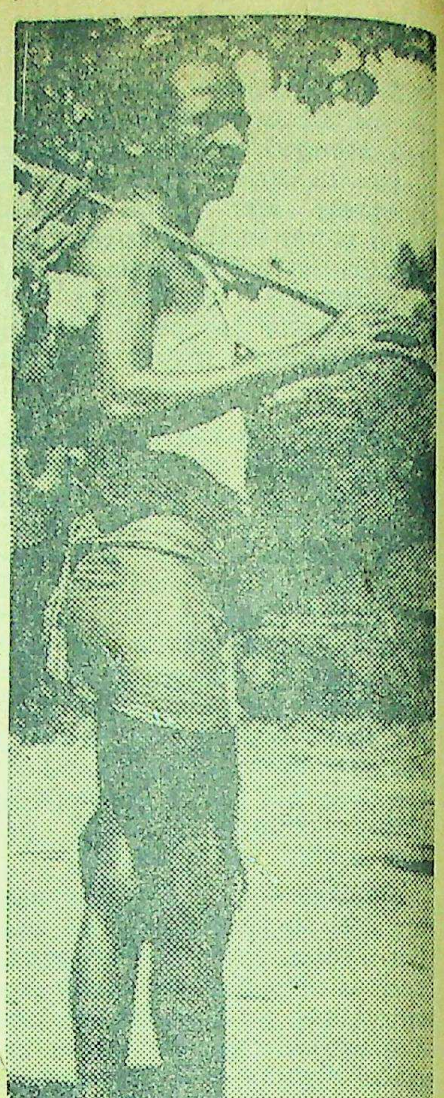
THE total rout of the Congress in the Lok Sabha poll as well as the Vidhan Sabha elections in June were outstanding events of 1977. But the six-month-old Janata Ministry has not covered itself with glory. It was a total failure on the price front. Essential edible items like pulses, groundnut oil, vegetabls including onions have become prohibitively costly. All this has caused disenchantment to the supporters of the Janata Party.

A number of Janata Party legislators publicly appealed to Chief Minister Kailash Joshi to give up his laissez faire policies and take strict action against the hoarders. Joshi promised at the time of assuming office an efficient and clean administration, restoration of basic freedoms and non-interference with the functioning of the judiciary. But with the in-fighting in the Janata Party and the protracted illness of the Chief Minister, the State administration is completely paralysed. Files do not move at all. Services are sore over vindictive transfers of senior officials.

Behind the campaign to oust the Chief Minister interestingly is the hand of a Jana Sangh Minister and most of its top brass. Joshi would have gone if the Socialists did not intervene in time and prevent temporarily at least a change in the stewardship of the State. Joshi eroded his popular base by promulgating the mini-MISA ordinance providing for preventive detention and aimed at foiling a strike by the electricity workers. The law has already divided the Janata Party and the Socialists have announced they would vote against the measure in the Assembly.

The RSS too helped to make the Ministry unpopular. They dominated the managing committees of dissolved cooperative institutions including banks. Minister for Cooperation L N Sharma, who belongs to the RSS hardcore, nominated a large number of RSS and Jana Sangh men. This led to a Cabinet crisis following a threat by the four Socialist Ministers to resign. The situation was saved only after the intervention of Union Minister for Cooperation Mohan Dharia, who rebuked Sharma to cancel the nominations. The Chief Minister pleaded that Sharma did not consult him when he announced the list of nominations, which was drawn by him in consultation with the RSS leaders. Though Sharma has cancelled the nominations, the demand for his dismissal from the Cabinet is mounting. A top Socialist leader told LINK that the unity of the Janata Party was dependent on Sharma's ouster.

While the Janata Party has failed to honour its election promises, the Pradesh Congress is embroiled in petty intrigues caused by the confrontation between Mrs Gandhi and the official Congress.



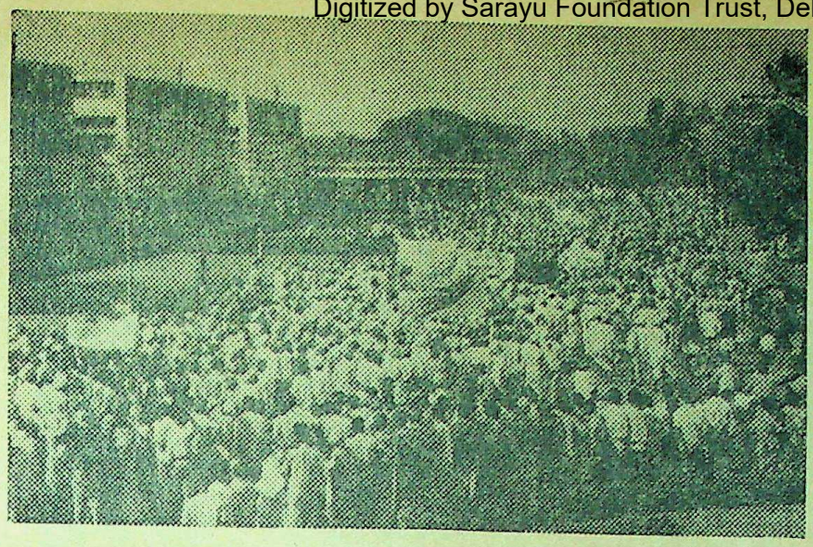
A tribal from MP.

Turbulent Days In Punjab

NINETEEN Seventy-seven was for Punjab a significant year as much for the emergency aftermath as the authoritarian experience of 21 months, writes our correspondent Shaukin from Punjab. Unprecedented unrest among the working people following the Janata Party's rise to power was the single most important phenomenon in the State. Workers of the State Government, the Electrictly Board, State Roadways, school and college teachers, industrial and agricultural workers and also youth and students had to resort to some kind of direct action in the 9 months of Janata Party rule. There had been token strikes, demonstrations and arrests. The Government in most of the cases, took obstinate and even provocating positions like barricading the civil secretariat at the State headquarters and resorting to large scale police action in the districts, taking certain sections of the State's working masses on a collision course with the CPM backed coalition government. The beginning 1978 might see a chain of strikes and bandhs. Debate on the problems of the people in the State Assembly would continue when the House meets on 4 January for a pre-budget session.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Spurt in popular agitations marked 1977.

The year 1977 also left behind a heavy financial deficit which the coalition government has not been able to make up so far because of its inability to levy new taxes, more so because of the Faridkot Lok Sabha and Anandpur Sahib State Assembly by elections. Detailed discussions on key policy matters like taxes and nationalisation of passenger transport were currently going on in the State and the year 1978 might see a wholesale reversal of well laid policies, which during the previous Congress regime were marked by a half hearted or poor implementation.

Verdict For Stability

FOR the United Front in Kerala, 1977 way t.ying and frustrating for the combined Oppositon. Not that the State had more than its share of vicissitudes the country had gone through. It was the peculiar political situation in the State. At the time of March elections, on one side of the line stood the ruling United Front (the Congress, the CPI, the Kerala Congress, the Muslim League, the RSP and the PSP) and on the other, the Opposition alliance, (the CPM, the Janata Party made up of Jana Sangh, the Congress (O) and the CFD, a rival Muslim League, a rival Kerala Congress, besides a rival RSP).

The United Front returned to power with a massive majority. The Opposition failed to win a single parliamentary seat. The massive mandate the ruling front received proved that the vast majority of the people did not want the Marxist Party and its Janata allies to come to power in the State. They also saw to it that the majority they gave the ruling front was such that its stability could not suffer even if one or the other of its constituents pull out of the Ministry.

However, this massive verdict in favour of the United Front was not acceptable to the Opposition, which thought it proper to hurl baseless charges of rigging only to demand the dissolution of the Assembly and fresh elections. Any development in the State or difficulty faced by the Government is seized by the Opposition to agitate for an exit of the Government, the dissolution of State Assembly and fresh elections. They lash in on every occasion from the religious feud rocking the Syrian Christian Church or court verdicts on the Rajan episode to the election petitions involving two State Ministers and a Lok Sabha member.

The importance of 1977 for Kerala is the rejection of alternatives to the United Front and of the hegemonical role for the CPM in an alliance.

LINK

INDIAN NEWSMAGAZINE

WORLD SUBSCRIPTION RATES EFFECTIVE FROM 1.4.77

		6 months	12 months
INDIA, NEPAL, BANGLADESH	: SURFACE MAIL	Rs 18/- Rs. 30/-	Rs 35/- Rs 60/-
AIR MAIL		Rs. 50/-	Rs. 100/-
BURMA SINGAPORE. MALAYSIA	: BY AIRMAIL	Rs. 70/-	Rs 140/-
ALL COUNTRIES	: SURFACE MAIL	Rs. 40/	Rs. 80/-

AIRMAIL RATES TO:

A.	MIDDLE EAST. HONGKONG. INDONESIA. SOUTH EAST :	Rs. 80/-	Rs. 160/-
B.	EUROPE. CHINA, JAPAN FIJI. HAWAII AUSTRALIA. MANGOLIA. AFRICA :	Rs. 125/-	Rs. 250/-
C.	USA. CANADA SOUTH AMERICA :	Rs. 150/	Rs. 300/-

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Spend a good night with us.
Start a good day in Japan.
Six flights a week.

Fly at night. Relax on our smooth overnight flights. You'll wake up in Japan, refreshed. To make yen while the sun shines.

Air-India is the only airline that takes you direct from India to Osaka, twice a week—Monday and Thursday.

And to Tokyo on Sunday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday.

All flights via Bangkok and Hong Kong.

AIR-INDIA

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Fragile International Calm

THE sun is setting over the year 1977 against a relatively calm political horizon, internationally. There are clouds, no doubt, very dark clouds over southern Africa and West Asia as well as the Horn of Africa where a fratricidal war is on. There are also undercurrents, but they are not strong enough to raise a storm, except in the minds of the Chinese soothsayers, who have been forecasting a world war for more than a decade now. It looks as though East-West detente will hold unless some very important people go berserk. The fragility of the calm, however, lies in the fact that world peace is based not so much upon friendly cooperation among nations as on the sense of horror that the vision of a nuclear war creates. It is out of such fears that peace is kept.

This fear, coupled with the war merchants' desire to make profit, has given a fillip to a reckless arms race. As the year closes, the NATO countries have decided to strengthen their forces in Western Europe with the moth-eaten plea of fighting the Soviet threat. The threat, according to the NATO Defence Ministers, has arisen from the arms build-up of the Warsaw Pact countries. Hence, they have thought it necessary to add to their stock of anti-tank missiles by one-third of present strength or by about 45,000 more of them. The NATO powers have also been discussing the question of giving clearance to the US project to mass produce its new horror weapon, the neutron bomb, for deployment in West European countries.

NEO-COLONIAL THRUST

The arms race is partly the result of the neo-colonial ambitions of the Western world, headed by the US, and the lingering desire to "contain" Communism. The other very important reason is the lust for profit. The year has seen billion of dollars' worth of arms being sold to the Third World, mainly the Gulf states, for strategic and economic reasons. The arms race has acquired a new dimension, that of competition in the market. There has been much heartburning between the US and its Western partners, primarily Britain and France. Arms trade is most profitable, earning profits of between 50 and 500 per cent. How costly it becomes for the poorer countries can be judged from the fact that a jet bomber costs as much as the price of 100,000 tons of sugar. Understandably, no arms exporting country has supported the Soviet suggestion that there should be a cut of 10 per cent in the military budgets of the permanent members of the Security Council.

These reasons are also mainly responsible for the lack of progress in the Vienna and Geneva talks. The SALT-2 negotiations in Geneva have passed through several optimistic stages; for example, in September this year, Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko and US Secretary of State Cyrus Vance met in Washington and declared in a communique that "progress was achieved in bringing closer the positions of the two sides." They decided that they would abide by the SALT-I agreement though it was to lapse early in October. Both were optimistic, though very cautious in making promises, and they are still optimistic for there is no rational alternative to the limitation of nuclear arms. But the differences are substantial and important, to use Gromyko's words. If any progress has been made, it is not yet known. The differences centre on categorising strategic nuclear arms and then fixing the permissible limit of the different categories. For example, whether the American "Cruise" missiles and the Soviet "Backfire" bombers are strategic nuclear weapons or only improved tactical weapons not covered by the present negotiations, has not been settled.

As for the Vienna talks on reduction of armed forces in Central Europe, they are showing no progress because the NATO countries insist that the Warsaw Pact countries have a superiority and that therefore their cut should be heavier. The Warsaw Pact countries stand by the agreed formula that the balance of strength evolved in Central Europe should not be disturbed. Therefore, cuts should be more or less equal, however, heavy they may be in absolute terms. They highlight the unreasonableness of the Western stand by pointing out that their proposal to freeze their respective military strengths at the present levels, till agreements are reached, has not been accepted.

BELGRADE

In view of the stockpiling of arms in different regions and the increasing number of armed forces, detente continues to be unstable. This is also evident from the differences of opinion in the Belgrade conference which has been in session for more than two months to assess the implementation of the Helsinki accord, which forms the basis of the East-West detente. The year 1977 has only confirmed that the West is still following its policies of domination and expansionism. At the same time it has also shown that the logic of times is compelling it to come to terms with the Socialist world and to also take into account the urges of the newly-liberated people.

President of the Soviet Union, Leonid Brezhnev.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

An example of this is provided by the steady, though still slow, expansion of trade and economic collaboration between the two blocs which are no longer solidly opposed to each other in every field. The Soviet Union and Italy have signed a ten-year programme of economic cooperation and a long-term credit agreement. Similar agreements have been signed by the Soviet Union with West Germany, France, Japan and the US firms. The US will help the Soviet Union to build a mineral fertilizer complex and a centre for international trade and scientific ties in Moscow. The Soviet Union has now the offices of at least 130 Western concerns and the Socialist countries own at least 20 banks in Western Europe.

Whether the Western cold warriors like it or not detente is making a headway. This must be noted as a very important factor in international relations today. The tensions and frictions arising between the East and West get modified by the needs of economic cooperation.

THIRD WORLD

But the problems of the world are not exhausted by those involving the East and West. The Third World, trying to shake off the burdens imposed by centuries of imperialist domination, is facing acute problems of poverty, colonialism and racism, regional tensions and the mounting pressure of neo-colonial forces against their economic and political independence. Arabs in West Asia have still to free their occupied lands from the Israeli aggressor and the oppressed people of southern Africa are shedding their blood for liberation from the most inhuman racist rule, while the people of Latin America are ranged against Yankee exploitation that is aided by native dictators. All are united over the demand that a new international economic order be established—an order that will help the long exploited countries to achieve industrial breakthrough and secure the benefits of the scientific and technological revolution. The year 1977 is ending without promise in this regard.

The UN General Assembly session, which ended in the third week of December, was described by the President of the session Lazar Mojsov as a "working session" perhaps because the Assembly went through the agenda of 131 items and the Assembly and its committees met 537 times adopting 256 resolutions. But in terms of achievement it failed to produce "spectacular results" to quote Mosjov again. Ever since the sixth special session of the General Assembly (1974) adopted its proposal on a new world economic order, the UN and its committees as well as international organisations like the FAO have been trying to give some practical shape to the proposal in vain. The Third World asked for a restructuring of the international market so that a fair exchange between the primary commodities exported by them and industrial goods from the advanced countries is effected. They also asked for an easier access to capital and technology possessed by the industrialised countries and a reduction in debts and easing of repayment problems. What the UN General Assembly achieved in its latest session was no more than adopting the proposal that further discussions on a new world economic order should be conducted by the entire membership (149) of the Assembly. This, in fact, is a recognition of the failure of earlier attempts to take substantive decisions—for example in the Paris talks, popularly known as the North-South dialogue. The old discussions of such issues as the "Common Fund" for stabilising commodity prices, transfer of resources, etc will be continued at a larger gathering.

In the meantime the debt burden of the developing countries will grow heavier, and pass he already fantastic figure of 190 billion dollars. The West will continue to stint on the promised aid of 0.7 per cent of its GNP and may add a little to the present 0.36%. There is no indication that the European Common Market (EEC) will change its protectionist policy or that the gap between the prices of the primary commodities and the manufactured goods will decrease. On the contrary, in the light of the UNCTAD forecast, the poor nations may grow poorer in relation to the rich nations.

It is a gloomy picture. It may change, but not before the developing countries forge some kind of sanctions as the oil-rich OPEC group has done by acting in unity on the question of oil prices. This plus much greater regional cooperation is needed to exercise pressure upon the Western multinationals, without which they will not change their present ways of exploitation of the poorer countries.

WEST ASIA

Lack of Arab unity and the requisite degree of pressure on the Israeli aggressor and its patron, the United States, has also resulted in a certain worsening of the situation in West Asia. Fresidest Sadat's visit to Jerusalem in November, followed next month by the talks between the Egyptian and Israeli officials, which was also attended by the US and United Nations representatives, and the Cairo summit where President Sadat and Prime Minister Menachem Begin exchanged views possessed all the features of a conspiracy against the Arab cause. It is not surprising that many radical Arabs have described the Egyptian President. as a traitor. This evoked an angry response from Mr

The remains of Chairman Mao lying in state.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Sadat, who dubbed the Arab leaders attending the Tripoli conference as "stupid and ignorant pigmies". He broke diplomatic relations with four Arab countries and closed the Consulates of the Soviet Union and other Socialist countries. All this has grievously weakened the Arab struggle to liberate the occupied territories.

The most convincing "scenario" (to borrow an American phrase) of the West Asian prospect is that under US guidance, Cairo and Tel Aviv will reach a firm understanding about partial vacation of the Sinai peninsula. This will help strengthen Mr Sadat's position among his people and may soften Syrian resistance to piecemeal settlements. As for King Hussein, there is no one more willing to reach an understanding with Israel on the question of the West Bank, provided he has given some concessions and assured of protection from the wrath of the Palestine Liberation Organisation. He has always looked up to Britain and the USA for support and succour, even from the CIA.

The year 1977 is closing on a concerted attempt by the US and its clients in the Arab world to keep the Soviet Union out of any West Asian settlement, to postpone the proposed Geneva peace conference to an indefinite future and to persuade the unwilling parties to make mutual concessions, which in the final analysis will favour Israel and allow it to retain the most strategic portions of the occupied territories. The biggest loser, if the attempt succeeds, will be the Palestinian Arabs, who will be cheated of their right to a sovereign, independent homeland in the West Bank—after having been cheated of their ancestral home in the state of Palestine which disappeared with the birth of Israel.

SOUTHERN AFRICA

A more optimistic picture emerges in another arena where the oppressed people are fighting to free themselves and take destiny into their own hands. The Zimbabwe people in Rhodesia and the Namibian people in South Africa as well as the African population in the Republic of South Africa have stepped up their armed struggle against the racist regimes. The front-line African states have taken a united stand to support the guerilla fight and show no inhibitions in asking for moral and material help from the Soviet Union and other friendly countries. The Anglo-American axis has been doing its best to create illusions about the immediate possibility of negotiated settlements in Rhodesia and Namibia, if not in the Republic of South Africa where the John Vorster regime is well-entrenched.

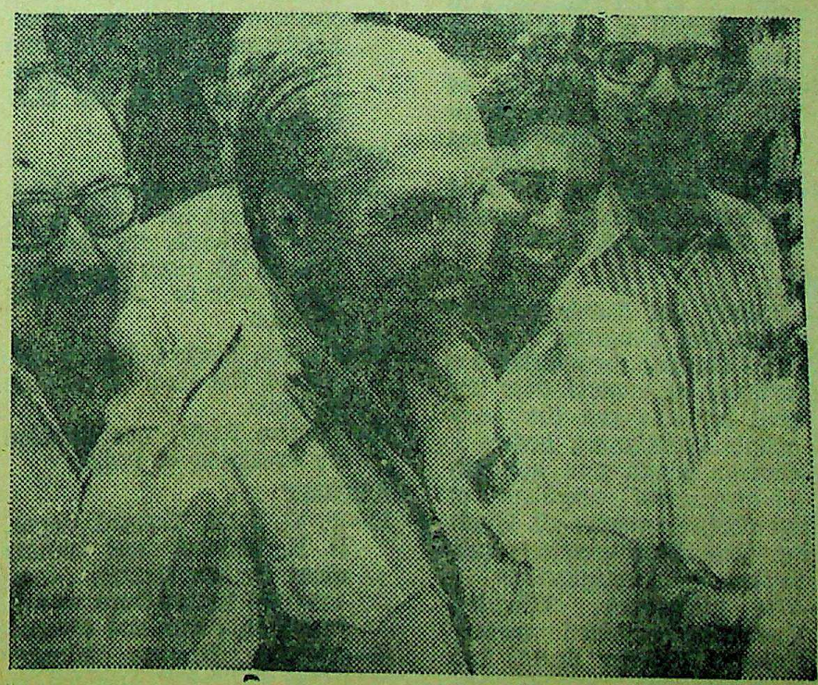
Bishop Muzorewa in Rhodesia and some tribal chiefs in Namibia (who held a constitutional conference in Windhoek) are in effect doing harm to their people by seeking unfavourable compromises with the illegal and brutish rulers. But it can be said that the year is ending not on a gloomy note, despite the treacherous and ugly role played by the racists and their imperialist patrons. The nationalists may not have scored big successes but they represent a vital force which is bound to grow with the passage of time and ultimately win full freedom for their people.

The outgoing year like any other in the past, is leaving a patchwork quilt of events and forces. The darkest patch is left by the neo-colonial, racist and zionist forces which tend to eat the rest of the world as provides of cheap labour or retainers. The most powerful contrast is provided by the growing forces of socialism, led by the Soviet Union. The socialist world is leading the battle for peace and cooperation among nations. The new Soviet constitution marks the coming of age an advanced socialist state, showing the way to radical changes. Only if the Chinese Communists had not pitted themselves against the Socialist world and not alienated large sections of the Third World, the international forces of progress would have been far stronger. But the Peking leaders have chosen to cast their lot with the US and its NATO allies in the hope of cutting a bigger slice from the world economy and military resources.

EUROPE

Europe provides a many-coloured view: the left forces growing in Italy, France, Spain and Portugal, which point new ways of advance to socialism; there is at the same time a recrudescence of fascist elements in West Germany and elsewhere, a danger to which Willy Brandt drew urgent attention; the urge to unify the European community is contending with the desire to defend national interests and there is no knowing which force will win.

The Third World as an entity is asserting with greater emphasis its policy of non-alignment and demanding a greater share in the world resources through a new economic order, but as separate states they do not always pull their weight in the same direction. The reactionary regimes most often act as reserves of the Western capitalist world, while those governed by progressive ideas take a bold stand against neo-colonialist and other reactionary forces in the world. Those who wish to have the best of both worlds—a rather difficult proposition— keep vacillating. Carter's visit to India and other countries will show where they stand at the dawn of the new year.



General Zia-ul-Haq.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Major Events—1977

National

JANUARY

3—India was declared a 'Sovereign Socialist Secular Democratic Republic; 36 articles of the Constitution Act 1976 including amendments to the Preamble of the Constitution came into force.

19—President Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed dissolved the fifth Lok Sabha.

FEBRUARY

2—Agriculture and Irrigation Minister Jagjivan Ram resigned from the Union Cabinet and the Congress.

10—President Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed issued a notification in New Delhi calling upon the 542 parliamentary constituencies in the country to elect their representatives to the sixth Lok Sabha.

11—President Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed succumbed to a massive heart attack a little after 6 a.m. He was pronounced dead at 8.52 a.m.

MARCH

16—The country went to the polls to elect the sixth Lok Sabha.

21—The Janata Party and its allies won absolute majority in the sixth general elections with a combined tally of 271 Lok Sabha seats out of 448 results declared.

22—Prime Minister Indira Gandhi submitted her resignation and that of her colleagues in the Council of Ministers to Acting President B. D. Jatti.

24—Morarji Desai, Chairman of the Janata Party was sworn in as the first non-Congress Prime Minister of India.

27—The Government revoked external emergency clamped on December 3, 1971.

APRIL

10—Gulzari Lal Nanda resigned from the Congress.

12—The Cabinet Secretariat was stripped of control over the civil services and the economic intelligence bodies.

13—Swaran Singh was appointed provisional president of the Congress party; all Working Committee members submitted their resignations.

14—The Congress Working Committee expelled former Defence Minister Bansi Lal from primary membership for six years; it also decided to reprimand former Information and Broadcasting Minister V. C. Shukla for misuse of power and abuse of mass media.

30—Acting President B. D. Jatti dissolved nine Legislative Assemblies with Congress majorities and brought the States under President's rule.

MAY

1—The leader of the Congress for Democracy, Jagjivan Ram decided to merge the CFD with the Janata Party; Chandra Shekhar was chosen president of the Janata Party.

19—A one-man commission comprising Justice J. C. Shah, retired Chief Justice of India was appointed to inquire into emergency excesses.

30—Over 46 persons were killed when the 13-Up Tezpur Express plunged into a flooded Beki river when the bridge on the Rangiya-Rangpura section collapsed.

JUNE

4—The Maharashtrawadi Gomantak Government won the fourth General Elections to the territorial Assembly in the Union Territory of Goa, Daman and Diu.

10—At least 19 persons were killed and many more injured in group clashes or police firings in the first round of polling in Bihar.

21—Election placed the State Legislature Party leadership predominantly in the hands of its Jana Sangh and BLD factions.

JULY

4—Sheikh Mohammad Abdullah, leading his men in an electoral battle for the first time in 25 years was swept into power in Jammu and Kashmir.

21—Neelam Sanjiva Reddy was elected the sixth President of India.

25—Sanjiva Reddy was installed as President of India.

AUGUST

15—P. C. Sethi, Yashpal Kapur, R. K. Dhawan and others close to Mrs Gandhi were arrested in pre-dawn swoops in Delhi, Patna and Kanpur

23—Former Defence Minister Bansi Lal was arrested by the Haryana police.

SEPTEMBER

7—The Nascent Industrial District of Ghaziabad exploded in violence in arson and three-hour-long firing in which two were killed and 67 injured.

10—The Planning Commission decided to terminate the Fifth Five Year Plan one year ahead of schedule.

17—Former Orissa Chief Minister Nandini Satpathy was arrested and bailed out.

OCTOBER

3—Mrs Indira Gandhi and four of her former Cabinet colleagues—K. D. Malaviya, H.R. Gokhale, P. C. Sethi and D. P. Chattopadhyaya—were arrested by the CBI—

4—Mrs Gandhi was released by the Delhi Additional Chief Metropolitan Magistrate.

10—Fiftythree persons were killed and 146 injured when the 103 Up Howrah-New Delhi Deluxe rammed into the rear of a stationary goods train at Naini Railway station.

23—A. K. Antony, Chief Minister, was declared elected to the Kerala Assembly.

NOVEMBER

4—Prime Minister Morarji Desai escaped with a split lip when the TU-124 Indian Air Force plane he was travelling in, crashlanded just outside Jorhat airport. Five crew members died.

6—Jammu and Kashmir Governor L. K. Jha promulgated an Ordinance giving sweeping powers to the State Government

19—Andhra Pradesh was hit by the worst ever cyclonic storm killing an estimated 10,000 people and destroying property worth crores and crops spread over about 30 lakh hectares.

21—Former Prime Minister Indira Gandhi declined to appear before the Shah Commission.

23—Twenty persons, including Rajya Sabha member Prakashvir Shastri, were killed and 21 seriously injured when the engine and 11 coaches of the Delhi-bound Ahmedabad mail derailed between Ajarka and Bawal stations.

DECEMBER

18—Mrs Gandhi resigned from the CWC.

28—Mrs Gandhi pulled her seven supporters from the CWC, taking the Congress to the verge of split.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

International

JANUARY

4—China and Bangladesh signed their first agreements—on trade and payments and economic and technical co-operation—in Peking.

10—Press censorship was clamped in Sri Lanka under emergency regulations.

12—Hundreds were reported killed in volcanic eruptions near Rwanda's border with Zaire.

18—Dzemel Bijedic, Yugoslav Prime Minister was killed in a plane crash near Sarajevo.

20—Jimmy Carter was sworn in as 39th President of U.S.A.

FEBRUARY

13—Edward Sokoine was appointed Tanzanian Prime Minister.

24—Former Bangladesh Head of State Khondakar Moshtaque Ahmed was sentenced to five years prison on charges of corruption.

MARCH

5—Thousands were killed in an earthquake in Southern Rumania.

11—An opposition strike call paralysed Karachi and army tanks moved in to check spreading violence.

16—Lebanese leftist leader Kamal Jumblatt was murdered in an ambush outside Beirut.

18—The first civilian Cabinet was formed in Afghanistan.

25—The Pakistan Government locked up the leaders of the nine party opposition alliance.

APRIL

1—The Soviet Union rejected American proposals on Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT).

3—President Anwar Sadat flew to Washington for talks with President Carter.

7—572 persons died in an earthquake which struck a number of villages in Iran.

9—At least 16 persons were shot dead in the worst anti-Government riots in Pakistan.

18—Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin resigned after his wife was fined a quarter of a million Israel pounds for a foreign currency offence.

21—Major-General Zia-ur-Rehaman was sworn in as President of Bangladesh following the resignation of Abu Sadat Mohammed Sayem.

23—Bangladesh dropped secularism as one of its state principles in favour of Islam.

MAY

10—A 15 nation NATO summit opened in London.

15—Pir of Pagaro, acting president of the opposition Pakistan National Alliance was placed under house arrest.

23—South Moluccan's held over 100 children in a Dutch school as hostages.

24—Soviet President Nikolai Podgomry was relieved of his duties as a member of the political bureau by the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee.

25—A four-ship US navy task group headed by a guided missile cruiser entered the Indian Ocean.

29—The Ethiopian Government closed the American, British and Egyptian defence attache offices in Addis Ababa.

31—Rhodesian forces occupied Mapai, Mozambique.

JUNE

2—A Pakistani High Court ruled the martial law imposed by Bhutto to be illegal under the constitution.

5—Left-winger Albert Rene seized power in Seychelles.

17—Communist Party General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev was unanimously elected President of the Supreme Soviet Presidium.

20—Menachim Begin took over as Israeli Prime Minister.

26—Djibouti gained independence.

JULY

5—The army took over the civil administration in Pakistan and imposed martial law.

8—President Carter relaxed control over foreign arms sales.

21—Egyptian forces destroyed Libyan tanks, armoured vehicles and shot down two jet fighters in a border clash.

22—The United National Party, led by J. R. Jayawardene won a landslide victory over the Sri Lanka Freedom Party in the eighth general elections.

30—Deputy Premier Teng Hsiao Ping returned to public life after 15 months political exile.

AUGUST

4—Archbishop Makarios, President of Cyprus died following a heart attack.

19—Hua Kuo-feng was chosen chairman of the Chinese Communist Party.

20—A 35-hour curfew was clamped in Sri Lanka.

SEPTEMBER

2—U.S.A. and Cuba opened missions at the two capitals.

3—Deposed Prime Minister Z. A. Bhutto was arrested on murder charges.

9—Nepalese Prime Minister Tulsi Giri resigned.

12—Kirtinidhi Bista was appointed Nepal's Prime Minister.

13—Z. A. Bhutto, Former Pakistan Premier was released on bail.

15—The six year state of emergency was lifted in Pakistan.

17—The army arrested Bhutto and ten of his close supporters under martial law regulations.

21—Socialist Republic of Vietnam was admitted as a member of the United Nations.

OCTOBER

1—Elections in Pakistan were postponed indefinitely.

2—More than 100 people were reported killed in an abortive coup attempt by dissident Bangladesh troups in Dacca.

12—North Yemeni President Ibrahim Al-Hamadi was assassinated in the capital.

13—A Lufthansa Boeing with 86 aboard was hijacked.

18—West German police commandos blasted their way into the jet at Somalia's Mogadishu airport and freed all hostages.

20—The military seized power in Thailand.

NOVEMBER

9—Martial law orders were repealed in Bangladesh.

12—The South African Government adopted wartime powers.

24—Rhodesian forces attacked Mozambique.

DECEMBER

1—John Vorster's National Party won a majority in South African elections.

5—Egypt broke diplomatic relations with Syria, Libya, Algeria and South Yemen.

8—Portuguese Premier Mario Soares handed the resignation of his minority Socialist Government.

10—Malcolm Fraser was swept back into power in Australian elections.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

An Amorous Diversion

BIHAR Agriculture Minister Kapildeo Sinha's threat on the floor of the legislature to muzzle the press was not just an angry outburst of a Minister, for Kapildeo has been nursing a grievance against the CPI daily Janashakti for having opposed his patronage of Devan Singh, a criminal and pervert, whose conduct sparked off trouble at Barahiya in which seven young boys were killed and several others were maimed, Devan Singh is the son of Kapildeo Singh's cousin who had been given toll collecting contract for Balgudar Ghat for about rupees one lakh when the Government had earlier realised rupees three lakhs from the same ghat. Janashakti exposure not only resulted in the cancellation of the contract but led to even Jayaprakash Narayan indirectly indicting Kapildeo Singh.

Even at that time word was process to the officers of the Information Department to restrict flow of advertisement to some of the newspapers. The process was on when Janashakti came out with another exposure. This time it was about welfare Minister Kameshar Paswan's, visit twice to an 'after care home' and having developed fancy for a girl and trying to pressurise 'home' Superintendent Vidya Sinha to send the girl to him. When his own efforts failed, the Minister sent his friend Raja Prasad to persuade the Superintendent. He too failed and the Superintendent was transferred. The Janashakti report created a furore. Letters from the inmates went to the Chief Minister and Jayaprakash Narayan and the issue was raised in both the Assembly and the Council. The Chief Minister asked an officer of the Welfare Department to inquire into the charge. The officer found nothing against the Minister, his friend or staff and held the lady Superintendent guilty. Even Kapildeo Singh while replying to a calling attention motion by Mrs Kamla Sinha of the Janata Party and several others admitted that the enquiry was made by an officer of the Welfare Department, over which the accused Minister himself presided.

The 'after care home' is located in a dilapidated house in Patna. It is a misnomer that only socially condemned women are sent there. Rukmini, a sixteen year old handsome girl for whom the Minister is reported to have fallen, came to this 'home' while she was very young. Her father and relatives had been killed by dacoits and there was nobody to look her after. The police sent her to 'after care home'. Similarly there are girls who have married boys of their choice. Their parents filed suits on the plea that the girls were minors. The court sent them to the 'home' pending a decision. There are about 96 inmates in this 'home.'

GROUSE

The lady Superintendent of the home Mrs Vidya Sinha aged about 50 and her deputy Leela Devi were not on good terms and Leela Devi's husband who is said to be a retired peon used to report against Mrs Sinha to the higher authorities off and on. During Mrs Sinha's superintendentship one inmate had died and two had tried to escape one of whom was later caught. These complaints had been enquired into several times and Mrs Sinha had been exonerated. But the complaints, mostly anonymous, continued to be raised. This gave the Minister a pretext to visit the 'home' on July 17 within a few days of joining the Cabinet. he reached there with an army of officers, and was received by girls and the inspection continued for some time.

Along with the Minister, had also gone his additional private secretary and some of his close friends. The additional private secretaries in case of Jana Sangh Ministers—Paswan belongs to erstwhile Sangh—are in fact Ministers' bosses since they are invariably RSS men who held more important positions in the Sangh than the Ministers. Only two Jana Sangh Ministers who were themselves important RSS functionaries are exceptions.

The next day the lady Superintendent received a telephone from the Minister to see him with the file of Savitri. Since there were five Savitries the Superintendent went there with the files of all the five. According to the reports, the Minister was angry when he saw the lady Superintendent alone. He asked, "are you the custodian of files." The Minister talked indirectly in the beginning but when the lady Superintendent refused to take his hint she was asked to bring the girl who had sung a welcome song. It was Rukmini, not Savitri.

A fascimile bearing the signature of Raja Prasad on the visitors book of the 'After Care Home.'

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

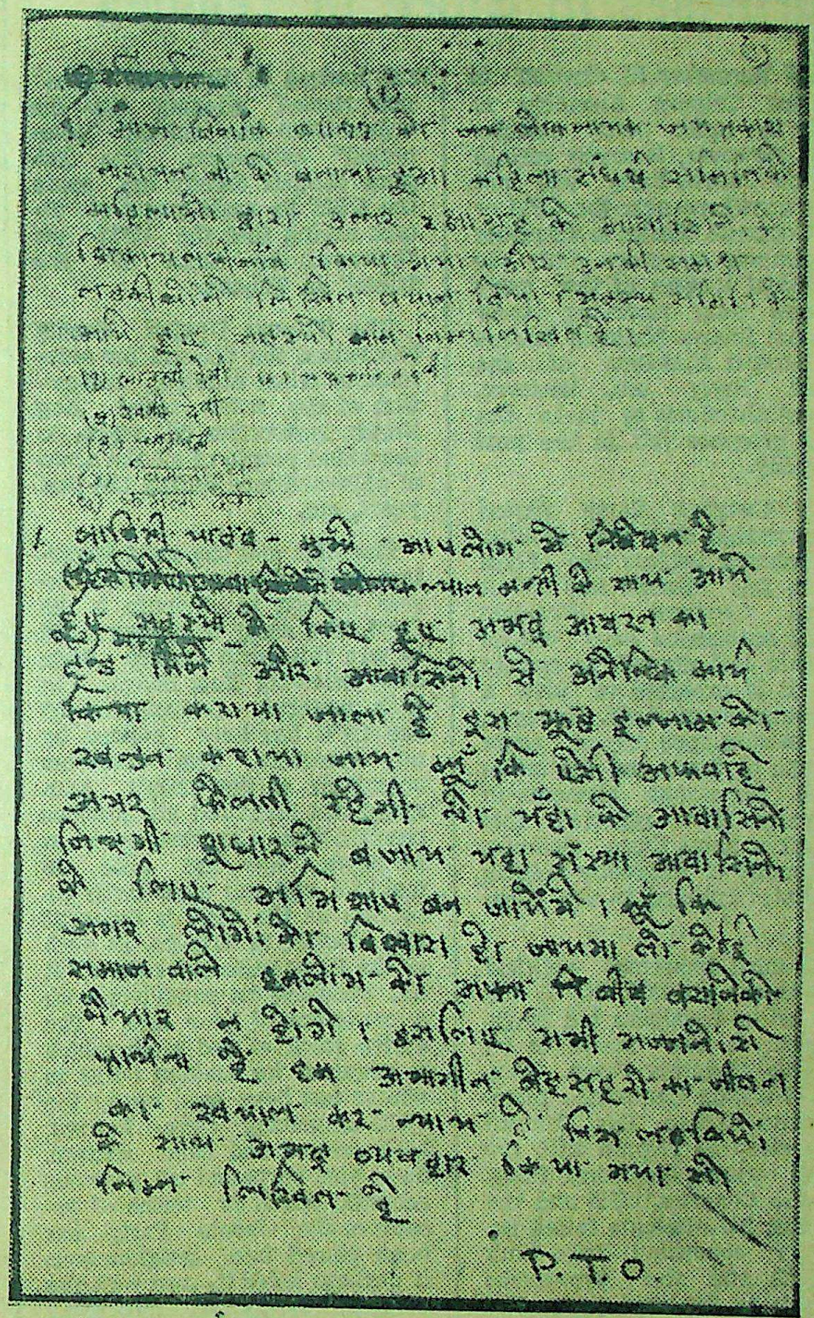
The lady Superintendent was also told that the Minister was considering her promotion. But it did not work.

From the next day, telephone calls to the lady Superintendent began. Some said she was being transferred, some said she was on the verge of suspension. Some one reached the 'home' on the pretext of adopting Rukmini. That was not possible since she was only 16.

On July 28, Raja Prasad, who claimed himself to be a close friend of the Minister went to meet the lady Superintendent. He tried to persuade Mrs Sinha to be reasonable and practical. He also threw hints that Kameshwar Paswan would do only what he wanted him to do. He telephoned the Minister's residence from there and said something in code and left promising to come again. Raja Prasad had visited the 'home' with the Minister on July 17 too. This time when he went alone he was asked to sign the visitors' book which he reluctantly did before he could meet the lady Superintedent. The Government does not deny Raja Prasad's friendship with the Minister but denies his visiting the 'home' on July 28. But the facsimile (see photo) which was placed on the table of the Council by Mrs Kamla Sinha gave lie to the Minister's claim and proves beyond doubt that Prasad did go there. But why did he go?

OLD CHARGES

Efforts to penalise Mrs Sinha continued. The old charges were raked up and the Minister reached the 'home' again with his staff and officers on October 10. But that day he was in a terrific mood. While he continued the inspection, members of his staff went inside and started alluring and vexing the girls. The girls later told the Superintendent also about it and wrote to Jayaprakash Narayan and the Chief Minister. A delegation of Mahila Sangharsa Samiti that visited the 'home' and examined the girls also found the charge correct. But the lady Superintendent remained firm. She was transferred. Mrs Sinha represented against her transfer to the Director of Welfare who sent the representation to Dy. Director for comment. The Dy Director in his comments made it clear that all charges against Mrs Sinha had been inquired into several times by Patna DM, Patna City SDO besides the Dy Director himself and had been found unsubstantiated. Yet Kapildeo Sinha while replying to the calling attention motion repeated the same charges to justify the Minister's visit. (He said the Minister visited the home only once but there are evidences to show that he went there twice).



P.T.O.

First page of the memorandum submitted by the inmates of the home.

But several questions arise, to which the Minister had no satisfactory reply. Why the charges against Mrs Vidya Sinha which had been found to be incorrect were raked up? How many Welfare Ministers had visited the home in the past? Why Raja Prasad, a friend of the Minister, visited the home and why the Government is denying that he visited the home? Why was Mrs Sinha transferred when the charges were not substantiated? Why does Government fight shy of a high level probe into the episode.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Surprises In Store In Tripura

THE December 21 election to the Tripura Assembly is likely to upset many calculations. However, it seems certain that the Janata Party will not come anywhere near the CPM or the Congress. Theirs is therefore a lackluster campaign. Only the individual leaders of the party are now busy reserving their personal image. National leaders and Central Ministers of the Janata Party are, however, making all efforts to make the party presence felt in the next Assembly.

The Congress Party started the campaign on a low footing. But younger leaders like Priya Ranjan Das Munshi and West Bengal Congress President Purabi Mukherjee have helped it regain lost ground. In certain areas it is expected to give a good account of itself. However, it is handicapped by an acute shortage of funds and the antics of the pro-caucus elements in the party. It is reported that in certain areas these elements are directly or indirectly helping candidates opposed to the Congress.

The third important political party in the election fray is the CFD led by Sachindra Lal Singh. However, it now seems to be with the Congress Party. Congress Working Committee member Priya Ranjan Das Munshi had arrived in Tripura with the idea of forming an United Front with the Congress, CFD and the CPI. But his attempts failed because of opposition from both the CFD and the pro-caucus elements in his own party. Das Munshi's plan was for the Congress to fight in 35 constituencies, CFD in 20 and the CPI in five. He felt this combination would give Tripura an extremely stable Ministry.

CONCERN

The fourth important party in the election is the Tripura Upajati Juva Samity which is actually causing serious concern and anxiety to the CPM in this State. This party has been instrumental in breaking the CPM's strongest base in Tripura—the traditional Communist base. Seriously embarrassed by the tribal youths organisation, the important leaders of the CPM have now started alleging that the organisation has started "communal" campaigns. The Tripura Upajati Samity has made the CPM its main target of attack saying that the CPM has "betrayed the cause of the tribes" in Tripura.

The Tripura Upajati Samity has raised the demand for autonomous tribal districts, recognition of the tribal script Kog Borok, restoration of rights to the tribal people of all the areas of alienated land during the past years, etc.

The fifth and the most important political party in the present context in Tripura is the CPM. The Party is making a bid to win this north eastern State also, following West Bengal. The high powered campaigning by the CPM has been noticed by all observers. The resources seemingly at the party's command has surpassed all previous records. The Congress, even in its heyday, was not able to mobilise and use such large resources as the CPM is doing at this election in Tripura. In each of the 60 constituencies the CPM has provided its candidate with a minimum of four cars. The entire stock of red cloth which is required for making quilts in winter has been used up by the CPM in making flags. Posters, both printed and hand written, have also surpassed all previous records. While in terms of resources the Janata Party has been placed into insignificance, it perhaps holds its own with the CPM in terms of mobilising State leaders. While the Janata Party has concentrated on the Central leaders, a few West Bengal leaders and the Central Ministers, the CPM has mobilised its Central leaders and those from West Bengal and Assam.

STRENGTH

The CPM's main strength however lies in the organisation of the State Government employees. In Tripura, it is alleged, the Government employees have openly and directly involved themselves in the CPM's election campaign. Allegations were submitted to the Government against 400 such employees. There were counter allegations by the CPM also. So far the Government has issued show cause notices to 110 employees.

However, these show cause notices have not been taken seriously by many. Because in the past those employees who were punished by the previous Government were exonerated by the next. According to senior Government officials, this seriously affects discipline and morale of the administration. Government servants' involvement in electioneering has been referred to the Janata Party leaders in their election campaigns.

While discussing the election campaign one is inevitably drawn to a comparison of the parties standing for the Lok Sabha elections in March. At that time the Congress had gained a majority in 35 out of 60 Assembly constituencies, the CFD in 14, the CPM in only 10 constituencies and the Upajati Juva Samity in just one.

But in the Assembly elections this pattern is not likely to be repeated. There will be serious vote splitting because in every constituency there will be a multi-cornered fight. Splitting of votes will seriously affect the election results. The largest number of voters in one single constituency is just about 20,000. Thus most candidates will probably win their seats with very small margins. This is precisely the reason why observers feel that the election results will upset all calculations.

Make LINK
Your Weekly
Reading Habit

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Sugar Nationalisation

REPLYING to a half an hour discussion on nationalisation of sugar industry in Lok Sabha on 16 December, the State Minister for Agriculture and Irrigation Bhanu Pratap Singh said: "we will not say 'no' to any proposal coming from any State Government which wants to nationalise it. We will not stand in that way. If the State Governments want to nationalise it, let them do it. There is no difficulty. The State Governments are as well empowered to take over sugar factories as Union Government."

But the situation is not so simple because at the moment no State Government seems to be insisting on nationalisation of the sugar industry Bhanu Pratap Singh earlier stated: "As the UP Government wrote to the Union Government several times not once, only once they wrote to the Janata Government after it was established here. Earlier they were writing to their own Government; they passed a resolution. They had ample time to implement that resolution. But they never intended to implement it. But they wanted to take advantage of it and held out a threat to the sugar magnates, perhaps. We cannot say what passed between the UP Government and the Union Government. As far as this Government is concerned, we received only one communication and that was in April 1977 perhaps. But before we could reply the Government in UP was also removed from office. The next government did not write to us. They did not press for it and they are not insisting that they be nationalised".

Why they were not insisting was clear from the reply Prime Minister Morarji Desai gave to a question in the Lok Sabha on 28 November, 1977. He said, "this prevailing problem is a complicated one. So far as UP and Bihar are concerned and more complicated because of low production of sugarcane. They have taken no steps to increase production. They go on asking for more and more prices because of bedeviling the whole issue. So it has to be gone into more deeply. We are trying to do that". Bhanu Pratap Singh was more categorical when he said that "seven public sector factories are under the control of UP State Sugar Corporation over the last four years and their performance is miserable."

Actually the sugarcane production has gone up. In 1976-77, the area under sugarcane cultivation was 29 lakh hectares which increased to 32 lakh hectares in 1977-78. The total production of 154 million tonnes of sugarcane in 1976-77, is expected to increase to 165 million tonnes in 1977-78.

As far as the sugarcane producer is concerned, his position remains the same. He has been receiving a uniform price of Rs 8.50 related to 8½% recovery from 1974. While the international price of sugar has fluctuated £ 700 a tonne to £ 100 a tonne in the world market, the Indian sugar magnate has been assured of a constant price which has been moving up in this country. Thus in spite of a slump in prices reported by the Minister for Food and Agriculture Bhanu Pratap Singh, the number of sugar factories in operation in India has increased. In 1975-76 231 factories were in operation. In 1976-77 this number rose to 235 and 1977-78, 257 factories were in operation on 22 December, 1977. This shows the sugar industry to be in a very satisfactory position in India regardless of the world market.

ARREARS

According to Bhanu Pratap Singh all these factories paid only Rs 590.80 crores as the price of sugarcane to the sugarcane producers. Even this was not paid monthly and on 30 September 1977 Rs 14.48 crores was in arrears.

Out of the 257 factories in operation during 1977-78, there are 103 sugarmills in UP and Bihar (30). Out of these sugar mills, 66 mills are more than 25 years old and some are more than 30 years old. At one time the sugar mills in UP and Bihar provided the bulk of the sugar for India. Even today these mills supply half of the sugar to India, the other half having been diverted to new mills in Maharashtra, Karnataka, Tamilnadu and Punjab. Ironically Maharashtra with 47 sugar mills produces the best quality of sugarcane. But the residents of Maharashtra despite this improvement in technique and production have to pay Rs 4.50 per kilogram of sugar. Therefore more efficient production in the cooperative sector, has not resulted in any relief to the consumer. On the other hand, the sugar industry has been heavily subsidised by the Government. The sugar industry has not made any efforts to modernise and get optimum output from the factories. The Public Accounts Committee in its 155 Report stated: "The Committee is firmly of the view that since no efforts have apparently been made by the sugar industry to modernise its equipment, adopt improved methods of production and expand their existing cane crushing capacity to make economic the gain of excise rebate and similar incentives have mainly put the premium on inefficiency and increased black-money". Even the Government could not benefit out of excise duty. While it was charging the excise duty on the basis of a price of Rs. 320 actually Rs 465 and more were being collected from the wholesale market in India and that was the price at Hapur.

EXCISE DUTY

The new Janata Government has benefited the sugar industry as much as the old Congress Government. They have reduced the excise duty by Rs. 47 which means there has been a sacrifice of revenue of Rs. 103 crores to the Central Government But this rebate has not been passed on the consumer. Out of Rs. 47, only Rs 25 has been passed on to the consumer and Rs 22 is being retained by the sugar factory owners. As far as the sugar industry is concerned, like all other private sector industries, it is also financed by the Government for the benefit of private industrialists An Economic Survey was made of 48 sugar companies by the Commission of Sugar Industry and it found that of these 48 Sugar companies the borrowing from the nationalised banks were of the tune of Rs. 97.44 crores from financial institutions Rs. 11.93 crores and from other public institutions Rs. 16.25 crores. It is with the money from these public institutions that these sugar factories operate. It is the money that the consumer pays which goes in their private pocket. A very little of it passes to the State in the form of taxes. They are so insulated that in spite of recession in the world sugar prices their profits and their prices not only remain intact but go on increasing. The Commission on Nationalisation of sugar industry recommended the entire private sector of the sugar industry other than the cooperative sugar factories should be nationalised.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The marketing at the level of wholesale trade should be completely nationalised;

Provision should be made for adequate representation of labour and cane growers in the nationalised sector and in the cooperative sugar factories at all levels;

For formulating and attacking policies in regard to the entire sugar industry, public sector and cooperative sector and for administration of the public sector of the sugar industries, statutory bodies and organisations should be set up.

These recommendations were not accepted by the Congress Government and it was left to the State Governments to nationalise the industry, though it was suggested that the States could take any action, the fact remains that the resources which enable the Government to take over sugar factories are in the hands of the Central Government and not in the hands of the State Government. Therefore no State Government, and here in particular UP and Bihar, where there are large sugar factories, can nationalise them. The Government is prepared to take over sick mills but it is not the sickmills but the mills that are not so sick which should be taken by the Government so that they can run in profit and provide adequate prices to the cane grower, adequate wages to the labour and sugar at reasonable prices to the consumer. There is a profit of Rs 200 per tonne which is just going into the black market and creating a parallel economy. The sugar lobby has been the most effective lobby in India and one of the biggest institutions of corruption of political life. If the sugar factories are nationalised, the State as well as the Central politics of India will be much better and cleaner. This will be an additional by product of the nationalisation of sugar industry apart from its economic benefits.

agriculture

Small Farmer : Unending Woes

THE Parliamentary Public Accounts Committee, in its 41st report presented to the Lok Sabha last week, has observed that there is no evidence in the material placed before it to show that all possible efforts were made to assess the requirements of various inputs and to ensure their availability to the cultivators in time, while launching the agricultural production programme. It is not surprising that set targets could not be achieved. But the PAC's conclusion that the whole programme was "patently over-optimistic and unrealistic", when read with its noting that not even a proper evaluation of the inputs needs was made prior to the implementation of the plan, raises the question; whose needs are to be fulfilled to achieve the success of a programme to boost agricultural production?

The improvements or changes in institutions and policies to effect plans, followups and to monitor the implementations can be beneficial only when priorities are properly aligned and coordinated to reach the level of the poorest farmers who are still bereft of the advantages of the all-round breakthrough in our agriculture. The Indian farming community is basically one of marginal farmers. The average holding of about 63 per cent of them is 2.27 hectares or 5 acres. Such farmers use their family labour for agricultural operation and when extra hands are needed as during paddy transformation, the neighbouring families help out each other on a mutual exchange basis. They employ traditional methods of ploughing, planning and sowing —often with much worn out implements. It is common to find a poor farmer borrowing a pair of bullocks to plough his land.

These small cultivators produce traditional crops. Some of them, whose lands are near a town do go in for vegetables in half an acre or so and take them to the vegetable mandis. But the price they get from the wholesalers is not sufficient to encourage modern techniques of vegetable plantation. This class of farmer is still selling its produce at the weekly village market—we mean, whatever, is left after the consumption by the family and the stock set aside for next year's seed requirements.

These small land holders have their own methods of planning and organisation, finance management and capital for cultivating their lands. The technological developments, introduction of tractors and other improved and quicker methods of preparation of fields, sowing or harvesting, is not available to them. The local agencies like cooperatives, Banks or extension officers consider these holdings too insignificant to give them any place in planning for higher production. If some of them do go in for HYV seeds or fertilisers, their lack of knowledge about proper application of the latest know-how, results in such a low yield compared to the increased cost of production of HYV seed crops that they immediately revert to traditional crops and methods. Even in areas which are easily accessible, the average gross cultivated land area under HYV is at the maximum 25 per cent or so; the rest of the holdings are still under traditional crops.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

IDLE TIME

Apart from low yields, the use of local seeds affects cropping intensity, the multiple pattern of sowing is not possible as the maturity period of the local seed crops is very long. These small farmers have no agricultural activity for about four months in a year.

Fertilisers and irrigation, the most important of the inputs are not generally available to the marginal farmer, at least not at the correct time. Even if he manages to procure credit, it takes so long to fulfil the formalities that by the time he has the financial capacity to purchase the inputs, either the stocks finish or it becomes too late to get the full advantage of the use of fertilisers or watering.

The basic problems as can be visualised from the above discussion are two-fold; the farmtr's lack of knowledge of the innovations in agriculture and secondly the non-availability of credit facilities. To develop an awareness about the modern techniques and their advantages, field trials, demonstrations and adoption of the lands of small farmers are the only realistic method. Seminars and talks arranged by the fertilizer industry or agricultural departments even at block offices do not attract a small land holder. He is either busy on his own land or doing labour for neighbouring big farms or trying to earn wages in nearby towns. He does not have the time to attend such functions, where in any case he is given a very back seat. A practical demonstration at a field in his village, will develop, in small farmers, a greater confidence about the efficacy of modern methods.

Secondly, a very intensive planning has to be done for providing easy and quick financial assistance to small land holders. In this the major role will have to be given to nationalised banks. These farmers are too poor to become shareholders in cooperative societies. The banks that have rural branches or are the lead banks in particular areas should be encouraged to coordinate their financing role with the Agro-Service stations which provide tractors and other implements on hire, and Government seed and fertiliser stores, If a fixed target is given to the Extension departments and the banks to bring at the end of a season a particular number of small land holders under the various schemes of assistance, they will be more willing to persuade this class to take financial and technical help. Farmers can be grouped together to plan ploughing by tractor from Custom service stations and have the harvesting and other operations also carried out by machines. This ordinarily, a single small land holder would not be able to afford.

A farmer holding two hectares of land requires much less financial credit than bigger farmers who till now have been the major beneficiaries of the bank loans. Moreover a small farmer has lesser ability to resist or postpone payments. For a wheat crop on a 2-hectare holding the total outlay on preparation of land through tractor, fertiliser, seeds, pesticides and irrigation, harvesting and salt would come to approximately Rs 100 to Rs 1000 at the maximum. Compare this with the loan for a tractor which is now in the region of Rs 35000. If one advance for a tractor is withheld it can help about 30 marginal farmers. The bigger cultivator can make do by hiring a tractor from the Agro-Custom centres. The same amount of Rs 35000 can help construct 5 to 6 tubewells which can on a cooperative basis provide water for irrigation. The farmers can be charged for using these tubewells on the same basis as canal irrigation taxes.

A crash programme to bring them under credit schemes, and integrated development of the agricultural knowledge and expertise of these small farmers would go a long way in boosting total production and making social justice a reality in the rural sector.

HAVE YOU AN IDEA ?

Any Idea

Just one on

Family Welfare

then, turn it into a Slogan

The Slogan should be Crisp. If you can help to motivate married couples, consistent with the current policy on Family welfare, the prize is yours.

Even if yours is the second best, you will get Rs.500/-

Closing date 14.1.1978

WIN Rs. 1,000

Write to : V. N. KAKAR Chief (Media)
Ministry of Health and Family Welfare P. B. No. 5410
New Delhi

davp 77/392

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A Feature on Nepal

Rising Aspirations

A VISIT—even a short one—to Kathmandu, its neighbouring towns and the villages beyond can be a discovery. Suddenly, one realises how little one knows about the many changes which have come about in this Himalayan neighbour of ours, over the last one decade or so. Suddenly, the commonplace notions seem so incorrect excepting, of course, the view that Nepal is a land of rugged and awe inspiring beauty.

But Nepal is not merely a land of beauty. It is a land of rising aspirations like most developing nations of the world. It is in the developmental sphere that much change has come about in this Himalayan Kingdom, though as one moves to the interiors, there is the feeling that the change is little slow: Poverty is as serious a problem in Nepal as it is in many Indian villages. Then, Nepal is also faced with the problem of lack of resources due to the smallness of size and dearth of cultivable land.

RESOURCES

Only about one-sixth of the 54,718 square miles of its area is under agriculture, the rest being mountainous regions of dense forests and snows. There is little scope for any heavy industry, though efforts have been made in the recent years to explore possibilities in this sphere also. Perhaps, the major potential in Nepal lies in the field of cottage and small industries and exploitation of its forest and water resources.

However, this can be possible only with the cooperation of India because Nepal is not presently in a position to utilise all these resources to its advantage. The history of cooperation between the two countries is as old as their common land mass. As many others have noted in the past, no two other countries have ever had such close and intimate religious, ethnic, cultural, linguistic, geographical and economic ties as Nepal and India. This closeness has occasionally caused tensions between the two countries but the realisation that to prosper, they must live together has always enabled them to overcome such difficulties.

A major step forward in overcoming some such snags was taken during the recent visit of Prime Minister Morarji Desai to Kathmandu at the invitation of Prime Minister Kirtinidhi Bishta-India's friendly gesture in agreeing to sign two separate treaties on trade and transit met a long standing demand of Nepal. The issue had caused much bitterness between the two countries during the last couple of years. India also agreed to Nepal's proposal that instead of inserting a clause on curbing of smuggling in the trade or transit treaties, the two countries should evolve an understanding on joint administrative steps to solve this thorny problem.

Equally important were a series of agreements on several joint projects like the Karnali dam, the Panchesar and Mahakali or Sharda hydel projects. Desai allayed Nepal's apprehensions on such joint projects, when he said that India was not at all keen to benefit at the cost of Nepal's resources.

EXPERIMENTS

Like various other countries in the developing world, Nepal is experimenting in evolving a political and economic system which can meet the needs of its people. The panchayat and back to village institutions are part of an experiment to see how the rising aspirations of the people can be fulfilled and moulded with the general conditions of the country. There has been significant progress in several spheres like land reforms, expansion of education, development of cottage and small industry and social reforms, which is having an impact on the people of Nepal, though the impact may still not be quick or widespread.

The Khumjung valley.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

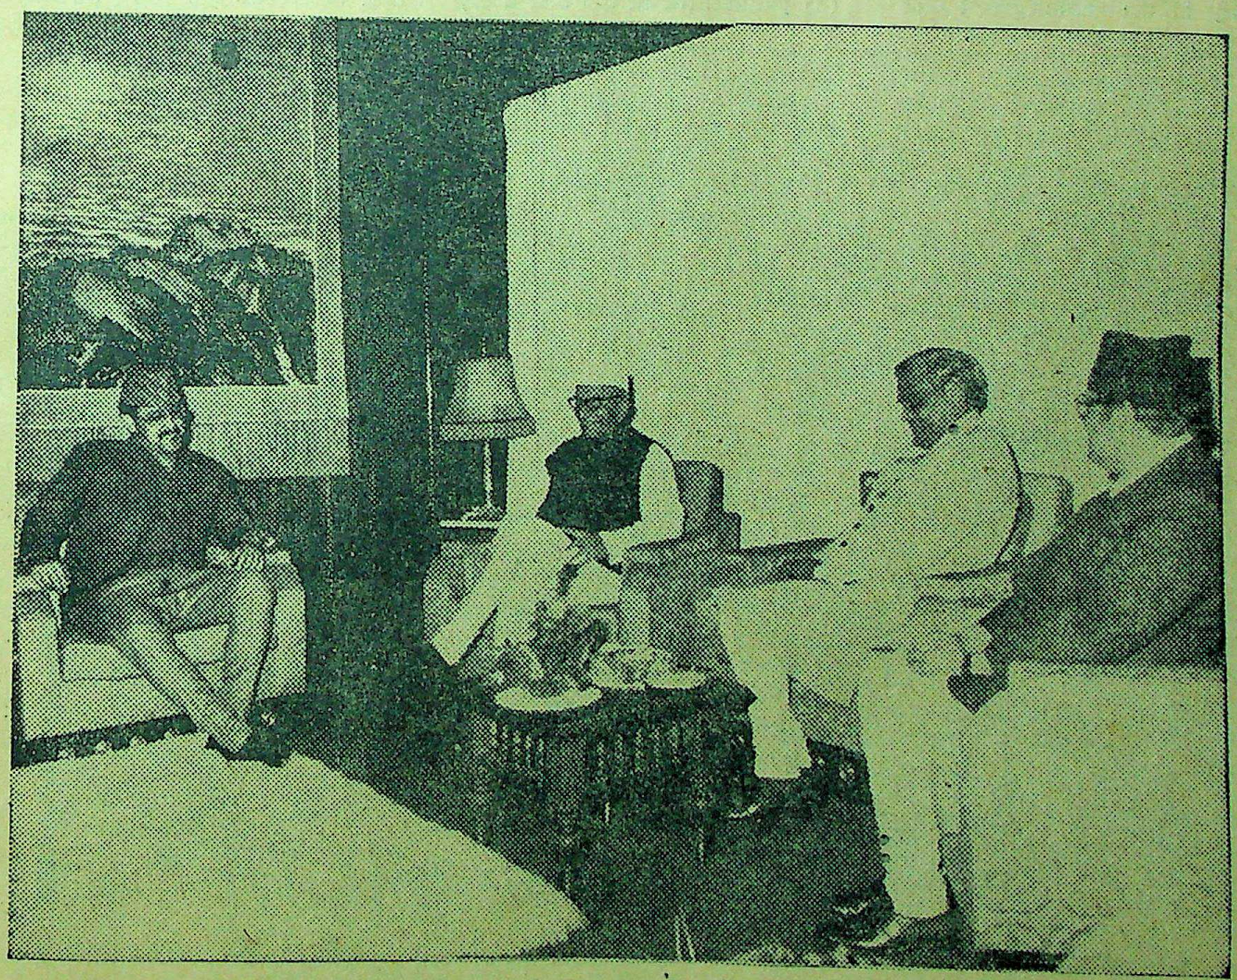
Synthesis Of Modernity And Tradition

Nepal, an international home for the Yogis and a playground for cultists and mystic explorers and adventurous travellers has emerged from the mists of history as a country determined to become a modern nation. No doubt, these people who "look at tradition" with unbelieving imagination. Tradition for better or worse, is looked up with suspicious eyes. The conflicts inherent in modernisation of an ancient land has been a subject of study by sociologists but without any real rewards. As King Birendra has observed: "...there are people who look at tradition with scepticism and grudge. They consider it as something of an anachronism that at least should be avoided to make way for rapid modernisation. Further still they regard tradition and modernity as contradictory goals where a choice has to be made if any headway towards progress is to be made at all. Personally I feel that this conflicting perception has come about as a result of the semantic confusion where two people draw different inference from the same word—namely tradition." Tradition is not linked necessarily to blind superstition, irrational faith and abscurantist ideas; it can be something of a valued experience. "It is tradition", King Birendra explains, that gives to a people its character and roots together with a sense of being and purpose. Without tradition people feel not only insecure but a sense of vaccum, rootlessness and alienation that unfortunately characterise some emergent societies. For a living human community is not a patch of deadwood but a thriving corporate body that through its collective identity seeks common goals and fulfilment."

HARMONY

Tradition and modernity in Nepal according to King Birendra are two aspects of the harmonious combination of the spiritual endeavour and material upliftment. "The people of Nepal make no allowance for fanaticism, rigidity or a lopsided growth, we as a nation, have fairly pragmatic, very tolerant and always open to embracing new ideas. We have eschewed casteism and have been free from sectarianism. The panchayat polity of Nepal enjoins on us to create a dynamic as against a static society. Like everything else in world when tradition gets tainted with the passage of time, when it gathers rust, bringing rigidity and a soul deadening creed, it surely needs change to permit a renewal of life, a revival and a regeneration. It is our belief that in the march of time everything should change, that which does not work, that which proved illusive, that which in the name of tradition only brings exploitation—all of these must change. Yet in the remorseless whirling of time, namely our tradition in which lies our independence, our freedom and the symbol of our identity that infuses life like soul to the body."

Indo-Nepal relations in the past decades have shown a remarkable resilience in maintaining friendly atmosphere despite many strains and stresses in the past. The unique and abiding ties between our two countries are a shared heritage which has



King Birendra with Indian Prime Minister Morarji Desai during the latter's recent visit to Nepal.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

"the inevitability of a shared destiny". "Friendly relationship which has happily subsisted between our two countries since the dawn of history needs to be maintained and further consolidated in keeping with the spirit of time", said King Birendra. "The edifice of Nepal-India friendship stands on the pillars of equality, trust and mutual aspect and understanding of each others' aspirations, said Shri Morarji Desai, Prime Minister of India. "The benefits of our connection and our cooperation are immense. To allow pettiness or small gains by anti-social elements would be only to betray our destiny and be unworthy of our heritage. I am confident that under His Majesty's leadership, this will not happen. Mr. Desai continued, "I speaking in same view, can pledge to Your Majesty and the people of Nepal our inflinching commitment to share your burdens in the effort to bring prosperity to the country. The actual strategy of development or even the policies of Nepalese trade are within the rights of Sovereign Nepal to determine".

Earlier, Atal Behari Vajpayee, the Minister for External Affairs, affirmed that "there is no other country in the entire gamut of international relationship with which India has had such ancient and deeply interlinked relations as with Nepal...God and geography have linked our two nations and decreed that we live in friendship and any government which seeks to create a rift between us, will be doing so only against the interests and wishes of our two people. There may be divergencies in our policies and occasional differences in the policies of cooperation. But differences between us are only proof of our independence ...This vision of our destiny is to be true to our tradition and equality there is always room for difference of opinion between India and Nepal, but there must not be difference of mind between them. There has been a perennial crisis—crossing of our borders not only for trade or tourism but more importantly, for knowledge, enlightenment and even salvation. That has led to understanding of India aspiration by the people of Nepal, understanding of Nepalese aspirations by the people of India, understanding by both of our people of the aspirations of the whole of Asia and the world."

WHAT NEXT?

The King performs five duties: (a) punishment of the evil doer; (b) the recognition of merit; (c) augmenting the income of the country by honest means and spend it on developments; (d) impartial outlook; and (e) protection of the nation by all means. King Birendra is committed to this concept of Kingship.

In a traditional society where literacy and modern consciousness has yet to reach an ordinary household abstract ideas of constitution and nation cannot be understood without the aid of symbols. The monarchy provides that symbol which brings home to the ordinary masses the idea of the nation. The monarchy as an over-reaching symbol, knitting together Nepal into a nation carries a literal meaning, since the Shah dynasty has been ruling the country for the past 2500 years. Nepal today is an independent nation and cherishes the image of a joint struggle of the monarchy and people for democracy and progress. And it is this new meaning given to the traditional bond between the monarchy and people, and to the king's role as an instrument of modernisation of the country.

King Birendra is aware of his responsibilities of modernisation of Nepal. He has already

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Kumari—a liivng Nepali goddess being taken out on procession.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

announced the establishment of four regional growth centres for integrated and planned development. His emphasis on the equitable distribution of investments has been widely acclaimed. During the last five years, he has travelled and stayed in the difficult terrain and hills of the country to keep abreast of and accelerate the pace of development activities. He is committed to clean up and streamline the administration and make politics development oriented. The King of Back-to-Village campaign is a healthy step in this direction of weaving together the panchayat bodies into an organised force and mobilise them into action on the basis of a well-coordinated programme and through trained cadres.

The importance of the royal institution is, thus, too obvious: the monarchy has proved that it can play a significant role as an agent of change in the modernisation of Nepal to which major reforms such as the Land Reform Act, the Mukti Act, the New Education Plan and the Communication Plan, testify. His Majesty's call to the nation for unleashing the forces of development has evoked tremendous response which is a happy augury for the country's bright future.

Nepalese Ambassador to India Vidhanand Jha.

Tourism In Nepal

FROM the fertile plains of the Tarai to the soaring mystic heights of the Himalayas, Nepal offers much to fulfil the needs and aspirations of foreign visitors. Nepal holds a distinct personality. Two important religions —Hinduism and Budhism— contribute so harmoniously to make the cultural life of the nation. The exemplary spirit of religious tolerance runs through the whole multiplicity of festivals in Nepal. Primarily a mountain Kingdom pulsating with new vigour and rapid strides of development under the most able, dynamic and inspiring leadership of the beloved sovereign. His Majesty King Birendra Bir Bikram Shah Dev, Nepal presents a rich heritage of art known to man— in stone and wood, in brick terracota, ivory, brass, bronze, silk and wool, in dance, music and folklore and in fact, in vision, deed and thought.

Although tourism in Nepal is comparatively a recent phenomenon it has played a significant role in the national economy of the country. Of course, in Nepal, tourism, in its modern sense, can be traced back to the beginning of the fifties when the country threw away the shackles of Rana regime and restored democratic rule but the concrete step to promote tourism was made when King Mahendra constituted a Nepal Tourism Development Committee under the chairmanship of prince Bir Bikram Shah in 1970.

The Nepal tourism master plan is a landmark in the history of tourism in Nepal. Looking at the growing importance and the priority this sector is commanding in the overall economic development of the country, the creation of a separate Ministry of Tourism this

A new town coming up in the valley.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Rhodesia : End Of A Phase

IT now looks that talks as an instrument to solve the Rhodesian problem have lost their utility and even credibility. Ian Smith is again at his intransigent best. After the buffeting it had taken between the leaders of the Patriotic Front and Smith, the Anglo-US package plan, with an element of UN participation, is dead as a dodo. As usual Smith takes or at least should take a major share of the blame for dynamiting the Anglo-American plan which likes the curate's egg was good in parts. Inevitably, the Rhodesian Prime Minister feels free to fall back on his own methods to solve the problem and the nationalist guerillas too feel no holds are barred.

Smith has launched his new initiative involving the white minority and the black nationalists living in Rhodesia. He says that the problem can be only solved by Rhodesians themselves. However, Rhodesians themselves do not cover nationalist leaders like Joshua Nkomo and Robert Mugabe. It is the moderate and pliable leadership consisting of Bishop Muzorewa, Rev. Sithole and Chief Chiaru that Smith is holding talks with. A number of constructive proposals are reported to have been made by both sides at these unrepresentative talks. The discussions centred round the subject of parliamentary representation and constitutional safeguards. Government representatives formally announced Smith's willingness to accept the principle of one man one-vote.

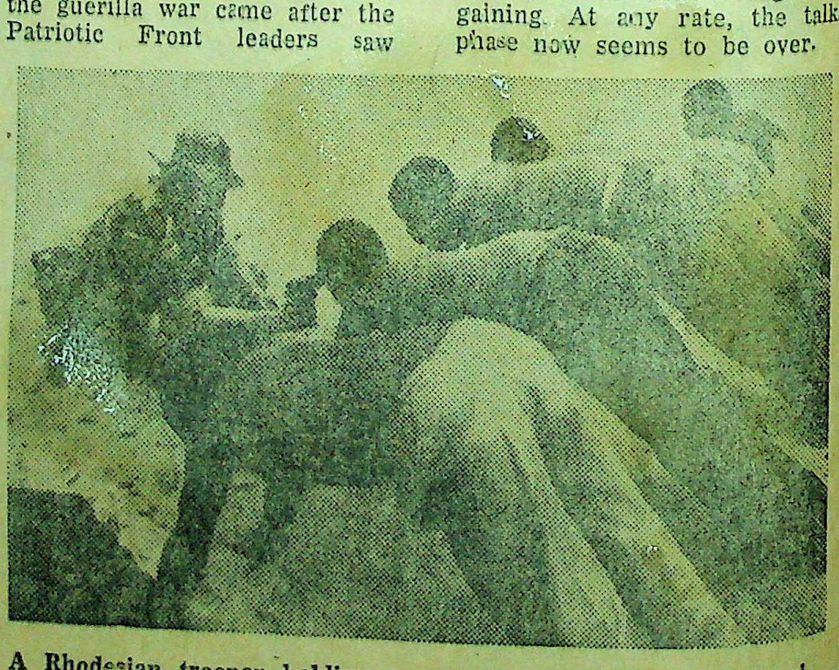
However, the internal settlement talks are not progressing satisfactorily. There is an area of disagreement between Smith and Bishop Muzorewa concerning the mechanics of a proposed safeguard for the whites in the form of a veto of legislation considered detrimental to the interests of the whites. Muzorewa hopes that by the time the talks end successfully, all opposition to them would disappear. He claims that there is already a general acceptance among the blacks and the white Rhodesians of imminent and decisive political change. Muzorewa says that Smith cannot remain immune to pressure even assuming that he is not trustworthy. The onset of rains and the exodus of whites should put him in a more reasonable frame of mind, says Muzorewa.

The exodus has already begun to worry the Smith administration because it clearly tells Smith that the whites no more have a sense of security. Though Salisbury has been reluctant to give out the true figures of this emigration, it is believed that one-tenth of the Rhodesia's white population has left the country. This does not include those persons who have left on the 'chicken run' either with a view of avoiding taxes or because they did not want that their friends should know they are quitting. Though the government attributes this exodus to the shortage of jobs at home and the fear of a call-up, it amounts to an admission that guerillas are gaining the upper hand in their battle, with government forces.

Last week, the guerillas bombarded the Grand Reef airforce base, killing 22 Rhodesian pilots. Earlier, they liquidated several dozen regulars of the white army and brought down three helicopters. This escalation of the guerilla war came after the Patriotic Front leaders saw through the Anglo-American game and recognised the futility of talking to Smith, Nkomo and Mugabe also rejected an invitation of British Foreign Secretary David Owen for talks in London. Smith knows that the internal settlement talks and any consequent solution would not stem the tide of guerilla attack.

He has, therefore, opened a new front of agression with a view to draw the free African states into the conflagration and internationalise the Rhodesian situation. Mozambique is already on the alert as the first prospective victim of Smith's new plan. It is expecting a military invasion any time. Whereas previous attacks on Mozambique were made by the Smith troops on the excuse of allegedly pursuing the nationalist guerillas fleeing into Mozambique, under the new strategy the invasion would be directed at Mozambique itself.

Then it would spread to other frontline states. Ultimately, Smith calculates, the whole of southern Africa would be plunged into widespread war and the could ask friendly western powers to intervene. The nuclear arsenal in South Africa could then be activated. A war of such dimensions is bound to push the Zimbabwean and Namibian questions to the background. In the international mediation that is bound to follow, Smith thinks he could do some tough bargaining. At any rate, the talks phase now seems to be over.



A Rhodesian trooper holding a gun in front of a line of prisoners being interrogated near Kikidoo, Rhodesia.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Pointless Parleys

NOTHING significant is likely to emerge from the present round of talks between the Soviet Union and the United States at Berne on the Indian Ocean. The US is seeking a freezing of naval deployment by the two parties at the existing levels. This amounts to indirectly demanding that it is free to retain the giant Diego Garcia military base and also to suggesting that the Soviet Union has bases in the Indian Ocean. Washington also claims that Moscow wants that the freeze proposal should be reinforced with a mutual pledge to reduce their naval force significantly. However, the Carter administration is unwilling to meet the crucial Soviet demand that nuclear-armed vessels should not enter the region because acceptance would mean barring US nuclear-armed aircraft carriers plying in the Indian Ocean.

Last week a Soviet spokesman was claiming that "things went more smoothly and quickly than expected". It was expected that before the next round begins, proposals made by both sides at Berne would be discussed at Moscow and Washington, where the first and second rounds were held in June and October respectively.

DETENTE

After this hard posture by the US, the Soviet Union expressed its willingness to agree to a stage-by-stage approach to detente in the ocean because the US was not ready to take radical steps. In the Soviet view "daring radical steps are required to have a fundamental solution of the question of consolidating peace in the Indian ocean area—it is necessary to eliminate all foreign military bases there and reduce the military presence of non-coastal states."

The Soviet representatives made these points at Berne: (1) That the talks would proceed on the basis of equality and undiminished security giving no unilateral advantage; (2) The concept of spheres of influence was alien to Soviet thinking and (3) It was the US which was striving for stabilization of military activity in the Indian Ocean at the first stage and the Soviet Union agreed only to help bring closer the Soviet and American positions. The US strategy was admitted by the Director of US Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and the head of US team to Berne Paul Warnke. He said that his country wants stabilization first and then only would consider the possibility of reductions.

This obviously means that the US intends to confine the scope of the Berne meeting to a possible understanding on limiting naval activity in the Indian Ocean at the current level. This implies the retention of US gains in the ocean including the Diego Garcia installation. The US is against including this in the talks. It details task forces from its Seventh Fleet to this area and makes use of naval facilities at Subic Bay in the Philippines and at Simonstown in South Africa. In addition there are bases and facilities in the ocean being used by Britain and France.

Washington has also tried to suggest at the instance of Pentagon advisers that the US would be ready to let the Soviet Union to use naval facilities at Berbera in Somalia. The fact, however, is that even before its breach with Mogadishu, Moscow did not have any base in Somalia or anywhere in the Indian Ocean. Obviously, the US is trying to reverse its previous policy of including Diego Garcia in the agenda by suggesting that Moscow is free to retain its alleged presence in the Indian Ocean.

There are also other factors like the so-called US experts who are hampering the conclusion of an agreement by fostering the fear of an alleged Soviet presence in the Indian Ocean. Retired Admiral Thomas Moorer and A. Cottrell, staff member of the Washington Centre for Strategic and International Studies declare that the Soviet-American negotiations allegedly give the Russians more advantages. On this basis they urge the US administration to expand the US base at Diego Garcia. All this is said when the talks are being held on the basis of strict adherence to the principles of equality and undiminished security. The Chinese too have been levelling baseless charges against the Soviet Union.

PEACE ZONE

The Soviet Union, on the other hand, consistently favours the dismantling of all foreign military bases in the Indian Ocean, as elsewhere, and is against the navies of great powers plying the waters for a long time far from their shores. It regards with understanding and approval the idea put forward by Sri Lanka and supported by a UN General Assembly resolution for turning the Indian Ocean into a zone of peace. This stand was reaffirmed in Moscow recently, when in the presence of Prime Minister Morarji Desai, Leonid Brezhnev emphasised that it was high time to make the Indian Ocean a zone of peace and to negotiate an agreement on the reduction of military activity in that area. This, he said, would meet the interests of Asian nations and promote the cause of peace.

Brandt's Mission

WHY has Willy Brandt come to India? That it is on an invitation from the Indian Council of Cultural Relations, is the formal explanation. From the West German side, Brandt is hitting important capitals in connection with the newly set up North-South Commission on Development Issues. The real mission however, could be to get a foothold in the Indian administration for Socialist International manoeuvres to peddle a variant of capitalism. The Socialist International has already a votary in Delhi. The vocal Industries Minister George Fernandes, released freshly from jail, was feted and lionised by the Bonn Government to an embarrassing degree this April. Brandt assumes Fernades is not one who would forget such felicitation

Fernandes has announced a new industrial policy which would set aside fears and remove obstacles

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

coming in the way of both domestic and foreign investors. Significantly, he broke this news first before the Indo-German Chamber of Commerce. Besides, an official of the West German Government is reported to have advance information of India's industrial policy specially in respect of investment. This makes Fernandes' Bonn connection curioser. The private banks in West Germany, which offered to invest a billion dollars in the next two years for the industrial development of India, could not have done it for the love of India. It is a cautious response to the present drift in the Janata Government's policies.

Brandt visited India not only as a West German Social Democrat but also as the chairman of the Socialist International which is slowly spreading its activities in the Third World countries specially in Asia and Africa. The goal is to create a "democratic socialist" movement and merge into it all non-Marxist socialists opposed to Communism. The mission is mainly political and the North-South dialogue is a poor disguise. Socialism in West Germany has always had an odd context. Hitler called himself a National Socialist. The rightist Bavarian Party calls itself Christian Socialist though its goals are very close to those of Hitler's Nazi Party. And the present ruling Social Democrats are neither socialist nor democratic.

West Germany has become militarist under the Social Democratic Party which is a member of the Socialist International Willy Brandt is heading. Bonn has moved closer to NATO and farther from peace for which Brandt got his Nobel Prize. Brandt has done nothing to prevent the Social Democratic Party from abandoning the Ostpolitik. The Helsinki obligations are honoured more in the breach by propaganda offensive against the German Democratic Republic. The military budget has grown from 26 billion marks in 1970 to 47.5 billion marks in 1976. While its armed forces are growing in size, its armoury is being modernised with new missiles, aircraft and naval vessels.

The military ambitions of the Social Democrat Government are buttressed by huge investments by the multinationals trying to reverse the process of detente in Europe and keep tensions alive in Africa and West Asia. Bonn's nuclear alliance with South Africa and Israel is a testimony to the role the Nobel Peace Prize winner's party is playing in Europe.

Most of the monopoly firms manufacturing arms and military hardware in West Germany are those very firms which had helped Hitler to create his war machine. They have 400 subsidiaries operating in South Africa, of which 300 are devoted to armaments business. These firms have helped Spain (under Franco) to build aircraft, Turkey to assemble Leaopard tanks, Malaysia to make torpedo boats and Thailand to make rifles for Pinochet's Chile. The Socialist International and Brandt fully support these activities of the Social Democrats because they help boost West German political, economic and technological potential.

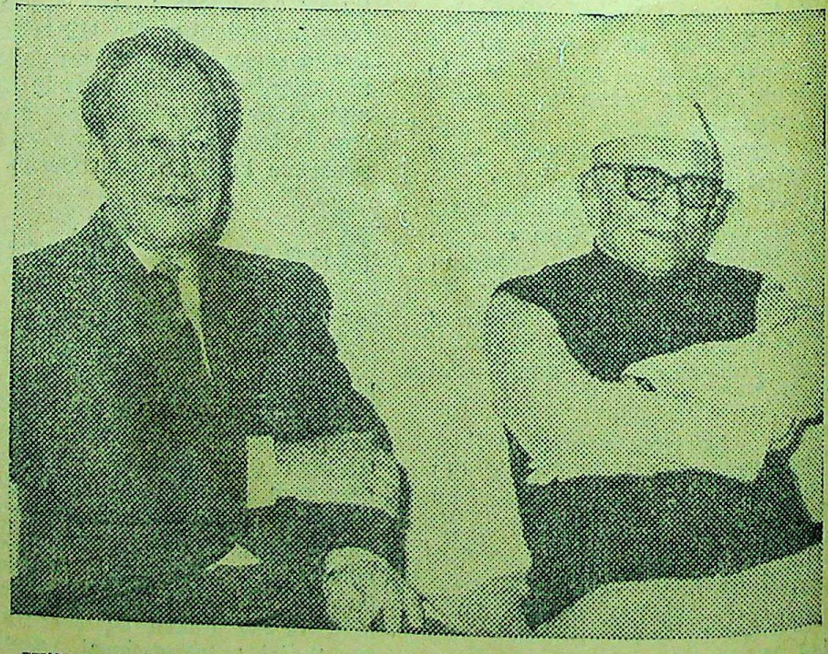
SUSPECT COMMISSION

The North-South Commission which Brandt is heading itself is suspect. That it is the brainchild of World Bank chairman Robert McNamara imparts it a dubious distinction. It is a diversionary device to deflect the heat industrial countries are subjected to at the Paris dialogue. The issues at the North-South dialogue are clear. They break down every time for only one reason, that is, the lack of political will on the part of the developed nations. Is Brandt confident that he can make the West adopt helpful attitudes? He should then be visiting the reluctant rich countries instead of Delhi. The obvious conclusion would be that he is trying to divide the developing countries into threshold states and developing nations.

In contrast to these ambitions of Bonn in regard to India, the ties between Delhi and Berlin present a picture of cordiality and trust. The first economic contacts between the two countries began in the midfifties, though diplomatic relations were established much later in 1972. The Indo-GDR joint economic commission set up in 1974 oversees economic, scientific and technical cooperation between the two countries. The trade turnover has increased 13-fold since 1955.

Besides traditional Indian export products, the GDR imports an ever-increasing volume of non-traditional items too. GDR exports mainly comprise machine tools, cargo ships, printing and textile machines, plants for electric data processing, for agriculture and food processing, scientific instruments, fertilisers and products of petrochemistry. Its printing machines too have gained good reputation.

Electronic small and medium-sized computers, modern office computers as well as products of precess-computing technique and large-scale computers are some of the important items GDR offers. The GDR foreign trade enterprise (Electrotechnik Export Import) is an important supplier of hardening and melting plants for the Indian metal working and machine-building industry and for foundry techniques. The economic development of the GDR and India opens up new opportunities to expand and deepen economic and scientific and technological cooperation between the two countries on a long-term and stable basis.



Willy Brandt with Prime Minis ter Morarji Desai at the residence.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Coomaraswamy Vay Of Seeing

COOMARASWAMY's integral approach to art combined the formal and stylistic study with the meaning and content of art. He believed that the actual shapes and structures of works of art are determined by their real content and that the knowledge of religious and philosophical background is indispensable for the understanding of the history of art.

Coomaraswamy attempted to understand and interpret the art of India in the content of the Indian pattern of culture. He differentiated the approach to art as manifest in Indian culture from that of the West on the basis of different principles involved in their relationship to nature. His exposition of the Indian view of art helps us to understand the disregard or lack of scientific perspective in Indian art. In Indian art, according to him, there is no mimesis or copying of nature or model but the artist obtains the image by a process of mental visualization or dhyana.

MEMORY IMAGE

"Thus the form is always reached by a process of synthesis and abstraction, rather than by observation, and is always in the last analysis a memory image. When we perceive increased reality or truth, we must ascribe this not to a change of habit, but to heightened consciousness, a more complete identification of consciousness with the theme itself—in other words to a more profound empathy." He gives evidence from Silpa texts and works like the Sukrantitisara to support this view of Indian art. He also says, "Those who wish to study the development of Indian art must emancipate themselves entirely from the innate European tendency to use a supposedly greater or lesser degree of observation of Nature as a measuring rod by which to trace stylistic sequences or recongnize aesthetic merit."

Though Coomaraswamy was himself interested in bringing forth the metaphysical foundations of Indian culture, his study draws our attention to the hold of 'types' in the presentation of an object. The artist would present a tree in painting or sculpture in accordance with the convention of presenting a tree rather than according to what he actually sees or as is seen in reality. Similarly, a queen would be presented according to the canons of depicting a padmini type rather than drawing her actual portrait. It is this fixation for presenting art objects according to types that explains, for example, the absence of portraiture in Indian art.

Sociologically speaking, this fixation for types can be intrepreted as a trait of the Indian pattern of culture which conditioned the Indian mind to conventions, not only in the visual arts but also in court literature, donative inscriptions, eulogies, etc. Instead of giving the actual account of kings in their charitas and inscriptions, the court poets presented romantic fictions which could apply to an ideal king. Such an attitude almost inhibited the writing of history in ancient India, at least up to the time of Kalhana. The empirical study of Indian art also shows a strong hold of conventions which becomes stronger from the 10th century A.D. onwards. For a socio-cultural study of Indian art it would be pertinent to find out the factors in history which led to thinking and viewing in terms of 'types' and to conventionalism and traditionalism.

A motif which first appeared in Coomaraswamy's "Rajput Painting".

In his History of Indian and indonesian Art, the Yakshas, and his various other works Coomaraswamy was conscious of the cultural setting of Indian art of which, however, he presents only scattered glimpses. While describing the art of Ajanta, for instance, he rightly draws attention to its courtly character and says that Ajanta paintings reflect the same phase of luxurious aristocratic culture as does the work of Kalidasa, Bana and other court-dramatists. Similarly, in his paper on terracottas written in 1928 while mainly dealing with the stylistic traits or formal analysis of terracottas of different periods he also deals with the cultural background of some of the terracottas suggesting the anthropological interest of some other types. He says, "Important for the history of art and technically interesting as the terracottas may be, it should not be overlooked that they are also documents of life."

SOCIAL CONTEXT

However, it may be mentioned that though Coomaraswamy was conscious of the cultural setting of Indian art and he brought out the fundamental ideas of Indian culture in relation to Indian art, there is no systematic or consistently worked out cultural or social history of art in his writings. No doubt, it was not his approach or intention to treat art as a part of the social framework. He was concerned rather with the religious and philosophical foundations of Indian art and culture. However, one can point out that some of his views are a historical and ideal rather that related to an actual sociohistorical situation. He stated, for instance, that the traditional artist was not interested in self-expression and that the patron was not interested in self-glorification.

One would like to comment here that instead of accepting a static and ideal picture from the Silpasastras and higher varna texts, we need to study texts in their historical contexts. Even cultural ideals can be viewed from a sociohistorical point with questions such as in what social situation could such ideals be formulated, who helped to foster them and what was their hold on actual life. We need to have material on the actual or concrete situation as regards the artists, patrons or public and their interrelationship as obtained under different stages of Indian history.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Ancient Indian society was not static as believed by the 19th century and early 20th century historians. Recently, social historians have drawn attention to different stages or periods in Indian based on differing socio-economic conditions. Thus, in the period circa 300 B.C.—A.D. 500, the period of heightened trade, commodity production and urban prosperity, the position of silpins or craftsmen improved considerably and money could be invested with their guilds, as we know from inscriptions. The art was mainly patronized by the urban or nagaraka class consisting of merchants, traders, artisan and craft guilds, common people and royal families.

Whereas in the period circa A.D. 500—900, when trade and commodity production was on decline, the nagaraka culture was replaced by the samanta or feudal culture. The craftsmen could be pressurized to forced labour or visti, though some of them joined the feudal order or rank of ranaka and thakkura in the period A.D. 900-1300. The inscriptions on numerous temple walls eulogize the might and prowess of patrons who built temples "for fame and glory."

BETTER IN SIGHT

The point is that the ideal and static picture as reflected in texts has to be critically studied against the material available on the concrete historical situation. Art has to be treated in a total framework against a network of relationship —social, economic, cultural, religious, etc.—a network which is dynamic and changing in history. The work done by Coomaraswamy, Stella Kramrisch, Zimmer, V.S. Agrawala and others has deepened our understanding of the ideational background of Indian art. They have given us insight into the relationship between the metaphysical structure and artistic creations, both of which ultimately can be viewed as reflections of the total socio-cultural framework. In this direction, with a view to understand the actual behaviour, modes of thinking and feeling, the stress laid on the interdisciplinary approach by Niharranjan Ray, Kapila Vatsyayan and others will be of vital importance.

—Devangana Desai

CINEMA

Search For Identity

SINCE the first James Bond film Dr No came out in 1962, there has been an increasing number of films which deal with spies, government space programmes and projects, loss of top secret documents pertaining to them, etc. Such films usually involve suspense-oriented actions, ruthless violence and brittle romances which spring from strange encounters. The technique, pace and style of presenting action-packed thrillers on the screen may vary in quality but the formula remains very much the same.

The Groundstar Conspiracy has a novel way of presenting the ruthless power of the State to destroy an individual in its own self-interests. The film's over-all chilling effect and suspense is achieved through an extraordinary teamwork of brilliant direction, subtle and sensitive photography and good acting by a trio of players appearing in order of merit Michael Sarrazin, George Peppard and Christine Belford.

The top secret government space project installation called Groundstar is in the news when an explosion in its premises kills six scientists and almost kills the seventh—John Welles (Michael Sarrazin). Badly wounded, Welles uncertainly makes his way to nearby seaside cottage. On seeing him, Nicole Devor (Christine Belford) who lives in that cottage screams with terror.

Later, security men from the project meet Welles and find on him not only an identity card but also a stolen tape detailing top secret data. They conclude that Welles sabotaged the project. George Peppard as Tuxan, the security head is determined to find the reason and investigate the activities of the persons involved.

Though Welles' life is saved through surgery, his traumatic amenesia deprives him of his identity. He cannot remember who he is or the circumstances which brought him to the Groundstar project.

It is the intensity of Welles' personal feelings...his passionate search for his identity after he has been cruelly deprived of his memory by electro-shock treatment which is given to him under Tuxan's instructions so that he may fit the personality of the man whose identity card he carries...the awakening of memory through images, the sound of foreign words and through flashbacks make it an impressive film. The interior and exterior forces are synthesized and the strange happenings in Welles' life are told with considerable dramatic effect.

Welles' return to the seaside cottage and his friendship with Nicole enable him to partially recapture the past. His ignorance about himself adds suspense to the story. The film reaches in an unusual way a high crescendo of suspense and surprise towards the end.

Christine Belford who decorates the film with her almost bare torso and shapely limbs is soon involved in an affair with Welles, and enacts with him a few (supposed to be) scorching bedroom scenes which reflect the swinging ideas of today's permissive society.

Miracles All The Way

IN Hindi films miracles never cease to happen, and Parvarish abounds with them.

Director Man Mohan Desai's treatment of smugglers and pickpockets is fantastic. People want to buy dreams and it has been his endeavour (as in the film under review) not to sell them sweet, smooth, complete dreams but a hotch potch of dreams spiced with the kind of violence that has been the stock-in-trade of the 'fight composers' of our films.

Two young pickpockets played by Neetu Singh and Shabana Azmi make a desperate bid to get married to their dream boys Amitabh Bachchan and Vinod Khanna respectively. They first pick their pockets, apologise for their misdeeds, then brazenly propose to them...When their proposals are turned down they threaten to commit suicide... This amuses the two boys immensely, and so their attempts to commit suicide are treated as a joke by them. They then approach the boys' parents who are also shocked and amused but nevertheless favourably impressed by them. So much so that even when they pick their pockets and purses they still want their sons to marry them.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Amitabh Bachchan plays the role of the son of the notorious dacoit Mangal Singh. As a police officer his ambition is to prevent people from indulging in anti-social activities. Adopted by the 'Police Commissioner' and his wife he proves to be an efficient and dedicated officer. Their own son played by Vinod Khanna joins a gang of gold and diamond smugglers.

Tales of two brothers' relations and the nefarious activities of smugglers have been narrated many times on the screen. It was therefore, unnecessary to produce another one.

The film is at times tense, superficial...Yet it has some original cinematic moments like the one when submarines are employed by the smugglers—the alternating scenes of look-back which are linked to the present. Shabana Azmi and Neetu Singh are involved with the comical situations of delinquents. At the same time they are out to murder the notorious dacoit Mangal Singh who is responsible for killing their parents.

Meanwhile, groups of hoodlums clash with the police... there are chases, fights.—pleasant farcical sequences, songs and dances...Everything is, as usual smoothened out at the end. A fewer dances and songs might have fitted the story just as well and perhaps shortened its length.

THEATRE

Contemporary Dimension

WHAT holds our interest in a Tanvir production is mainly form: a Sanskrit play with its rigid classical structure is given a new form through assimilation of the freer airs of the improvisation techniques of the folk theatre Of the three modern adaptations from the Sanskrit drama so far enacted—Shudraka's "Mrichhakatika," Vishakhadutt's "Mudrarakshasa" and Bhavabhuti's "Uttara Ram Charit" "Mitti Ki Gadi" in its Chhattisgarhi outfit has the contemporary texture, and its judicious blending of modern theatre techniques with the rural universe of a folk culture as reflected in the natcha style of the Chhattisgarhi actors. Their interpretation of Shudraka has the imprint of their characteristic vitality. The play has a certain restraint it must be said that has a markedly urban touch.

Mitti Ki Gadi is a new production—as fresh perhaps as a freshly painted mud wall, and succeeds in establishing immediate rapport with the urban audience. Though at place the play seems allegorical Tanvir's genius has transformed it into a contemporary experience. The slogans and militant marches by a rebellious people determined to overthrow an atrocious regime and the king's brother-in-law's bullying of the judge has the flavour of recent history.

Since music is an essential component of folk theatre, the performers have to be good singers. And the singing with sprinkling of melodies that have a thumri touch enliven the narrative.

The Chhattisgarhi players' uninhibited zest is really infectious. Ram Lal as Sansthanaka, king's brother-in-law, his boisterousness, his buffoonery has the ranting air of a maniac. If he tends to exaggerate, Udai puts in a far too restrained performance: seldom does he raise his voice or change his serene smile of self-content to anything more expressive. The play's Chhattisgarhi colouring, the improvisations indulged in too often by individual performers, the spontaneity of the gesture and movement and its mid-stage low and round platform, leaving enough space for a circular movement—an old device no doubt—have given to the new production of Mitti Ki Gadi a contemporary dimension which is in keeping with its classical milieu.

Agents for

LINK & PATRIOT

In

BHOPAL

M S INDIAN NEWS AGENCY

Rajdoot Hotel, Hamidia-Road

BHOPAL (M.P.)

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Outstanding Performers

Sarangi's Glory

PANDIT Ram Narayan's contribution to sarangi music is unique. The sarangi which had been degraded and its audience limited to the visitors of the tawaifs, has been restored to its past glory.

Ram Narayan fell in love with the sarangi when he was about five years old. So fascinated was he by the melodies he could reproduce on the sarangi that he wanted to play it all the time. He preferred to play the sarangi than attend to his school work. His father did not discourage him but when he thought he was mature enough to understand the hard facts of life he told him about the plight of most sarangias. So he promised his father that he would never work for tawaifs and told him that his aim was to save the sarangi from extinction.

Ram Narayan gave his first solo performance in 1954 at the Cowasjee Jehangir Hall, Bombay. The unruly audience greeted his performance with jeers. He was hooted off the stage. This experience depressed him so much that he thought of dropping the idea of specialising as a soloist. But he was fortunate to have friends who had faith in him. They insisted that he should give himself another chance to perform as a soloist in public. His triumph came when the same organisation which had sponsored his first solo performance invited him to perform again. Over 3000 persons attended and applauded his second performance and that marked the beginning of his career as a soloist.

Today Pt Ram Narayan has to his credit hundreds of successful concerts in India and abroad. He has performed in several cities of the Soviet Union, China, France, Germany, Holland the UK, the USA, Canada..In India there are many musicians who belong to the Ram Narayan Gharana, and specialise in presenting his compositions and his style of playing the sarangi. He believes that new styles and compositions enrichen classical music. An artiste's calibre can be judged by his new contributions. At present Pt Ram Narayan is the Head of the Department of Music and Executive Director of the National Centre for Performing Arts, Bombay.

Pandit Ram Narayan.

Michael Ferreira

VERY few Indians have had the merit to qualify as individual world champions in the field of sport. Wilson Jones, who won the world billiards title on two occasions, is considered the first Indian to earn that distinction. Some however say that wrestler Game was the first. Michael Ferreira has now become the second Indian in recent times to wear the world "crown" by beating all-comers in the World Amateur Billiards Championship at Brisbane And bettering Wilson, with whom he has had many happy huntings, Ferreira also annexed the World Open title, played in New Zealand immediately after.

"King" Michael has been seeking the crown for long. And everyone has acknowledged that he had the genius in him. Yet, he failed to pull it off in seven earlier attempts entering the final thrice. Each time it was as if the 'crown' lay just beyond the bend. It was said that Ferreira always "lost to himself", that he was his own enemy. He was compared to Ken Rosewall, of tennis, for falling this side of the threshold of final story.

Sportsmen of a lesser calibre may have given up long back, but not Michael. He succeeded in breaking the hoodoo in his eigth attempt and the fourth final appearance. He beat off an early challenge from Bob Close and then grabbed the crown.

For those who have never had the occasion to know Ferreira apart from the brief score-figures tucked away in most sports pages, his own reporting from Melbourne and Auckland must have been a revelation. He is so humane, so philosophical yet down to earth, so observant and so lucid with a touch of sophisticated humour, and above all so proud of being an Indian. His personality comes throuhg when he says:, "How you react to the bitterness of losing will determine whether you have the stuff of which champions are made of".

Billiards may not be one of the so-called "major" games played in India. Yet it has enough Indian votaries of class to buttress the country's claim to be considered a major "power" in world billiards. A game of British origin, played in countries where John Bull left his colonial mark, it may appear to be a ponderous one, like cricket. But it is a demanding and complex sport, calling for exceptional and diverse skills. Geometry, mathematics, pin-point accuracy, quick and clear-headed planning and approach, keen sight and perception and stamina are some of them. Age is an asset, not a bar, for the game but it requires complete dedication as in any other sport to reach the top.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

There have been sportsmen who have been honoured by the nation for lesser glories in other "popular" sports than those earned by dedicated men like Ferreira. Although it may be too much to expect the type of welcome home as is accorded to our victorious cricket or hockey teams, Ferreira is a national hero, and should be received and honoured thus in all quarters.

Truffaut's Choice

She is the Screen's Most Beautiful Woman. With sea green eyes, flawless skin, sculptured face and magnificent body, she has come to be recognized as one of the great movie beauties of all times. At 33, and with over two dozen movies behind her, Jacqueline Bisset is not the Best Actress or Biggest Star though she is well on her way to achieving major international stardom.

Jacqueline has worked with big names like directors John Huston, Francois Truffaut and actors Paul Newman, Belnondo, Mastroianni and Steve McQueen. At present she is filming "The Greek Tycoon" in which she plays the part of a widow of an assassinated American President married to a shipping billionaire.

She was born in 1944 at Surrey, England. Her father, Frazer Bisset is a Scottish physician and her mother half-French. After the war her family settled in Reading where Jackie and her older brother grew up in a "nice" atmosphere of books and music. After some modelling and walk-on movie parts she managed an audition with Roman Polanski and eventually a small part in his 'Cul de Sac'. Her next movie was 'Two For a Road' which launched her on a string of bad Hollywood films. While filming 'The Sweet Ride' she met Michael Sarazzin with whom she lived for seven years. After being cast in a series of 'girl friend' roles to the stars of male-action films Jackie has now begun to complement her looks with sensitive acting. She was excellent

Jacqueline Bisset.

in 'The Grasshopper' and 'The Mephisto Wallz.'

Truffaut is probably the only director to have exploited Jackie's acting talent as well as her beauty. in his 'Day for Night' where she plays an English movie star. Of her he says, "She's probably the most beautiful actress I've ever worked with. Most women with sexy bodies lack that particular spark of mystery, but she has both." Edith Head, the famous designer describes Jackie as "one of the greatest bodies I've ever worked with. But besides that she is rather the opposite, because she is so damned intelligent. It is a strange combination, almost a double personality."

At presnt Jackie is living with Victor Drai, a Frenchman in his early 30's. They lead a quiet life with Jackle pursuing her favourite hobby of cooking and Drai his of backgammon.

Her parents were divorced after 32 years of marriage which perhaps has influenced her views on men. She is very distrustful of the opposite sex particularly of their fidelity level. She does not want to get married though only thinks of it "vaguely" when she is depressed.

Jackie's problem is of being a sane person in a crazy world and lacking a bizarre personality like Marilyn Monroe's which sells. Her beauty has doubtless given her a sense of power whi h is sells. Her beauty has doubtless given her a sense of power which nevertheless tinged with pathos as her beauty, like that of others, is food for everyone's fantasies but her own. It is a dangerous glory as very few—Katherine Hepburn amongst them — have been able to keep this power to themselves.

A Dancer is Born

BALLET, the most stylised of the arts, is a poetry of movements which have a spatial orientation. The stylised movements are composed like film frames the spectator providing the ground for a transition from one action to another. Bharat Sharma emerged with his performance in the Wolf-boy, the award winning ballet at the all-India ballet competition as dancer who has the power to create a chain of usual sensations. He has mastered the art of free-style dancing to which he gives a cutting edge by importing movements from chhau dance. With a hypnotic gaze and a long graceful neck, large eyes and a wiry body he was able to convey a dream quality mixing unreality of the dance movements with the real-looking mannerism of a wolf. He has an actor's felicity of expression and enables us to read into his face every shade of emotion and their complexity.

The son of a noted dancer-choreographer Narendra Sharma and dancer Jayanti Sharma Bharat grew up almost in the rehearsal rooms and this has made him a dancer.

Bharat Sharma

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Geo-thermal Energy

THE present position of consumption of various energy sources in the world is: (i) Coal 32.7 per cent (ii) Natural Gas 19.2 per cent, and (iii) Petroleum products 44,2 per cent. The remaining is taken are of by the Atomic Energy. But all these sources are slowly getting depleted which necessitates a search for alternate energy sources. Even in advanced countries like USA., which has 63 atomic power plants working and 70 under planning, it is expected that the energy supply will last only for another 70 years. The two most talked about alternate sources are solar energy and geo-thermal energy. Solar energy no doubt has already got the attention of scientists.

In a number of countries though the geo-thermal energy has not been taken up on the same scale, various experiments carried out at a number of places have shown that the temperatures under the earth's crest are very high. This discovery has brought the attention of the scientists to whether the heat available could be converted into useful energy. The taking out of geo-thermal energy is something like discovering oil on shore. The first layer below earth is a solid matter after which is a liquid layer. This again is followed up by a solid layer which could be as thick as 3400 kms. The temperature in between these two thick layers are very high which can be as much as 3,000 degree C to 4,000 degree C. The available there cannot be calculated or estimated with the present scientific knowledge available. If this energy is taken out and converted into electricity, it will serve the purpose where low energy supply is necessary. This heat source is the basic source for geo-thermal energy. The various layers of earth are made up of different radioactive elements collected over thousands of years. The advantages of geo-thermal energy are that the pollution is reduced to a very low limit or almost negligible, low cost of production and never ending energy supply. But it has certain disadvantages also. While drilling for geo-thermal energy gases like carbon dioxide, ammonia, hydrogen sulphite will also surface.

The initial work done on geo-thermal energy production has been based on the technology applied to petroleum well drilling. This is one of the reasons why only the petroleum companies are taking interest in such projects. These companies are fully aware that on the one hand these sources will provide pollution free energy sources but on the other hand will have hazards like blowing of some of the drilling wells similar to what happens in oil and natural gas drilling. They have the experience and knowledge to take care of such hazards on the basis of the experience they have gained with petroleum drilling.

HOT SPRINGS

Most of the geo-thermal energy centres are the hot water sources under the earth. The temperature of this hot water sources can be anywhere between 200 to 360 degree C. When a well is drilled and the pressure is relieved, only 15 to 20 per cent of water gets converted into stam. This can be used for production of electricity. The remaining quantity of water can be used for other work. The hot springs have the highest supply potential for geo-thermal energy. Apart from this, there are seven more geo-thermal energy sources e.g. the dry water regions, low emthaply regions, geo-pressure regions, and mecma deposits. Of these sources have their own distinct qualities. The first two sources are known as hydro thermal sources and are supposed to be the best geo-thermal energy sources. In California, jets of hot waters emerge from the earth crest from which steam is separated and generators are run on the steam to produce electricity. The hot water separated is used for heating homes and desalination of sea water. In India, there are about 250 hot water springs having temperature up to 140 degree centigrade and sources of good wet steam. By the end of July 1977, in Puga region in Ladakh which is 230 kms from Leh in Himalayas, geo-thermal energy plant of 7 megawatt was under experimental stage. Geological Survey of India has drilled 16 wells up to a depth of 15 to 17 metres and nearly a hundred tonne of wet steam is coming out of it at a temperature of up to 140 degree centigrade. Various regions in which work on geo-thermal energy in India has been undertaken are Kashmir, Himachal Pradesh, Ladakh, Arunachal Pradesh, Sarguja area in Madhya Pradesh, Cambay and Western Ghats of Maharashtra.

Geo-thermal energy did not receive any attention till now mainly for two reasons. Firstly the other energy sources which were easily attainable were freely available and secondly, industrially developed countries had no legal provision for running geo-thermal projects. At present, the non-Communist countries which has a capacity of developing up to 8 lakh megawatt of electricity do not develop even one per cent from geo-thermal energy. In a report published in 1974, 80 countries round the world had the capacity to use geo-thermal energy but so far only USSR, Italy, Japan, USA, Mexico, Kenya, Ethiopia, Hungary, Turkey, El Salvador and India have made any progress in this field. The US Administration expects that by 1985, 10 to 15 thousand megawatt electricity would be generated from geo-thermal sources. Though the scientists expectations in America are that by the end of this century geo-thermal energy would be used to develop up to 4 lakh megawatt of electricity. Japan has also encouraged private enterprise to invest in this field. USSR has developed a geo-thermal energy centre at Kamchatka Peninsula and the progress has been remarkable.

There was not much of progress in this field in our country. A committee was set up in 1966 whose report is still lying buried in files. Based on a report of 1974, a 30 megawatt capacity geo-thermal electricity plant working at a 90 per cent load factor will cost Rs. 5 crores whereas a thermal power plant based on coal will cost Rs 6 crores and the atomic power plant would need up to Rs 11 crores. Considering these various factors and the energy supply requirements which are likely to go up to 40,000 megawatt in 1980 for our country, it is necessary that these geo-thermal energy sources are given due consideration.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Science Policy Planning

A sound national science policy evolved as early as 1958 has failed to yield the expected results because of lop-sided implementation. This is how Dr. Harinarain, Director, National Geophysical Research Institute summed up the country's science and technology scene. He felt that the Indian scientists have done great work during the past three decades. Deputy Director of Regional Research Laboratory, Hyderabad, Dr. P. M. Bhargava also shared this view and highlighted various achievements free India has to her credit. Dr. Harinarayan felt that we must evolve priorities and that priorities have to be formulated by people at helm of national affairs. Quoting Atmaram and Naiudamma, Dr. Harinarain said that we have been simply following western techniques in science and technology which are capital intensive and labour saving. Such technology was meant for western countries where manpower was a problem. In the Indian situation, we need a different technology. We have problems of capital and energy and not shortage of man-rties where manpower was a propower. He said that Indian scientific community today had sufficient know how to solve most of the problems of the Indian masses. It was for the Government to see that results of research and development reached masses. According to Harinarain a break through is possible if complacency is shed by authorities and plans and programmes are projected by the coordination council for natural resources in the planning commission. The National Council will help in formulating national policies, priorities and integrated plans while the main emphasis at the State level will have to be on integrated land soil, water management. Harinarain said, time, was the most crucial factor in economic and industrial development.

Dr. Bhargava was critical of Indian scientific research and development. While Indian expertise in various branches of science and technology could be excelled by only a few countries, he said, the prime reason for failure was the non-involvement of the scientific community in framing science and technology policies. He regretted the influence of bureaucracy on science and technology and the fact that only lip service was being paid to the development of a scientific temper.

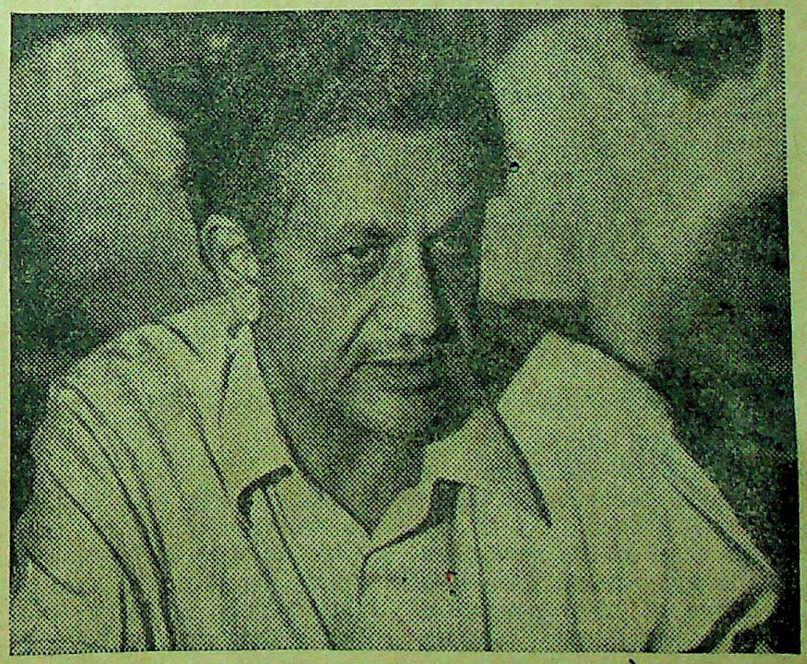
Policy makers, he added, had opened doors to neo-colonialism by their indiscriminate import of foreign technology. With the exception of Bhabha, Bhatnagar, Dr. Zaheer Hussain and Sarabhai, most of those appointed to high administrative positions had little commitment to science and much less to society. Besides some of them had no faith in scientific methods and values and hence created a situation in which scientific research suffered and irrational unscientific beliefs flourished. Dr. Bhargava outlined a nine point programme as the only way out of this situation. Contributions by Indian scientists and technologists should be adequately recognised. Non scientific and anti science attitudes should be discouraged and methodology based on this approach should be incorporated in the directive principles of the Indian Constitution for making policies and finding solutions to problems. His other suggestions included minimising import of foreign technology, recognition to quality based research and dispensing with present class and caste systems of education.

Nuclear Strategy

VIBRATIONS from the shock waves that the nuclear blast at Pokhran created three years ago, have still to subside. Reactions of dismay and doubt about India's utilization of its know-how for peaceful purposes were more or less along expected lines. India's ability to harness atomic energy for material development was however never in doubt.

Of the men, who have spent their lifetime to bring India to the threshhold of being called a nuclear power, Dr Homi Nusserwanji Sethna, Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission and Secretary, Department of Atomic Energy, Government of India comes to mind most naturally. A close collaborator with Dr Homi Bhabha, Dr Sethna was responsible for the designing and construction of the plutonium plant at Trombay. Currently busy in developing an adequate breeder power programme, he acknowledges that the "breeding" which enables fuller use of scarcer materials and hence makes energy production economical is "necessary and attractive."

At the recent Dr Hiralal Roy Memorial lecture, departed from the prepared demogogic text to speak to the audience in a language they could understand. Dr Sethna not only knows what he is saying but has his priorities clear. There is reason to hope that India's scientists and engineers engaged in making fast breeder power reactors would make them a commercial proposition by the end of this century.



Dr H. N. Sethna.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Not Good For Moraie

"IT is too much for (the health of) the heart", skipper Bishan Singh Bedi said after the nerve-tingling end of the second Test against Australia at Perth. With just five of the 15 mandatory overs remaining, the home team were left only with the two tailend wickets and about eight runs more to get to their second successive victory in the series. After five days of sea-saw cricket in blistering heat, the result hung on those precious few minutes; with the Aussies just tipping the balance in their favour at the end. If the results at Brisbane and Perth are the pattern for the rest of the three Tests, Bedi's warning is ominous.

From India's point of view it was the repetition of tragedy —they lost another Test they should have won, or could have easily drawn. The heat in the Perth bowl—and the annoying flies that constantly buzzed around—must have done something to the Indians on the fourth afternoon. How else does one explain the side tumbling from 240 for one to 330 for nine with time to spare in the last two hours of play on that day? Ageing Sam Ganon, who had been their tormentor 10 years back, suddenly looked a demon and claimed two wickets each in two of his post-tea overs to puncture the Indian innings. Surely, after fending off the fire to Thomson, the Indians should have learnt to defend their wickets against anything-else the Aussies could hurl at them in the name of pace.

INEPTITUDE

On the final day, the foxy Simpson guided his team so methodically through the Indian spin maze (which, of course, has lost most of its mysticism) that although wickets were lost, the tempo of runs scored in good time was always kept up to the last minute. In that, he got unexpected assistance from nightwatchman Tony Mann; the first nightwatchman in cricket history who ended up with a century!

In the final analysis it was the triumph of Aussie application over Indian ineptitude; the former seizing even a half-chance, and Indians squandering their opportunities like the earnings of a gambler, recklessly. What a pity that the excellent work of Mohinder Amarnath (90 and 100) of Chetan Chauhan (88 and 32) and Sunil Gavaskar (127) at the start of the two innings should have been pushed down the drain by the latter-order batsmen. What a pity again that neither Chandrasekhar nor Venkataraghavan could come to the assistance of Bedi in either taking wickets or containing the run rate. The valient skipper almost bowled single-handed, claiming five wickets each in the two Aussie innings. His bowling, especially in the excitement-packed last day, was tremendous indeed.

With so much of experience behind him, Vishwanath continues to be an enigma; unable to continue his innings beyond the 30's and 40's Coming at No. four he should be doing far, far better than exhibit those juvenile streaks. Batting sense seems to have deserted both Brijesh Patel and Madan Lal, both walking up to their doom time and again like rabbits caught in the glare of torchlights. There was a time when India had a batting line-up down to even No eight or nine In the past it was the Indian "middle" that held after the collapse at the start of an innings. There has been a complete reversal of that now Down Under.

AMATEURISH

All said and done the difference between the two teams, with all their differing endowments, is not much. What tilted the balance in favour of the home team on two successive occasions was that while Bedi and team-mates approached their task rather like amateurs Simpson was able to marshal his green-horns with a more professional approach. Again, temperamentally, the Indian cricketer has always displayed frail traits; when the going becomes a little tough, he just caves in.

With eight consecutive victories before the first Test, the Indians exuded confidence It was so quickly shattered by the narrow defeat at Brisbane. This showed while they lost the match against Western Australia at Perth itself before the second Test. The second Test defeat has brought the morale of the team further down. This was seen when the tourists lost the one-day match at Tasmania in the last over. With further injuries suffered by Surinder Amarnath on whom Bedi must have been banking heavily to strengthen the batting line-up in the remaining Tests and the loss of form of so many of his key players, including bowlers, it is too much to expect that his team will rise as if from the ashes in the remaining three encounters which follow in quick succession.

Travel-weariness is already reported to be showing among the team members. Morale is also low. The tactics which skipper Simpson has so successfully adopted so far—softening up the Indian batsmen with brief spells of "Thommo" fire to spoil their appetite, and later litting the second-liners like Clark Ganon or Hurst collect the falling leaves—is sure to be repeated in the remaining Tests. The measure to which our batsmen count this systematic attack will determine the final results of the series.

The two close results have been applauded as a "victory for cricket" by the Australian press in a chorus, now in the midst of their campaign to run down the Packer circus. Would they have done the same had the Indians won by these small margins?

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

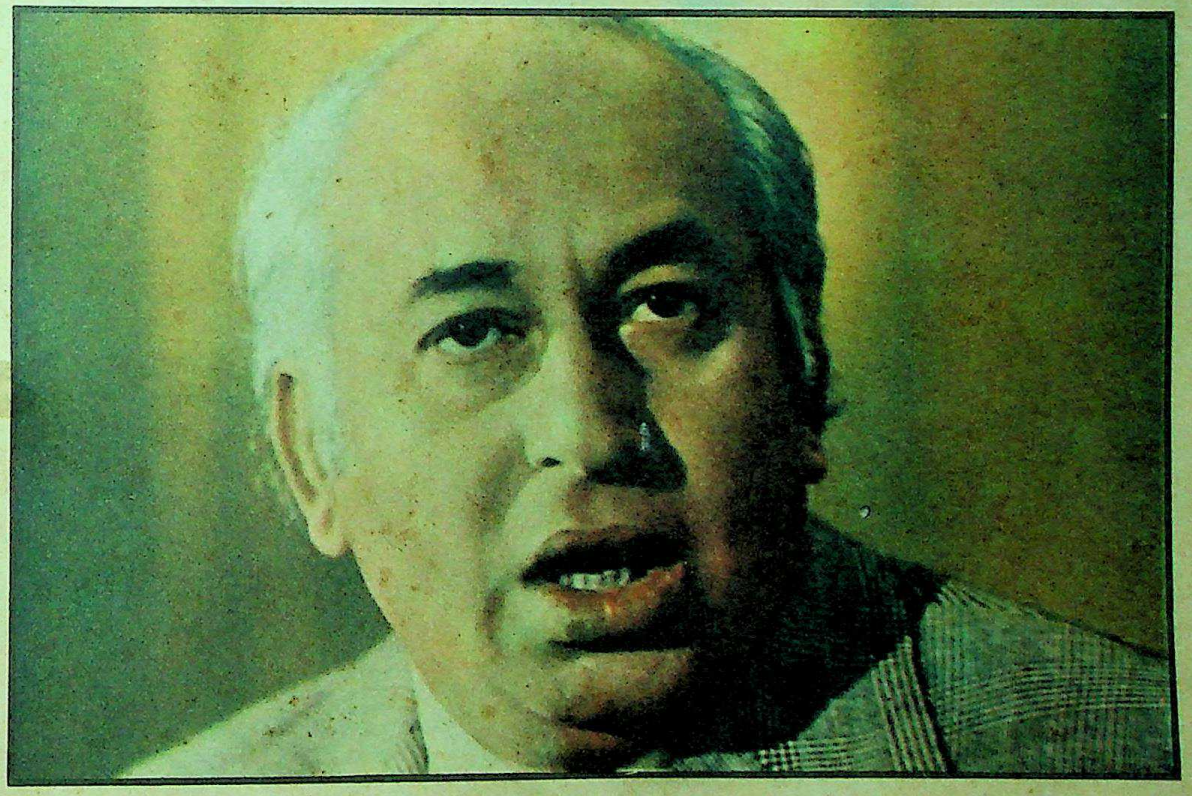
15 APRIL 1979 AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION Re 1
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNDAY

Exclusive report from Pakistan by Peter Niesewand

Tariq Ali speaks out from London

How Muslim nations treat their leaders



Has Bhutto been silenced?

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

"Life is no brief candle, its a splendid torch"*

Like the unique range of Geep focussing torches. In a striking combination of steel, brass, aluminium, and plastic. With an extra-powerful, long-distance beam. In an exciting range of colours and three convenient sizes - the large 824, the standard 724, and the new mini 524.

Buy a Geep torch today.
You never know when you'll need it.

GEEP - highest value for your money

Sterling-GF-4035

GEEP

GEEP FLASHLIGHT INDUSTRIES LTD.
(A Shervani Enterprise)

*With apologies to George Bernard Shaw

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

BETALLER

Are you fed up with being called 'Shorty', 'Little Man' or even 'Hey you down there'?

Now for the first time in Asia, a complete step-by-step illustrated method that shows you how to add centimetres to your height.

Grow as much as 5 to 15 cms. in just 2 short weeks . . . or pay nothing!

Please note that the NEW HEIGHT COURSE is a BOOK OF INSTRUCTIONS on how to be taller and how to correct the posture with the help of certain scientific excercises. IT IS NOT A MEDICINE OR DRUG.

Presenting the NEW HEIGHT method for growing taller—whether you're young or old, man or woman. No gadgets or strenuous exercises, no artificial aids like elevator shoes, no appliances. New Height is an all new, scientific method based on an exclusive Swiss principle which reactivates the whole body.

New Height is remarkably effective in both men and women—has been proved in thousands of cases all over Europe. Now spend only a few minutes each day following the step-by-step instructions. In 2 short weeks, measure your height.

You will find it has increased—perhaps by as much as 15 full centimetres. And remember, if you do not obtain satisfactory results, we'll refund immediately, no questions asked.

A TORRENT OF TRIBUTES FROM NEW HEIGHT USERS:-

"Ididn't think it was possible to gain height But to my delight, New Height helped me to keep going until I reached 185 cms". S.R.K.

"The New Height course is worth its weight in gold and more! My life has changed since I gained 11 cms. in height." R.H.

Whether it be social success, love, sports, jobs or pleasure, the tall man always seems to get there first. So act NOW for a new you. Tall up rapidly and permanently. Be Taller NOW!

GOOD FOR LADIES TOO!

SEND THIS COUPON TODAY

MAIL ORDER SALES PVT. Ltd. Dept NH11
15 Mathew Road Bombay 400 004.

Yes, I want to be taller. Rush NEW HEIGHT for 10-day free home trial. If not fully satisfied, I may return everything for immediate refund (less postage and forwarding charges.)

(Please tick ☑ appropriate box)

☐ Send by Registered Post Parcel. I am sending Rs. 35 (plus Rs. 4 p. & f.) by Cheque/Draft/ I.P.O./M.O. No,..... dt.....

☐ Send by V.P.P. I promise to pay postman Rs. 39 on delivery.

SY-32

Name .....

Address .....

.....

.....Signature.....

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Mrs. D. Contractor of beauty salon Manize', Bombay, says:

'Hair is as individual as you are and I know just what you need from the Gleem range of shampoos'

Each Gleem variety complements your kind of hair with its special ingredients, rich lather, lingering French perfume and long-lasting economy.

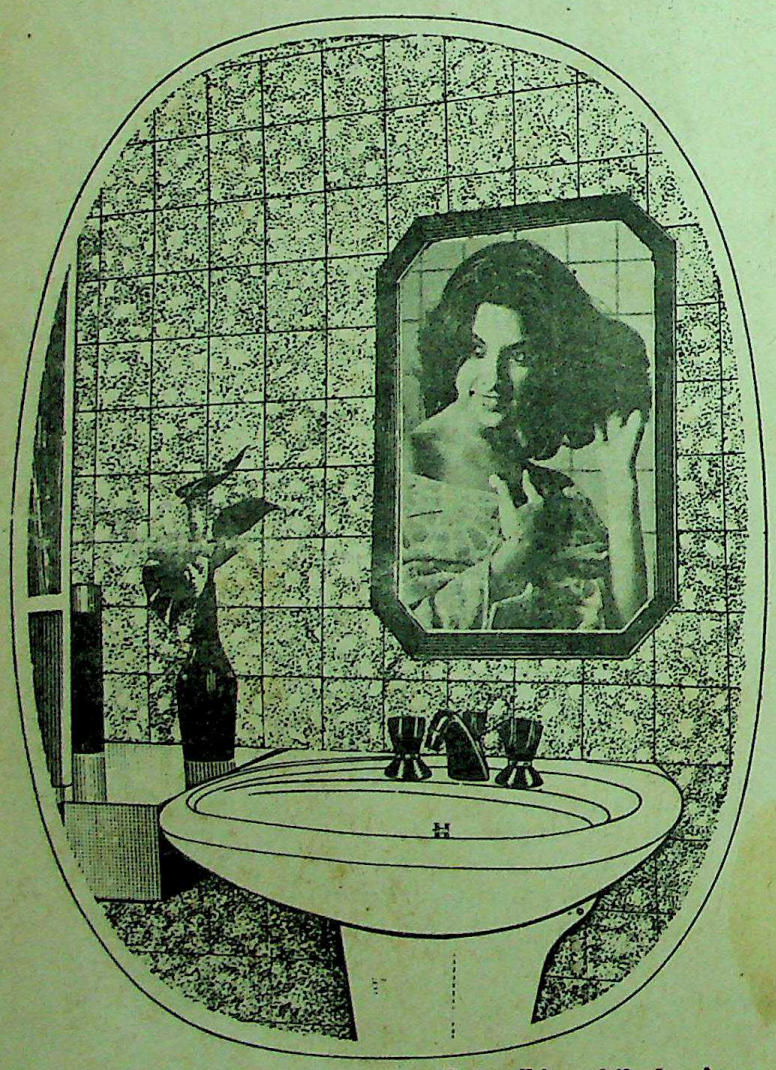
Gleem Regular	Gleem Egg	Gleem Tonic
Makes normal, healthy hair silky, clean, manageable	Nourishes lifeless hair to give it luxuriant body and health with pure egg protein	Cleans problem hair, loose scales, itchy scalp

NOW also in a convenient 60 ml size

Gleem SHAMPOO recommended by leading hairdressers

G-37-R

Geoffrey Manners & Co. Ltd.



Don't pay more. Insist on our Price List while buying.

The mirror in your bathroom reflects your face

But what does your bathroom reflect?

Your taste

Modern homes deserve modern bathrooms.

Choose Hindustan Sanitaryware with Soma Metal Fittings and accessories. Together they give you an elegant and efficient bathroom.

The Hindustan Sanitaryware range is backed by years of experience and expertise. And Soma Metal Fittings complement it perfectly. Made to Swiss precision, they are attractive and durable. Easy to fit and maintain.

naa.HSI.795

VITREOUS HINDUSTAN SANITARYWARE & INDUSTRIES LIMITED
Makers of India's largest selling, largest exported bathroom equipment

Soma Plumbing Fixtures, Limited
A wholly owned subsidiary of Hindustan Sanitaryware

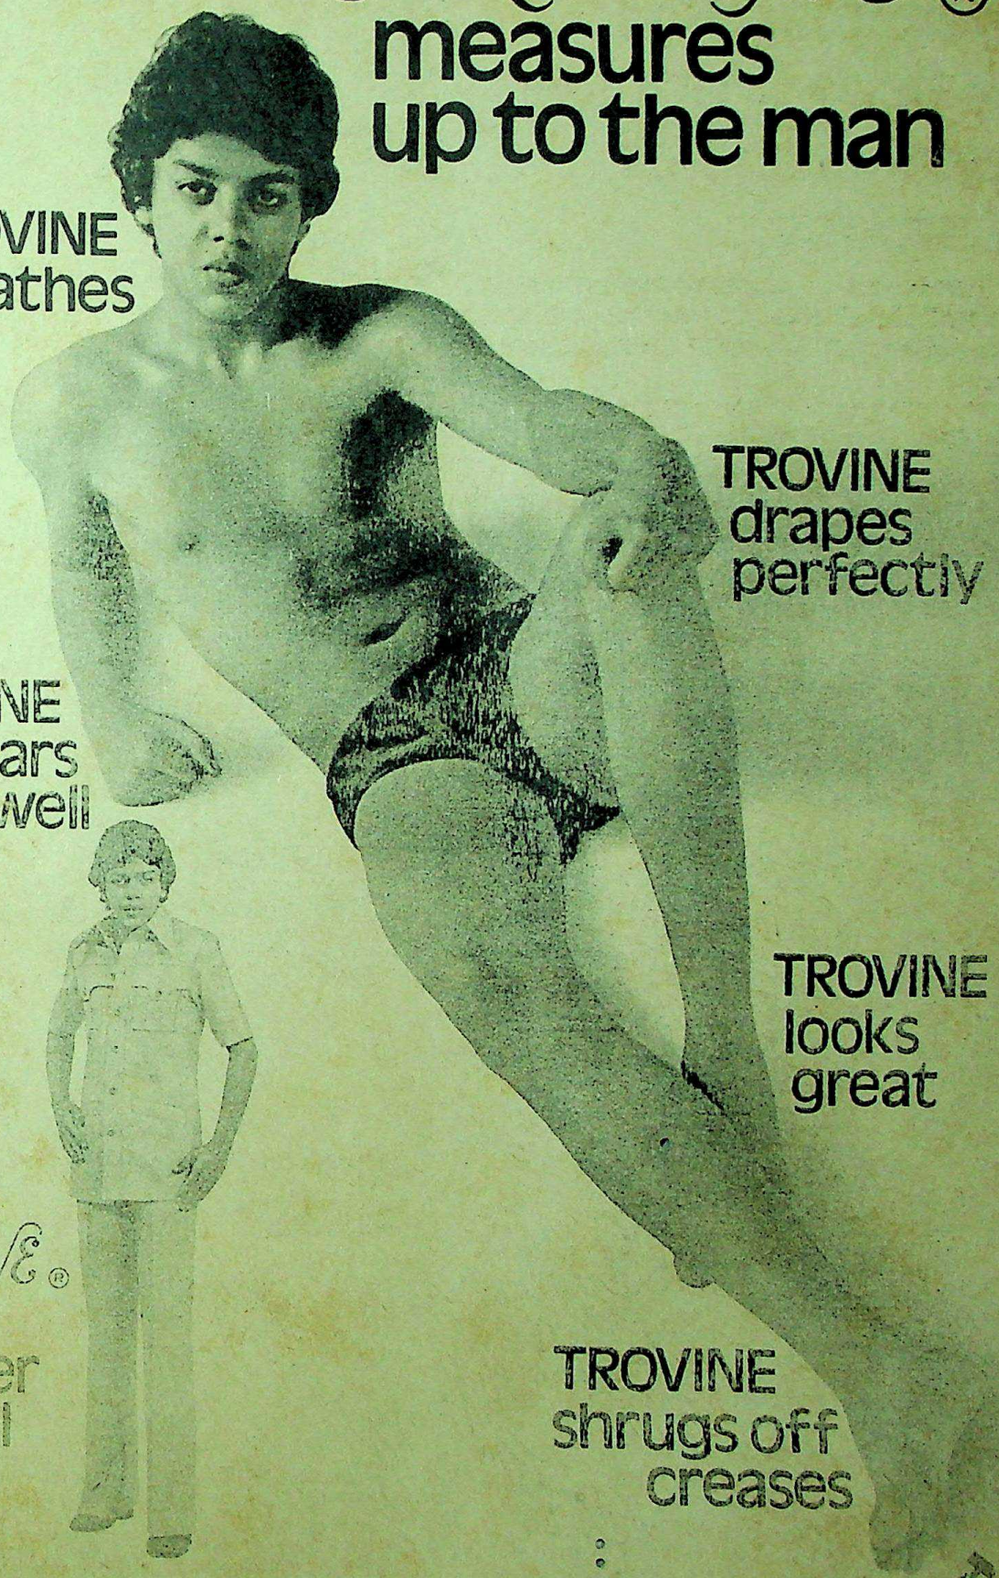
2, Red Cross Place, Calcutta-700 001

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Raymond's TROVINE®

measures up to the man



TROVINE breathes

TROVINE drapes perfectly

TROVINE wears well

TROVINE looks great

TROVINE® the summer special

TROVINE shrugs off creases

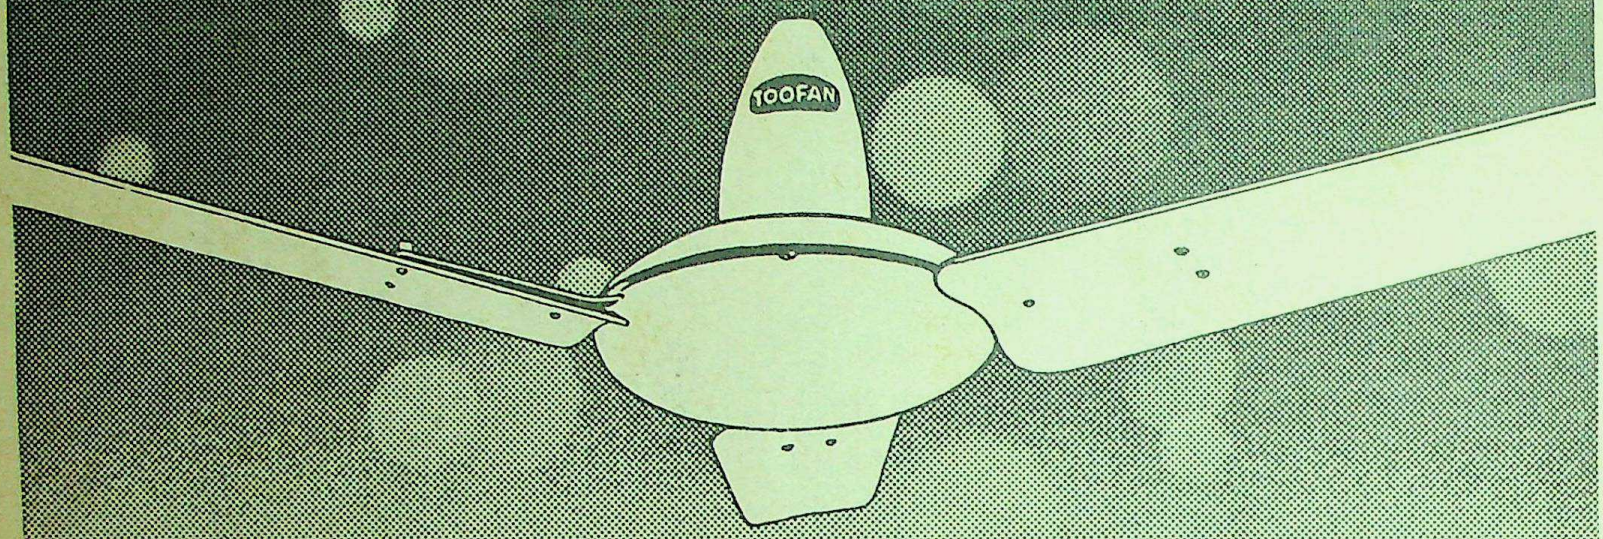
Raymond's A guide to the well-dressed male

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

GEC TOOFAN

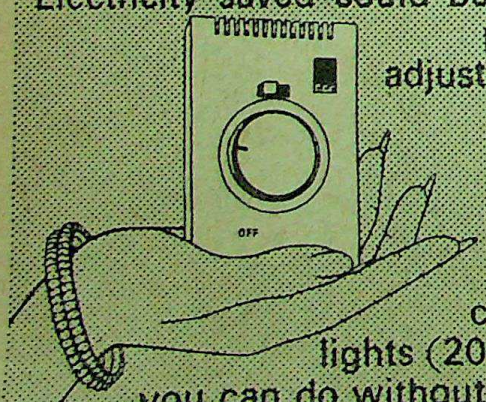
The best is what we put in it
Regardless of the cost



The best materials
The best design
And the best quality control
PLUS...

...A power-saving export model electronic regulator-cum-light-switch as standard equipment.

It takes up almost zero power at any speed. Electricity saved could be around Rs. 25 per year. Speed adjustments are finer too. And this mini wonder also includes a lightswitch that can control upto five lights (200 watts max). So you can do without a switchboard !



Total reliability

Every component in a Toofan fan is precision engineered, checked and re-checked for high air delivery, low power consumption, and a long, trouble-free life.

A 3-year guarantee that's really genuine

A GEC guarantee means exactly what it says : FREE replacement of parts with no 'ifs' and 'buts'.

GEC Toofan. The best looking, the most advanced ceiling fan to date.

GEC THE GENERAL ELECTRIC CO. OF INDIA LTD.

GEC/G/875/2

TRADE MARK GEC PERMITTED USER—THE GENERAL ELECTRIC COMPANY OF INDIA LIMITED

Creative Unit-A 2893

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

THE MOST IMPORTANT PART OF YOUR ATTIRE.

Pantene. It ensures strong, healthy hair growth. Because 'Panthenol', its unique ingredient helps stimulate and normalise healthy blood circulation.

Pantene also styles and sets your hair for hours on end. No wonder then people say that Pantene is all you need to look really well-groomed.

PANTENE

THE NON-GREASY GROOMING AID THAT CHECKS HAIRLOSS.

Creative Unit-A 2893

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Consumer Council of India Survey reveals

ONLY HERBS PROTECT TEETH FROM DENTAL DISEASES

Only neem Toothpaste

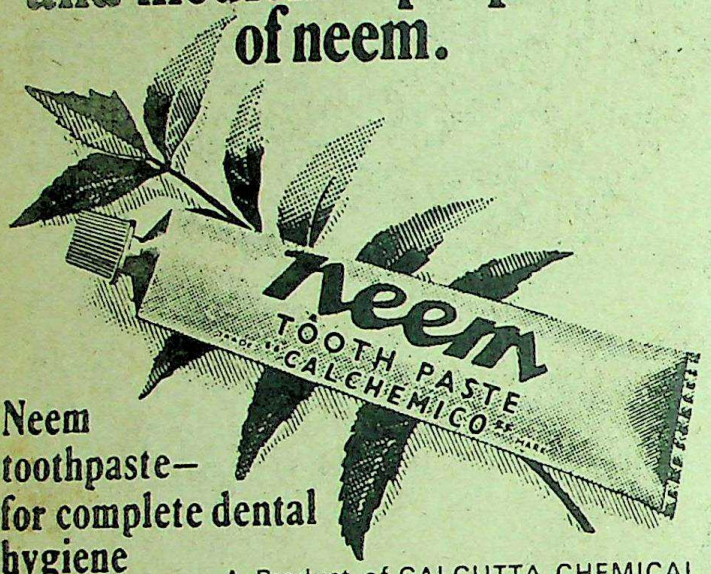
has the herbal and medicinal properties of neem.



Neem toothpaste– for complete dental hygiene

A Product of CALCUTTA CHEMICAL

FOR FULL PREPAREDNESS
for MEDICAL COLLEGES ENTRANCE EXAMS '79
(JIPMER, CMC, St.JOHN'S, AFMC, AIIMS, ANDHRA) Rely on BRILLIANT'S POSTAL TUITION
Comprising
A SYNOPTIC SURVEY OF THE PRE-MEDICAL SYLLABUS PLUS 3000 MULTIPLE CHOICE QUESTIONS ON THE SCIENCE SUBJECTS PLUS MODEL ANSWERS TO TYPICAL PAPERS OF THE OBJECTIVE AND ESSAY TYPES.

B BRILLIANT TUTORIALS

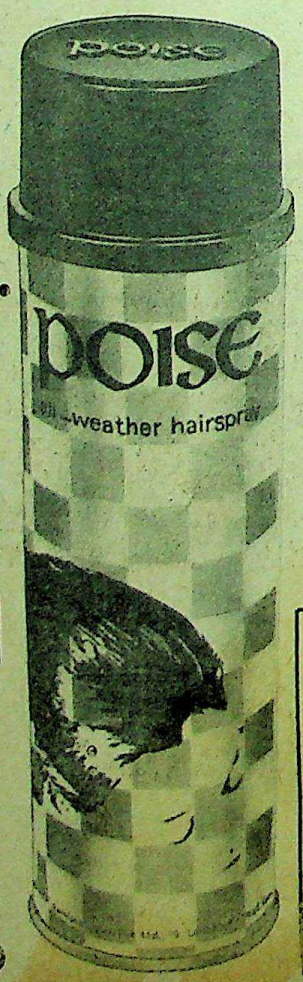
12, Masilamani Mudali Street, T. Nagar, Madras-600017. Phone: 442099

Classroom course for MBBS Entrance from 1st to 20th May.
Classroom course for IIT Entrance from 9th Apr to 29th Apr.
Postal Tuition Papers for IIT Entrance Available.

JUST ONE HAIRSPRAY TAKES CARE OF ALL KINDS OF HAIRSTYLES

What good is a beautiful hairstyle, if it can't stay that way?
Long, short or coiffured... hairstyles stay naturally in place with Poise Hairspray. Poise holds hair gently, but firmly. Shows up its gleaming, natural highlights. Sprays on evenly. Brushes clean away. No stickiness and no flaky particles.



poise
HAIRSPRAY

LET BEAUTY GO TO YOUR HEAD

Marketed by: Rallis India Ltd.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNGLOSS decorative laminate

Beauty that endures

caprihans
INDIA LIMITED

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Great Picture.
Great Sound.
Great Service.

Ask anyone who owns one.

CROWN-TV

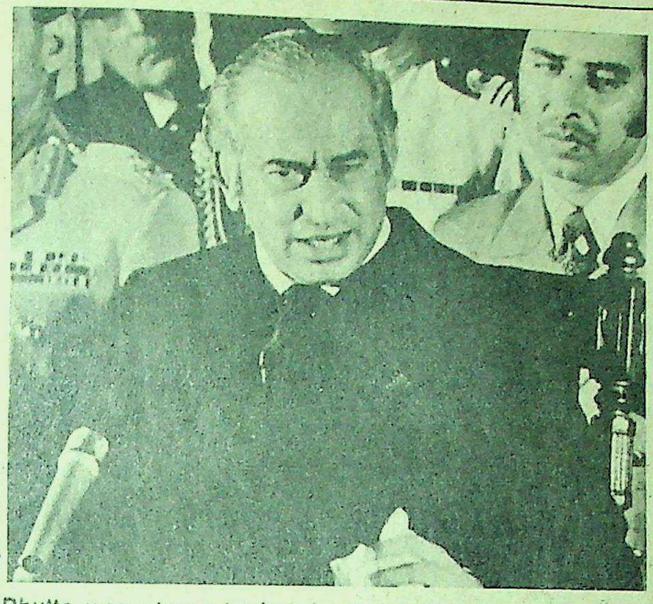
Our service tells the difference.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNDAY VOLUME 6
ISSUE 49
RUPEE ONE
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

April 15, 1979



Aloke Mitra

Bhutto was stunned when he heard that he would be hanged; his fellow prisoners joined him spontaneously as he read the Quran in his cell just before his execution—PETER NIESEWAND reports from Islamabad on Bhutto's last hours and the bewildered Pakistan he leaves behind. Tarapada Basu interviews the exiled Pakistani firebrand, Tariq Ali, in London on Pakistan's past and future.

"RSS as an organisation, even for its presumed narrow sectarian interests, would never like to have communal disturbances in the country," the Janata Party President, Chandrashekhar, tells BHOLA CHATTERJEE in an exclusive interview.

An income-tax raid on a Lucknow tailor's shop in 1976 led to an amazing discovery — a copper plate bearing an inscription in Persian which may provide the clue to a fabulous treasure hidden somewhere. Since then a relentless search has been on, which has now led to Faizabad. TANIA SHAH visited Lucknow and Faizabad to trace the course of this obsessive treasure-hunt.

When in 1919, General Dyer's troops shot down hundreds of Indians at Jallianwalla Bagh, his superiors condoned his action and the Lords' passed a motion in his support. In the first part of the serialisation of "Farewell the Trumpets" James Morris recounts the Jallianwalla Bagh massacre and traces Gandhi's role in the early phase of the Independence movement.

COMMENT

Opinion 12
The media 29

COVER STORY

Has Bhutto been silenced?|Peter Niesewand 16
Bhutto was bad ; the Generals worse : Interview with Tariq Ali|Tarapada Basu

SUNDAY SPECIAL

The hidden treasure of Oudh|Tania Shah 40

CONVERSATION

'I run the Janata, not RSS": Interview with Chandrashekhar|Bhola Chatterjee 36

CINEMA

Khaas Baat 32

NEWS

Headless media|Vivek Sengupta 25
Diabetes — the main culprit|Olga Tellis 41

VARIETY

Chess|Bridge|Quiz|Stamps 53
Sunday week 55
India abroad 56
Without comment 56
This India 56
Humour in real life 56
A word or two 57
Stranger than fiction 57
Comics : Asterix 30

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Delhi Diary 28
Serial : Farewell the trumpets 46
Deadpan|O. V. Vijayan 35
Science 54
Comic strip : Peanuts 54

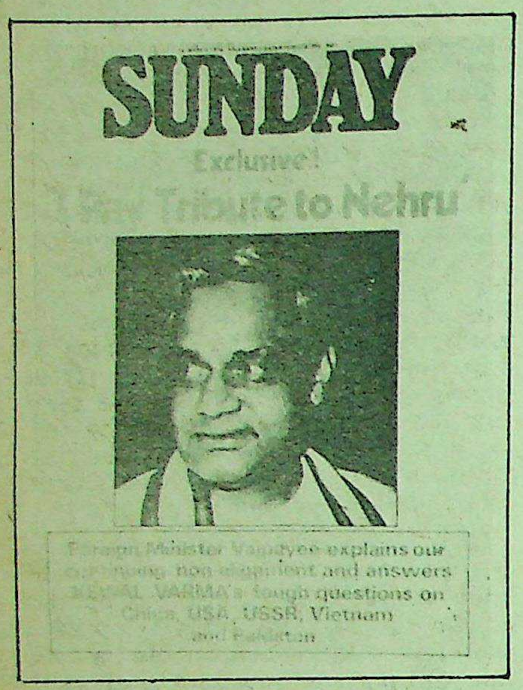
Cover transparency by AP

Editor M. J. Akbar
Assistant Editor Subir Roy Editorial Staff Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, Nirmal Mitra, David McMahon, Saumitra Banerjee, Tirthankar Ghosh, S. N. M. Abdi Delhi Correspondent Ajoy Bose
Art Director Bipul Guha Asst Art Director Amiya Bhattacharya

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Published from 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001 and printed at Ananda Offset Private Ltd., P-248, C.I.T. Scheme No. VI M Calcutta

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Brilliant debate

KEWAL VARMA's interview with the Foreign Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee: "I pay tribute to Nehru" (March 18) was a marvellous debate that outmatches all verbal exchanges in Parliament on foreign policy. Mr Varma was at his best in his queries and succeeded in laying bare the hypocrisy of the Janata's "genuine non-alignment". Mr Vajpayee had to seek shelter in loud laughter when Mr Varma cornered him quite effectively on many inconvenient issues. It is time such effective journalism came into vogue, to evaluate the Janata Government's performances rather than allow it to persist with the memory of the "Emergency excesses".
Mohammad Aslam, New Delhi.

THE interview has improved the image of the Janata Government, and Mr Vajpayee's in particular.
Tainwala R. K., Gangtok

THE cover story was enlightening, particularly Mr Vajpayee's answer to the question about the implications of the Islamic resurgence for India: "India is the world's second most populous Muslim country and Muslims in India, like all other communities, are free to practise their religious beliefs. However all religions have to come to terms with modernisation and this applies to Islam as well." In fact, Janata, the weekly magazine of the socialist movement published from Bombay, has been continuously calling for the modernisation of all Indians as an alternative to the RSS' slogan of Indianisation of non-Hindus. With due respect to Mr Vajpayee, he should know that like charity, modernisation begins at home.
Chundi Jagannatham, Hyderabad.

THOUGH most other important matters regarding India's foreign policy were talked about in detail, no mention was made by either Mr Vajpayee or Mr Varma of the Karakoram Highway which the Chinese are constructing in Pakistan. Before Mr Vajpayee's departure for China, this matter was raised as it is believed to be a threat to India's security. The Foreign Minister assured the nation that he would lodge a protest on the issue with the Chinese leaders, but even after his return there is no indication of his having had any discussion on the issue.
Deepak Daftuar, Chaibasa (Bihar)

THE authors of our foreign policy perhaps thought that by prefixing the word "genuine" to qualify the already complete and comprehensive concept of non-alignment, they would succeed in qualifying their own formulative capacity. Little do they realise that the word "genuine" is redundant and meaningless in the context. Clearly, the term has been coined to serve political ends. It is pointless to debate whether the meaning of the term rests on "nuances" or "content" and whether it serves our "being non-aligned." Obviously, Mr Vajpayee has been cornered by Mr Varma.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Hrishi Kesh, Kanpur.

IT IS time we learnt of China's real intentions. The Chinese Vice-Premier Deng Xiao Ping's assertion about the Sino-Indian border dispute is dubious. China also underestimates India's potential (Deng's statement that Vietnam is stronger than India), is keeping quiet about Sikkim, and insisting on helping the Naga rebels, which is definitely an interference in our internal affairs. Again, China's attack on Vietnam to "teach her a lesson" is a grim reminder that her sole ideology is to attack wherever she finds convenient. Hence, India should not agree to normalise relations with China without a settlement of the border dispute.
Sibaram Padhi, Berhampur (Orissa)

Kissa badtamizi ka

THE report "Kissa Sanjay ka" by Ajoy Bose (March 18) enables one to assess the magnitude of highhandedness which Sanjay could have displayed when his mother was the Prime Minister. What he and his hirelings did in court leads to contempt of court and the least Justice Vohra could have done was to sue Mr Gandhi. If the offenders go unpunished it will be setting a precedent and compelling others to believe that even in law there are double standards.
Shiv Kumar Jha, Daltonganj.

That's great

IN THE modern rat-race it is most striking and refreshing to see one magazine (SUNDAY) calling another magazine (NEW DELHI) a "stablemate". Not only this, you have also implored all those who have been missing Khushwant Singh's column to read it in NEW DELHI. Till today, I was proud to be a regular reader of SUNDAY but now, I am proud of SUNDAY.
N. Anantaraman, Calcutta.

Plan the Commission

IN HIS article: "Janata's Plan: will it roll on?" (February 18) Dr D. M. Nachane is right in saying that "the early history of Indian planning is largely the story of Nehru's personal triumph and tragedy". But I do not agree with his view that the failure of planning is due to the lack of "a sense of mass participation". He seems to lament the fact that in spite of all his plus points, Nehru "could not identify with the masses the way Gandhiji could".

It was the fault of the makers of our Constitution that they did not provide for any planning body. Our first PM, though quite aware of the need for a planning commission, never cared to make it an independent advisory body. Perhaps, nobody in the Government then wanted the Commission to come up with plans that did not suit their personal likings. Why does the Planning Commission have Cabinet Ministers as members? It is clear the Commission is a political body because senior Ministers review its operations and lay down directives for it at two superior levels, the National Development Council and the Union Cabinet. But the detailed working and formation of the Plan, the decision of marking priorities and the choice of a particular line of growth from among various alternatives, are technical matters which should be left to economists. As such the top members of the Commission should necessarily be economic experts.

It is this aspect which reviewers of our economy should emphasise. They should help form public opinion in regard to the setting up of a Planning Commission with a set membership and Constitutional sanction. The talk of a "sense of mass participation" and "identifying with the masses" is empty rhetoric. If a person were to gain in some measure from a Plan, and feel its presence in his daily life, why would he not deve-

It's now more fun to go Click Click Click Click

with Agfa
Click IV
*Sophisticated black finish.
*Universal flash contact and accessory shoe.
Get one! Gift one!
Visit your friendly Agfa Dealer soon.
®Registered Trademark of Agfa-Gevaert, Antwerp/Leverkusen. Manufacturers of Photographic Products.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Is buying an ENFIELD-200 like a marriage?

Many think it is. After all, they say...
"ENFIELD-200 is a sleek beauty.
Smart men fall for its looks – then enjoy its company, qualities & performance.
Mostly, it's a 'love-marriage' and many envy the man. Often, fond parents 'arrange' it for their worthy sons. Sometimes, there's some waiting – like an engagement period!"

What do you think ? Just see, feel and test-ride this beauty once. You'll own it happily ever after !

ENFIELD-200:
born deluxe.

The Enfield India Ltd.

ADWAVE/EIM/952

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

lop a sense of participation in it? Good measures always win the support of the public.

Even a man of Roosevelt's farsight cared to respect the advice of economists when programming his New Deal. In India it is perhaps by a strange coincidence that both the Plans and General Elections come up after every five years, and political leaders take up the Plans as part of their election campaigns. While the aim of an election is achieved in a short time, the aim of a Plan is not. If the Congress (I) comes to power in the next elections, the Planning Commission would be forced to take another somersault. So before the Planning Commission starts chalking out the Seventh Five Year Plan, it is necessary to plan the Commission itself.

Ravi Shankar Chowdhury, Silchar.

I WOULD like to point out a few errors in the table accompanying Dr D. M. Nachane's article, of the "Distribution of Public Sector Outlay among different sectors in the Five Plans". The total outlays given under the First and Second Plans are the revised outlays, and those given under the Third and Fifth Plans are from the draft plans. As far as I know, the total outlay given under the Fourth Plan is neither the revised nor the actual figure. Again, if the allocations under different heads are added, the results do not tally with the total figures mentioned under the Third, Fourth and Fifth Plans. Further, under the Fifth Plan, the allocation against Industries and Minerals i.e., Rs 8,939 crores is not 24.2 per cent of the total outlay, Rs 37,250 crores, as mentioned. 24.4 per cent of Rs 37,240 crores is Rs 9,029. crores, which was actually the figure for Industries and Minerals in the Draft Fifth Plan. Besides, the total of all percentages against different heads under the Second Plan comes to 109 and not 100, because 445 is not 19 per cent but approximately 10 per cent of 4,600.

Sucharita Choudhury, Shillong.

Editor's Note: You are correct. Except for the total outlay given under the First Plan, (Rs 1,960 crores) the other figures given under the Second, Third, Fourth and and Fifth Plans are wrong. Instead of Rs 4,600 crores, Rs 7,500 crores, Rs 16,774 crores and Rs 37,250 crores, they should read Rs 4,672 crores, Rs 8,577 crores, Rs 15,779 crores and Rs 39,287.49 crores for the Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth Plans respectively. These are the final figures. Sorry for the lapse.

Stop the chaos

AJOY BOSE, in his article "Dhanbad: city of terror" (March 11) has outlined the level of degradation to which our trade union movements have sunk, as also the attitude of our Government. It seems that the trade union movement under A. K. Roy is the only hope for the common man. His supporters have resorted to bows and arrows and taken the law into their own hands.

Mohammed Akhtar, Banpur

AJOY BOSE did a marvellous job. Incidentally, most copies of the March 11 issue of SUNDAY in Dhanbad were bought by the union toughs and burnt to prevent them from being circulated among the colliery workers.

N. Dave, Dhanbad

Exploiter, did you say?

I WOULD like to draw your attention to certain inaccuracies in the article "Lampholder to gangster-millionaire" (March 11). First, it has been reported that Suryadeo Singh joined me and made plans to capture the Boragarh and Kustore Unions and further that I was a CPI leader in 1967. I would like to state that I had no connection with the CPI then nor with the SVD Government, and Suryadeo Singh did not join me. At that time the Krantikari Koyala Mazdoor Sangh was not affiliated to the AITUC but instead to the IFITU.

As a matter of fact, Suryadeo Singh did not become a trade unionist till 1973. Secondly, it is a fact that following the assault on Rafique Khan, and his subsequent death, the management of M/s K. Wara and Co got me implicated in the case of his murder, but it is not true that the then Chief Minister, Mahamaya Prasad Singh, tried to help me. He was not approached at all. I was subsequently released on bail. No witness has so far turned up in the case. It is not a fact that I tried to decamp. On receiving the information that I was implicated in the case, I voluntarily surrendered. Judging by the reporting it seems that Suryadeo Singh and I had conversed while we were in jail. This is not true. I had no connection with Suryadeo Singh and no such conversation took place. I do not see how the author could have reported this. Third, I was never the "guru" of Suryadeo Singh. I did not have any battle, let alone battles, with him on the road or in the colliery areas. I had no musclemen nor did I try to extort 'chanda' from the poor miners. Further, I never tried to capture the INTUC Union at Boragarh and no one was either killed or injured in the alleged attempt to capture the INTUC Union at Boragarh. I am a trade unionist and I do not believe in holding on to a union in a manner unbecoming of a man. Fourth, the report relating to the counterattack on my assailants lacks credibility. I was attacked as soon as my car stopped in front of my house and there was no opportunity or occasion for me to counterattack the assailants.

As regards your suggestion that I did not mention the counter attack in the FIR because I had an unlicensed firearm with me, I would like to inform you that I have a licensed revolver that I always carry with me for the purpose of my own safety Fifth, I met A. K. Roy and he has categorically denied having said what has been attributed to him as an answer to the question: "In Dhanbad, what are the communist unions doing?". Finally, contrary to what has been reported, I do not own any car and the car I happen to travel in is maintained by the union I serve. I have no house or land in Dhanbad. I live in a rented flat. I am not involved in the exploitation of workers. So far there has not been any complaint against me to this effect.

Sheo Kumar Rai, President, United Coal Workers Union, Dhanbad.

In defence of the RSS

WHILE you are entitled to your own views as a free journal, I feel that most of your articles on the RSS are thoroughly one-sided and unjust. Very seldom is an attempt made to show what the RSS exactly stands for, and what it is doing in this country. Undoubtedly, the organisation has its roots in Hindu dharma, but it also works for the social, moral and religious uplift of the people. While the RSS does mobilise Hindu support for its goals, it does not preach hatred toward any other religion in this country or abroad. During Mrs Gandhi's regime, an enquiry commission was appointed to investigate the real cause of communal disturbances, and the RSS was not found guilty. Even in the riots at Aligarh, the UP Government did not find the hand of the RSS behind them.

The RSS is only helping to reform the moral character of the people and trying to infuse in them a spirit of patriotism. These qualities stand the nation in good stead when it is faced with foreign aggression, natural calamity or an era like the Emergency. The late Prime Minister Lal Bahadur Shastri in fact had spoken highly of the RSS' role during the 1965 war with Pakistan. Besides, many political bigwigs would not enjoy positions of prominence today if the RSS had not stood behind them.

Rajendranath Roychowdhury, Calcutta

We are sad to announce the death of Col B. N. Kaul, author of "Puritanism or survival?" (March 11), of a heart attack on March 15, 1979. — Editor, SUNDAY.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Has Bhutto been silenced?

PETER NIESEWAND reports from Islamabad

Raghu Rai

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

IT was Begum Nusrat and his daughter Benazir who broke the news to Zulfikar Ali Bhutto on Tuesday (April 3) that he was to be hanged a few hours later. Prison sources said that when the two women were brought from house arrest at Sihala, about 15 miles away, for their last meeting with the deposed Prime Minister, Bhutto had not been officially informed of his impending execution. The women mentioned that it was their final visit and Bhutto looked stunned. The prison superintendent was summoned, and he confirmed then that the plan was for a hanging in the early hours of Wednesday morning.

In the appalling days before Bhutto mounted the scaffold, the military authorities made sure he suffered. They took away his bed and made him sleep on the cement floor of a cell which was infested with red and black ants. They removed books and writing materials. They refused to let him use the adjoining lavatory, but gave him a commode in his cell which they rarely emptied so that visitors came away nauseated by the stench. The steel bars of the death cell door were kept permanently locked. At the final anguished meeting with his wife and daughter, the authorities would not even allow them a last embrace. The family held hands and kissed farewell through the bars. Then a police car sped back to house arrest both women, staring straight ahead, their faces shocked. Their application to attend the funeral was turned down. They were not even permitted to see Bhutto's body.

Hangings in Pakistan—and there have been about 400 of them since General Zia-ul-Haq took over—are usually carried out at dawn, but Bhutto was executed furtively, in the dead of night. Armed troops moved in at midnight, surrounding the gaol and arresting Pakistani journalists they found watching the activity. Bhutto wrote out his will and the magistrate, who was soon to see him die, witnessed his signature. Gaol officials claimed next day that Bhutto had later changed his mind and burned it, but it seemed more likely they had done so. He was allowed a bath and given some verses from the Qufan to read. In cells around him, other prisoners began loudly chanting recitations from the holy book.

A few minutes before the appointed time of 2 a.m., the prison superintendent arrived at the death cell to identify Bhutto as the man named in the black warrant, and to read to him the sequence of the rejection of his appeal by the Supreme Court, and the refusal of the soldier who overthrew him to accept mercy petitions lodged on his behalf. Bhutto's hands were pinioned behind his back and he was escorted, in slow procession, to the scaffold : two warders in front of him, two behind, and one holding each arm. His escorts kept their eyes downcast.

In the last hour the other prisoners in the cells around Bhutto began loudly chanting recitations from the Quran.

They positioned Bhutto on the trap directly beneath the beam to which the manila rope had been attached, and the hangman bent down to strap his legs tightly together. Bhutto cried out: "Oh Lord help me, for I am innocent." A hood was then placed over his head, and the noose was tightened around his neck. The warders holding his arms stood back, and Pakistan's last elected Prime Minister waited for the trap to crash open. The medical officer stood with the hangman and the other witnesses for 30 minutes before going down to check that Bhutto's heart had stopped beating. He pronounced : "Life extinct", and the body was cut down and placed in a plain wooden coffin. It was taken by truck and aircraft to the remote hamlet of Ghari Bhutto near the town of Larkana, where Bhutto was born 51 years earlier, and where the family graveyard is located.

Three relatives were informed of the execution and allowed to attend the funeral: two uncles and Bhutto's first wife Amir Begum. Amir Begum looked into the coffin. She said: "I saw the face. They had shaved him and it was obvious that he had been hanged. But he looked as innocent as a flower."

Most Pakistanis were stunned and angered by the execution. Employees in Government offices wept openly. A man said: "Now this country will be like Iran". A wave of demonstrations and riots swept Pakistan—spontaneous outbursts—not organised by those currently holding the torch passed down from Bhutto.

Bhutto's PPP is at its lowest ebb : confused, impotent and lacking in courage. Even an angry group of 30 PPP student supporters, who broke into the house in Islamabad where the Central Executive Committee was meeting earlier this month to demand that they stop their polite discussions and take to the streets to lead demonstrations, failed to make an impact.

PPP officials reported stirrings of anger in the countryside, but admitted they were doing nothing to capitalise on these. In the towns there had been silence, except for Amir Begum said: "I saw the face..it was obvious that he had been hanged. But he looked as innocent as a flower."

some sporadic demonstrations. Members of the Central Executive claimed that the people were just waiting for a signal, and then they would rise. But if this was true, they waited in vain. The PPP leadership remained inscrutable.

Only some of Zia ul-Haq's senior aides looked at the situation with satisfaction. "How can anyone believe Bhutto is so popular?" one of them asked. "Where are the demonstrations? It's not Martial Law which is making them keep quiet, because people will brave bullets if they believe in something strongly enough. Remember what happened in Pakistan during the PNA movement in 1977? There were demonstrations all over — mass arrests, people shot. It didn't stop them. They came onto the streets day after day, and then we moved in and toppled Bhutto."

Not all army officers believed this simple analysis : indeed, there is even evidence now that Zia himself doesn't really go along with it, and that he is preparing himself for trouble later in the year.

The PNA movement at least had courageous leadership : the PPP today has none. Martial Law regulations make it an offence punishable by flogging and imprisonment to take part in political demonstrations, and without a clear lead from the top, few are willing to expose themselves in what might be a small, futile, individual gesture.

When Begum Nusrat and Benazir told Bhutto he would be hanged a few hours later, he looked stunned.

Some members of the PPP Executive are suggesting privately that it was on the instructions of Bhutto himself that no large-scale demonstrations were mounted, but sources close to the former Premier say this is simply not true. The failure was one of the current leadership, and of those ex-Cabinet Ministers, such as Abdul Hafeez Pirzada, who are not in prison at the moment, but who have shied away from laying their freedom on the line in an attempt to save the life of their Party Chairman.

Unflattering comparisons between Pakistan and India have been drawn by the PPP critics. In India, lakhs of people would be out on the streets, courting arrest, if say, Mrs Gandhi were in a death cell, awaiting execution. In Pakistan, it was news when police "apprehended seven PPP women workers for raising slogans outside the premises of the Sind High Court and later taking out a procession."

For Bhutto himself in his stinking death cell, with its uncleaned toilet commode, its one hard wooden chair, and the dirty blankets on the cement

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Bhutto 1928-1979

Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, son of Sir Shahnawaz Khan Bhutto.
Born: January 5, 1928.
Education: Graduated with Honours in Political Science from University of California, Berkeley. MA with distinction in Jurisprudence from Christ Church College, Oxford. Bar-at-law from Lincoln's Inn, London.
1952-'53: Leclurer in International Law, University of Southampton.
1953-'58: Teacher of Constitutional Law, Sind Muslim College, Pakistan. Practising Lawyer at West Pakistan High Court, Karachi.
October 25, 1958: Joins Iskander Mirza's Cabinet.
1958-'60: Minister of Commerce, Pakistan.
January 1960-'62: Pakistan Minister of Minority Affairs, National Reconstruction and Minister of Information. In April, 1962, also becomes Minister of Fuel, Power and National Resources and Kashmir Affairs.
1962: Elected Member of National Assembly of Pakistan for Larkana. Becomes deputy leader of the Muslim League.
1962-'65: Minister of Industries and Natural Resources.
1963-'66: Minister of Foreign Affairs.
March 1965: Secretary General of Pakistan Muslim League.
June 1966: Resigns from Government, returns to the legal profession.
September 19, 1967: Forms Pakistan People's Party and becomes its Chairman.
1968: Leads popular movement against President Ayub Khan; arrested in September.
February 1969: Released.
November 28, 1969: Escapes assassination attempt.
March 1970: Escapes another attempt on his life.
December 1970: Elected Member of the National Assembly.
December 20,. 1971: Becomes President and Chief Martial Law Administrator.
April 21, 1972: Lifts Martial Law.
June 4, 1972: Signs Simla Agreement.
August 14, 1973-'77: Becomes Prime Minister.
July 4, 1977: Deposed in coup and imprisoned. Released in the same month, but detained again.
September 3, 1977: Arrested in Karachi for the alleged murder of Ahmad Raza Kasuri. Formally indicted on September 12. Released on bail of Rs. 50,000 on the orders of Mr. Justice A. K. Samdani of Lahore High Court on September 13. Arrested again in Larkana, Sind, on September 17.
October 11, 1977: Trial opens before five judges of the Lahore High Court.
March 18, 1978: Sentenced to death.
February 18, 1979: Supreme Court upholds conviction in 4-3 verdict.
March 24, 1979: Supreme Court rejects review petition but recommends clemency.
April 4, 1979: Hanged to death.

Missions and delegations

1957: Member of Pakistan delegation to the UN General Assembly.
1958: Leader of Pakistan delegation to the UN Conference on Law of the Sea, Geneva.
1959, 1960, 1963, 1965 and 1966: in Pakistan delegation to the UN General Assembly.
April 1964: Afro-Asian Conference, Jakarta.
April 1965: Bandung Conference.
1974: Chairman of Islamic Summit Conference, Lahore.
1960: Mission to India in April (Press Code). USSR in December.
1962-'63: In delegation to India on the Kashmir dispute.
1963: Peking in March. Teheran in May.
1964: Burma in January.
1965: Moscow in January. Foreign Ministers Conference in Algiers, July. Summit Conference in July. Commonwealth Prime Ministers Conference in London.
1974: Bangladesh.

Decorations and awards

1964: Hilal-i-Pakistan.
1966: Awarded honorary LLD, Sind University.
Foreign decorations: Nishan-i-Hamayun, First Class from Iran. Order of the Republic of Indonesia. Gran Cruz de la Orden Del Libertador General San Martin, Argentine Civil Award.

floor, the last days have heaped new pressures and agonies on him.

ONE of Bhutto's great failings has always been his inability to judge character. He promoted General Zia to Chief of Staff, above the heads of those next in line, because he thought Zia would be "safer". In his administration, Bhutto surrounded himself with people whose loyalty he bought, and who were often no better than thugs, or as one respected Asian magazine recently called them, "scum". The others around were the sycophants, who are always thrown up during the rule of an autocrat, and who pandered to Bhutto's desires to be verbally stroked at all times.

Then there were the weaklings, the family members, the friends of friends who were rewarded with positions beyond their experience or capabilities. A few good men were also there : but the good they did is largely interred with the bones of Bhutto's administration. When Bhutto's life depended on massive public demonstrations of support and direct challenges to the Martial Law authorities, the members of the General Executive have failed to rouse themselves to take personal risks. When his health deteriorated after the Supreme Court rejected the review petition, and the prison authorities confiscated his medicines so that he was virtually unable to eat and vomited much of what he did manage to swallow, the Central Executive sprang into action. It wrote Bhutto a letter : "We beseech you, in the name of Allah and the love that you have for the people of Pakistan, to assuage this concern of the people by partaking of your meals."

Bhutto was not on a hunger strike. He could not eat. His long-standing gum disease, chronic periodontitis had gone untreated, and the prison authorities had confiscated even his bottle of Listerine — the most basic requirement of hygiene in Bhutto's case. The result was that his gums turned black and he began coughing up blood. In the midst of all this, to receive an entreaty from his political colleagues asking in effect that he eat his greens, must have been hard to bear. But worse was to come : incidents which those closest to Bhutto said he viewed as betrayals.

Bhutto had remained resolute that no petitions for mercy should be sent to General Zia from either his family or his Party. He considered that those would amount to an admission of guilt, however they were phrased. He refused to beg. He was prepared to die first.

But around him, the ranks were breaking. Much as he tried to shore up the morale and determination of those outside, by his own courage, and sometimes even humour during prison visits, the wavering grew. The Central Executive Committee decided to send a mercy petition to General Zia, ignoring the instructions of their Chairman, Abdul

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Hafeez Pirzada (the former Finance Minister) who, after an agonised night, finally announced that he too would submit his own personal "representation". Coincidentally, Pirzada was unexpectedly called to see Bhutto in Rawalpindi Gaol, and he arrived there knowing that the Executive had already delivered their petition to Zia, and that he himself would do likewise later in the day. He also knew what Bhutto would say, since he had broached the subject briefly during a visit two days earlier, and Bhutto had "hit the ceiling".

Confronted with the former Prime Minister, locked on the other side of his steel-barred cell door, Pirzada's courage failed, and he did not mention the petitions. He said later that Bhutto would probably find out about them from his guards, or by reading a report in the newspaper.

The following day, Zia got the prize he had been pursuing for weeks — a mercy petition from a member of Bhutto's own family. Mrs Imtiaz Sherbano, his half-sister, who is considerably older than him and who regards herself almost as his mother, was given her allotted 30 minutes in front of the death cell bars, and listened to Bhutto urging her not to plead for his life. She went straight out and did it. "He can order other people around but not me," she said. "I want him alive."

For Bhutto these were bitter blows, but Zia must have been pleased. His plans for the PPP, if general elections go ahead as proposed on November 17, seem to have been well laid. As articulated by senior sources close to him, Zia recognises that the PPP cannot be totally crushed. A ban would probably result in the sprouting of the same Party under a different name, but the electorate would know it was still Bhutto's Party.

In fact, the military believe that the PPP has grown in popularity since the coup in 1977, and that in fair and open elections, it would almost certainly sweep the boards. The question before Zia is how to live with this situation.

His answer has been to purge the PPP — of Bhutto principally, but also of some other senior members who have been disqualified from politics by military tribunals. Observers believe that some disqualifications will be lifted before the elections are held, but Zia clearly hopes that quite a different Party will emerge. He made this clear to Mr Pirzada during private discussions at the Presidential residence, a few hundred yards from the Rawalpindi Gaol, at the beginning of March. There was political life after Bhutto, Zia indicated. Elections needed to be fought and there was still a place for the PPP. Yet as Zia knows, many dangers and difficulties will beset his country, particularly with Bhutto as a martyr.

Bhutto stages a walk-out at the UN over Kashmir

ZIA made a public mention of one of the worst dangers—the first indication that he even acknowledged it — at a military parade in Kabul at the end of March. It was the spectre about which Bhutto had often warned : the possibility of a breakup of Pakistan. "Defence shall be not only against external aggression," Zia told the troops, "but also against internal disruption, as both can endanger the security of the country. God forbid, if internal disruption leads to the breakup of the country, the defence of its borders becomes meaningless. If there is tranquillity and peace within the country, but there is a lapse in vigilance on the frontiers, the future of the country is thrown in jeopardy. Pakistan's armed forces have, therefore, to remain ever-vigilant on both the external and internal fronts."

Many diplomats and political observers believe Pakistan has become a tinderbox, and a spark — perhaps not now, perhaps later in the year — could set off a conflagration. Already there are unsettling signs. In Peshawar recently, customs officers, acting on a tipoff, stopped and searched a bus and found 745 sticks of dynamite hidden in secret cavities. In Bannu, police seized 39 detonators being carried by a passenger bound for Baluchistan.

In Quetta, on the day after the expiry of Bhutto's seven-day clemency period, a bomb shook the Sandeman Library area, and in Gujranwala, a man was injured when a letter bomb went off inside a post box. The Martial Law authorities in Quetta have directed district authorities to "deal with an iron hand" with the activities of troublemakers.

There is also the very real danger that some Baluch and Pakhtoon tribesmen may use the excuse of internal divisions to advance their own separatist cause.

Bhutto, who has long prophesied disaster for Pakistan after his execution, told his lawyer in the death cell : "My heart bleeds — bleeds for Pakistan, for the people, bleeds for what is to come."

If Zia believed that hanging Bhutto would herald a new era of peace and progress in his country, the next few months could give him his answer. To many diplomats and political observers, it seems a gamble with appallingly high stakes. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Bhutto was bad, the Generals are worse

TARIQ ALI, the exiled Pakistani firebrand, talks about the past and the future in an exclusive interview with TARAPADA BASU in London.

Q: What is your first reaction to the hanging of Mr Bhutto?

A: I am horrified, though not surprised. It is a sad day when the generals begin to hang civilian politicians. My sympathies go to the Bhutto family and especially the two women (Mrs Bhutto and Benazir) incarcerated at Sihala 'rest house'. One does not have to agree with their ideas to admire the exemplary courage they have displayed over the last two years. The fact that they are women made it even more difficult.

Q: Why did Zia defy world opinion expressed by politicians and heads of State on the one hand and the Pentagon, the Central Intelligence Agency and the Saudi royal family on the other?

A: I am convinced that if the USA had really wanted to save Bhutto's life they could have done so. After all, they succeeded in saving Mujibur Rehman when he was a Pakistani prisoner, and for the Army Mujib's crime was infinitely more serious, namely 'high treason'. So in my opinion there were no serious objections whatsoever from the USA. Secondly, I think that Zia's reasoning was straightforward and simple: He knew that Bhutto alive would remain a focus for any mass opposition to military rule. Also knowing Bhutto's memory, Zia and his fellow generals were probably motivated by purely subjective reasons as well. Zia is a self-confessed simpleton. Who else would promise British journalists that 'we will hang the blighter'. Well, he has kept his promise. Thirdly, Bhutto was the only Pakistani politician with a mass following that transcended provincialism. As such, it was a foregone conclusion that his People's Party would win any election. Even if Bhutto had been personally disqualified or under house arrest a victorious Pakistan People's Party Government would have depended on him for leadership. That was a risk Zia was not prepared to take. So to cut a long story short, he hanged Bhutto.

Q: Was the murder case against him a total fabrication?

A: Probably not, but everyone admits (including three judges of the Supreme Court) that the prosecution's case was full of holes and there was no solid evidence which revealed Bhutto's complicity in the murder. The murdered man was an old toady of the British Raj. He was the only native employee of the British who agreed to witness the execution of Bhagat Singh! Ordinary people talk about this quite openly in Lahore! In reality the murder charge was a mere pretext to extinguish Bhutto politically and physically. Very few Pakistanis believe otherwise.

Q: You were a staunch opponent of Bhutto when he was in power. In fact he refused to let you enter Pakistan on one occasion. Were you right then and wrong now or vice versa?

A: I was correct then and I am correct now. Bhutto's regime was not the golden age of Pakistani politics as his apologists proclaim. Political opponents were locked up (some were killed), workers were attacked, newspapers were censored, etc. Bhutto's slogan when he won his landslide victory in 1970 had been 'Food, clothing and shelter'. When he was in power he was reminded of this slogan by peasants. His reply: "We never said that everyone would get all three at once." He was a cynical but highly intelligent bourgeois politician. But he was brought down by his own mistakes and those of the sycophantic and servile politicians who formed his court. It appeared that he had got away with the election rigging at first. A popular Lahori joke went something like this: 'A special messenger has arrived from Indira Gandhi in Delhi. He carries the following message: You can have Kashmir if you send us your Chief Election Commissioner'. But the election rigging did not work. There was mass anger and Bhutto had to call the army in to help maintain order. From then it was only a question of time before the Army moved in and toppled him. So I was right in my opposition to Bhutto's policies. However, I will never support the imposition of Martial Law, never support the generals against any elected politician. If the Army was serious about allowing justice to be done then it should have allowed a general election to take place with full rights for Bhutto and the PPP. But they were intent on wiping out Bhutto. In that case the choice was obvious. One had to oppose the army and argue for the release of all political prisoners, free elections and lifting of Press censorship.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Q: And Pakistan after Bhutto?

A: Pakistan under the Generals is the worst it has ever been. They are attempting, in league with the obscurantist Jamaat-i-Islami, to transform the country into a confessional monstrosity. Jinnah, who as you know was a deeply secular man, must be turning over in his grave. The big theological debate which is currently preoccupying the men in power concerns amputation. Should a thief have his hand severed at the wrist or should the State be content with merely chopping off the fingers. This unedifying discussion aptly symbolises the clerico-military dictatorship.

The first reaction to Bhutto's hanging has been one of shock, but this will develop, sooner rather than later, into a movement against the generals and those politicians who collaborated with them. What form such a revolt will actually take remains to be seen. However, of one thing I am certain. I don't believe that the anti-military struggle will be fought under the banner of religion. The present regime has discredited religion to a considerable degree. In my opinion the choice confronting Pakistan is not a new one. Either a regime which breaks with the past and carries out a fundamental social transformation i.e. a social revolution or a slow and steady process of disintegration. Don't forget that Bhutto was a Sindhi. Don't forget that the three judges of the Supreme Court in favour of acquittal were all non-Punjabis. Don't forget the turmoil in Iran and Afghanistan. After all, the balance sheet of the Pakisani ruling class, since the country was established in 1947, is not a very positive one. Three military dictatorships, two wars and the loss of Bangladesh, which contained a majority of the country's population. Now to that they add the judicial murder of Bhutto. It is a country on a downward slope. In 1969, I wrote a book entitled Pakistan : Military rule or people's power? I think that the same question could be posed anew, though in a slightly different way : Total disintegration or social revolution?

Q: Any comparison with other parts of the subcontinent?

A: Many, but let us restrict them for the purpose of this interview. Just look at the changes that have occurred in the politics of the four subcontinental States. In Pakistan and Bangladesh the two populist leaders, Mujib and Bhutto are dead. Both were replaced by generals, both of whom were called Zia. This last fact is a pure coincidence though the astrologers will have a different estimate. In India and Sri Lanka, however, both the women politicians who ran the countries on roughly similar lines were removed through the ballot box. One can only marvel at the ironies of the historical process. And yet in all four States, despite these upheavals, the condition of the masses has worsened. It is the emancipation of the peasants and the workers that is the essential prerequisite to a just and humane society. I think we have a long, long way to go. ■

'He taught us courage'

BHUTTO's two sons in London, Mir Murtaza and Shahnawaz have been in great distress and grief. The 24-year-old Mir Murtaza said, "The British Government should recall its Ambassador from Pakistan. I cannot even return to Pakistan. One of General Zia's henchmen has said it would give him great pleasure to tear me limb from limb if ever he gets his hands on me. I am very very proud of my father. He taught us courage and, despite torture and the most horrible humiliation, he refused, right up to the scaffold, to crawl to Zia. I dread to think what may happen to Mama and Benazir, my elder sister, who are still in custody in Pakistan. They regard suffering as the price to be paid in the struggle against dictatorship. Although like us Benazir will be grief-stricken, she will keep her head just as we will. We refuse to give in to our anguish. It's a luxury we cannot afford".

As Mr Mir Bhutto spoke, a constant stream of friends and relatives, some weeping, arrived at his house to offer their condolences. His brother, 19-year-old student Shahnawaz Bhutto, said that General Zia had ordered the execution out of "fear and desperation". "The man is a murderer. He fears my father's popularity and he is desperate. Everyone, apart from the generals who have accused my father, knows he is innocent. This charge was brought by madmen. They will suffer. We are a revengeful people."

The hanging of Mr Bhutto was "a warning to all politicians to behave within legal limits", a Pakistani Cabinet Minister said in London. "Nobody likes a hanging," said the Minister of Economic Planning, Professor Khurshid Ahmad. "But Mr Bhutto brought discredit on the whole political arena by his reign of terror. If General Zia spared the life of a person who had occupied a very high political position, it would be licence to politicians in the future," he said. "It is not a day for rejoicing. I feel ashamed that my country produced a talented person who ruled Pakistan like a feudal estate," added Professor Ahmad who is in Britain for an Islamic conference. His remarks were made as police reinforcements were sent to the Pakistan Embassy where a backlash demonstration was expected by London's volatile Pakistani student community who have shown support for Mr Bhutto. The absence of demonstrators initially could be explained by the Islamic tradition of praying for several hours after a leader's death. Professor Ahmad said Mr. Bhutto was visited by nearly all his close friends and relatives in the last week. "No one beat him at any stage," he added, and said reports that he was kept in disgusting conditions were exaggerated. Professor Ahmad's views were published in a London evening newspaper.

T.B.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The impact

RAJENDRA SAREEN says that the world has not heard the last of Mr Bhutto.

Gen Zia says he has upheld the majesty of law by turning a deaf ear to the pleas for clemency for Mr Z. A. Bhutto. But the law, as the saying goes, is an ass. It is a pity Gen Zia-ul-Haq finally persuaded himself to "let the law take its course." The act is asinine, to say the least. The responsibility is going to be fairly and squarely placed on Gen Zia-ul-Haq. Mr Bhutto has crossed the threshold of life into the world beyond; henceforth he will loom larger than life on the political horizon of Pakistan. The many excesses committed by him against a large number of political opponents will no longer be relevant. The reasons are : first, none of the excesses during his tenure measured up to what has been done to him; second, politics being what it is, even those who would have no truck with him when he was alive, shall have no difficulty in paying homage to his memory in a bid to make common cause with those who had turned pro-Bhutto because of the political uncertainties and anxiety over the intentions of the ruling military junta.

It is unlikely that the world has heard the last of the Bhutto case. The many heads of State who pleaded that Mr Bhutto's life be spared are unlikely to treat the issue as a matter to be thrashed out between the junior functionaries of their respective foreign offices and Pakistani diplomats at comparable levels. The stopping of US economic aid, ostensibly for the reason that Pakistan is pursuing its nuclear programme to attain weapon technology, has in all probability as much to do with the disdain with which President Zia rejected President Carter's personal appeal for clemency. The hanging of Mr Bhutto has certainly not advanced the US commitment to human rights.

The President of the UAE, Sheikh Zaid bin Sultan al Nahyan, a close friend of Mr Bhutto, had been camping for weeks in Pakistan in a bid to persuade President Zia to spare his life. The financial aid from UAE is unlikely to be forthcoming as readily as before. The rebuff implicit in the execution of Mr Bhutto towards King Khaled of Saudi Arabia is a matter of serious significance insofar as after the USA and members of the Aid-Pakistan Consortium, Saudi Arabia has been the biggest source of financial assistance to Pakistan. As a matter of fact Saudi Arabia is the only country that stands between Pakistan and bankruptcy.

The instability and turmoil, which are in the process of developing in Pakistan, are in all likelihood going to last quite some time. The net result of all this will be that Pakistan will cause destabilisation of a very sensitive area where three super powers are fairly active and in considerable conflict with each other. This will further add to the difficult times ahead.

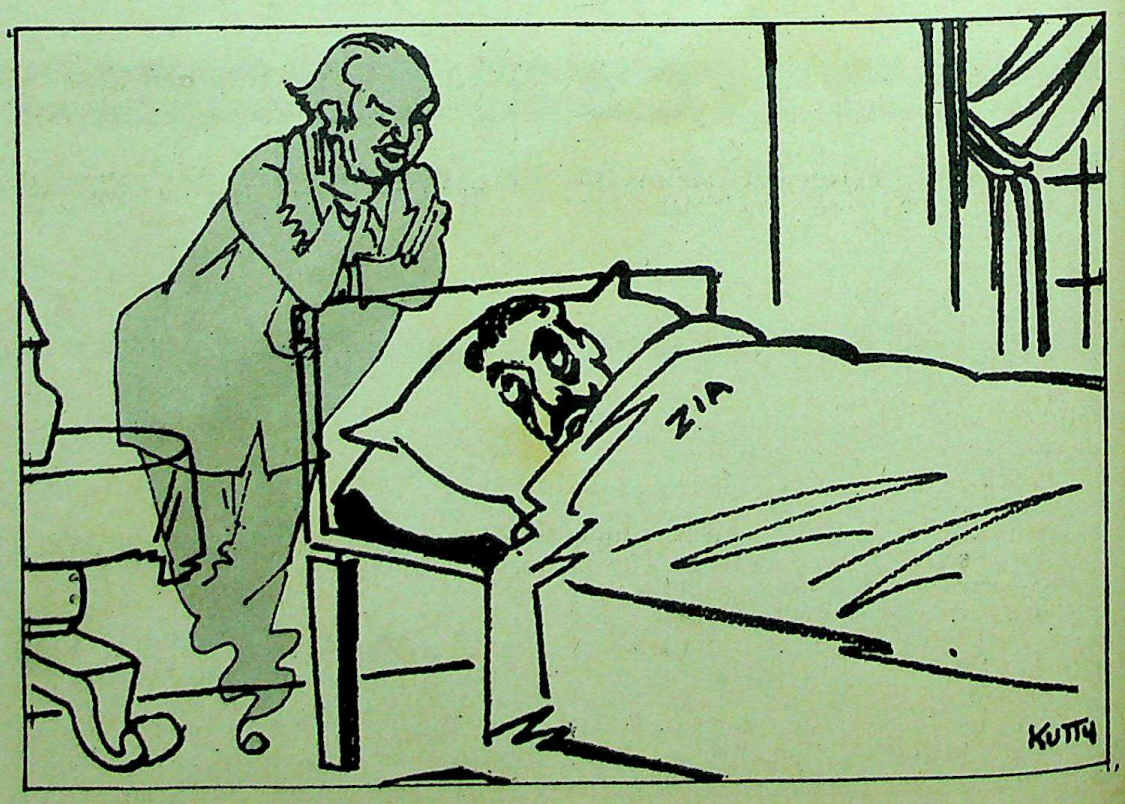
Considering that the major political support for Gen Zia at home emanates from the Jamaat-e-Islami which as an ideology and organisation, is also in existence both in India and Bangladesh, the fact that the violent outburst in Srinagar and other parts of Kashmir has turned against the Jamaat is of significance. The Jamaat has been carrying on a crusade for its peculiar brand of Islamic fundamentalism all over the subcontinent. The Saudis have generously, if not very wisely, underwritten tremendous financial support for this organisation to help it carry forward its mission of propagating fanatical obscurantism. The people of Kashmir have more than ordinary interest in the affairs of Pakistan because there is hardly a family which does not have some member or the other living in that country. The Kashmiri reaction is the closest to what might be the normal reaction in Pakistan itself and how it would seek to express itself but for the draconian measures adopted by the Martial Law regime.

The Muslim community in India and Bangladesh is aghast over what has happened and Pakistan will no longer loom large over their consciousness as an embodiment of Islamic resurgence. Arising out of that, the ruling military junta of Pakistan is bound to suffer in the estimation of the people of the countries of South Asia with the result that under its aegis Pakistan's diplomatic prestige and capacity to win friends and influence people is bound to suffer serious damage. No Government in South Asia will find itself eager to go out of its way for closer relations or undertake fresh initiatives for strengthening of existing arrangements.

It is not without significance that the rigid stand taken by Mr Morarji Desai in treating Bhutto's execution and all that preceded it as purely an internal matter of Pakistan has not won any kudos. On the contrary, the criticism of this position has been ostensibly harsh and adverse. It was totally unnecessary for the Prime Minister to describe the sentiments expressed by the President as his personal views.

In Afghanistan, the leftist Government is bound to make good use of this development to denounce the mullahs and other Islamic activists carrying on insurgency against the Government. The ruthlessness with which the military junta has acted is going to come handy as an adequate justification for the strong measures being taken by the Tarakki regime.

Bangladesh has been cautiously making it clear that any talks of reunification with Pakistan or even some loose ties like a confederation is the surest way of queering the pitch for normal relations between the two countries. President Zia of Bangladesh has been at pains to exphasise the distinct national personality of Bangladesh which draws sustenance from Islam. Bangladeshi nationalism, however, does not even admit the fact of common nationhood during the period of 1947 to 1971. The Bhutto hanging will provide a strong argument for those in Bangladesh who are deeply interested in discounting any talk of common ties with Pakistan. ■



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

How Muslim nations treat their leaders

BASHIRUDDIN AHMED, a Senior Fellow at the Centre for the Study of Developing Societies, Delhi, talks to OM PRAKASH.

IN the cases of Pakistan, Bangladesh and Afghanistan, a leader was put to death. In Pakistan, Mr Bhutto lost his life through apparently fair and just legal procedures. In Afghanistan, Sardar Daoud was assassinated. So was Sheikh Mujibur Rahman in Bangladesh.

These political deaths, in quick succession, lead to the impression that assassination is the way of settling political matters in these Muslim countries of this subcontinent. But let us take note of three other aspects of their politics : first in countries like Pakistan and Afghanistan, changeovers have taken place from one leader to another without assassination. In Afghanistan Sardar Daoud took over from the Afghan King when the latter was visiting Europe. He did not kill him. In Pakistan, Mr Liaqat Ali Khan was killed not by a group which wanted to take power from him but a deranged individual acting on his own. After him, all changes of leadership in Pakistan occurred without involving killing. Major General Iskandar Mirza was pushed out of office by Gen. Ayub Khan, but not killed. Ayub was replaced in office by Yayha Khan, and this happened virtually at the request of the former. And then there was Yayha Khan who, having lost East Pakistan, also lost his legitimacy to rule Pakistan and turned to Mr Bhutto. In the case of Bangladesh, of course, we are talking of a young nation in which the unfortunate assassination of Sheikh Mujib cannot serve as a basis for any generalisations.

The other thing to notice about these countries is that each one of them is controlled by the Army. Even in Bangladesh, where Gen. Ziaur Rahman is making a bold effort to take his country into a new stage of civilian rule, the Army still remains a major factor. In each of these three countries political leaders were put to death essentially by the Army. Sardar Daoud was killed by elements of the Army which staged a coup against his Government. Sheikh Mujib was assassinated exactly in the same circumstances by a group of soldiers. In Mr Bhutto's case, his death came through the law courts but only because the generals in control of Pakistan did not want to lose their control over the Government. They knew that if Bhutto lives they cannot hold on to power. So even his death is political murder committed by the Army.

The important question really about these countries is the question of why they have not been able to evolve civilian institutions. As we noticed earlier, Bangladesh is now moving in that direction, but the answer to this question is difficult. Obviously, there are any number of factors involved, ranging all the way from levels of economic development and social diversity, to traditions of struggle and movement. But let us note that military rule is not confined only to Islamic countries; military rule is in fact the norm rather than the exception whether one considers Africa, Latin America or even Asia. A majority of regimes, particularly in Africa and Latin America, are either directly military in character or backed by it.

The absence of democratic institutions is primarily a reflection of the inability of developing societies in general to handle the regional, linguistic, and ethnic diversities with which they start as independent nations. These diversities need to be attended in the very early stages of the country's independence, and this can only be done, if a new country has a leadership with vision and understanding of the requirements of nation-building along with legitimacy and popular support. Such leaders generally are those who have led the national movement. In the case of Pakistan, Mr Jinnah died soon after its independence and Mr Liaqat Ali Khan only a few years after that. These two leaders probably could have handled the problem of forging a nation out of the peoples of different provinces making up Pakistan. With their departure, the process of nation-building received a setback.

Nation-building requires adjustment and accommodation, that is, a great degree of give and take which can only be engaged in within the framework of an open and democratic society, and by leaders who have some measure of popular support. Military regimes are inherently incapable of doing this. Their emphasis on orderly conduct of national affairs reflects an inability to understand and appreciate the requirements of bargaining and adjustment involved in creating a national community. It is often their impatience with what Mr Bhutto calls, in his last testament, the chaos and confusion of the democratic political process, which results in military takeovers. The initial discipline and order that results from establishment of military regimes invariably leads to a recrudescence of social tensions — because nations can no longer be forged in today's world, with its flow of communication and widely shared democratic values, through force. No wonder then that Bangladesh emerged when the military was in power in Pakistan.

Once the leadership fails in the initial stages to create a national community, the country remains divided. Every economic or social crisis virtually takes the form of an acute polarisation and division of public opinion and social forces. This is what has been happening in Pakistan, Bangladesh and Afghanistan. And when the divisions in the country are so marked, peaceful resolution of differences becomes difficult. Assassinations of political leaders have always occurred in such

God's will

AS soon as the news of Mr Bhutto's execution reached New Delhi, the External Affairs Minister, Mr Atal Behari Vajpayee told his aides in the South Block to prepare a statement which he wanted to read out in Parliament. He went to the Lok Sabha armed with the statement and sat next to the Prime Minister, Mr Morarji Desai, in order to get his green signal. But before the External Affairs Minister could speak to the PM, the Opposition members were on their feet, demanding that the House make an obituary reference. At this juncture Mr Vajpayee sought Mr Desai's permission to read out the statement, which had been mildly worded, but the PM said no.

Mr Vajpayee was seen trying to convince Mr Desai, but the latter was adamant. Infuriated, Mr Vajpayee left the House in a huff. The Union Petroleum and Chemicals Minister, Mr Hemvati Nandan Bahuguna, met Mr Vajpayee when he was on his way out, and unwittingly enquired whether he was going to make a statement on the execution. This annoyed Mr Vajpayee further and he gave vent to his anger. Both the Cabinet Ministers felt strongly on the subject and were of the opinion that a mild statement on the occasion would not have done any harm. But who could reason out with Mr Desai, who claims to have a direct hotline with the Creator?

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

contexts, irrespective of the religious complexes of the country. Even in United States you see instances of this happening. At one of the gravest moments of political crisis, Abraham Lincoln was assassinated. The second period of crisis which occurred in the USA was in the 20's and the 30's, and this period witnessed the attempt on President F. D. Roosevelt's life in Chicago.

There are other instances too that one can cite from the recent history of other non-Islamic, countries. There probably are cultural reasons for explaining the use of violence in public life. Each culture, of course, has its own concept of politics and its traditions of managing public affairs. However, these are plural enough in each culture to permit varieties of political behaviour. This is also true of the Islamic traditions, though the dominant fact of Islamic culture seems to be a close link between politics and day to day life. This may well change in the future. But as long as this link remains, there will be, given the social and economic conditions of the Islamic countries of the sub-continent and perhaps other Islamic countries, a tendency to settle political differences through violence. ■

PR man

RUSSY Karanjia, who interviewed Mr Bhutto at the height of his glory following the cessation of East Pakistan, remembers Bhutto as "the most extraordinary, vital political person I had ever met. Just as he filled the room with his personality, so I was told he filled every nook and corner of Pakistan with his charismatic and egregious personality.

"His death will create a vacuum both in the Opposition and the Establishment which will be hard to fill. It is really difficult to believe that such a vital being filled with all that is good and all that is wicked should be snuffed out like a candle flame. It's also a pity that he should have suffered so many minor inhumanities and brutalities that left him almost derelict. But that the spirit and courage he showed did not yield till the last is a moral to the rest of us on how to meet the challenges of life and overcome them.

"Bhutto was a tremendous public relations man. No one could beat him at the game. I had abused him as a 'bastard' and he was obviously hurt about it and recalled it during the interview I had with him. But he handled it and dismissed it so gracefully that I couldn't but feel for him. All his life he had a tremendous sense of history and in all his actions and oratory he seemed to be writing chapters of this history. During the five hours I spent with him over two sessions, I could feel he was using me to further his historical image as he wanted it. The oddest thing happened on the day I was leaving Rawalpindi. He phoned me and told me to tell Indira Gandhi not to bother about his speeches. They were meant for domestic consumption. He explained what a difficult task he had undertaken to rebuild a broken and defeated Pakistan. All his talk of a 1000-year Jehad was so much bullshit. He He never meant it. It was for internal consumption. He was fundamentally for peace and some kind of loose alliance between India, Pakistan and China.

"Mr Bhutto was a man of tremendous contradictions. Take Kashmir for instance. In one breath he told me that he admired Indira Gandhi for exploiting the Bangladesh situation to break Pakistan. He would have done the same thing had he been in her place. In fact when India had a confrontation with China he had advised Ayub Khan to march into Kashmir and take it over. He described Ayub as a poltroon for not doing so. At the same time he asked me to convey to Indira Gandhi that she should settle with Abdullah as he was threatening to come to Pakistan and that would involve him (Bhutto) in a situation he did not want. "Kashmir is your baby so please settle it and relieve me of a confrontation between Srinagar and Delhi' he pleaded.

"Bhutto was basically for peace and goodwill, the rest was demagogy for internal consumption." believes Mr Karanjia. As he says, it's the tragedy, of leaders like Indira and Bhutto, that they become victims of their own demagogy.

"Bhutto was brilliant and perhaps this made him cynical about values if he had any. He was for instance the author of the Pakistan-China alliance. If one gave him an opening, whether in a conversation or in diplomacy, he would exploit it to the fullest. He got this chance after we broke off relations with China and he succeeded in tilting the balance of power against us in the subcontinent.

"Perhaps it is a little known fact that he had the highest admiration for Krishna Menon and to an extent Nehru, although he considered Nehru a weakling. He insisted on all his foreign diplomats possessing the complete writings and speeches of Krishna Menon and Nehru and he even examined them like a teacher on what they had read. It was a tribute paid by brilliance to genius. His high intellectual standards made him amoral. He perhaps had no values except to get the best of every development for himself and his country. I don't think he thought in terms of one without the other.

"I didn't know the Bhutto of the Bombay days. I thought he was a bit of a social snob but one thing I do remember was that he was always surrounded by the most beautiful women whether in Bombay or Geneva where I once met him."

OLGA TELLIS

Dapper and humorous

NARGIS reacted rather angrily to the news of the hanging of Mr Bhutto. "It is one of the worst kinds of political murder one has heard of in recent times. It is something which could not have taken place in the civilised world, particularly when the whole world spoke against it. It was a great shock when we heard the news on the radio."

Nargis knew Bhutto during his school years in Bombay. "I was not very close to him, but I was a close friend of the family. His cousins, Sikander and Imdar, were close friends of ours and through them we knew Zulfi. Later when I joined films. I was thrown together with them, because his elder cousin was married to a film actress. Of course they belonged to my mother's generation. They came to our house and we went out to movies and picnics together. Zulfi was enamoured by the film world and he and his cousins always accompanied me to my shooting sessions. I did not know Zulfi the politician. I knew him as a student. He was like any other normal student, full of beans, fun and laughter. He always struck me by his elegant dress and he had this air of aristocracy about him. But he never showed off his wealth. He was never ill-behaved. He was humorous and never stayed aloof."

"Perhaps his hatred for India," said Nargis, "stemmed from the fact that he was uprooted from the place where he spent his formative years. When the whole family left for Pakistan he too went away. I know he said Indians are dirty dogs and somehow I cannot associate this phrase with the Zulfi I knew. He was probably embittered by the fact that he lost his citizenship and his property here. After all he grew up in India."

"In fact when we first heard of him as a politician it made no impact on me. The Bhutto family is a very big family. It was the late K. Asif who reminded me that he was the boy who accompanied me to the shooting of Mughul-e-Azam. 'He's become a politician now,' Asif said. It was only then that I realised it was the same person. Later on I followed his career and being a nationalist I was shocked at his attitude towards India."

Nargis shuddered as she said : "It leaves one thinking about what he must have gone through. Not even allowed to embrace and kiss his Nusrat and Benazir. I admire him because he never asked for clemency."

OLGA TELLIS

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Headless media

AIR and Doordarshan chiefs' retirement leaves a real void

ALL India Radio and Doordarshan are (at the time of writing) without their top executives. This situation has come to pass because the respective directors-general of the two organisations, Mr P. C. Chatterji and Mr P. V. Krishnamoorthy, retired on March 31. And coincidentally the seniormost officers on the second rung — the deputy directors-general (DDG) — Mr S. C. Parasher and Mr Iqbal Malik, respectively, also attained superannuation on the same day. A fifth DDG, Mr M. S. Gopal (of AIR) also retired on March 31. Thus five of the seniormost officers in AIR and TV retired together leaving the departments literally headless.

Normally, when there is a vacancy at the top in any Government department, a Departmental Promotion Committee (DPC) consisting of a representative each from the concerned Ministry and the UPSC meets and makes the selection. The DPC's choice is then referred, via the Ministry, to a Cabinet sub-committee (known as the Appointments Committee) comprising the Prime Minister, the Home Minister, and the concerned Minister (in this case the Information and Broadcasting Minister). In normal circumstances the Appointments Committee okays the DPC recommendation and the appointment is made. In the present case although the Ministry was aware for at least a year, if not more, that the posts of DGs in Akashvani and the fledgling Doordarshan (having independent existence since April 1, 1976) would fall vacant on April 1 this year, it did nothing to name the new incumbents. No DPC was convened and all kinds of rumours — the sort which is the staple of Delhi's bureaucracy — were afloat till almost the last day.

On March 30, it was announced that Mr S. K. Sehgal, Secretary, Information and Broadcasting, will for the present hold additional charge of the two organisations. This is the first time in the history of AIR that the Secretary of the Ministry has been asked to officiate as the DG as well. The announcement has come amid speculation as to whether the Government would appoint a 'generalist' — an IAS officer — or a 'specialist' — a professional programme staff man from the department. This speculation as well as the controversy whether a 'generalist' or a 'specialist' would fit the bill better takes place on every occasion when a new DG is to be appointed. A third dimension is usually added by the Minister who wonders if he should bring in a total outsider to head the organisation. This time was no exception. Among the names mentioned were those of Mr P. L. Deshpande, the Marathi novelist, Mr Chanchal Sarkar, the Director of the Press Institute of India, (both of whom had been members of the Verghese Committee on autonomy for AIR and Doordarshan), Mr Hafeez Noorani and Mr E. Alkazi, the former Director of the National School of Drama. Mr Sarkar had once before unsuccessfully tried to bag the prestigious appointment — in 1971 when the DG's post was advertised by the UPSC and none of those who had applied was selected. It was after this fiasco that in 1972 an IAS officer, Mr S. K. Mukherjee, was brought in as DG. It is to his credit that before he left Mr Mukherjee recommended that the post should go to a professional.

It is in fact rumoured that the Minister, Mr L. K. Advani, had made up his mind to induct an outsider just as the Prime Minister had brought in his biographer, Mr G. S. Bhargava, a journalist, as the Principal Information Officer. But in the face of the recent parliamentary storm over the AIR blacklist of 17 names who were not to be given programmes for their alleged co-operation with the Emergency regime, Mr Advani did not immediately make an announcement of his choice, but will do so once the storm clears, according to informed sources. This theory fits in well with the fact that the Government made an ad hoc arrangement at the eleventh hour.

A communal colour to the situation has also been added. Blitz in its column called "Tommorrow's News Today" (March 31 1979) has asserted, though not exactly in so many words, that seniority was being given the go by in appointing the new DG, AIR because the seniormost DDG, Mr U. L. Baruah, is a Muslim. It was the first time in more than 30 years that the Government had the chance to appoint a Muslim as DG, AIR and Mr Baruah has an excellent record and a good two years to go before he retires, but Mr Advani gave the specious argument that the Ministry does not want to promote any DDG before the implementation of the Verghese Committee's recommendation to have a common head for AIR and TV — under Ak[illegible]

L. K. Advani: indecisive?

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

— who would be appointed by an autonomous Board of Governors.

This argument does not hold water because the Verghese Committee also recommended a common Chief Engineer for both AIR and TV. And this did not prevent the Ministry from promoting the seniormost engineer when the Chief Engineer, AIR retired recently. Why this discrimination in favour of the engineering staff, ask AIR's programme officers. In fact, the Programme Staff Association (PSA) feels that the Minister is most unfavourably biased against the regular programme staff As it is, there is a tremendous imbalence between the programme staff and the engineering staff in AIR. As against 590 sanctioned Class I engineering posts there are only 197 Class I programme posts. One wonders if in the Government's eyes the medium counts more than the message. In a letter to Mr Advani on August 18, 1978 the PSA said: "...It hurts us to say that while you had the time for formal and informal meetings with recognised, unrecognised splinter groups of various categories, you could not spare even a few minutes in full one year for our association... during our service we have had chances to work under eight different Ministers but the treatment given to us during the last 17 months is totally unprecedented."

BUT what of the man whose departure has given rise to this controversy? Mr P. C. Chatterji, who took over in June, 1974 is generally regarded as one of the finest DGs that AIR has had so far. It was under his leadership that AIR won many laurels in international competitions for radio programmes and to crown it all he became the President of the Asian Broadcasting Union in 1977. (This prestigious position came India's way after many years and is now lost.) Mr Chatterji in the course of his career has fought and won many skirmishes with Governments both at the Centre and in the States including a major battle with the Communist-dominated United Front Government in West Bengal in the late Sixties when as the Station Director in Calcutta he had turned away a Minister determined to broadcast a vitriolic script. This famous incident was the raison d'etre of the now famed 'code' for broadcasters. Mr Chatterji is also well-known in the academic and intellectual circles of Delhi and Calcutta for his many scholarly writings and speeches on aesthetics and philosophy. It is also to Mr Chatterji's credit that despite all their efforts the new regime after the Emergency could hold nothing against him and he stayed on. Almost incredible if you consider how many heads rolled after March, 1977.

When the Government had a precedent of granting extensions, Mr Chatterji should have been offered one. But he did not even seek one. When asked why, he replied: "I am sick and tired and fed up. You know when I was a Station Director (and away from Delhi) I had some independence but in Delhi I stopped taking decisions concerning anything beyond my immediate family." He was obviously alluding to the all-powerful Ministry which breathes down the neck of every officer stalling any imaginative and innovative move. Mr Chatterji is happy that he is able to go back to the world of philosophy but is it true, as some say, that Mr Advani is equally happy that he was able to get rid of a person with an independent reputation with whom he never quite got along.

VIVEK SENGUPTA, Delhi

Diabetes–the main culprit

JP showed remarkable endurance

MR Jayaprakash Narayan's fight to live with the aid of a powerful armoury of antibiotics and medical technology from March 19 onwards is perhaps his last great battle against bad health that dogged his footsteps viciously ever since he was jailed during the Emergency in Delhi and Haryana. JP and his closest friends like his secretary, Mr Thomas Abraham, and his PA, Jagdishbabu, perhaps alone know what a living hell life was for JP. At Bombay's Jaslok Hospital on the night of March 20, the unassuming Sarvodaya worker Mohanji said JP murmured: Ough, bahut takleef hai—aur saha nahin jataa (Oh, it's so painful, it's unbearable). Many a time he told Abraham: "life is useless, what's the use of such a life, tied to a machine?" The nights were long, lonely and sleepless. He suffered from insomnia . His attendant, the young Gulab, had to massage him through to relieve him from the frustrating restlessness that results from sleeplessness. He did yoga for some time to overcome insmonia but he couldn't do it consistently. He would say "Now I should go. My life is over."

Dr Jeffery Marston, the specialist in ischemic colitis who flew in from London to examine JP, put it in a nutshell when he said JP suffered from all the major illnesses—diabetes, coronary heart disease, renal failure, ischemic colitis and a damaged liver.

Bhola Chatterjee

JP : frail but indomitable

What's is JP's medical history? It is impossible at this stage to get anything official because the relationship between a doctor and patient is sacred and doctors attending on JP value this sacred relationship with JP. "Go and ask JP, if I can talk" says Dr K. R. Mani, the chief nephrologist, knowing very well that trying to get to JP in the intensive care unit is like going to the moon.

As one tried to probe one got answers like don't you know Lord Moran who was treating Winston Churchill was prosecuted for writing a book on him. It's better not to talk about it, says another doctor. "You know Dr Lohia died 15 years ago but today they are digging up his case papers to find out what went wrong". Or better still, "don't you know that the medical secrets of great men are one of the best kept secrets?" It is said that had the late Dr Jal Patel who was treating Mr Mohamed Ali Jinnah disclosed that Jinnah had not very long to live as he was being consumed by TB, partition may never have taken place.

However, JP has cheated death on at least two occasions. Since Holi JP had diarrhoea. Many in Bihar suffer from diarrhoea thanks to the water and insanitary conditions there. JP had been taking entrevioform, a course prescribed for 30 days. In fact he had a permanent complaint of diarrhoea and constipation. Before this he was keeping reasonably well. They had cut down his dialysis by half an hour and he had put on 4.5 kg.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Principles; not personalities

From Gandhiji to Indira Gandhi and Morarji Desai, no leader has ever received our unqualified support.

Whenever their movements were infiltrated by vested interests, we reported it; right down to exposing the excesses of the caucus during those dark days.

Remember?

Right. Then what is the guiding light by which Blitz charts its apparently shifting editorial stance?

The people, obviously.

On February 1, 1941 we said we would be 'the pulse of the people'; and that principle hasn't changed in thirtyeight years.

That's why the rich and the powerful also read us. They need to keep their fingers on the pulse of the people, and they want the big news first.

Which, somehow, always seems to break in Blitz. Frankly and fearlessly. We are not only the pulse of the people, but their eyes and ears too.

And they love us for it.
Hundreds of thousands of them.

BLITZ
INDIA'S GREATEST WEEKLY

LGC2204

Principles; not personalities

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

His breakfast usually consisted of fermented mung, toast, boiled eggs and fruit. For lunch he had fish curds and sweets. He had fads in food that lasted a while. Like for sometime it was chicken. Recently he relished fish. At night he never ate anything, and he had given up tea and coffee.

On Friday the 16th he had his breakfast and lunch as usual. He was put on dialysis which started around 12.25 in the afternoon. At 8 pm. he suddenly vomited profusely and had a motion with blood. It was diagnosed as diarrhoea and he was given chlorostrep.

On Saturday he passed large quantities of blood. He didn't want to leave Patna. Mr Abraham phoned Dr Mani in Bombay around midnight. Dr Mani asked them to bring him to Bombay but they said he was in no condition to be moved. They asked him to come to Patna. Dr Mani reached Patna at 9 am on Sunday. Had he reached 20 minutes later, JP would have literally bled to death. They did not give him blood transfusion as his haemoglobin was very low and Dr Mani decided immediately to put him on dialysis and give blood transfusion. JP was in spasms of agonising pain and fainted on two occasions.

JP cheated death again in Bombay on 20th night. Dr Ashwin Mehta, the eminent cardiologist attending on JP, said it happened just after the dialysis was over. Dr Mehta had gone to the 16th floor to invite the two doctors attending on JP from Patna for dinner. They were getting ready so he went up to the 19th floor intensive care unit to see a new admission when JP's faithful attendant Gulab rushed in crying and screaming that JP was dead. "Actually he had a cardiac arrest" Dr Mehta said. "I gave him a manual massage and his heart sprang to life. This condition is usually to be treated within two to three minutes on the onset of a cardiac arrest. So the chances of survival are few, because a doctor is never always on hand. The circumstances were extremely fortuitous. There are two ways of treating cardiac arrest condition either a cardiac massage or a machine to give an electric counter shock of 200 watts which makes the heart spring to life."

"JP's heart is not the world's greatest heart," says Dr Mehta, "but it is reasonably stable for some one who has been on dialysis since 1975. He is probably the oldest in the world to have dialysis at that age and is pulling on unexpectedly long with so many complications."

JP suffered the first heart attack in Bombay in 1972 when he was addressing a Press conference at the Ritz Hotel. Dr Mehta was summoned immediately and has been treating JP's heart disease since then.

JP's diabetes is the organial killer and all his ills are a logical consequence of this complaint. Very simply put, diabetes leads to or aggravates the process of atheroscelrosis which is the hardening and narrowing of the arteries. The blood supply to various organs is jeopardised. It leads to narrowing of blood vessels going to the limbs. Therefore cerebral circulation and incidence of stroke, coronary and kidney disease are higher in diabetic patients.

The latest attack JP suffered was ischemic colitis. It is a condition where the blood vessels in the large gut or large intestine are narrowed and the area does not get blood. This part consequently gets damaged, eroded, and bleeding starts from the raw surface. It is also part of the diabetic syndrome.

OLGA TELLIS, Bombay

DELHI DIARY

FLYING SECRETARY

THE Labour Secretary, Mr Raghupat, attached to Mr Ravindra Verma, is fond of flying out of India. During the Port Trust strike in Bombay he was on a foreign assignment. Nowadays he is preparing for his 4th Geneva visit during the last six or seven months. Although the budget session of Parliament is in progress it seems he has no interest in the Labour Ministry. According to sources close to him, he is about to retire at the end of this year. These sources also claim that the main purpose behind these numerous foreign visits is to get a good UN assignment, possibly with the Geneva-based ILO. It is also claimed that his staff car is permanently with his son who is an IFS probationer.

DISCIPLINED FARCE

THE ruling Party had not till recently gone to the extent of expressing dissidence against its own Government in such a flagrant manner as did the Raj Mangal Pandey-led dissidents in UP Assembly the other day. Voting against the Government on a money bill and then sticking to the Party is unheard of but that is what many dissident MLAs did in UP Assembly last month. Even some Jana Sangh leaders at the Centre did not approve of the act but the Janata Party President, Mr Chandrashekhar, who is supposedly keeping the Party together, gave the 20-odd MLAs the go-ahead and duly 18 Chandrashekhar-backed MLAs voted against the Banarsi Das Government. When a prominent Jana Sangh functionary told Mr Chandrashekhar of the implications of the move, the Party President was furious : "Tumhe ladna bhi nahin aatta. Rajnarain jaise aadmi se kya sharafaat say ldo gay" (You don't even know how to fight. Would you fight Raj Narain with grace and dignity). The Jana Sangh leader too had to fall in line. After all, the Party President was the one to save them from any disciplinary action.

SMUGGLED OUT

ON February 16 the Bombay Customs nabbed a top executive of a leading transport company as he was going through the green channel at Santa Cruz Airport. The businessman yielded a goldmine of incriminating evidence : foreign exchange salted away in a number of banks all over the continent, investments in various foreign blue chips and, above all, a detailed balance sheet of the proposed steel mill the transporter intended to set up in the USA. Custom officials interrogated him for ten hours. Legally they could have arrested him and that is what they were going to do when a phone call from Delhi from somebody high up in the Finance Ministry to the Customs Collector of Bombay swung open the door to freedom and respectability for the detainee. The businessman was close to the former Haryana Chief Minister, Mr Bansi Lal, till Mrs Gandhi was thrown out. During Janata rule he found his way into the camp of Bansi Lal's successors. No wonder it worked. The last has not yet been heard on the case because the Customs, during those ten hours, duly recorded some of the incriminating evidence in their inventories.

D. E. NIZAMUDDIN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Paying the price

JUSTICE demands that if All India Radio is bent on punishing an announcer and a transmission executive for allowing coverage of the mistaken report about Jayaprakash Narayan, the Prime Minister too should pay a price for formally passing on the information to the Speaker who then made the official Lok Sabha announcement.

But what is sauce for the goose is not sauce for the gander. In India more than anywhere else, there is one law for the powerful and another for the humble. While, at the time of writing, the erring announcer and transmission executive are both waiting in limbo (having been suspended) for charge sheets, Mr Morarji Desai, having—so we are told—deeply examined the matter within himself, solemnly assures us that his resignation would be "a greater and more grievous blunder".

Two thoughts are implicit in that statement. First, the Prime Minister recognises no judge higher than his own presumably infallible and impeccable conscience. Secondly, the conviction of his indispensability comes through loud and clear. Not that there is anything new in this double standard. Everyone knows that while civil servants are nowadays forced to retire at a hoary 58, being thought to be too decrepit for efficiency, Mr Desai is no more than a sprightly youngster at 83 and easily able to manage the complex challenges of governance. His Home Minister, who rigidly enforces Mr Desai's implacable decision to refuse bureaucrats extensions, is a mere 75, having himself retired from the ICS nearly two decades ago.

Observation of Mr L.K. Advani's actions over the last two years suggests an unshakable belief in a Congress (I) conspiracy to subvert AIR and Doordarshan. We have known of tapes being tampered with by station directors so that listeners are spared the insult of having to hear Mrs Gandhi's name. Her ubiquitous followers have been blamed for arson in studios. Other minor employees have been penalised, allegedly for giving publicity to her policies. We are left to conclude that while the Prime Minister made a genuine error in announcing Mr Narayan's death, the two radio employees gleefully broadcast news that they knew to be false because of their political commitment.

Anyone who knows how highly a job is prized in our society, and the inevitability of swift reprisal from Akashvani's political masters, will instantly dismiss the notion as fantastic. They will see the threatened action for what it is: inoffensive heads are rolling because the Government needs scapegoats.

NO less objectionable are Mr Advani's views on broadcasters and programme content. He sought not long ago to prove impartiality on radio and T.V. by claiming that the Janata gets only 45 per cent of the total time given to political Parties in the main news bulletins. Since the remaining 55 per cent is shared by four national Parties, to say nothing of regional organisations like the DMK and AIADMK, Janata's quota is hardly negligible. But as former working journalist on the Organiser, the Minister must surely also know that wordage often matters less than the slant, timing and context.

An admirable instance of the subtlety of official propaganda was provided by television's Republic Day coverage of the Gonda project initiated (for those who seek further confirmation of Mr Advani's ideological perspectives) by the Deendayal Institute. After the obligatory opening tribute to Mr Sanjeeva Reddy, who inaugurated the scheme, the 15-minute film plunged into an audio-visual eulogy of the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh. By connecting the President of India with the RSS, the feature bestowed respectability on the latter; it projected the Sangh as a constructive force; and its flattering shots of Mr Balasaheb Deoras sought to elevate him to the status of a national leader.

In the record, however, Doordarshan probably allots these 15 minutes of clever and persuasive RSS propaganda under the heading of "development" or even publicity for the President.

Little wonder then that Mr Madhu Limaye complains of radio and television being subverted to promote the RSS. His charge is substantiated by the publicity given to another Deendayal Institute enterprise, a book called Gandhi, Lohia, and Deendayal that was released by Mr Chandrashekhar; and by the regular appearances on official media of journalists on the Organiser and Panchjanya. He might have added that there is food for misgiving in the inspired attempt to rewrite history from a narrowly chauvinistic point of view, in Government patronage for the Hindi news agency Hindustan Samachar which now boasts the Rajmata of Gwalior as Chairman, in the recent dismissal of journalists who favour a more secular approach, and in the prize jobs that have been found for former employees of Motherland.

With Mr Advani at the reins, the RSS is stepping high. Political realists may not be surprised at these tokens of gratitude to the victors of the Khandwa by-election, but those with some concern for progress, social enlightenment and harmonious coexistence of India's religious minorities cannot but be alarmed at such growing evidence of the Janata Party's commitment to retrograde concepts.

THE matter of exclusion from Akashvani and Doordarshan programme becomes curioser and curioser. The 17 persons who are clearly banned include two MPs, a distinguished scholar on China, an eminent Hindi writer, the Vice-Chancellor of Aligarh Muslim University who is also a nominated member of the National Integration Council, as well as journalists from the Hindustan Times, New Wave, Secular Democracy, Navjivan, Tej, Hindustan, Patriot and National Herald.

This too in the name of restoring freedom of expression and on the eve of revamping the two institutions into autonomous corporations in further fulfilment of that pious ideal. "Ideology is irrelevant to the media" says Mr Advani while admitting that supporters of Mrs Gandhi's 20-point programme, and of her son's five points, must be excluded.

But let the Minister himself sum up his guiding principles: "I still maintain there is no black list, but the vociferous advocates of the Emergency are not to be invited for programmes for some time". If that enunciation of policy is not at once crystal clear to readers, it is only because they do not share the commitment of Mr Advani who also boasts: "I am proud of my association with the RSS and no amount of calumny will make me disown it". ■

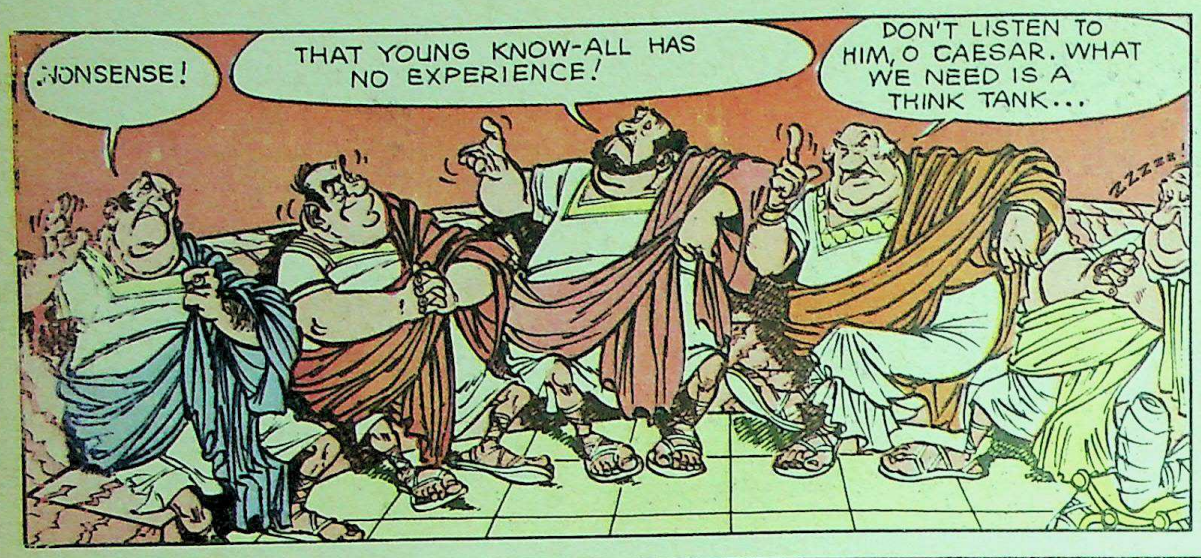
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

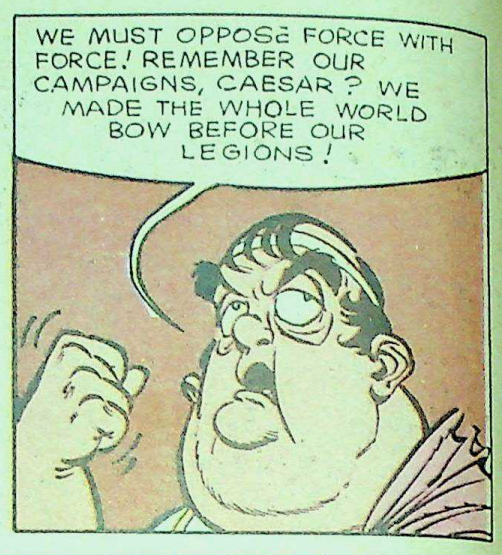
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

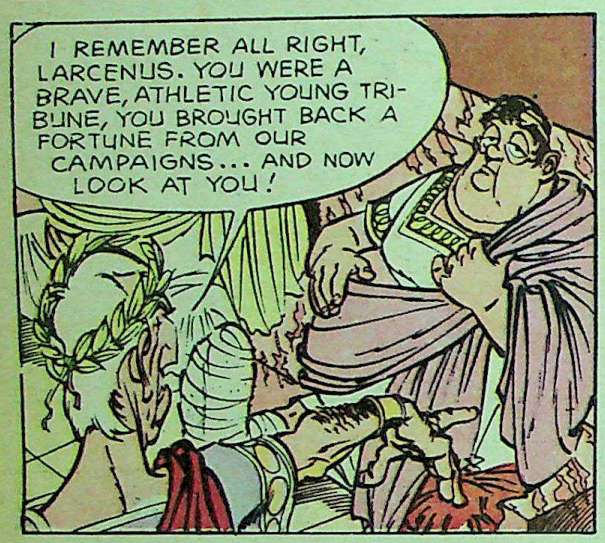
COMICS

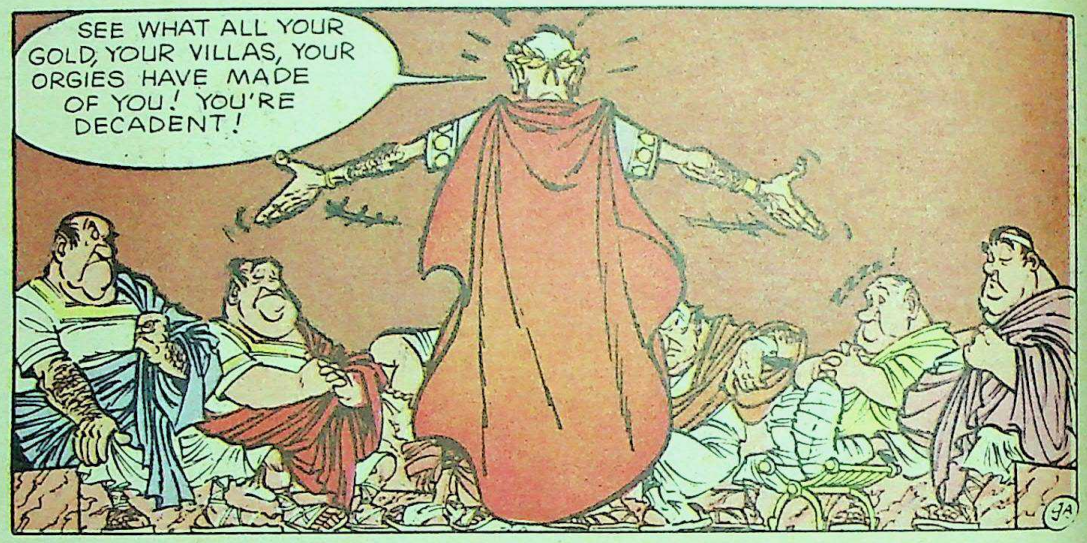
An Asterix Adventure
OBELIX AND CO.

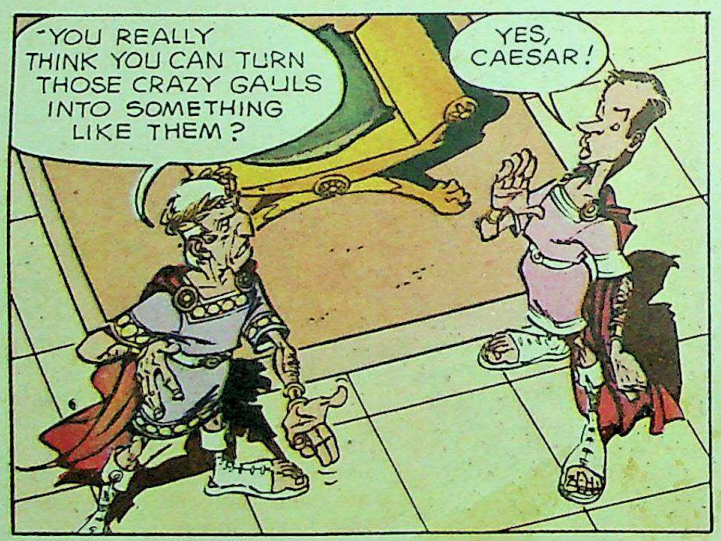
by GOSCINNY and UDERZO

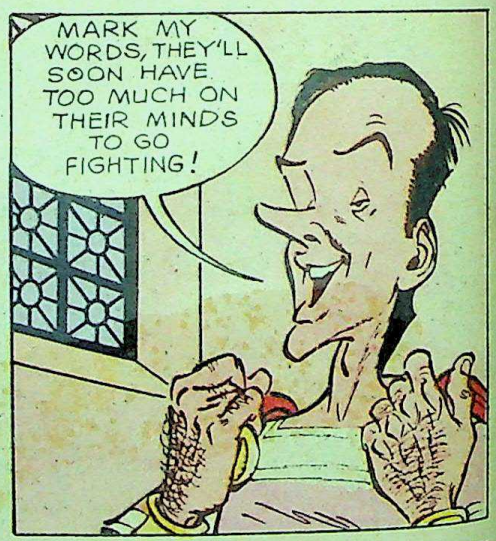


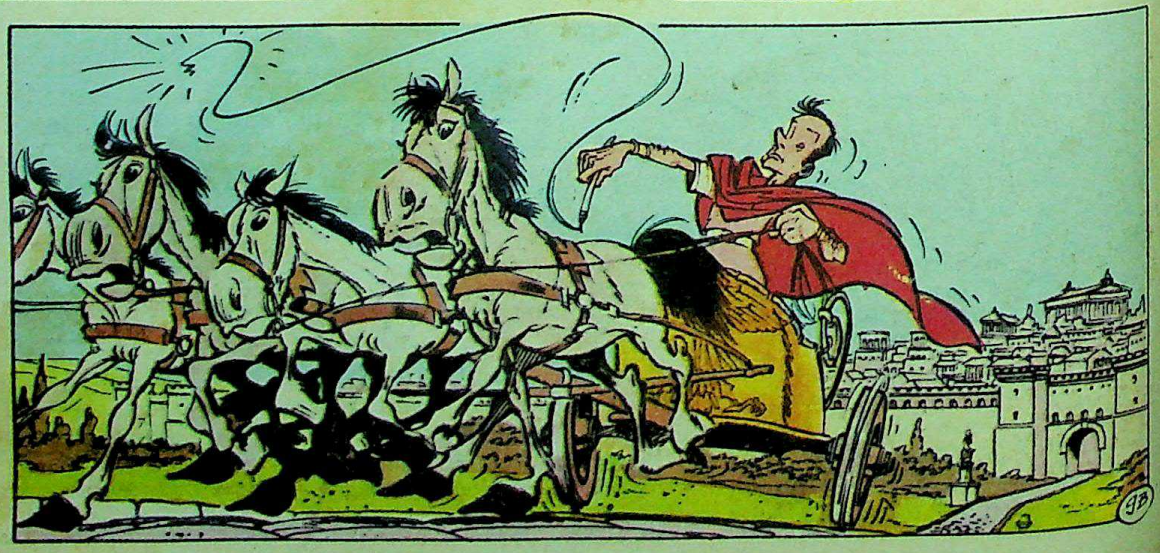












CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Bindiya: one more by the head-count

Tapas Roy

THINGS don't seem to be quite perfect between young Rishi and Tina With Chintu, of course, this is a normal affair — not getting along with his female co-stars, I mean. But there seems to be a contradiction somewhere: he is very keen on getting young actresses to work with him, yet while shooting, he creates an uneasy atmosphere around them. Of course, he is a total professional while shooting is on. But in the intervening period between the shots, this man shows his ugly side. And Tina is going through such a phase with him. Not that this is bothering her—she gets over such problems faster than most other stars. She is not like Neetu, Ranjeeta Bhavna, etc.

DID YOU notice how Hema has taken a backseat among this year's award winners? She is featured nowhere. Is this an indication of her fading popularity or that her involvement with Dharam is growing stronger? She probably has enough hassles to keep herself busy in her free time, rather than do her homework on her films. Is it any wonder her films don't do as well as they used to? The same thing happened to super star Rajesh Khanna, when he got too busy with personal problems to attend to his career. Domesticity and its allied problems cause professional disruption. That's why they say a married star is less successful than his/her single counterpart. Unless, of course, they happen to be Amitabh Bachhan.

IN SPITE of having exclusive hairdressers ready and waiting on them, most female stars prefer to go to hairdressing saloons. Like Rekha, Neetu, and now, of all the people, Bindiya. Doesn't she know that Hema Malini never visits public hairdressing parlours? Since she is supposed to be imitating this super star, judging by her superior airs, this is one thing which gives her away. Anyway, the fact remains that she goes unrecognised when she visits this particular saloon which is frequented by Rekha, Shabana, Zarina and Asha Sachdev.

DABOO KAPOOR has achieved what he wanted to for a long time —an award nomination for his acting in Kasme Vaade. This is second to his other achievement of having lost a tremendous amount of weight. Though he has put on record that 1978 has been the worst year for him and that such a year should never come back, he has actually never had it so good. Though 1979 promises to be a better year with him launching his next film and also acting in millionaire Jethawani's film, he says he wants something new for '79: which means he wants another baby.

ANOTHER star who has made it big, through a very small film is Amjad Khan. The film, Dada, is such a hit that many producers have signed him up for the lead role for similar films. This is more than a test for him. He alone was responsible for the success of Dada with no other big stars or credits to help him. Will his first attempt at directing a film prove to be a success too?

FAROOQUE SHAIKH is slowly and steadily climbing up the ladder of success, just like Smita Patil has. Incidentally, both of them had begun their careers as TV artistes. The recent release Gaman is supposed to be a refreshing film notable for its music and the performance of Smita and most of all, Farooque. The pleasant-faced actor has no airs at all, which just saves him from being considered a potential super star. That he dates Shabana Azmi quite often is of course not enough scandal to put him on the list of well-known people. Something tells me he will soon join the ranks, though!

AMITABH, it seems, has made quite a name for himself growling and grunting and gunning his way through movies. Now there's going to be a change — he is going to dance his way through—in the tradition of Travolta. He was always a good dancer, especially since his early days with Jaya looking on fondly as he tried out his impromptu steps.

Hema: on the downward slide

Tapas Roy

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

KHAAS BAAT

IN Sigappu Rojakkal, she played the Brahmin girl who seduces a young boy when her pious parents are at the temple. Since then Sumangali has been flooded with similar roles and one understands she has rejected most of them. Maybe she expects roles in which she'll have to seduce men of ripe age. Or does she want to play a nun of immaculate conception?

NANDITA BOSE, the Bengali actress, who has worked in about 30 South Indian films, has acted in only two Tamil films till now. It seems the Tamil producers are a bit reluctant to touch her, because they are interested only in artistes whose voices need not be dubbed. This is Nandita Bose's version. But then Seema's voice is invariably dubbed, one hears, and so is the case with Sarada, the Telugu girl who made it big in Malayalam films. And since multi-lingual films are the craze today, you find that many people dub their voices. There are actresses like Roja Ramani, Kanchana and Padmapriya who are more popular in Kannada films in spite of the fact that they hardly know the language. And Mamta, the Telugu girl is a big name in Malayalam films, ever since she bared herself in a soft-porno film, A Night in the Rest House.

So, Nandita, there must be some reason why Tamil producers are a bit wary of you. But why worry, the Kerala producers just love you. And anyway, you say you are not keen on too many acting assignments.

RAJESH KHANNA seems to have made a positive impression on the Madras producers when he worked in producer Balaji's Amar Deep. Soon after its completion, he was signed by three well-known Madras banners. One of these films is a remake of a popular Tamil hit, Sigappu Rojakkal, starring Kamalahasan and Sridevi. It was directed by Bharatiraja. The Hindi version will have the same director and, will be starring Rajesh, Tina and Amjad Khan. Kamalahasan portrayed a misogynist in Sigappu Rojakkal who slaughters his women after laying them. Now, let's see how Rajesh is going to perform. One hopes he won't repeat his performance from Ittefaq where he had to pretend to be a psychopath.

RADHIKA, who played the blushing village maiden in Kizhakke Pogum Rail appears in modern clothes, in Nikkum Ilamai. And though she has the appearance of a flirt, the whole town is after her. But surprise : she's "pure at heart" whereas her cousin, who's draped in conventional, conservative sarees has a wandering mind and fancies all kinds of men. Meera has played the role of the cousin rather well even though the credit titles are hogged by Radhika.

STAR-CRAZY audiences who turn up for the felicitation programmes often get annoyed when the stars attending the function refuse to speak, or say just a few inspired words. Few years ago, Leena Chandavarkar, who hails from Dharwar, was heckled and booed by a Kannada crowd in Bombay when she declared that she couldn't speak the language, at a function organised by a Kannada association! Leena wanted to speak only in Hindi or in English, but the irate crowd told her to leave the auditorium.

A couple of weeks ago, the new Telugu box-office success, Subashini, just said, "Thank you" and sat down. The function was organised to felicitate the unit of Shivaranjani, a Telugu hit film which has done excellent business in Bangalore, too. The audience listened, rather restlessly, to the meandering speeches of the director and some technicians. But all the time they were expecting some words, may be even some anecdotes from Subhashini. Maybe Subhashini is just shy of big crowds. She refused to say anything beyond a short sentence ... of course, she was not offensive at all. But the audience was not in a tolerant mood.

THERE'S a sudden spurt in Oriya films. Following the super success of the mythological film Sati Anusuya in which Roja Ramani played the title role, the Oriya producers have started descending on Madras. For one thing, they look around for not-so-expensive heroines. And then there are the streamlined Madras studios. Currently, four such films are being made in Madras ...and all of them are mythological. At least in Orissa, the road to the box-office is paved with mythology.

GIRISH KARNAD'S Ondanondu Kaladalli was a slick entertaining film, but it was not entertaining enough for the masses : it was not a box-office success. Girish says he made the film because "new-wave" Kannada films like Samskara, Chomana Dudi and Kaadu were similar, so he wanted to make something light and entertaining. But Girish is not really worried about the fact that Ondanondu Kaladalli was not a success. He has persuaded the the producer to think of launching another film with himself as the director. It'll be a small budget film.

Now that he is acting in some films in Bombay, won't he spending too much time there? No, says Girish. The kind of directors he's working for, Basu Chatterjee included, are fastidious and fast. His work in Ratnadeep, in which he's paired with Hema Malini, is almost over and for Man Pasand, in which he has an important role to play, his shooting schedule may last only another fortnight.

PIOUSJI

Subha

Sumangali : reversing roles

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

It's time for an extra twist of taste

A time to taste – *lemon and lime like it's never been. More tangy,* more punchy, more everything.

A time to 'freshen' – *with tongue–tingling lemon and *lime. Fresh and icy cold.

A time to switch to Campa – *lemon and lime Any time from nine to nine – or before and after. Today – or now.*

*Artificial flavour

It's Campa time with the flavour of lemon* and lime*

CC-0. Mumukshu Bhawan Varanasi Collection. Digitized by eGangotri

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Pravda scoop

While the Indian newsmen made do with Press Information Bureau handouts, Anna Karenina and Yuri Zhivago, two young enterprising reporters from PRAVDA, the paper exclusively devoted to sensationalism, grilled their Prime Minister Alexei Nikolayevich Kosygin on his mystery mission to India.

Anna: Alexei baby, did you have to go all that way to smear colour on the cheeks of Indian girls? Aren't the Kolkhoznik wenches good enough?

Kosygin: Holi is a heroic third world festival.

Anna: All the same, an Associated Press report says you didn't splash water. Is that true?

Kosygin blanches, and refuses to answer.

Zhivago: Okay, if you won't tell us why, we take it that the Soviet Government has plenty to hide. Well, let's put it this way: did you also, concurrently so to speak, go shopping for rice?

Kosygin grows even paler, sweats, then steadies himself with a vodka.

Anna: Alexei baby, do you think your Government will fall if you answer?

Kosygin: My Government is stable. But I desire to say just this: one does shop around a bit at festival time.

Zhivago: You'd done crisis shopping for rice in India. Do we conclude the Agrograd policy is being reversed?

Kosygin: This is the Chinese canard. No policy of the Revolution is being abandoned or reversed.

Anna: Then why didn't you buy the rice from the kolkhozes?

Kosygin: I repeat: we stand by the Great October Revolution, which runs short of wheat once in a way. So we buy a little bit of the stuff from a neighbouring revolution, the Green Revolution. It's all between revolutions.

Zhivago: Factual error, Alexei old boy. The Green Revolution is coarse wheat, not rice.

Kosygin: All grains are allies.

Anna: But, baby, Lenin said wheat kept the proletariat in trim while rice made them sluggish.

Kosygin: Lenin said that communism was the electrification of the countryside, that it was the spread of washing machines and colour TV. It's we who will interpret Lenin, not you.

Anna: Boo!

Zhivago: Boo!

Kosygin reels, then stabilizes himself with another vodka.

Kosygin: Lenin meant that a dole of rice to a revolutionary people occupying another revolutionary people will do the former a world of good.

Anna: Did the Chinese knock out the Vietnamese rice centres, their military-vegetable complex?

Zhivago: Like we wanted to knock out the Chinese nuclear installations at Lop Nor, and the Americans wouldn't let us?

Kosygin guzzles a large vodka.

Kosygin (haltingly): The heroic Vietnamese people grow their own rice.

Anna: But would you, baby, or would you not send them this rice?

Kosygin: We might. Just to create a South-East Asian buffer stock to stop Chinese expansionism.

Zhivago: After parting with the rice for a song, the Indians let you call the Chinese robbers and assassins. And that, when you were on Indian soil.

Anna: Did you break into their South Block, wire the place and snoop on Jagat Mehta, with a view to pressurising the Indian Government to have a foreign policy different from Atal Behari Vajpayee's?

Kosygin: We don't break in. We insist on being invited. The real leaders of the Kampuchean people invited us. Since we couldn't go, we sent the Vietnamese. So too the Czechs. They sent us word, "drop in", and we paradropped our troops. They again sent word, "roll in", and we sent a goodwill mission of tanks. We've given the Indians tanks, too, but not the tank crews. Not yet.

Zhivago: But dear Nikolayevich, it's rumoured the CPI invited you to break in.

Anna: That you're giving the Indian workers the slogan: 'from Gandhi to Gandhi to Gandhi.' Who's the ally of the October Revolution: the boy or his mom?

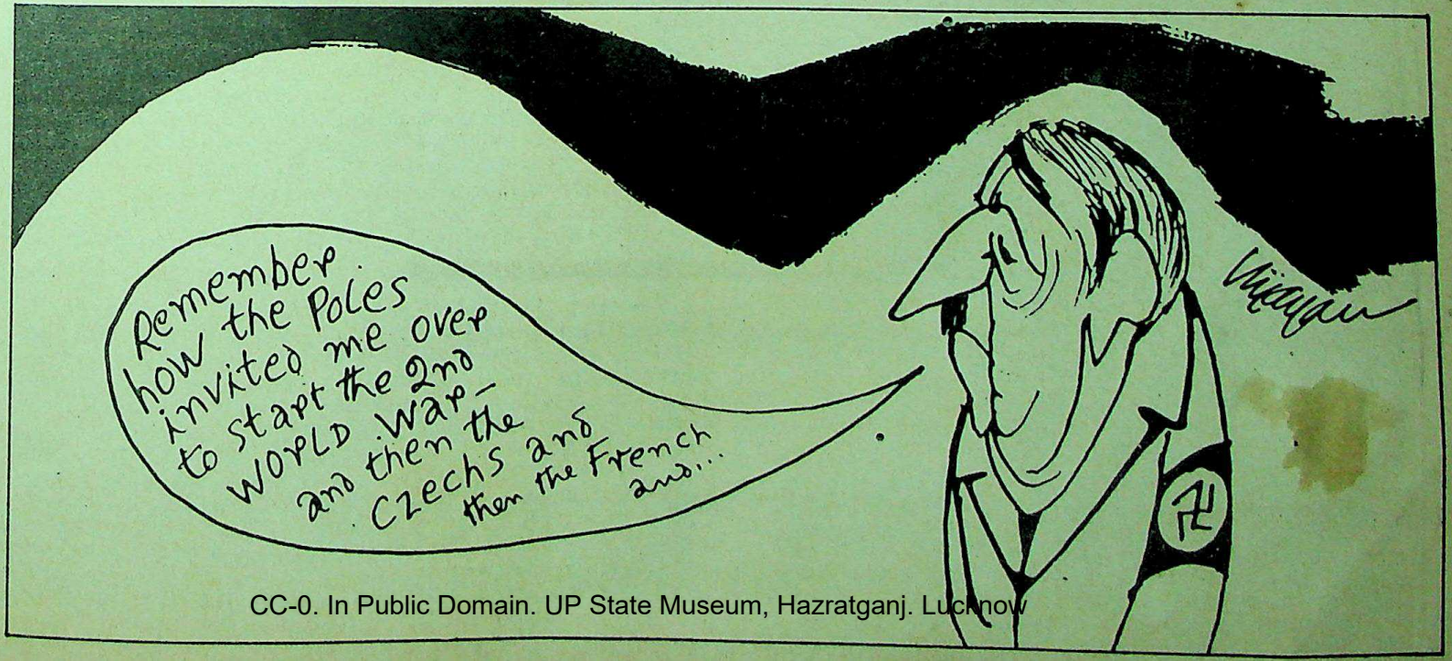
Kosygin puns delicately.

Kosygin: Mom's the word.

Anna and Zhivago: Boo!

Moscow is thick with the most sordid rumours. These say that Kosygin is trying to put new life into the Indo-Soviet Treaty, using unfair and illegal means. The managers of Pravda declared meanwhile that they would stand by their reporters. It wouldn't matter to them whether the Government stayed or fell.

By O.V. VIJAYAN



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

'I run the Janata, not RSS'

Janata Party chief CHANDRASHEKHAR tells BHOLA CHATTERJI

Q: An impression seems to have gained currency that you have become soft on the RSS. There is a lot of controversy about the role of the RSS in politics; and it is said that at the time of the recent communal conflict in Aligarh you had kind of given the RSS a relatively clean bill of health. What do you have to say about that?

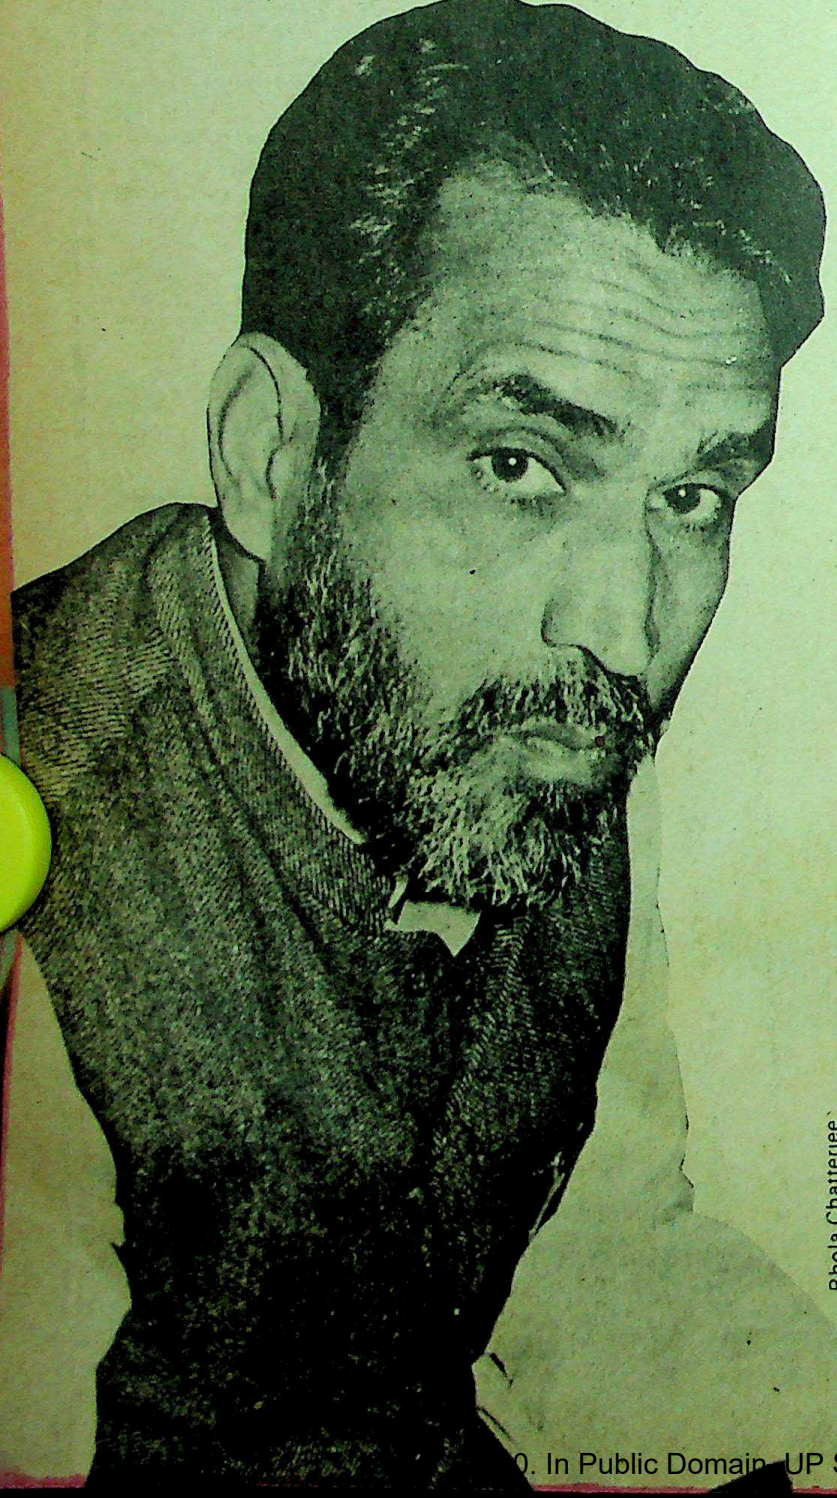
A: It is true that an impression has been created all round that I am trying to be soft on the RSS. But the fact is, I am not dealing with the RSS ideology at the moment, I am dealing with a situation wherein I have been given the responsibility to run a political Party which was formed in January 1977. Or, if I may say so, which actually came into existence in May 1977. But it contested the elections after the Emergency in peculiar circumstances where many friends who belonged to the RSS also joined this Party. All of us were conscious of this fact. If you ask me about the ideological stand of the RSS, or for that reason of any organisation or any section of our society which wants to bring religion in any way in the economic and social affairs of mankind, I am against it. But my problem is that I cannot make it a point to single out individuals in order to help some political game. When the RSS joined the Janata Party, its character was the same. If I may say so, it has by force of circumstances been compelled to change a little. I do not say that it has changed basically, but in order to have a working alliance with other groups in the Janata Party it has tried to accommodate the sentiments, aspirations and the wishes of other sections of the Janata Party. Some of my friends say that it was the RSS which was trying to foment communal trouble in order to achieve its goal. The RSS as an organisation, even for its presumed narrow sectarian interests, would never like to have communal disturbances in the country. And at that time I made it quite clear to many of my friends, who doubted the motivation of the RSS, that in two or three States friends who earlier belonged to the RSS were running the administration and, comparatively, they had done much better on the question of communal tension in those States. So it would not have been proper for me as Party President to blame all the men who belonged to the RSS in the past.



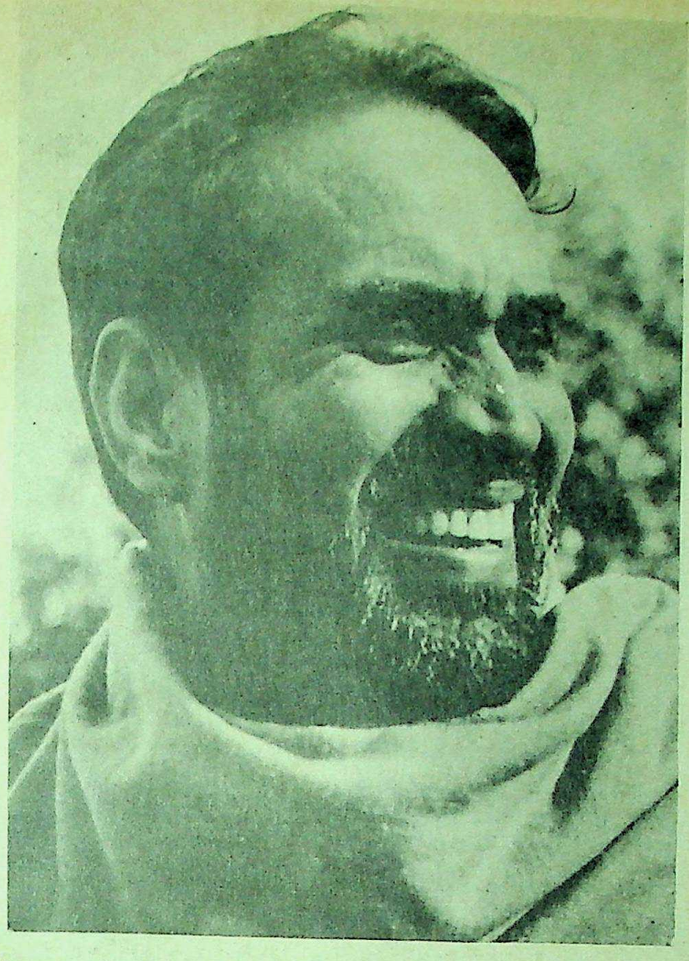
Bhola Chatterjee

But I want to make it quite clear that this issue of communalism cannot be tackled by bringing certain individuals into the Government or elbowing some others out of it. It requires a complete overhaul of our policy orientation and we will have to understand the implications of religious fanaticism and how it works. I have been of the view, and I still hold the view, that the Marxist analysis in this regard is quite correct. Religion as an instrument of communion between man and God, whatever God may be, is a thing which can be well understood. Every individual, every citizen, should have the right to the freedom of establishing communion with the Almighty. But as soon as religion enters into the domain of social and economic affairs of man its implications could not be anything but dangerous. It applies to all the religions. It is true of the majority community's religion; it is also true of the minority communities' religions. If you draw the logical conclusion of this argument I do not think it would be very agreeable even to the minority communities. I do not know whether the numerically largest minority community would consider the desirability of having a fresh look at the Muslim personal law. This is my point of view regarding the RSS.

My difficulty is that I am neither running the RSS nor waging a crusade against the RSS; I am running the Janata Party. And you know, if we have a distinct goal to achieve we can do it through cohesive and enlightened functioning. And this can be done only by pursuing certain well-defined policies and programmes which would eliminate the role of religion in social and economic life of the people. Unfortunately, some men do not seem to be interested in pursuing the policies and programmes, but they want to hurl accusations against each other. I don't know how I can be a party to this. I well understand that if it offers a chance of gaining a certain popularity this attitude may cause some injury to my popularity. But one has to take, at times, unpleasant decisions if one

0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Vijendra Tyagi

has to discharge certain public responsibilities. If some people are satisfied by making such accusations I do not bother about it. As I understand it, communalism can be fought only by solving the problems of the minorities, by creating a society where the more privileged people are not allowed to enjoy the major share of the fruits of development. The problem is that one forgets the historical process that operated in the last three or four decades in this country. This is an elitist society where only a small segment of the people gets the benefits of the socio-economic development. This is true whether the reference is to the Hindus, Muslims or the Christians.

Unfortunately, in India the elite section of the Muslim community went to Pakistan at the time of partition and only the poorer sections remained. The elitist, be he a Hindu or a Muslim, gets the fruits of development in this country. But the major portion of the Muslim population which in the pre-partition days were exploited and downtrodden, are feeling the pangs of misery more, and one cannot ignore this fact. You know, whenever job opportunities occur in our society, they do not as a matter of course go to the men of merit. For these jobs, approaches are made, recommendations are made, and that not by ordinary people but by those who have a say in society today. Those Muslim friends who had a say in the pre-partition society were not here, as a result other Muslims suffered. It is the duty of all those who are running the administrative machinery to make special efforts to accommodate the minorities in various services and give them more opportunities for their economic development, so that they could also join the voyage of national reconstruction. That is the one thing which should be done. But, unfortunately, attempts are being made to tackle the problem by narrow sectarian political manoeuvrings to which I cannot be a party.

Q: India is a secular State, certainly. But then it is one thing to have a secular Constitution, and quite another to work it. People belonging to the various minority communities seem to have a feeling that the Constitution is something less than real in their everyday life. Take one instance out of many. The minorities constitute nearly 20 per cent of India's total population, but there is no proportional reflection of this in various spheres of national life. What do you say?

A: I have already said that this is the situation that obtains in the country. But it is not true only in the case of the religious minorities, it is true in regard to all oppressed and exploited sections of society. Let me first answer the question about the Constitution. It has not talked only about secularism; it has promised many amenities to the people. If you remember, the Constitution said that a decade after it became effective there would be no illiterate person in the counry, that no Indian child would be without education. It is no only the minorities or the oppressed classes but even the children of the higher castes and other sections have also been denied the right to education. Many good ideas were put in the Constitution but they still remain unrealised. This is very unfortunate. Take the case of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. For them there was a definite reservation made in the Constitution. But in spite of the constitutional provisions and all the emphasis on them by the people in the Government—Jawaharlal Nehru, Lal Bahadur Sastri, Indira Gandhi, and now Morarji Desai— the situation is far from encouraging. Everyone of these leaders started by swearing to the commitments to the oppressed and exploited people—the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. But, inspite of the specifice Constitutional provisions for their employment in the services, their quota is not filled even today.

That explains the situation. It is not religious bigotry, but the economic and social disparity which comes in the way. I can well understand, and I very much respect, the sentiments of the minorities. But if this problem is sought to be explained in a manner which gives it the colour more of a communal issue than anything else, then I am afraid it will defy solution. This problem should be seen in its right perspective. The unfortunate thing is that even the religious minorities, who are the most exploited sections of society, instead of joining hands with the oppressed and the exploited people, want to segregate themselves. And this is the game that is being played by certain politicians. If a solution to the problem is to be found out, the attempt should be to make joint endeavours by all who stand for an egalitarian society, for the rightful claims of all the oppressed and exploited sections of society. Because of historical reasons the minorities might have suffered more and they have suffered more in certain areas. But I do not think this is mainly a religious question; perhaps it is partly so, religion has a minor role to play.

It should be recalled in this connexion that in certain sectors the minorities were the dominant factor in our economic life. Most of the artisans in our rural and urban areas were from the minority community. Whether the jari work of Varanasi, brassware of Moradabad or muslin in Dacca—these cottage or village industries were predominantly handled by the minority community. During

We will have to understand the implications of religious fanaticism and how it works .... The Marxist analysis in this regard is quite correct.

As soon as religion enters into the domain of social and economic affairs of man, its implications could not be anything but dangerous.

Communalism can be fought only by solving the problems of minorities, by creating a society where the more privileged people are not allowed to enjoy the major share of the fruits of development.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

RAMCO'S BELIEF:

ONLY THE BEST IS WELCOME IN WORLD MARKETS.

Anything a shade less is scorned at.
In a little over two years, Ramco is already 'at home' in several countries in the Gulf. It is our know-how that wins us the orders—contracts worth several million dollars. But our real edge in the highly competitive overseas markets is our 'know-what'—our in-depth knowledge of customer requirements and local conditions. Senior Company Executives frequently visit the markets to make on-the-spot study. Result is, our export orders are meticulously executed. From the packing outside to the product inside, our customers have come to appreciate Ramco's high standards. Proof of this faith is in our orderbooks!

SOUTHERN ASBESTOS CEMENT LTD., 739 Anna Salai, Madras 600 002

Offices :
Bangalore ▪ Vijayawada
Hyderabad ▪ Cochin ▪ Pune
Factories :
Arkonam (Tamilnadu),
Karur (Karnataka)

ACIL SAC 10A 79

Ramco
ASBESTOS CEMENT SHEETS AND ACCESSORIES

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The elitist, be he a Hindu or Muslim, gets the fruits of development in our country.

British rule, these industries were destroyed—the Britishers not only made us politically dependent, they also destroyed our infrastructure of development. After Independence we did very little to revive these industries. The result was that most of the minority community people who were engaged in these occupations gradually went out of employment. Even as late as in 1947 many of these industries were in operation, but because of our mad race for modernisation these industries were not given proper attention. It is now essential that these industries should be given proper attention not only to provide jobs to these people, not only to give them a respectable position in society where they could add to the wealth of the nation as well as earn their livelihood, but also to make the Indian economy more viable. If these problems are tackled on an economic basis, giving special emphasis to the minorities, then we might find a solution to them. Without creating any bitterness, we could thus give more opportunities to the minorities, particularly their oppressed sections, to contribute to the national growth and also to regain their social respectability.

Q: Some of your colleagues in the Janata Party, particularly some of those with a Socialist past, seem to view the RSS issue as the most serious problem that confronts the country at the moment. What do you say to that?

A: I have nothing to say about that. That is their understanding of the problem. The interesting thing is that some of them say that they are ready to join hands with the Congress in order to tackle the problem. I asked one of the leaders with a Congress past, who belongs to my Party, the Janata Party : how come that for a long thirty years when there was no RSS member in the Cabinet, whether at the Centre or in the States except in 1967 when some State Governments had a few Jana Sangh members as Ministers, that communalism did not die in the country? The problem has to be tackled on the basis of a clear-cut policy and programme. I do not think that the RSS or any other group in the Janata Party will be able to influence its collective thinking. If (anti-RSS) friends try to put forward some constructive programmes which could be implemented, they would be more able to combat these forces than by creating embarrassing situations for the Party as well as for themselves. From my point of view, this will not help them to go far; this is just a slogan which can at best be used against certain individuals in the Government or outside. This is not going to solve the problem of communalism, which is a more deep-rooted malady, a malady that can be traced to obscurantist ideas, traditional values, superstitious beliefs and, particularly, the economic problem. I feel some of my friends try to use this as a political slogan in order to create a problem in the Party. Perhaps they might be thinking that they are serving the Party and society by so doing. If the RSS is trying to influence the Party in an undesirable direction they should pinpoint that and I think it would then be possible to mobilise the whole Party, including many friends in the (former) Jana Sangh who would never be a party to obsurantist, outdated, obsolete ideas. Instead of doing that they are, unfortunately, just using a slogan which is not going to make any difference in the working of the Janata Party or in the present social situation.

Q: How do you explain the conduct of some of your Party leaders who attended the recent RSS rally at the Ramlila Ground in New Delhi?

A: If you want my personal views in the matter, I have made it quite clear that I would not like those who hold responsible position in the Government to go in half-shirts and 'knickers' with a lathi in hand to take part in such parades. It does not create a good impression. But there is nothing objectionable in that because if thousands of citizens could attend the rally they (the Party leaders) could also do so. I shall not ask any individual to put a social boycott on his friends because he happens to be in the Government. It is something that should be avoided in our politics. Unfortunately, those who become Ministers begin to claim that they are superior to others. This is a very dangerous tendency. For instance, today I am Janata Party President and you are my old friend. Suppose I begin to feel shy of sitting with you or going somewhere with you, how would you feel? Suppose some RSS people are there who happen to be associates or friends of the leaders; if somebody asks them not to associate or dine or attend any function with (their old RSS friends) it would be against human dignity. If a Minister attends the function of Balasahab Deoras, I shall not take objection to it. But if Balasaheb Deoras says something which is against the State policy or the Janata Party policy, on that count he will have to make himself clear. Those friends who are taking objection to these things had better point out where Balasaheb Deoras has made a statement that runs counter to the ideas or stand of the Janata Party. But, instead of doing that, if one advocates the nineteenth century idea of social boycott and all that, I do not agree with it. In a parliamentary democracy you would have to converse with all types of people and I do not think much exception could be taken to this.

Q: What is your attitude towards the Muslim League, or the Jamaat in Uttar Pradesh, or certain other organisations which are openly communal?

A: My attitude is the same towards all such organisations. They must be tested on the criteria which I have already indicated to you. You had better put this question to the people who are taking serious exception to the RSS and trying to collaborate with all these organisations. It is unfortunate that some people imagine that they can discourage majority communalism by encouraging minority communalism. It is not correct and it is creating a difficult situation in the country. They are not the friends of the minorities who want to foment unnecessary hysteria among the minorities and unnecessarily provoke a section of the majority community to go on an undesirable path. Religious fanaticism, whether in the minority or in the majority community, is equally bad, and you should not discriminate against the one or in favour of the other. It is true that the majority community's religious bigotry may do more harm to society. But, in principle, in ideology and theory, both are equally harmful.

Unfortunately some people imagine that they can discourage majority communalism by encouraging minority communalism.

Q: You would agree that the intra-Party conflict in the Janata Party is not a figment of anyone's imagination. Do you think that this might have an extra-territorial source of inspiration?

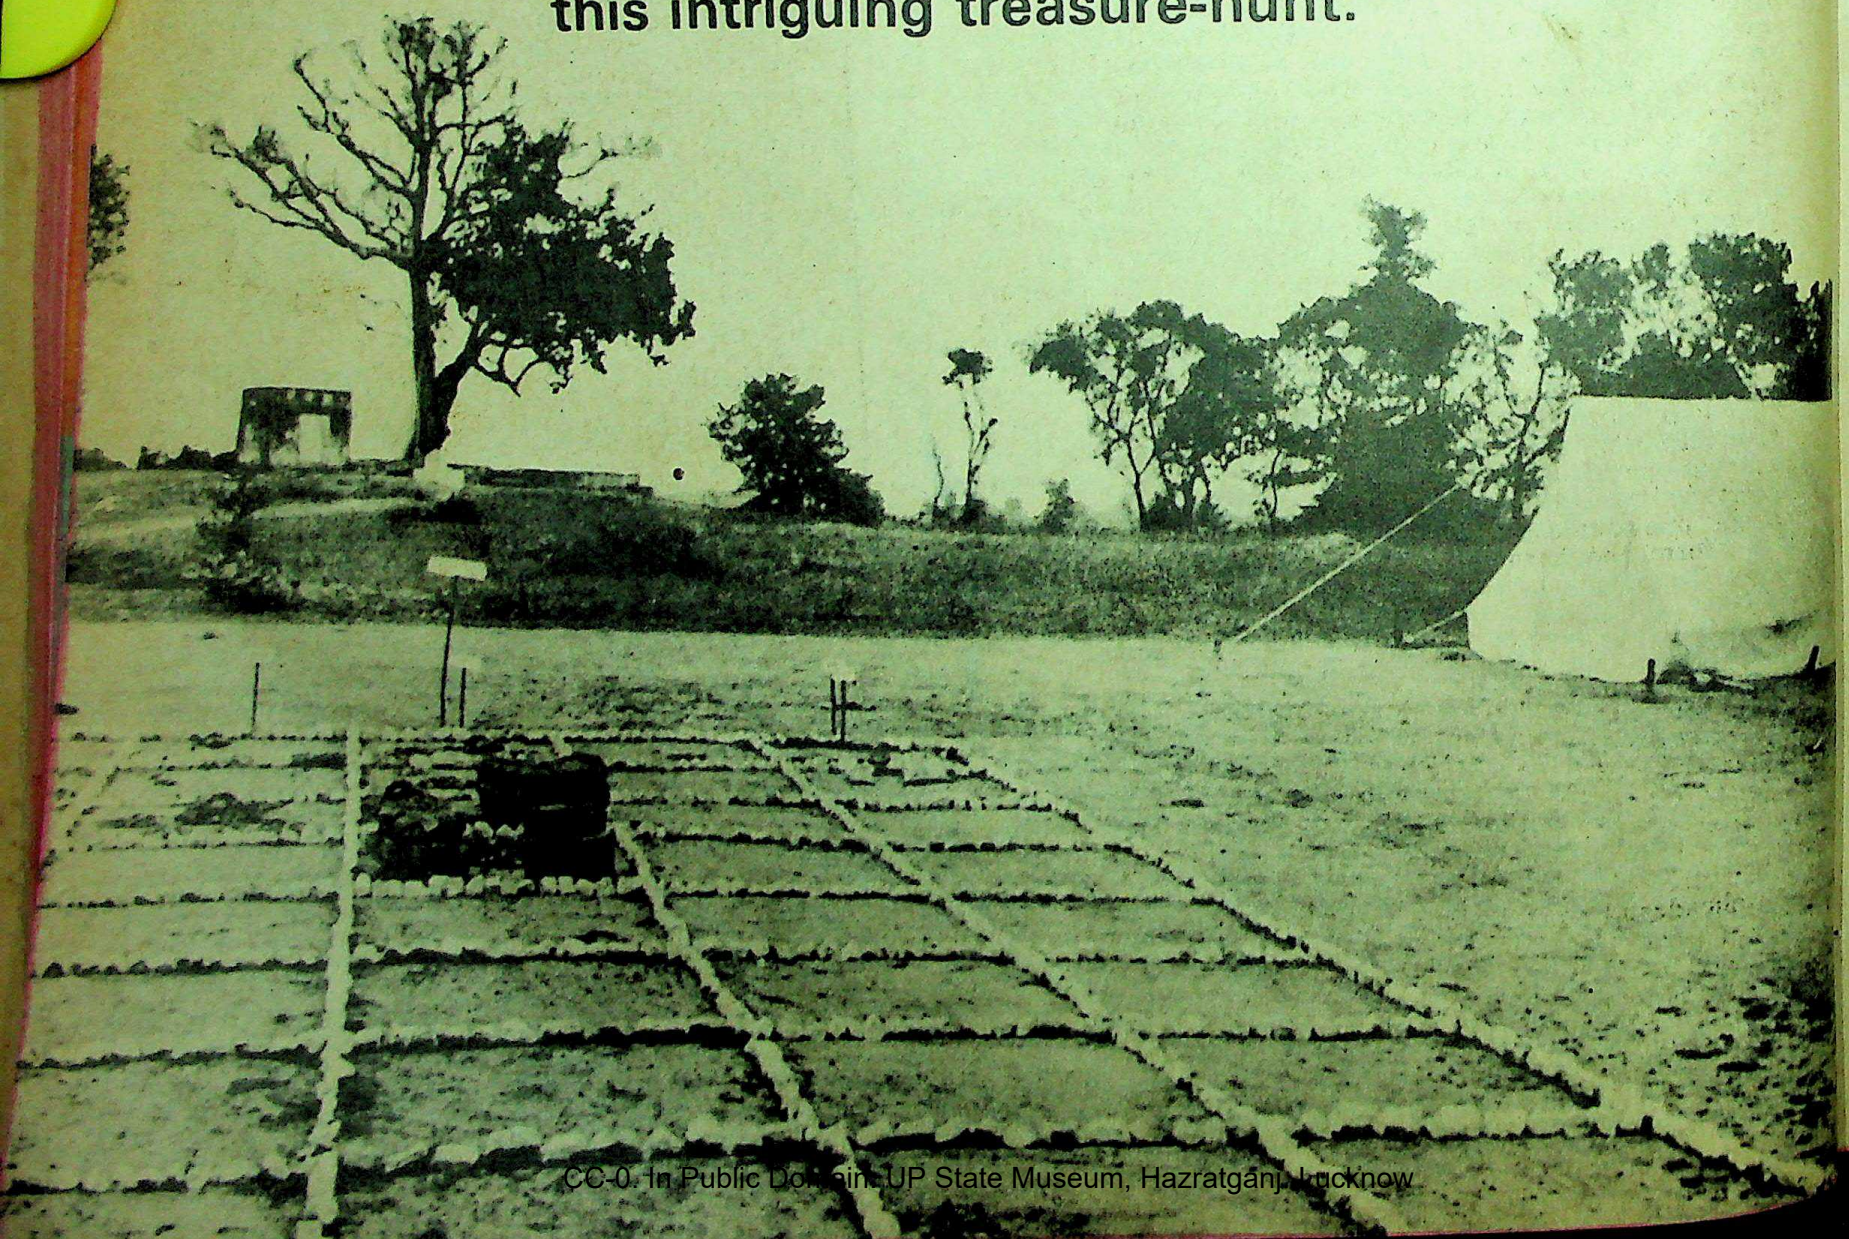
A: If is very difficult for me to comment on this. But one fact should always be kept in mind—the Super Powers always try to intervene in the internal politics of the developing countries and India is no exception to it . It is known by all of us, and there is nothing new in it. For the last three decades this has been the case. One should always keep in mind that Super Powers may try to create a situation of instability in this country, because a stable India is always an eyesore to them. A non-aligned, independent, sovereign, stable and economically viable India is considered to be a competitor by the Super Powers. It is an unfortunate phenomenon, but it is a fact of history. There may be some forces that are trying to (destabilise the country) but I do not think that the Indian people are going to tolerate this type of interference. So, we should not give too much credence or too much importance to this talk of interference by the Super Powers. They might be desirous of interfering, they might be desirous of playing some role, but their role is not going to be the determining factor in the future of this country. I do not give much importance to this type of talk. If it is there it would be exposed and the people who might be trying to be instruments of Super Powers will not cut ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Hidden Treasure of Oudh

An Income Tax raid on a Lucknow tailor's shop, a man's nagging superstitious and religious beliefs and some material gleaned from history books about the Sultanate of Oudh have led to a search for a fabulous treasure that may be buried somewhere in Lucknow or Faizabad. TANIA SHAH followed the trail of this intriguing treasure-hunt.



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A STONE's throw from the temples of Ayodhya, in a mysteriously built grave probably lies a fabulous treasure that once belonged to the Nawabs of Oudh. The grave is situated in an abandoned, overgrown graveyard whose graves go back hundreds of years. And the mystery of the grave in question is that it is built from East to West, whereas Muslim (and Hindu) graves are always built North to South.

On it is engraved a symbol which looks like a key, and on its western side something has been inscribed in Persian. Most of the letters have faded, except the word "madphoon", which means buried. The grave became suspect not only because of its being built in the wrong direction but because the word "madphoon" is the last word of a suspected treasure secret, engraved on a copper plate which was seized from a Lucknow tailor's shop by the UP Income Tax Department.

The treasure hunt, were it not for the involvement of the State Government, would be the stuff of which dreams and fairy tales are made. The copper plate claims that Nawab Shuja-ud-daula discovered a huge treasure buried by Hindu kings and protected by the ancient gods. After sacrifices and prayers, he acquired the treasure which was later buried by one of the Begums of Oudh, around 250 years ago, in a shikargah (hunting lodge).

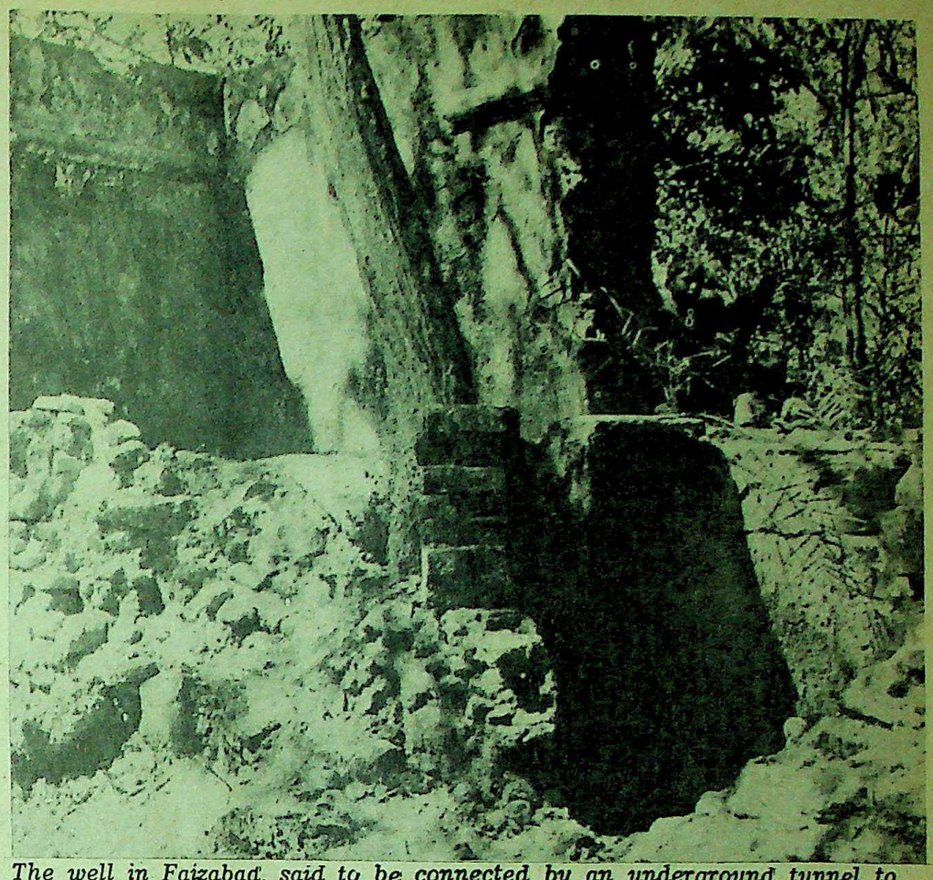
How the treasure hunters got to the East-West grave in Faizabad, is a story which begins with the Income Tax raid in 1976. Yunus Beg, whose family have owned a tailoring shop in Lucknow since the time of Queen Victoria, had an ancestor who was a soldier in Wajid Ali Shah's army. He, it is believed, acquired the copper plate in the chaos that followed the arrest of Wajid Ali Shah. He was later killed by the English and the copper plate, along with some other documents, remained with his family. For generations nobody bothered about it till Yunus came across it some years ago. He took it to someone who could understand Persian and was told that it was the secret to a buried treasure.

Naturally, word got around and some public-spirited citizen decided to inform the Income Tax department, who raided Yunus' shop and seized the plate. They then had it translated and discovered that it was in fact some kind of map but they did not start looking for the treasure and would perhaps never have done so were it not for the enthusiasm of the tailor. He started plaguing the Income Tax Department to find out what was going to be done, till the Income Tax Commissioner, Mr S. K. Lal, told him to go ahead and start looking for possible places where the treasure may be, and if anything were found, he would be entitled to 10 per cent of the treasure under the Treasure Troves Act.

Ten per cent of a treasure that would now probably be worth at least 80 crores, presuming that its value has gone up at least ten times, is incentive enough for anyone. So off Yunus went. His first difficulty was that when the Oudh Nawabs shifted their capital from Faizabad to Lucknow, during the time of Asaf-ud-daula, they renamed the city exactly as if they had moved the whole of Faizabad; so if you have a Khurd Mahal in Faizabad you have one in Lucknow and if you have a shikargah, you also have it at both places. In fact, a report made to the Income Tax Department by someone from the Archaeological Survey suggests that Lucknow is more likely to hold the treasure than Faizabad.

Yunus, however, did not find a likely place in Lucknow, so he went to Faizabad where, after walking for days through the streets, he came upon an area called Khurd Mahal. The reference in the plate is to a queen by that name, but there was also a palace, of which only a few walls and arches now remain. People have built houses within its ruined interior and one of the older residents of the area told Yunus (and me when I visited the spot) that some of the junior begums of the Oudh nawabs lived in Khurd Mahal. But they laughed at the mention of a treasure and said that had there been any, they would not be living like paupers.

Undeterred, Yunus persisted with his enquiries and was told of a local legend that a treasure was buried by a begum in a "purab-paschim kabar" (East-West grave) in a shikargah. Now he realized he was hot on the trail because the last line of the plate said "dar shikargah madphoon" (buried in a hunting lodge). He found the grave and the well and another legend that the two were connected by an underground tunnel. He informed the authorities, and the hunt began.



The well in Faizabad, said to be connected by an underground tunnel to the mysterious grave.

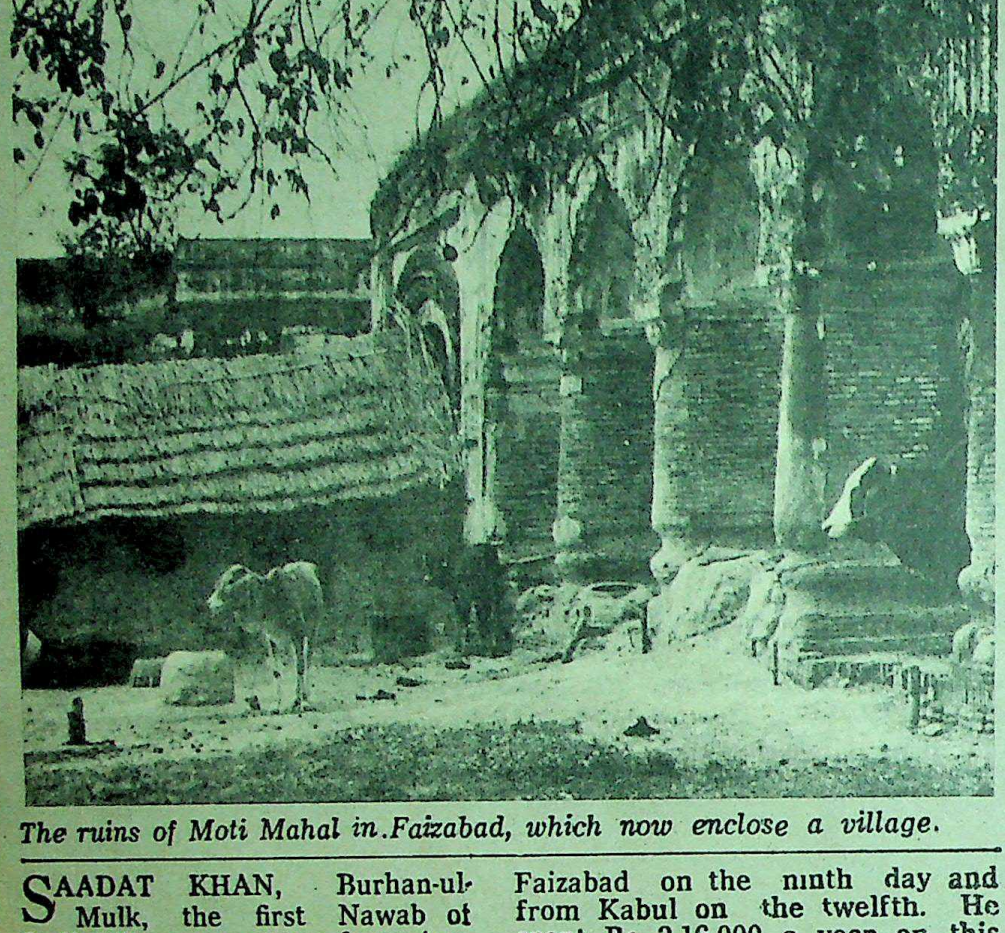
THE actual digging was started around the end of February. When I visited Faizabad in the middle of March, the treasure-hunters had still not decided whether to dig up the grave itself and were negotiating with the authorities to have the well drained to see if there was anything in it. The question now is whether the hunt should continue and whether they should risk offending local Muslim sentiment and break open the grave. Sceptics (who seemed to be winning) feel that the whole hunt is a wild goose chase and should stop before more money is wasted; romantics feel it cannot do any harm to continue and, of course, Yunus, the tailor, would be distraught if the whole search were called off.

In Lucknow, the first person I met was Mr R. C. Singh, the Director of Archaeology, who smiled sheepishly when I mentioned the Faizabad treasure hunt. "We are archaeologists," he said in an embarrassed voice, "we're not really supposed to be looking for treasure and archaeologically speaking, the site is of no interest. We are just following orders. The Government has given us Rs 10,000 and told us to dig, so we are doing just that. This whole business was started by that tailor, who seems to know some Minister or bigwig in Delhi".

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Faizabad's prosperous past



The ruins of Moti Mahal in Faizabad, which now enclose a village.

SAADAT KHAN, Burhan-ul-Mulk, the first Nawab of Oudh (the name comes from Ayodhya) resided mainly in Ayodhya where at Lachhman Ghat, a short distance from the town, he built the Quilla Mubarak as his official residence. Faizabad was not yet founded and he is said to have held court in a tent, pitched in the Keorah forest on the banks of the Ghaghra.

He also constructed a 'bangla' (shooting box) around which he raised a mud wall with a bastion on each corner as in a fort. This enclosure was large enough to house his cavalry, infantry and artillery. The houses he built were of mud, and after his death in the time of Safdarjung, this town came to be called Faizabad. Shuja-ud-daula succeeded him and made Faizabad his capital and started living there in 1765.

During the time of Shuja-ud-daula, Faizabad attained a prosperity which it never saw again. Merchants from Persia, China and Europe regularly visited the city which is said to have had several beautifully laid out gardens. W. C. Macpherson wrote in Soldiering in India that in 1733, his new fort and palace were still being constructed and that 40,000 men worked daily on the construction. The walls of the new fort were 60 feet thick.

Shuja-ud-daula had a very efficient intelligence department which employed 18,000 couriers so that news from Poona reached Faizabad on the ninth day and from Kabul on the twelfth. He spent Rs 2,16,000 a year on this service. Shuja-ud-daula died in Faizabad on January 26, 1775 and was succeeded by Asaf-ud-daula who moved his capital to Lucknow seven years after his accession.

Shuja-ud-daula left his mother Nawab Begum and his wife Bahu Begum a treasure estimated then at Rs 2 crores. In the time of Asaf-ud-daula the East India Company began interfering in the affiars of Oudh, and to meet their demands, he took Rs 30 lakhs from his mother and borrowed Rs 26 lakhs. The demands continued and when Asaf-ud-daula really could not afford to pay, Warren Hastings assisted him in forcibly taking the treasure from the Begums.

In the first week of January 1782, a British detachment marched to Faizabad and supported the Nawab's troops. The Begums' too eunuchs were forced to part with the treasure. Later, the spoliation of the Begums of Oudh formed one of the charges in the impeachment of Warren Hastings.

Of Bahu Begum, W. Hoey in his Memories of Faizabad: . "No one woman in all the 32 subahs of India can be held up in these days as her rival in either the grandeur of her surroundings or the respect she commands."

From Bahu Begum's death at 86 in 1815 till he annexation of Oudh, the city of Faizabad fell into decay. ■

MS Singh added that they had dug a two-metre trench near the grave and had hit natural soil, meaning there was nothing beyond. They had also dug another trench near a ruined stone terrace, close to the grave, and had found nothing there either. "We intend to examine the well and if we find nothing we will just call it off. In any case, we aren't going to continue beyond March 25."

According to him other such treasure hunts had always ended in failures. He mentioned one at Bhuragarh, near Banda and another one at the Charkhari Fort. He said, as if it were the bane of his existence, that there were some politicians who believed that treasure troves by the dozen could be found with a little digging, but as far as he was concerned, the whole thing was absurd. He had not even seen the copper plate, because, to all intents and purposes, they were looking for archaeological finds and not treasure.

YUNUS BEG's tailoring shop is in a dilapidated backlane in Ameenabad, the old city of Lucknow. It consists of one small, low-ceilinged room with drab, scarred walls and a couple of battered Singers. He was not there when I arrived. His brother, Irshad, said he had gone to a nearby mosque for his afternoon prayers and would be back in half an hour. I asked him if he knew anything about the treasure and he said he was not interested in these things and continued to carefully iron a pair of very flared trousers, sitting on a wooden plank on the floor.

People walked in and out of the shop looking for "masterji" who seemed to have become a celebrity of sorts. They were impressed that a journalist had come all the way from Delhi to see him and said that I was lucky to find him in Lucknow at all, since he now spent most of his time in Faizabad. "Poor old Yunus," said a doctor who had been in Yunus' house at the time of the Income Tax raid, "he has really been working hard to find this treasure. But I'm sure they'll find something in the end, or why should the Government have agreed to look?"

Yunus arrived nearly three hours later. He is a short, dark, nondescript man with a dishevelled and unshaven air. He gave me the impression that he spent most of his time praying or thinking about the treasure. He told me, in surprisingly educated Urdu, that he was illiterate but had acquired a history book, and had someone else read to him the history of the Nawabs of Oudh. He had discovered from the book that Shuja-ud-daula had made Faizabad his capital and that since the treasure was originally his, he had surmised that it would also be buried at Faizabad and this theory had led him to the East-West grave. He added that he had made nearly 40 trips to Faizabad since the copper plate was confiscated in 1976. The plate had been handed down to him from his ancestor Sanahullah Beg.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Yunus, a man of religious as well as superstitious faith, said he believed he would find the treasure because a "peer" (holy man) whom he had once visited had predicted that he would one day be a very rich man. When I mentioned that the archaeological people didn't think they were likely to find anything he gazed thoughtfully into space for a few minutes, slowly chewing his paan, and said: "Do you believe in spirits?" Slightly taken aback, I said I didn't. He gazed on thoughtfully, continued chewing his paan, and said: "We Muslims believe in spirits, and I don't think these spirits will let just anybody find the treasure ...You have to have the right hands, you have to be destined, just as it was destiny that took me to Faizabad and made me find the right place." He then mumbled something about a "baba" who had told him that the treasure lay more in the direction of Ayodhya, but then quickly changed the subject, saying he could not give everything away.

I asked him what he intended to do with the money if it did show up, and he said that he would start off by sending 50,000 widows on haj and would then spend some money helping destitutes...Beyond that he had not thought.

Yunus, with help from two lawyers whom he has hired purely in connection with the treasure hunt, seemed to be more than aware of what his rights as chief informant were. He seemed to think he was being fobbed off with a mere 10 per cent when he could rightly claim 33 per cent. He could not explain how he had worked that out but said his lawyers could.

The Assistant Director of the UP State Archives, Mr Rajendra Bahadur, was one of the first people to visit the East-West grave. He went with Yunus and a representative of the Income Tax Department in January 1977 and made a report on the basis of which the hunt began.

He told me: "When we arrived there, I noticed that there was a hole in the side of the grave, so I threw a brick in...the other two were too frightened. Yunus said he was scared of ghosts, and the other man was a believer in Sai Baba... Anyway this brick went straight down and made a hollow sound as it hit the bottom, which made me think there was something strange about the grave, and that it was probably not a grave at all."

According to Mr Bahadur, there must have once been treasure buried there but it was unlikely to be still in the grave. In his report he mentioned that it would be worthwhile starting a hunt on the basis of the clues provided in the copper plate and also because the place where the East-West grave was found did appear to have once been a hunting lodge. History also records that Saadat Khan, the first of the Oudh nawabs, built a shikargah near Ayodhya.

The unusual East-West grave, which is believed to hold the treasure. Its digging was held up for fear of offending Muslim susceptibilities.

The other significant historical backing for the treasure hunt was given by the Income Tax Commissioner, Mr S. K. Lal. He said he had found a historical reference to Khurd Mahal, one of the queens of Ghazi-ud-din Haider, who is supposed to have buried treasure somewhere and not revealed the secret, despite considerable pressure from her stepson Naseeruddin Haider, to anyone except a 'faithful general'. It is possible that in the chaos that followed the arrest of Wajid Ali Shah, the copper plate somehow got into the hands of Yunus' soldier-ancestor.

FAIZABAD is a two-and-a-half-hour train ride from Lucknow. I used the journey to read through the district gazetteer which mentions Saadat Khan's shikargah and yet another possibility of a begum having needed to bury treasure. It did not mention her having done so, but said that Shuja-ud-daula's wife Bahu Begum and his mother were left a treasure estimated at Rs 2 crores. His son Asaf-ud-daula was very much in the clutches of the British and Warren Hastings had demanded from him huge sums of money, which he did not have. Hastings then assisted him in going to Faizabad and extorting the money from his mother, Bahu Begum.

The District Information Officer met me at the station and seemed quite surprised that there should be so much sudden interest in the treasure hunt. He himself had never been to the site.

Faizabad is a nondescript, unattractive town that has been built on the ruins of what must have been a really beautiful city. In almost every street there are the remains of Shuja-ud-daula's capital—a graceful arch, a forgotten mosque or a crumbling palace. His own palace, Digging in progress near Moti Mahal, Faizabad: will something turn up?

Moti Mahal, is now just a few walls and broken arches around a rice field and a small village. West of the former palace, towards Ayodhya, is the shikargah that has suddenly attracted so much attention. On the eastern side, separated by several narrow streets and bazaars, is the Khurd Mahal, which was Yunus' first major clue.

The graveyard, or former hunting lodge, is directly behind the Faizabad Industrial Training Institute. The East-West grave is next to a row of 11 stone graves, built in the conventional direction (North-South) and also about 250 years old. The East-West grave is twice the size of the others and on it is engraved a symbol which really does resemble a large, old-fashioned key, the lower point of

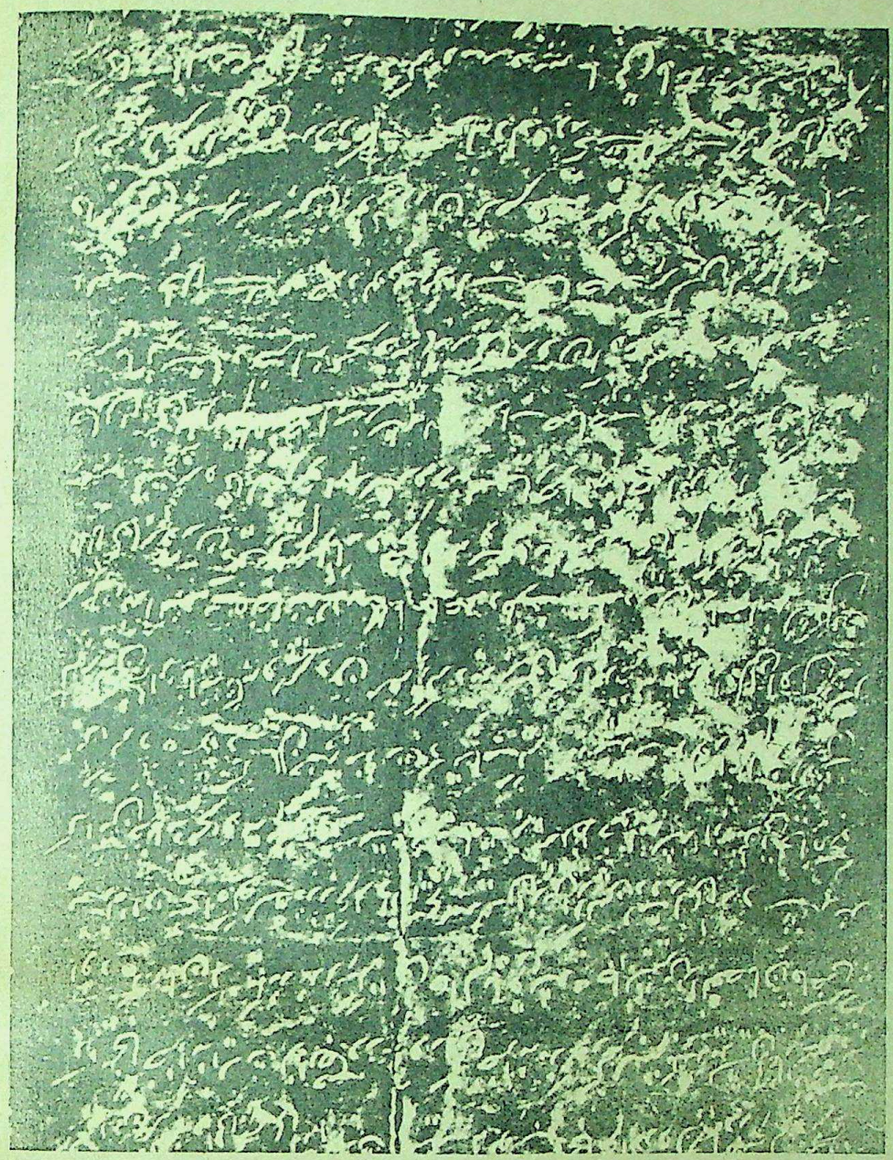
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The copper plate



Above : The Persian inscription on the copper plate which was seized from Yunus Beg's shop. Below : The translation of the inscription.

This treasure belongs to the rulers of Kharigarh. When Nawab Shuja-ud-daula conquered this place it became known to him that there existed underground a fabulous and vast treasure. He became determined to have the above said treasure dug out but when his men that had come with him from Oudh tried digging it up, their young and precious lives would be snatched by Death. Fifty goats were sacrificed and his Ministers advised him to be careful since the treasure belonged to Hindus and was probably being guarded by powerful spirits.

A pandit was found and asked what could be done to possess the treasure. The Pandit said that it was in his knowledge that the treasure was being guarded by Narsingh and Bhairavi and that any man who wished to possess would first have to make sacrifices to the gods. He suggested that statues of gold be made and sacrificed to the river Bhagirathi. They should be five 'ser', five 'tolas' and three 'masha' in weight. After this the treasure would belong forever to the man who made the sacrifice. If he refused, however, he would have to face terrible difficulties and lots of people would be killed. The Nawab Sahib made the sacrifice and took the treasure out of the ground. It was worth 24 crore rupees and was in the form of solid gold.

After Nawab Shuja-ud-daula, his descendants used the treasure until finally in the time of Naseeruddin Haider there was about Rs. 8 crores worth remaining. Then Khurd Mahal took it from the King and buried it in a Shikargah.

which points East.

North of the grave, under a peepal tree, is the whitewashed grave of a Sufi saint called Jungi Shaheed, where Yunus prays, when he comes to the site, almost every other day. West of the grave is a field full of wild flowers around a ruined terrace, near which the second trench has been dug and beyond this, in a guava orchard, is an old well which, local people believe, is connected to the grave by an underground tunnel. Not far from the well are two stone structures of the same period, which locals call the baroodkhana or ammunition dump. Around the entire area is a broken wall, which could well have enclosed the hunting lodge.

Mr Rajaram Pal, Exploration and Excavation Officer, the man in charge of the digging, confirmed that the place could well have been a shikargah. He also said that in his opinion, the grave was not a real grave and it had been used to conceal treasure, but he felt the treasure had been removed. In the 1.40-metre trench beside the grave he showed me a semicircular mark, about three feet wide, which he said indicated that the grave had been tampered with about fifty years ago. He added that they were not yet sure whether they could dig up the grave without offending local Muslim sentiment, but felt that they would probably have to, if they were to settle the matter once and for all.

He also emphasised that this was supposed to be an archaeological digging operation and not a treasure hunt but that they had found nothing much of archaeological value except a few bricks and some broken pieces of pottery. The bricks are large and could have belonged to a Kushan period temple, around the 2nd century B.C. The pottery pieces could date back to between 400 and 1,000 B.C. but according to Mr Pal, the 19-acre site, acquired by the State Government, was unlikely to yield a cultural sequence that might be of value. Twenty five workers and four professionals have been working at the site since February 25.

The graveyard, despite Yunus' fears, has not so far turned up with any visible ghosts, but one of the trenches did yield a human skull. So digging had to stop.

Local authorities seemed quite excited about the treasure hunt. The city magistrate told me that it was his "personal not official" opinion that something would be found. They also intended to grant the treasure-hunters permission to drain the well in which, if nothing else, they would probably find some dacoit loot, since the area was used by dacoits as a hideout about thirty years ago.

On the day I was leaving Faizabad, one of the diggers claimed to have found two more East-West graves, similar to the one Yunus found, beyond the well and this put the future of the hunt into even more of a balance. The archaeologists wanted to stop: the treasure hunters wanted to continue. ■

Pictures by Tania Shah

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

One man against an empire

Exclusive extracts from "Farewell the Trumpets" the trilogy by JAMES MORRIS, which explains why the Raj ended. Narrated here is the story of Jallianwalla Bagh and the role that Gandhi played in expelling the Raj.

IN THE MEANTIME, while this frail new empire came fitfully into being, a terrible event occurred in the greatest of the old possessions, India, providing one of those markets in time, like the Indian Mutiny or the Boer War, by which imperial patterns can best be traced. It was the massacre at Amritsar, which was recognized even then as the worst of all stains upon the imperial record.

It happened in a public enclosure, something between a square, a rubbish dump and a garden, called the Jallianwalla Bagh, in the very heart of Amritsar. This was a venerable city of the Punjab, and it contained the holiest shrine of the Sikhs, the Golden Temple, where the splendid major-domos of the faith, sashed and staved, all day long marshalled the pilgrims towards their holy places beside the pool. The city was a brown maze of narrow streets, mud-paved, always crowded, with open-fronted bazaar shops, and toppling merchants' houses, and foetid lanes with open drains. It was a highly-strung and volatile place, like most such sacred sites, and in April 1919 it was in a state of uproar. A wave of nationalist protest had been sweeping India, yet another epilogue to the Great War, and in Amritsar there had been riots and demonstrations, culminating in the deaths of five Englishmen and an assault upon an English woman missionary, riding her bicycle innocently through the town.

Nobody doubted that the British would retaliate, but by now the city was too inflamed to count the risk; though public assemblies had been forbidden, on April 13 some hundreds of people deliberately and defiantly crowded into the Jallianwalla Bagh for a political meeting. It was an ominous scene. The Bagh, surrounded by high walls, was sunk below the level of the surrounding streets, and overlooked on all sides by towering houses, and this gave it rather the feeling of a prison exercise yard, or a place of execution. There were only three entrances: two gates at the southern end, and a narrow passage, hardly wide enough for two men to pass, at the north-west corner.

Near this passage a patriotic orator, clambering on to a pile of rubble, began to read to the crowd a passionate poem of liberty. With every word the tension rose. The people swayed, stirred, sighed, and sometimes shouted responses: and the heat was so great, the place so jammed, the emotion of the occasion so high, that one could almost feel the heart of the crowd thumping there, and hear its excited breathing. This was elemental India—"life chained to an imperfect mind", as the poet Rabindranath Tagore described it—uncouth but innocent, too big for itself, furious when excited, docile and endearing when calm. It was a crowd in short, like most Indian crowds, assembled there partly out of conviction, partly in the hope of profit, partly for something to do. It was a dangerous crowd.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Suddenly there was a rumble of heavy automobile engines outside the walls, and people near the entrance passage could see, gleaming in the street outside, the brown steel shape of an armoured car. In a moment the corridor was full of armed men, pushing their way fiercely into the garden, and on to the higher ground behind the speaker. One or two were English officers, some were Baluchis, some were Gurkha riflemen, taut purposeful little mercenaries like tamed wild beasts, with rifles in their hands and kukris at their belts. In a matter of moments they were briskly deployed along the top of the garden, and were kneeling with loaded rifles facing the crowd.

The speaker did not at first notice the commotion behind him, but some of the crowd at once made for the gates, or took cover behind a small stone shrine that stood half-way down the garden. When the orator looked over his shoulder, and saw the soldiers kneeling there, he shouted to the crowd not to be alarmed—they would never shoot—they only had blank cartridges. Hardly had he spoken than a command rang out, and the impassive Gurkhas, obedient as machines, began to shoot at point-blank range into the crowd. The panic was frightful. People fought each other to get to the gates. They scrabbled at high walls, they trampled one another down, they rushed this way and that, they tried to hide, to take shelter behind each other, to lie flat on the ground. The Gurkhas were unmoved. Loading in their own time, they aimed especially at the two exits at the bottom of the garden, until the gates were jammed with dead and wounded Indians, and nobody else could escape.

THE shooting went on for about six minutes. When the soldiers withdrew again down the alley, and the armoured cars returned to their barracks with a reverberation of gear changes among the city lanes, 379 people had been killed, and another 1,500 wounded. The Bagh was littered with corpses and wounded men, blood trickled through the dust, and when dusk fell upon the carnage, and the last survivors had left the square terrified and aghast, women and children crept around the garden searching for their menfolk—turning bodies over, inspecting shattered faces, or simply squatting helplessly among the horror. Later the jackals and pi-dogs arrived: and since a curfew was in force, by ten o'clock there was scarcely a sound in the Jallianwalla Bagh, but the rustling and gnawing of these animals, the moaning of the wounded, and the echoing voices of the British patrols outside, tramping with cocked rifles through the shuttered streets.

Mohammad Ali Jinnah.

This was the tragedy of Amritsar, when Brigadier-General Reginald Dyer, CB, felt it his duty to make an object lesson of the demonstrators in the Jallianwalla Bagh. He was obliged to resign his commission, but he had many supporters, for he believed he was forestalling another Indian Mutiny. His superior officers condoned his action: the guardians of the Golden Temple enrolled him into the Brotherhood of Sikhs; the House of Lords passed a motion in his support; the readers of the Morning Post subscribed a £25,000 testimonial; in his attitude as in his orders he was only reflecting an innate sense of inadequacy that would presently debilitate the British in India. Still, as Winston Churchill said, it was an episode "without precedent or parallel in the modern history of the British Empire... an extraordinary event, an event which stands in singular and sinister isolation".

This was true: at least since 1858, the British had seldom behaved murderously towards their subjects, except in battle. But then the situation in India in the years after the Great War was itself without precedent or parallel. The truth was dawning on the British rulers of the sub-continent that their dominion, still absolute after so many generations, was foreseeably coming to an end. India was not like any other British possession, not a casual acquisition, or a hazily conceived name in a statistical chart, or a colony settled in by cousins, or even a fashionably recommended investment. India was part of the British truth, the other half of a mirror, "the stern step-mother of our race".

India had long since filtered back to Britain, too. Maharajahs were common figures of London society. Indian cricketers and polo players were popular performers. There had been Indian Members of Parliament, Indian university professors, even an Indian peer—Lord Sinha of Raipur, Privy Councillor and Freeman of the City of London. Monuments of the Indian connection were scattered across Britain, from war memorials to the country houses of nabobs, from village wells donated by benevolent Maharajahs to the cemetery, high on the Sussex hills, of the Indian soldiers who had died at their hospital in Brighton during the Great War. India was more than Empire. In an illogical way it was, to the British and to many Indians too, a part of England, a distant part that only a minority knew, but so interwoven with English destinies that the association seemed indivisible.

There was profit in it, even now. India was one of the most valuable fields of British investment—in 1914 some £800 million of capital was invested there. Rubber, coffee, indigo, tea, coal, jute, railways — all these Indian industries were very profitable to British financiers: jute mills in the 1920s were said to be making an annual profit of 90 per cent. India provided a sizable army for the imperial defence (paid for out of Indian revenues), not to speak of the prestige and authority which accrued from the mastery of this vast possession in the east, and generations of Englishmen had benefited directly from the Indian link.

BUT the relationship went much deeper. Most men entering the Indian services now had some family connection with the country, and families like the Rivett-Carnacs, the Maynes, the Ogilvies, the Birdwoods, the Lawrences or the Cottons felt themselves to be almost of dual nationality, so old were their links with India. The Anglo-Indians had long since idealized their purposes in the east, and evolved folk-myths of their own. They looked at the affairs of the sub-continent with a vision peculiar to themselves, part paternal, part loving, part contemptuous. They were selective in their affections. The simpler and more martial the Indian the better, and for music lovers

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

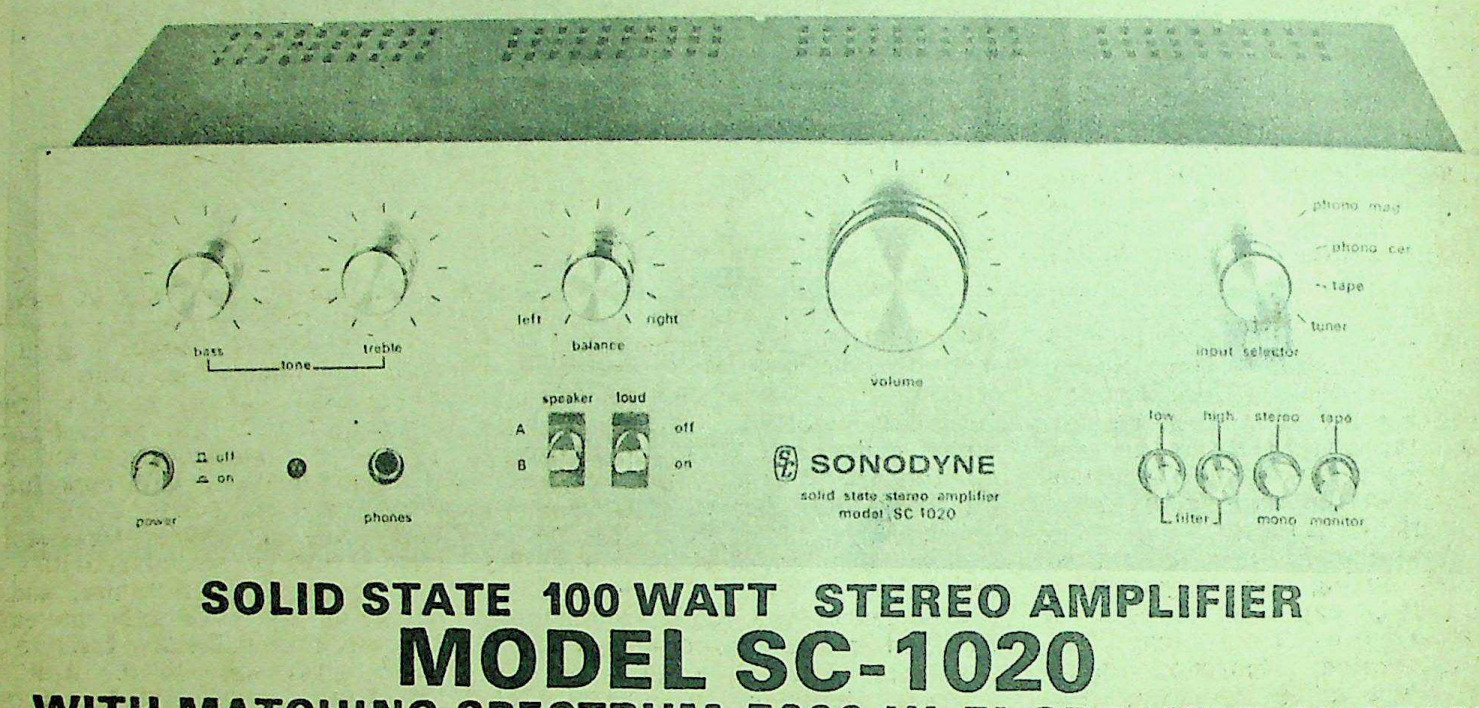
SONODYNE

offers matching with any international brand in performance & styling

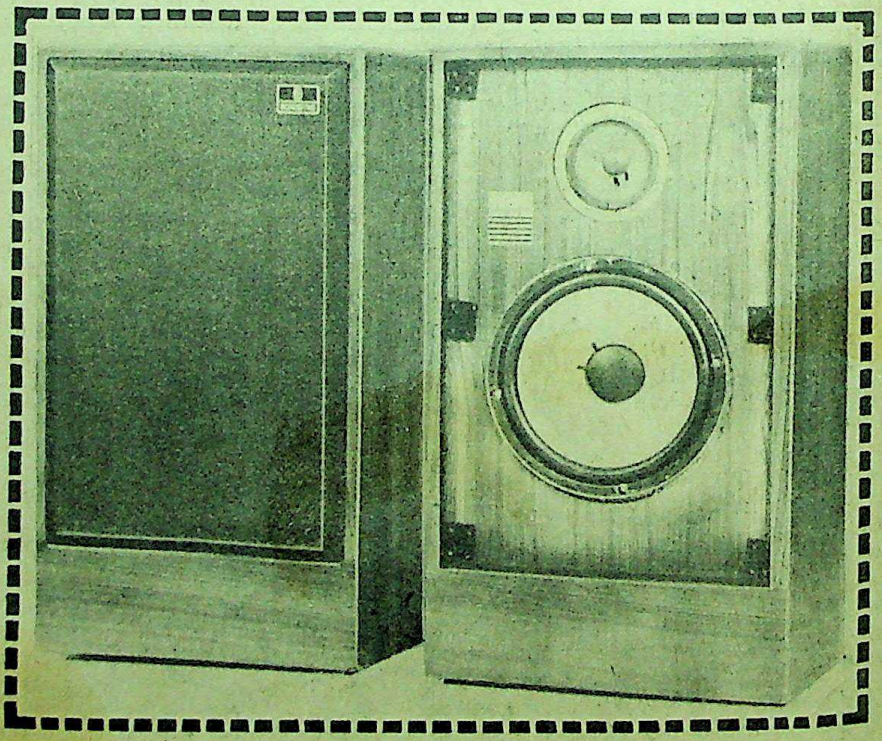


SOLID STATE 100 WATT STEREO AMPLIFIER

MODEL SC-1020

WITH MATCHING SPECTRUM-5000 HI-FI SPEAKER SYSTEM

The amplifier is based on latest low distortion direct coupled OCL circuit and housed in contemporary styled metal cabinet with solid aluminium dial and diamond finished aluminium knobs in champagne gold finish. Speakers are based on acoustical suspension design with cross-over network for smooth response over the entire audio spectrum.



SPECIFICATIONS

SC-1020 STEREO AMPLIFIER

TOTAL MUSIC POWER 100 WATTS
HARMONIC DISTORTION 0.5%
FREQUENCY RESPONSE 10 Hz to 40 KHz ± 3db
POWER BANDWIDTH 10 Hz to 30 KHz 3db
SPEAKER 8 OHMS, MAIN/REMOTE SPEAKERS

SPECTRUM-5000 SPEAKER SYSTEM

CROSS OVER 3000 Hz
UNITS 8" WOOFER, 3" TWEETER
ENCLOSURE ACOUSTIC SUSPENSION.
VOLUME 28 LITRES.

Manufactured by : SONODYNE ELECTRONICS CO. PVT. LTD.

Anta/SC-152/79

Distributors for Andhra Pradesh : SRI RAMA CORPORATION, P.B. 303, Eluru Road, Vijayawada 520 002, RAM MOHAN ENTERPRISES, 25 Lalbahadur Stadium, Fatehmaidan, Hyderabad 500 001. Distributor for Assam and N.E.C. Area : BHARALI BROTHERS PVT. LTD. Panbazar, Gauhati-781 001. Distributor for Delhi, Haryana, Himachal Pradesh, Punjab and J & K : ALPHA RADIOS, 1900 Chandni Chowk, Delhi 110 006. Distributor for Goa : CASTELLINO ELECTRICALS, Opposite Fatima Convent, Margao, Goa. Distributor for Karnataka : SEVEN HILLS, Bhadravati Building, 812 J.C.Road, Bangalore 560 002. Distributor for Kerala : SRI RAMA CORPORATION, 37/1124, Old Railway Station Road, Ernakulam, Cochin 682 011. Distributor for Maharashtra and Gujrat : ASSOCIATED ELECTRICAL AGENCIES, 84 Dr. Annie Basant Road, Worli, Bombay 400 018. Distributor for Tamil Nadu : ASSOCIATED ELECTRICAL AGENCIES, General Patters Road, Madras 600 002. Distributor for U.P., M.P. and Rajasthan : TIME & TUNE, 17/33, M.G. Marg, Civil Lines, Allahabad.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

the more rural the countryside. Many of them went through life in a profound condition of love-hate, detesting the filth, disease and corruption of India as a whole, passionately devoted to their own chosen aspects of it. Nobody pleased an Anglo-Indian more than an upright Rajasthani soldier of the old school : nobody repelled him more absolutely than some young law graduate of Bengal, with his progressive ideas and his never quite perfect English. In fact the British were still strangers in the land, for their knowledge of Indian culture was seldom profound, even after generations in the country, and they saw the great sub-continent only through their own experiences. The Indian totality was as baffling to them as to anyone else—"I felt", wrote one more than usually frank British District Officer, describing his relationship with his subjects, "like a man wandering about with a dim lantern in the dark."

Field Marshall Wavell greets Lord Mountbatten on his arrival in India.

By the 1920s the ancient association was changing. The British were losing interest in their Empire, and there was a falling-off of recruitment for the Indian services. The Indians were restive and disillusioned, and joined the nationalist movement in their hundreds of thousands. A million Indians had served the British during the Great War, and everybody expected concessions of independence in return. The moderates wanted Dominion status, like the white settler colonies, the extremists wanted to be quit of the Empire altogether. They were angry and disappointed when all the British conceded was the system called dyarchy, which certainly gave Indians a far greater share in government, but was a long way from liberty. The British genuinely thought dyarchy a great step forward — "the war had compelled England", wrote Lionel Curtis of it, "to recognize that the principles for which she was fighting... must be extended to Asia and Africa." The Indians thought it a miserable reward for their loyalty, or alternatively an inadequate concession to their demands.

So a sense of impending change came over India, in the years after the Great War, not unlike the rumours and superstitions that had swept through the country before the Indian Mutiny. "The people are restless", reported a percipient Deputy Commissioner to his superiors in 1918, "and discontented and ripe for the revolution" : and in that very year the revolution had begun. The Rowlatt Acts, giving the British Government almost unlimited powers against Indian subversives, were its spark. Mahatma Gandhi was its prophet.

We last saw Gandhi toiling down the slopes of Spion Kop as a humble and loyal stretcher-bearer, but since then he had become a celebrity. The son of a palace official in the minuscule Gujarati princedom of Porbandar, on the shore of the Arabian Sea, he had been trained as a lawyer in London, and had briefly Anglicized himself, dressing in high white collar and dark suit, cultivating the art of small talk, even learning the violin, before gravitating to South Africa as legal adviser to an Indian firm in Durban. There he had taken to politics, by way of the grievances of the Indian community, and had become well known as a champion of Indian rights and self-respect. Returning to India in 1914, he plunged at once into the furious world of nationalism, arguing first for Indian Home Rule, later for complete independence, and reverted to his Indian origins. Now he dressed altogether Indian style, professed a frugal vegetarianism, and year by year prepared himself for the vatic role he was to play in the struggle for Indian liberty.

Nobody then, nobody later, knew quite what to make of Gandhi — Mahatma Gandhi, Gandhi the Pure Soul, Gandhi of the round disarming spectacles and the toothless smile. He shared with T.E. Lawrence the quality of enigma, so that he seemed to one man a saint, to another a hypocrite, and sometimes seemed to exchange the roles from one day to the next. A very small man, 5 foot 4 inches, and slight to the point of emaciation, he had vivid black eyes, spoke very pure English with a vestigial South African accent, and enthralled nearly everyone with his suggestion of almost unearthly wisdom. "The unknown looked out at us through his eyes", said the most wordly of his disciples, Jawaharlal Nehru, and Lloyd George reported that when Gandhi visited him at his home in Surrey, an unknown black cat bounded through the window to settle on Gandhi's lap—it left when the Mahatma left, and was never seen again.

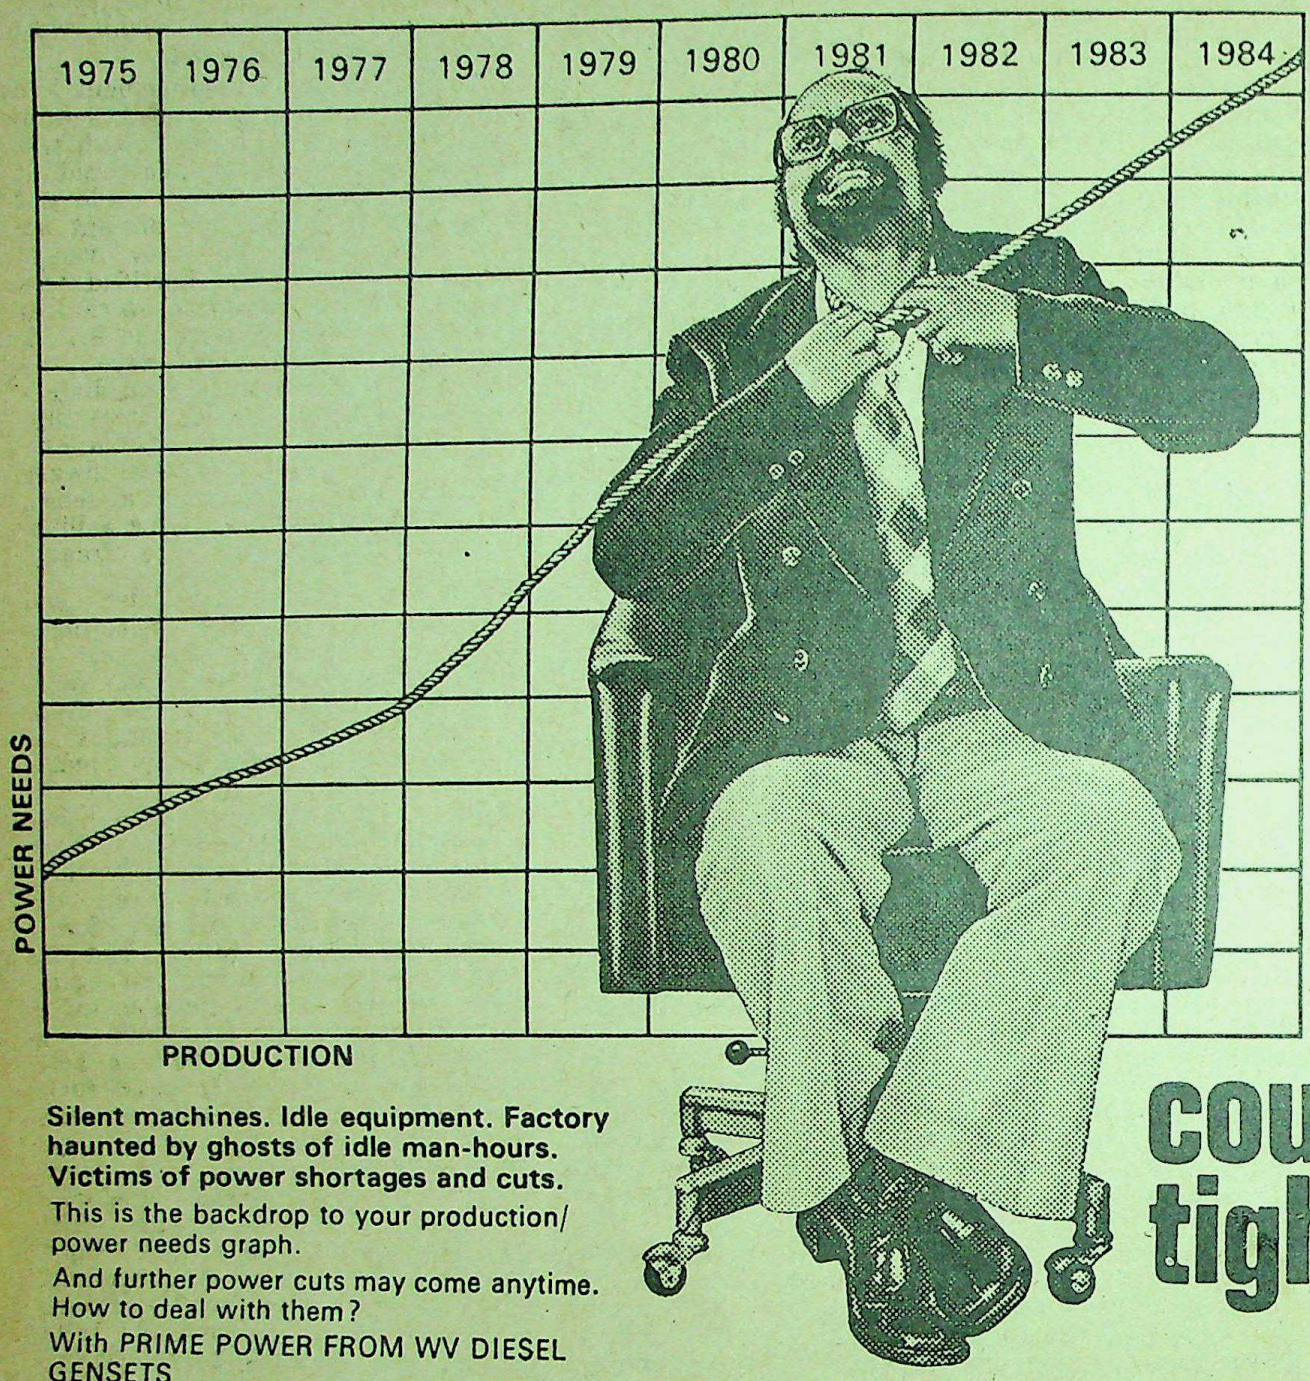
Gandhi was sweet-natured, but sly. He was astute, calculating and self-conscious in others. Like Lawrence again, he well understood the value of publicity. Like many another Indian guru, he veiled his shrewdness in platitudes and truisms, and sometimes cheapened it with opportunism. There was something sterile about him. Not only did he foreswear, in middle life, all sexual activities, but he had no eye for nature, and his equipoise was essentially uncreative. His repeated political fasts to the death never were to the death, as the British wryly noted, and there was to him an irritating element of crankiness and faddism, not to mention sanctimony—"I cannot free myself from that subtlest of temptations", he once wrote in all solemnity, "the desire to serve." "The saint has left our shores", General Smuts wrote when Gandhi left South Africa for the last time, "I sincerely hope for ever" : yet Smuts fell beneath his charm too, for even at his most contumacious Gandhi remained a being of consummate serenity and appeal—"like a good night's sleep", is how one contemporary described the effect of his presence.

THOUGH Gandhi came to command a universal audience, he was specifically a man of his time, place and opportunity. His time was the first half of the twentieth century, the century of disillusionment; his place was an India still primitive and illiterate, but given new cohesion by modern communications and political ideas; his opportunity was the waning confidence of a generally kindly, certainly not sadistic Empire. "We all feel", Lord Minto the Viceroy had written in 1907, "that we are mere sojourners in the land, that we are only camping, and on the march". Gandhi's time had come.

He was an Anglophile. "Hardly ever have I known anybody", he wrote of himself in his youth, "to cherish such loyalty as I did to the British Constitution...I vied with Englishmen in loyalty to the throne."

CC-0. In Public Domain. U.P. State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



PRATIBHA-78-195

This noose could get tighter and tighter

Silent machines. Idle equipment. Factory haunted by ghosts of idle man-hours. Victims of power shortages and cuts.

This is the backdrop to your production/ power needs graph.

And further power cuts may come anytime. How to deal with them?

With PRIME POWER FROM WV DIESEL GENSETS

Any genset may give you immediate relief. But the WV sets solve not only your immediate problems but also take care of your needs

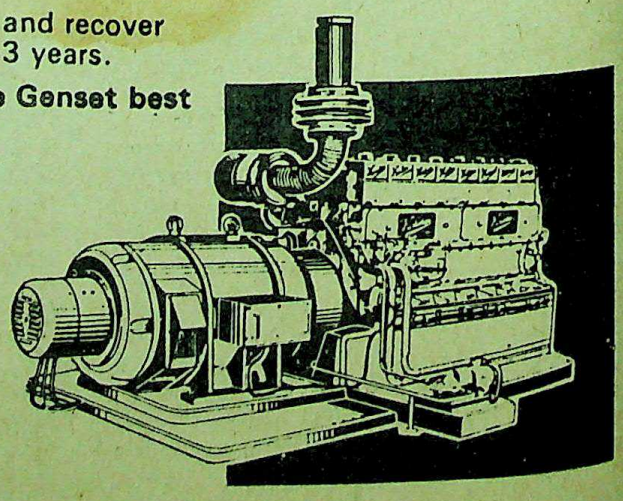
Here is what you can get from the WV sets:

* Engines specially designed for prime power generation. Suitable for 24 hour continuous operation.
* Wide range : 160 KVA, 230 KVA, 310 KVA, 365 KVA
* Slow speed reliability; longer life; economical operation.
* Special governors to match sudden, heavy, inductive furnace loads.
* Over 20% ultimate savings through investment allowance
* IDBI Deferred payment facility available.
* Countrywide network for pre-and-post sales service.

Genset buying represents a long term captial investment.

Plan NOW with WV engines and recover your investment in less than 3 years.

May we help you select the Genset best suited to your needs?



Kirloskar

Kirloskar Oil Engines Ltd

Laxmanrao Kirloskar Marg, Khadki, Pune 411 003

Offices at : Gauhati, Patna, Calcutta, Lucknow, Cochin, New Delhi, Rajkot.

Ⓡ Registered user- Kirloskar Oil Engines Ltd. Pune 411 003

Sold & serviced by :

Escorts Limited

Bombay, Delhi, Madras, Calcutta, Cochin, Pune, Bangalore, Secunderabad, Visakhapattanam.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

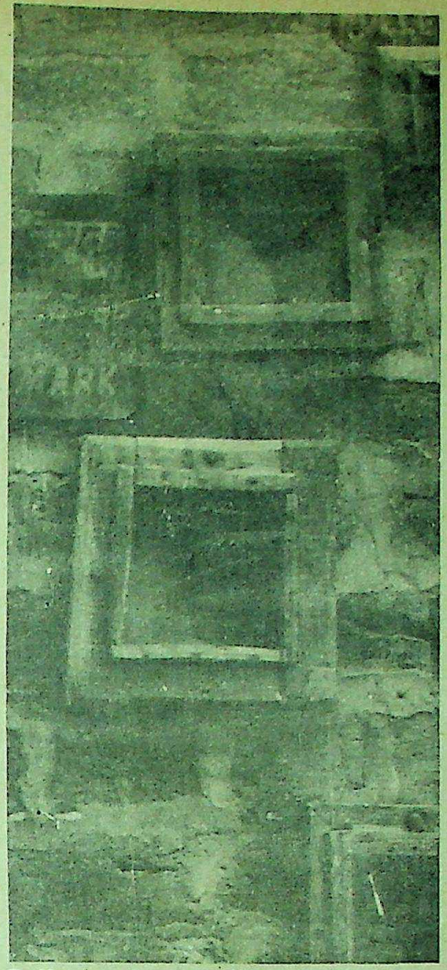
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

He was decorated for his courage in the Boer War, and for years continued to declare his devotion, if not to the British Empire, at least to the British: "The Emperorship must go, but I should love to be an equal partner with Britain, sharing her joys and sorrows." In many ways indeed his ideas were those, orientally tempered, of an English gentleman, and he often Anglicized Indian philosophical techniques. One of his favourite poems was Kipling's If, one of his favourite hymns was Newman's Lead, Kindly Light. Even politically, he was often attuned to the public school spirit. "True democracy", he once wrote, "is not inconsistent with a few persons representing the spirit, the hope and the aspirations of those whom they claim to represent"—Lord Milner's views exactly.

Over the years his ideas of national independence became fused with thoughts about human dignity, raising the struggle for Indian emancipation to a level beyond the vision of the Easter Rising heroes, or the groping patriots of Nyasaland. For Gandhi Indian nationhood was only an aspect of human fulfilment, applicable to all, and it was lucky for him that the British in India were, by and large, tolerant and sympathetic rulers, so that he was able to work out his moralities on a political stage, without being shot on the spot.

Gandhi's revolutionary formula was a conglomeration of foibles, dogmas and contradictions—political ambition, social theory, religious precept, racial pride, personal intuition. He rationalized it all into a single metaphysic, and called it satyagraha—truth-force. If imperialism was essentially a glorification of force, satyagraha was just the opposite—it postulated, Gandhi said, "the conquest of an adversary by suffering in one's own person". It was indiscriminate in application. By its means Gandhi pulled together all the separate threads of Indian discontent, social, economic, political, historical, and wove them into a radical movement of incalculable power. Satyagraha was the means: the end was swaraj, independence, which was as much a personal as a national condition. India could not be herself while aliens ruled her, and Indians could not be altogether themselves.

To the Indian masses Gandhi became semi-divine. They believed him capable of miraculous feats, flying or vanishing, and at the peak of his powers his hold over their emotions was absolute. Women of all ranks became passionate nationalists; an army of children, the Monkey Army, became the couriers and scavengers of the movement, like the Fianna Boys in Ireland. The people did not understand him, though, and he did not always understand them. He was repeatedly warned, by friends as by enemies, that satyagraha, hazily grasped by a vast illiterate populace, would inevitably lead to violence; nevertheless, when the Rowlatt Acts were announced, he launched a nation-wide protest against them.



Bullet marks of Jallianwala Bagh

The result was savagery all over India. Everywhere the mob came out in Gandhi's name, breaking windows in Calcutta, destroying offices in Bombay, molesting the missionary in Amritsar.

The British seriously thought they might have a second Mutiny on their hands, and responded with massive troop movements, arrests, curfews and prohibitions. "I have made a Himalayan miscalculation", Gandhi said, surveying the bloodshed and misery that swept across the country: and in Amritsar General Dyer gave the order to fire.

Gandhi recognized that force as such could not expel the Raj. British firepower was still overwhelming in India, and there were many more Dyers ready to obey their inherited instincts of command. Other revolutionary methods were needed. Most Indian rebels appealed to the past—Gandhi looked to the future. "He was like a powerful current of fresh air that made us stretch ourselves and take deep breaths", wrote Nehru. Until Gandhi, Nehru said, fear was dominant in India—fear of the army, of the police, of prison, of unemployment, of starvation, of usury, of landlords and agents. Fear kept things as they were, and allowed the British to retain control. Gandhi changed all that. He deliberately made use of India's disadvantages, her poverty and backwardness, to reinforce his own methods, and so very soon became master of the Indian political scene. The Indian National Congress closed its ranks behind him, and the constitutionalists who wished to progress more sedately towards more limited goals were left impotent and discredited.

Though his own misjudgement had caused it, Amritsar convinced Gandhi that compromise with the British was now impossible—sinful, he said at the time. General Dyer could not have guessed it, but his prompt action in the Bagh that day was a signal of retreat. So horrified was the world by the massacre, so shaken and even remorseful were the British themselves, so infuriated were the Indians, that swaraj immediately assumed a new force, and from that movement until the end of the Empire, the true initiative was always with the Indians. In a moral sense, thanks to the sacrifice in the Jallianwalla Bagh, they were free already.

IT was to prove a muddled and ambiguous progress. Sometimes the impetus seemed to wane, and the British thought the worst was over. Sometimes Gandhi withdrew from politics, devoting his energies to more eccentric causes—his movement for the spinning of cloth, for instance, which, with its preposterous cameos of plump financiers and bony politicians sitting ungainly at their spinning-wheels, struck even the devoted Nehru as ludicrous. Sometimes non-violence failed, and the Indian masses burst into riot again. They were convulsive times in India, not because anything solid was achieved, but perhaps because both sides were beginning to sense their own strengths and weaknesses—the Indians riding the tide of history, but weakened by their own feuds and rivalries, the British gradually relinquishing the will to rule. The balance was changing, and if people did not always realize it consciously, unknowingly they responded, British and Indians alike. Once in the 1920s Gandhi was arrested, to be charged with subversion, and the puzzled, almost pained sensitivity of the presiding magistrate, Robert Broomfield, exactly reflects the bewilderment of the time. The case was heard in the Circuit House at Ahmedabad, in Gandhi's own province of Gujarat. This was not a court-room, but a house used by visiting judges and officials, and was chosen because it stood on the outskirts of the city, away from the mob and close to the British cantonment. The court was simply a room, and though European policemen guarded the door, and a clutch of British officials sat in the front seats, and Sir Thomas Strangman the Advocate-General had come especially from Bombay to conduct the prosecution, still the atmosphere was informal. There was no dock or witness-box. Most of the spectators wore the white homespun of the patriotic movement, and when Gandhi entered the room, wearing only a loin-cloth himself, they stood to their feet in his honour.

To be continued

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

HMV

Springbloom

A bouquet of exciting international LP releases

Spring's here ! And HMV's back with a whole new package of happy and exciting sounds.
Racy Rock, pacey Pop or just plain danceable Disco...take home the music of springtime !
Visit your local HMV dealer today.

BOHANNON'S BEST
Hamilton Bohannon (London)

DEVIL'S GUN
C. J. & Co (Atlantic)

RHYTHM OF LIFE
Afro Cuban Band (Arista)

GOODY GOODY
Goody Goody (Atlantic)

WORLD OF TODAY
Supermax (Atlantic)

Instrumental

MORE GOLDEN GREATS
The Ventures (United Artists)

FRANCK POURCEL MEETS ABBA
Franck Pourcel (EMI)

Vocal

LET'S KEEP IT THAT WAY
Anne Murray (Capitol)

PAUL ANKA...HIS BEST
Paul Anka (United Artists)

LIGHT MY FIRE
Baccara (RCA)

WINGS GREATEST Wings (MPL)

LIVING IN THE U.S.A.
Linda Ronstadt (Elektra)

BLAM !!
The Brothers Johnson (A & M)

SOME GIRLS
The Rolling Stones (EMI)

BAND TOGETHER
Rare Earth (Motown)

HMV

Released by
The Gramophone Company of India Limited

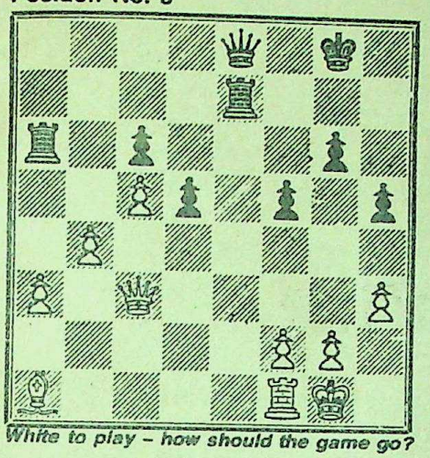
GC 3146A

UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

chess

Position No. 3



White to play – how should the game go?

Continuation of Position No. 1

This was a position that occurred in a game, Schulman-Sandler, played at Baldonnaix last year: r5k1; 5ppp; 3R1P2; 2Q5; 1pP1p3; 1q6; 5P1P; 6K1.

White won by 1. Q—QR5, R—KB1; 2. Q—KN5, resigns, since mate is inevitable after 2. . , P—N3; 3. Q—R6.

The pendulum motion of the Queen is a neat blending of two basic themes: (1) mate on the back rank and (2) mate with Q and pawn on N7.

Chapter of errors

When we win what we think is a good game of chess, we cherish the fond illusion that it is comparatively free from errors, at least as far as we are concerned. In actual practice the occasions on which such games are flawless are as rare as the phoenix.

I used to believe that the great masters, at any rate, played games that were faultless; but after watching the world championship match this year between Karpov and Korchnoi in the Philippines I came to the conclusion that they were just as fallible as the rest of us. Neither grandmaster nor international master seem to be able to escape from this blight of blunders. As for ordinary national masters, consider the following bright game that was played in an international tournament at Leipzig this year. Both the players concerned are classed as national masters, the winner from East Germany and the loser from Cuba.

White, T. Casper. Black, L. Bueno.
Sicilian Defence.

1. P—K4, P—QB4; 2. N—QB3, N—QB3; 3. P—KN3, P—KN3; 4. B—N2, B—N2; 5. P—Q3, P—Q3; 6. N—R3, P—K4; 7. P—B4, KN—K2; 8. O—O, O—O; wrongly allowing the enemy BP to advance; correct was 8. . , P x P.

9. P—B5, P—B3; a disagreeable necessity; White gets an overwhelming attack after
9. . , P x P; 10. P x P, B x P; 11. R x B, N x R; 12.B—K4.

10. P—KN4. This obvious move is nevertheless not the best move which was simply 10. P x P.

10. . . , P—KN4. Nor, as will be seen, is this the best. Correct was 10. . , N—Q5; to which White intended replying 11. N—K2.

11. N x P, P x N; 12. B x P, P—KR3; 13. B—K3, N—Q5; 14. P—KR4, P—Q4; realising that passive defence will not do against the threatened pawn advance Black decides to counter-attack. But his attack is practically still-born.

15. Q—Q2, N(Q5) x KBP. A rather better chance was 15. . , N x QBP; 16. Q x N, P—Q5; 17. P—N5, P x P; 18. P x P, P x B; 19. P—B6, B—K3; when, however, White still has an advantage after 20. P x B.

16. KP x N, Q—Q3; 17. P—B6! the start of a fine final combination.

17. . , R x P; 18. R x R. B x R; 19. Q—B2, P—Q5; if 19. . , P—N3; 20. R—KB1.

20. N—K4, P x B; 21. Q—B3, Q—K3; 22. N x B ch, K—R1; 23. R—KB1, P—K5; 24. Q x P(K3), N—N1; 25. P x P, Q—K4; 26. N x N, K x N; 27. Q x RP, B x P; 28. R—B6, B—R4; 29. R—B5, Q—Q5 ch; 30. K—R2, resigns.

HARRY GOLOMBEK

bridge

IN Problem 1 of the Christmas Competition North-South were vulnerable and the bidding was:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
1 ♠	No	2 ♣	2 ♦
2 ♥	No	2NT	3 ♦
?

South held: ♠ A Q 7 4 2
♥ K Q 10 6 5
♦ 4
♣ K 3

If you were marking a bidding competition, how many points out of 5 would you award to (a) Pass, (b) Double, (c) 3♥, (d) 3NT?

You are not minimum, and to pass is a bit feeble. Partner may not have a sound double and the most likely result is that you will defend against Three Diamonds, one or two down.

You can probably beat Three Diamonds, but East has heard the bidding and you cannot expect a big penalty; however, it is better to double than to pass.

Three Hearts would not be a mistake exactly, but partner will take it as competitive and may well have nothing more to say.

The King of partner's suit is a significant card, and I think you should try for the vulnerable game. If East had passed, you would have bid 3NT without hesitation.

The unlisted bid of Four Hearts, proposed by some competitors, is poor: partner might be quite weak in both majors.

My marking is: 3NT – 5; Double – 3; Three Hearts – 2; Pass – 2.

In Problem 2 the score was game all and the bidding went:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
1 ♥	No	1 ♠	No
2 ♦	No	2 ♥	No
?

South held: ♠ 4
♥ A Q 7 4 2
♦ K 9 7 4 3
♣ A Q

How many points out of 5 would you award to (a) Pass, (b) 2NT, (c) 3D, (d) 3H?

You must recognise here that partner has responded at the One level and given simple preference: he may be quite weak, with little in the red suits. The doubleton A Q in the unbid suit is not particularly good for no-trumps, and any advance would be unwise.

My marking: Pass – 5; 2NT – 2; Three Hearts – 1; Three Diamonds (more encouraging than the others) – 0.

TERENCE REESE

stamps

Because the postal services in the Ottoman Empire before the First World War were so slow and inefficient, several European Powers opened their own post offices, usually attached to consulates, where tourists and traders could post their mail. France had nearly 40 such offices, including four in Egypt. Those in Cairo and Suez operated only for a brief period in the mid-nineteenth century but the Alexandria and Port Said offices, opened in 1830 and 1867 respectively, did not close until 1931. At first they used ordinary French stamps but they were later provided with special stamps in designs similar to those of contemporary French definitives. This 2-centimes Alexandria stamp is one of a long series issued in 1902.

C.W. HILL

quiz

QUESTIONS

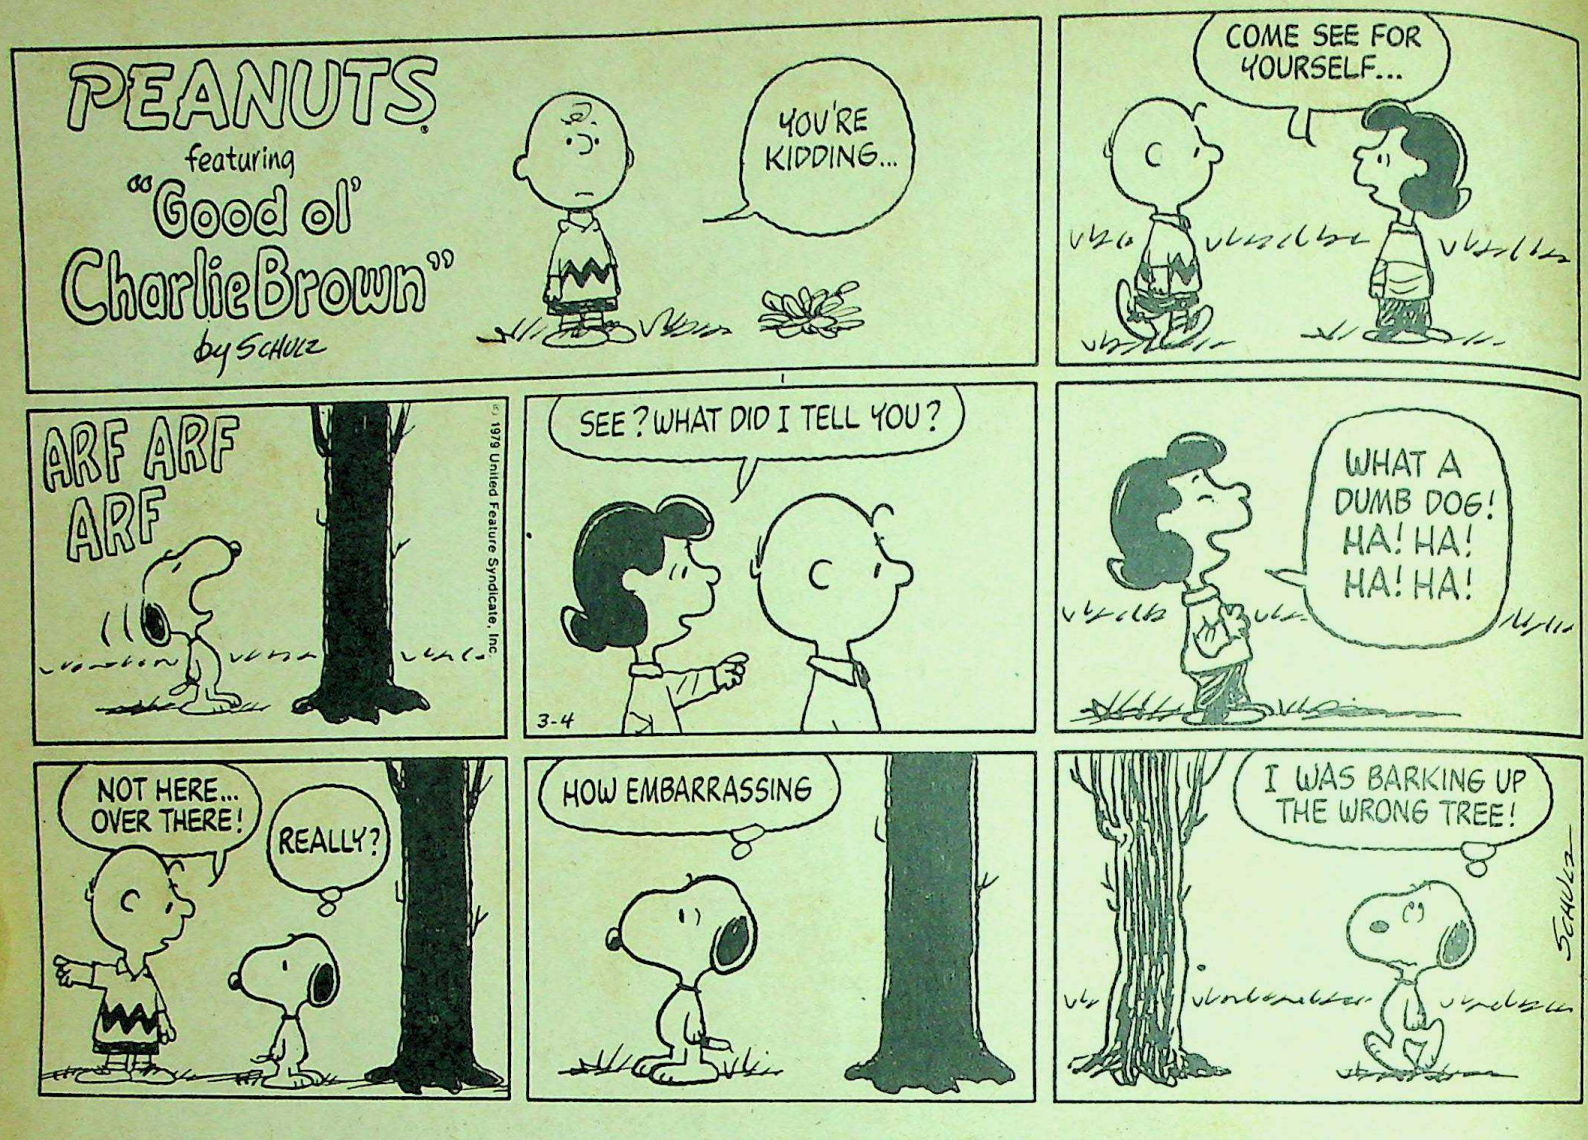
1. Who won the 1977 Nobel Prize for Literature ?
2. What would a group of bears be called ?
3. What is the meaning of "absit omen"?
4. What was Mjollnir in Norse mythology ?
5. Which English queen was known as "Bloody Mary"?
6. What is the origin of the name of the state of Pennsylvania in the USA ?
7. What is Op Art ?
8. Who directed the film "One flew over the cuckoo's nest"?
9. What is P. G. Wodehouse's full name ?
10. On which day did the ship Titanic sink ?

ANSWERS

1. Vicente Aleixandre, a Spanish surrealist poet.
2. Sleuth of bears.
3. It means "Hope this is no bad luck".
4. It is the magic hammer of Thor.
5. She was Mary I who ruled from 1553-1558.
6. It means "Penn's Woodland" and named in honour of Admiral Sir William Penn.
7. It is the 1960s art movement known as Optical Painting.
8. Milos Forman.
9. Pelham Grenville Wodehouse.
10. On April 15, 1912.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



X-raying the mummy

This 2,000-year-old Ancient Egyptian mummy of the last Century BC of the Egyptian priest Anch-Hapi was X-rayed at the municipal hospital in Hildesheim, near Hanover, Federal Republic of Germany. Dr Arne Eggebrecht (r), curator of the town's Romer-Pelizaus Museum, ordered the layer-by-layer X-ray to learn more about the priest's age and cause of death. Radiologists and archaeologists are convinced Anch-Hapi was the father of Nesmin, whose mummy is on exhibit in Liverpool, England, and further discovries are awaited.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Beginning April 15

This week the Sun is in Aries, Jupiter alone is in Cancer, Saturn and Rahu are in Leo, Uranus is in Libra and Neptune is in Scorpio. Venus and Kethu are in Aquarius and Mars and Mercury are in Pisces. The Moon will be moving through Sagittarius and Capricorn from Scorpio.

ARIES (March 21 — April 20) Be careful in the first part of the week since there are chances of loss through trickery and deception in business deals. Your initiative in your job will win the respect of your employers. Although, this week will be financially gainful, do not lend, borrow or stand guarantor. Avoid doubtful love adventures. A lot of social activity in the weekend is in the offing. Some of you will gain a renewed interest in the arts and the occult. Good dates: 18, 19 and 21. Lucky numbers: 3 and 9. Favourable direction: South.

TAURUS (April 21 — May 22) Your affairs make great headway in the early part of the week. Later, an elderly female relative will cause anxiety as regards health. However, there is nothing to worry about. This week, on the whole, promises to be a happy and successful one in which you will gain popularity and fortune. Stellar influences bring unforgettable events of a happy nature into your life. Good dates: 15, 17, 20 and 21. Lucky numbers: 3 and 6. Favourable direction: West.

GEMINI (May 23 — June 21) Do not be despondent if you have domestic worries. However, the present condition will not continue for long. Happier and better financial conditions are forecast. Be tactful in your dealings with elders and those in authority. Act on your own intuitions since these will pay in the long run. Be careful while signing legal documents. Intellectual expansion is in the offing. Good dates: 16, 17, 19 and 21. Lucky numbers: 1 and 5. Favourable direction: South-west.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) This week there is danger of great financial losses. So, avoid all types of speculation. The period is not favourable for dealings in property matters. Do not fritter away your financial gains on unimportant things. Intellectual activities are forecast. An elderly female relative will help you. Good dates: 19, 20 and 21. Lucky numbers: 2 and 7. Favourable direction: West.

LEO (July 23 — August 22) You are suffering from fits of depression. Try your best to overcome them, be relaxed and try to be in cheerful company. Be careful in your correspondence with friends and business partners. Take the advice of elders and those in authority. Attend to your vocation. Take care of your own health and that of elder family members. Good dates: 17, 19 and 21. Lucky numbers: 9 and 11. Favourable direction: North-west.

VIRGO (August 23 — September 22) Utilise the favourable stellar portents now in progress. There will be some annoyance because of difference of opinion with those in authority. Secret matters progress well. The weekend will be noticeable for social activities. Do not squander money on doubtful love adventures, unnecessary luxuries and worthless friends. Take the advice of elders. Good dates: 15, 16, 18 and 19. Lucky numbers: 3 and 5. Favourable direction: South.

LIBRA (September 23 — October 22) This is an auspicious week. Business ventures will be successful. You will gain through strangers and travel. Guard against quarrels and accidents, and curb impetuosity. Avoid straining yourself. A short journey is indicated and gains will be enjoyed. Your health will be good. Avoid gambling of all kinds. Good dates: 15, 16, 20 and 21. Lucky numbers: 4 and 6. Favourable direction: North and East.

SCORPIO (October 23 — November 21) This week promises to be good as regards domestic and business matters. Do not be carried away by your emotions. Avoid extravagance. Romance is in the offing but beware of deception. Take care of your own health and that of elderly women in the family. Promotions are in the offing in the latter part of the week. Act on the advice of elders. Good dates: 17, 19 and 20. Lucky numbers: 4 and 7. Favourable direction: North-west.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22 — December 22) Care should be exercised in business; some amount of financial success is in the offing. You will be praised by your friends and relatives. New friendships as well as revival of old associations are forecast. A love affair and possible marriage is presaged. Avoid physical strain. Good dates: 16, 18 and 21. Lucky numbers: 1 and 9. Favourable direction: South-east.

CAPRICORN (December 23 — January 20) This is going to be an important and exciting week for you. Unexpected good fortune is forecast. Despite some annoyance, beneficial changes are in the offing. Elders retard progress and may cause concern. Marriage and courtship are in the offing. Take care of your own health as well as that of elderly relatives. Good dates: 15, 16, 17 and 20. Lucky numbers: 5 and 10. Favourable direction: West.

AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) You will enjoy success and happiness this week. However, take care of your health; eat regularly. Peruse all correspondence. An unexpected journey will be followed by financial benefits. Do not make hasty changes as regards your profession. Secret matters of the heart progress well. A marriage in the family is forecast. Good dates: 16, 17 and 21. Lucky numbers: 4 and 8. Favourable direction: West.

PISCES (February 20 — March 20) You will realise your ambitions. Happiness and financial success is forecast this week. However, watch expenditure. Intellectual and business expansion is in the offing. Go ahead with your plans. Domestic matters progress well. Young people and children help you. A short journey is in the offing. Good dates: 15, 16, 17 and 19. Lucky numbers: 3 and 9. Favourable direction: North.

M. B. RAMAN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

VARIETY

this india

prize rs. 30 for the entry given first

MARCH 1979 will open a new chapter for India's defence forces with three service chiefs drawn from three religions. General Malhotra, Air Marshal Latif and Admiral Pereira are the Indian military's Amar, Akbar, Antony in that same order —Imprint (Jagdish C. Madan, New Delhi)

BANGALORE: A jukta (horse cart) ouraced a BTS bus in an 'unofficial race' conducted by the District Citizens' Association. The jutka which left the Malleswaram Bus Terminus along with a bus operating on Route no. 14, reached the destination, Banasnankari, 23 minutes before the bus. The jutka which took a straight route stopped at three traffic signal points while the bus which plied along its regular circuitous route stopped at five traffic signal points. Besides the bus skipped 10 of its 37 scheduled stops and made five 'unauthorised stops'—Deccan Herald (Arasu, Bangalore)

AMRITSAR : The greed for more dowry landed the mother-in-law, husband and two sisters-in-law of a young woman in the police lock-up after they had allegedly tried to burn her to death. Fortunately the young woman's life was saved. Twenty-year-old Rita told the police in the emergency ward of the local hospital that her two sisters-in-law, Kanchan and Sushma, had dragged her by the hair into the courtyard of her house where her mother-in-law drenched her with kerosene. Her husband then set her alight... Rita was married to Om Parkash two and a half years ago. During the first six months after marriage, she was sent thrice to her parents' house to get money. She returned with cheques for Rs. 6,000, Rs. 5,000 and Rs. 3,000, respectively. After that her in-laws turned her out... The murder attempt followed her refusal (to fetch more money from her father)—Hindustan Times (Swarup K. Das, Ranchi)

NEW DELHI: A man in Pune went to buy meat worth Rs. 2. The butcher asked him if he had a bus ticket. The puzzled man asked the butcher why he was inquiring about the bus ticket. The butcher said that the prices have gone up so high that you can wrap up meat worth Rs. 2 in a bus ticket. So it was wrapped in the bus ticket. By the time the man reached home, the meat had fallen through the punch hole a conductor makes in tickets. Thus the man returned empty handed. The Rajya Sabha heard this story from a Congress (I) member during the discussion on the general Budget in support of his contention that prices had shot up—The Indian Nation (Sushil Sinha, Hazaribagh)

NEW DELHI : Mr E. R. Krishnan, AIADMK member of the Rajya Sabha became the unlucky 13: he got a reply in Punjabi to his question in Tamil. Chairman B. D. Jatti called the names of 12 members to raise questions, but all of them were absent. The 13th member, Mr Krishnan, was called to ask him questions... When he asked the question in Tamil, Mr Jatti requested him to speak in English. Mr Krishnan replied to him in Tamil, which Mr Jatti said he could understand, but not Agriculture Minister S. S. Barnala. However, amid peals of laughter, Mr Barnala replied to Mr Krishnan's questions in Punjabi — The Mail (H. Abdul Haleem, Madras)

india abroad

LONDON : A former adviser to the Shah of Iran, the Indian-born millionaire, Sir Shapoor Reporter, is negotiating with the Foreign Office in a bid to get a visa for the Shah to settle in Britain. The whereabouts of Sir Shapoor who is one of the 16 former advisers to the Shah wanted by the new Teheran regime, had not been known since the fall of the Imperial Government .... Sir Shapoor has been in constant touch with the Foreign Office where Britain's former Ambassador to Teheran, Sir Anthony Parsons, was now deputy to the permanent Under-Secretary—Statesman

WASHINGTON : A 44-year-old Indian-born woman pleaded guilty to charges of trying to bribe a US Agriculture Department official to help her obtain credit guarantees to finance rice exports to Nigeria. Thankam Mathews, a Washington commodity broker, pleaded guilty in a US District Court to charges that between December 1 and December 6, 1978, she made "repeated offers of $ 5,000 to $ 10,000 per month for a year to Mr Lawrence T. McElvain, an official of the Department's office of General Sales Manager", the Department said. "In return for the money Mr McElvain was to assist Mathews in obtaining US Government credit guarantees worth more than $ 50 million towards financing rice export sales to Nigeria." Thankam Mathews will be sentenced on April 25. The charges carry a minimum penalty of two years' imprisonment and a fine of $ 10,000—Hindu

without comment

IF I were the President (of Pakistan), I would have respected the recommendation of the Supreme Court . .. I would have granted mercy—Z. A. Bhutto on the rejection of the death sentence by the Supreme Court

IF I accepted it (the demand for resignation) I would be guilty of a greater and more grievous blunder—Prime Minister Morarji Desai on the Opposition's demand for his resignation because of his wrong announcement in Parliament on JP

IT is politics—Janata Party President Chandrashekhar commenting on the anti-RSS campaign by some Janata members

THOSE who signed the Janata Party pledge and also talk of Hindu rashtra are dishonest people—Janata MP Madhu Limaye

IF Janata follows correct politics, even some of the Congress (I) may extend their cooperation to us—Janata President Chandrashekhar

WE support Leninism, and Leninism is incomplete without Stalinism—CPI (M) leader Pramode Dasgupta

TODAY there is a sullen anger, a despair in our party. We do not know what to do—a prominent Congress (I) leader

humour in real life

AT A small tea party to celebrate the engagement of a senior and aged clerk of our office, the manager was heard remarking: "At last, a wandering soul will now rest in peace"—Sunil Narayan, Bareilly prize rs. 30 for the entry given first

SIGN seen at the back of a big way truck—"Use deeper at night" —Johar Sahdia, Sibsagar

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

a word or two

BEFORE entering into a competition or combat, you should plan ahead. And when all your moves have been successfully demolished by a powerful adversary you can save the day for yourself by using something which you have up your sleeve. It might be some evidence, argument, trick or stratagem that you might keep in readiness to surprise your opponent with.

This might be one of the few expressions which has come down to us from the world of fashion. It can be traced back to the clothes worn in the fifteenth century in Britain. In those days a gentleman's garment had no pockets at all, unlike his modern counterparts. A man usually wore a belt and essential things like a sword and a pouch were hung from it. It was indeed the genius of a dress-designer of yesteryear which discovered that if the sleeves could be made fuller between the elbow and wrist then they could also serve as a receptacle to keep away those thingummies of a gentleman's day-to-day use. This fashion of pillow-case like sleeves acquired grotesque proportions in later days, thanks to fashion-conscious young men and even women (although they did not keep anything up their sleeves apart from the occasional handkerchief), when the sleeves sometimes scraped the ground. From after the ascent of Henry VIII sleeves slowly lost out to trousers with mundane pockets, whatever you had up your sleeves was purely figurative.

WORDSPINNER

Illustrations/Ahi Bhusan Malik

stranger, as we were telling you, than fiction

FEW people have stopped to wonder how the lustrous pearls of a necklace, or the familiar pearl buttons, could grow beneath the waters of an ocean or a muddy river bottom. The 'factories' in which these gems are made are the bodies of three altogether different types of mollusc. The mantles of these three types, just like every other mollusc, secrete a fluid substance that hardens to form the animal's shell as well as provide a smooth lining for the inside of the shell. In a few species however, the fluid is pearly and lustrous in quality, and it is this lustrous secretion—called nacre—that forms the raw material for jewel pearls.

The history of the pearl is a long one. It is mentioned in the literatures of ancient India and China. The Egyptians were perhaps the first people to adorn themselves with the rare and valuable jewel pearl. They believed that a god had discovered pearls off the coast of India about 4000 years ago. Egyptian women are known to have worn pearls from about 1500 B.C.

An unblemished pearl is one of the most ancient symbols of perfection. Pearls were so highly esteemed in classical Rome that only persons of a specified rank were permitted to wear them. Pliny the Elder writes of pearls as "the richest merchandise of all, and the most sovereign commodity in the whole world". Trade in pearls was conducted by a special corporation whose members were known as "margaritarii."

History tells us that the pearls for which Britain was supposedly famous spurred Caesar to cross the Channel and conquer Britain. He returned with a highly coveted breastplate adorned with pearls, which he dedicated to the Roman Temple of Victory. However, Britain remained especially proud of her pearls. Much later, during the reign of Queen Elizabeth I, in an attempt to impress a visiting Spanish ambassador, Sir Thomas Gresham, the wealthy merchant, drank a toast in wine to the Queen in which he had dissolved a famous pearl worth £ 15,000.

Pearls are noted for their size, beauty and historical associations. They, are ranked among the famous jewels of the world. La Reinedes Perles, a 27.3 carat oriental pearl, was among the crown jewels of France. It was stolen in 1792, while La Regente, an oval pearl weighing 34 carats, was once owned by the French imperial court. The most perfect pearl is known to be the Pellegrina, in Moscow's Zosima Museum. It is 28 carat, globular in shape and is of unusual beauty.

For centuries men were constantly lured into great danger in a never-ending quest for this highly coveted and extremely valuable jewel. And all the while they searched in vain trying to unravel the elusive secret of how certain shells produce valuable pearls while others do not. Many legends thus grew up about the origin of pearls. One curious notion was that pearls were formed by raindrops falling into the gaping valves of the pearl shell.

Legends finally lost their force when Professor Louis Boutan of France made the discovery that pearls formed when a bit of foreign matter became lodged within the shell of a mollusc. If the animal was unable to dislodge the irritant, it would for greater comfort, coat it with the same gland secretion with which it lined its shell. These become the smooth, round, non-irritating object we know as a pearl.

When Columbus landed on the American coast in 1492, he discovered naked Red Indians wearing strings of beautiful pearls. He traded miscellaneous trinkets for them, and started the New World's first pearl rush. Then came the Spaniards who did not bother to trade for them. De Soto's men simply robbed the natives of their pearls.

The Red Indians soon learned to keep the source of their pearls a secret from the white men. By the time the English arrived, they could not find a single Indian who had ever heard of a pearl. The mystery kept deepening. Not until 1857 did an English shoemaker, David Howell, find a valuable pearl in a New Jersey river mussel. This started the pearl rush in the United States. The origins of one comparatively recent strike sounds like a movie version about the California gold rush days. In 1956, two clam diggers found a bed of mussels in the Tennessee river. Prying one of them open, they discovered a perfectly formed pearl. A heated argument erupted among the partners as to who would claim it. Both went for their guns, shot at each other at the same time and both fell dead.

The thick pearl-like layers of the river clam were found to be good material for buttons, buckles, and many kinds of ornaments. In 1893, J. F. Boepple, a former button manufacturer in Austria, migrated to Muscatine, Iowa (USA). He went wading in the Mississippi river and accidentally cut his foot on a clam. Upon examining the clam he discovered that the shell was perfect material for buttons. A new US button making industry was born. The business steadily grew until Muscatine became the pearl button capital of the world.

RAJIB NARAYAN SANYAL

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The plight of undertrials

The chaos in India's judicial system is evident from the fact that there are anything between 96,000 and 1.7 million people languishing in our prisons, waiting for trials, most of them in connection with petty offences. KAPILA HINGORANI, who is a Supreme Court lawyer and ardent fighter for human rights, is presently engaged in a spirited campaign for the speedy execution of undertrials' cases. RAKA SINHA and SHIV S. NAYAR ask her who is to blame, and what can be done to solve the problem.

Q: What prompted you to take up the cases of undertrial prisoners?

A: I was moved by K. M. Rustomji's (member of the National Police Commission) articles on the pathetic plight of undertrials in various jails. It's incredible that something like this can happen in our country.

Q: If justice delayed is justice denied, don't you think a large number of undertrials (estimated at between 96,000 and 1.7 million) are denied justice because of Government apathy and the Judiciary's indifference?

A: I agree. If a person is not tried for a long time it is very likely that evidence against him as well as in his favour is not going to be cogent or just. If the undertrial is in jail, the situation is worse as he cannot even prepare his defence. In many cases he is poor and can't afford a lawyer. There is an urgent need to give such people legal aid on an organised, national basis. The legal aid should be administered through the Bar and provided by the Government. While the State will have a public prosecutor why should the poor be deprived of a lawyer, whom they need most? Or else they will be fighting an unequal battle. This is a violation of equality. To a large extent the fault is of the judicial system and its administration. Many times the remands are ordered mechanically, perhaps due to pressure of work in courts, or just indifference. It's really a tragedy of routine. All of us get so bogged down in the routine and lose our sensitivity.

Q: Under criminal law no undertrial can be kept in prison for more than 60 days. Doesn't this imply that the Judiciary is turning a blind eye to illegal detention and abuse of power by the police?

A: Normally, no one can be kept in jail for the purpose of investigation for more than 60 days, and 90 days for a major offence. It's surprising that in spite of this provision, many of the undertrials had not been released on bail for so long. When you speak of illegal detention it refers to women in jail who are kept under protective custody. This is illegal detention. There are children in jail, I understand. A child under seven years cannot be charged with any offence. A child under 12, unless of mature mind, cannot commit any offence. Their detention is illegal and it is difficult to comprehend why these cases are overlooked.

Q: An accused who can afford a lawyer can get away on anticipatory bail while a poor man caught for petty thieving cannot think of being let off even on a personal bond. Doesn't this indicate that the judicial system, even after 30 years of Independence, favours the rich?

A: Bail provisions as administered today work to the disadvantage of the poor. The rich buy their freedom while the poor cannot. The Supreme Court has now directed the release of undertrials on personal bonds. The consideration for granting bail should not merely be based on sureties. Various other factors like, for instance, the accused's family ties should be taken notice of. The purpose of taking a bond, after all, is to see that the accused appears at the trial.

Q: There is a suggestion to appoint young lawyers as Honorary Magistrates who can dispose of quickly cases pending before courts. What do you think about this?

A: I'm against honorary magistrates and lay people sitting as judges. Young, competent and qualified people should be attracted to the judiciary by improving service conditions. The pay and service conditions of magistrates and session judges are not at all adequate and good. It is most unfortunate that he Government is not paying attention to this problem. For the expeditious disposal of cases, there could be separate courts for very minor, major and very serious offences. Simple and summary procedures can be easily prescribed for very minor offences. Arrests need not be made for many of the offences.

Q: How can the undertrials be helped?

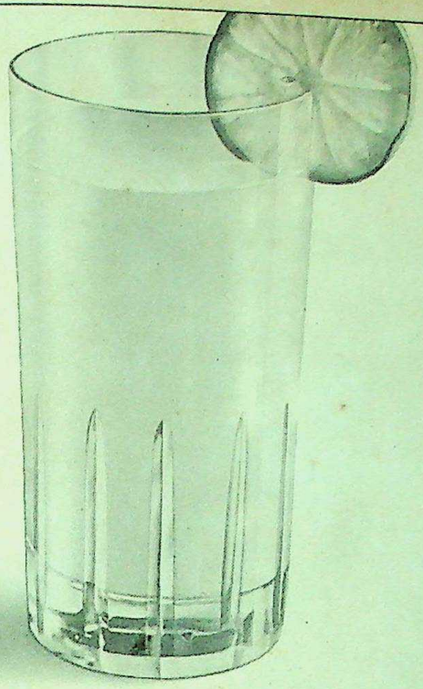
A: Many undertrials rotting in prisons are too poor to have a lawyer. They should be provided lawyers at state expense. The urgent need is to get the prisoners released on bail. The right to a speedy trial is a Fundamental Right, and so should be the right to counsel.

Q: What is your suggestion for improving the judicial system?

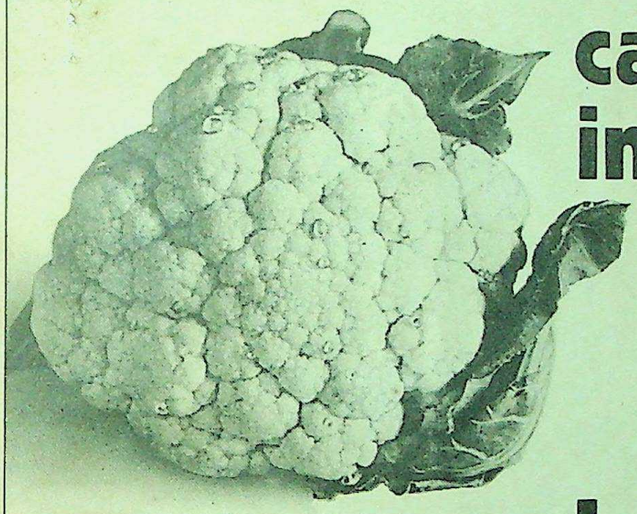
A: Besides improving the service conditions of judicial officers to attract more competent people; more courts should be established. There have to be changes in law and procedure. But most important of all is the approach to administration of justice. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Leonard chills lemonade in London

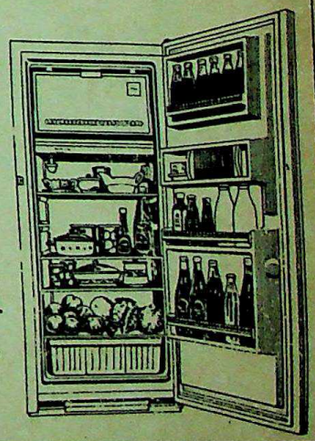


Leonard keeps cauliflower crisp in Cochin

Leonard keeps Bina smiling in Bombay

Leonard serves millions of families around the world. Its dependable compressor and new ingenious defrost system guarantee you long, trouble-free service.

When Leonard owners are asked about their refrigerators, they just smile. After all what more need we say about a friend of the family.



Leonard

Since 1881. Trusted the world over.

Another quality product from

BLUE STAR®

Leaders in refrigeration

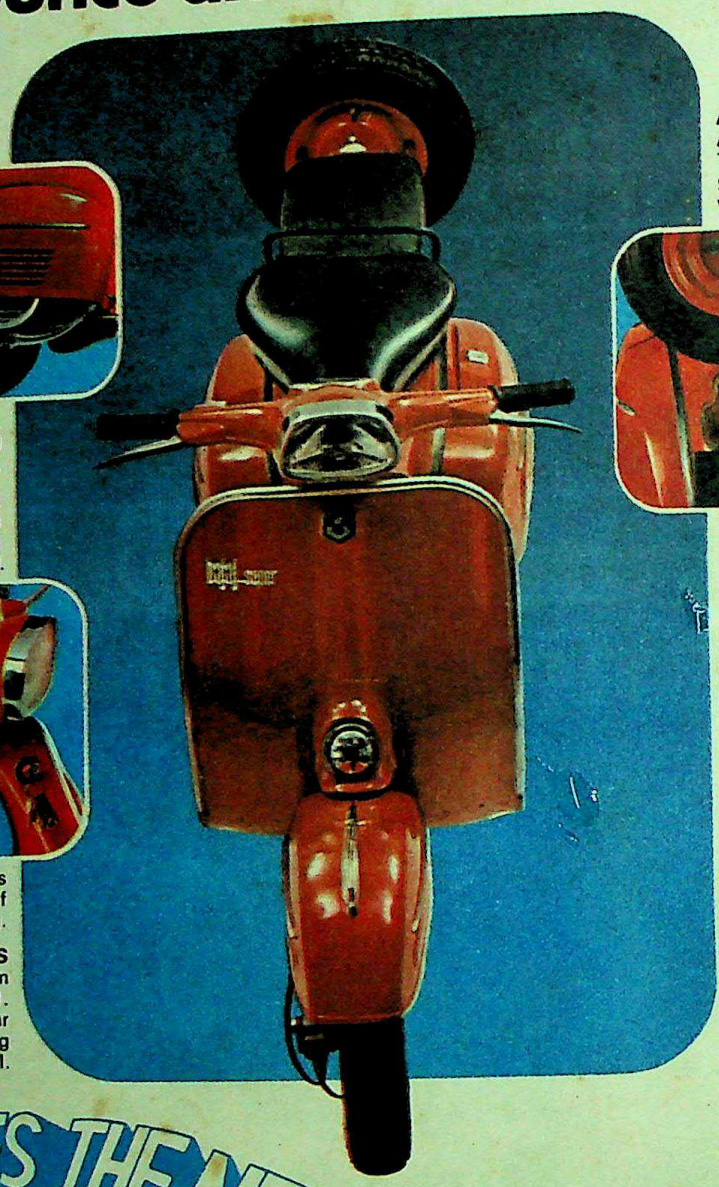
SIMOES/BS/4A/79

Bombay • New Delhi • Calcutta • Madras • Ahmedabad • Pune • Kanpur • Indore • Chandigarh • Jamshedpur • Bangalore • Cochin • Secunderabad • Visakhapatnam.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The makers of the finest scooters in the world announce another fine scooter



In 1960, the Bajaj 150 hit the road, and became India's largest selling scooter.

In 1972, the Bajaj Chetak was launched. It went on to become a favourite the world over.

Now, the news is the Bajaj Super. With distinct improvements and innovations.

SHEERLINE SHAPE
Strangely enough, by making the Bajaj Super more 'chunky' it looks far more streamlined.

Its sheerline shape reflects the latest in styling.

The handlebars and headlamp are also squared up. In the Bajaj Chetak style.

And the Bajaj Super's frame is the same sturdy, integrated, electrically welded unit which has proved itself over many years of rugged driving.

FOUR GEARS
Which give you ratios from 13.35:1 all the way up to 4.73:1. The result is smoother gear changing and a noticeable saving in fuel.

A LITTLE FASTER, A LITTLE FURTHER
The Bajaj Super has been rated at 90 kmph on the test bench. With an improved compression ratio, we have squeezed out a little more mileage; upto 46 km per litre under standard conditions.

DELIVERIES HAVE BEGUN
After decades of unmatched performance, the Bajaj 150 makes way for the Bajaj Super, which will be going out to all those on the waiting list for a Bajaj 150 scooter.

It certainly is a long waiting list. But now you're waiting for the new, improved version of the best scooter in the world.

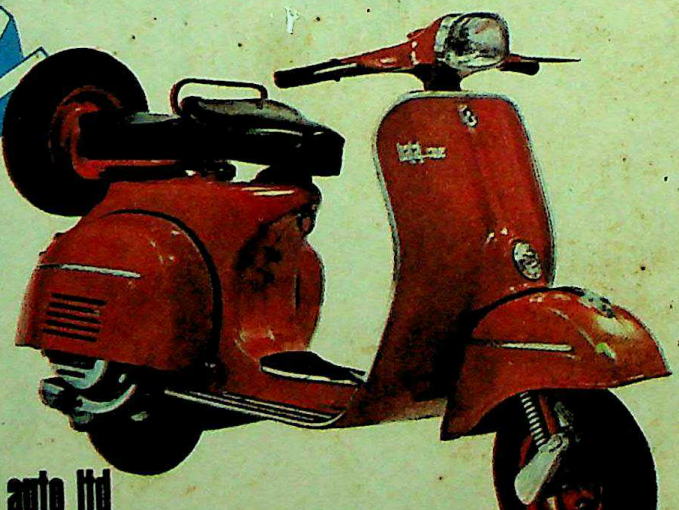
THE BAJAJ 150 LIVES ON
Without doubt, the '150' has been the most wanted scooter in India for many years; you can still see fifteen- and twenty-year old models on the road.

To all those people who believe that 'old is gold', the good news is, that the '150' will live on as the 'Priya', made by Maharashtra Scooters Ltd.

THE BAJAJ CHETAK REMAINS A 'PRIORITY' ITEM
The Bajaj Chetak will continue to be available to those who can pay in foreign currencies.

HERE COMES THE NEW

bajaj-super



bajaj auto ltd
AKURDI POONA 411 035.

The world's second largest scooter makers

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

politician, Bhutto dug his grave by his thirst for power. But how long will Zia, presently in the saddle, survive?
Delhi Alka

■ The fuse has been lit. Pakistan might blow up into small fragments.
Allahabad Abhay Singh

■ Cutting across communal feelings, the execution has dismayed, disgusted and shocked everyone.
Meerut A. C. Maheshwari

■ Zia has erased from the public memory all the shortcomings of Bhutto by executing him. Even Indians have forgotten the threat of "a thousand year war" and are grieving over his hanging.
Lucknow I. P. Ram

JP Betrayed

Your Cover Story "A Leader Betrayed" (INDIA TODAY, April 1–15) was apt, and a timely exposure of the Janata Party's power-drunk and ungrateful leaders.
Allahabad A. K. Jaiswal

■ It is a tragic story of a selfless person who tried to do much for India and its people, only to be betrayed in return. The reason: Jayaprakash Narayan was, and is too honest to be a politician.
Bokerstr Subhash Likhite
W. Germany

■ The cover picture of JP was marvellous and a nice gesture to the patron-saint of our nation.
Hyderabad R. V. Divakar

Jayaprakash Narayan—ideals betrayed

■ How arrogant and ungrateful can the prime minister be. For Morarji Desai, JP did not rank high enough to warrant an immediate visit to Jaslok Hospital, nor did his 'death' warrant a declaration of national mourning.
New Delhi Joseph Chacko

■ A wayward son often disappoints his father but does not kill him. But the Janata Party has stooped low enough to commit patricide.
New Delhi K. S. Raman

■ By his strong will JP has survived, but how long would he be able to bear the moral blows inflicted by his own creation—the Janata Party.
Baroda A. C. Shukul

■ It is beyond comprehension that even the Intelligence Bureau could blunder and declare JP 'dead'.
Tehri-Garhwal Shiv Kumar Dhyani

Mature Decision

The article "Bear Hugs And Bruises" (INDIA TODAY, April 1–15) was interesting and sensible. China had once tried to disrupt India's friendship with Russia by suggesting that Moscow was using the Indo-Soviet Treaty to control and exploit India. The Indian Government has, however, displayed statesmanship and maturity in ignoring such innuendoes and widening the areas of co-operation with the Soviet Union in various fields.
Cochin Mohan Murti

The New Yorker

The special feature "An American In India" (INDIA TODAY, April 1–15) provided a good psychological study of Ellin Pollachek. A human mind becomes insensitive, frustrated and conditioned when the capacity for openness and imagination deserts an individual. And these cannot be regained even by such a radical treatment as a trip to India.

Pollachek can go anywhere and see nothing new. But the contents of her beauty box could go on changing under the cocktail shaking.
Norway Torben Huss

■ Do not believe that Pollachek's view is emblematic of westerners' opinion about India. How can one, whose values in life are confined to five-star hotel rooms and sex, appreciate other cultures? I am not a frustrated New Yorker and so I have, like most westerners, great respect for Indians.
Denmark Lina Bjirrigaard

■ As an American (and, I might add, a New Yorker) who has been studying and living in India for the past year, I was grossly offended by Pollachek. She gives the false impression that Americans visiting India are concerned only with hot and cold running water, western-style commodes, and the rates of trinkets and taxis; in short that they are as empty-headed and oblivious to the great country around them as Pollachek.
Waltair Steven Ghitelman

Letters to the Editor should be addressed to India Today Letters, India Today, 40-F Connaught Place, New Delhi 110001. For reasons of space letters are liable to be edited.

DIMS

DELHI INSTITUTE OF MANAGEMENT & SERVICES

CORRESPONDENCE COURSES

India needs 5 lakh Managers in the current Five Year Plan.

There are only 1.2 lakh Managers at present.

DIMS can train you to become a Manager.

These courses are:

- Designed by Specialists with rich experience.
- Specially suited to Indian conditions.
- Job Oriented.
- Can be taken up any time.
- Can be completed at your convenience.

DIMS offers the following Courses.

1 Post Graduate Diploma in Business Management & Industrial Administration.
2 Marketing Management.
3 Personnel Management.
4 Salesmanship.
5 Purchasing & Storekeeping.
6 Travel & Tourism Management.
7 Hotel Management.
8 Office Management.
9 Export Management.
10 Production Management.
11 Journalism & Public Relations
12 Book Keeping & Acco
13 Labour Law & In 14 Taxation

For Details, Conta
DIRECTOR
LALIT M.KHUN

Delhi Instit
Manageme

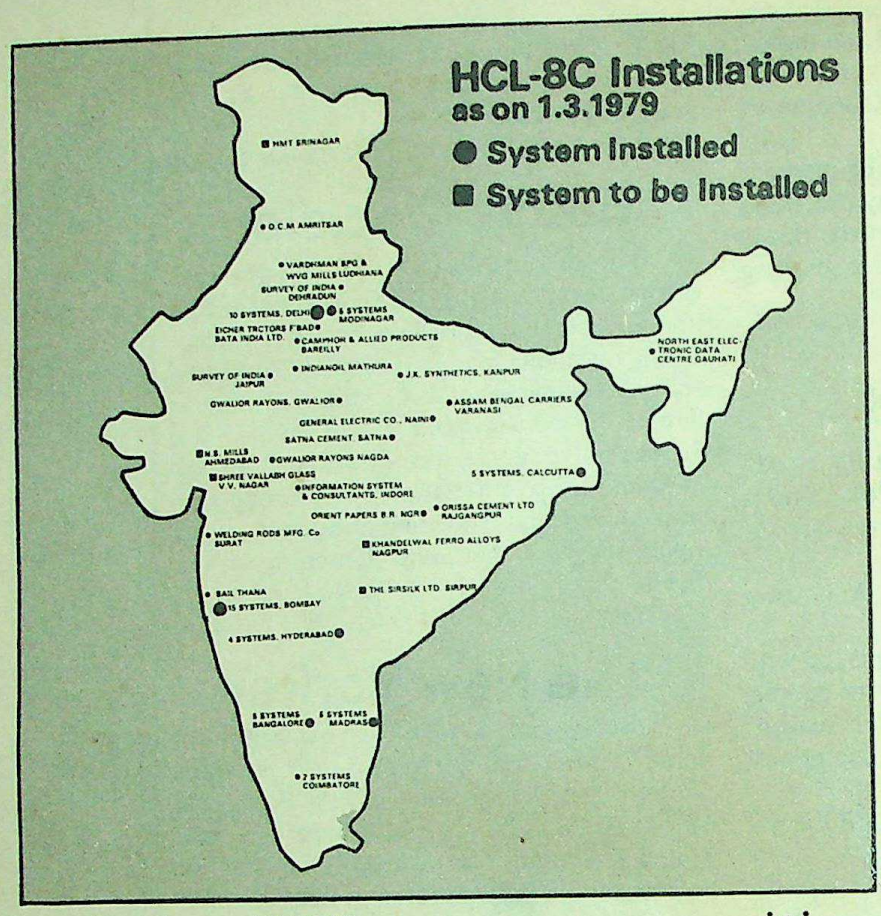
301, Akashdeep
Barakhamba Roa
Tel: 45018, 464

Impressions-540

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A lot of computer companies in India would like to be where HCL is today!



Building HCL user communities, for instance.

In all the major industrial and financial centres in India.

In the closely-knit computer-user's community in India, actual performance and word-of-mouth are the crucial factors in a computer system's reputation. HCL's ...matic sales are ample ...of the popularity of its ...rcial computers and ...anced technology ...hem.

To date HCL has installed more commercial computers than all other Indian computer manufacturers put together. Over fifty to be precise. In every major city in the country. HCL commercial systems have already become an integral part of prestigious organisations like the Maharashtra State Electricity Board, Ananda Bazar Patrika, J. K. Synthetics, Sita World Travel, Bata India Ltd., Orient Paper Mills to name a few. All this in just 2-1/2 years of the most intensive and exhaustive systems implementation programme undertaken in the Indian computer Industry.

HINDUSTAN COMPUTERS LIMITED

505, Siddharth, 96, Nehru Place, New Delhi-110019

...rising the Indian corporate world. For the 'eighties.

ARMS/HCL/4

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

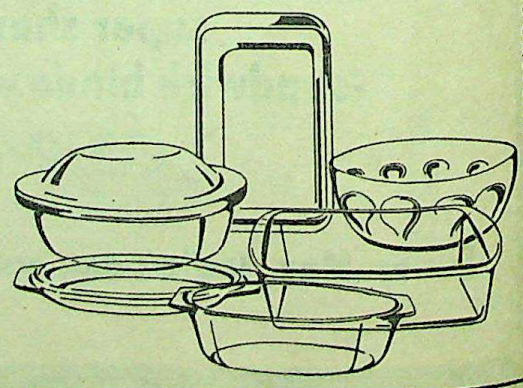
CORNING OVENWARE

Corning is wonderglass—capable of withstanding uniform heating of upto 500°C ! Corning Ovenware goes straight from oven to table. Then into the refrigerator for storing. Back to the oven for reheating and serving at the next meal.

Corningware is the new concept of cook, serve and store in the same dish. More practical, more hygienic, and looks extremely elegant on your dining table.

Available at all department stores.

Ask for Corningware: The new concept of dualware from America.



SIMOES/BG/2/79

Manufactured by
BOROSIL GLASS WORKS LIMITED
Bombay 400 018.

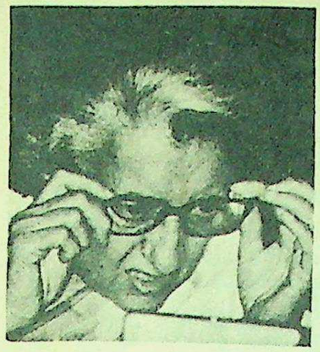
CORNING®

® Registered Trademark of Borosil Glass Works Limited—manufactured in collaboration with Corning U.S.A.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

In Focus This Fortnight



COVER STORY: Dark clouds are again hovering over the former prime minister Mrs Indira Gandhi. The Special Courts Bill designed to deal with Emergency cases is on its last legs. And within her Congress (I) she is faced with stern opposition from her senior colleagues who are reluctant to back her son Sanjay. With the ruling Janata Party in disarray and whispers of a Third Force emerging, can Mrs Gandhi survive yet another battle.? Page 30.

SPECIAL REPORT: Last month's communal riots in Jamshedpur, southern Bihar, were a violent reminder of the deteriorating secular image of the Janata Government. What was extraordinary about the events was the planning and the intensity of politicking that went behind them. Together with administrative failure and active participation of the Bihar Military Police, the steel city bore savage scars of death everywhere. INDIA TODAY correspondent SUNIL SETHI reports from the scene of disaster. Page 8.

GUEST COLUMN: On May 1, the Janata Party celebrates the second anniversary of its formal, if traumatic, political birth. But judging by the ever-widening schisms within the party structure, it seems doubtful if the Janata Party has much to celebrate about. Its failure to implement most of its election pledges has set off warning bells that are becoming increasingly strident. B.G. Verghese evaluates the party's performance since its inception. Page 14.

POWER CRISIS: Chief Minister Jyoti Basu was not to be seen in Calcutta as the state capital was engulfed in darkness by the worst power crisis to hit the state in recent years. All industrial activity in the state came to a grinding halt. Years of trade union rivalries, over-bureaucratization of power plants, fatal maintenance standards and negligent manpower planning is the cause of what is essentially a man-made crisis in West Bengal and other states. Page 19.

INTERVIEW OF THE FORTNIGHT: Petroleum Minister Hemwati Nandan Bahuguna is one of the most resilient politicians on the contemporary political stage. After being dispatched into political exile by former prime minister Indira Gandhi, Bahuguna bounced back with a bang as one of the architects of the Congress for Democracy (CFD) party. Bahuguna recently spoke to INDIA TODAY on the performance of his ministry and of the Janata Party as a whole. Page 54.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON: The shrouds of secrecy that have mummified the covert operations of America's Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) are being ripped off with increasing frequency. The latest—and most disturbing—exposé on the CIA is in the form of a book—The Search for the Manchurian Candidate—a chilling account of the agency's experimentation with Mind Control. INDIA TODAY'S Washington correspondent interviewed the author, John. D. Marks about the experiments. Page 64.

TECHNOLOGY: Peter Drucker, Clarke Professor of Social Sciences at the Claremont Graduate School in the US has acquired an enviable reputation in the contemporary management world. When he visited India last year, he was buffeted by sermons on the suitability of small industry and rural development by the Government's economic planners, including Prime Minister Morarji Desai. He dismisses it as mere rhetoric and discusses the concept of economic development in the Indian context. Page 82.

BOOKS: The former ambassador to India, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, put his literary cat among the pigeons recently when his controversial book, A Dangerous Place was belatedly released in this country. Published last year it went unnoticed by the Indian public, and the Government which has just woken up to the fact that the book contains some highly explosive material. Managing Editor CHHOTU KARADIA reviews the book along with the controversial extract. Page 107.

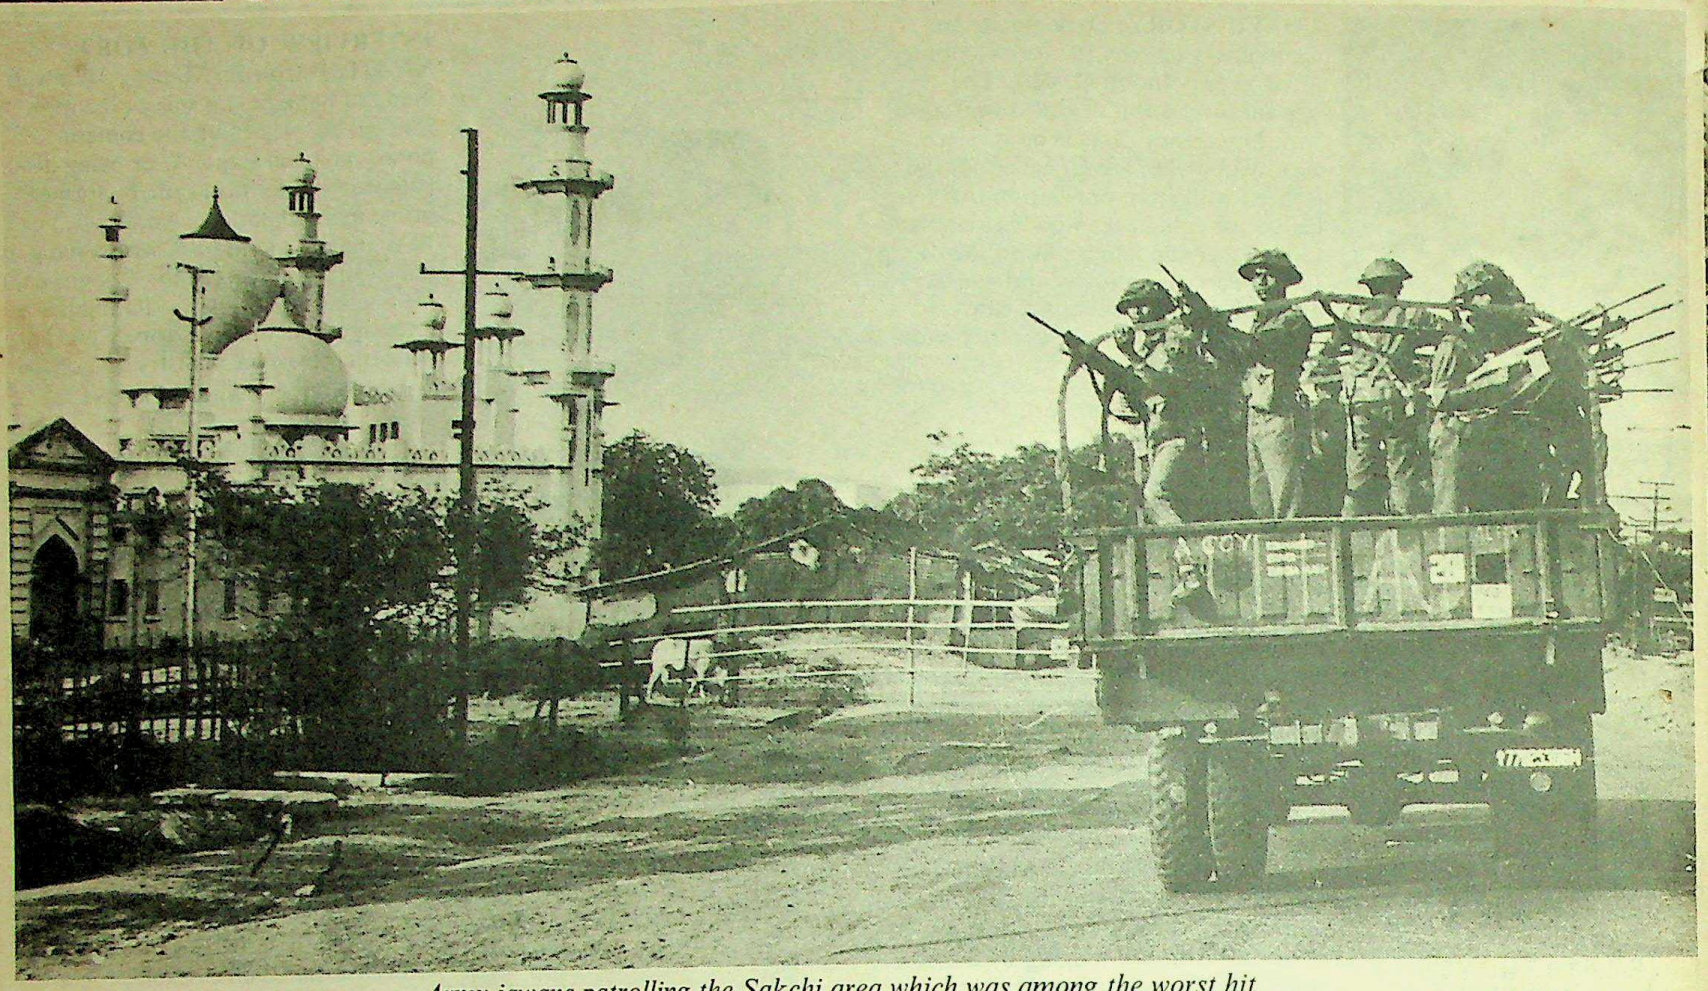
Contents

8	Special Report	59	Neighbours	93	Crime
14	Guest Column by B.G. Verghese	64	Letter from Washington	96	Perspective
18	Current Events	72	Economy	100	Images India
30	Cover Story	82	Technology	103	Arts
42	Globe-trotting	86	Sports	107	Books
53	International Intelligence	89	Labour	111	Science
54	Interview of the Fortnight	91	Commissions	112	Eye-catchers

Cover Photo by PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Army jawans patrolling the Sakchi area which was among the worst hit

JAMSHEDPUR

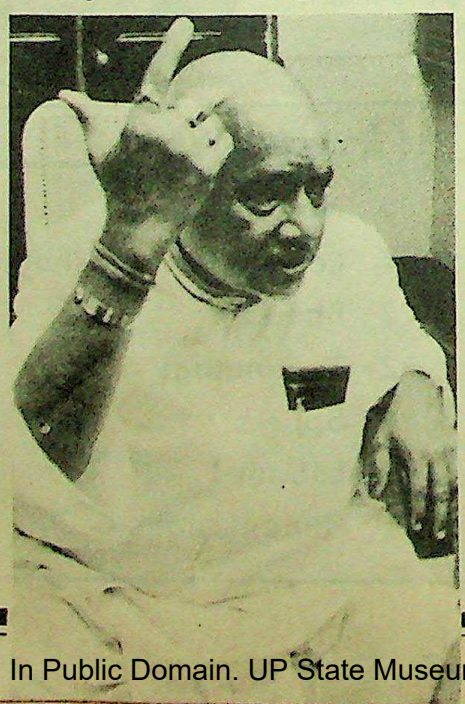
Day Of The Vultures

IN the neighbouring Pakistan General Zia-ul-Haq executed the former prime minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto without any bloodshed whereas in India more than 100 lives were lost in communal rioting that took place in the steel city of Jamshedpur. It was one of the worst communal flare-ups in India after Ahmedabad and Aligarh. INDIA TODAY correspondent SUNIL SETHI who toured the riot-torn city found that vultures had come to the rescue of the local officialdom to help clear the corpses. While the police and politicians moaned and groaned, the vultures went about their job with precision, speed and efficiency. Accusing fingers are now being pointed at the Hindu extremists, the RSS, for provoking the riots; the trigger-happy police force must equally share the blame for causing bloodshed on the religious festival of Ramnaumi.

SILENCE ruled the steel city of Jamshedpur in southern Bihar last week. Two days after the grim scenes of communal murder and rampage had ended, the only signs of life evident amidst the wreckage were provided by the police, the politicians and the vultures quietly picking at the corpses. All three are traditional visitors at any scene of disaster; all three assume the responsibility for disposing of the dead. But it is characteristic of any Indian disaster that it is usually the vultures who go about their job with precision, speed and efficiency. The police and the politicians bumble on regardless, while the local administration, inept and wide-eyed at the outset, is caught wringing its hands in panicky sweat by the end.

That was what happened in Jamshedpur last month when virtually total administrative failure abetted by contingents of the notoriously partisan Bihar Military Police (BMP)—eyewitnesses frequently saw them actively participating at the scenes of crime—failed to check the worst and most organized communal riots in one of the largest and best-managed industrial towns

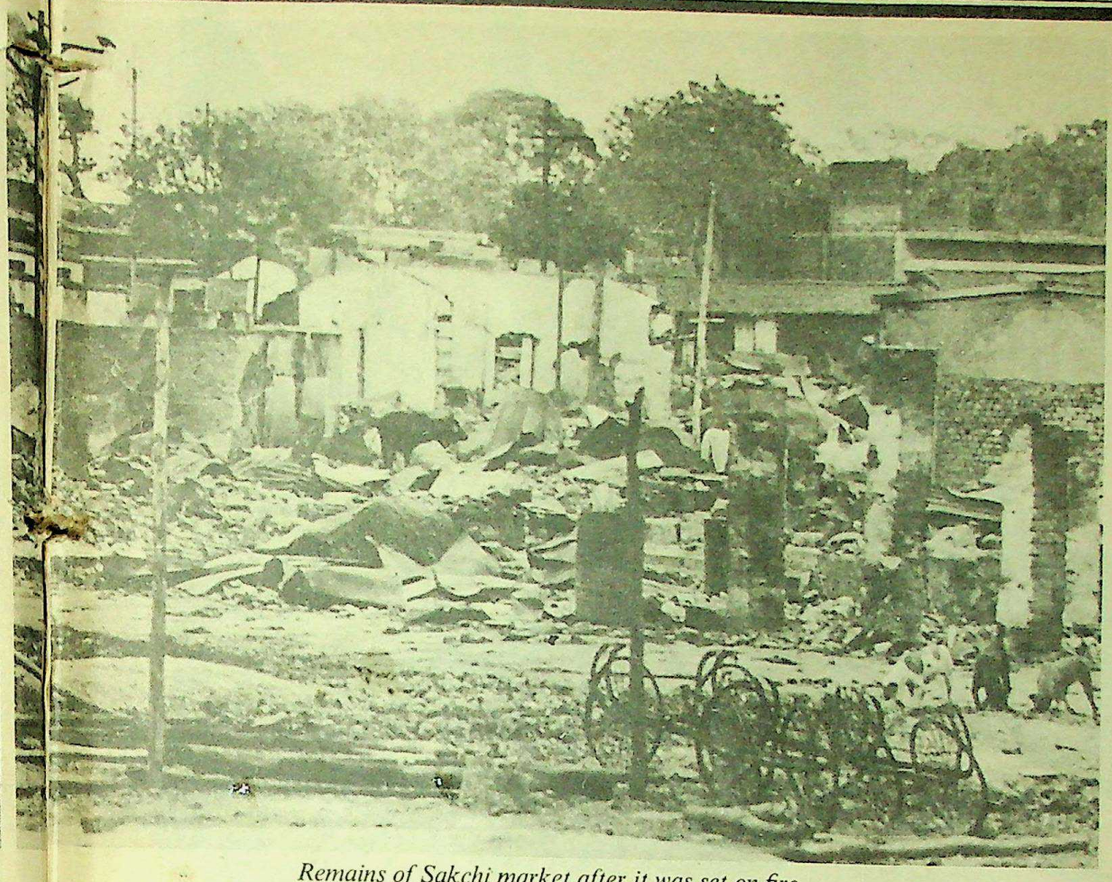
Raj Narain—blaming the RSS



Thakur—no comments to make

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Pushkarna—India Today

Remains of Sakchi market after it was set on fire in India.

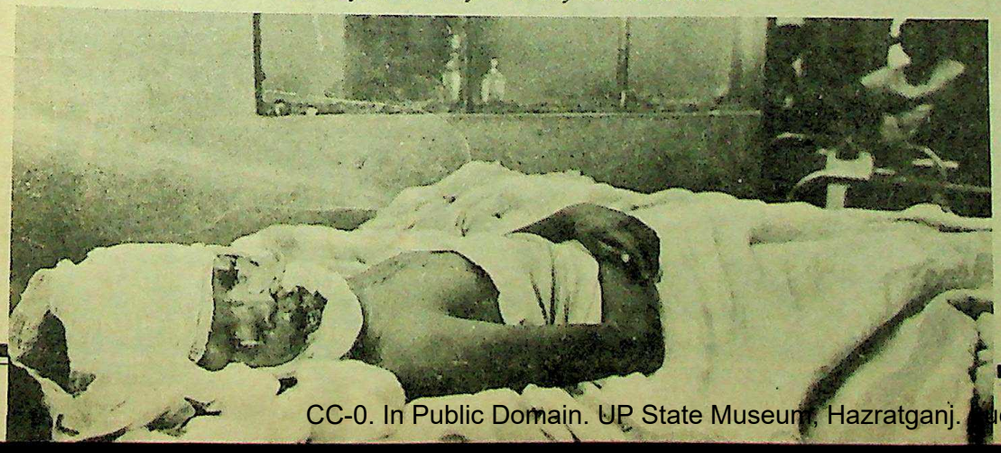
A bleary-eyed Karpoori Thakur (nursing a three-day old shave, as usual, for special effect) clucked around in the Circuit House trying to gloss over the outspoken claims of his old friend Raj Narain (who, as usual, accused the RSS with no effect at all). While long platoons of the BMP, the Central Reserve Police (CRP), the Border Security Force (BSF) and the local police strutted up and down the chalky, lifeless streets of a town under curfew, there were quiet reminders of vicious violence elsewhere.

Proud Hostess: In the local government hospital on the brink of the Subarnarekha river that cuts through the city, and beyond which lies the fateful Mango area with all-Muslim pockets such as Azad Busti where the riots germinated, a smiling nurse in a white sari was only too happy to show off her new acquisitions or "the deadly cases" as she called them. Here was a man with a severed leg, there a woman wholly bandaged over scorching burns, and finally her smile overflowed as she exhibited a 10-year-old lying motionless on a hospital bed. His face was virtually blown out, and most of his torso and one scrawny leg bandaged. He lay unattended. "Well, he just turned up," she said, "nobody knows from where. I think he was brought on the evening of April 11. But no one has come to look for him." Finishing the hospital round she led the way to the morgue, a little way behind the hospital. "Our PM (post-mortem) house," she said with a flourish. Amid the stench of putrefying flesh, the vultures were busy on the verandah. How many bodies?

"No count," said the nurse, "maybe 150, maybe 200 but they have been coming jumbled up, you see, in gunny bags, so how can one tell?" No sooner had the photographer drawn out his lens to take a picture, than a few hospital attendants came rushing to prevent him. No photographs could be taken without permission from hospital officials. Where were the officials? "All have gone to Circuit House." When, the next morning at dawn, the photographer returned to get his pictures, there were no corpses left. "All cleaned up," said the gatekeeper, "all buried at night."

A 10-year-old boy—nobody knows his name



Well-Prepared: Officially, the death toll after nearly three days of intense and widely-scattered rioting, looting, arson and street fighting was put at less than 120 more than half being Muslims. The number injured was estimated at about 350, of whom nearly 170 were Muslims. And the total number under arrest was officially placed at 832, of whom 142 were arrested between April 5 and 10, that is, before the outburst took place.

The areas where the worst scenes of brutal rioting had taken place were spread far apart—from Mango in the extreme north across the river, to Jugsalai in the south outside Tatanagar railway station, to Sakchi (where an entire shopping market was razed to the ground) and Bhalubasa in centre of the city, which altogether covers an area of roughly 25 square miles. The outbursts took place almost simultaneously, beginning on the early afternoon of April 11 and continuing through the night to grip most of April 12 as well. It was as if by some remote control mechanism the entire city burst into flames, thereby substantiating the theory that sections of the rabidly antagonistic Hindu majority and those of the Muslim minority—which constitute no more than one-sixth of a population approaching seven lakh—had carefully planned their strategies of assault and defence.

Since industrial cities like Jamshedpur not only become the hunting ground of criminals, thugs and other underworld species but also spawn a virtual industry in manufacture of illegal arms (vast caches of hand-made guns, grenades and sophisticated weaponry such as sten-guns have been recovered in police raids but the administration will not give the exact number of recoveries) there was no shortage of ammunition to conduct mass-scale riots. The only question was of timing and somehow hoodwinking the administration. Tragically, the city's administration played into the hands of the communal elements—in particular active members of the RSS—who were looking for an opportunity.

Chosen Route: The Hindu festival of Ramnaumi on April 5 provided the opportunity. On that day, the Hindus of Jamshedpur, as of most towns in southern Bihar, bring out processions and decorative saffron flags dedicated to Hanuman (called Bajrang Bali) and immerse them in the river as Statues of Durga are immersed in neighbouring Bengal. The processions are called akharas and there are 72 of them in Jam-

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Our quality control isn't complete until we've made this slip.

It is called a 'packing slip' and it accompanies every carton of Nirester polyester filament yarn.

In the unlikely event of the slightest complaint, the packing slip leads us to round-the-clock records of actual process conditions on the day of manufacture. It also helps us trace the results of all stipulated physical tests on that particular batch of yarn. It even allows us to check back to the chemical characteristics of the raw materials from which the yarn was manufactured.

And more. The personal commitment to quality runs so deep at our plant, that the packing slip even gives us the names of the individuals who stood duty at all key stages of manufacture!

Yes, everyone working on Nirester is proud enough to sign his work. And that is the ultimate guarantee of our quality.

Nirester

an advance over ordinary polyester.

Nirlon Synthetic Fibres & Chemicals Ltd., Bombay.

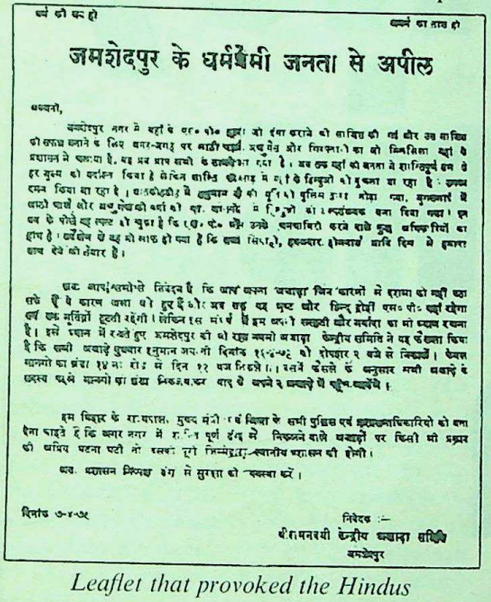
LINTAS-NIR.5-2518

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

shedpur, each brought out by a locality and centred around every Hanuman temple. Last year, the six akharas of Mango area decided to carry out the procession on a certain route, called Route No. 14, which passed through the Muslim pocket of Azad Busti. The administration, fearing trouble in a mixed locality where communal tempers could be easily ignited, forbade them to take this route and offered instead Route No. 15 which skirted the Muslim mohalla. The Shriramnaumi Akhara Samiti took offence and took the matter to the Ranchi bench of the Patna High Court. The court, in its ruling, allowed the administration to use its discretion in the matter.

Thus checkmated, the Akhara Samiti decided to launch a tougher offensive this year. The Akhara Samiti, made up of traders who are staunch Hindus, also includes some avowed RSS workers who, it has been suggested by leaders as far apart



जमशेदपुर के धर्मप्रेमी जनता से अपील

बन्धुवर,

जमशेदपुर नगर में यहाँ के ४८० वीं वर्ष से हिन्दुओं को आतंकित करने की एवं उन्हें आर्थिक क्षति पहुंचाने के लिए बराबर-बराबर पर आगजनी, मारपीट, लूटपाट और गिरफ्तारी का जो सिलसिला यहां के प्रशासन ने चलाया है, वह अब सभी के बर्दाश्त के बाहर है। अब तक यहां की जनता ने शान्तिपूर्ण ढंग से हर जुल्म को बर्दाश्त किया है लेकिन शान्ति प्रेमप्रिय मे ही हिन्दुओं को दुर्बला का रहा है। उनका दमन किया जा रहा है। आतंकवादियों के तुष्टमान की नीति को पूर्णतया क्रियान्वित किया जा रहा है। आये दिनों और अब तो हद हो चुकी है कि ए.एस.पी. तक उनके पक्षपातपूर्ण करने वाले कुछ अधिकारियों का हाथ है। उन्हें लेकर ये लोग यही समझ बैठे हैं कि अब सिर्फ ये, हथियार, होमगार्ड आदि हिन्दू के हमारा साथ देने को तैयार है।

अतः आर्थ/सम्मोपेत निवेदन है कि आप अपना जबाड़ा किन कारणों से हमारा को नहीं छोड़ते हैं ये कारण जाने को हुए हैं और अब वह घृणा एवं भ्रष्ट और हिन्दू होगी एवं ए.एस.पी. यहां रहेंगे एवं एक मूर्तियां टूटती रहेंगी। लेकिन इस संघर्ष में हम अपनी लक्ष्मी और मर्यादा का भी ध्यान रखना है। इसे ध्यान में रखते हुए जमशेदपुर की सभी रक्षा समाजी जबाड़ा केन्द्रीय समिति ने यह फैसला किया है कि सभी अखाड़े शुक्रवार हनुमान जयन्ती दिनांक १९-४-७९ को शोभायात्रा २ बजे से निकालें। केवल मालगो का झंडा १४ नं. रोड से दिन १२ बजे निकलेगा। इनमें फैसले के अनुसार सभी अखाड़े के सदस्य अपने मालगो का झंडा निकट्यकर बाद में अपने २ अखाड़े में शामिल हो जायें।

इस विषय के सम्बन्ध में मुख्य मंत्री एवं बिहार के सभी पुलिस एवं प्रशासनाधिकारियों को बता देना चाहते हैं कि अगर नगर में किसी पूर्व दंगे निकलने वाले अखाड़ों पर किसी भी प्रकार की अप्रिय घटना घटी तो उसका पूरी जिम्मेदारी स्थानीय प्रशासन की होगी।

अतः प्रशासन निष्पक्ष ढंग से सुरक्षा की व्यवस्था करें।

दिनांक ७-४-७९

निवेदक :-
श्री रामनवमी केन्द्रीय अखाड़ा समिति
जमशेदपुर

Leaflet that provoked the Hindus

as Raj Narain and the Shahi Imam of New Delhi's Jama Masjid, who showed up unexpectedly, took encouragement from RSS chief Balasaheb Deoras's presence in Jamshedpur on April 1 when he addressed a huge rally in the town's Regal Ground. Ramlakhan Singh Yadav of the Congress who was a member of the team headed by former union health minister Karan Singh, on the other hand feels that the riots had something to do with the RSS chief Balasaheb Deoras's meeting Jamait-e-Islami leaders in Jamshedpur.

No Compromise: Initially, the administration was well-prepared and stuck to its guns in forbidding the use of Route No. 14. It also began making precautionary arrests. The samiti—many of whose members found themselves behind bars—in frustration called off the akharas scheduled for April 5. Instead they began to make plans to collect the entire town's akharas. On April 7, a provocative pamphlet was circulated all over the city, stating "that despite the peaceful protests of the people against the arrests and despite their having suffered sundry oppressions, the administration's efforts in oppressing the Hindus had gone on unabated". The morning of April 11 was mooted as the day for all the akharas to unite and carry out a combined procession following Route No. 14.

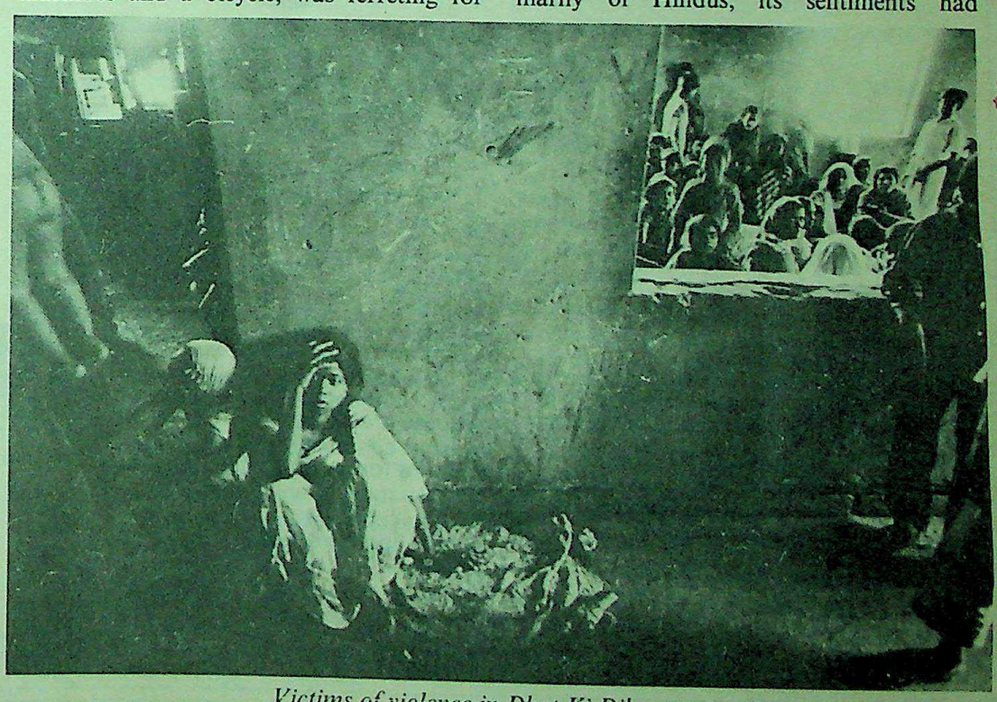
Hints were also dropped in the pamphlet against a Harijan Superintendent of Police, Ram Parshad, who had earned their wrath. Dinanath Pandey, the local MLA, was directly involved in organizing the collective procession. On April 10, a local peace committee was formed in the Mango area, consisting of Hindus and Muslims, to attempt a compromise solution for the route. But the Hindus were insistent.

When the procession began, it was peaceful. It consisted of only 50 to 60 people and Muslims also participated. By the time it reached the main road, where in the Mango Police Station, virtually the entire administration including the deputy commissioner was present, and BMP reinforcements were on the guard, the crowd had begun to swell. Nobody realized that thousands of Hindus were pouring across the bridge from the other side of the river to join the originally small akhara. In about an hour there was a crowd estimated at about 50,000 people. No one quite knows who called the first cry, or on whose roof the first firecrackers were burst. At about midday, the loud cries of Jai Bajrang mingled with stone-throwing, and the BMP began to open its first rounds of fire. After that there was no end.

Culprit: Syed Idaullah, a Telco worker, whose house and brother's tailoring shop on the main street have been reduced to cinders, with only the charred remains of sewing machines and a bicycle, was ferreting for left-overs when he told INDIA TODAY: "At one moment there was a shouting, restive mob. Then almost instantly, I saw smoke bombs which I thought was tear gas, but realized that there was open shooting. The next thing I knew was a few local goondas, political leaders like ex-CPI MLA Ram Avtar Singh and BMP soldiers emptying petrol cans on housefronts to set them ablaze."

Although the then chief minister sought refuge—as was usual—by saying that no comment could be made because a three-member inquiry commission was being set up to investigate the matter, there is clear and widespread evidence in Jamshedpur today of the involvement of the BMP in invariably inciting the mob, aggravating the situation by indiscriminately opening fire and indulging openly in arson and looting. "The BMP has become as dreaded an institution in Bihar as the Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC) was in Uttar Pradesh," said a local industrialist. According to Jagannath Sarkar, member of the central secretariat of the CPI, who head the party's team: "The role of the BMP stands out as a scandalous feature. There are many reports about its collusion in the riots. (Muslim) victims in refugee camps have complained: 'It is the BMP that killed us, not the Hindus.'"

In many instances the BMP, when not actually participating in crime, was reduced to an impotent onlooker. In several cases it simply turned around on its heels and fled. On April 12, when an ambulance full of women and children was set ablaze in the Bistopur area by a frenzied mob, killing nearly 40 of the occupants, the police were virtually helpless. A local official conceded off the record that since the BMP consisted primarily of Hindus, its sentiments had



Victims of violence in Dhat Ki Dih camp

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

In an emergency flash this sign

Your wallet is empty. And you have to entertain unexpected guests to dinner. Or you need an airplane ticket in a hurry. Or your car runs out of gas. Get all the things you want. On credit!

It's your privilege. When you become a Diners Club Credit Card holder.

The Diners Club is your passport to convenience, security, mobility. And more important, the way to added spending power. Interest-free!

A Diners Club Member can:

- Make purchases and avail of the services in over 2000 establishments in India and Nepal
- Pay only one convenient bill per month, for the previous month's expenses
- Present a comprehensive monthly statement for tax-deductible expenses
- Travel on most international airlines
- At special concessional rates, get personal accident, fire and burglary insurance.

All, at a membership fee of little more than Rs. 12/- per month!

Make life easier. Become a Diners Club Member.

DINERS CLUB INTERNATIONAL

DINERS CLUB India Pvt. Ltd.,
50, Vir Nariman Road, Dady House,
Bombay 400 023.

Fill out this coupon for complete details on membership:

Name:

Address:

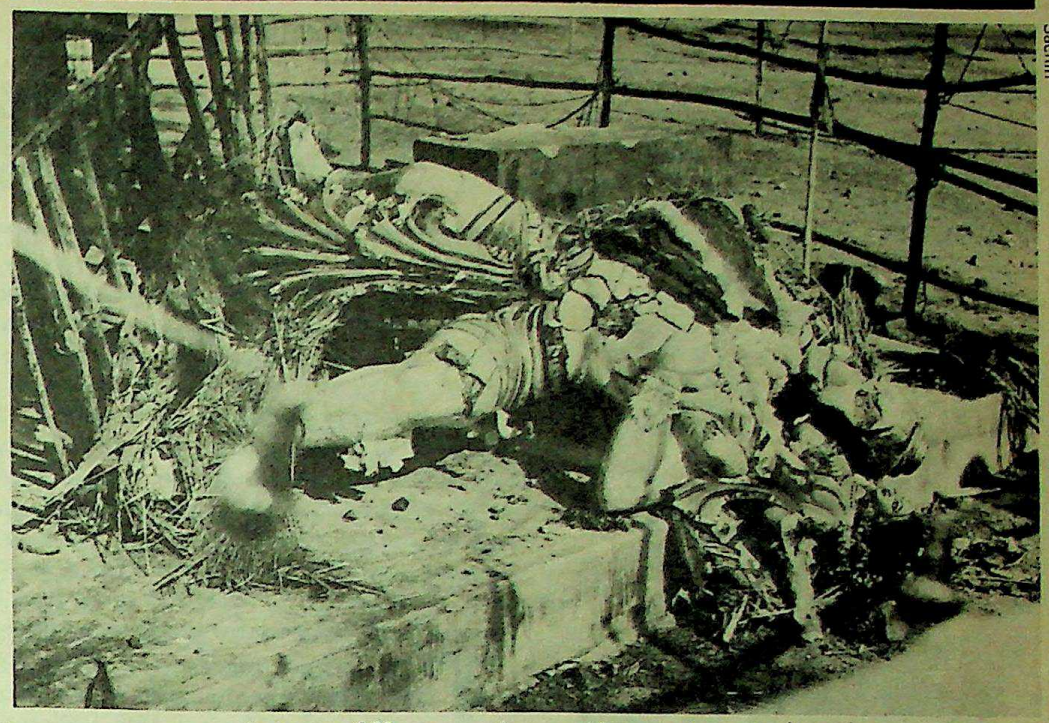
17 B

U/DC/34

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Shahi Imam—"inane police action"



Sachin

A statue of Hanuman damaged by a mob on April 12 undoubtedly been aroused against the Muslims.

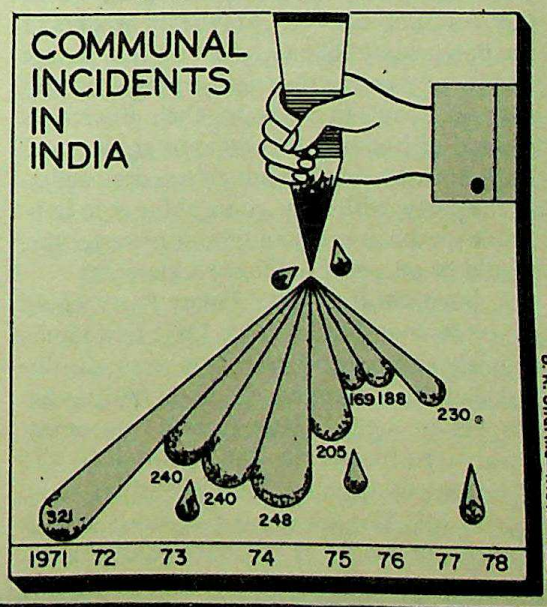
Better Informed: With the administration and the police force by and large paralysed into inaction it was left to the Tata Companies, Tata Iron and Steel Co (Tisco) and Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co (Telco)—altogether the Tata complex of industrial units that employ over one lakh workers have a total annual turnover of Rs 750 crore—to salvage the situation by setting up refugee camps, providing relief, and importing supplies in a city gripped by shortage of basic necessities. Even Russi Mody, vice-chairman and managing director of Tisco, when he arrived on the scene, was more aware of the incidents taking place than any member of the administration. "I find it incomprehensible that people should kill each other in the name of religion," he said, disbelief writ large on his face.

If the chief Tata representative in a city that was almost created by them when they produced the first steel ingot in 1912, harboured incomprehensibility at the ferocious turn of events, then most of the politicians and reporters present failed either to foresee or present the facts of the case in their true light. Few of them accurately reported the communal aspects of the crisis and the extent to which it had spread. Raj Narain, raising his usual political bogey, accused the RSS of being the cause of the agitation. The CPI and Congress (I) teams which investigated the causes separately have also accused the RSS of planning and executing the riots with the assistance of the BMP.

There are those who see the Jamshedpur events as deliberately organized ones which were a precursor of the confrontation between the Jan Sangh and the Bharatiya Lok Dal in the state capital. A Janata Party team led by Madhu Limaye has also supported this line of thought. Fact-finding committees set up by the Congress, Congress (I) and the Communist Party of India have found that the local administration failed to visualize the situation despite clear danger signs. The committees' reports state that the riots were pre-planned. Even a five-member team of the Bihar State Minorities Commissions which included Jayaprakash Narayan's private secretary, Sachidanand, notes: "The trouble-makers got a whole week's time to plan and prepare for the disturbances. There was planning on both sides. Hindu communalists planned offensive action against the Muslim population while the Muslim activists planned their defensive operation."

Disparate: All opposition parties' teams accused Dinanath Pandey, Janata Party MLA of involvement but in an interview in Patna he claimed that he had been wrongly held responsible. He said he had proof of the Congress (I) and the CPI having a hand in the tragedy. He alleged that the CPI leaders had conspired and distributed arms among Muslims. He says that it was a CPI worker who held up the procession till other processionists joined it. Bricks, bombs and other explosives were then hurled from a roadside Muslim residence and mosque, he claimed. He accused the local superintendent of police of instigating Hindus by arresting only them and seizing their arms. Pandey says he cabled the governor on April 7 about the partisan role of the superintendent of police and on April 9 tried to contact the chief minister through his secretariat.



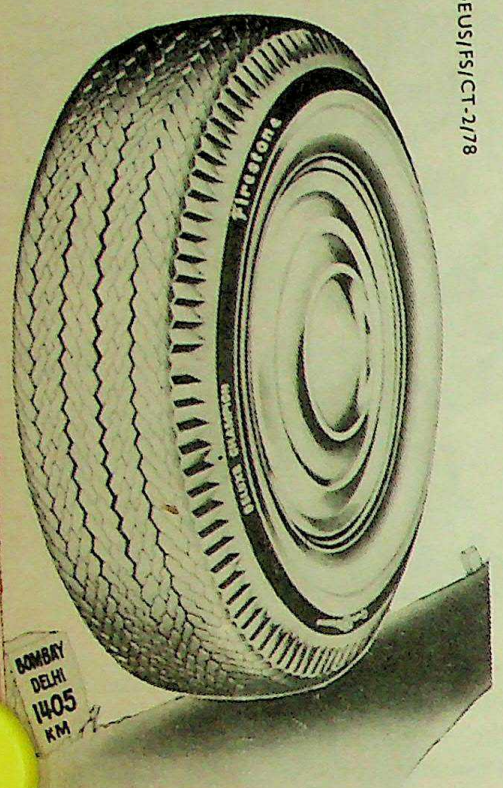
The Shahi Imam made it clear in an interview with INDIA TODAY in Jamshedpur that he held politicians responsible for the situation. He said: "I do not call this Hindu-Muslim riots, I call it inane police action. The question in the end is not one of what happened in Jamshedpur, or Aligarh, or Varanasi. The question is if this sort of carnage will ever end. There was no end to it during the Congress rule and there is no end to it in the Janata Party rule. Although here it is popularly believed that the RSS is behind these riots, I want to make it clear that the RSS has not stuck to its promise of Hindu-Muslim unity and its ideology and path remain unchanged.

"I thought that after their years in jail, after their struggle to come to power, the Janata Party leaders would stick by what was promised. I had supported them and fought for them. But now a great deal appears ruined. Muslims are being consistently alienated throughout the country. Either the Government should do something about it or we will wait till the next elections and fight for our rights to the hilt. We are waiting for that moment. We are waiting for the moment when they will need us. We will have the answers then."

—SUNIL SETHI and FARZAND AHMED

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust. eGangotri



RADEUS/FS/CT-2/78

Long journey

Another good reason to use Firestone tyres

Firestone tyres—the right choice for the long journey. For more reasons than one. Firestone tyres are designed and engineered for excellent road handling and cool running. And they give you more kilometres for every litre of fuel.

Firestone

78 YEARS OF INTERNATIONAL EXPERIENCE

JANATA PARTY

A Tale Of Lost

On May 1, the Janata Party observes the second anniversary of its formal founding when the five political parties which had swept the 1977 polls on an anti-Emergency platform merged into the party. But their election manifesto did not confine itself to the restoration of democracy—it also made other ambitious promises to the people on economic and social issues. Evaluating the performance of the party, columnist B. G. VERGHESE says that as it enters its third year in office, it should heed the warning: "It is later than you think."

THE prime minister broadcast to the nation recently reviewing the steps taken by the Janata Government over the past two years towards fulfilling the mandate given to it by the people. The record is not unimpressive if one merely runs through a check-list of items, especially with regard to the restoration of freedoms and civil rights. Measures have also been taken to give added emphasis to the rural and small-scale sector and enunciate Antyodaya programmes under various headings: adult education, community health, minimum needs, food-for-work, and micro-planning. True. Yet there is all too much evidence of poor style and lost opportunities. The psychology of change is absent. Instead, there is a sense of political indecision, pulling apart, and slow motion.

The political thrust has been blunted and confused by continuing dissensions within the Janata Party. What did the Janata manifesto promise? The Janata Party, it affirmed, "is not a mere alliance of parties but a new national party to which the Congress(O), the Bharatiya Lok Dal, the Jan Sangh, the Socialist Party, Independent Congressmen and many others stand firmly committed. This manifesto is a solemn reaffirmation of that common resolve". Maybe the leaders of the party would like to reflect on that pledge and judge whether they are keeping true faith with the people in projecting their differences instead of building on common ground and on factors that unite. Thoughtless destruction of the party, with some going as far as to hobnob with the discredited tyrants of yesterday, would be an act of political recklessness.

Inaction: If only the Janata Party would act on its manifesto it could forge new bonds of unity and rediscover its true strength. The Lok Pal Bill is awaited. Electoral reforms are not yet in sight. There is little movement towards restructuring Panchayati Raj, and of reform of urban government there is no sign at all. The movement towards broadcasting autonomy is unconscionably slow. Little thinking is evident on cheaper options for mass transport systems or on a national energy policy. Necessary legislation to give coherence to industrial relations and purposeful trade unionism has been stalled and a commendable effort towards attempting to structure the beginnings of a wages, incomes and prices policy has been aborted, with business interests inweighing against necessary moves to enlarge and refine the public distribution system through a grass-roots network of fair price shops reaching down to population clusters of 2,000 even in the rural areas. One could go on. Even debate on these issues is muted and little effort has been made to build public opinion.

Lip service is constantly paid to agrarian reform but precious little has been done about it, especially in the Janata Party ruled states. On the contrary there has been every evidence of masterly inactivity for lack of political will. The matter has acquired urgency because although the new farm technology is neutral to scale, small and marginal farmers and insecure tenants and share-croppers do not enjoy equal access or incentive to adopt improved methods or use the available infrastructure. The dice is loaded against them.

The second green revolution that is now under way in both dry and irrigated regions all over the country is going to accentuate agrarian tensions as the new technology holds out promise of great gain to those that have. Pressures on the small, underprivileged and unorganized must therefore be expected to mount progressively and give a sharper edge to caste-class conflicts that could end in bloody violence. At that stage, problems of law and order and crisis management will usurp all attention and the development process will suffer just when it could gain significant acceleration.

It is precisely on such a wave of diversified agricultural growth with equity that the Janata Party could begin to deliver on its promise of the New Village and the right to work. It would sometimes appear that the nature of the problems and opportunities ahead are not comprehended at all by politicians who, like some generals, fussily plan to fight yesterday's wars.

Vital Issues: Likewise, inadequate thought has been given to emerging issues of water policy, especially in the dry belt. Who owns water? How should it be distributed? Should there be any priorities or prohibitions regarding its use? And how should it be priced? In the semi-arid tracts, water, not land, is the critical constraint. With the new dry-farming technology coming into vogue

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Lost Opportunities

and with the increasing exploitation of groundwater and surface flows, appropriate water policies need to be articulated. These are not merely technical but vital political issues.

While these issues have been sidetracked, national attention has been strangely diverted to a total red herring, the so-called Garland Canal Scheme to which a fascinated prime minister has given more publicity than to any other single project in any field over the past two years. He has now told Parliament that the scheme, earlier referred to the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) on grounds that are not at all clear, has now been additionally referred to the World Bank and to Soviet experts. This would be unexceptionable but for the fact that the Garland Canal Scheme has been dismissed as technically unfeasible, scientifically unsound, and incoherently expressed by all competent Indian water resource, scientific and administrative departments as well as the Planning Commission.

If a further scientific and technical discussion were necessary in India this could have been easily organized. But what has happened is that the entire body of Indian scientific and professional opinion has been totally bypassed to project abroad a scheme which, if feasible, would profoundly affect the very basis of planning, national development priorities and foreign policy.

Disservice: Equally striking is the fact that the author of the Garland Canal Project, Captain Dinshaw Dastur, has been unable to defend or scientifically explain his project in public gatherings or symposia. Everyone is entitled to advance and canvass ideas and specific project proposals. But for the prime minister to divert Indian engineering energy into an intellectual desert is a mighty national disservice. The ecological, political, technical and scientific question marks raised by the Garland Canal Project are so basic and formidable that to give it a priority before all else without any known government statement of what it thinks the scheme is about, seems an act of runaway whimsicality. Meanwhile, more urgent matters wait.

A new educational policy has been promised and this will be awaited with interest. Two key elements would be to delink degrees from jobs, which should be filled through qualifying tests where necessary, and to develop part-time, non-formal and non-sequential systems of elementary education imparted by part-time instructors such as craftsmen and farmers drawn from local communities, in parallel to more formal systems. This is necessary if the large poll of non-school going children and so-called drop-outs are to be brought within the learning system.

The near-total breakdown in higher education especially in Uttar Pradesh and Bihar has assumed the proportions of a national disaster. Standards have declined precipitately and all values have been negated. A drastic overhaul is overdue and it would be far better to close down the errant institutions or universities totally for some time than let the virus spread.

Danger: There is no visible movement to push ahead with the promise of legal reforms to make justice speedy and inexpensive and bring it within reach of the poor through legal aid. The due process of law as it obtains today is exploited by the wealthy, the vested interests, and opponents of change for their own ends, and there is little redress for the vast majority. Court arrears are mounting. The danger is that unless the judicial system can deliver, it will be bypassed and issues will be settled in the streets and through violence.

There is much else in the Janata Party manifesto that remains virtually untouched. Unless the Janata Party acts swiftly, the time and the mood for reform will have passed and the country will find itself overtaken by events which it is no longer able to influence and shape.

As the Janata Party enters its third year in office it should heed the warning: "It is later than you think."

WIN 14 A FREE HOLIDAY DAYS IN GERMANY

Sponsored by scala international with Lufthansa German Airlines and 200 other attractive Prizes.

MISS. MEENA POTTI (MADRAS)
OUR 1978 CONTEST PRIZE WINNER—says "It was a romantic holiday – a life-time experience"

Participate in "MATCH THE PICTURE" Quiz and be the winner! Here's how you enter..... take a subscription to scala international ACTION PACKED PICTORIAL MONTHLY FROM FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

ENTRY CLOSES ON 30-6-79

on art/tourism/cultural events, entertainment, science/fashions etc. etc.
at an AMAZINGLY LOW PRICE
☐ 1 yr-12 issues only at Rs. 25/- SAVE instead of Rs. 76/50 ON 3 YEARS
☐ 3 yrs-36 issues only at Rs. 50/- instead of Rs. 229/50 post paid, by Sea Mail and GET 1979 LOVELY Pocket Diary by Recorded Delivery and also Quiz form.

FREE '79 DIARY

Send your orders to Sole Subscription Agents in India:

VIJAY STORES

☐ 231, Dr. D.N.Rd, Commissariat Bldg., Fort, Bombay-1
62 Kalyan Bhuvan, Relief Rd., Ahmedabad-1

Cut & Paste on M. O Coupon

Please enter my subscription for Scala international for ☐ English ☐ German ☐ One year Rs. 25/- ☐ Three years Rs. 50/-

My name _____
Address _____
_____
I am remitting Rs. ____ by P.O./M.O. or Bank Draft No. _____ Send me Diary and quiz form
Date _____ Sig _____

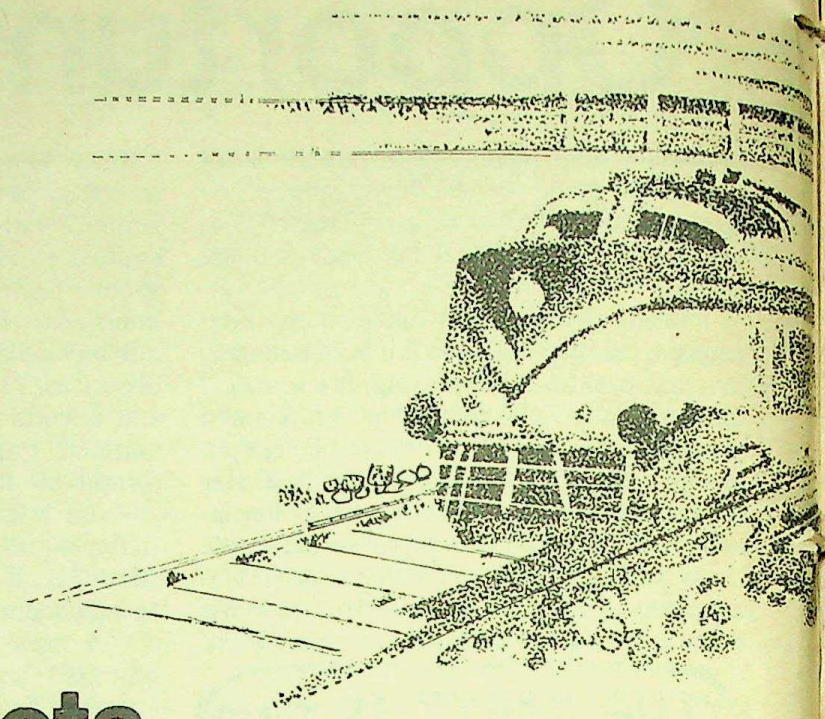
SAVING COUPON

RDCIT

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

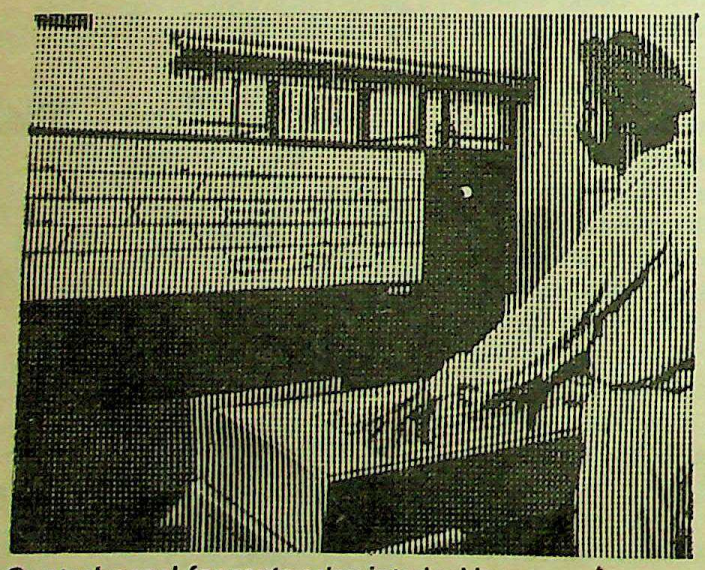
SIEMENS



Indian industry gets the green signal

as transportation becomes safer and speedier over the largest railway network in Asia.

61,000 kms. of rail—the country's lifeline, carrying people and products across a subcontinent. Where electrical signalling is helping to run more trains at greater speeds. Making the utilisation of trains in India among the highest in the world.



Control panel for route relay interlocking at Churchgate, Bombay.

Siemens India commissioned India's first Route Relay Interlocking System at Churchgate, Bombay specially designed for Indian needs. A system now being provided by Siemens to countries where similar conditions prevail. While Siemens India is extending such systems over a 61,000 km. network.

■ Siemens India is thus helping to develop a strong transportation system for India's needs. With 5 works, over 6000 workers, a training centre, 25 sales points all over the country and over 110 years' experience in India. Developing, manufacturing, installing, commissioning, maintaining electrical equipment. Transferring and adapting increasingly sophisticated technology for India's escalating needs. Participating in India's drive for self-sufficiency.

If you should like to know more about Siemens India, write to:

Siemens India Ltd.
P.O. Box 6597, Bombay 400 018.

Siemens India. Helping to engine

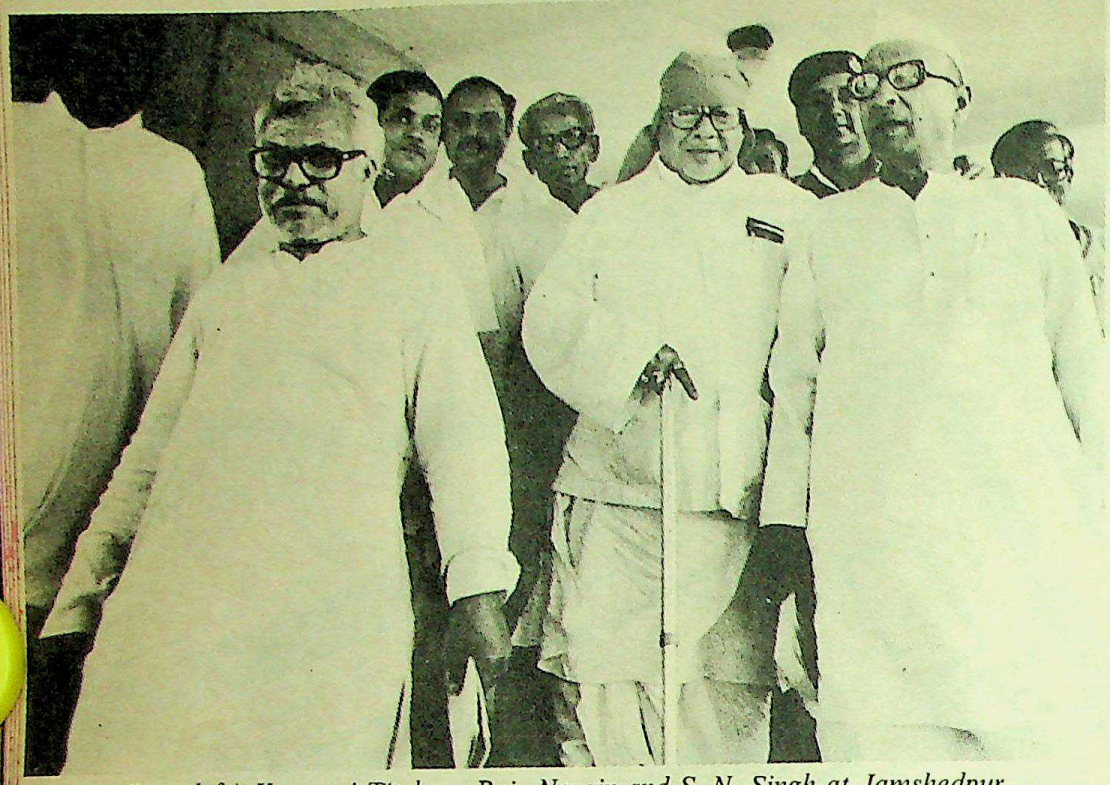
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

r the future.

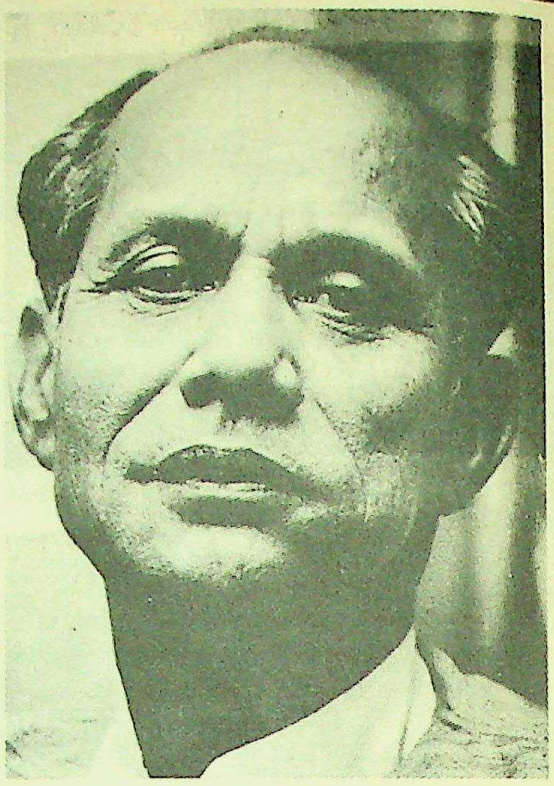
SIMOES/SI/C2/C

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



(From left) Karpoori Thakur, Raj Narain and S. N. Singh at Jamshedpur



Das—rise from anonymity

JANATA PARTY

Tenuous Existence

TWO days after he was rudely ejected out of the chief minister's chair Karpoori Thakur was squatting morosely at the house of his comrade and confidant Pranab Chatterji, MP, in Patna. He did not seem to have much to do: all morning he had been packing his bags to clear out of his official residence. Only four days earlier in Jamshedpur he had been very much master of ceremonies; he gave the impression of being in complete control politically. In the midst of questions about the communal riots someone had weakly asked if the chief minister had any plans for postponing the meeting of the state's Janata Legislature Party (JLP). Thakur snapped back. He intended to do nothing of the sort.

Now it was all over. "I was not in the least expecting it," he said, but apart from unleashing his venom upon the Rashtriya Swyamsewak Sangh (RSS) and the Congress For Democracy (CFD)—whose nth-hour withdrawal of support was the crucial factor for his defeat—Thakur was keeping his opinions to himself. "I knew it was happening—the RSS lobby had been organizing itself and trying for the past few months to show their strength. But I didn't think Jagjivan Babu would let me down."

Raj Narain, Thakur's chief propagandist, by then was shooting his mouth in both Patna and Lucknow, virtually at the same time it seemed. He told INDIA TODAY: "You want to know who bought the legislators in support of the Jan Sangh? You want to know how much they were bought for? The Bihar sugar lobby paid. The liquor houses paid. The top industrialists were involved in the toppling of this Government. But wait till we topple them. They won't last a day in the new Assembly. We'll finish them off in no time."

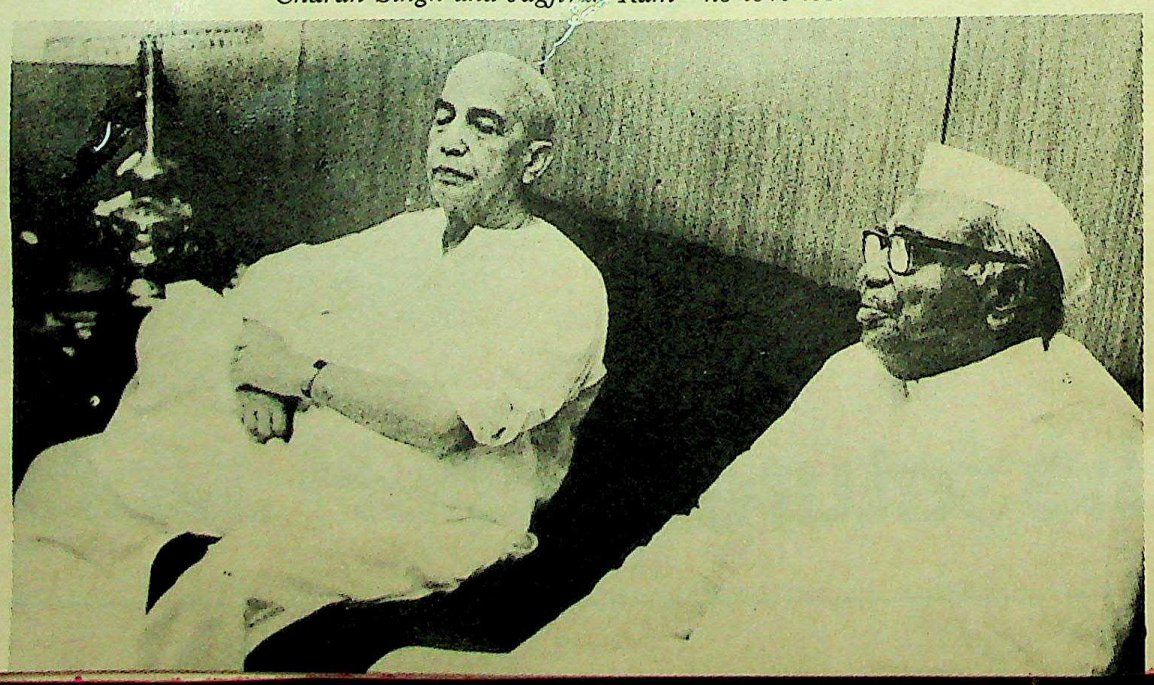
Rejoicing: Not too far away in the MLA quarters in Patna there were celebrations. A small crowd had gathered to hail the mildly innocuous new Harijan chief minister, 56-year-old Ram Sunder Das who, without any ministerial background or experience, suddenly found himself installed in what appears to be an era of puppet chief ministers being manipulated by the leaders in New Delhi.

The political fall-out engineered in Patna by the Jan Sangh (with RSS leader Sundar Singh Bhandari camping to put the final touches in the bargaining scheme) might, in retrospect, appear predictable after the fall of the last Uttar Pradesh ministry in February. But together the two states have embarked on a path that might be the final phase of Janata Party rule; because if the newly-born ministries in these two crucial states indulge in any more toppling, then the whole edifice in New Delhi might come crashing down.

Savage shows of strength in Bihar and Orissa (one Bharatiya Lok Dal (BLD) bird flew, the other did not) had their immediate repercussions in Haryana and Himachal Pradesh last fortnight. Devi Lal promptly sacked four Jan Sangh ministers, Shanta Kumar walked the razor's edge again, and in New Delhi the plot dangerously thickened.

And as Finance Minister Charan Singh, leaning heavily on his stick, slowly walked into the South Block to attend a routine Cabinet meeting on April 19, he realized that he had been isolated again. Despite his strenuous efforts to teach "communal Jan

Charan Singh and Jagjivan Ram—no love lost



Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Sangh" a lesson, his grand strategy had failed. Karpoori Thakur, his unfailing protégé, had badly miscalculated and burnt his fingers, after full assurances that he could survive the show of strength. Charan Singh's old bête noir, Jagjivan Ram, had helped pull the carpet from under his feet, and Prime Minister Morarji Desai smiled benignly over his new-found connection with the Jan Sangh.

Belligerent: But no sooner had he lost, than Thakur was on the war-path in Patna. His followers would not support the new ministry, he declared. There could be no question of a compromise, especially as his decision to investigate the Jamshedpur riots was now to be reconsidered. Raj Narain was off to Lucknow to issue more explosive statements and rake up trouble in UP.

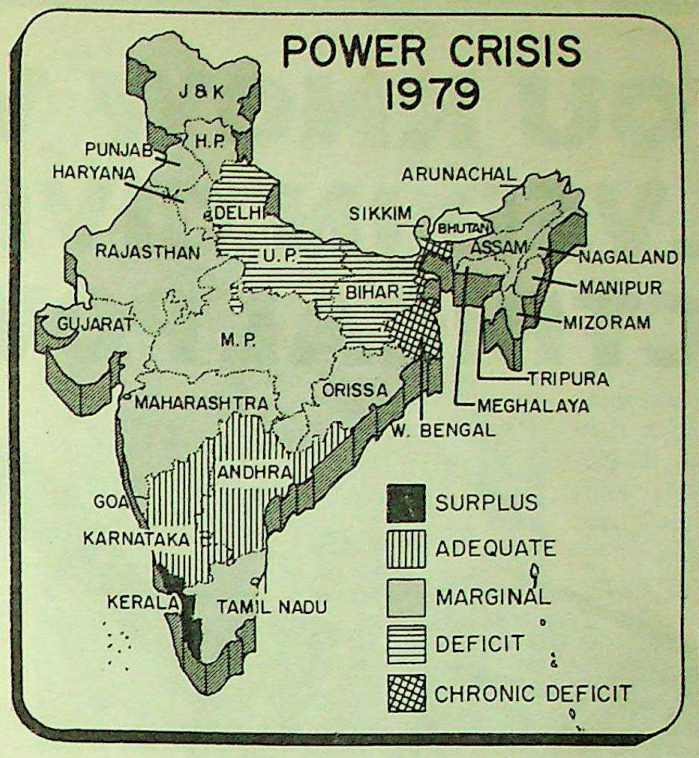
Later, on his way to Delhi and Bombay (where he was seeking "JP's" blessings) Ram Sunder Das was accompanied by the chief Jan Sangh forces of Bihar who had set him up as a "safe" chief minister unlikely to make trouble. Satyendra Narain Singh, the president of the state's Janata Party who was instrumental in winning the game for the Jan Sangh, was happily licking his chops as he held forth on the subject of Karpoori Thakur's evils. "He was weak, witless and incapable of ever taking a decision. Every body outside Bihar thought him to be a clean honest man. But in Bihar he became synonymous with corruption." As for his own part in Thakur's downfall, Singh was eager to spill all the beans: "Jan Sangh leaders in Delhi had been warning me since last year that Karpoori was eroding our base in Bihar. He had to go. Of course, we had it all planned long ago but I was not getting the green signal from Delhi. What with the UP crisis and JP's illness, the matter got delayed for a while."

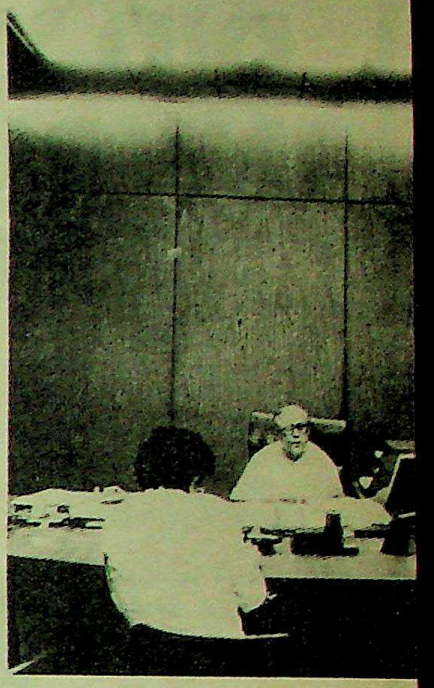
Jagjivan Ram's "betrayal" of the BLD in Bihar is attributed by sources in the defeated camp to reasons as various as "BLD leaders' refusal to return Suresh Ram's porno pictures" and the Harijan leader's insecurity at the growing strength of the Jat-Yadav lobby.

Uncertainty: But even as the new ministry takes over in Bihar, Thakur is consolidating his mandate with the help of the Congress led by Abdul Ghafoor and certain Sarvodaya and Chhatra Sangharsh Samiti elements. Already there is talk of a mid-term poll in the two most populous and politically unstable states of north India.

On the second anniversary of its inception the Janata Party might be racked by the cancers of venom and vengeance in the states but it is in the individual interests of New Delhi's seemingly ageless trio to show restraint, and keep the party in power at the Centre while the bickering continues elsewhere. No thought could be as nightmarish for them as the idea of another general election.

—SUNIL SETHI





As Bengal suffers lights blaze in Basu's office

POWER

Area Of Darkness

MOST crises are man-made, the power crisis in West Bengal which led to an unprecedented shut down of electric supply to all industry for a week, even more so. Jyoti Basu, the unflappable chief minister of the benighted state, took it coolly, as if half expecting it. At the height of the crisis, with much of Calcutta engulfed in darkness, Basu, who also holds the power portfolio, was away on party work in north Bengal. Then he went to Madras to attend a trade union conference, also a party affair. He was so busy with party work that the state was unrepresented at the recent conference of state power ministers in New Delhi. And when the crisis struck the powerful commissar turned yogi and quietly disappeared from the scene.

A further reflection of his curiously cavalier attitude was evident when he spoke to INDIA TODAY in his Writer's Building office in Calcutta last week. Sitting dwarfed behind a mammoth desk—a legacy of past chief ministers no doubt but hardly suited to a trade union activist—the chief minister's office positively blazed. Lamps of brilliant radiance shed light and more than one air-conditioner hummed away, even as virtually all industry using power from the Calcutta system had ground to a halt and severe load-shedding was being practised in most city areas. Basu was quick to pile the blame on the previous Government and absolve himself of the sudden seriousness of the situation. "I was not aware," he pleaded, "that things were so bad. How was I to know that there had been no maintenance, that nothing had been done to establish reserves and that the machines had been slogged so heavily?"

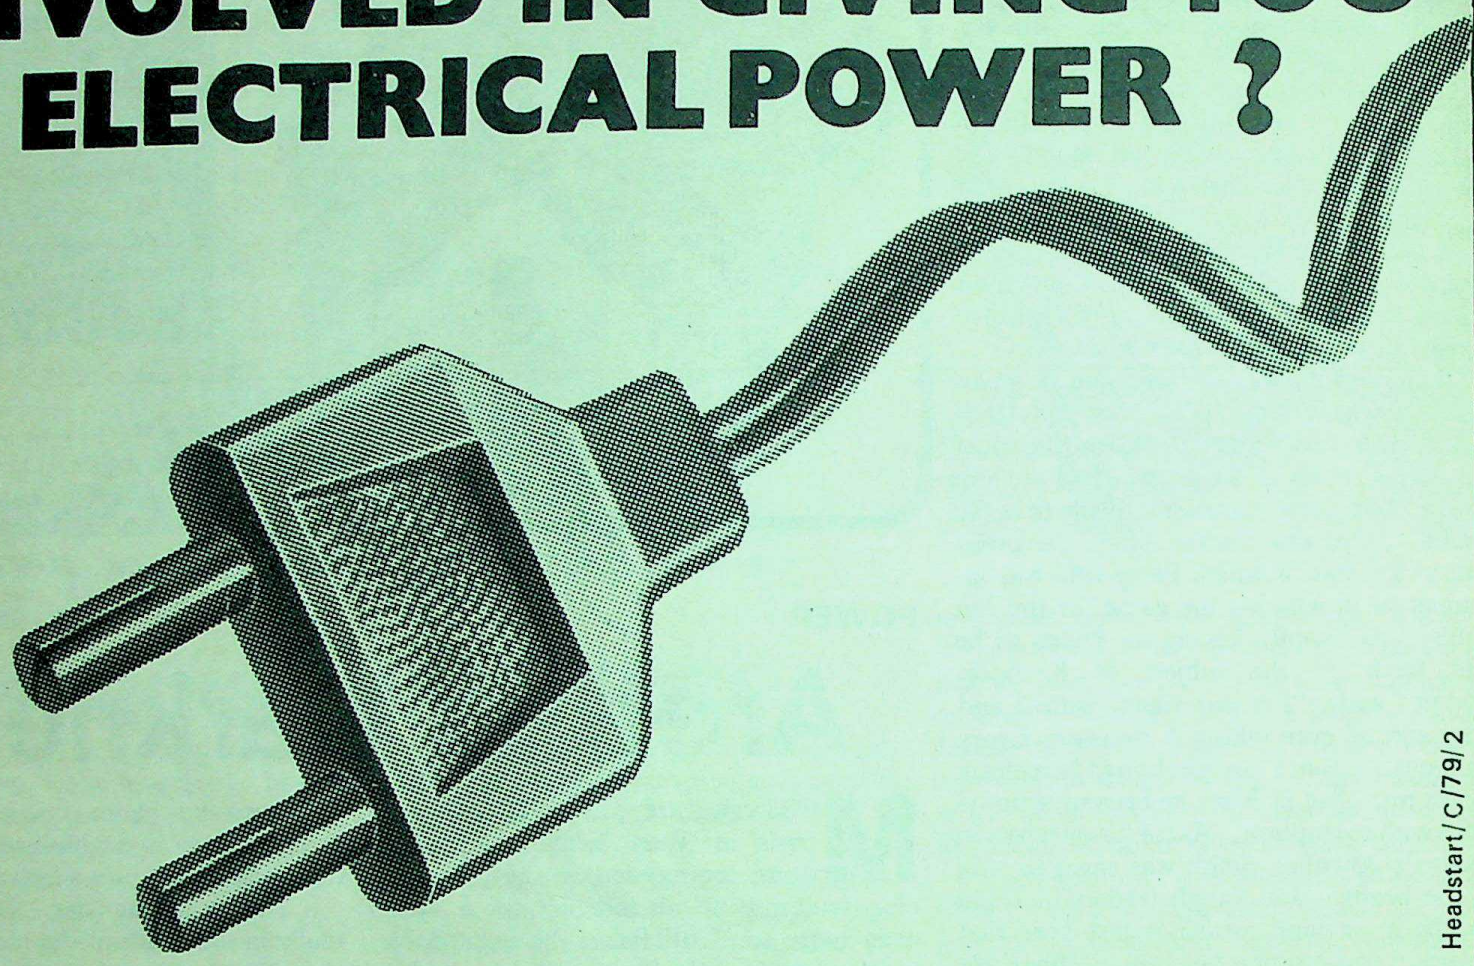
Failure of machines, of course, is eventually in the hands of the men who manage them. And although Basu, like any other politician, mostly accuses opposition trade unions (in this case, the Congress-led INTUC and Naxalite-oriented Workmen's Union) who he claims have ganged up against his own party's Centre of Indian Trade Unions (CITU), much of the irony lies in a trade union leader now running the Government. "After all," said an observer in Calcutta last week, "if Jyoti Basu had been in the Opposition today, he would have made sure that there were rallies and bandhs and processions everyday in protest against the present situation. He knows he can get away with it because there is no opposition."

West Bengal is probably the worst managed state in the country and the communists have done nothing to improve the situation. "We have no reserves and no adjustments were possible in cases of plant failure. There has been deep-seated labour tension and no manpower planning in the Santaldih and Bandel plants and discipline was at a very low ebb when we took over," says S. M. Murshed, the state's forceful power commissioner who, as one of the chief minister's blue-eyed administrators took office in April last year. Murshed insists that no one, least of all the lobby of industrialists, hit the worst, could have predicted the appalling situation that suddenly develop-

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

DID YOU KNOW WE ARE INVOLVED IN GIVING YOU ELECTRICAL POWER ?



Headstart/C/79/2

One of the major sources of thermal power in India is the ENNORE THERMAL POWER STATION.
A highly complex system of structures, it takes a lot of meticulous planning to execute.

The ENNORE and TUTICORIN THERMAL POWER STATIONS are concrete proof of our construction abilities. We have installed 8800 piles and constructed Boilers and Turbo-generator foundations and super-structures. From 1947 we've put up buildings and factories working from the foundation upwards right upto interior finishing.

We have many 'firsts' like pneumatic caisson piling, kick automisation diesel pile driving and tubular scaffolding to our credit.

With highly complex thermal power plants, tyre factories and sophisticated high rise structures successfully erected, COROMANDEL ENGINEERING makes conscious efforts towards technical advancement.

Versatile and adaptable, we at COROMANDEL ENGINEERING are completely geared to do your job to perfection.

Building from the foundation upwards.

The Coromandel Engineering Co. Ltd.,

* REGINA MANSION, IIIrd FLOOR NO: 46, IInd LINE BEACH, MADRAS-600 001. Ph : 25306
* New Address:

FREE!

Please send with no obligation.

- ☐ a brochure
- ☐ your representative

Name _____

_____

Address _____

_____

Company _____

Designation _____

Signature _____

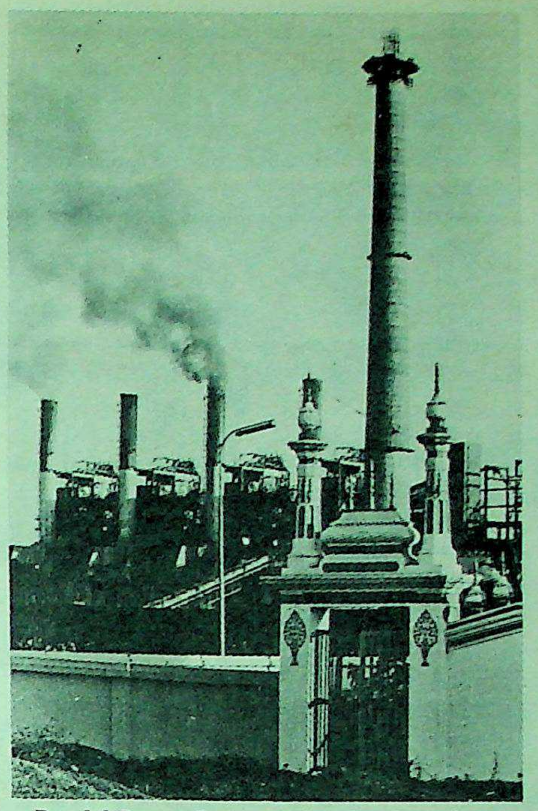
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

ed in the third week of March when the fire brigade had to be called on several occasions to rescue people stranded in elevators and everything, from Calcutta's trams to telephones, was a write off. (Of the four 75-megawatt units at Bandel, only one was working; of the two functioning 120-megawatt units in Santaldih, one worked; the Damodar Valley Corporation (DVC) and the Durgapur Projects Ltd (DPL) both simultaneously registered a sharp drop in their supplies to the Calcutta system; and power generation on the whole dropped to as low as 280 megawatt a day when the minimum demand is of 550 megawatt). "But even under an ideal situation with all channels working full blast we cannot get away without a shortage of 50 megawatt," admits Murshed, even as the chairman of the West Bengal State Electricity Board (WBSEB) S. S. Dasgupta spends most of his time these days literally going round with a begging bowl to cadge a few megawatts from neighbouring boards in Bihar and Orissa to meet the daily consumption.

As the officials in Calcutta wring their hands in panic, the Centre looks askance at the situation they have invited. A senior official in the Energy Ministry in New Delhi told INDIA TODAY that power projects in West Bengal taken up four years ago are far behind schedule. Had they been commissioned on time, the installed capacity would have doubled by now. (The third unit at Santaldih station manufactured by Bharat Heavy Electricals (Bhel) was to have begun functioning in December 1975; it was in fact installed in October last year and Murshed admits that it has broken down no less than 12 times in under four months).

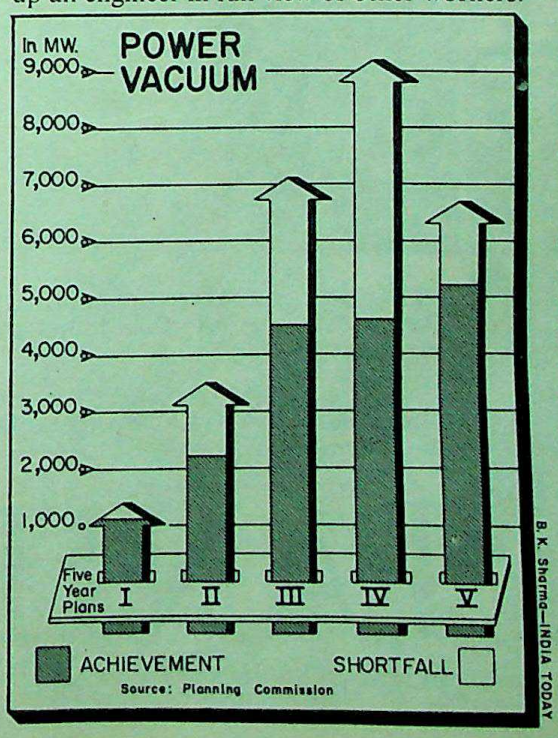
The power generation to the eastern region as a whole (including West Bengal) increased by only two per cent in 1978–79 against an average rise of 12 per cent for the country as a whole. There is, according to the Planning Commission, enough installed capacity in the state (1,500 megawatt), but the maintenance is so poor and breakdowns so many that utilization is very much below par. The administration is so negligent—and, possibly, even indifferent—that the five gas turbine sets of 20 megawatt each (one megawatt = 1,000 kilowatt) imported from Britain on a 'crash' basis have not yet been commissioned. Some sets have not even been unpacked and the packages rot in the sun.

The situation in West Bengal is further complicated by the communists' attempt to politicize every activity in the state, from Panchayat elections to labour management. It is an open secret that the ruling party in the state is pushing its own men into every crevice in the establishment and the Communist Party of India-Marxist (CPI-M) trade union, CITU, is having a heyday making rings round every other trade union. There is no discipline worth the name in any of the power plants and the management dare not enforce discipline where the cadre of the ruling party is involved. The energy crisis has severely affected the summer paddy crop as also potato cultivation. Along with erratic power, diesel too has disappeared from the market, resulting in destruction of nearly half the standing crop.



Bandel Power Station—low-level working

In Santaldih the most notoriously inefficient of all units, for instance, CITU workers prevented the engineers from repairing all the tubes of a boiler unit on the excuse that only one was leaking. "It is a conspiracy to undermine the left front government by shutting down the unit," they protested. The inevitable result was that the boiler burst when it was put back on stream and the powerhouse had to be closed down. In another instance last April a trade union worker, Kamal Ghosh, beat up an engineer in full view of other workers.



The power crisis in West Bengal is the cumulative effect of indiscipline in the plants, gross neglect of equipment, inter-union rivalry, jealousy among engineers and, above all, politics. The last is a special gift of Jyoti Basu and company.

But maladministration and neglect of equipment are not confined to West Bengal alone. About this time every year, a crisis in power generation and supply erupts almost all over the country like a seasonal epidemic, its dimensions varying from state to state. It began this year with a complete six-day shut down in West Bengal and a near-breakdown in neighbouring Bihar and it is a matter of time before it spreads to Assam, Maharashtra, Madhya Pradesh and New Delhi, roughly in that order. Delhi, like Calcutta, is perpetually in the throes of a crisis and hardly a day passes without a major trip-up at one or the other of its supply points.

Andhra Pradesh and Kerala with exportable power surpluses have helped stave off power crisis in the southern region by sharing it with Karnataka and Tamil Nadu, where demand cuts have created operational problems for the continuous process industries. Textile mills and other units working through the week have been forced to shut for a day. Mills have also not been able to switch on generating sets following the ban on the supply of high speed diesel oil for power generation in the industrial sector. Tamil Nadu mill owners are sore that an investment of over Rs 10 crore for installing standby generators of capacity for producing 1,00,000 KVA have been made unproductive with the ban on diesel oil.

The Southern India Mills' Association has warned that Tamil Nadu accounted for more than a third of the yarn delivered to handlooms, powerlooms and knitting factories in the country and fall in yarn production in the state will lead to a chain reaction in the decentralized sectors. Tamil Nadu and Kerala have worked out a power deal whereby the additional power will be used by cement units to work to full capacity and divert a part of the production to Kerala. Karnataka has decided to buy power under a four-year agreement with Kerala at 23 paise a unit.

In Europe, there have been cases where even a minor power black-out has led to the resignation of top executives. But in India, power shut downs, like corruption in high places, are accepted as a fact of life. And it is perhaps this passive acceptance, more than anything else, that is at the root of the total indifference, bordering almost on callousness, which characterizes the general attitude towards power development in the country.

It is not as if there has been no development at all through all these years of growth but a growing economy has insatiable appetite for power which never seems to be adequate enough. The installed capacity has increased nearly 15 times since Independence—from just under 2,000 megawatt

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Pantene. It ensures strong, healthy hair growth. Because 'Panthenol', its unique ingredient helps stimulate and normalise healthy blood circulation.

Pantene also styles and sets your hair for hours on end. No wonder then people say that Pantene is all you need to look really well-groomed.

PANTENE

THE NON-GREASY GROOMING AID THAT CHECKS HAIRLOSS.

Creative Unit-A 2893

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

in 1947 to 29,000 megawatt in 1978–79—but the rate has slackened off with the years and it is now nowhere near what it should be.

A rate of growth of 10 per cent per year is considered moderate for a developing country, which, when compounded, gives a doubling period of around seven and a half years. By this token, the current installed capacity should have been of the order of 40,000 megawatt, as against 29,000 megawatt—a shortfall of 11,000 megawatt, or more than 25 per cent. It must be said to the Janata Government's credit that it has recognized the crucial role that electricity plays in the country's economy by stepping up the outlay on power from 18 per cent (of the total public sector outlay) in the fifth plan (1974–79) to 23 per cent or Rs 15,750 crore in the sixth plan. But such crash programmes are always suspect particularly when neither the equipment manufacture unit like Bhel nor the state electricity board are equipped to handle such a huge increase in their responsibilities.

Bhel has recently come up for considerable criticism, a good deal of it politically motivated—the Industry Ministry had to fly out a team of Bhel specialists to Calcutta headed, not by Bhel chairman or engineering director, but by a secretary in the ministry. There are genuine doubts whether its manufacturing programme is in line with the realities of the situation.

The manager of the Pathratu Power Station in Bihar has complained that the sets made by Bhel are subject to frequent breakdowns, as is the ill-fated third unit at Santaldih which was apparently not the case with the old sets supplied by Soviet organizations. The Bhel answer is that they are working to specifications over which they have no control and if, for instance, the ash content in coal goes on increasing as it has been doing, they can do little about it. The ash content in middlings can be as much as 40 per cent which means that of every 100 tonne of coal received, 40 tonne is just ash. This leads to colossal corrosion and abrasion of boilers and auxiliaries, including high wear and tear in coal mills and fans, and eventually, reduces efficiency. However, according to some engineers, the Russian equipment is apparently sturdier and being less automated, can be adjusted quickly to take care of changes in coal supplies. If so, the attempts of Bhel to update design may be of questionable utility. Under Indian conditions, it may be better to go in for sturdier and less automated equipment based on relatively backward technologies rather than highly sophisticated plants that cannot take the rough with the smooth.

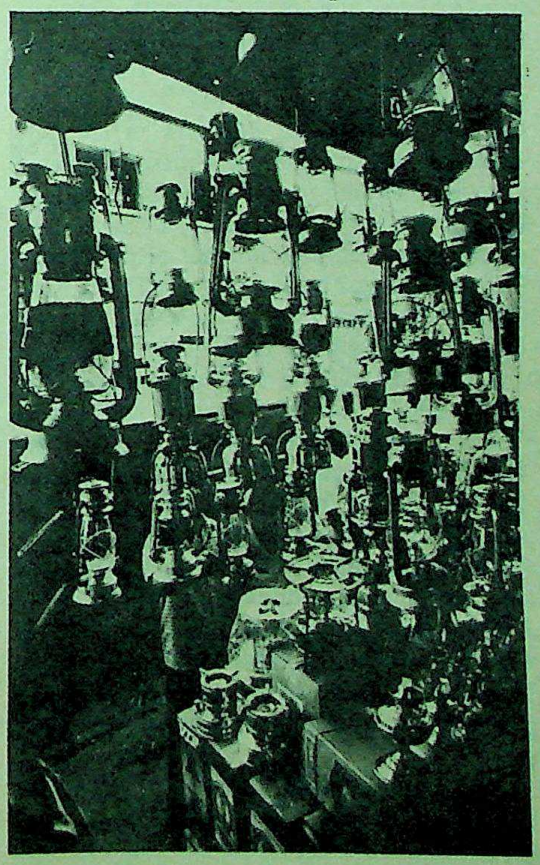
The babu-ridden State Electricity Boards (SEBs) are in a class by themselves. Most SEBs do not have trained staff to man the new large size generating units and in the case of West Bengal (WBSEB) vacancies, beginning with two on the board itself, remain unfilled for years particularly at the level of assistant engineers. On the other hand, Jyoti Basu's major grouse against his predecessor, Siddhartha Shankar Ray has been that he inducted no less than 12,000 people into the WBSEB, mostly as an election sop. "What am I to do?" says chairman Dasgupta, "I am still left with 4,000 people to accommodate."

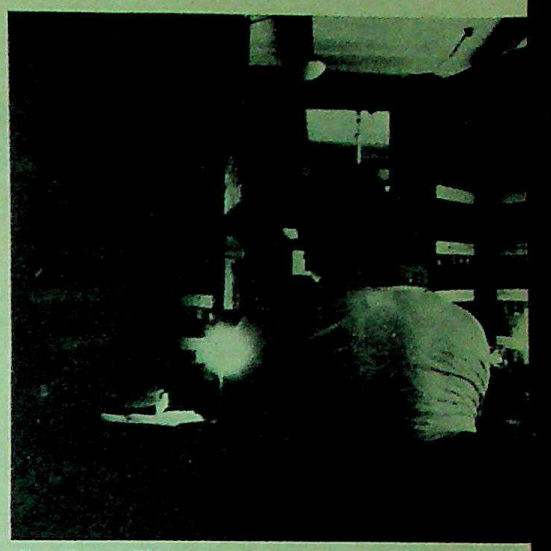
But more important than their endemic inefficiency (on market day at Santaldih droves of workers and engineers have been known to saunter out to spend the day loafing in the town and leaving the plant to the mercy of no one in particular) SEBs in general are apparently totally immune to the 'profit' culture.

The power supply in Calcutta was among the best in India—next only to Bombay—as long as it was operated by the Calcutta Electric Supply Company Limited, a British-owned company, that was nationalized in the early '70s. Since then, electricity in Calcutta has never been quite the same again. The boards have to depend on state governments, that is local small-time politicians, for budgetary allocation and this has affected their management and efficiency no end. It is doubtful whether things will really improve if engineers instead of babus man the upper heights of the management ladder.

The WBSEB is headed by an engineer—its secretary and public relations men are also engineers—but this has not improved its functioning, nor its public relations. The Atomic Energy Commission is also headed by an engineer (who is also secretary of his department and reports directly to the prime minister) but the Commission is even more inefficient than some electricity boards. The babu vs the engineer is a red herring: the management of SEBs is not better or worse than that of other public sector organizations. It just seems worse because it is not as remote as, say, Hindustan Steel or National Seeds Corporation.

Lanterns in a Calcutta shop—brisk sales





Candlelit Chowringhee railway booking office

Power is in a mess, because it is everybody's and, therefore, nobody's baby. Because power is money, everybody has a finger in it. There are, apart from the much maligned SEBs, power departments of state governments, their irrigation departments in charge of hydro-electric projects, project control boards (for inter-state projects), regional electricity boards, Central Electricity Authority, the Union ministries of Energy and Irrigation, Atomic Energy Commission, Ministry of Petroleum and Chemicals and the Oil and Natural Gas Commission, National Thermal Power Corporation, Rural Electrification Corporation, Planning Commission, Ministry of Industry—the list is endless. Any one of these organizations can bring the parade to a halt. This is only as far as planning is concerned.

Where it comes to operations, there is the familiar merry-go-round of complaints and back-passing; railways blaming Coal India, Coal India blaming electricity board and electricity board blaming railways. With over a score of organizations at each other's throat, it is a minor miracle that there is any power at all at the end of the cable.

Things might perhaps improve if the power establishment is debureaucratized and a profit element is introduced in certain limbs of the power industry. In Maharashtra, Tatas run in tandem with the state electricity board, and this is apparently good for both. In highly industry-intensive areas like, for instance, Calcutta, a large power station, owned and operated by a private sector company would keep the 'sarkari' power complex on its toes. Jyoti Basu may not like such a non-Marxist solution to the power problem, but, on the other hand, he might, as it would afford him and his colleagues more time to deal with pressing party affairs instead of worrying about such trifles as leaking boiler tubes, stuck valves and the wear and tear on turbine blades.

—JAY DUBASHI and SUNIL SETHI with Bureau Reports

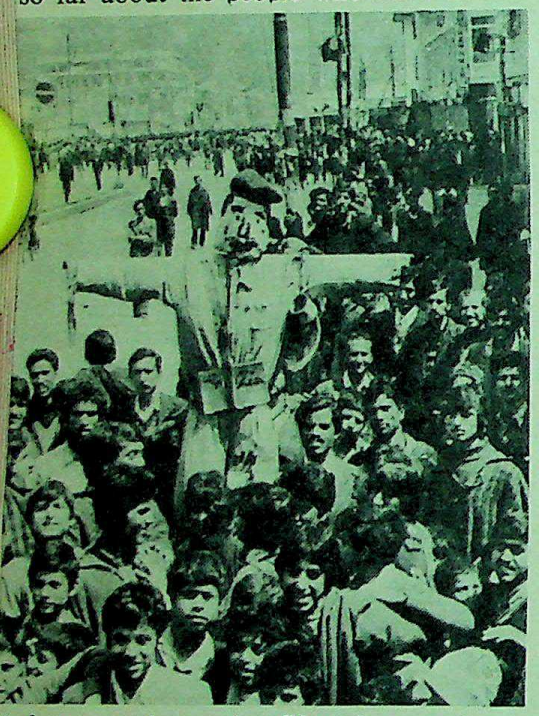
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Anti-Zia Movement

Bhutto's execution has severely buffeted the pro-Pakistan movement in Kashmir Valley. Cries of "Down with Pakistan" and "Quit Azad Kashmir" rent the air even in Pak-occupied Kashmir as anti-Zia demonstrators took to the street. The Pakistani authorities alarmed at the escalating violence cracked down heavily on the protestors, many of whom attempted to cross over to the Indian side of Kashmir.

The Indian border force, alerted by New Delhi on April 4, prevented a large influx of refugees but 12 families reportedly managed to infiltrate into the Indian territory of Poonch and Rajouri sectors. A senior official told INDIA TODAY that the authorities "have not taken any final decision so far about the people who have crossed over" but patrolling on the line of actual control has been intensified to prevent "illegal" entry. Over 100 persons, who had tried to cross into the Uri and Keran areas of Kashmir and Poonch sector in the Jammu region were reportedly forced back by Indian security forces. The official said that refugees who have managed to infiltrate are seeking asylum on the plea that "a reign of terror has been unleashed by Pakistan authorities against pro-Bhutto men".



A demonstration against Bhutto's execution

Pro-Indian: In the state Assembly recently in session in Jammu, both the Opposition and ruling National Conference members urged "steps to get back Pak-held Kashmir". At several rallies in Srinagar, speakers, resentful of Prime Minister Desai treating Bhutto's case as Pakistan's internal matter raised pro-India slogans. In fact, most Kashmiris are veering round to the view that Sheikh Abdullah's decision to support accession to India in 1947 was "right" and he stands vindicated by "undemocratic developments in Pakistan".

A political observer, however, cautioned that the anti-Pakistan feeling presently swamping the Kashmir Valley has not changed the basic thinking of the pro-Pakistan lobby in Srinagar. Political groups like Maulvi Farooq's Awami Action Committee, Maqbool Mahaz Party and People's League Party have not denounced their commitment for a plebiscite to decide the future of Kashmir.

Says a Kashmiri leader: "A concrete change in the thinking of the pro-Pak lobby would very much depend on Zia's failure to handle Pakistan after Bhutto."

—B. L. KAK

SIKKIM

Ethnic Struggle

It is now fairly certain that Sikkim's state Assembly elections will be deferred at least till November or may be, even till March next year. But some of the controversies triggered off by the possibility of an April poll continue to be avidly debated.

Almost all issues in Sikkim originate from and end in its ethnic diversity. Lepchas, the original inhabitants are today facing extinction; the Bhutias who ruled after them are also in a minority. Nepalis, who immigrated in large numbers in the late 19th and the early 20th centuries, are now in an overwhelming majority and are clamouring for their right to rule. Adding to the confusion are a large number of plainsmen, identified as "of Indian origin". The tension and bitterness created by the ethnic struggle have cut across party lines.

The Central and state governments are committed to the abolition of the present "parity system" under which Lepchas and Bhutias who constitute only 20 per cent of the population have 15 seats reserved in the 32-member Assembly. Nepalis—in 1975, of 133,000 voters 98,000 were Nepalis—also have a similar number of seats. This was done under a formula devised by the Chogyal to keep Nepali power in check. Nepalis find this regulation stifling under it since they cannot hope to dominate Sikkim's politics.

Citizenship Problems: Sikkim will probably be the first region in the recent past, where the most debated issues in the elections will pertain to those of the elections itself. After the merger of Sikkim with India, the Indian Government granted citizenship to all Sikkimese subjects listed by the former Chogyal's administration. But Nepalis who came to Sikkim after 1961—when the Sikkim Subject Regulation came into force—were not made Sikkim subjects and hence were missed out in the Indian list as well. Ironically, the political movement of 1973 which had dethroned the Chogyal, Palden Thondup Namgyal, had the active backing of thousands of such Nepalis. They are said to number about 50,000 and Nepali politicians are working hard for their inclusion on the election rolls.

Incongruity: An equally unfortunate case is that of people of Indian origin in Sikkim, who are estimated to number about 60,000. In the normal course, when a person changes his place of residence from one state to another no restriction is placed on his right to contest an election from his new state. But in Sikkim, people of Indian origin—some have been staying since very long—who form over 20 per cent of the population are foreigners in their own country and do not retain the right to contest elections. This section is likely to be alarmed by the reported remark of Ram Chandra Poudyal, Sikkim's Tourist, Land Reforms and Forest Minister that the question of "Indian" immigrants could not be sorted out before that of the Nepali immigrants was settled. The Nepalis are apparently not too keen on the induction of "Indians" on the election rolls since this might weaken their power base.

The questions of protective representation and citizenship right for Nepalis will only be settled when the Central Government introduces a bill in Parliament defining its objectives and intentions in "public interest". Until then Sikkim promises to be an unkind home for its numerous settlers.

—PRAKASH YOGI

THE NORTH-EAST

No Peace Signs

Peking's assurance to Foreign Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee during his recent visit to China that no assistance would be given to Naga rebels has come as a crippling blow to the insurgents. Particularly dismayed are the rebels—reported to number over 3,000—who have been camping across the border in Burma since 1977 because they cannot hope to enter India without Chinese assistance.

After the January 5 massacre of Assamese villagers by armed Naga rebels, the situation along the Assam-Nagaland border has become quite fluid. For the first time since the Shillong Accord of November 1975 the Nagas have taken to attacking security personnel. In the last week of March, Naga rebels ambushed an army patrol killing seven jawans and injuring four seriously.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

To add to their problems, curfew has been imposed for two months along the entire Indo-Burmese border to prevent rebels from crossing over into India. Smugglers often cross the borders on bribing the officials and underground elements have taken advantage of this. They have gone across the border for guerilla training and returned, masquerading as smugglers.

Top Naga rebel leaders are meanwhile working hard to arrange another round of talks between Prime Minister Morarji Desai and the self-exiled Naga leader A.Z. Phizo. But chances of bringing the two together at the negotiating table are slim. Immediately after the unproductive talks in London between them in June 1977, Phizo had reportedly circulated spliced tapes of the talks to his followers and after this, Desai has naturally assumed a rigid stand: Phizo has first to become an Indian citizen and give up the demand for a sovereign Nagaland before the start of negotiations.

Difficult: New Delhi may try to be flexible on the demand for a sovereign Nagaland but on the question of Phizo's nationality, Desai is unlikely to budge. If Phizo were to come to India as a British citizen, the issue would be internationalized. On Phizo's part, Desai is asking for the impossible because he (Phizo) still maintains that Nagaland is not a part of India. It is unlikely that for just another round of talks he would throw everything he stands for to the winds.

Meanwhile, the Naga rebels now in India and Burma have no inclination to accept the Shillong Accord of 1975 in letter and spirit. This has been one of the main reasons for the failure of the series of talks at Pangsa between rebel leaders and representatives of the Nagaland Peace Council.

The hostile attitude of the local population has been the result of their exploitation by unscrupulous businessmen who have converged on this region from all over the country. Moreover, candidates from other states, taking advantage of the low level of literacy, have grabbed a large percentage of the white-collar jobs. To top this, the people feel neglected by the Centre. Under the circumstances, the people have been quick to respond to the anti-Indian propaganda of the rebels.

Violence: Nearby Mizoram and Manipur have also been badly affected. With the expulsion of Laldenga from the Mizo National Front, the strength of the Mizo rebels has been considerably reduced. But with elections to the 30-member Mizoram Assembly held recently, political parties had taken up the cry that Mizoram's problems cannot be solved without the participation of Mizo rebels. In Manipur, policemen and jawans have been shot down in broad daylight only to have their arms snatched. The number of bank heists and hold-ups has risen as the underground elements intensify their search for funds to finance their activities. But until now, not one of the insurgents has been arrested.

Though the impossibility of arranging talks between Desai and Phizo is apparent, it has also become increasingly clear that Nagaland at least cannot hope to see peace until Central leaders and the Naga National Council—of which Phizo is the president—come to an amiable settlement.

—IBOYAIMA LAITHANGBAM

KERALA

The RSS Factor

A long round of tantrums dealt with by placatory moves has finally come to an end in Kerala politics. The desperate attempts by Communist Party of India (CPI) Chief Minister P. K. Vasudevan Nair and his colleagues in the coalition government to rope in the Communist Party of India-Marxist (CPI-M) have failed. The need was urgent in view of four Assembly byelections scheduled for May 17.

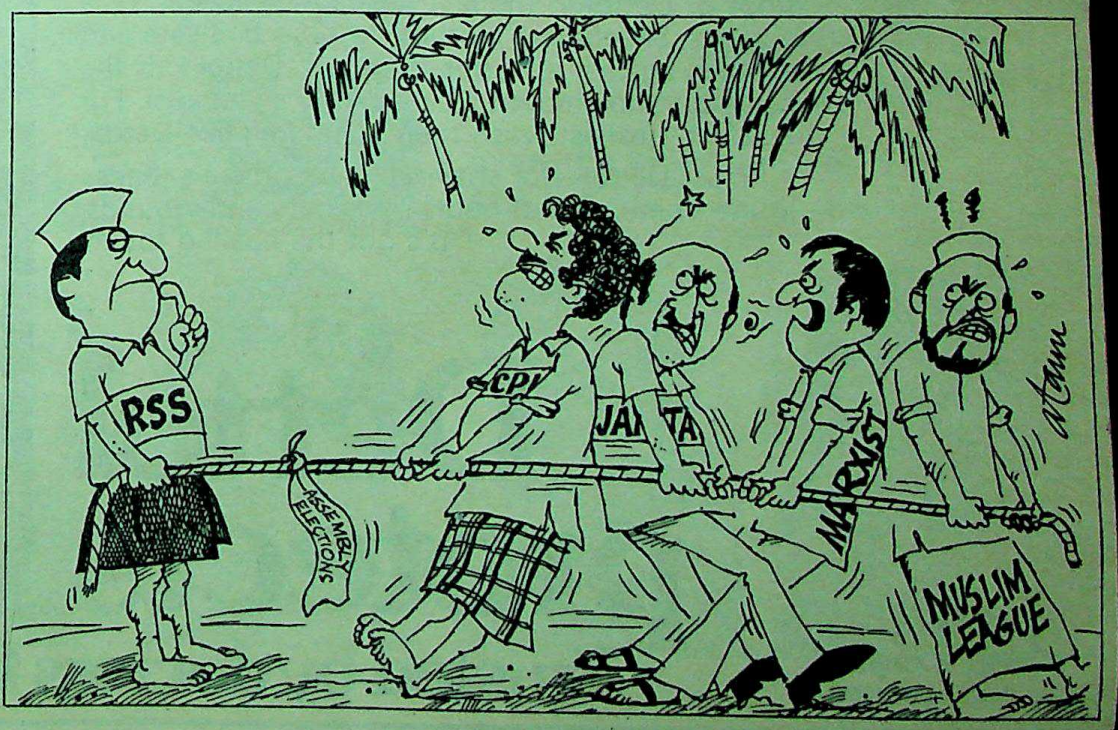
The ruling front had been going out of its way to have the Marxists on its side. On Marxist leader E. M. S. Namboodiripad's demand, its leaders readily responded by publicly declaring that the front had never been anti-Marxist. They agreed with the CPI-M proposal that there should be "no liberalization of pension for MLAs". During the Rajya Sabha election, in another attempt to woo the Marxists, the ruling front legislators gave their second votes to the CPI-M candidate, K. Chathunny Master. But Namboodiripad's conditions were stiff. He wanted the ruling front to express its regret publicly for having toppled his government in 1969 to usher in a CPI-led coalition government headed by C. Achutha Menon. But the ruling front's leaders refused to oblige.

The political sparring and handshakes between the two were the result of a common threat they felt they experienced. The Marxists were scared of the growing influence of the Rashtriya Swyamsewak Sangh (RSS). This fear was spurred by the influx into the RSS of youth of the Marxist fold in the northern districts of Kerala. The CPI and the Congress, major participants in the coalition, also shared this apprehension.

But Namboodiripad's "clean slate" diplomacy, implying that the past be forgotten, was too much for the ruling front to stomach particularly since it involved the resignation of the Nair ministry. Said Nair: "There is no need for the front to be apologetic to anyone about the functioning of its government." The front, he said, was functioning well on the basis of certain programmes and policies. But he issued a last half-invitation to the CPI-M by underlining the need for all those opposed to reactionary forces to join hands at the state and national level.

Result: The end of one series of talks for the CPI-M merely meant the beginning of another—this time successful. The Janata Party moved in swiftly and the Marxists have concluded a pact with it, the rebel Muslim League and the National Revolutionary Socialist Party. The CPI-M will contest two seats and the Janata Party and the Muslim League, one each. But the RSS factor stuck out like a sore thumb. According to the agreement, the Janata Party will not field an RSS candidate and the CPI-M will retain the right to attack the organization in its campaign speeches.

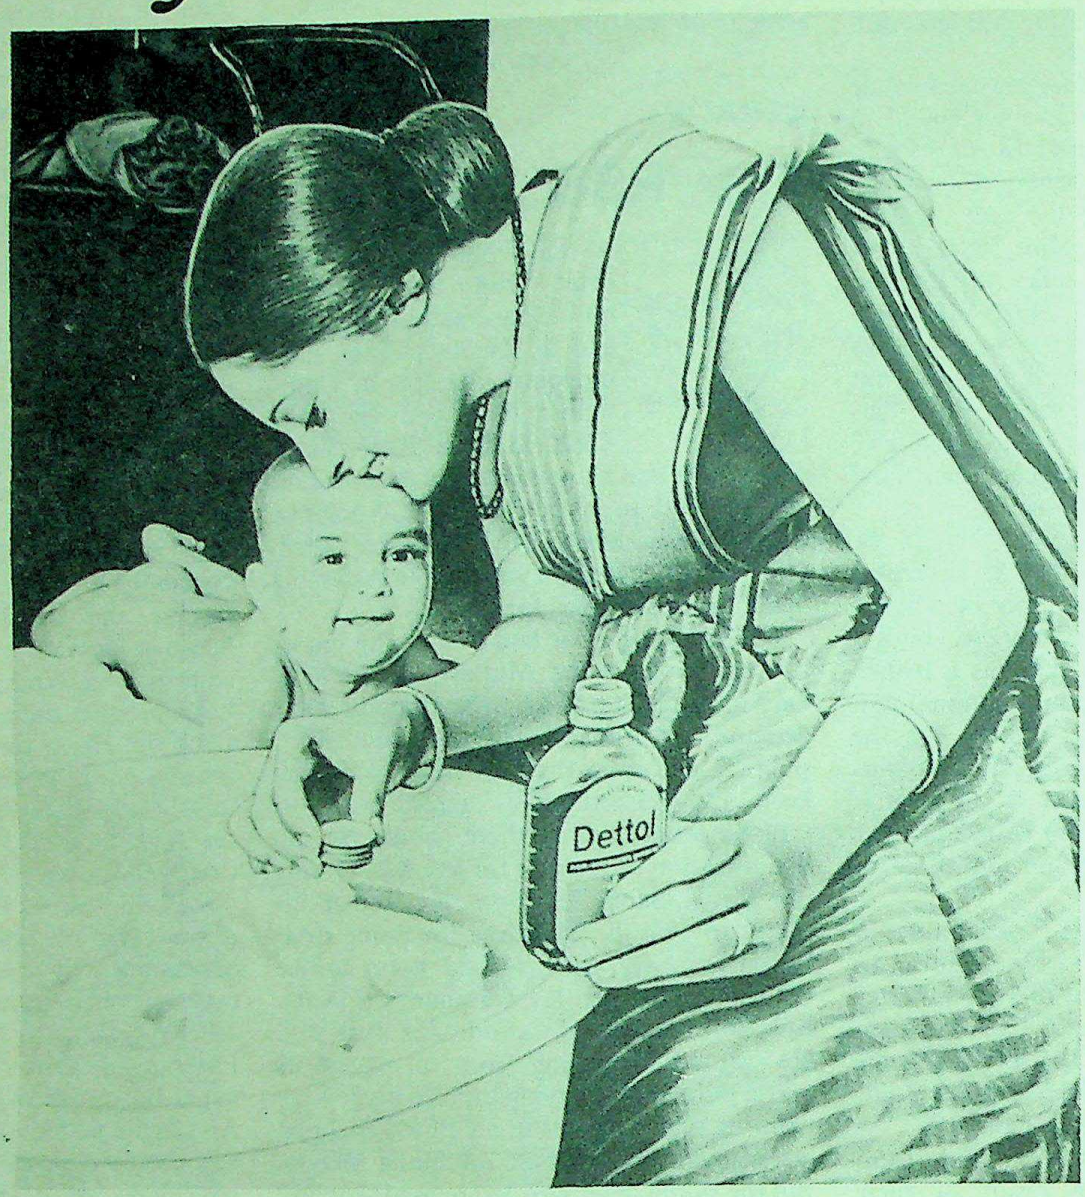
For the Janata Party it may not be such a sweet victory. The RSS element in the bargaining may cause unpleasantness between members of the former Jan Sangh and other constituents of the Janata Party. For the ruling front on the other hand, it might not prove to be such a bitter defeat. An alliance with the CPI-M, whom they have vehemently opposed in the last two elections could have led to a fall in its credibility with the voters. As for the Marxists, this summer in Kerala is likely to be a pleasant one.



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Add a safety measure to your baby's wash



Keep baby's world germ-free. Just add a few golden drops of Dettol to the last rinse when washing his nappies, sheets and clothes, to keep him safe and protected against all types of germs. Dettol kills the germs that no amount of washing can remove. For the safest, freshest wash there's nothing like Dettol.

Trust Dettol—for shaving, when there's illness in the home, and of course for cuts and wounds. It's got the healing touch.

Dettol protects

Trusted by doctors for over 40 years

RCI
Reckitt & Colman of India Limited

LINTAS/DTL-5/2417

shilpi dm 54 A/78

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

ELECTRIQUE

NEW ELECTRIQUE
BEAUTY SOAP

from the beautiful world of MAX FACTOR...naturally

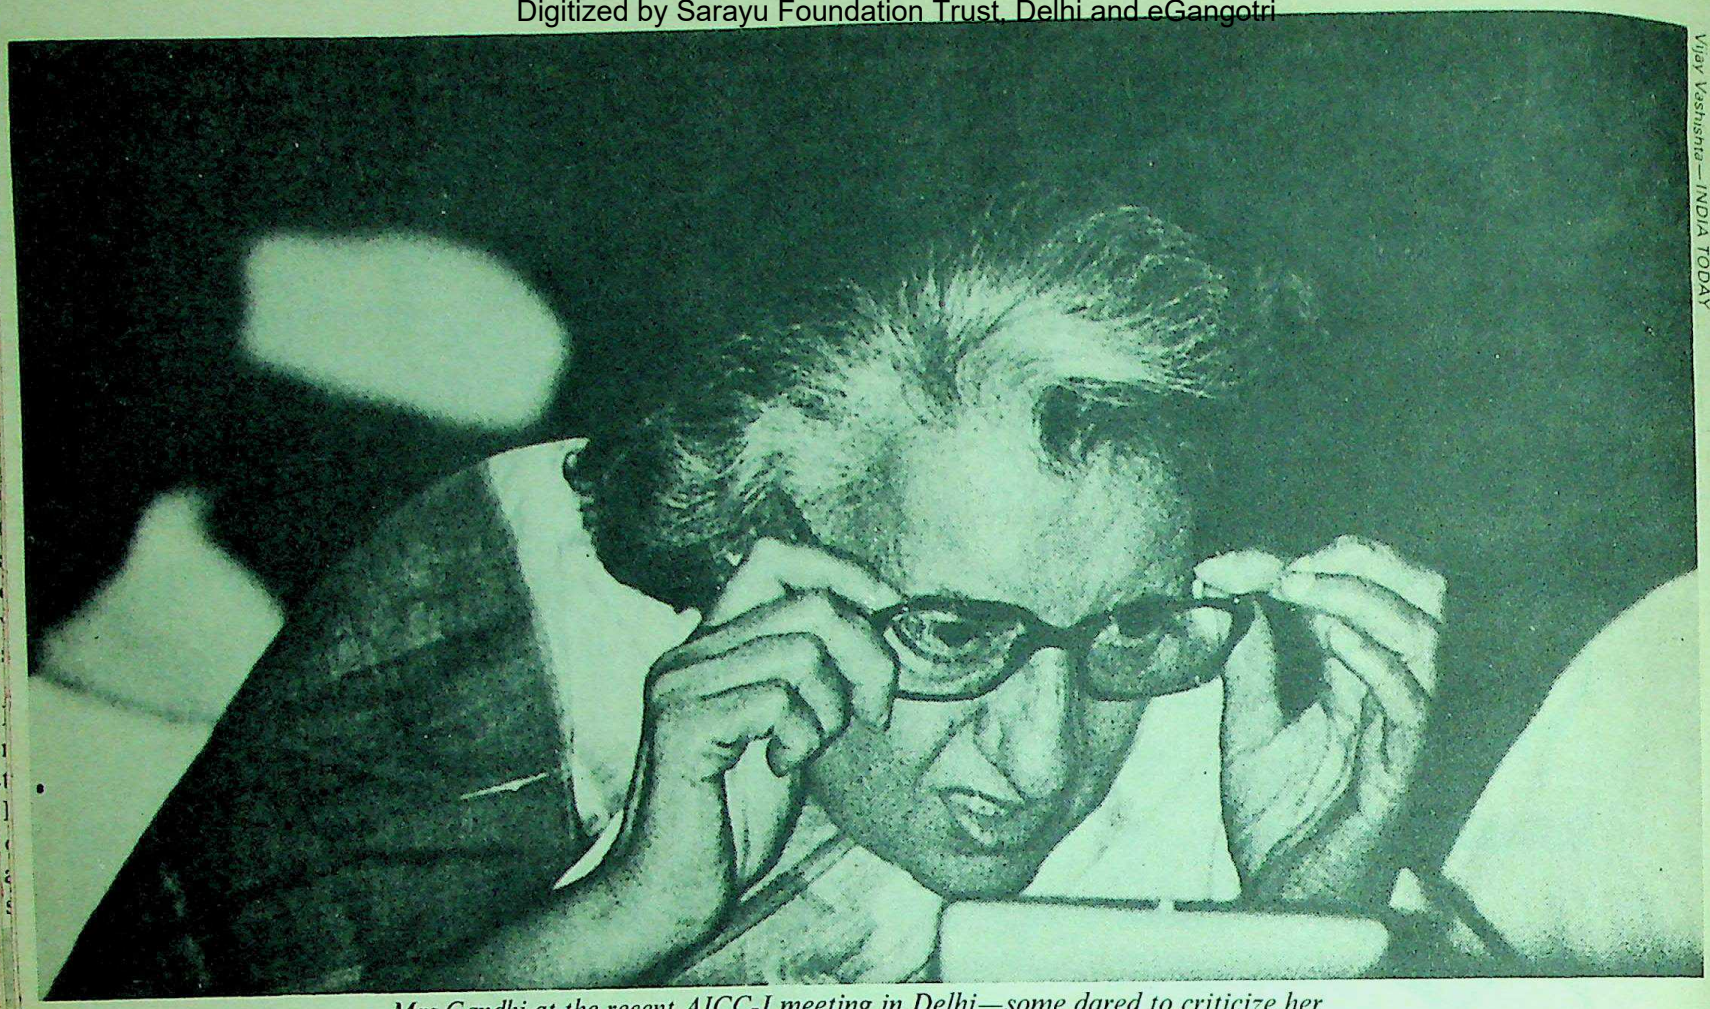
shilpi dm 54 A/78

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Vijay Vashishta—INDIA TODAY

Mrs Gandhi at the recent AICC-I meeting in Delhi—some dared to criticize her

INDIRA GANDHI

Back To The Wall

CAUGHT in a pincer attack from the Janata Party's Special Courts move and from her rebellious partymen, Mrs Indira Gandhi, the imperious Empress of the Emergency, is now fighting for her political survival. Despite her attempts to quash the Special Courts Bill it was passed through Rajya Sabha where the Opposition enjoys a majority. Now it is only a matter of time before it becomes law.

Hard political realities are staring starkly in her face. The Special Courts Bill designed to bring to book those responsible for the excesses committed during the 1975–1977 Emergency is sending cold shivers down her spine. Her partymen and women who have perceived the shape of things to come have pointed out the danger signals, but her arrogance and misplaced sense of grandeur have so far prevented her from coming to terms with her political doom. One of her former ministers attending the AICC-I session in Delhi quietly said: "She is now a political irrelevance. She will be summoned, prosecuted and sentenced."

Her legal advisers fear that the Government has at least one strong case—the alleged illegal detention of veteran freedom-fighter Bhim Sen Sachar. With less scope in a Special Court for legal manoeuvres to buy time, Mrs Gandhi has reasons to worry about her political future. When she was jailed for contempt of Parliament last December, the public response in her favour in the north, which holds the key to national power, was weak. Though there were a handful of demonstrations, some of them violent, there were virtually no public meetings in her support in marked contrast to the south. Under the circumstances a long spell in jail could be politically fatal for her. And here lies the crunch.

Resistance: To stop the Special Courts from functioning, the Congress (I) will have to take the issue to the streets and organize nation-wide protests. This the older leaders like Karnataka Chief Minister Devraj Urs and Andhra Pradesh Chief Minister Chenna Reddy are reluctant to do. She needs the support of her errant son's organization—the Youth Congress. But any such upsurge of the discredited Youth Congress and their patron saint, Sanjay Gandhi, is being resisted by a growing number within the party.

Said a pot-bellied senior delegate at the AICC-I pointing to the complacent dull assembly of delegates: "Look we are all finished. We can't fight any more. The party needs new blood but the problem is that of finding a matching blood group for transfusions. She is trying to give the party a transfusion with the Youth Congress and the two groups don't match. Naturally it will be rejected."

Pipe-smoking Urs, probably the only other leader in the Congress (I) with a following of his own, fired the first salvo (see interview). One of the first speakers on the opening day of the session, he said: "If I know Mrs Gandhi's mind, she will not bring him (Sanjay) to the forefront of politics." Hitting out at the caucus around Mrs Gandhi, he threatened to "expose from public platforms" all those who "clandestinely and surreptitiously" made use of Sanjay to get favours from Mrs Gandhi.

The delegates to the AICC-I, in the air-conditioned Gujarati Samaj auditorium in old Delhi, heard him in stunned silence, except for a meek protest from the back-benches occupied by the Youth Congress members. When Urs resumed his seat on the podium, Mrs Gandhi stared at him and said: "I will resign." Urs shot back: "I can also do that. But that is not going to solve our problems." A little later, Urs left the session. He had lunch with Maharashtra Congress leader V.P. Naik, and went back to his luxurious suite in the Karnataka Bhavan and slept while Mrs Gandhi's camp pondered over the attack from one of her loyal supporters.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

On the second day of the session, Urs continued to keep her in suspense and went off to attend an All India Muslim Youth Convention, one of whose patrons is Kashmir Chief Minister Sheikh Abdullah's son Farooq. The message of Urs's antics was clear—Mrs Gandhi could no longer count on his unconditional support.

Here again, the underlying reason which provoked the Urs outburst was the ubiquitous Sanjay Gandhi. Apparently, some ministers in Urs's cabinet like Transport and Tourism Minister Gundu Rao have been maintaining a direct dialogue with Sanjay, which has got Urs nervous. In addition, there is an election petition contesting Urs's election in the state elections of February 1978, and if he is unseated by the court the leadership may well pass into the hands of the pro-Sanjay lobby in Karnataka. Urs also fears that if Mrs Gandhi is convicted, the leadership of the Congress (I) may fall into Sanjay's lap. But this apprehension could well be a cloak to hide the ambition of a local chieftain who wants to come into the big league specially when his national leader is on the defensive. Obviously, his political mentor's sense of timing has rubbed off on him, and Urs is likely to continue to apply pressure on Mrs Gandhi's Achilles' heel—Sanjay.

Irked: Urs's battle against Sanjay Gandhi and the caucus got a further boost when the attractive firebrand Tarakeshwari Sinha, who defected from the Congress (O) to Mrs Gandhi's party during the Bihar movement in 1974, said: "Some people have formed a Saturn ring around you. People have opened shops to trade on your name and that of your son's." Mrs Gandhi, who was presiding, angrily rang the bell to interrupt her. "This is a session to discuss programmes, not personalities." Sinha retorted: "If you are going to keep your eyes closed, nobody can help you."

When Mrs Gandhi continued to interrupt her, Sinha threw up her papers on the platform and walked out in a huff claiming that she was not allowed to speak. Only a couple of women in the front rows protested against Sinha's remarks. But outside the hall, Sinha became a heroine. They patted her on her back for speaking out her mind. Said Sinha: "Sometimes I feel we have to save Indira from Indira."

It was now clear to Mrs Gandhi that the misdeeds of her taciturn wayward son were once again being visited on her and she was none too comfortable for it. She squirmed uneasily on the dais and twitched her eyebrows nervously, and showed the annoyance of an empress who had been scolded by her retainers. But she kept a stony silence about the apple of her eye, on the grounds that she would not discuss personalities. This, however, did not prevent her from giving full rein to her loyal minions to rant about the hardships of being a prime minister's son.

Ramachandra Rath, the president of the Youth Congress, said: "You are born into a family because of providence, but you become somebody because of yourself. A beggar's son and a prime minister's son must have equal rights. You can't stop a beggar's son (from entering politics) just as you can't stop a prime minister's son." He thought the campaign against Sanjay was part of a plot against the party and Mrs Gandhi. "It should be dealt with seriously when it shows signs of coming up within the party."

Threat: And to boost the lady's morale there was no shortage of rhetoric. Moving the resolution condemning the Special Courts, leader of the Opposition, C. M. Stephen, 60, thundered: "Indira Gandhi is the commander-in-chief of the party and the people of India. They will fight the battle for her; they will accept the challenge." And he added a veiled threat to potential candidates who might aspire to the benches of the Special Courts: "When this party assumes power anything will be forgiven. But a judge who offers to be the instrument of political vendetta commits a heinous crime. This cannot be forgiven."

The degree of Mrs Gandhi's paranoia about the Special Courts was brought into sharp focus when a petition form against the "black law" was used by delegates to write a note for making an announcement. As soon as Mrs Gandhi saw the note, she grabbed the microphone and screamed in her schoolteacher voice: "Don't misuse these forms. If you don't wish to collect signatures, please return them. Do not use it as a writing-pad."

It was obvious from the manner in which she conducted the sessions that she felt this was her own show. The idea behind holding the AICC-I session was to establish the legality of Mrs Gandhi's Congress and demonstrate her control over it. General Secretary A. R. Antulay jubilantly claimed that of the 620 AICC members belonging to the pre-split Indian National Congress, 376 were present at the session, giving Mrs Gandhi's faction the right to call itself the real Congress. "Twenty-six delegates have sent telegrams and letters pledging their support to us," he said. But a bystander quipped in: "Yes, they are 420 in all." And to prove to the election commissioner that those delegates had attended, Mrs Gandhi's men were busy herding them for group photographs which would be produced before the election commissioner.

Mrs Gandhi is making a determined bid to get recognized as the Indian National Urs—fighting the Sanjay smell

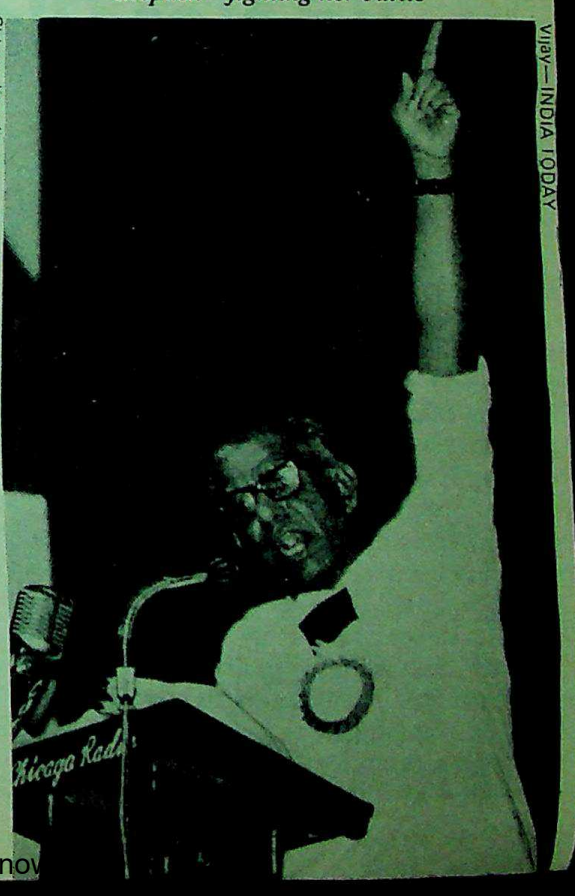
Vijay—INDIA TODAY

Sinha—"saving Indira from Indira"

Chhotu Karadia

Stephen—fighting her battle



Vijay—INDIA TODAY

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Mrs Gandhi meets Sanjay and (on his right) Bansi Lal's son Surinder at an IYC meeting in 1976

R.K. Dhawan (left) and Charanjit Singh with M

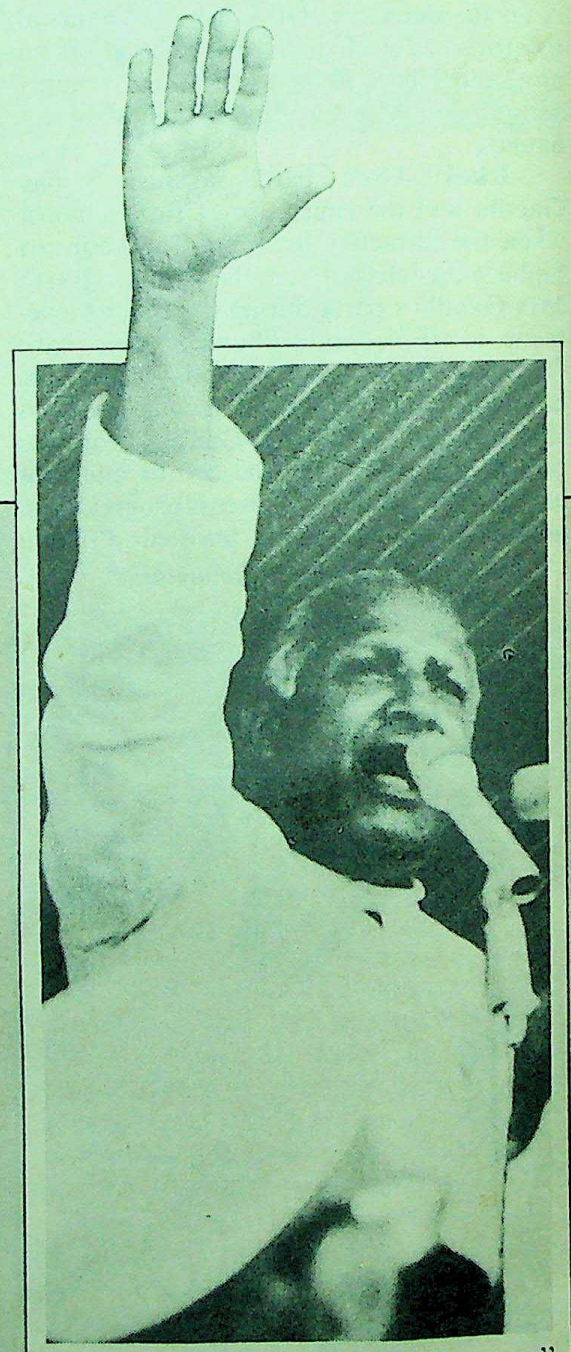
Gandhi at the Congress since she well appreciates the election advantages of such a recognition. She would not only totally demoralize the rival Congress (S), but would also have a popular election symbol and a nation-wide party network for fighting elections.

But Y. B. Chavan, former leader of the Opposition and now with the rival Congress(S) said: "They are wasting their time. It is a futile effort." The AICC-I will go down in history as a session where Sanjay ruled the roost and Mrs Gandhi stood by her son.

However, Mrs Gandhi and her supporters claim that Sanjay Gandhi is not in politics but is only doing some social work. The distinction is as academic as the one in the Janata Party over the political role of the Rashtriya Swyamsewak Sangh (RSS) which claims to be only a cultural organization. Said one close associate of Sanjay Gandhi: "My friend has lost his business, his factory and is facing so many trials. What else can he do but enter politics. There is really nothing else a young man who is not qualified for any job and is not even a graduate can do under the circumstances."

But others in the party would like to see the young man politically unemployed. An associate of Urs, a former minister, articulated the feelings of his group: "We are only saying it is politically inadvisable for Mrs



Urs—"expressing the feeling of partymen"

DEVRAJ URS

"I Did Not Blame Sanjay"

KARNATAKA Chief Minister Devraj Urs, 63, who is spearheading the rebellion in the Congress(I) against the return of Sanjay Gandhi, is a suave diplomat and a shrewd politician. In an interview with INDIA TODAY Urs explains his attitude towards Sanjay, Mrs Gandhi and the Janata Party. Excerpts:

Q. What prompted you to make those remarks about Sanjay Gandhi at the AICC-I meeting?

A. Some people are unnecessarily dragging in his name for their own ends. Why should it be done at all? I am not against Sanjay Gandhi coming back to politics. How can anyone prevent it? I'm not one who says that because he is Indira Gandhi's son he should not be allowed to enter politics. I am only saying that he should come on his own steam and there should be no room for suspicion that he is being imposed or that he is being built up by someone or some people.

Q. But do you think there is a danger of Sanjay Gandhi becoming powerful again?

A. Why do you call it a "danger"? It is because it seems unnatural. It is not the way one should come to a position of power. Sanjay's comeback should be natural.

Q. What would you call a "natural" way to come into politics?

A. Supposing you want to stand for elections, what should you do? You should choose a constituency and nurse it. You should work there among the people and serve them. You should win their confidence and get to know them. They may elect you and who can prevent it? It is all your own effort and you are accepted by the people for what you are and what you do. Nobody imposes you.

Q. Is Mrs Gandhi angry with you because

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

jit Singh with M

Gandhi at the AICC-I—caucus' conspicuous presence

Gandhi to bring in Sanjay. Let's face it, the only solid base the party still has left is in the south. The people there literally worship her. Even I wept when she was arrested. But they don't like Sanjay and why destroy the party."

Lonely Woman: Much to the chagrin of several delegates, the Emergency caucus had a conspicuous presence at the session. Soft-drinks tycoon, Charanjit Singh, and Mrs Gandhi's Man Friday R.K. Dhawan hovered around the dais. Stephen and several delegates even made a plea for taking up the cause of Dhawan, who is likely to face a Special Courts trial for alleged Emergency excesses. Several delegates fulminated against his presence—he is not an AICC member—but could do little without annoying Mrs Gandhi. Said one Bihari member: "We have got to be grateful for small mercies. At least Sanjay is not on the stage and Dhawan hasn't yet been made the party general secretary."

Other delegates secretly criticized her autocratic style of leadership. Said a Congress (I) MP: "She has alienated most of her close colleagues by playing one against the other. She is a very lonely woman and her son makes it worse by not letting anyone come close to her." When Sinha criticized Sanjay, Mrs Gandhi angrily told her: "You seem to know more about Sanjay." Sinha snapped back: "I am glad you don't know."

But others do know, and the present rumblings may develop into a bigger rebellion if Mrs Gandhi does not mend her ways. As long as she continues to be surrounded by her Emergency hangers-on, and is secretly influenced or controlled by her son, the hopes of her political revival look dim. Also, she now lacks the clout of political office to silence her critics who now see through her political game. Although, her biggest asset remains as the prime vote-catcher among all the Opposition parties, the revelations of the Shah Commission and Moynihan's allegations (see Books) have shown her to be a political leader without any scruples.

Few of the mature members in her party have any illusions about her using the party as a shield to protect herself and Sanjay from the Special Courts. It was aptly summed up by an elderly Congress (I) legislator from Andhra Pradesh: "Mrs Gandhi is playing for short term stakes. She is now preoccupied with escaping from the Special Courts and she thinks only Sanjay and his unruly Youth Congress can help her. Therefore, she is prepared to even risk the break-up of the party if that could get her off the hook." But that just might be one risk too many.

HOWEVER, taking risks is nothing new to Mrs Gandhi. She is used to them as a duck is to water. When cornered by the Allahabad High Court decision, she leapt back like a wounded tigress, declared the Emergency, changed the Constitution and imprisoned thousands of innocent people, all in her selfish interest to remain in power. For 18 months the country buckled under her

Dr Karan Singh, Congress (S) MP and former Union health minister:

"I certainly do not think she will come back to power. If the public is disillusioned with the Janata Party, it is equally apprehensive about the Congress (I). Recent events indicate that the caucus continues to dominate the party. Moreover, the party is badly split in the states. As I had said in Parliament, between Kissa Kursi Ka and Hissa Kursi Ka, a third alternative will emerge, and that is what we are working on."

of your remarks about Sanjay Gandhi?

A. She was under the impression that I said something that was unnecessary. I was only expressing the feeling of our partymen. They felt happy that I voiced what they were hesitant to speak out themselves. I don't see any reason why Indira Gandhi should be angry with me. I did not denigrate Sanjay Gandhi. I did not even blame him. I only spoke against those who are trying to capitalize on his name for their own ends.

Q. Do you think that given the infighting in the Janata Party, Mrs Gandhi is going to return to power soon?

A. I don't know when. But there is every possibility of her coming back to power. Because I think so, there is all the more reason that there should not be an atmosphere of suspicion around her (regarding Sanjay Gandhi).

Q. Do you attach any importance to the reports that Mrs Gandhi might contest a byelection from Thanjavur in Tamil Nadu instead of Chikmagalur?

A. Not at all. I take it that when she wants to stand for elections she will stand from Chikmagalur. Parliament might have expelled her but the people of Chikmagalur haven't. Why should she leave the constituency?

Q. What is cooking at the dinner diplomacy with the Janata Party leaders?

A. What dinner diplomacy? I didn't even have dinner at Chandra Shekhar's (Janata Party President) house that day (April 19). I had had my dinner with a friend when I went to talk to Chandra Shekhar about Vinoba Bhave's (anti-cow slaughter) fast. Some other friends were also there.

Q. Do you think there is a possibility of an alliance between your Congress and those in the Janata Party opposed to the Rashtriya Swyamsewak Sangh (RSS)?

A. Congress (I) is not in a position to say that they should form an alliance with us. It is for the Janatamen to decide whether they want to continue with the RSS or not, and what they should do to fight it.

Q. You have good relations with Janata Party leaders...

A. Yes, of course. Opponents are not enemies. The two words mean different things. In a parliamentary democracy this basic difference should be understood. When we fight elections we are opponents, not enemies. Both of us are fighting because we feel what we want to do is the right thing for the country. It is nothing personal. Enmity comes only when we fight over something personal. Should not we have cordial relations with people of all parties? How can we have democracy if you don't want to have social relations with political opponents?

Q. What are the prospects of unity with the Congress Party led by Swaran Singh? Is it a closed chapter?

A. It looks like that. There may be individuals or groups coming over to us from that organization. If our party grows like this, what would be left of the other party to unite with?

f partymen"

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

iron-fisted rule, till like most dictators, she wished to legitimatize her powers, and made the blunder of declaring a general election in March 1977. Surrounded by the coterie of sycophants who are still by her side, the master tactician had lost her touch, and she suffered a crushing defeat at the polls.

But after a brief spell of hibernation to nurse her wounded pride she rose again like a Phoenix to split her party to mould it into her image—Congress(I). The bickerings within the Janata Party helped her along the way and her party thundered home in the two southern states—Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh and did well in the others, in the state Assembly elections of February 1978.

With the break up of the Congress, the country is left without a national party. The Janata Party is north based and suffers from the weaknesses inherent in a forced unity between parties of a divergent ideology. Infighting among its various constituents has now become an exhausted subject of drawing room gossip. Said editor of Seminar and political commentator, Romesh Thapar: "Our politics is based so much on personality conflicts that it defies analysis of the kind one is accustomed to: for example, Mrs Gandhi's fortunes are taking a nosedive just when the Janata mess is coming to a boil."

Alliances: And if the Janata Party pot boils over and the party splits, it would most probably be because of the burning ambition of Deputy Prime Minister Charan Singh, of the BLD faction, to become the prime minister. To do this, he will need to break the present alliance between the RSS backed Jan Sangh and Prime Minister Desai's Congress(O) within the Janata Party. But for the time being, with memories of his ouster from the Government fresh in his mind, he is exercising restraint and not risking a direct assault on Desai. His strategy is to hit at the RSS in the states (see current events).

But this uneasy peace at the Centre is unlikely to last. The RSS-backed Jan Sangh is already on the political offensive. Jan Sangh faction leader and political commissar of the RSS, Sunder Singh Bhandari, recently said that Charan Singh is welcome to leave the party. "We will run the party," he asserted. His mood was indicative of the hardening of attitudes among the various factions within the Janata Party. The much-talked-about realignment of forces has now simply boiled down to the question: whether the Jan Sangh-RSS faction is acceptable in the Janata Party.

Desai, who has taken a battering at the hands of the BLD and the Socialists, is firmly allied with the Jan Sangh group which has offered him its unflinching loyalty. Ranged against them are the BLD (Charan Singh, Raj Narain, Biju Patnaik), the Socialists (George Fernandes, Madhu Limaye, and Madhu Dandavate) and Chandra Shekhar's rebel Congressmen (like Mohan Dharia, Ram Dhan, and Krishan Kant).

Clash: Jagjivan Ram, characteristically, is sitting on the fence. He is not favourably inclined towards the Jan Sangh, but he is even more suspicious of the BLD and in the existing caste configurations an alliance with the BLD could be dangerous for him.

SPECIAL COURTS

Long Arm Of The Law

VERY soon some of the top political leaders and senior government officials, who held the destiny of the country in their hands only about two years ago, will be lined up before Special Courts to stand trial for the alleged offences committed during the Emergency.

Heading the list of political leaders would be Indira Gandhi, former prime minister, who ruled the country for 11 long years—from 1966 to 1977. She would be followed by V.C. Shukla who was information and broadcasting minister in her cabinet. Both had held the country in thraldom for 19 months.

After these two come Bansi Lal and Pranab Mukherji, Union ministers in the Indira Gandhi government, and three former chief ministers, Zail Singh of Punjab, P.C. Sethi of Madhya Pradesh and Hardeo Joshi of Rajasthan.

Those figuring prominently in the impressive list of officials are D. Sen, former Central Bureau of Investigation director, S.R. Mehta, former chairman, Direct Taxes, R.K. Dhawan, additional private secretary to Indira Gandhi when she was prime minister, P.S. Bhinder, former deputy inspector general of Delhi, Jagmohan, former vice-chairman of the Delhi Development Authority, and V.S. Ailawadi, former secretary to the New Delhi Municipal Committee.

The Special Courts would be set up soon after the Special Courts Bill is finally adopted by the Lok Sabha by the end of this month. These courts, four in all, according to Home Ministry sources, would be presided over by the sitting judges of the High Courts.

Wider Scope: The Bill was first adopted by the Lok Sabha on March 9 though it was strongly opposed by the Congress (I). The Communist Party of India (CPI) wanted two amendments made in the Bill but the Government turned them down. When the Bill was taken up by the Rajya Sabha it passed it on March 21 with two CPI amendments. They widened the scope of the Bill to cover offences committed by holders of high public or political office disclosed in future during investigations conducted by the government agencies or probes by commissions of inquiry, and provided for the sitting judges of the High Court to preside over the courts nominated by the chief justice of the High Court concerned with the concurrence of the chief justice of India.

V. C. Shukla and Sanjay Gandhi leaving Tis Hazari court after Kissa Kursi Ka case

Indira Gandhi is involved in the cases about the harassment of some senior government officials who were collecting information about Sanjay Gandhi's Maruti Ltd, and illegal detention of Bhim Sen Sachar and a number of her political opponents soon after the Emergency was clamped. Bansi Lal and former chief ministers are also accused in the case about illegal detentions. V.C. Shukla is facing the Directorate of Advertising and Visual Publicity posters case and Pranab Mukherji and S.R. Mehta are arraigned in the Baroda Rayon case.

Sanjay Gandhi is implicated in cases about illegal detention of textile inspectors who tried to check the alleged fraudulent deals of Messrs Indira International, demolition of houses at Kapashera near Maruti factory, Gurgaon (about 45 km from Delhi) and Gaffar Market demolition in Delhi. Almost all important officials listed above are entangled in these cases in some way or the other. The cases would be prosecuted by the CBI.

According to the Home Ministry sources, since the scope of the Bill will be widened, several other cases not based on the findings of the Shah Commission, like the Jeeps Scandal case, may also be brought up before the Special Courts. "In fact, cases pending against Indira Gandhi and her son anywhere in the country can be transferred to the Special Courts for early disposal," said an official.

—BRAJ MOHAN

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

His Harijan followers come more into direct conflict with the middle castes represented by Charan Singh than with the upper castes represented by the Jan Sangh. And both Charan Singh and Jagjivan Ram have their eyes on the prime minister's chair.

A similar process is taking place in the Congress(I). Sanjay Gandhi is to the Congress(I) what the RSS is to the Janata Party. With Sanjay and the RSS forming the opposite ends of the political spectrum, there is a tendency among the groups in the middle to move towards each other to deal with their common foes. "There are two evils in body politic," said a former Congressman, "one is the RSS and the other is Mrs Gandhi with Sanjay." There is now a possibility that the Congress(S), the Congress (I) dissidents like Urs, and the anti-RSS elements in the Janata Party could all come together on this anti-Mrs Gandhi-RSS platform under the banner of what is now being termed as the 'Third Force'.

The go-between for these exploratory moves is the Bombay based politician-cum-lawyer Rajni Patel, who ironically was one of those who ardently supported Mrs Gandhi after the 1969 split, and was her principal fund-raiser for the 1971 elections. With the rise of Sanjay, he fell from grace and has been in the political limbo since. In the present state of political flux, Patel has used the opportunity to renew his wide personal contacts cutting across political lines to build up a consensus for the concept of the Third Force.

R. K. Karanjia*, 66, Editor-in-chief, Blitz:

"But for Sanjay Gandhi, any referendum or election would bring her back to power. People would prefer her and even her Emergency to the mess being made by the Janata Party. The present Third Force is all bogus and is merely a ploy to save the Janata Party."

Third Force: Asked about his role, Patel modestly told INDIA TODAY: "I have been given credit when it is not due and discredited when it was not necessary. But the country does need some kind of a coming together of progressive elements." He felt that Mrs Gandhi had no chance of coming back with Sanjay behind her. He added: "After all, Mrs Gandhi's base is in the south and if she loses the support of powerful chief ministers like Urs, then where does that leave her?"

The move to work for the Third Force was born in the Jaslok Hospital where several leaders of the Janata and Congress parties like Chandra Shekhar and Chavan were visiting the ailing Jayaprakash Narayan in March. Patel carried the word around and this was followed by several meetings in Delhi last month between Urs, Fernandes, Patnaik, CFD leader Hemwati Nandan Bahuguna, Mohan Dharia, and Maharashtra Chief Minister Sharad Pawar of the Congress.

BYELECTION

A Safe Constituency

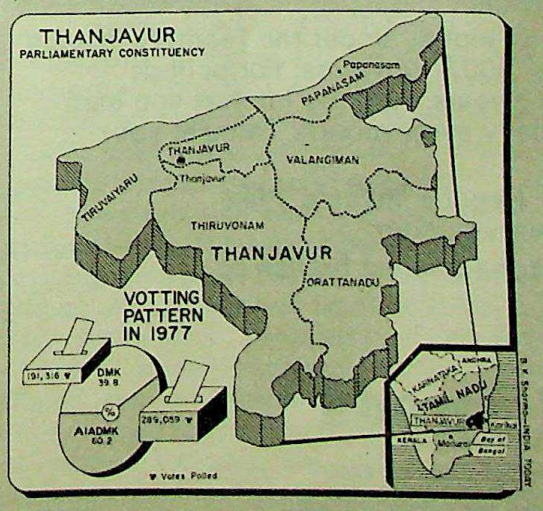
MRS Indira Gandhi seems to be looking for a seat safer than Chikmagalur to make a bid to return to Parliament from where she was ousted last December. An insecure Mrs Gandhi now appears to be turning to the voters of Thanjavur in All India Anna Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam-ruled (AIADMK) Tamil Nadu. The AIADMK has agreed to offer the seat to the Congress (I) and support its candidate in the byelection on June 17.

The Thanjavur seat was held by AIADMK's S. D. Somasundram, 49, who recently resigned from the Lok Sabha to join the state ministry. He had defeated his nearest Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK) rival S. Ganesan by a margin of nearly one lakh votes in the 1977 General Elections.

The supporters of the Congress (I) had been looking around for a safe seat for Mrs Gandhi since her expulsion from the Lok Sabha last December (INDIA TODAY, January 1–15). Chikmagalur from where she staged her brief comeback last year, after being routed at Rae Bareli in the 1977 General Elections, is no longer favoured by Mrs Gandhi's strategists. They are sceptical of Chief Minister Devraj Urs who is still making efforts for Congress unity and is opposed to Sanjay Gandhi's re-entry into active politics.

Support: But with the Tamil Nadu Chief Minister, M. G. Ramachandran, and Sivaji Ganesan, both popular matinee idols of the Tamils, willing to campaign for her, Mrs Gandhi's supporters are optimistic of an easy victory at Thanjavur. They are, however, taking no chances, and are trying to secure the support of the Communist Party of India (CPI), albeit indirectly. The AIADMK has offered to support the CPI in the byelection also on June 17, at Nagappattinam (70 km east of Thanjavur) provided the Communists do not contest the Thanjavur seat.

Thanjavur is an ancient temple town which was once the seat of Tamil kingdoms. The district straddling the Kaveri river is the rice-bowl of Tamil Nadu. It has been the scene of agrarian tensions. On the one hand the CPI and the Marxists have organized militant peasant struggles there and on the other the landlords and big farmers have been carrying on Charan Singh style agitations for cheaper power and agricultural inputs. The district has also witnessed clashes, between landlords and landless peasants agitating for higher wages, affecting the popularity of the ruling party.



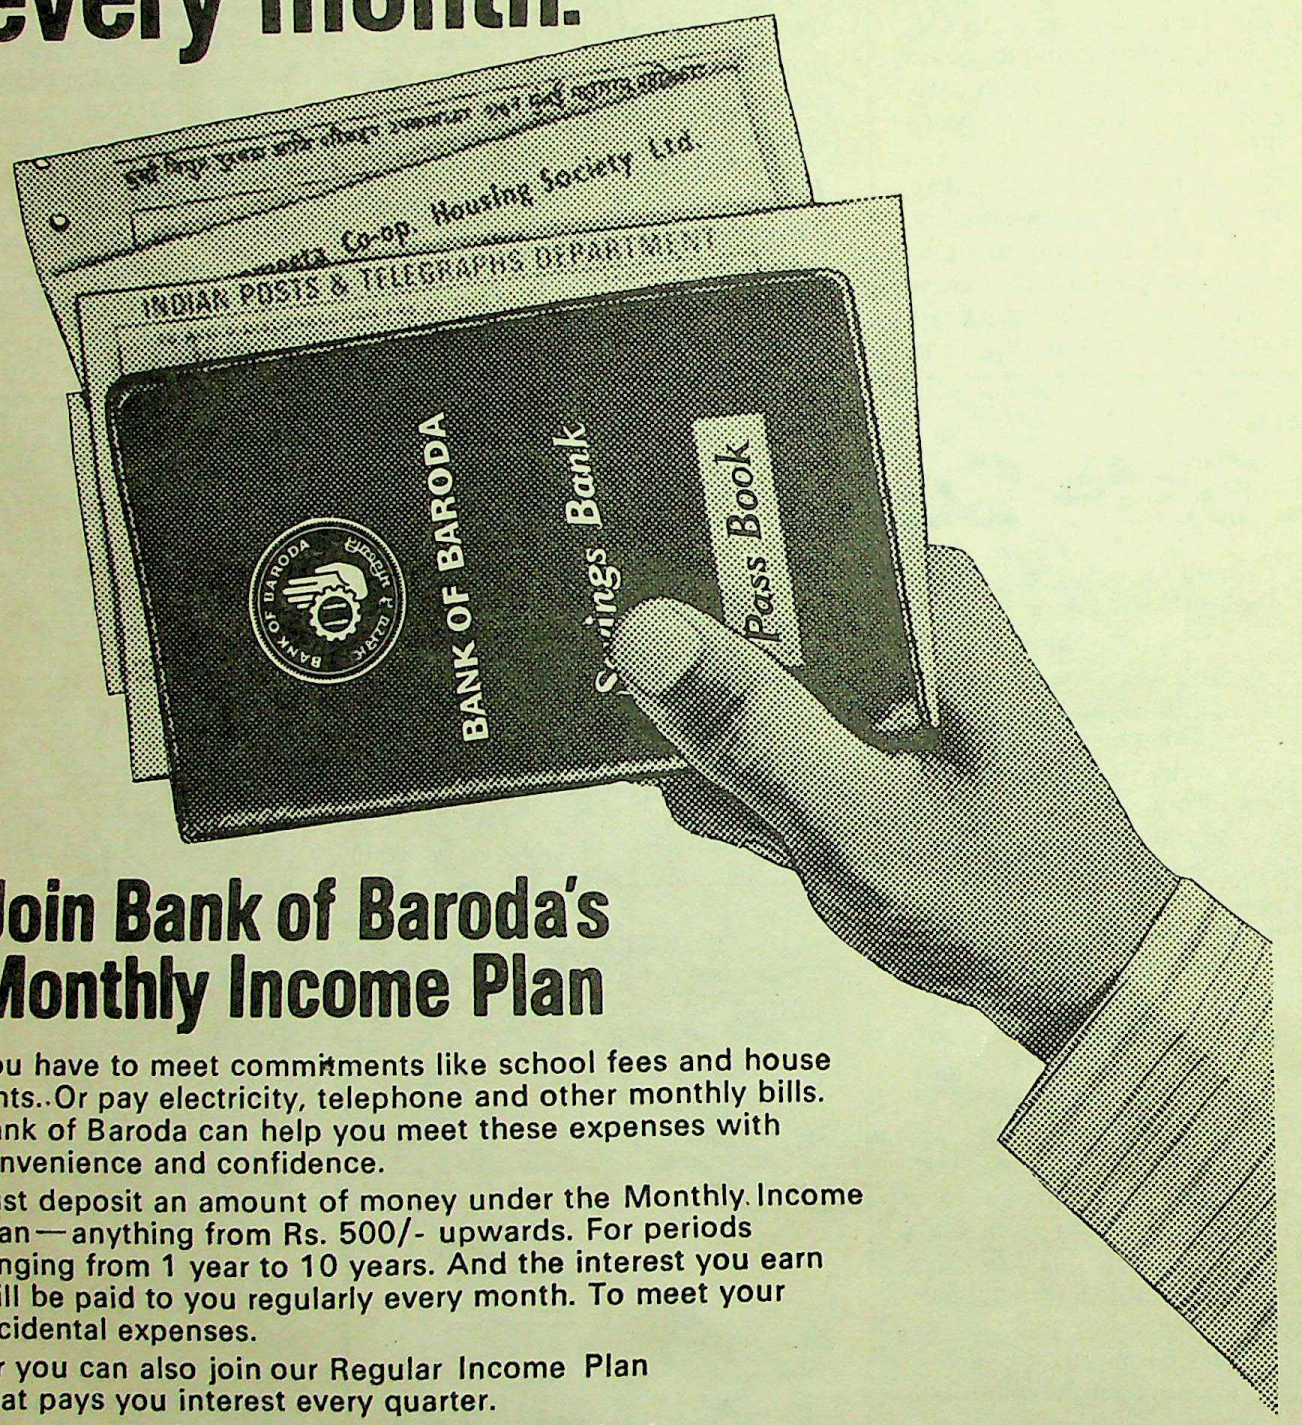
Exigency: The AIADMK had fought the 1977 Lok Sabha elections in alliance with Mrs Gandhi's Congress, the CPI and the Muslim League in Tamil Nadu, but after the Janata Party victory it broke up the alliance and hitched its wagon to the Janata Government. The CPI and Muslim League, meanwhile, gravitated towards the Opposition DMK. Exigencies of Tamil Nadu politics, therefore, have forced the AIADMK to seek the hands of the Congress (I) again. It was in pursuance of this policy that the AIADMK members in the Rajya Sabha cast their votes against the Special Courts Bill. The AIADMK badly needs the support of the Congress (I) when it faces the electorate in Pondicherry in the next few months.

The only factor holding up Mrs Gandhi's final decision is the deep division within the Tamil Nadu unit of her own party and the rivalry between the factions led by the former Tamil Nadu Congress Committee President, Karupaiah Moopanar, and Nedumaran, responsible for the replacement of the former by Swaminathan. When Swaminathan replaced 12 District Congress Committee presidents by pro-Nedumaran men recently, Mrs Gandhi promptly annulled the action as a sop to Moopanar. Thanjavur is Moopanar's stronghold. A formal invitation from Moopanar is all that Mrs Gandhi is now waiting for before entering the fray.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Now! You can pay your monthly bills with the interest we pay you on your Fixed Deposit every month.



Join Bank of Baroda's Monthly Income Plan

You have to meet commitments like school fees and house rents..Or pay electricity, telephone and other monthly bills. Bank of Baroda can help you meet these expenses with convenience and confidence.

Just deposit an amount of money under the Monthly Income Plan—anything from Rs. 500/- upwards. For periods ranging from 1 year to 10 years. And the interest you earn will be paid to you regularly every month. To meet your incidental expenses.

Or you can also join our Regular Income Plan that pays you interest every quarter.

For more details, contact the nearest branch of Bank of Baroda. Today.

Bank of Baroda
A Government of India Undertaking

A network of over 1350 branches in India and abroad-in Bahamas, Belgium, Fiji Islands, Guyana, Kenya, Mauritius, Seychelles, Sultanate of Oman, United Arab Emirates, U.K., and USA

Imageads-BOB-53

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Y. B. Chavan*, 66, MP and leader of Congress (S):

"It is not going to be easy for Mrs Gandhi to come back in the post-Emergency India."

Ayub Syed*, Editor, Current:

"Mrs Gandhi's charisma is gone and she will lose her hold. But if a Third Force does not emerge, the Janata Party with its mess is virtually laying a red carpet for Mrs Gandhi's return."

K. R. Malkani*, 57, Chief Editor, Organizer:

"The Janata has an awful image—but its performance is reasonably good. Mrs Gandhi's chances of a comeback are next to nil."

The proposal put forward by the Janata Party leaders was that Congress leaders and those of the Congress(I) should join the Janata Party, even though the Jan Sangh—the political wing of the RSS—is still a constituent of it. They reasoned that this influx of "progressive forces" into the Janata Party would weaken the Jan Sangh faction's influence and may even force them to quit the party.

An alliance: The Congress(I) leaders are not as yet prepared to accept this proposal because of the Jan Sangh. After having riled against the communal RSS for so long, an alliance that includes them would be difficult for their followers to swallow. On the other hand, the other Congress leaders probably would not have much objection to this as they have already entered into an alliance with the Janata Party in Maharashtra. In fact the Pawar Ministry is being held out as the future model for political alignments. Pawar heads a coalition of the Congress and the Janata Party, with some Congress(I) dissenters joining his ranks.

Now this experiment is about to be tried again in neighbouring Goa with a slight modification. After the ouster of Shashikala Kakodkar, who succeeded her father as chief minister in the dynastic tradition of the Nehrus and showed signs of turning authoritarian, a coalition government of the Congress, the Janata and the Maharashtra Gomantakwadi Party (MGP) is taking over under the leadership of Shankar Laad, an MGP dissident.

The votaries of the Third Force feel that it is time to carry it to the south where a similar government has been functioning in Kerala in alliance with the Communist Party of India. The natural choice for extending the experiment would be Karnataka headed by Urs.

Though Urs has been making loud protestations of loyalty to Mrs Gandhi, political circles do not attach any importance to these. Said one Janata Party leader from Karnataka: "Mrs Gandhi filed the nomination papers of Sanjiva Reddy in the 1969 presidential elections just before the first Congress split and then she went and opposed him. Jagjivan Ram supported the Emergency all through and when the elections were announced he bolted out of the party. You can't take a politician at his word, especially a master manoeuvrer."

Focus: If Urs goes out of the party, the dissidents in neighbouring Andhra Pradesh would probably also join him. Goka Ramaswami, who resigned from Chief Minister Chenna Reddy's cabinet in March after making allegations against Reddy's son Ravinder and protesting against the refusal of entry to a Harijan legislator into a temple, is one of the prominent Andhra dissidents. Lately he has been camping at Bangalore and the other Andhra dissidents, former health minister K. Rajamallu and state Congress(I) general secretary, K. Keshav Rao, have a good rapport with Urs. After his bold stand at the AICC-I meeting, Urs has become the focus of all Congress(I) members around the country who are opposed to the return of Sanjay. Leaders from several states have been meeting him and offering their support.

Mrs Gandhi has been quick to grasp the dangers of the Third Force move. If by her quitting politics, the country would become strong, she said, she was prepared to do it. But she warned her partymen of the "dangers" of the Third Force. All the "confusion and contradictions of the Janata Party" would be manifested in it. "It would be worse than a khichri; it would be a mess." Hitting out at the BLD, which has stolen her anti-RSS platform, she said she doubted if those who had joined the Jan Sangh to share power would be able to shake off the "RSS tentacles".

Opportunity: However, the result of all these manoeuvres is the political isolation of Mrs Gandhi. But it must be remembered that Mrs Gandhi works best alone. If she gets into Parliament from Thanjavur in June this year, and it seems likely, she will politicize her trial by the Special Courts as she did the Shah Commission and her arrest in October 1977. Her political creed is opportunism, and with deft political footwork she may outwit all of them to a point where they cancel each other out. She has vigour, versatility, cunning and an unquenchable thirst for power which could send her again round the country in an attempt to restore her credibility.

Most of the Janata Party leaders have stopped seeing her as a potential threat and this could well be a fatal mistake. Although, she is now on the defensive, she is not an opponent to be underestimated. And the ball is now firmly in the Janata court to take the action they have been promising for the last two years. Their only chance for retaining power is to improve their performance and to act decisively against Mrs Gandhi.

And if she is convicted, the Congress(I) would lose an unrepentant evil genius who could be forgotten in time and the sordid memories of a totally unacceptable era in Indian politics would fade away. Said a senior Janata Party MP: "The Shah of Iran is gone. Bhutto has been hanged and Idi Amin has fallen. And Indira Gandhi has so far been lucky because of our democratic tradition. Now it's her turn to face the music."

But this is only possible if the Janata musicians would stop squabbling amongst themselves and unite to strike the last note in this tragic symphony.

—ARUL B. LOUIS with Bureau Reports

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Ride sky high, or walk on the firm ground

it's the THACKERSEY blend that sets the trend

Shirtings
Suitings
Dress Materials

HINDOOSTAN SPG. & WVG. MILLS LTD.
16, Bombay Samachar Marg,
Bombay 400 023.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust. Delhi and eGangotri

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

WVG. MILLS LTD.
16, Bombay Samachar Marg,
Bombay 400 023.

The quality product.

Paper makes it better.

Machine glazed titanium-dioxide-loaded Poster Paper.
For packaging soaps, biscuits, bread, blades etc.
40-50 gms.

Also machine glazed white Poster Paper for the tobacco industry. 50 gms.
And machine glazed pink Manila for envelopes. 50-90 gms.

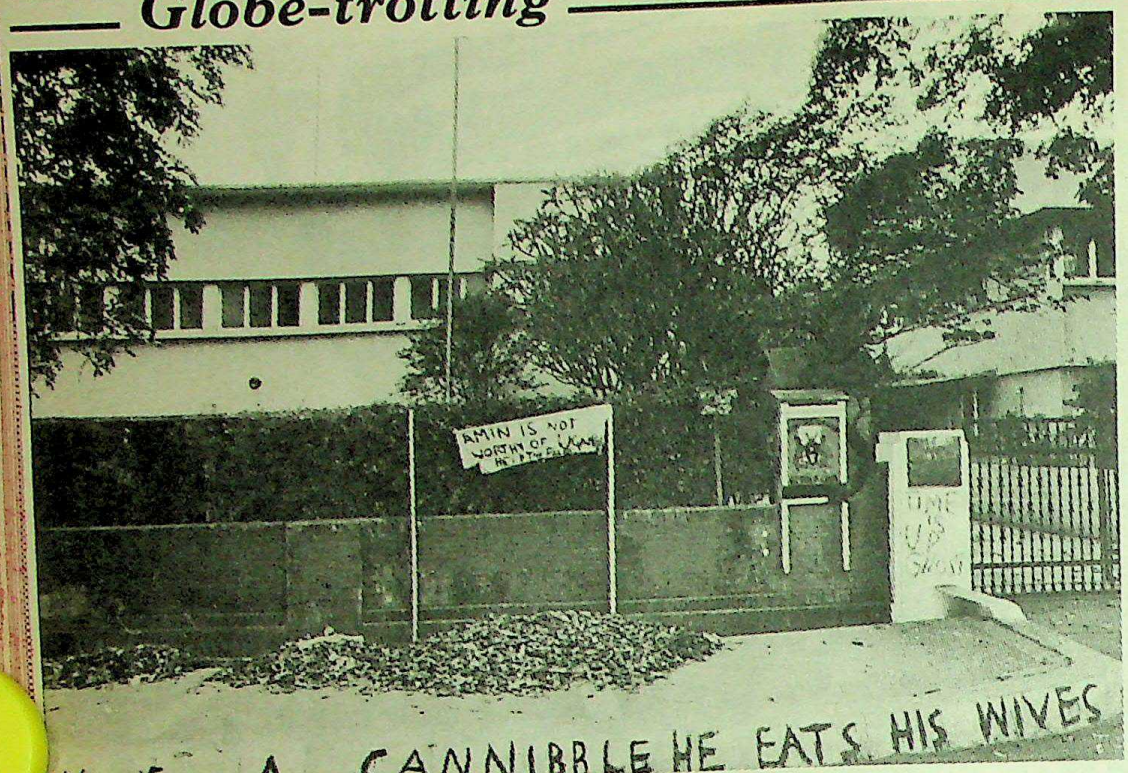
WEST COAST PAPER

H. O. Shreeniwas House, H. Somani Marg, Bombay-400 001.

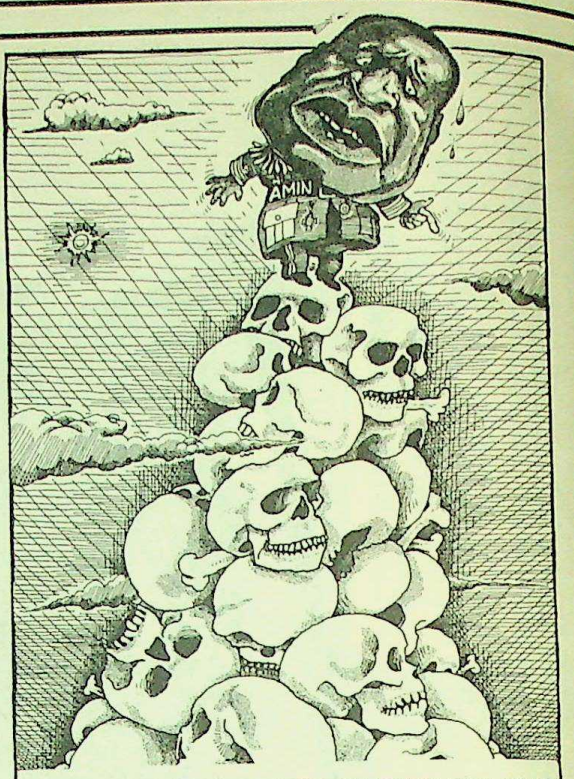
U-WP4-/9 A

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Ugandan High Commission in New Delhi—fall of a hated leader



"BUT I MAY HURT MYSELF JUMPING OFF SUCH HEIGHTS?!"

UGANDA

Asians' March Home

Hopes soar as Amin's dictatorial regime falls

NO international tears were being shed last fortnight when Tanzanian troops mopped up the putrid remains of Idi Amin's brutal regime. Amin's end was being predicted months before he finally fled, but there was one group of observers that followed events in Kampala with more than anxious interest. Seven years ago, in August 1972, 50,000 Ugandan Asians, mostly of Gujarati origin, were booted out of Uganda by Amin.

Last fortnight, however, the Asians were making tentative probes into Kampala to pave the way for their eventual return to Uganda. Correspondent K. SRINIVASAN who has recently returned from Nairobi, reports that a small conclave of Gujarati businessmen had been holding regular meetings in Nairobi weeks before Amin's fall to decide on a question of vital importance to them—their return to Uganda to pick up the economic threads that had virtually controlled the country's economy before their ignominious ouster. The meetings were not to decide whether to return, but when to return.

Some of the members had contacts with the Save Uganda Movement and had actively and financially supported it. "Now that Amin is gone, Uganda is the best country for us to be in," said one Gujarati businessman who had been living in London since his expulsion from the country. In fact, of the 50,000 Indians expelled by Amin's "economic war", a majority had settled down in Britain and built up their businesses from scratch.

Willing: Now, it appears that most of them are willing to return. Members of the Madhvani (the son and heir, Mayur, married well-known Indian actress Mumtaz some years ago) and the Mehta families are planning to return to claim their enormous industrial and agricultural interests in Uganda. Less influential Asian exiles have also started trickling back from Kenya. In the pre-Amin days, they controlled 80 per cent of commerce, 75 per cent of industry and manufacturing and controlled a total of 4,000 business houses.

Seven years ago, when they were expelled, they were only allowed to carry meagre personal belongings with them. But most of them had little doubt that they would return. "Our faith was not misplaced," says one Gujarati businessman who returned last fortnight.

Uganda's new ruler, Yusufu Lule (see box), has already extended an invitation to all Ugandan Asians to return. Lule's gesture is not based on humanitarian grounds. In the shattered state of Uganda's economy today, they are sorely required to start the

YUSUFU LULE

Reluctant Liberator

YUSUFU LULE, 68, is perhaps the most reluctant liberator in modern history. When influential Ugandan exiles in East Africa and London first approached him to lead them against Idi Amin, Lule had just retired as secretary general of the Association of African Universities in Ghana, and all he was looking forward to at that time was a quiet superannuated life with his family in his London home. When he finally accepted the role under pressure, it spelled the end of Amin's brutal rule.

President Julius Nyerere of Tanzania had stated that the only condition for the continuation of his support of the anti-Amin movement was that the exiles find an acceptable leader. Lule's was more than acceptable to Nyerere. He had been his contemporary at Edinburgh University 30 years earlier and they had become close friends.

Lule's takeover from Amin has been widely hailed by a majority of Ugandans. He has had a distinguished career in and out of Uganda. He graduated from Fort Hare University in South Africa and went to Edinburgh for his masters' degree after a short spell as a teacher in Uganda. He returned home as the first African lecturer at Makerere University. From 1954 to 1961 he was, with Apolo Koronde and Zekeria Mungonya, one of the three African ministers in the colonial government. He was later appointed chairman of the Uganda Public Service Commission, the Ugandan equivalent of the Union Public Service Commission in India, which appoints civil servants.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum

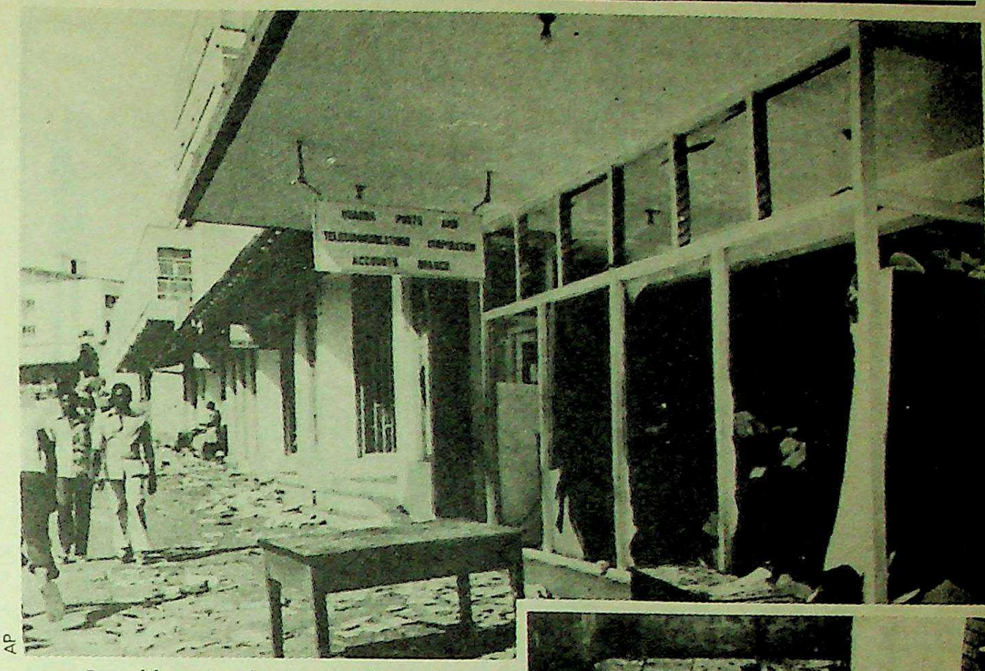
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

wheels of commerce moving again.

The collapse of Idi Amin has left Uganda literally in a shambles. Hundreds of Ugandans have taken the opportunity to seize whatever they can carry from abandoned banks, shops and houses. Entire offices have been stripped of furniture and equipment. Under Amin's rule, the machinery of government had ground to a halt and the coffee, tea, tobacco, sugar and cotton estates, formerly run mainly by Ugandan Asians, had been left to rot.

Buried Treasure: It is obvious that the Asians who are returning to Uganda will not exercise the same control over the country's economy that they did before. According to one spokesman, the majority have plans to start off with small-scale industries. A large number of them freely admit that they had buried most of their financial wealth in various places, and that they would now try to recover it. Though the task of rebuilding their's, and Uganda's, shattered economy is a daunting one, the eventual rewards could well justify the risk in returning to Uganda to pick up the threads.

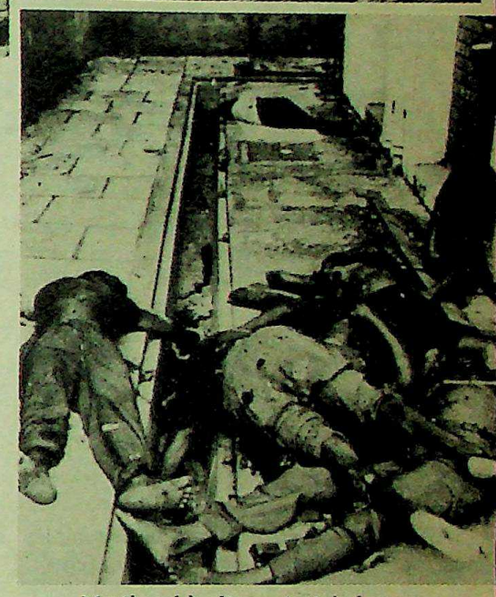
Uganda's broad agricultural base and its fledgling mining industry makes it one developing country with almost unlimited potential. But the suicidal economic policies of Amin have taken Uganda back by at least a quarter of a century. "The infrastructure is completely destroyed," stated Lule last fortnight. "We have some crops but we can't even move them because of the chaotic state of the roads and the railways."



AP

Post-liberation looting in Kampala

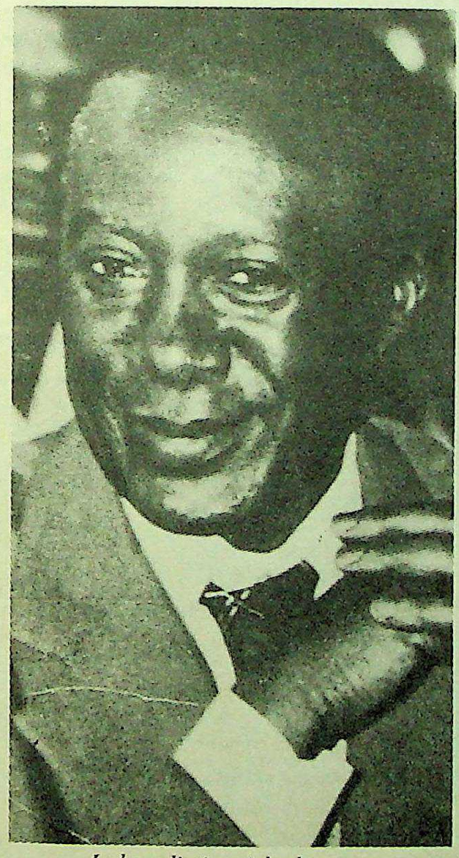
Good Scope: For an enterprising businessman—and Uganda's Gujarati business community is if anything enterprising—the sky is the limit. Virtually everything—from consumer goods to soap to insecticides and agricultural tools—is in great demand. Whatever products are available are beyond the reach of most consumers. A bottle of milk is currently selling for $3 (Rs 24) and a pair of ordinary trousers costs around $200 (Rs 1,600). The biggest hit has been the country's vast acreage of cash crops. Uganda, once the largest coffee exporter in the Commonwealth, now has barely enough to satisfy local needs.



Mutilated bodies—Amin's legacy

The Government has promised to try and pay as compensation an estimated $200 million (Rs 160 crore) to those whose assets were confiscated by Amin. The return of a large chunk of the 50,000 Asians who were expelled will give the country's economy a major boost. The Ugandan Asians also accounted for a large percentage of the country's managerial, technical and commercial manpower, and though life will be painfully difficult in the initial stages, a large number of them hope to return and take up new jobs in post-Amin Uganda.

But no matter how successful their efforts are, it will be a long time before Ugandan Asians can think of being economically restored to pre-Amin levels. Judging by the mess the country is in, things will get a lot worse before they start getting better.



Lule—distinguished career

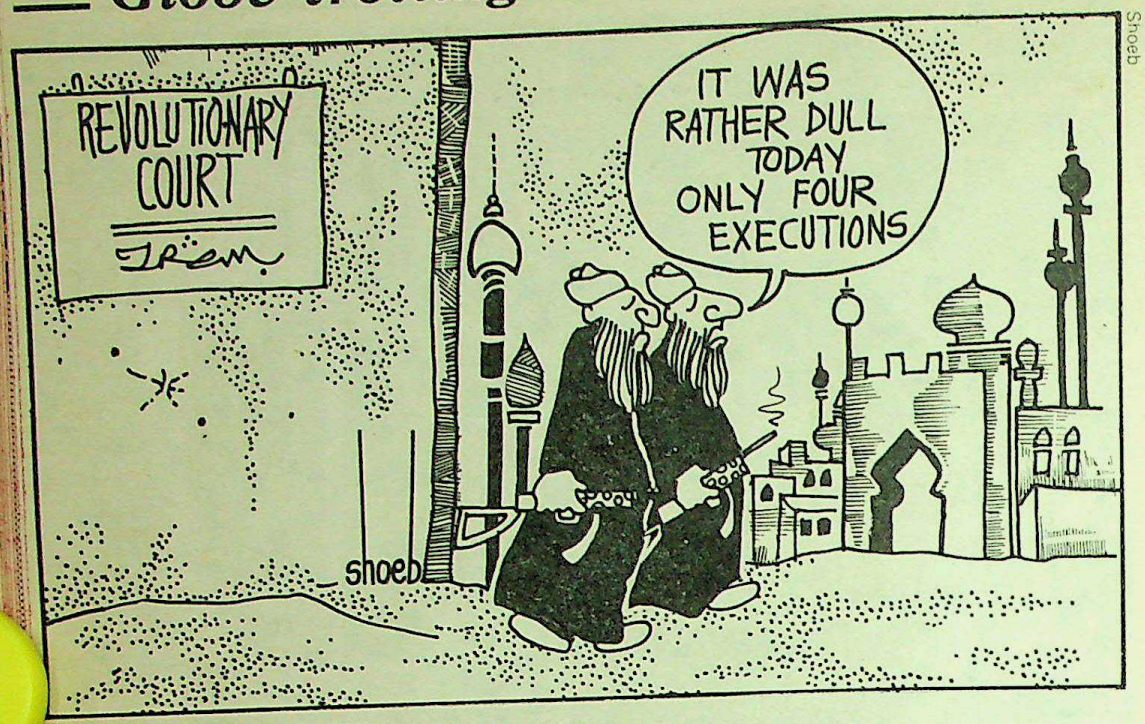
In 1962, the three East African colleges, Makerere, Nairobi and Dar-es-Salaam were merged into the University of East Africa with President Nyerere as the chancellor. Lule was appointed to the prestigious post of the principal of Makerere.

No Politicking: But despite all his qualities as an educationist and an administrator, Lule did not get on well with Dr Milton Obote's radical regime which sought to spread its politics into every Ugandan institution, including Makerere. Lule resented this, and with the backing of members of his staff, managed to keep politics out of the campus.

The three university colleges split in 1970 with each becoming a full-fledged university. Obote, who automatically became chancellor of Makerere, immediately sacked Lule. After leaving Makerere, Lule joined the Commonwealth secretariat as assistant secretary general in charge of education, youth and the legal division at Malborough House in London. Two years later, Lule became secretary general of the Association of African Universities in Accra. He retired a few months ago, little knowing that he would eventually succeed Idi Amin as President of Uganda.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



MIDDLE EAST

Iran's Red Peril

Khomeini's troubled regime faces a dangerous communist threat

WITH the situation in troubled Iran growing increasingly volatile, the country finds itself edging closer to the possibility of a civil war and to a potentially dangerous communist threat. In addition, Iran's long-simmering problem of nationalities has also surfaced forcefully, with demands for more autonomy and political concessions undermining Ayatullah Khomeini's headlong rush to turn the country into a full Islamic Republic.

With the Iranian economy in a shambles and the widening rifts between Khomeini and his ministers, the situation has been further complicated with the return of the pro-Moscow Tudeh Party's first secretary Nureddin Kianuri from a 25-year exile. Further, the influential religious leader Ayatullah Teleghani, who left Iran recently in protest against violation of human rights, has returned, having established close contacts with pro-Moscow elements. In the face of these recent developments, the communist threat to Iran has become increasingly real.

Kianuri, a hardened communist, has been urging Khomeini to abrogate all defence or economic pacts with the US made during the Shah's rule and instead enter into treaties of peace and friendship with neighbouring Iraq, Marxist Afghanistan and Turkey. Kianuri has also been trying to get Khomeini to accept the principle of collective Asian security (as propounded by Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev). Meanwhile, he has recalled Iranian guerillas (estimated at between 3,000 and 5,000) from Herat and other Afghanistan provinces and is now frantically lobbying in Tehran for a friendship treaty with the Soviet Union.

Main Thrust : With Kianuri's return, thousands of exiled communists have followed suit and pledged their full support to the Tudeh Party leader. Kianuri has stated that the main thrust of the Iranian is the "struggle against imperialism". He insists that the Islamic Republic should be "anti-imperialist, democratic and should actively support non-alignment and the establishment of good relations with socialist countries".

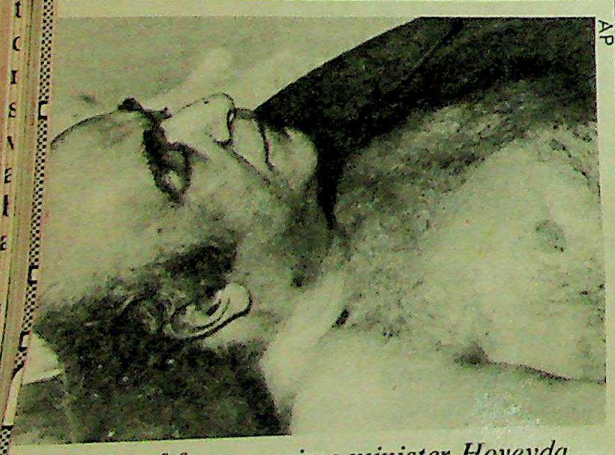
The clandestine radio station located in southern Russia (INDIA TODAY, March 1–15) gives Iranian listeners daily instructions on how to stage demonstrations and "resist security forces equipped with American-made riot fighting equipment". The radio station has been warning listeners to guard against the wider "conspiracy of the West to perpetuate its influence in Iran".

The communists have also exploited the recent arrival of some 200 Americans in Iran to train defence personnel in the use of billions of dollars worth of American military hardware lying unused there. Khomeini, however, feels that some American influence at this juncture is necessary to fend off the growing communist threat.

Khomeini seems to be trying to counter the influence of the Tudeh Party, the People's Fedayeen and the People's Mujaheddeen, the two most important urban guerilla

Apostle Of Death

EVERY morning, after the daily rituals of executions in Iran have been completed and the bodies dispatched to the morgue, an unassuming man unlocks his tiny office and starts his work. The sheaves of files on his desk and in the steel cabinets seem innocent enough. But for many, the contents of the files spell death by the execution squads.



AP

Body of former prime minister Hoveyda

The files contain the names of Iranians suspected of such bizarre crimes as declaring war on God and his Prophet, defiling all that is sacred, and corruption on earth. The mild-looking man who guards the files so jealously is Mehdi Hadavi, prosecutor-general for the Islamic Republic of Iran—a man who holds the power of life and death for thousands of Iranians in his hands. It is he who decides who is to face the Islamic justice of the revolutionary courts. His spartan office has the names of individuals against whom complaints have been made.

Mass Complaints : Each day, scores of people gather at the gates of Tehran's Revolutionary Committee headquarters holding out scraps of paper on which are written complaints against servants of the Shah's regime. It is from these bits of paper that Hadavi decides who is to be arrested and eventually tried and sentenced by the revolutionary courts.

It is estimated that there are 2,000 suspects awaiting the life-or-death decision of the man who has become the symbol of Islamic vengeance. But very few people actually get to meet Hadavi. He remains an anonymous face behind the bloody spate of executions which have sickened most of the world.

Hadavi was appointed by Khomeini's revolutionary committee to spearhead the massive and bloody purge which began in real earnest with the execution of former prime minister Amir Abbas Hoveyda. Hadavi works 15 hours a day keeping the revolutionary courts and the executioners busy. Before the revolution he was just another nondescript lawyer. Now he has become the acknowledged overlord of Islamic justice.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

organizations. But he has been careful not to risk offending the communists to a point where they could stage a revolt.

Khomeini believes that without some American support and technical assistance, the Iranian armed forces, mostly equipped with US material, would lack effective punch and thereby fail to counter the communist threat. But for him the biggest worry is that the growing support and power behind the communist movement in Iran would shatter his dream of establishing an ideal Islamic state.

BRITAIN

A Tragic Trend

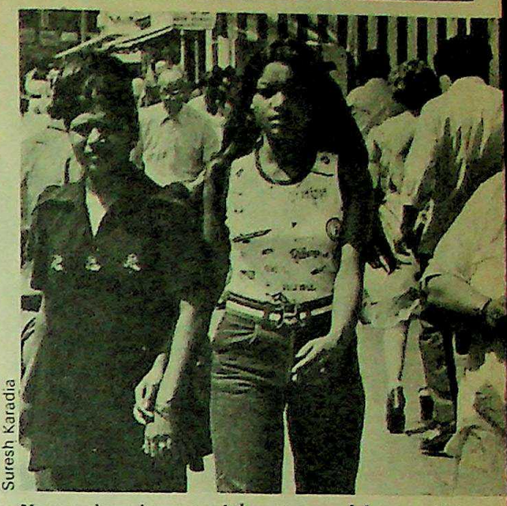
Immigrants rebel against traditions

EARLY last month, Tara Meisuria, a young Indian immigrant in Britain checked into a hotel with her boy-friend, Rajinder Singh. The couple lay on the bed and swallowed a dose of sleeping pills. According to the coroner, Dr John Burton, Tara was a "normal English schoolgirl—except that she was of Indian origin". She killed herself because her parents insisted that she marry a boy brought up in India. She was sent to India to meet her prospective husband. She returned to Britain, and, rather than spend the rest of her life with a man she had nothing in common with, chose the only way out—suicide.

Tara's is just one of the many tragic cases involving young immigrant women in Britain—some barely out of school—who are increasingly rebelling against the traditional path of marriage arranged by their parents. Jane Gaskell, a woman columnist for London's Daily Mail, has recently filed a report on this new trend and its repercussions on the lives of thousands of Indian immigrants. Burton, the coroner who performed the inquest on Tara Meisuria, told Gaskell: "This case represents the ultimate in despair. I have heard seven similar cases this year. These girls are frequently trapped by tradition and family honour. If they go against their parents' wishes they become outcasts."

Gaskell also spoke to another man who has become familiar with this situation—Inder Singh Uppal, the community relations officer for Hounslow, Middlesex. "There was one girl," said Uppal, "who, in desperation, hitch-hiked here from Slough in the dark for help. She was a young Indian immigrant who had never been allowed out of her parents' sight except to go to school. She was being forced to marry a total stranger, so she defied her family and came to us for help."

Uppal now handles so many similar cases that he has had to hire extra staff. "For the girls it is obviously tragic to have to marry a man they neither know or understand," Uppal told Gaskell. "Very often, the man has been born and bred in a remote part of India and has in-built attitudes the girl cannot willingly accept even for her parents' sake now that she has grown up in England."



Suresh Karadia

Young immigrant girls—trapped by tradition

Refuge: Uppal's aim is to bring a daughter and her family together again, says Gaskell, but he also wants a hostel where Asian girls can safely go if they feel they can no longer remain at home. Betty Keirle, a welfare officer at Hounslow College where hundreds of Asian children take A-level courses along with their British counterparts, disagrees. "If there were a hostel, parents of runaways would go straight there looking for them." She does, however, feel strongly that there is a need for "somewhere where these youngsters, caught between so many pressures, hammered by the old customs and their new thoughts, can have a little time to think". Many Asian girls under her charge, she

ELECTION

The Black Vote

WHAT price the immigrant vote in Britain's general elections scheduled for May 3? Apparently not very much judging from the various party manifestos issued so far. The National Front is so rabidly anti-immigrant that any comment would be superfluous. What is surprising, however, is that Margaret Thatcher's Conservative Party, which needs every vote possible to get a hold on the keys to 10 Downing Street, has alienated Britain's immigrants.

Immigrants from India will have ample reason to worry if the Conservatives romp home in the elections. In their manifesto, the Conservatives have pulled no punches on the immigration issue and have pledged to go all out on immigration restrictions, though they have stated that there will be no question of "compulsory repatriation". They have also pledged not to allow the husband or fiancé of any immigrant resident to enter the country except in a very restricted number of cases—a measure that James Callaghan's Labour Government had so far opposed.

Powell—"the numbers game"

The factor that influenced the Conservative stand is purely statistical. There are currently 1.9 million "coloured" immigrants in Britain comprising about 3.5 per cent of the total population, according to one recent estimate. In electoral terms, the voting power of the immigrant community would be largely negligible.

Thatcher has stated that she stands by her favourite theme aired last year about British people feeling "swamped by migrants". The Labour Party's silence on this issue has been defeaning.

The only prominent political leader who has defended the immigrant issue is Liberal leader David Steel who called on politicians to "resist stirring Enoch's pot".

Numbers Game: The Conservatives, on the other hand, have tried to justify their stand by arguing that the concessions given by the Government to immigrants have been abused. There are certainly signs that point to some abuse of current immigration laws (INDIA TODAY, April 1–15), but whether the entire immigrant community in Britain should be held ransom for the crimes of a few is debatable. Apparently Enoch Powell's strident voice has been heard in the right places and the misleading "numbers game" played by him and National Front spokesmen has had the desired effect.

If Thatcher's party is returned to power—a likely possibility judging from the opinion polls—immigrants in Britain will have to face troubled times ahead.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Success:

It could be working against you.

Getting to the top isn't easy. You know that.

It means extra hours of work. A hectic, tension-ridden life. Too many cups of tea and coffee. Too many cigarettes. Irregular meals. Rich fatty foods. Not enough exercise.

All of which could lead to health problems.

From minor ones like gas and indigestion. To major ones like high cholesterol levels.

What can you do ?

You know it is not easy to change your way of life.

But there is something you can do to help prevent the ailments that threaten you.

With Garlic Pearls.

Garlic—medical authorities speak...

Lancet, the international medical journal states :

"Garlic has a very significant protective action against hyperlipaemia and blood coagulation changes which are normal after fat ingestion."

Leading specialists recognise the value of garlic therapy for reducing cholesterol, relieving gastric upsets and helping prevent pain in the joints.

But raw garlic smells. And raw garlic, once cooked, loses its beneficial properties.

The goodness of raw garlic without the smell.

You can now get the goodness of raw garlic in a convenient form—and without the smell—with Garlic Pearls. Garlic Pearls are a product of Ranbaxy Laboratories—the name the medical profession has come to trust.

Two Garlic Pearls with meals.

Two Garlic Pearls taken regularly before meals help reduce cholesterol levels, relieve gas, indigestion and help prevent pain in the joints.

So, if you're successful, develop the Garlic Pearls habit. And don't let success work against you.

Look after yourself.

RANBAXY'S GARLIC PEARLS

The natural way to all-round health.

GP 5568 AI

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

says, want to marry the man of their parents' choice. But many others feel very strongly that this is an insult to their integrity as young girls.

Opposite View: The Indian Workers' Group in Britain takes the opposite view. "Very often," said a spokesman, "English girls think they are in love when it is infatuation. They present a pretty face before marriage. Then, suddenly, the girl finds she is married to a stranger. If her parents had arranged the marriage lovingly between families who knew and respected each other, with every detail sorted out in advance, all would have been well."

But to many immigrants who have spent all their lives in Britain and have worked alongside others who are allowed to choose their own boy-friends, the cross is a heavy one to bear. To an increasing number of them, the freedom to lead their own lives and choose their own husbands is outweighing the cost of breaking with tradition, and, in most cases, with their families.

AFRICA

Swiss Connection

Botha puts the Swiss in a spot

AS South Africa's Muldergate information scandal stirred up the country's political morass, Foreign Minister Pik Botha, was causing similar tremors in Switzerland and its fledgling relations with Black Africa.

Just over a month ago, Pierre Aubert, the country's foreign policy chief, returned from a two-week visit to five black African countries. It was the first such trip undertaken by a Swiss foreign minister and it culminated in a resounding condemnation of apartheid by Aubert in Lagos.

Within days, Botha pulled the rug from under Aubert's feet by demanding an audience, which Aubert reluctantly agreed to. Then, at short notice, Botha summoned South Africans from the four corners of the globe to the Zurich Hilton for what was billed as an emergency session on Namibia.

Botha—playing his trump card

Both actions revived the controversy aroused by Aubert's own trip to Africa, which right-wingers had claimed jeopardized Switzerland's traditional policy of neutrality.

Capitalistic: Botha's visit, however, did cast revealing light on traditional Swiss neutrality, which left-wing critics and those who say Switzerland should join the United Nations, argue is a chimera.

This was forcibly driven home during Aubert's visit to Africa when Switzerland was experiencing its own controversy over the South African "Muldergate" information slush fund. The Rand Daily Mail revealed that the Zurich-based Thesaurus Continental Securities Corporation (wholly owned by the powerful Union Bank in Switzerland) had provided a loan contract to Lewis Luyt for $13.8 million to establish the Citizen newspaper that was going to spread the good news about South Africa's racial policies. The Citizen is smack in the centre of the Muldergate Scandal. One of the signatories on the loan was Bruno Saager, a board member of the Swiss-South African Association whom Botha had met on his Swiss visit. The association includes Switzerland's most powerful bankers and businessmen.

Important: Botha's meeting with them had immense significance because of the possibility that the UN might impose economic sanctions on South Africa. There are only 18 Swiss companies who have invested in South Africa (compared to 699 British) and trade between the two countries is negligible. But in the event of UN-imposed sanctions, these companies could be a valuable life-line to the West, since Switzerland is not a member of the UN.

Botha's objective was therefore to shore up his country's flagging image with Swiss bankers and businessmen. Fortunately for him, Aubert's faux pas on apartheid in South Africa put the Swiss in a spot and gave Botha the ideal opportunity to play his trump card.

Chicken Economy

Ghana grinds to a halt

OFFICES in Ghana are vacant most of the time, their occupants queuing up for toilet rolls, searching for car parts and otherwise trying to maintain some semblance of a normal life-style. Raging inflation and crippling shortages of consumer goods have destroyed the previously comfortable life of Ghana's middle class. "It is not possible for any member of my staff to live on his salary. He must have some other source of income," said the head of a Ghanian university.

The most popular source of a secondary income is raising chickens. Another way to make money is by using a private or a company car as a taxi. Both methods are resorted to, often during working hours.

"THESE VULTURES ARE OUT TO GET ME!"

The increasingly time-consuming search for goods and the money to pay for them is slowly bringing much of the country's civil service to a halt. Teachers often skip classes, officers do not appear at work for days, and trading has become a national pastime.

The problems are a result of seven years of military rule characterized by corruption and mismanagement. To meet growing debts, the Government merely printed more money. Consequently, inflation has been running at 100 per cent per year for more than two years. Prices sky-rocketed as traders made vast profits from the shortage of essential commodities.

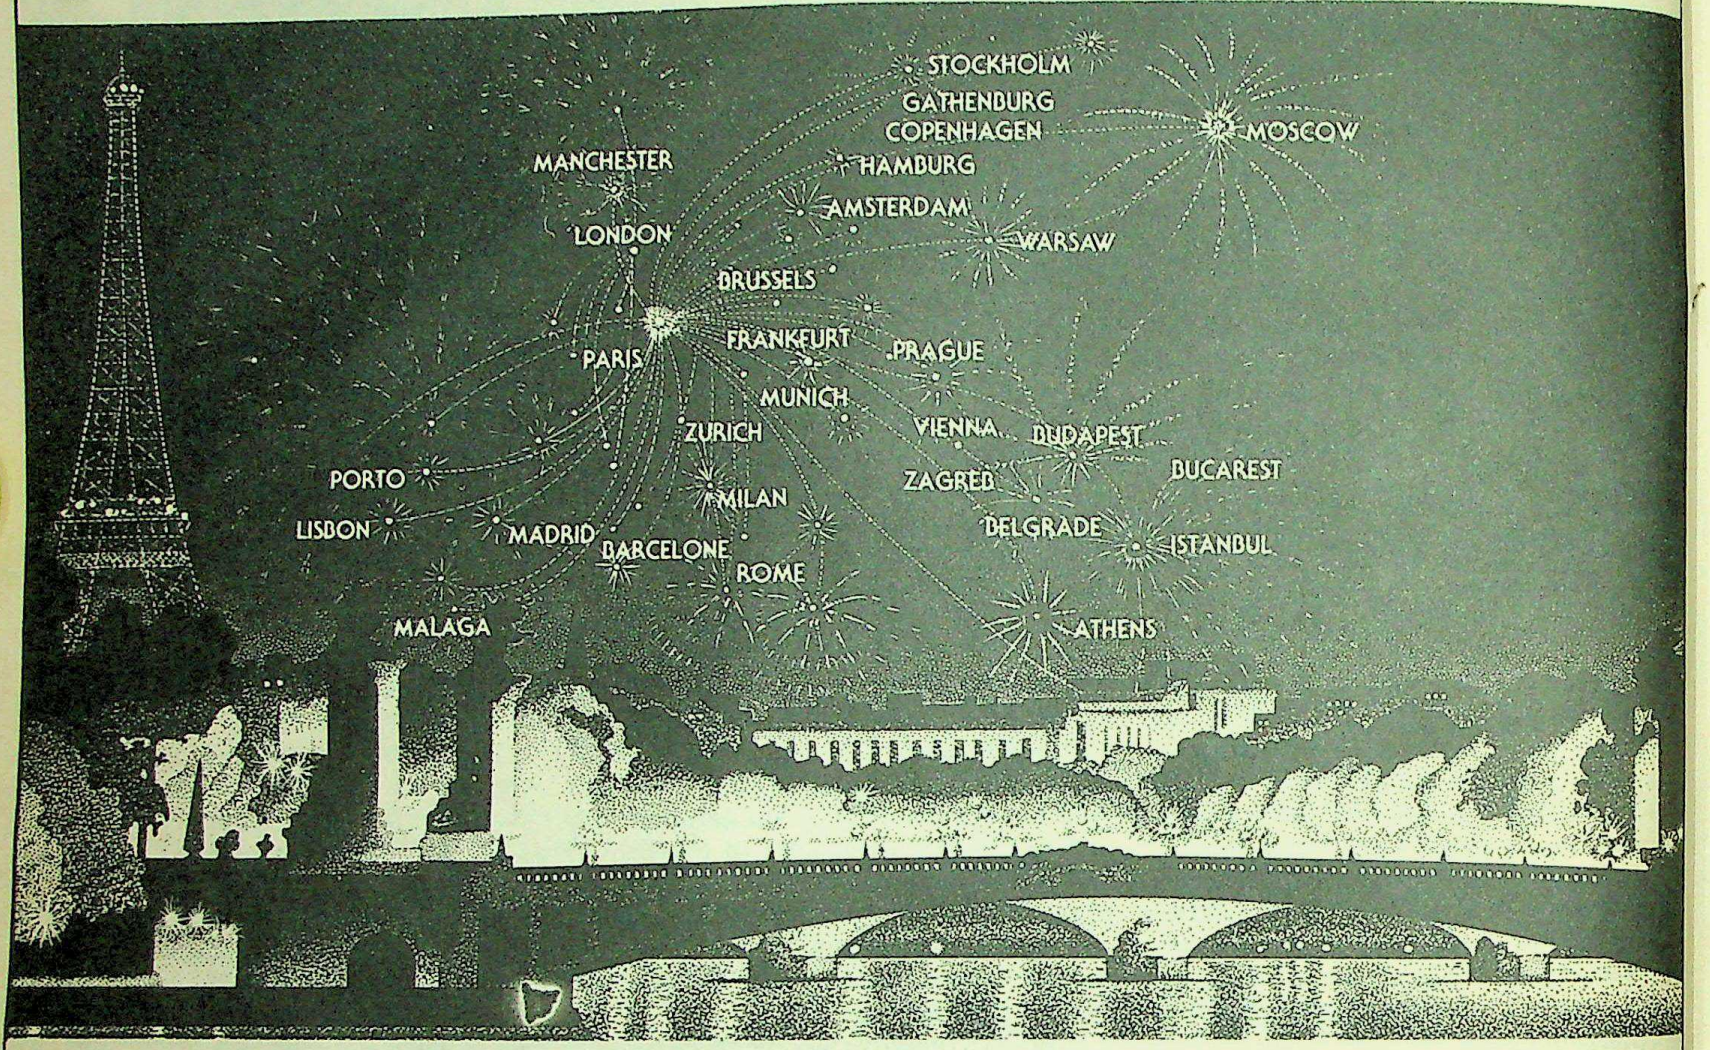
Most people have no option but to make money by other means. Corruption in every walk of life is rampant. Ghanians, however, are becoming increasingly incensed at the level of corruption. Strikes by students and professionals—lawyers, engineers and doctors—finally forced the resignation last year of General Acheampong as head of state and the announcement of elections for a civilian government.

But an increasing number of professionals have started leaving the country. Between August 1977 and September 1978, more than 4,000 teachers left Ghana. Even the statistics on inflation are months behind because the Bureau of Statistics cannot keep staff. Most Ghanians, however, seem confident that the new civilian government to be elected in June will straighten things out. But many also wonder how deeply ingrained the pattern of the last seven years has become.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Bienvenue en Europe.



Welcome to Europe. The whole continent awaits you with open arms via Air France, the European experts. From our gateway in Paris, the City of Lights, Air France flies to 57 European cities in 23 countries, with over 1,260 flights each week.

Step aboard an Air France 747 from Delhi and Bombay, and the charm and attentiveness of our flight crews put you at ease immediately. You'll dine on your choice of fine French cuisine or special Indian vegetarian dishes (simply order when making your flight reservation) . You'll land with us at Roissy-Charles de Gaulle, Paris' spectacular airport of the future. And from Roissy, Air France takes you everywhere in Europe in style. Come with us for the warmest welcome in the skies.

Air France: the European connoisseurs.

AIR FRANCE

The best of France to all the world.

Bangalore: 10/2, Kasturba Road - Phone: 54060 – Bombay: Taj Mahal Hotel - Phone: 298922 - 298950 51 52 – Calcutta: 41, Chowringhee Road - Phone: 240011/12 – Dacca: Hotel Intercontinental - Phone: 244700 – Delhi: 6, Scindia House, Janpath - Phone: Ticket Office 374775, Reservation 372191 - Kathmandu: R.S. Concern Annapurna Arcade, Kingsway - Phone: 13339 – Madras: Spencers Building, 153, Mount Road - Phone 88377.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Globe-trotting

Clumsy Seducer

■ Film stars rarely, if ever, live up to their screen image. Bloodthirsty villains of the silver screen often turn out to be gentle, unassuming people in real life and vice versa. Sex symbols, more often than not, are actually prudish, home-loving females, while rib-tickling comedians turn out to be dour and dull. The latest example of this myth is the virile all-male Hollywood star, Marlon Brando.

According to his Indian-born ex-wife Anna Kashfi, Brando was inarticulate, incoherent, a clumsy seducer and a lousy lover. According to her, Brando's seduction technique showed all the subtlety of a guillotine and his love-making resembled a well-rehearsed, polished performance lacking warmth and naturalness.

Kashfi, the latest to succumb to the tell-all-for-money memoir craze, reveals a fury undiminished by the 21 years since her marriage with Brando ended in 1958. In a bitter literary tirade against her ex-husband, Kashfi complains that during their three-year marriage, Brando would disappear for days on end and return only to play bongo drums until dawn.

Baldies, Bad Luck

■ There is bad news for baldies. According to the 650 scientists who met recently in Hamburg for the first International Congress of Hair Research, there is no known cure for baldness. The delegates confessed that they had tried everything—ointments, tonics, special food and medicine, scalp massages, magic rituals and even prayers—but the tragic conclusion was that once a head went bald, nothing would grow on it again.

Delegates seemed totally baffled by the fact that two-thirds of all males in the US experience some degree of baldness, while only one in every eight Orientals loses his hair. They seemed to have the answer to another phenomena, however—why a growing number of women are reporting loss of hair. According to some scientists, oral contraceptives affect the body's hormones and this often results in loss of hair. They also claimed that an unhappy love affair or other emotional disorders could have an unhealthy effect on a woman's hair. Baldness, according to them, was also hereditary. The unanimous advice for people growing bald was to adopt a philosophical attitude to the phenomena. As the old saying goes: "Hair today, gone tommorrow."

Financial Spaghetti

■ What could be world's most expensive jigsaw puzzle was put together last fortnight by a Texas bank under rather unusual circumstances. Because of a computer error, all incoming cheques and deposit slips—about 200,000 vital pieces of paper worth around Rs 16 lakh—were fed by mistake into a shredding machine.

Years of uncertainty, dispute and acute embarrassment appeared to be in store for the bank. Brooding over the countless fragments of financial spaghetti, each strip no more than three-sixteenths of an inch wide, Buddy Ragley, president of the bank, hit on a plan, promptly dubbed Operation Humpty Dumpty by his staff. Ragley closed the bank doors, and instructed his 15 staff members and 45 temporary helpers to paste together the jigsaw puzzle. Incredibly, after a session running 24 hours a day in eight hour shifts, all but 400 of the cheques and deposit slips were pasted back into readable form. As a reward, Ragley distributed mock-shredded bonus cheques to his staff.

Twin Coincidences

■ Coincidences do occur occasionally, but the odds against twin sisters who were married on the same day giving birth within minutes of each other are extremely rare. Yet, that is exactly what happened last month to Renee and Christopher Montross and Bernee and Lance Laurie. Renee gave birth to a girl at 4.48 p.m. in the Southern Nevada Memorial Hospital. Her twin Bernee also gave birth to a girl in the same hospital minutes later.

The couples were married in a double ceremony in Las Vegas in August 1977 and, not surprisingly, have bought houses next door to each other.

True To Form

■ The fall-out from the disastrous accident at Three Mile Island nuclear plant in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania last month has not just been radioactive. Running true to form, Hollywood has now become the biggest beneficiary of the world's first nuclear disaster. In has turned Jane Fonda's new film, The China Syndrome, about a near-disaster at a California nuclear plant, into the box-office hit of the year. A major factor in the movie's phenomenal success was its timing. The China Syndrome opened just 12 days before the Harrisburg disaster and the $6 million (Rs 5 crore) "nuclear thriller" has already raked in $30 million (Rs 24 crore), boosted Columbia Pictures' stock, and helped Fonda and co-star Jon Voight win last fortnight's Oscar awards for their roles in a Vietnam war film, Coming Home.

"The boom started the day of the accident," said a Columbia Pictures' executive. "Everyone has heard they will get an inside look at what went wrong in Harrisburg." California's Governor Jerry Brown saw the film and described the resemblance between the Harrisburg accident and the film plot as "eerie". He then called for a closure of the State's biggest nuclear plant, Rancho Seco—a sister unit of the one in Harrisburg. Meanwhile, a triumphant Fonda announced that she and her husband, activist Tom Hayden, would make nuclear power "the issue in next year's Presidential election".

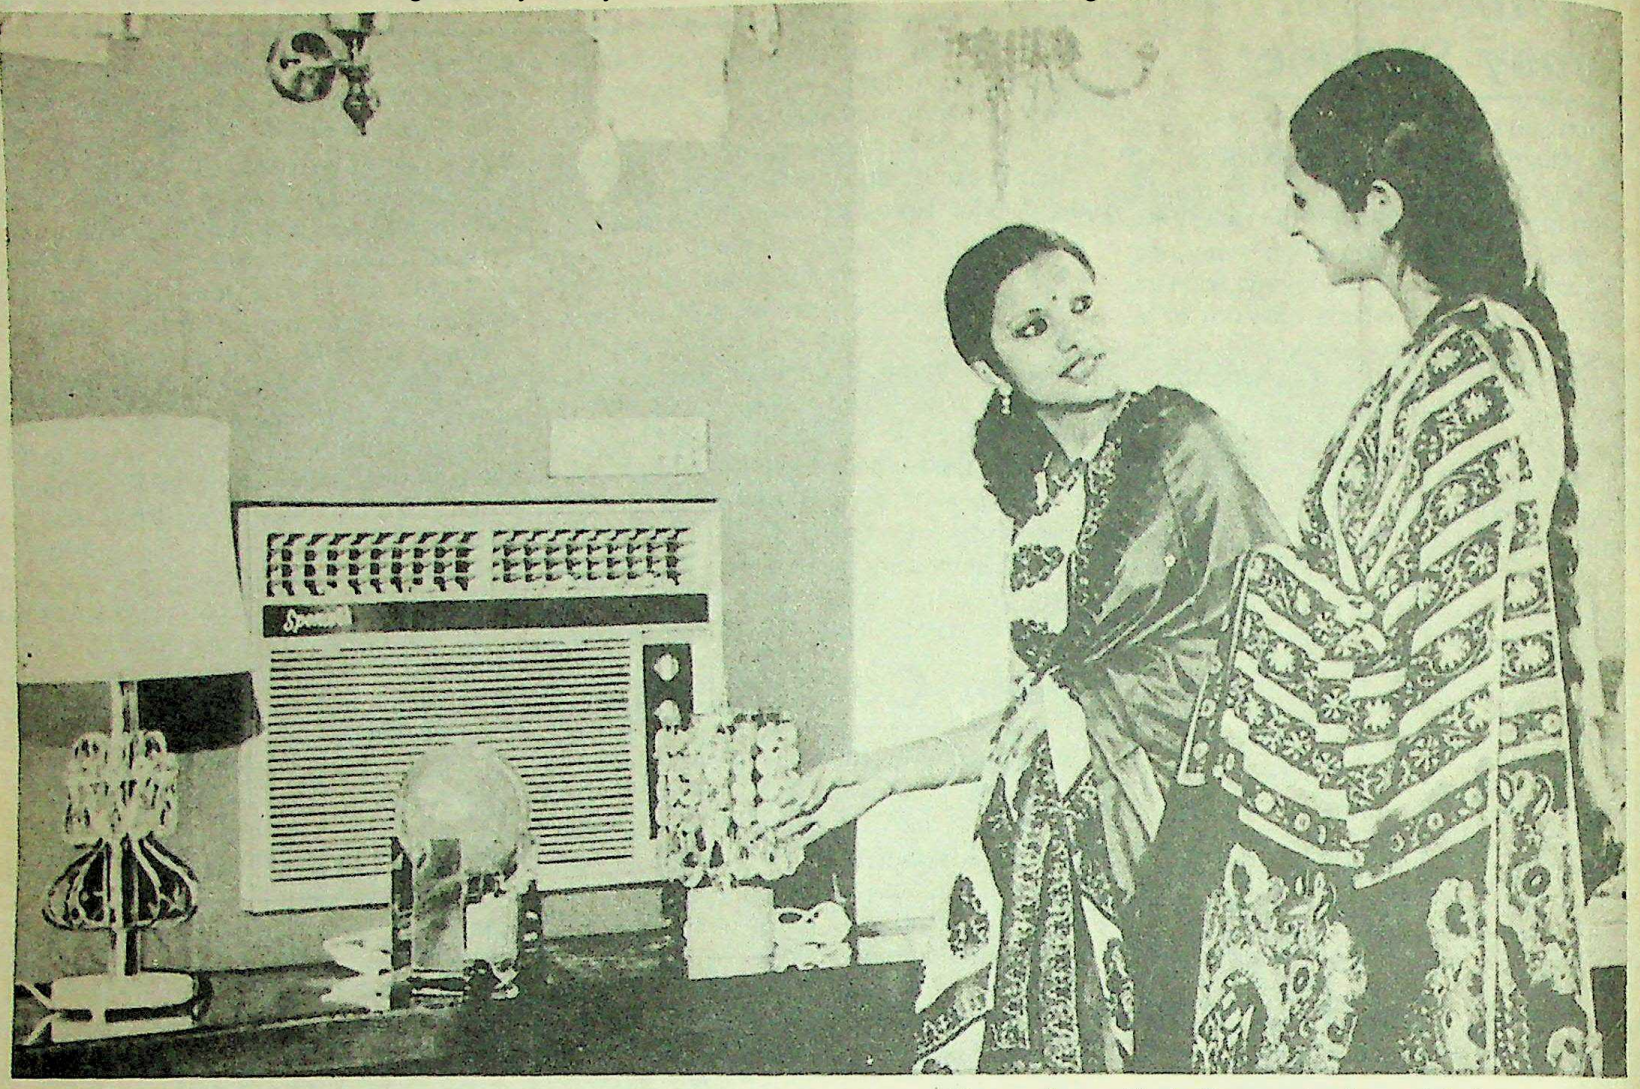
Healthy Imagination

■ When British doctors finally put their heads together they discovered that there was absolutely nothing wrong with the man who had been admitted more than 200 times to at least 68 hospitals and had been given thousands of blood tests and X-rays. This 34-year-old case history of imaginary illnesses was reported in last month's issue of the British Medical Journal. According to the report, the unidentified man spent a total of 10 years as a patient in National Health Service hospitals and used at least 30 different names. The man suffered from "Manchhausen's Syndrome" named after an 18th century character who told lurid tales of war adventures, all of them imaginary. Doctors said the man's abdomen resembled a "scarred battlefield because of the innumerable operations he had been given for imaginary ailments". The cost of treatment for Britain's state health service—Rs 1.6 crore.

Voight and Fonda—nuclear fallout helped them

CC-0. In Public ... State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



4623/1

Kapoor Lamp Shade Company's elegant Madras showroom is also cooled by a Spencer's air-conditioner.

*Psychrometric tests prove Spencer's air-conditioner cools faster consumes less power

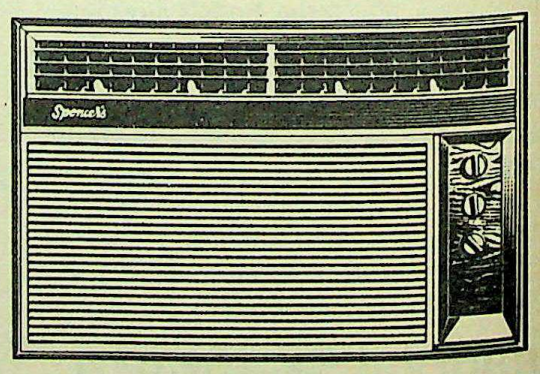
Facts are proof: Spencer's airconditioners are 20% more efficient in cooling. And power consumption? Nearly 6-8% less, compared to other leading brands.

It's all a matter of superior know-how, excellent compressors, uncompromising quality control. In short, everything you expect from Spencer's.

And don't forget the traditional Spencer service. Count on it any time. Anywhere in India.

SPENCER & CO. LTD.

● 769, Mount Road, Madras 600 002 ● Spencer Building, Forjett Street Bombay 400 036 ● 70 Diamond Harbour Road, Calcutta 700 023 ● 19-A, Alipore Road, Delhi 110 006.



Spencer's
with service our way of life since 1865

 Internationally accepted tests conducted on leading airconditioners.*

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

International Intelligence

New Arms Salesman

PRESIDENT Anwar Sadat of Egypt has a brand-new role to play—that of an international arms salesman. Once the Egyptians take delivery of the huge consignment of American weapons pledged to them under the Camp David agreement, they will be looking for buyers for their vast stockpile of used Soviet military hardware. According to one estimate, Egypt's arsenal of Soviet-made weaponry is worth around $4 billion (Rs 3,200 crore).

The result could be that Egypt emulates Libya in becoming a central supply point for the distribution of Russian military hardware. Sadat thus hopes to convince a number of African leaders that they can now ease out of their current relationship with Russia without forfeiting the right to Russian-made weaponry and spare parts on which their armies are so dependent. Sadat has already found his first customer in Tanzania. Somalia's President Siad Barre has been hinting that he might renew his previous links with the Soviets if he cannot get arms from the West, and Sadat could find him a willing customer as well, if only to deter Barre from rejoining the Soviet fold.

It is likely that Sadat's arms supply will be used to further his own interests, and, by extension, those of the US as well. Apart from that, Sadat's new role as an international arms salesman will prove very lucrative—a significant development now that the oil producing Arab countries have decided to cut off oil supplies to Egypt.

Tremors From Iran

THE growing power and success of Ayatullah Khomeini in Iran has sent significant political tremors through neighbouring Iraq and Afghanistan. In Iraq there have been visible signs of a major movement among the country's Shia community directly inspired by Khomeini's Islamic revolution in Iran. The Shias are the country's largest religious group but ever since Iraq gained its independence, political power has been concentrated in the hands of a Sunni ruling clique. Khomeini's victory in Iran has, however, encouraged Iraqi Shia leaders to demand a larger participation in the economic and political system. They have reportedly also established close contact with Khomeini, who has allegedly agreed to pledge arms and support for a Shia uprising in Iraq.

In Afghanistan, President Tarakki's regime, closely aligned with the Soviets, finds itself threatened by a similar Muslim revolt apparently with the full support of Khomeini's followers in Iran. Ironically, Afghanistan originally served as an important base for opponents of the Shah of Iran's regime, before he was forced to flee the country.

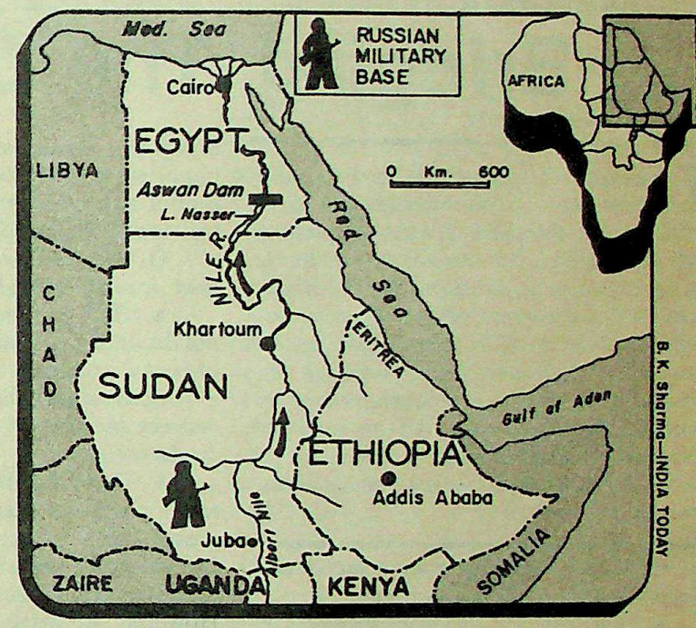
Mysterious Sabotage

INTELLIGENCE sources are convinced that the recent sabotage of French nuclear reactors earmarked for Iraq at the Mediterranean port of Seyne-sur-Mer was the work of the Israeli secret service, though there is no proof to support this theory. On April 5, a massive explosion took place inside the heavily guarded warehouse belonging to France's leading manufacturer of nuclear machinery—Navale Industrielle de la Mediterranee. When security guards rushed inside, they found containers holding reactor components bound for Iraq completely destroyed. Surprisingly, none of the other consignments destined for other countries had been affected by the blast.

The equipment that was being supplied to Iraq was of vital importance to the entire balance of power in the Middle East, as it could have given Iraq the capacity to produce its own nuclear weapons.

The method by which the sabotage was carried out still remains a mystery. That the saboteurs could have gained entry into the heavily guarded warehouse sounds beyond belief. This points to the possibility that the explosives were hidden inside the crates during some stage of their journey from the manufacturers to the warehouse.

Israel seems the most likely culprit. When the French first announced that they were setting up a "nuclear research city" in Iraq, Israel and the US had protested strongly to the French Government. The French ignored the protests since they were being guaranteed an uninterrupted flow of oil for a long period in addition to massive arms sales to Iraq. But the sabotage operation has reduced to nought the possibility of Iraq becoming the possessor of a nuclear bomb in the foreseeable future—an eventuality that could possibly have led to a nuclear showdown with the only regional power with the same capability: Israel.



Sadat's Toppling Game

A large measure of the success of the Tanzanian forces in overthrowing Idi Amin's regime belongs, surprisingly, to Egypt. President Sadat's decision to supply the Tanzanian forces with arms and advisers was spurred by covert Soviet threats to cut off water supply to both Egypt and Sudan. According to informed sources, the Egyptian intelligence service received reports that the Soviets, with Ugandan and Ethiopian help, were planning to take over control of the Nile. In the initial stages, the plan was to control the sources of the Blue Nile with Ethiopian help, and build dams to divert their waters to threaten Egypt's vital Aswan Dam project.

Later, the plan envisaged controlling the source of the White Nile, located in Uganda, and the subsequent setting up of military bases near the Uganda/Sudan border. The Russians then planned to clear the way for a takeover of the region through which the Albert Nile flows. To counteract this threat, Egypt agreed to outfit the Tanzanian army with equipment it required, including MiG-17 fighters. The Egyptians also agreed to supply them with as much ammunition as they would require to topple Amin's Libya-backed army, medium artillery, heavy machine guns and armoured vehicles.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Vashishta—INDIA TODAY

Bahuguna—proud that petroleum products were not rationed

H. N. BAHUGUNA

Bridging The Gap

The dapper Hemwati Nandan Bahuguna, 59, presides over the troubled Petroleum and Chemicals Ministry. An astute politician with a strong base among the minorities, he has been resilient in weathering the vicissitudes in his political career. After being sent into political limbo by Mrs Gandhi during the Emergency, Bahuguna came back to the national scene as one of the architects of the Congress For Democracy. In an interview with INDIA TODAY, Bahuguna spoke on the plans of his ministry and the issue of minorities. Excerpts:

Q. What are the important achievements of your ministry in the last two years?

A. Oil exploration was speeded up and the Oil and Natural Gas Commission was restructured. The refineries which were in the red are also now performing better.

Q. But the supply of oil and petroleum products is erratic. Are you taking any corrective steps?

A. Considering the adverse circumstances, arrangements for the supply of petroleum products have been to an extent satisfactory. For instance, Bombay port was closed due to strike for 200 days during 1978, and nothing could be moved out of the Bombay refinery. The impact of the continuous strike would have been disastrous but for the fact that production in Bombay High was maintained at a reasonable level through efficient management. I have introduced a monitoring system to daily assess the availability of petroleum products.

Q. Why is the kerosene and petrol shortage continuing?

A. It is due to disruption in the movement of supplies in the country and erratic supply from Iran during the last year. Moreover, regular supply of items that are imported, even in other countries like Britain, cannot be guaranteed. We are proud that petroleum products were not rationed here.

Q. But kerosene, which is used by the poor, is in short supply.

A. The production of kerosene has not declined. Its demand has gone up because of coal shortage.

Q. How are you going to fill in the gap between the demand and supply of petroleum products?

A. We have been able to meet our requirements of petroleum products so far though with great difficulty. During the Iran crisis, we had a shortfall of eight million tonne per year which was not easy to manage. However, we were not starved of petrol because of our friendly relations with the petroleum producing countries. I could manage 45 lakh tonne of petrol from Iraq, five lakh tonne from Abu Dhabi, 20 lakh tonne from Libya and five lakh tonne from Saudi Arabia. The five-lakh-tonne deficit would be covered by producing more in India.

Q. When do you expect to achieve self-sufficiency in petroleum products?

A. It will take a long time. India has potential both for on-shore and off-shore petroleum production. Our gas is of superior quality, but its supply is not enough to meet the domestic requirement. We, however, save substantial foreign exchange from five lakh tonne gas production every year.

We have been able to save $10 (Rs 80) per barrel on the petrol imported from abroad. The price in the open market was $24.50 (Rs 196) per barrel before the recent price hike but we got the petrol at $14.50 (Rs 116) per barrel from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC). If India had to purchase 80 million tonne of petrol from the open market, it would have spent Rs 200 crore more on the deal. I am happy that my Arab connection has worked.

Q. When do you propose to increase the domestic gas connections?

A. While there are over 10 crore families in India, we have been able to give only 25 lakh connections. In the next two years, 20 lakh more connections would be available through increased productions at Bombay High and Mathura Refinery.

Q. What have you done to improve the drug Industry?

A. India was without any purposeful drug policy up to 1977. The earlier government appointed the Hathi Committee, but no follow-up action was taken on its report. Now, we have formulated definite policies on the basis of Hathi Committee recommendations in respect of areas of operations of public and private sector including multinational corporations. We have removed the confusion prevailing regarding issue of licences and dilution of foreign equity by multinationals. We have abolished brand names of important medicines like Analgin and given them general names so that there is no possibility of misuse of patents. We have also reduced the prices of 375 formulations which are used in the production of commonly used medicines.

Q. What is your reaction to the various constituents of the Janata Party talking in terms of reviving their old organizations.

A. Well, Babuji (Defence Minister Jagjivan Ram) said long ago that the Congress For Democracy (CFD) is the only party which has merged in the Janata Party. I think nothing more explicit could have been said. Various constituents of the party must forget their past affiliations otherwise the Janata Party will collapse under its own contradictions.

Q. Are you satisfied with what the Janata Government has done for the minorities?

A. Many steps have been taken to help them. But personally I feel that to protect the interests of minorities, scheduled castes and other weaker sections of the society, we must have a Communal Amity Police Force. This force should comprise men from minorities and scheduled castes and only 25 per cent of the personnel should belong to majority groups. This force should take care of the property of all sections of the community during a communal flare-up. It must also be ensured that no graveyard will be taken over by the Government agencies for any public purpose whatsoever. The educational system which has communal overtones should also be revamped.

Q. People feel that continuation of RSS elements in the Janata Party is alienating the minorities. What do you think?

A. The Janata Party leaders should sit together and sort out all the issues rather than giving controversial statements that harm the party.

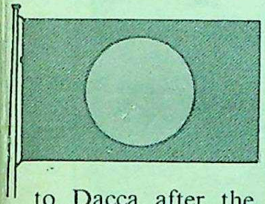
—PRABHU CHAWLA

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Morarji Desai and Zia-ur Rahman (right) with aides at talks in Dacca on April 16

BANGLADESH

Love And Hate



The fact that Bangladesh President Zia-ur Rahman chose Morarji Desai to be the first head of state to pay an official visit to Dacca after the recent elections, is a significant pointer to current relations between the two countries. Ever since 1971, Bangladesh has regarded India with ill-concealed suspicion. There was some melting of attitudes when the Janata Government came to power, but in the last fortnight's talks during Desai's visit it was obvious that Zia is determined to steer clear of India as far as economic or military dependence is concerned. Zia's main fear is that India's major stake in the economy of Bangladesh will provide New Delhi with a powerful political lever in the future. He was at pains to emphasize his country's dependence on the US, Japan and some South-East Asian countries for technical and economic aid. Significantly, there was no mention of China which indicates that Zia realizes that intensification of relations with Peking could prove diplomatically unwise.

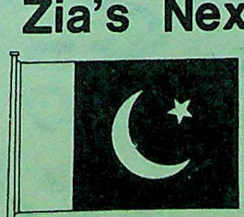
Bias: There is ample evidence that Bangladesh is finally going through an economic revival. Dacca has wide, metalled roads, a more efficient transport system and intense construction activity is in evidence all around. Dacca's Intercontinental Hotel is bustling with Japanese, American, Thai, Malaysian and Filipino economic and technical experts and businessmen. The Bangladesh Government, however, has persistently discouraged Indian businessmen and visas for Indians to visit Bangladesh are extremely difficult to come by.

During Desai's visit, it was evident that the strong anti-Indian feeling of the past four years had abated considerably. There is, however, an undercurrent of fear that India could prove an abrasive neighbour. It is this attitude that led Bangladesh to internationalize the Farakka issue and try and involve Nepal and the World Bank in tapping the eastern water resources.

Inherent differences like sharing the Ganga waters, delineation of the maritime boundaries, ratification of land border agreement signed in 1974 still remain unresolved. In addition, the current flow of refugees from Bangladesh into the northern states of India is one area of potential tension between the two countries.

PAKISTAN

Zia's Next Move



Zulfikar Ali Bhutto's death cell prophecy of a bloodbath in Pakistan if he was executed has failed to materialize. But then he, like a majority of his followers, was guilty of sadly underestimating the political potential of the man who cracks the whip in Pakistan today—General Zia-ul-Haq. Pakistan's plethora of military dictators have been a largely predictable lot and have essentially followed a well-trodden political path. But Zia has emerged as a different kettle of fish, as his supposedly risky gamble in hanging Bhutto has proved.

It is, however, Zia's unpredictability that has painted a massive question mark over the event around which hinges the future of Pakistan—whether Zia will stick to his promise of holding the general elections on November 17. Many people in Pakistan, including senior military officers, feel that Zia will renege on his promise. There are many factors which could provide Zia with a legitimate excuse for doing so, even at the risk of jeopardizing his own future. The collapse of the Pakistan National Alliance (PNA) into small constituent parts; pro-Bhutto violence or a deterioration of the situation on Pakistan's border with Afghanistan.

The PNA's decision last month to withdraw from Zia's cabinet, described by its leader Maulana Mufti Mahmood, as "unanimous" was essentially a question of political survival. Always a heterogeneous entity, afflicted constantly by factional quarrels, the PNA's departure from Zia's Government was as unobtrusive as was its entry into it last August.

Political Expediency: Out of the nine constituent parties that originally grouped under the PNA banner, five of the major constituents opted to stay out of Zia's cabinet. Now reduced to a political lightweight, its only path to survival lay in discontinuing its active alliance with Zia's regime. The execution of Bhutto has caused national and international revulsion, and any political group associated with Zia is likely to fare badly at the next general elections, if and when they are held.

There are other signs that the military will be playing a decisive role in the future of Pakistan. Last fortnight, Zia, in an interview with an American columnist, stated that his next step would be to usher in "some constitutional role for the armed forces, which is today the only institution which is stable, which is responsible for the safety, security and guarding the integrity of Pakistan. If we find at a particular stage that political environment is like the one in 1977 or politicians are pulling in different directions then it should be the President of the country who, with the help of the armed forces, should be able to dissolve the National Assembly, take power himself, and run the country. . . ." This, he added, would bring in more stability and would be "much more democratic".

Zia seems to be already gearing himself for that eventuality, by setting stage two of his political purge in motion—the elimination of the Bhutto dynasty. With Bhutto dead, the Pakistan People's Party (PPP)

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

"Beautifully Yours" Sandtex

The long life decorative and protective finish—
Both for exteriors and interiors

Why SANDTEX MATT is superior:

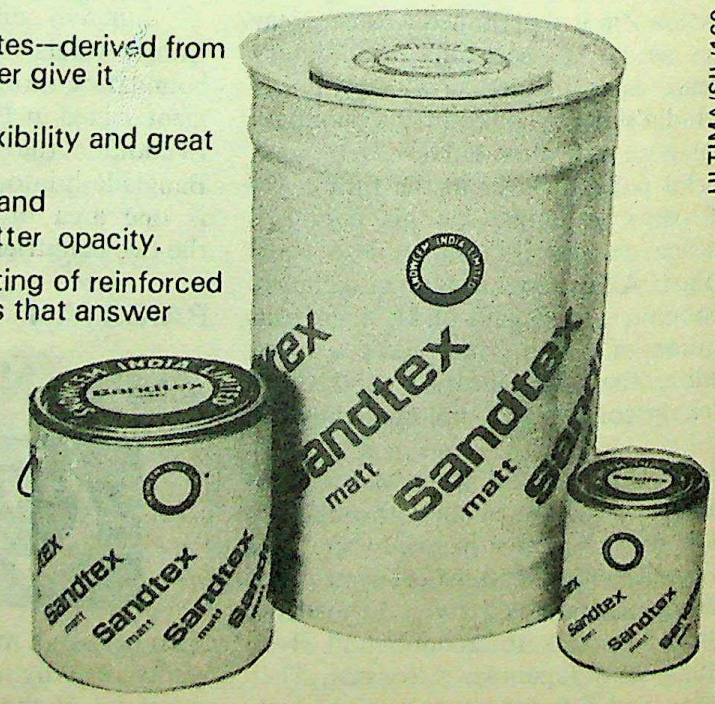
1) It contains one of the hardest known fine aggregates—derived from granite, as well as other ingredients, which together give it exceptional resistance to the elements;
2) A special resin which imparts a high degree of flexibility and great adhesive properties;
3) Constituents that produce a full bodied paint film; and
4) Higher concentration of pigments which gives better opacity.

The result is a material that provides a rich, thick coating of reinforced toughness, weather resistance and durability, qualities that answer all the problems you normally meet in decorating.

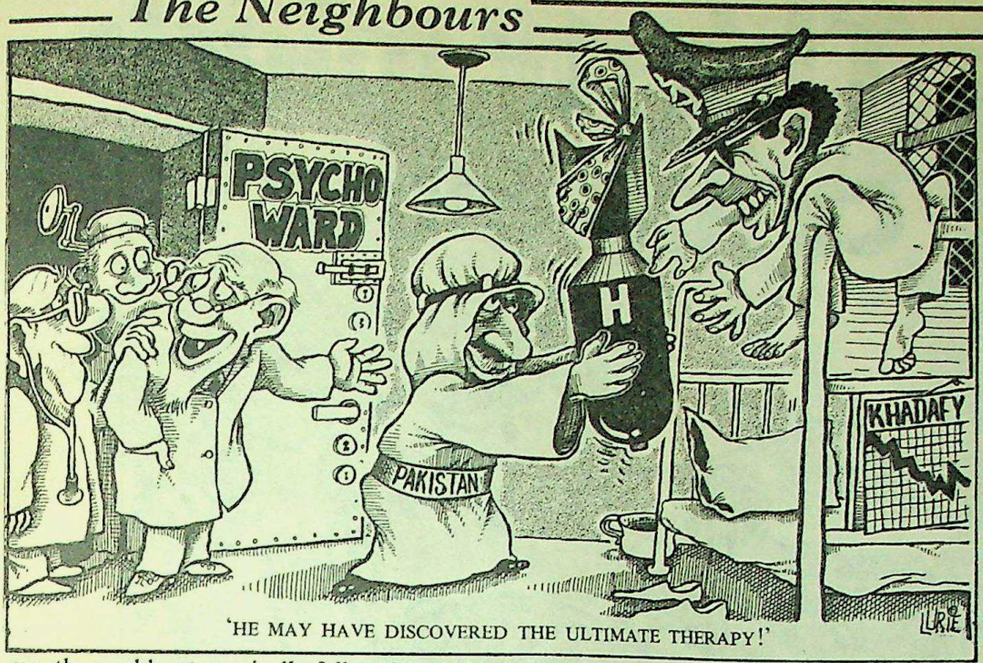
SANDTEX MATT is now available in a case of sixteen 1-litre tins in addition to the case of four 4-litre tins and 20-litre galvanised drum.



ULTIMA/SIL/160-78

Manufactured by:
Snowcem India Ltd.
A KILLICK SUBSIDIARY
KILLICK HOUSE, CHARANJIT RAI MARG,
POST BOX 109, BOMBAY 400001.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



'HE MAY HAVE DISCOVERED THE ULTIMATE THERAPY!'

mantle would automatically fall on Bhutto's second wife, Nusrat and from her on his daughter Benazir.

Next Purge: According to recent reports, Zia is widely expected to bring criminal charges against both of them. In the raid on the Bhutto household on the eve of Bhutto's execution, officials claimed to have discovered secret state documents cencerning Pakistan's foreign and defence affairs. If Zia manages to eliminate Nusrat and Benazir from the political field, the PPP, undoubtedly the party with the best electoral chances, would be leaderless and pose less of a threat to the indefinite extension of Zia's military rule.

But the most significant event, at least as far as India is concerned, was the US offer to Pakistan last fortnight of 50 Northrop F-5E fighters equipped with advanced air-to-ground missiles and diplomatic backing for Pakistan's proposal of a nuclear-free zone in South Asia if Pakistan will accept full nuclear safeguards. The American policy switch, is apparently an attempt to wean Pakistan away from its ambitions to develop nuclear weapons by making a twin offer of fighter planes and help in producing nuclear power if Pakistan agrees to international safeguards. The offer is also an attempt to soothe ruffled Pakistani feathers caused by the US decision to cut off all assistance to Pakistan except food.

Impact: The US also desperately needs a foothold in Pakistan after the upheavals in Iran and to counter the spread of Soviet influence from neighbouring Afghanistan. It is for that reason that the Carter Administration's reaction to Bhutto's execution was relatively mild. But the extent of the US support to Pakistan is likely to have a significant impact on Indo-US relations.

India has always opposed Pakistan's proposal of a nuclear-free zone in South Asia. The Indian policy has been to accept full-scope nuclear safeguards only if the same rules apply to all nuclear powers. Pakistan, on the other hand, has already informed the US that it will accept nuclear safeguards only if India accepts the same terms. Pakistan has officially denied that it is pursuing a nuclear path, but in private, Pakistani diplomats say that the Government is determined to keep its nuclear options open.

It would come as no great surprise if Islamabad rejects the latest US offer. By doing so, Pakistan would earn valuable breathing space for perfecting its gas centrifuge project, meant as a substitute for the nuclear reprocessing plant. With the centrifuge, Pakistan could produce enriched uranium—the core material for a nuclear weapon.

In any event, Pakistan is counting heavily on Arab aid—particularly from Libya—to accelerate its nuclear programme. Libya's strongman Colonel Gaddafi has invested heavily in Pakistan's nuclear research. Ironically, he was persuaded by Bhutto's argument that the world had a Christian bomb, a Hindu bomb and a Jewish bomb. The time had come to build an Islamic bomb. If Zia follows the same path, the consequences could be disastrous.

—DILIP BOBB

SRI LANKA

The Dope Boom

Sri Lanka has reportedly become a major link in an international drug-trafficking chain, with international drug-carriers increasing their operations via Colombo.

There was a time when the "Golden Triangle" of Burma, Laos and Thailand took pride of place in narcotics drug-trafficking. But now what is known as the "mini-triangle" comprising Sri Lanka, India and the Maldive Islands is gradually taking over as the centre of international smuggling of opium and ganja (cannabis).

The Sri Lanka Narcotics Bureau (SLNB) estimates that over five tonne of opium "leak" into the country each year. The bulk of this is sent to cities in Europe, England, the United States and Australia. Some of the opium is sold to local addicts, tourists and crews of fishing-trawlers which poach round the coasts. The chief of the SLNB said that ganja was planted illicitly in about 500 acre. With each plant yielding 40 pound of ready-to-use ganja the average produce an acre was 15,000 pound. At the street value of Rs 20 a a pound in Sri Lanka, cultivators could earn Rs 75,000 from one acre.

The Narcotics Bureau chief said that India produced about 1,500 tonne of opium a year on state permits as a raw material for certain drugs, a pound of opium fetching around Rs 225. The five to six tonne that filtered into Sri Lanka yearly through Valvettiturai, Kankesanturai and Talaimannar were adulterated and sold at Rs 2,500 a pound.

Seizures: In the past, opium was transported to Sri Lanka from India in boats or towed underwater in polythene bags by fishing crafts. The main landing point was Valvettiturai, a small coastal fishing hamlet in the north of Sri Lanka, where the chief occupation of the local populace was smuggling. Now morphine, heroin and even LSD are filtering into the country. Although, Singapore has introduced the death penalty for carriers, operators are risking even that as a kilo of heroin which initially costs about $300 (Rs 2,400) ultimately fetches around $75,000 (Rs 6 lakh).

According to the SLNB, smugglers employ couriers to travel to India as pilgrims. Each 'pilgrim' brings back a package of opium weighing up to 15 pound. They pass through Katunayaka International Airport and the airport at Jaffna in the north. Indians travelling on Sri Lankan visas and Sri Lankans who return via Dhanushkodi/Talaimannar by boat are also used for carrying larger quantities as there are no restrictions on the amount of luggage on the overland route.

In recent years there had been a shift in operations from Valvettiturai. Drug and other contraband smugglers now use Pesalai, Mannar, Delft, Nainativu, Kurukadouwan, Kayts, Gurunagar and Karainagar.

New Method: The latest ruse is to send parcels of opium from the Maldive Islands by air and sea. The detection is difficult unless the authorities are tipped off. But even if detected, the real people behind the trafficking remain unidentified.

The Sri Lankan and Indian Governments have agreed on a coordinated plan to curb the drug smuggling. The two countries are not only alarmed at the drug-trafficking but also at the escalating gem smuggling, customs and revenue evasions, which are now intertwined with dope smuggling.

—T.B. PERAMUNETILLEKE

ULTIMA/SIL/160-78

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

At the end of the winning game...

Thirsty minds drink alike!

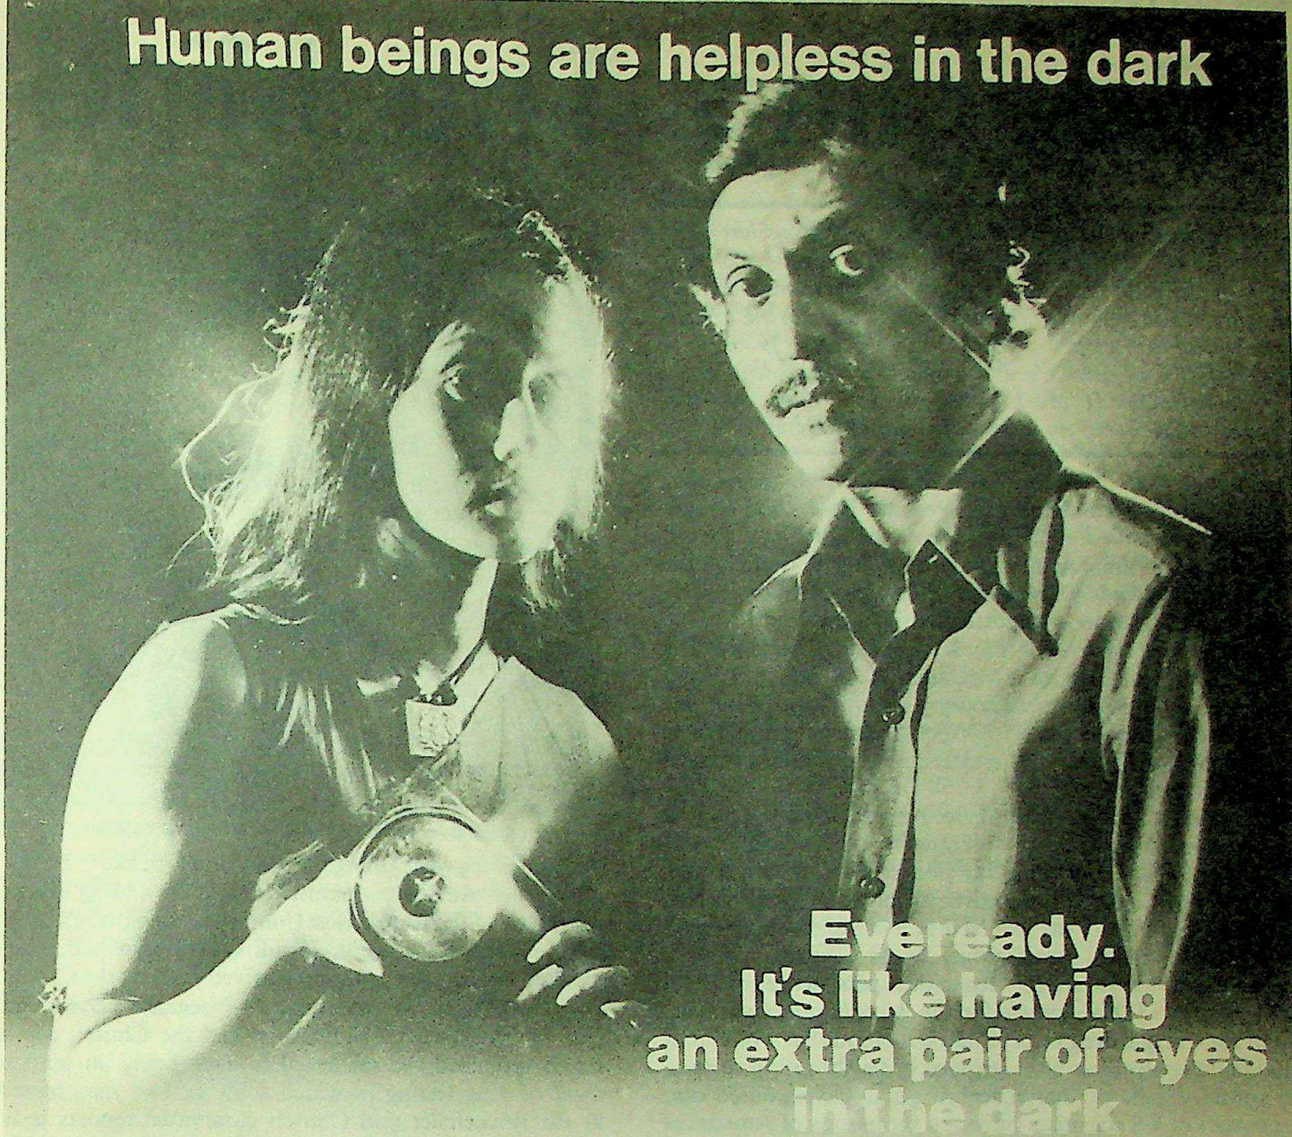
*Limca

is veri veri lime'n' lemoni

RADEUS/PE/L-16

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Human beings are helpless in the dark



Eveready.
It's like having an extra pair of eyes in the dark.

27 torches. Each one designed to match a particular need, suit a particular budget. Colourful little torches to fit a lady's handbag. Slim torches with pen clips to make for easy carrying in a shirt or jacket pocket. Heavy duty brass torches for a lifetime of service. Light aluminium torches that combine good looks with economy. And many more.

The Eveready range has something for everybody. Including you.

EVEREADY
The only guarantee you'll ever need.

UNION CARBIDE

OBM-6071A/2

RADEUS/PE/L-16

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Boggling The Mind

THE veil of secrecy that shrouds the CIA's operations has often been ripped off but the mystery persists. The latest—and most disturbing—exposé of its notorious activities is in the form of a book, The Search for the Manchurian Candidate. It deals with the organization's diabolical experiments, from 1950 to the early 1970s, with 'Mind Control'. INDIA TODAY*'s Washington correspondent interviewed the author, John D. Marks, about the experiment, which if successful, would have been "the ultimate in totalitarian control".*

IT's sold more than 20,000 copies in less than three months. It is going into its second printing. Penguin Books has bought rights to it. Yugoslavia and France have bought the rights to translate it. A daily London newspaper is going to serialize the entire thing. And Playboy magazine's prestigious book review section had dubbed it the most important book of the year.

The book, The Search for the Manchurian Candidate, has jolted America with the fury of a Muhammad Ali punch. It's got the nation's secret intelligence community scrambling around like a bunch of headless chickens. And it's got Americans from Maine to Iowa shaking their heads and muttering: "It couldn't happen here. It couldn't happen here."

But the point is, it did happen here. And for all one knows it still may be happening. What we do know, thanks to this remarkable book, is that from 1950 until the mid-1960s and early 1970s, the CIA, in concert with various government agencies as well as independent US scientists was involved in a massive, super-secret experiment with diabolical ramifications: Mind Control.

Magic Drug: Thanks to the tenacious persistence of John D. Marks, author of The Search for the Manchurian Candidate, CIA's hunt for a magic drug or psychiatric method that would produce total mind control has been stripped of its shroud of secrecy, and the sordid details of that macabre quest have poured out.

Thousands of US scientists subjected thousands of Americans and unknown numbers of foreigners to these experiments under the 'Big Brotherly' control of the CIA.

Author John Marks, 36, a former intelligence officer with the State Department, told INDIA TODAY during the course of a two-hour interview: "What I uncovered is probably one per cent of what really went on. I'm not sure we'll ever know all the details. I suspect the CIA has destroyed most of the really damaging documents." The very idea of using "psychiatrists, surgeons, hypnotists, physicians to control the human mind is repugnant," he said. "It's the ultimate in totalitarian control. It's what Orwell talked about in Nineteen Eighty-Four."

Other governments—including, of course, the Soviet Union—have tried experimental mind control in one degree or another, says Marks. "If you achieve mind control the possibilities of what you can do with it are endless. Most governments can't resist it." Marks obtained his information—16,000 pages of original, albeit heavily censored CIA documents—through a unique American institution—the Freedom of Information Act under which ordinary citizens can go to court to compel the government to release information that does not affect national security or the privacy of individuals.

Official Secrets: "Other countries," Marks says, "have followed in the footsteps of their former colonial masters such as Britain in adopting official secrets acts." Official secrets acts, he says, "are a bureaucrat's dream of non-accountability to the public." Initially, Marks says, he did not know quite what he was getting, and he did not even have the idea for a book, when the CIA grudgingly began to release him information in small driblets in 1976.

Marks—uncovering CIA's experiments to control the human mind

The following year, things began to jell. Senator Frank Church's intelligence oversight committee had been holding hearings following release of the Rockefeller Commission report in which there was mention of a CIA agent, Frank Olsen, who had jumped to his death from a window after being given LSD by the CIA.

Marks says the documents he began receiving showed him that the Rockefeller Commission and the Church committee had barely scratched the surface. Far from being an innocent experiment of drug testing in which a life or two may have been lost, as the Rockefeller and Church committee reports indicated, the CIA's 20-year programme, as Marks was to discover, was a heavily financed and tightly orchestrated effort to find fool proof methods of governing human behaviour.

Advanced Research: Government as well as private scientists and researchers, in an ethics-be-damned orgy jumped willingly into the heart of the CIA experiments which spread from coast to coast and used major American college campuses—Columbia, Harvard, Stanford—as fertile grounds for research. "This programme," Marks says, "was the cutting edge of the behaviour modification and change field. It represented the most advanced research in this field. It was the ultimate form of government research and the scientists who agreed to be part of the programme were promised secrecy, pay, and full support. It was hard for them to resist."

Marks said he decided to write his book after his perusal of thousands of documents convinced him that the CIA's continuing experiment was, indeed, aimed at searching for a Manchurian Candidate. "Manchurian Candidate" is the title of a 1959 novel by Richard Condon which suggests that a person can be brainwashed into becoming an assassin on a pre-arranged signal. The CIA experiments, Marks notes, were designed to determine if a Manchurian Candidate could actually be created experimentally. The CIA's experiments had the express purpose of determining whether unwitting victims can be made to commit involuntary acts such as assassinations and then not be able to remember these acts or what prompted them to commit them. A successful experiment of this sort would establish the ultimate form of mind control.

Collaborators: The CIA found willing allies for its experiments not only among US government agencies but also in the pharmaceutical industry which provided CIA with dangerous drugs which had been rejected for use for humans because of undesirable side-effects.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Marks's documents show that since the 1950s the CIA was obsessed with experimenting with poisons, drugs, hypnosis, psychosurgery, electroshock treatments at home and abroad. And acts committed by victims whose minds had been altered by these methods could include the killing of not just foreign politicians but also American officials.

The importance of mind control through various devices such as concussions induced from afar was that such traumas "are always followed by amnesia for the actual moment of the accident", a CIA document shows.

"If a technique was devised," the same document says, "to induce brain concussion without either giving advance warning or causing external physical trauma, the person upon recovery would be unable to recall what had happened to him." These methods, the memo says, could be established as "tools in brainwashing therapy". And they include—in addition to drugging—subjecting unknowing victims, such as people driving cars, to sudden, special horn blasts tuned to the resonant frequency of the head, blast waves propagated in the air, and to tuned sound waves concentrated on the victim with the help of accoustical lenses and reflectors.

The Origins: Names given to these CIA experimental programmes were CHICKWIT, and OFTEN. And they apparently grew out of a secret project named ARTICHOKE in the 1950s. The "essential element" of ARTICHOKE was to study the feasibility of whether "an individual of (deleted) descent, approximately 35 years old, well-educated, proficient in English and well-established socially and politically in the (deleted) Government could be induced under ARTICHOKE to perform an act, involuntarily, of attempted assassination against a prominent (deleted) politician or if necessary, against an American official . . ." (The deletions represent words blanked out by the CIA).

In other areas, CIA operatives were asked to cooperate with Tanzanian witch-doctors in order to obtain information from them about the various mind control uses of poisons obtained from the gall bladders of sick Tanzanian crocodiles of the Nile variety.

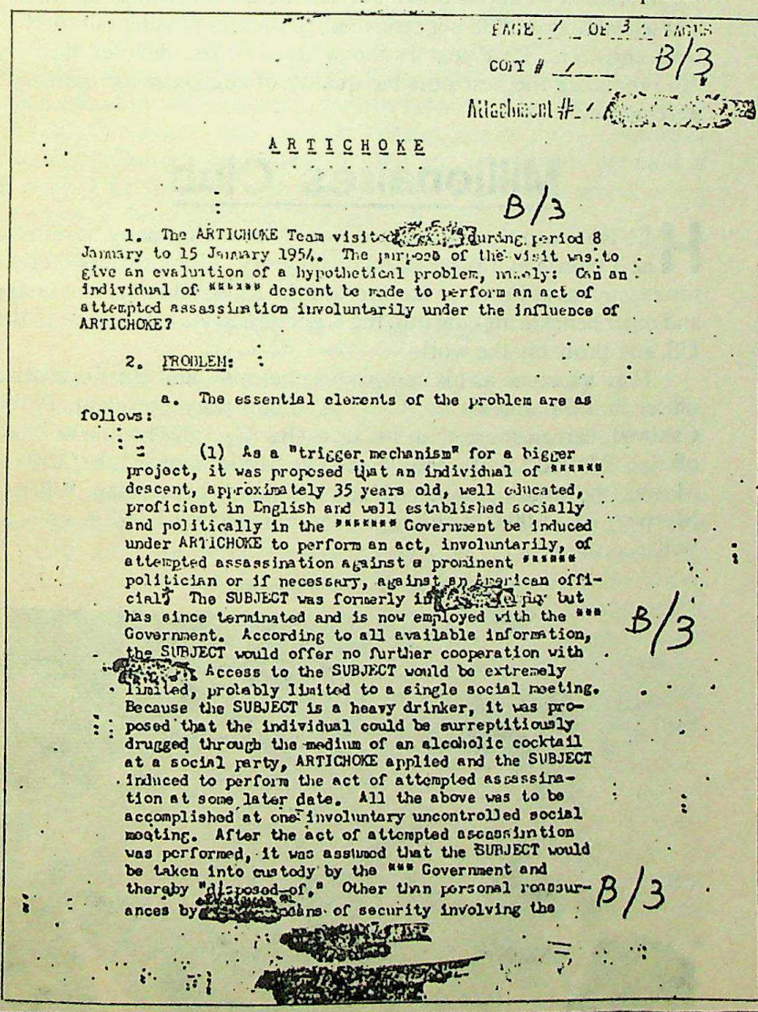
Marks is not sure whether—so far—CIA's experiments on thousands of students, mental patients, prostitutes, prison inmates, foreigners, ever produced a Manchurian Candidate. He knows for sure that the CIA's psychological experiments on San Francisco prostitutes—dubbed "Operation Midnight Climax"—in order to use sex in espionage yielded negligible results.

Symbol of Defiance: But the CIA experiments, Marks says, led to the "democratization of the drug LSD", over which the CIA had maintained a complete monopoly. The drug could not be produced, imported or exported without CIA knowledge and control, so important was its place in the CIA's secret armamentarium of mind control devices.

But the CIA's use of LSD in campus experiments was the way LSD "got out" of the CIA's hands in and into the mouths of America's flower children in the 1960s. Use of the drug became a symbol of defiance of authority, opposition to the Vietnam war, and karma trips designed to wipe off the memory of materialistic Amerika, as the cultural revolutionaries of those days spelled the word.

Marks thinks that LSD which slipped out of CIA's control in the 1960s and became the mind-expanding drug of the campus movement may have served a "counter-revolutionary purpose", in that it focused the energies of the youth revolt away from economic and political issues and into purely cultural ones.

"But you've got to remember," Marks says, "the cultural revolution was very anti-authoritarian. CIA may not have found the Manchurian Candidate but its experiments certainly helped usher in the Dawn of the Age of Aquarius."



PAGE 1 OF 3 PAGES
COPY # 1 B/3
Attachment #1

ARTICHOKE

B/3

1. The ARTICHOKE Team visited [redacted] during period 8 January to 15 January 1954. The purpose of the visit was to give an evaluation of a hypothetical problem, namely: Can an individual of [redacted] descent be made to perform an act of attempted assassination involuntarily under the influence of ARTICHOKE?

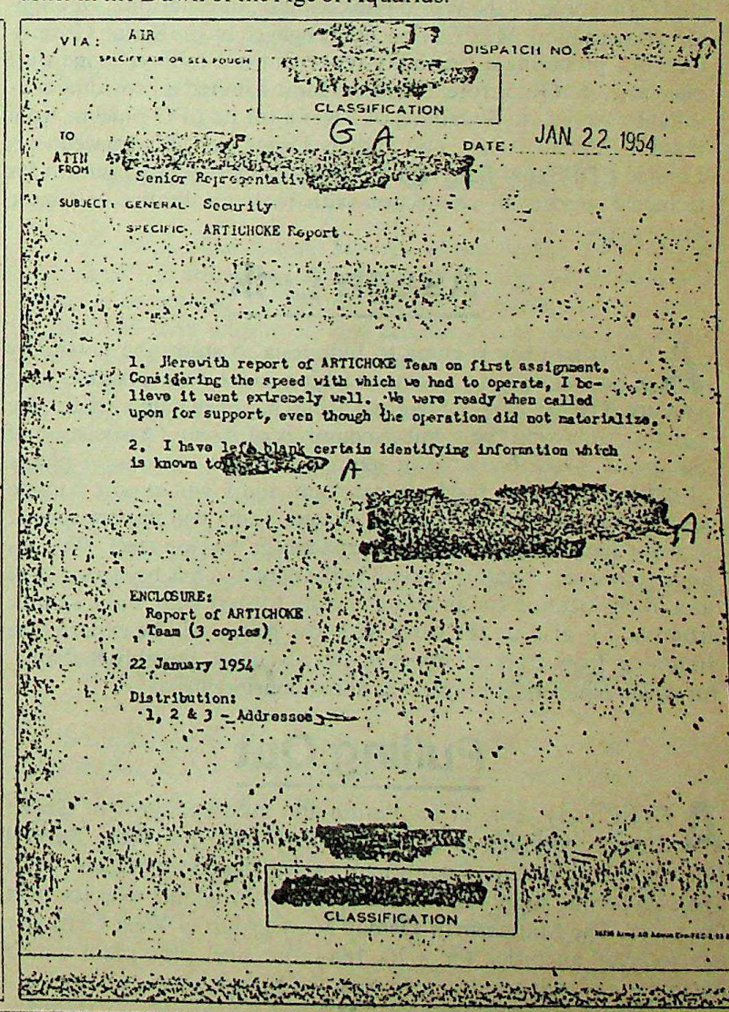
2. PROBLEM:

a. The essential elements of the problem are as follows:

(1) As a "trigger mechanism" for a bigger project, it was proposed that an individual of [redacted] descent, approximately 35 years old, well educated, proficient in English and well established socially and politically in the [redacted] Government be induced under ARTICHOKE to perform an act, involuntarily, of attempted assassination against a prominent [redacted] politician or if necessary, against an American official. The SUBJECT was formerly in [redacted] employ but has since terminated and is now employed with the [redacted] Government. According to all available information, the SUBJECT would offer no further cooperation with [redacted]. Access to the SUBJECT would be extremely limited, probably limited to a single social meeting. Because the SUBJECT is a heavy drinker, it was proposed that the individual could be surreptitiously drugged through the medium of an alcoholic cocktail at a social party, ARTICHOKE applied and the SUBJECT induced to perform the act of attempted assassination at some later date. All the above was to be accomplished at one involuntary uncontrolled social meeting. After the act of attempted assassination was performed, it was assumed that the SUBJECT would be taken into custody by the [redacted] Government and thereby "disposed of." Other than personal reassurances by [redacted] means of security involving the

B/3

B/3



VIA: AIR
SPECIFY AIR OR SEA POUCH DISPATCH NO. [redacted]
CLASSIFICATION
TO: [redacted] G A
ATTN: [redacted]
FROM: [redacted] Senior Representative
DATE: JAN 22 1954
SUBJECT: GENERAL: Security
SPECIFIC: ARTICHOKE Report

1. Herewith report of ARTICHOKE Team on first assignment. Considering the speed with which we had to operate, I believe it went extremely well. We were ready when called upon for support, even though the operation did not materialize.

2. I have left blank certain identifying information which is known to [redacted]

A

A

ENCLOSURE:
Report of ARTICHOKE Team (3 copies)

22 January 1954

Distribution:
1, 2 & 3 - Addressee

CLASSIFICATION

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Business International

Exit Ironing

THE "Sanforised" people whose process to control cloth shrinkage revolutionized the cotton textile industry have now come out with a no-iron anti-wrinkle process called "Sanfor-Set". The process is being marketed by Chiet, Peabody and Co, the firm that is responsible for marketing the "Sanforised" process the world over.

Sanfor-Set shirts are now being tested in USA and the initial response is said to be favourable. According to an executive of a man-made fibre company, the abrasion resistance, easy-care and wrinkle-resistance properties of Sanfor-Set are quite good but not as comfortable as polyester-cotton blended shirts which make up 71 per cent of the shirt market in the US and Europe. In India the proportion is low because of the lower initial costs of cotton shirts. However, the new process is expected to give a tremendous boost to the shrinking cotton textile industry everywhere, particularly India, which has a large cotton surplus.

Consultancy Services

INDIAN consultancy firms are slowly making their mark in the export market. Fertiliser (Planning and Development) India Limited, which, for some reason has been kept out of new fertilizer projects in the country, is taking up a study of fertilizer marketing and distribution for Afghanistan Fertilizer Company, Kabul. The study is financed by the World Bank affiliate, International Development Association. MECON has been engaged by the Syrian Government for preparing a feasibility report for a 1-million tonne steel plant at a fee of Rs 5 crore. Engineers India Limited is providing consultancy services to Sonatrach of Algeria for its LPG pipeline from Hassi R'Mel to Arzew and Indian Drugs and Pharmaceuticals Limited (IDPL) has been retained by the Algerian Government for technical services in connection with their antibiotics and basic drugs plant.

Asean Link

AN Indian team is going to Indonesia to study the possibility of setting up an alumina smelting plant as a possible joint venture. The Ministry of Steel and Mines has drawn up a scheme for collaboration with the member-countries of Asean (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) in setting up metal conversion plants at either end of the production stream. India will export bauxite and import alumina. In the case of steel, India will import sponge iron for feeding it into electric furnaces for making steel. With its huge resources of natural gas and oil, Indonesia has been identified as a likely location for an alumina plant to start with, but a sponge iron plant is also on the cards. Iron ore pellets will be exported to Indonesia from Iron ore mines on the east coast, possibly Bailadila, for which a pelletization plant is under consideration.

Pulling Out

AFTER sixty years of revolution and industrial growth, Soviet Russia continues to buy technology from the West. Several European and Japanese contractors have signed agreements with Moscow for the supply of two heavy industrial plants over the next few years. The Mannesman-Demag Meer group of West Germany has received an order for a Rs 184-crore steel pipe plant which Mannesman is expected to split with the French Steel and nuclear-technology group, Creusot-Loire. Moscow is also placing an order for a Rs 56-crore tyre manufacturing plant to be supplied by Mitsubishi Heavy Industries of Tokyo. The plant, to be ready by 1982, will manufacture heavy-duty tyres for bulldozers and tractors.

Meanwhile, Mansfield Tire and Rubber Company, a US tyre manufacturer that has not been doing too well lately, is pulling out of India and is selling its 20 per cent interest in Madras Rubber Factory in Madras for about Rs 1 crore. The Madras company was also not doing well for some time but has now recovered. Its Rs 10 equity share is quoted around Rs 20. Mansfield Tire is apparently following in the footsteps of Kaiser Aluminium which is also selling its interest in Hindustan Aluminium, a Birla group company.

Engineers In Japan

THE main factor behind the success of Japanese industry is the effort put into high quality and reliability and the close cooperation between engineers and marketing men. Japan regards technology as the foundation of its prosperity and considers its engineers as its most precious industrial asset. According to a recent survey, engineers hold 67 per cent of board seats in the major Japanese manufacturing firms. In some high technology areas like electronics and chemicals, all board members are engineers.

This emphasis is also reflected in the Government. In the Ministry of Science and Technology, one third of the top officials are engineers and in the Agency for Industrial Science and Technology (which has no counterpart in India) only one of the top officials is not an engineer.

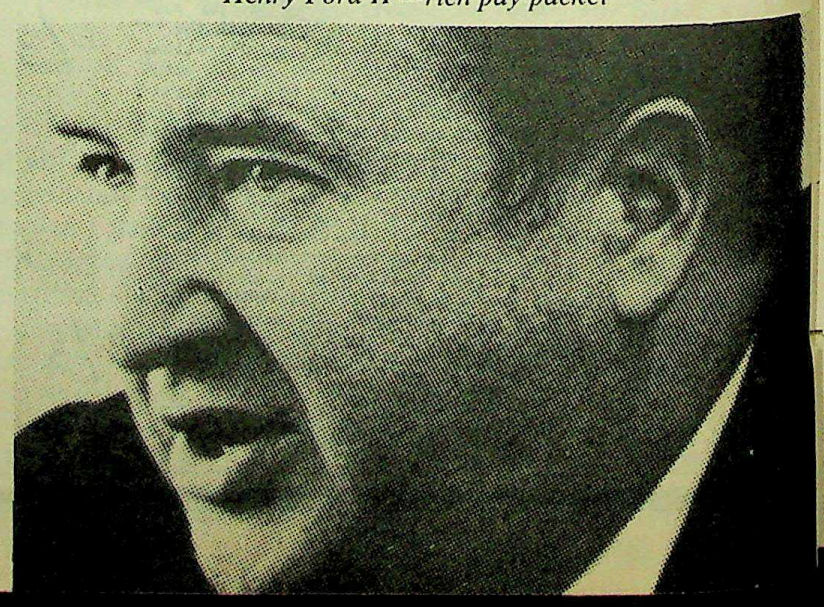
Over half of Japan's 601 universities are dedicated to science and technology and 38 per cent of all graduates passing out in 1977 were engineers. Last year two new universities, devoted entirely "to producing the best possible quality of engineers for industry" were opened.

Millionaires' Club

HENRY Ford II, chairman of Ford Motor Company, is retiring next month in a blaze of financial glory. Along with two other top executives at Ford, he has crossed the Rs 80 lakh mark in salary and other benefits making him the highest paid auto executive in the US, and probably the world.

Ford's income as his company's chairman and chief executive officer in 1977 was Rs 80,90,680. The company president, Philip Caldwell, earned more than his boss (Rs 83,21,024) while another official, Edward Lundy, also joined the Millionaires Club. General Motors, the largest company in the US, paid its chairman, William Murphy, Rs 78,00,000 although GM outstripped Ford in sales as well as profits.

Henry Ford II —rich pay packet



Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

trade winds

Gassing Games

Petroleum Minister Hemwati Nandan Bahuguna is planning to take Bombay Gas all the way to Lucknow, his home town and political base, and has turned down Gujarat Government's request to have a slice of the gas-based petrochemical empire. Bahuguna's argument is that Gujarat already has a petrochemical complex at Baroda but Morarji Desai's home state is not prepared to take 'no' for an answer. Bahuguna's men in Delhi say that Maharashtra has a stronger claim on Bombay High than Gujarat which can always fall back upon its onshore dry gas fields in the Tapi basin. Gujarat Chief Minister, Babubhai Patel, is so miffed at Bahuguna's attitude that he refused to attend the inauguration of the Baroda complex by the prime minister in March.

CBI Probe Bhel-Siemens

The Bhel-Siemens tie-up is now in the hands of the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI), not the collaboration proposal itself which the Cabinet is looking into, but the disclosure by Communist Party of India-Marxist member of Parliament P. Ramamurthi who has mounted a one-man campaign against it. CBI inspectors raided a printing press in Madras last month and took away bits of manuscript and galleys. Apparently, the Ramamurthi version differs from the original in many respects, but the Industry Ministry is so secretive about the deal that even the official Janata Party Committee headed by Sunder Singh Bhandari has not been able to get hold of a copy. CBI suspects that Bharat Heavy Electricals officials were involved in passing the information to Ramamurthi.

More Power

The additional power generating capacity 'really' added to the country's power system is only 1,522,000 kilowatt and not 3,022,000 kilowatt, according to power engineers in the know. Power from eight plants with a total capacity of 1,500,000 kilowatt will be available only nine months from now as the plants are now on "barring gear", which is one stage before 'rolling' them and putting them on actual power production. This stage, which is quite crucial, takes anything between nine to 12 months and makes all the difference between installing a plant and extracting power from it. Government's own power engineers are saying that the Energy Ministry is involved in a fiddle and is merely inflating figures to impress Parliament. Incidentally, all the eight plants included in the ministry's claim are located outside West Bengal.

Master's Voice ?

CBS Records, a subsidiary of Columbia Broadcasting (CBS) of New York, is planning a joint venture in India for manufacture and export of gramophone records and pre-recorded tapes. The proposal, if it goes through, involves the setting up of manufacturing facilities in Bombay in collaboration with a non-resident Indian from London who will hold 60 per cent of the authorized capital of Rs 60 lakh. The balance will be held by CBS in exchange for the supply of complete plant and equipment. The new venture will have a capacity of 640,000 gramophone records and 150,000 pre-recorded tapes.

There are three record manufacturing companies in India including two foreign companies, HMV (a subsidiary of EMI) and Polydor. The only Indian company in the field is Indian Record Manufacturing Company Limited (IRMCL) which has been trying to get CBS franchise in this country. But will now be left out in the cold.

Birla Turns To Leyland

Birla-owned Hindustan Motors is negotiating with British Leyland of UK for technical collaboration to replace its outdated Ambassador model. Hindustan Motors is aiming at a lighter, cheaper car with improved fuel economy and reduction of its present use of heavy steel auto components. The company began operations in 1954 with a tie-up with British Motor Corporation which was the manufacturer's name before its merger with Leyland and its more recent nationalization by the Labour Government. British Leyland, now known as BL Limited, is fully owned by the British Government and has been passing from crisis to crisis ever since the takeover. It has an Indian subsidiary, Ashok Leyland, which is doing quite well and has just announced an ambitious expansion programme. But Ashok Leyland makes trucks, not cars.

Rolls-Royce's Tank Deal

Rolls-Royce of UK is discussing a proposal with the Defence Ministry for setting up design and manufacturing facility in India to produce high-power engines for tanks, and eventually, civil aircraft. Rolls-Royce engines have been fitted to the latest series of Chieftain tanks that were originally destined for Iran but are likely to be purchased by India at a discounted price which could be as low as Rs 40 lakh per tank. Iran had agreed to buy 1,300 tanks for Rs 1,170 crore but the order was cancelled in February before the revolution. New Delhi is interested in the deal provided Rolls-Royce, which is wholly owned by the British Government, is willing to use some of the money to set up shop in India.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Sungloss around my bed takes me on a magic flight the seagulls call, the heavens spread as red and gold turn into night.
I catch a starlit, silvery beam and then, I turn into a dream...

SUN SUNGLOSS decorative laminate
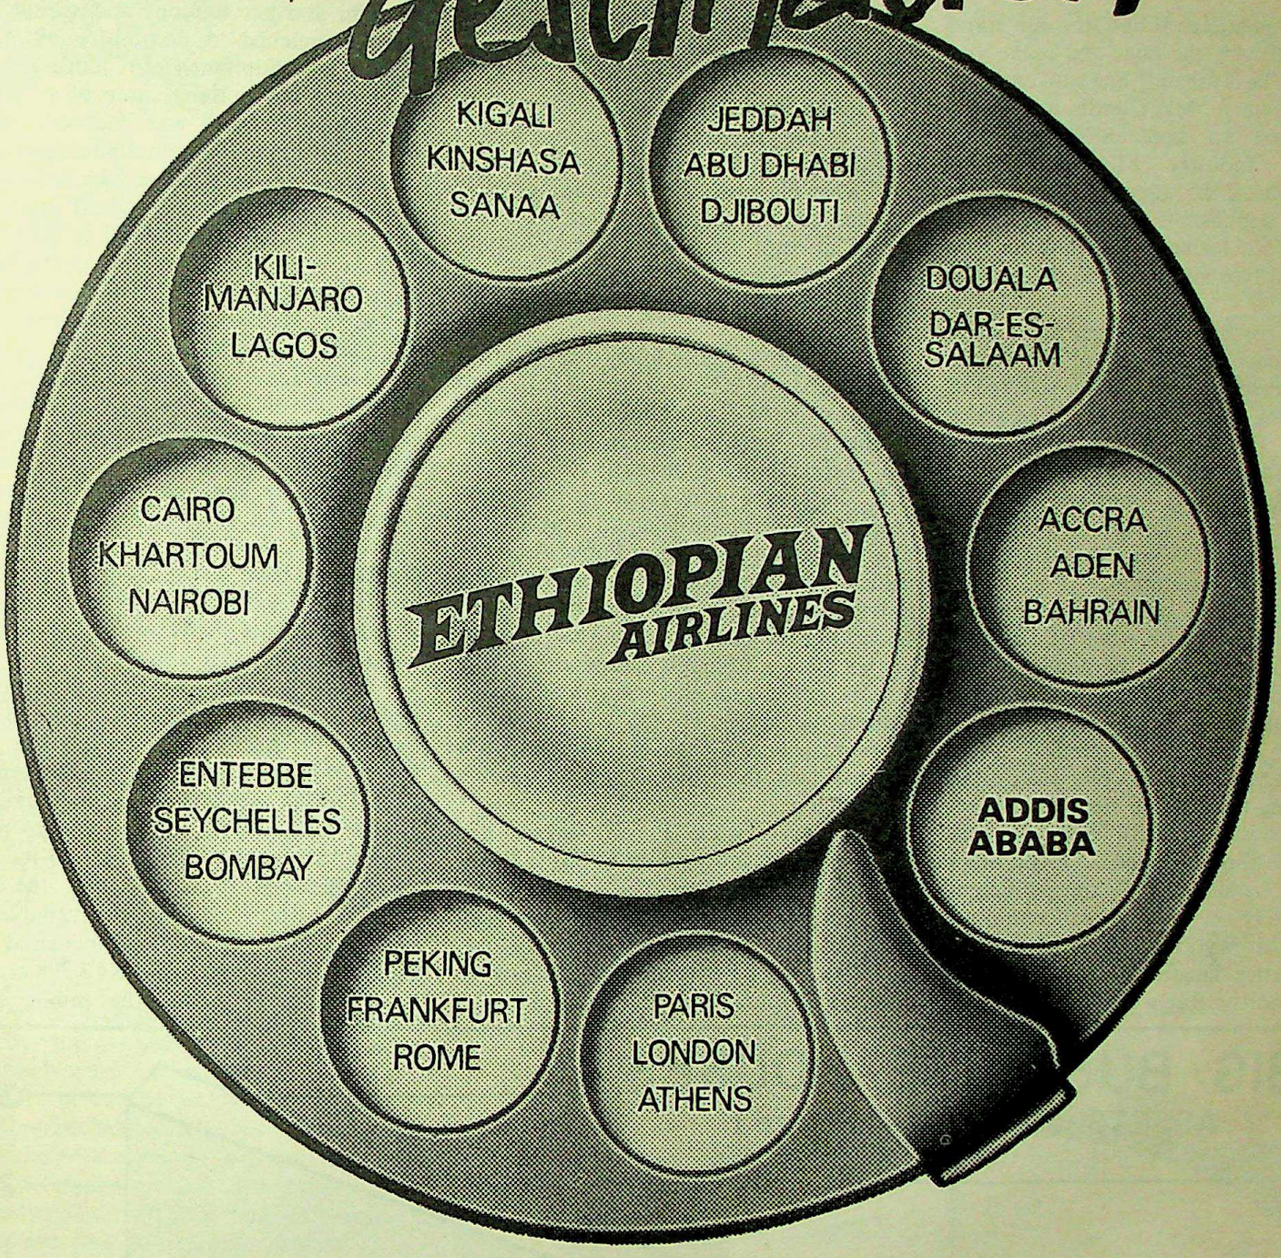
Beauty that endures

OBM 2863

caprihans INDIA LIMITED

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Dial a destination.



If you're travelling by air, call us. For information about our flights to 26 international destinations, or flights on any other airline. We're just glad to help. We'll work out the best routes for you, check your schedules, and help you on your way across the world. Travel with us and you'll see how much trouble we go to, to make sure your journey is trouble-free. We're only a telephone call away, so why not call us—or your nearest Travel Agent?

Taj Mahal Hotel, Bombay. Tel: 294462 or 297755 Ext. 3215
Janpath Hotel, New Delhi. Tel: 388495 or 383961 Ext. 2
Contact your nearest Travel Agent or any Air-India Office (GSA for India)

20.78

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

NATIONALIZATION

Confusion Prevails

A skilful politician is one who can stand up and rock the boat and make you believe he is the only one who can save you from the storm. Mrs Gandhi was such a politician and so apparently—and surprisingly—is Industry Minister George Fernandes. But if the wages of sin is death, the wages of populism is chaos, as happened in the case of the former prime minister who was the first casualty of the storm she created.

The George-Biju axis, forged in the wake of the Chikmagalur disaster for the Janata Party, has blossomed into what is referred to in some ruling party circles as 'Fernandes and Patnaik Pvt Ltd Co'. "I don't know what keeps these two gentlemen together," says a pipe-smoking member of the party's nine-member committee on big business houses. "They have very little in common except overweening ambition."

The George-Biju combine was literally on the carpet last month when at a stormy meeting of the committee, Fernandes is said to have pleaded for more time to justify his plea for the takeover of large business houses The industry minister is apparently under attack from a number of quarters. His proposal for a long-term tie-up between Bharat Heavy Electricals (Bhel) and Siemens of Germany is also embroiled in party politics and is being looked into by three different bodies, namely, a cabinet subcommittee consisting of Morarji Desai and H.M. Patel; a party committee headed by Sunder Singh Bhandari; and the Rajya Sabha, which will soon take up a motion tabled by CPI-M member of Parliament, P. Ramamurthy and others.

Initial Stratagem: The anti-big business lobby in the Government has a long history going back to Mrs Gandhi's salad days in 1967 when big businessmen—working mainly through the Swatantra Party—made a concerted attempt to dislodge big politicians (mainly Congressmen) from power and nearly succeeded in doing so in most of the northern states.

The anti-business lobby was carefully put together by P.N. Haksar and R.C. Dutt with men like M. Kumaramangalam bringing up the rear. Since the front required intellectual respectability, economists R.K. Hazari H.K. Paranjape were roped in from convenient government-financed institutions like the Indian Institute of Public Administration, and they dutifully prepared reports criticizing the rapid growth of big business houses like Birlas. Chandra Shekhar, who was at that time a Congress backbencher—after a short spell as a socialist—was a leading man behind the scenes. He too had his dutiful economists in tow, some of whom have now jumped over the fence to join the Janata bandwagon.

However, while P. N. Haksar and Kumaramangalam went on to bigger things and the economists got their crumbs, Birlas themselves got off scot-free. They knew right from the start that the whole exercise was only a public relations gimmick designed to create a favourable radical image for Mrs Gandhi and her minions and would leave them untouched. A committee of inquiry headed by a Supreme Court judge was duly appointed but nothing came of it. By the time the Emergency was imposed, Haksar was in the doghouse, Kumaramangalam was dead and Chandra Shekhar who had done so much for Mrs Gandhi's radical image was unceremoniously bundled off to Tihar Jail. And the person nearest to Mrs Gandhi was no other than industrialist Krishna Kumar Birla, son of the godfather of Indian big-business, G.D. Birla.

Surprising: Against this messy background, it is not clear why George Fernandes should have disinterred the rotting corpse of a dead horse, unless he too was advised, possibly by the same clique of intellectuals, to refurbish his image à la Indira Gandhi. The facts, if anything, are against him. The big houses [illegible] bigger but so has everything else. They are growing much slower than the public sector, or even the industrial sector as a whole.

Between 1963 and 1971, a period of rapid industrial expansion, the top 25 business groups doubled their assets from Rs 1,820 crore in 1963 to Rs 3,680 crore in 1971. During this period, the corresponding assests of the public sector shot up nearly three-fold from Rs 1,600 crore to Rs 4,690 crore. Between 1972 and 1976, the latest years for which figures are available, the same big houses (see chart) increased their assets by 61 per cent (from Rs 3,398 crore to Rs 5,476 crore) while the public sector assets grew by 132 per cent (from Rs 5,606 crore to Rs 13,044 crore).

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Lokesh Bhargava

Thus, while the public sector expanded 1.9 times as fast as its private counterpart between 1963 and 1971, it grew 2.2 times faster during 1972 and 1976. The net result was that by 1976 the public sector accounted for 43 per cent of total assets in industry as against its share of only 32 per cent in 1972.

In terms of turnover also, the public sector has gained steadily on the 25 big houses. In 1972, the turnover of the public sector was Rs 3,325 crore against Rs 3,870 crore in respect of the 25 big houses. Four years later in 1976, the position was reversed: Rs 8,050 crore in the case of the public sector against Rs 7,065 crore of 25 big houses. The boot is now actually on the other foot and it is the Big Babudom that is swelling—and more than twice as fast as Big Business.

Political: Dr Raj Krishna, a member of the Planning Commission who submitted a note to the committee, seems to have realized this but the compulsion of cosmetic image-making is apparently irresistible. Actually the question of how to deal with concentrations of economic power, whether in the hands of the state or the private sector, is a political rather than economic issue, since it is nobody's case that Birlas and Tatas ought to be curbed because they are inefficient.

Economists are competent to deal only with questions of economic efficiency and utilization of resources. No wonder that the only concrete suggestion made by Raj Krishna is so outlandish that one is amazed it was made at all. He has suggested that as soon as a business group has reached the stupendous—to Raj Krishna and others—figure of Rs 100 crore in assets, the surplus funds should be placed in bank deposits "which then can be recycled to both the private and public sectors", whatever that means. The assumption is that the assets of a company are stored safely away at the end of the year, every bundle of notes counted twice!

As things are, the nine-member committee is impressed neither with the economists nor with George Fernandes and is unlikely to oblige them. Biju Patnaik seems to have realized this, for he told a reporter of the Business Standard in Bhubaneshwar that "he never pleaded for nationalization of Tisco", but all he wanted was that the Government should decide whether to give away Rs 400 crore straightaway to Tatas for modernization or "the same amount of money should be spent through the public sector". What he meant, but did not say so, was that Tisco should be nationalized before giving the undertaking the money for modernization, but he is now obviously backsliding.

Patnaik also said that the Government's stake in the equity of Tisco was 45 per cent against Tatas' four per cent. If so, it would be wrong to bracket Tisco along with other companies in the Tata group and lump all assets together, since the assets are not all owned by Tatas. Either a company belongs to Tatas or it does not. If the companies not owned by Tatas—or Birlas—are excluded, it is doubtful whether the assets of Tatas or Birlas, or any other business group, can add up to the figures computed by the Government. There should actually be two lists for each group: companies with majority or substantial group interest and those only managed by the group. If only the first category of companies is taken into account Tatas are probably worth around Rs 150–200 crore which is nowhere near the Rs 1,000-crore mark they are supposed to be.

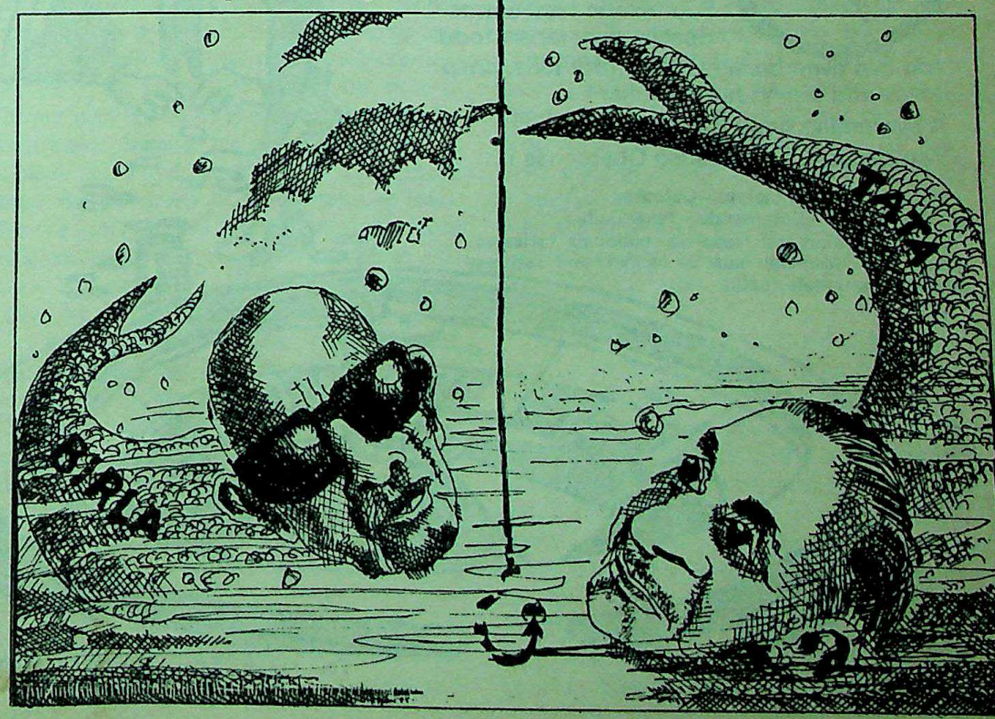
Wrong Thinking: And since it is management rather than ownership that is at issue, let the shareholders decide who should manage the company for them, J.R.D. Tata or G.D. Birla, or some faceless bureaucrat in the Industry Ministry and his political bosses. George Fernandes, as a socialist, should be the last person to object if the voting is done on one-shareholder-one-vote basis unless, like all capitalists, he too thinks that a man with a hundred-rupee stake is worth 10 times as much as a man with a ten-rupee stake. He would not be much of a socialist if he does.

Actually, if the Government is really serious about economic democracy, it should open up the public sector for public participation by offering a portion of the equity for sale to the public. The manifesto of the party calls for action against concentration of power in the hands of the state as well as private business. If workers can participate in the management of a public undertaking—though few do—there is no reason why the man in the street cannot, since he is the ultimate owner of the public sector. And when the equity is distributed among the public, let the new shareholders decide whether, for instance, they want the ailing Steel Authority of India to be run by Patnaik's men in the Steel Ministry or by Tatas' men in Tisco. The outcome of such a poll could be devastating.

There are at least three members of the committee who are thinking on these lines. The committee has five members from Congress (O) and Bharatiya Lok Dal (Hegde, Asoka Mehta, H.M. Patel, Viren Shah and S.N. Mishra), two are socialists (George Fernandes and Surendra Mohan), one is from Jan Sangh (Bhai Mahavir) and one from Chandra Shekhar group (Krishan Kant). Only two (including himself) are supporting George Fernandes, and Krishan Kant is apparently sitting on the fence—he clashed with Fernandes in the other committee (Bhel-Siemens tie-up).

The division at the moment is six to three but in the Janata parliamentary party itself, it may be nearer 10 to one. As of now, therefore, George Fernandes and his friends are fighting a losing battle.

—JAY DUBASHI



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

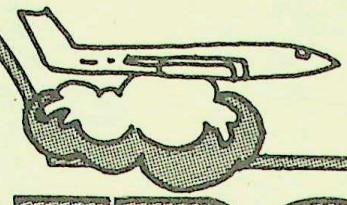
The holiday of your life abroad.
You've tried the hill stations of India. Now try Kathmandu.

7 FUN FILLED DAYS

HOTEL

SOALTEE OBEROI

FOR JUST RS. 999/-



NO PASSPORT

30% DISCOUNT ON I.A., R.N.A.C. FARES*

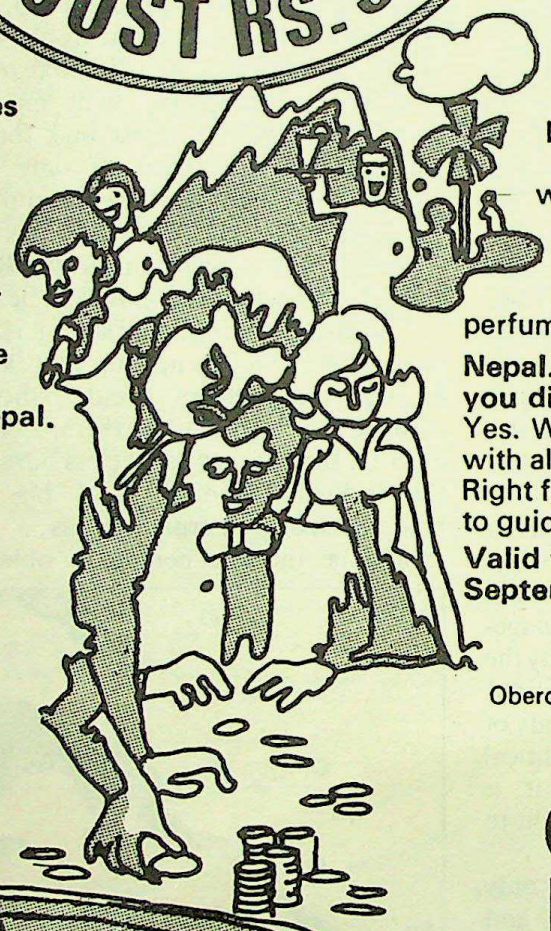
NO FOREIGN EXCHANGE REGULATIONS

999 Indian Rupees for 7 days and 6 nights. Includes bed and breakfast on a twin-sharing basis. No extra room charge for children below 12. Free transport from airport to hotel. Half day free sight-seeing in Kathmandu. Plus Rs. 100 worth of free chips to spend at the hotel's exciting Casino Nepal.

The fun spots of Kathmandu. They're right in your hotel !

Four exotic restaurants.
Special vegetarian food.
You can even breakfast on fluffy idlis, crisp dosas and piping hot sambhar !
A swimming pool. Bars.
You name it. The Soaltee Oberoi has it.

* Calcutta - Kathmandu - Calcutta
New Delhi - Kathmandu - New Delhi
Valid for Indian and Nepalese nationals (attested proof of citizenship must be carried) and resident foreign nationals only.



There's a MONTE CARLO EAST OF SUEZ- CASINO NEPAL.

It's right in your hotel too. The only casino east of Suez and west of Macau. Offers all international gambling facilities.

Foreign goods galore.
Everything from perfumes to cameras.

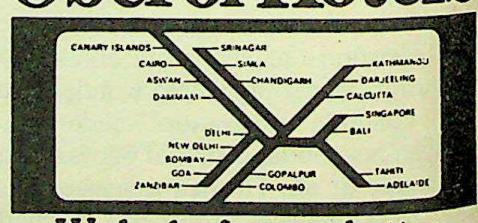
Nepal. We'll help you discover it.
Yes. We'll help you with all arrangements. Right from car rentals to guided tours.

Valid from May 1 to September 30, 1979.

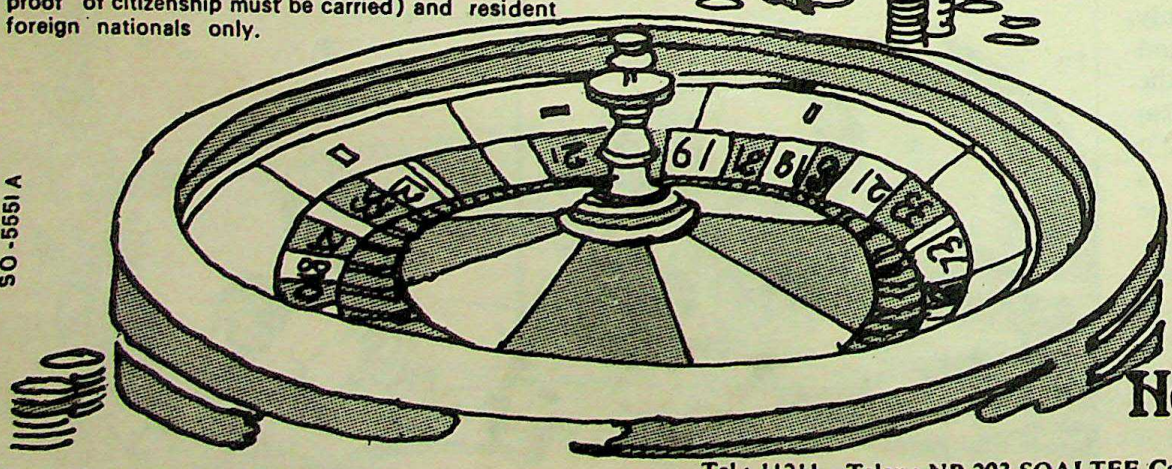
HURRY
CHANCES LIKE THIS COME JUST ONCE IN A LIFETIME

For reservations, please contact your travel agent or the nearest Oberoi Hotel.
Oberoi Instant Reservation Service:
Oberoi Inter.Continental, New Delhi. Tel : 699571
Oberoi Towers, Bombay, Tel : 234343
Oberoi Grand, Calcutta.Tel : 230181
Madras Office.Tel : 88156

Oberoi Hotels



We look after you better



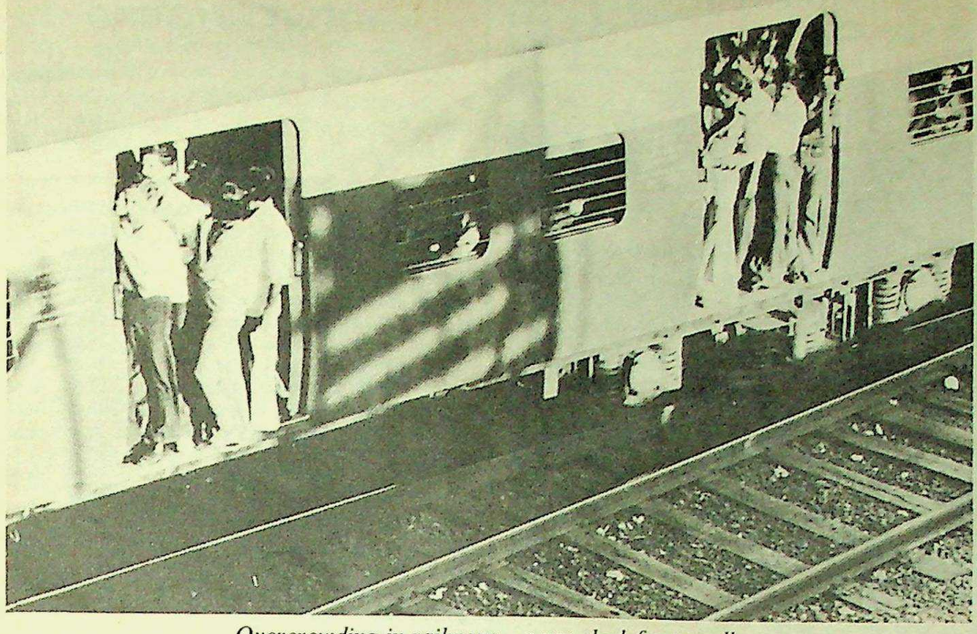
SO-5551A

Hotel Soaltee Oberoi

Kathmandu, Nepal

Tel : 11211 Telex : NP-203 SOALTEE Cable : SOALTEE or OBHOTEL KATHMANDU

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Overcrowding in railways—a raw deal for travellers

RAILWAYS

On The Wrong Track

MADHUKAR Sawant lives in Dombivli, a suburb of Bombay, and catches the 8.10 special to his office in Crawford Market every day. Fifteen years ago when he started, his Central Railway train was punctual and Sawant could nearly always manage to get a corner seat for himself, even on Mondays when the rush was heaviest. Not any more. The train is unpunctual as well as crowded and Sawant has become the most reluctant commuter of Dombivli.

Ever since Independence, railway passengers in India, particularly short-distance travellers, have been at the receiving end. Railways consider themselves essentially as a bulk carrier of goods and look upon passengers as a social liability and have consistently squeezed and downgraded them. This is clear from the niggardly increase in seating capacity compared to the number of passengers. According to M. B. Lal, a former member of the Railway Board, the seating capacity has increased by 113 per cent since 1931 while the number of passengers has gone up by 173 per cent.

What is worse, says Lal, echoing Madhukar Sawant and others, is that the railway administration has become elitist in its approach and fusses over the so-called long-distance travellers who constitute a small fraction of the passenger traffic—probably not more than five per cent of the annual 3,500 million rail commuters. More than half the passengers (55 per cent) travel short distances, about 20 km per passenger. The average trip of the remaining 45 per cent is just over 80 km.

Short-Sighted: The Rajdhanis and the air-conditioned expresses cater to a tiny proportion of the traffic, most of which originates outside the four metropolitan cities. It is easier to get a reservation on a Rajdhani between Delhi and Bombay than, say, between Baroda and Bombay, although the traffic between Baroda and Bombay is much heavier than that between Delhi and Bombay.

In 1960, the railways handled nearly 60 per cent of the passenger traffic. Today they carry about 35 per cent of the total estimated traffic of around 10,000 million passengers. By the end of the century, the proportion may be brought down to 30 per cent, leaving the roadways to carry the remaining 70 per cent, a vast proportion that may take our oil import bill to 60 per cent of all exports. Actually, the proportion should be reverse: 70 per cent by railways and the balance by roadways. In the metropolitan areas of Tokyo and Paris, the railways carry more than three-quarters of the commuter load, for the simple reason that it is six times more efficient—in terms of oil consumption—to carry a passenger by rail than by bus and 30 times by private car.

Indian railways make much of the fact that they are the only profit making railways in the world. They should be, since they carry passengers as if they were cattle, and cattle are often better looked after by them than humans. The fact is that the railways do not think they are a part of the mass transit system and have done little over the years to develop their mass transit capacity.

Slow Growth: The route mileage of Indian railways has grown very little since 1873—a century ago—when the present railway network was completed by the British. Since Independence, only another 5,000 km have been added to the 55,000 km that the British left behind. This works out at less than 200 km per year, not much to write home about. The basic structure of the railways has also remained unchanged for over a century during which period the human and industrial landscape has undergone vast changes. The population itself, let alone anything else, has trebled.

But the railways behave as if they had no other obligation except to carry coal and grain and limestone while the hapless Sawant and others have a trying time getting to office and back every day and take it out on the railways by burning them down every few months. And the railway authorities wonder why they have such a big communication gap with their customers.

COMPUTERS

Filling The Vacuum

WHEN it comes to computers, every silver lining has apparently a cloud tagged on to it. It is now nearly two years since IBM was asked to pull out of the country but the vacuum left by the giant multinational has not yet been filled. The majority of IBM's former employees have joined the two firms formed out of the IBM rump—Computer Maintenance Corporation (CMC) and International Data Management (IDM). CMC is apparently having more than teething troubles and has not yet settled down. IDM is busy with bread-and-butter matters—punch card manufacturing and computer services—and it will be some time before it ventures, if it does so at all, into IBM's main business—assembling and leasing of computers.

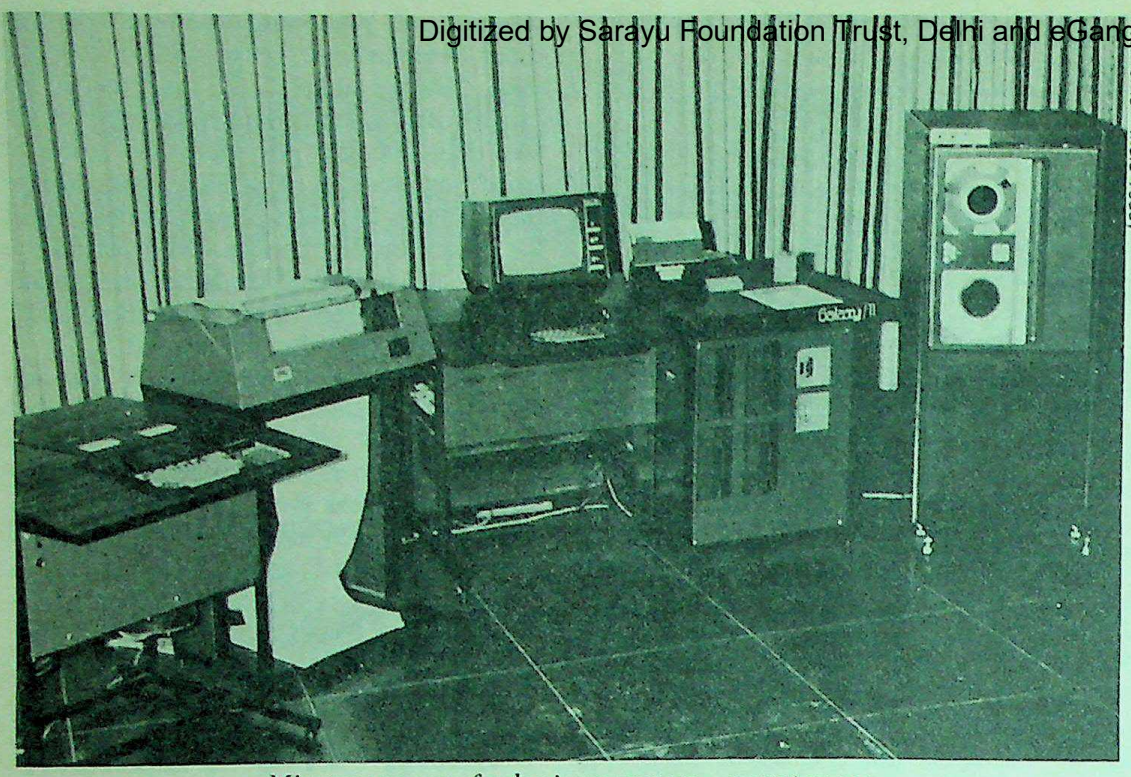
With IBM's departure, there are only two computer manufacturers left in the country—Britain's International Computers (ICL) and India's own Electronics Corporation of India (ECIL). With its lacklustre marketing, ICL was never able to compete with IBM but now that the latter is out of the way, the British plodder may show some gumption and push ahead, but, on the face of it, this seems unlikely. Incidentally, the company is waiting to go Indian under the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (FERA), after which perhaps things may improve.

ECIL is one of those rarities, a government undertaking that has done really well, with a vast range of electronic goods from TV sets to oscilloscopes and aircraft instruments but its sorties into the computer field have been none too successful. It has concentrated on "minis" which it sells at "maxi" prices: its TDC-316 costs a staggering Rs 25 lakh for a basic system while a similar machine from a US company might cost less than Rs 2 lakh.

New Firms: This leaves the field open to the microprocessor which promises to

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Pushkarna—India Today

Microprocessors for business system—a vast scope revolutionize the computer industry in India. According to an expert, while Indian computer usage and hardware is typically 10 years behind Europe, Indian companies are no more than a year or two behind their European counterparts in the area of business systems built around microprocessors. Two companies lead the micro field—DCM Data Products, a unit of Delhi Cloth Mills, and a small company called Hindustan Computers. Between them they have a turnover of around Rs 12–15 crore, a substantial amount, considering that they began their marketing operations just over a year ago.

DCM Data Products entered the electronics field in 1972 with desk-top electronic calculators but quickly expanded its research and development department to have a go at the micro field, then an unknown quantity. The company markets two series of microprocessor-based machines—Spectrum, an eight-bit processor with memory up to 32k bytes, and Galaxy, a 16-bit processor with floppy disk and cassette tape drives. The company has sold 101 units in its very first year and employs 550 people, including 70 on research and development. Last month it received from the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FICCI) the award for research in science and technology. Imports account for only 12 to 15 per cent of the cost of the machine.

Large Field: Hindustan Computers, a slightly smaller outfit, employs 400 people including about 50 on research and development and has developed, besides the usual range of microprocessor-based systems, a considerable body of system software. The company was master-minded by a young group of technocrats who first cut their teeth in the DCM organization and went on, in the fashion of computer companies all over the world, to set up their own outfit.

According to Vinay Bharat Ram, executive director of DCM Data Products, data processing devices have considerable scope in India. The relatively low cost of the processor systems—around Rs 7 lakh for the Galaxy range—brings it within the pockets of medium-sized business firms with sales turnover of around Rs 2 crore a year. The machines are used by all sorts of people, from garment exporters who wish to keep close tabs on costs and prices—"a few paise this side or that can make a hole in your pocket"—to iron-ore exporters whose inventories cover over 10,000 items. The only snag, according to Ram, is the Government's policy which has been hanging fire for the last seven years. "Let them make up their mind one way or the other," he says, "but this suspense is killing."

—DIPA JAYWANT

THE MARKETS

On The Brink

Was it a flash in the pan? INDIA TODAY had asked last month when The Economic Times index had just scaled a fresh peak of 184.4 on March 1, a rise of seven points from the pre-budget level of 177. Apparently it was not for the index has been rising ever since and on April 10, it crossed the sound barrier of 200 which many thought it wouldn't until the end of the year, if at all. The rise of 23 points or 14 per cent in 40 days is extraordinary, to say the least, particularly when seen against the background of the worsening situation on the industrial front. History will record—if it does record such things at all—that the index touched 200 on the very day all business including industry came to a dead halt in Calcutta in the wake of yet another power crisis in that melancholy state.

Marketmen think that the stock market is on to a good thing and the apparent lull after scaling 200 is only a lull before the storm. It is true that there are not too many

ACTIVE STOCKS

High 1979	Low 1979		Close 17.4.79	Change on fort. night
		BOMBAY
335.00	270.00	Ahmedabad Advance	317.50	45.00
171.50	137.00	Associated Cement	165.00	–3.50
153.00	114.00	Bombay Dyeing	153.00	14.00
33.75	25.75	Cadbury	28.25	–4.75
761.50	622.00	Century Rayon	755.50	24.00
121.25	97.00	Dawn Mills	115.00	10.00
27.00	22.00	Garware Nylon	26.00	–0.25
26.00	20.00	Goetze	26.00	2.00
20.25	16.75	Greaves Lombardini	17.50	–0.50
558.00	458.00	Gujarat Fertiliser	547.00	–10.00
80.00	57.50	Hindustan Dorr-Oliver	70.00	–4.00
38.25	30.50	Hindustan Lever	32.75	0.25
350.00	267.00	Indian Rayon	350.00	14.00
262.55	225.00	Kirloskar Cummins	250.00	1.25
39.00	34.25	Larsen & Toubro	37.50	0.75
31.50	21.75	Mahindra & Mahindra	29.50	–1.00
57.50	44.00	Nirlon Synthetics	56.00	1.00
67.00	47.00	Premier Automobiles	61.00	–1.00
46.25	40.75	Siemens India	46.00	0.25
29.00	22.00	Tata Chemicals	29.00	2.75
113.25	95.25	Tata Steel	111.00	0.25
370.00	245.00	Telco	363.00	10.00
175.00	129.00	Voltas	168.00	22.00
		CALCUTTA
36.45	30.50	Ballarpur Industries	35.00	1.10
33.00	27.50	Bata India	31.50	0.25
17.30	13.50	Brooke Bond	16.70	–0.20
43.75	39.00	Chloride India	43.75	0.15
27.00	23.20	Dunlop India	25.65	–1.35
26.50	22.15	Guest Keen Williams	26.10	0.15
35.10	23.50	Hindustan Aluminium	34.40	4.80
27.80	22.85	Indian Aluminium	27.40	–0.30
28.50	22.40	Indian Cable	28.50	1.30
26.25	20.90	Indian Explosives	25.75	nil
25.80	19.45	ITC	25.80	1.75
53.35	43.90	J.K.Synthetics	52.80	3.70
18.12	13.44	Metal Box	18.12	0.87
32.25	27.75	Philips India	32.00	0.10
30.25	22.37	Remington Rand	29.75	–0.25
21.90	17.50	Shaw Wallace	21.90	nil
27.30	19.40	Straw Products	27.30	4.25
24.44	19.40	Texmaco	24.37	nil
30.10	25.60	Union Carbide	29.30	–0.70
23.90	19.90	Usha Martin Black	23.50	0.70
		DELHI
15.00	11.75	Bharat Gears	15.00	0.38
13.50	7.56	Bharat Steel Tubes	13.31	–0.19
44.50	36.16	Delhi Cloth Mills	44.03	0.78
50.44	42.37	Escorts	49.16	–0.28
12.05	9.00	Hindustan Motors	11.95	–0.05
27.62	20.28	Modi Spinning	27.12	–0.13
7.50	6.19	Mohan Meakin	7.50	0.25
18.50	13.50	Punjab Anand Batteries	18.50	4.19
25.75	21.00	Ranbaxy	25.00	–0.75
19.12	14.50	Sriram Fibres	18.25	–0.87
21.62	15.75	Swadeshi Polytex	21.00	–0.62
		MADRAS
23.37	15.75	Ashok Leyland	19.25	0.50
26.25	19.25	Best & Crompton	26.25	nil
66.50	46.50	Binny	61.00	1.75
37.25	31.25	Consolidated Coffee	34.25	1.25
14.50	10.20	Madura Coats	13.75	0.25
14.25	7.50	Mangalore Chemicals	14.00	0.13
14.00	10.20	Mettur Chemicals	13.65	–0.10
276.00	212.00	S. I. Viscose	275.00	19.00
9.05	7.00	SPIC	8.90	0.20
137.00	82.00	Textool	134.00	14.00
13.00	9.80	United Breweries	12.85	nil

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

good scrips in the market as a result of the finance minister's withdrawal of the capital gains tax relief, and since more investors than usual are crowding the floor after developing a taste for the market following the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (FERA) issues, the sky is the limit for whatever blue chips are available. If the finance minister relents and the relief is restored, the punters who are holding back will be tempted to unload their stuff and bring prices down. If he doesn't, and chances are that he will not, the bulls will be back in their pens and another upward swing is on the cards.

However, whatever the short-term prospects, there are signs that the market has reached the top and may be in for a big fall, especially if the overall price situation gets out of hand. The theory that inflation is good for the stock market was knocked off long ago, though inflation in small doses may not be harmful. The rosy flush on the face of the market reflects the high performance of the corporate sector during a period of zero inflation. Prices have already gone up by about three per cent since the budget levies were announced. Prices of most industrial raw materials—steel and chemicals among others—have also gone up and this is bound to affect profits. On the other hand, there is also the other side: investment has picked up which means demand is bullish.

For investors who are not speculators, the best bet are scrips which are still quoted below or around par and which should pack a lot of power. There is, for instance, East Anglia Plastics, a never-do-well company that has been on the sick list for the last 15 years or so and never paid a paisa in dividends. The company has now changed hands with Excel Industries of Bombay in control. The share is quoted around Rs 6 but is worth much more and a flutter is indicated. Mangalore Fertilisers, just above par, has announced an ambitious expansion programme which is rather surprising, considering that its plant went on stream only recently but which also shows that it is on to a good thing.

Shipping shares have been in the doldrums for the past two years but the depression is apparently lifting and the market is looking up. Most shipping company shares are quoted very much below their worth, which is as good a reason as any for adding them to one's portfolio.

A couple of issues back, INDIA TODAY indicated that a bonus issue from Hindustan Aluminium was on the cards. It also mentioned Mahindra & Mahindra as another likely candidate in that department. There are quite a few scrips in the same happy situation, including one in Delhi, which is going for around Rs 50. Although they look over-priced, it is worth holding on to them, just in case.

WORLD VALUE OF RUPEE

Country	Unit and Currency		TT Selling rates (Rs)	TT Buying rates (Rs)
Australia	As $	1	9.2136	9.1219
Austria	As Sch	100	59.8662	59.1596
Bahrain	Dinar	1	21.6890	21.3383
Bangladesh	Taka	100	55.4483	55.4483
Canada	Can $	1	7.2929	7.2258
Egypt	Egp £	1	20.0748	20. 07
France	Fr Frc	1	1.9231	1.8726
Hong Kong	HK $	1	1.6117	1.5953
Indonesia	Rupiah	100	1.3062	1.2951
Iran	Rial	100	11.5660	10.9267
Italy	It Lira	100	0.9858	0.9764
Japan	Jap Yen	100	3.8774	3.7566
Kenya	K. Shilling	1	1.1013	1.1013
Kuwait	Dinar	1	30.0090	29.5209
Malaysia	ML $	1	3.7455	3.7061
Mauritius	Rupee	1	1.3626	1.3511
Nepal	Rupee	1	0.6803	0.6745
Netherlands	D Glde	1	4.0516	4.0144
Pakistan	Rupee	1	0.8433	—
Singapore	Sing $	1	3.7784	3.7386
Spain	Sp Pt	100	12.2717	12.1043
Sri Lanka	Rupee	1	0.5425	0.5236
Sweden	Sw Kr	1	1.8971	1.8792
Switzerland	Sw Frc	1	4.8547	4.8073
Tanzania	Tn Shilling	1	1.0214	1.0214
Thailand	Baht	100	40.9214	40.0733
UK	£	1	17.2295	17.0853
USA.	US $	1	8.3700	8.2300
UAE	Dihram	1	2.1689	2.1338
USSR	Rouble	1	12.3435	12.3435
W Germany	DM	1	4.4843	4.2735
Zambia	Kwacha	1	NA	NA

These are the rates supplied by The Bank of Tokyo Ltd, New Delhi, and quoted on April 24, 1979 (They are only indicative).

ECONOMIC TRENDS

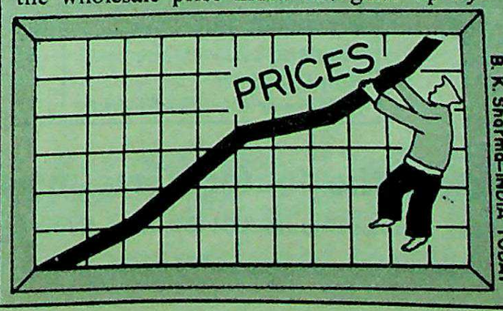
	Latest	Change on Last Month
PRICES
Wholesale Index, Mar 10 (1970–71 = 100)	188.1	2.8 pc
Cereals	156.6	0.1 pc
Sugar	138.8	4.3 pc
Edible Oils	153.5	2.7 pc
Cigarettes, Bidis	209.9	10.9 pc
Drugs & Medicines	133.8	–2.8 pc
Gold, standard, Apr 6 (Rs per 10 gm)	951.00	37.00
Silver, Apr 6 (Rs per kg)	1655.00	–100.00
SHARES
RBI Index, Mar 31 (1970–71 = 100)	146.1	6.3 pc
Aluminium	74.9	10.5 pc
Cement	155.0	10.0 pc
Shipping	116.1	15.3 pc
MONEY
Money Supply, Mar 23		1.5 pc
Credit to Government		2.2 pc
Credit to Commerce		1.2 pc
Bank Deposits—demand		0.5 pc
Bank Deposits—time		1.1 pc
Foreign Exchange Assets		3.2 pc
Call Money Rate	8.5 pc	—

Playing With Figures

"ARE you sure about the genuineness of the figures?" asked member of Parliament Purushottam Ganesh Mavalankar when Industry Minister George Fernandes was rattling off figures in the Lok Sabha last week in support of his contention that industry was doing pretty well under his leadership.

Statistics, like boiled eggs, should always be taken with a pinch of salt, particularly when they come, as they often do in this country, from official agencies. They are not always wrong but they are not 100 per cent right either, for in skilled hands they can always be bent to suit one's convenience.

A case in point is the unbelievable accuracy with which Finance Ministry officials tried to estimate the rise in prices following Charan Singh's budget at 0.95 per cent. Charan Singh, a seasoned politician, did not say anything at the time. Now that the wholesale price index has gone up by more than three per cent, he says that the rise is not wholly due to his new taxes. Had the price rise been less than 0.95 per cent, he and his officials would have been the first to pat themselves on the back for the correctness of their calculations. Actually, the price effect of the budget is such a complex matter that all the computers in India would not be able to measure it. And 0.95 per cent sounds more impressive than a bald one per cent.



Ridiculous: The worst offenders in this respect are the national income estimators who compute income to the last thousand rupees. In a country of India's size, this is ridiculous. A man who says that India's national income in 1977–78 was Rs 73,130,52 lakh is either a statistical prodigy or a fool. National income calculations are correct, if at all, within no more than plus or minus 10 per cent since nearly half the gross national product (GNP) originates in villages and is largely a matter of guess work. All that can be said is that India's GNP is between Rs 70,000 and Rs 80,000 crore and is steadily improving.

However, statistics are always impressive, particularly when they are the kind no one can find out for himself. And ministers rattling them off are even more impressive, although the louder the rattle, the bigger the credibility gap.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Eat hearty – stay healthy!

Use SAFFOLA – the kind-hearted cooking medium.

Avoid ghee, butter and vanaspati
Cooking mediums such as ghee, butter and vanaspati are rich in saturated fats which can result in the body producing excessive amounts of cholesterol. Eventually, this can lead to trouble.

Choose the cooking medium highest in polyunsaturated fats
Amongst all cooking mediums, SAFFOLA contains the highest percentage of polyunsaturated fats, which help to lower your cholesterol level. Use it for cooking, frying, baking and in salad dressing. Enjoy your favourite dishes—without running the risk of increasing your cholesterol level.

Children too will benefit from SAFFOLA
Cholesterol accumulates right from childhood. Don't let your children eat unwisely—make SAFFOLA the cooking medium for the whole family.

Polyunsaturated/Saturated	Ratio
Ghee	1/2
Butter fat	1/2
Vanaspati	3/1
Groundnut oil	3/1
Mustard oil	4/1
Sunflower oil	4/1
Safflower oil: SAFFOLA	7/1

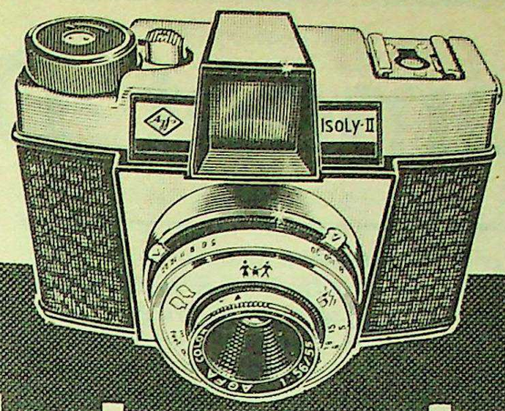
Start on Saffola before the doctor starts on you!

The Bombay Oil Industries Pvt. Ltd., Kanmoor House, 281-87, Narsi Natha Street, Bombay 400 009.

SIMOES/BOI/1/79

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Agfa Photography at 3m.

The Agfa Isoly-II takes perfect snapshots at close range. Set the aperture to f/8 to get just the right amount of light to the film. Set the shutter speed at 1/30 second, just fast enough to avoid camera shake. Shoot from a distance of 3 m. on slow film—125 ASA—for greater sharpness. The result? A perfect close-up every time.

The Agfa Isoly-II is a great all-round camera. You simply adjust settings, distance and film to freeze a sports scene forever, capture every detail, near or distant, of a landscape or take a perfect picture in dim, soft light.

The Agfa Isoly-II is built to German specifications and undergoes over 100 exacting tests. See this fine camera soon at your friendly Agfa dealer.

AGFA

Distributors:
AGFA-GEVAERT INDIA LIMITED
Branches: Bombay • New Delhi
Calcutta • Madras
®Registered Trademark of Agfa-Gevaert, Antwerp/Leverkusen. Manufacturers of Photographic Products.

Agfa® ISOLY-II
for professional results.

SIMOES/AG/A/78

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Development Dilemma

PETER F. Drucker, 69, Clarke Professor of Social Sciences at the Claremont Graduate School in the US, is one of the big names in management today. When he visited India last year, no one could tell him what the Government's economy policy was. In strong contrast to Nehru's belief in heavy industry, Prime Minister Morarji Desai preached to Drucker about the suitability of small industry and rural development. But this, says the author, is the same rhetoric, heard in many developing countries and one which led to Maoist China's disastrous "Great Leap Forward". Much as it pains the Government economist, it is the bicycle, transistor radio, gasoline pump and motor scooter rather than the spinning wheel that are "appropriate technology" for India. In this article published by arrangement with the Asian Wall Street Journal Drucker discusses concepts of economic development and suitable technology for India. He also examines the applicability of two popular slogans in planning: "Small is Beautiful" and "the Bigger the Better".

"THE big mistake Gandhi made was to advocate the spinning wheel," said one influential Indian government economist. "It's much too efficient. With the unemployment and underemployment we have in our villages the truly appropriate technology is the hand-held spindle, the distaff." Yet this is hardly how the Indian villagers define "appropriate technology" for themselves.

What struck me most when travelling for several weeks through rural India was not the pervasive poverty or the palpable unemployment; I had expected both. What I had not expected, however, were the four or five brand-new bicycles standing outside every one of the miserable hovels—and not one of them chained or locked. There may still be more bullock carts in rural India than bicycles; there surely are still more bullock carts than there are small tractors. But what powers India's "Green Revolution", what has given the subcontinent a food surplus for the first time in its thousands of years, is not the digging stick or the wooden plough. It is the gasoline pump in the tubewell and the irrigation ditch of an arid land.

From every bullock cart, every camel cart, every pedicab and every howdah on the back of an elephant there issues the strains of the transistor radio. And the most crowded stand in every one of the countless village markets is the one that sells motor scooters on the instalment plan.

Much as it pains the Indian Government economist and his boss the prime minister, the bicycle, transistor radio, gasoline pump and motor scooter—rather than the spinning wheel, let alone the distaff or the spinning whorl—are indeed the "appropriate technology" for India and for most developing countries. They create jobs and purchasing power—the distaff would destroy both.

No one in India could tell me what the economic policy of the Government is. The only governmental actions are expansion of already large government enterprises, unchecked growth of an already obese bureaucracy and more bureaucratic regulations. The Cabinet cannot agree on anything and has no policy whatever. Substantial sums are being allocated to "the villages" but without programme let alone goals. But there is a pervasive rhetoric of smallness and of antitechnology.

India's Prime Minister, Morarji Desai, 84 years old but looking 55 (which he attributes to his eating only raw mashed vegetables and drinking his own urine) preached to me "small is beautiful", "rural development" and "appropriate (that is, pre-industrial) technology". It is this rhetoric that his economic adviser echoes when he counsels a return to the distaff. And pretty much the same rhetoric can now be heard in many developing countries, for example in Indonesia or from the Islamic fundamentalists in Iran. It is very much the same rhetoric that underlay the disastrous "Great Leap Forward" in Maoist China 15 years ago, with its emphasis on the "village" and on backyard steel furnaces.

As a reaction to the delusion of "the bigger the better", which enthralled earlier Indian governments, especially Nehru, Desai's emphasis on rural India is overdue. Earlier governments neglected the village, where 90 per cent of India's 550 million people still live. But "small is beautiful" is just as much a delusion as "the bigger the better". What is "appropriate" is not what uses the most capital or the most labour, it is not what is "small" or "big", "pre-industrial" or a "scientific marvel". What is "appropriate" is quite simply what makes the economy's resources most productive. What is appropriate in a country of huge population and rapid population growth is what multiplies productive jobs. What is "development" in a country, which like India has sizeable resources of managerial and entrepreneurial skill and at the same time huge unfulfilled consumer needs is whatever creates purchasing power.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Steel mills, those prestige investments of the '60s into which earlier Indian governments poured very large chunks of the country's scarce capital resources, are becoming the white elephants of the late '70s. Steel mills are "inappropriate technology" for a country like India. They are highly capital-intensive rather than labour-intensive. They supply a commodity which is in ample supply on the world market and available everywhere at a low price. Above all they create practically no jobs beyond those in the mill itself.

But the automotive industry—passenger cars, motor bikes, trucks and tractors—is probably the most efficient multiplier of jobs around. Its own plants have a fairly high ratio of labour to capital, and the industry generates about four to five secondary or tertiary jobs throughout the economy for everyone in the manufacturing plant. It creates jobs in road building and road maintenance, in traffic control, in dealerships, service stations and repair jobs. And it creates enormous purchasing power with these jobs.

Similarly, making transistor radios and bicycles requires both a large manufacturing base and a large dealer system; and both multiply jobs and create purchasing power. And like the automotive industry, both create human capital, that is, skills accessible to the unlearned. The same might be said for the manufacture of synthetic fertilizer or pharmaceuticals or pesticides—all require big enterprises and national distribution and service (moreover these products, together with the gasoline pump, underline the two great successes of India since Independence: the rapid increase in food production and the rapid decrease in infant mortality).

> "What struck me most was not the pervasive poverty or the palpable unemployment: I had expected both. What I had not expected were the four or five brand-new bicycles standing outside every one of the miserable hovels."

Equally appropriate as a creator of productivity, jobs and purchasing power is the cosmetics manufacturer, who may be quite small. I saw a highly efficient and highly successful "multinational" cosmetics firm in Bangalore which, with 20 employees, produces five times as much foreign exchange per rupee of investment or sales as any of the huge state-owned Indian enterprises.

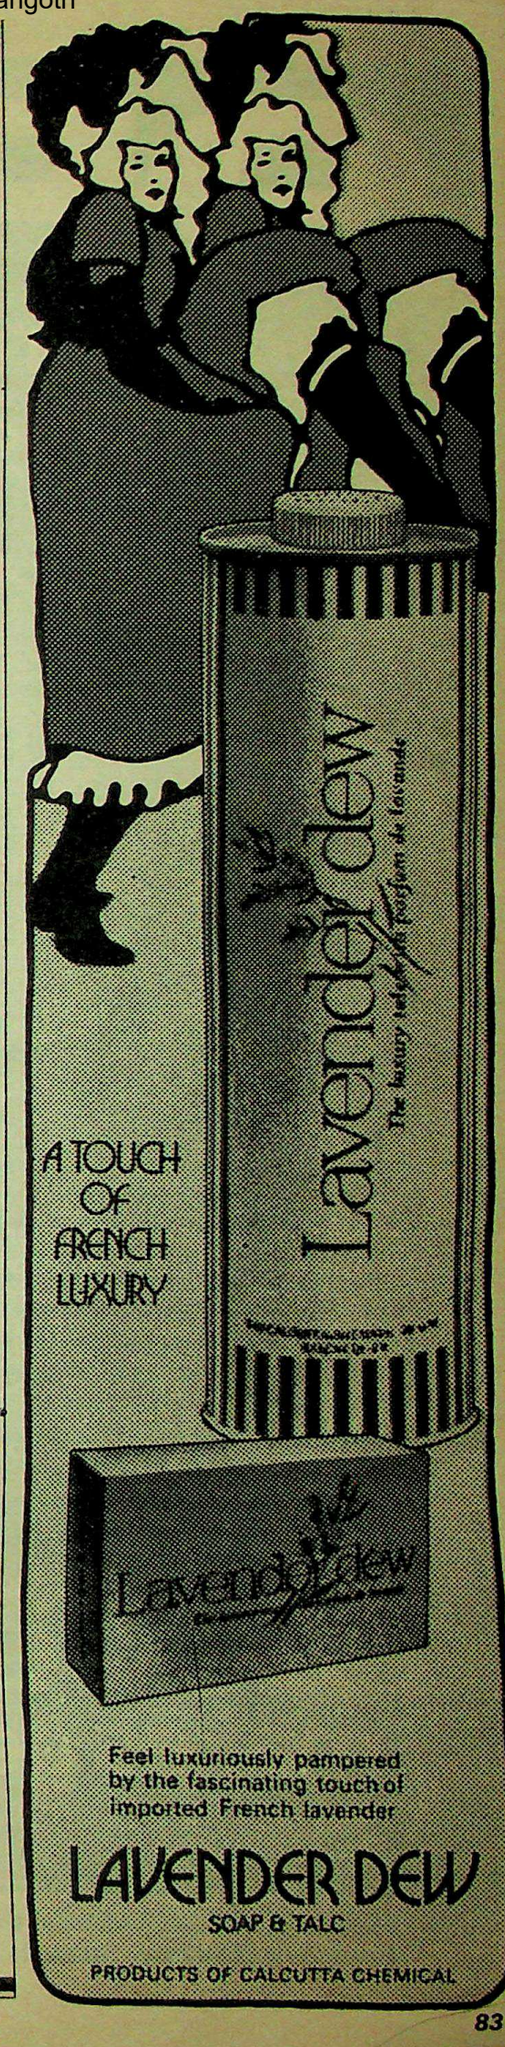
The development decades of the '50s and '60s worshipped capital investment. The best testament to this superstition is "The Stages of Economic Growth", which Walt W. Rostow, later President Johnson's foreign policy adviser, wrote in the early '60s and which then became the bible of the developing countries. Rostow proclaimed that development is an automatic and direct function of the size of capital investment. But that is not productivity; it is waste and incompetence. Today there is a tendency to define productivity as whatever uses the most labour—especially in the developing countries, with their huge, unemployed, young populations.

But that too is incompetence. Productivity is whatever generates the highest overall yield from an economy's resources of capital, labour, physical resources and time. This will also give the largest number of jobs and the maximum of purchasing power. It will even produce the lowest possible inequality in the distribution of incomes attainable to a given stage of economic development. And surely poor countries cannot afford to support unproductive people—that is, people who appear busy winding a few yards of cotton around a distaff. Rich countries may be able to afford to keep unproductive people gainfully unemployed, but poor countries have no surplus to distribute.

Above all the troubadours of "small is beautiful" forget—as does so much of official Washington—that a healthy economy and society need both the large and the small. Indeed the two are mutually interdependent, in both a developed and developing country. There can be no small manufacturer in a large market—whether that of the US or of India—unless there is a large assembler or a large retailer, an IBM, a GM, a Sears Roebuck. It is only in their products or their stores that the small man's output can reach the market. But there would also be no GM except for the existence of a multitude of small autonomous tool-and-die shops and a host of small parts suppliers, or local dealers, service stations and repair shops.

Pharmaceutical research requires big—if not very big—enterprises. But pharmaceutical sales depend on some 200,000 drug stores and 200,000 physicians—each of necessity decentralized, and indeed autonomous. "Rural development" in India not only means national marketing organizations for village products and national credit and banking institutions. It means huge power stations. Above all—something the advocates of "small is beautiful" always conveniently overlook—it means centralized government bureaucracies, which surely could not be called "small" whether or not they deserve to be called "beautiful".

None of these arguments, I am afraid, made much impact on the Indian government economist—nor I realized would they have made much impact on his prime minister. But once Indians have the bicycle, the motor scooter, the transistor radio and the gasoline pumps, are they really going to go back to the distaff?

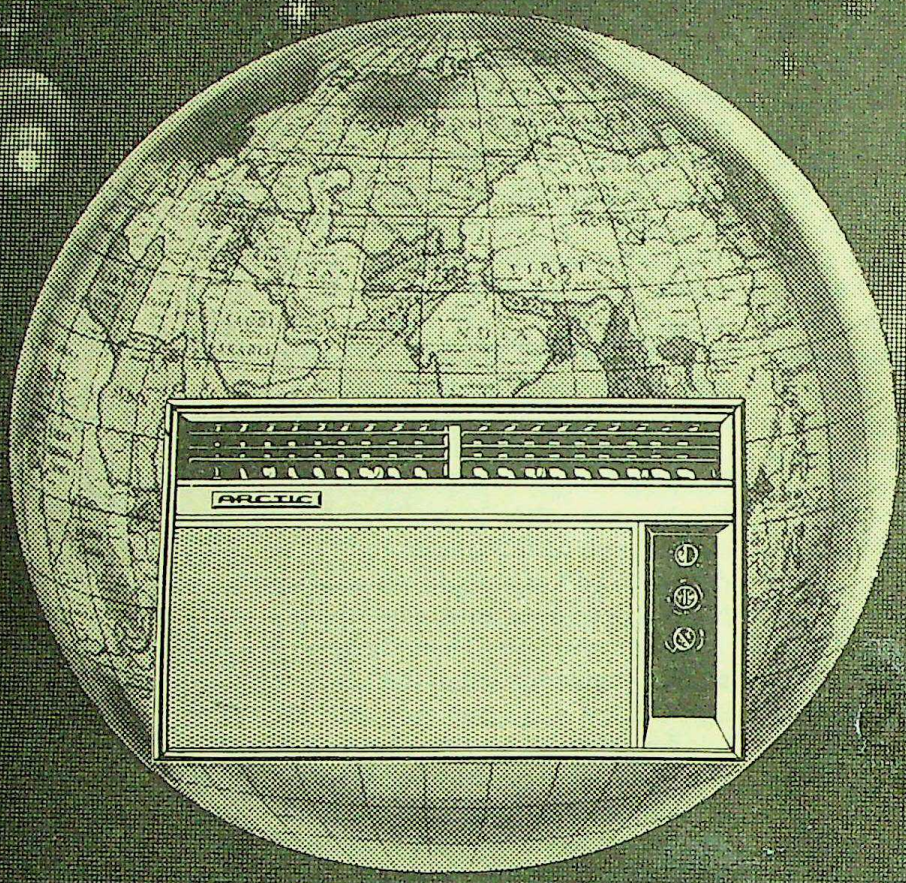


CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

ARCTIC

The internationally-acclaimed Indian airconditioner.



There are thousands of our airconditioners in operation in India, Europe and the Middle East. Arctic airconditioners enjoy such popularity because they are rugged, quiet, and trouble-free in operation. They cool faster and better, creating a perfect balance of temperature and humidity conditions, so essential for improving productivity.

Arctic airconditioners are ideal for offices, hotels, hospitals, stores, clinics, restaurants, clubs, banks, homes—as a matter of fact, for any type and size of establishment. They are available in two sizes : 1 & 1.5 tonne. All Arctic airconditioners are backed by a most efficient service network.

Electronics Ltd.

makes good things even better!

Regd. Office & Sales H.O. Atma Ram House, 7th Floor, 1, Tolstoy Marg, New Delhi-110001
Ph : 382001-2-3

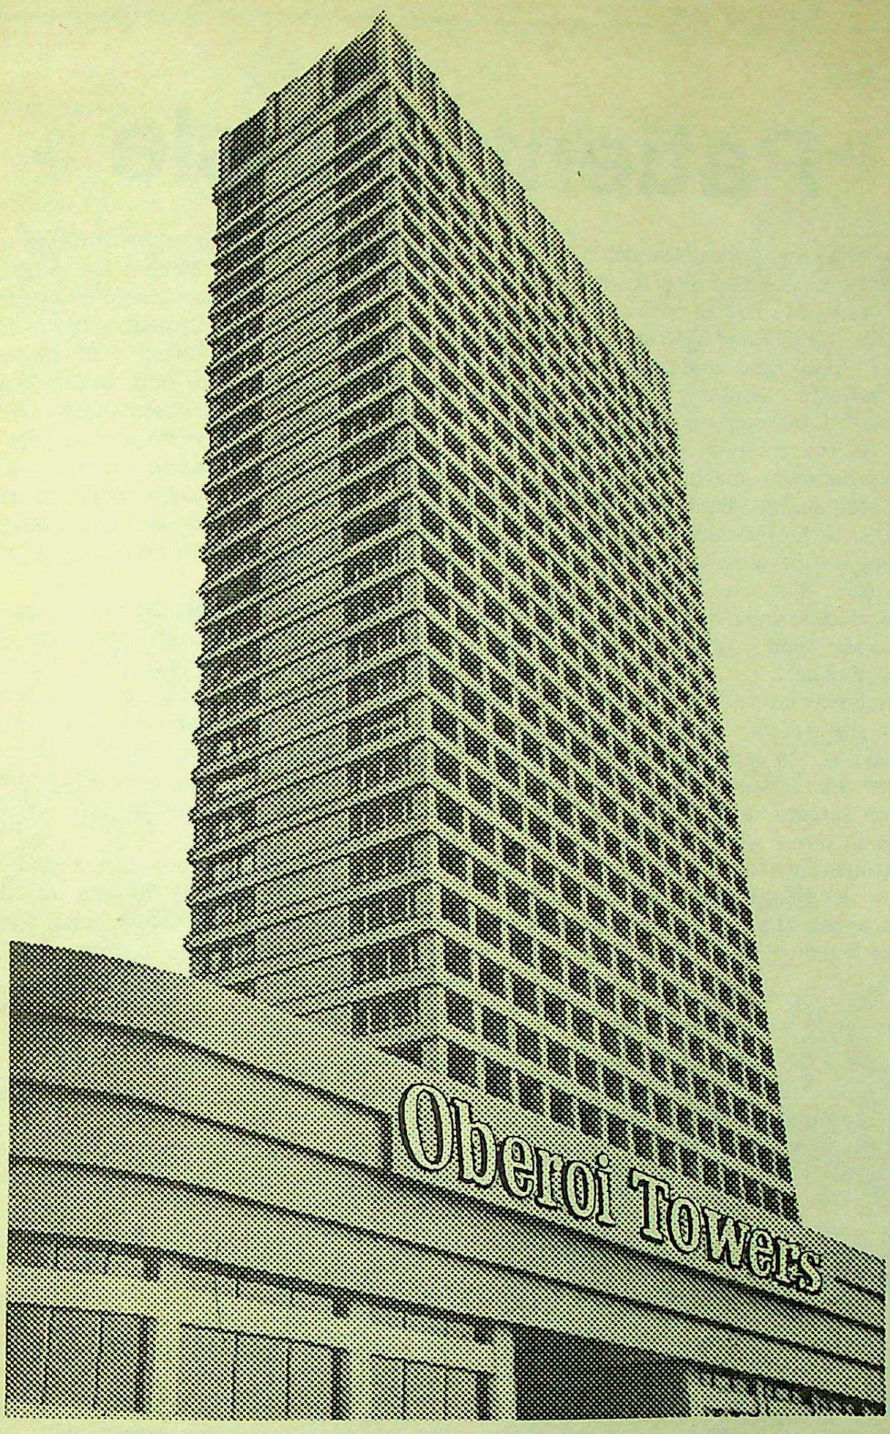
Mutual-2090

Available on Government Approved Rates

Branches : Bombay, Calcutta, New Delhi, Madras, Ahmedabad, Bhopal, Chandigarh, Lucknow, Patna & Secunderabad.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

EIH-5640 A



If you don't look up when you enter, you will never notice the change.

The smiles.
The splendour. The style.
The service. The food.
Everything is just as exciting as it always was at the Oberoi in Bombay.
Except one thing.
The name.
We are now Hotel Oberoi Towers, Bombay.

Hotel Oberoi Towers

Marine Drive, Nariman Point, Bombay, India.

For instant reservations contact :

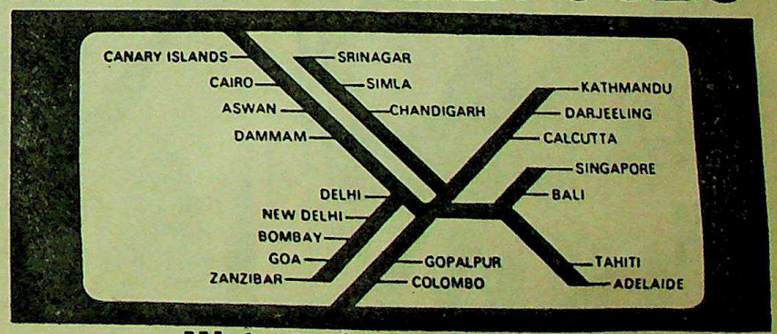
Oberoi Towers, Bombay.
Tel : 234343.

Oberoi Grand, Calcutta.
Tel : 230181.

Oberoi Inter.Continental,
New Delhi.
Tel : 699571.

Madras Office.
Tel : 88156.

Oberoi Hotels



We look after you better

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Surprise your relative or friend abroad with a gift subscription of

INDIA TODAY

Paid for in Indian rupees

Annual Subscription Rates

(Airmail)

Rs. 245

ABU DHABI, BAHRAIN, CHINA, DUBAI, HONG KONG, INDONESIA, IRAN, IRAQ, KUWAIT, QATAR, SINGAPORE, THAILAND

Rs. 380

AUSTRALIA, AUSTRIA, FRANCE, GDR, FRG, ITALY, JAPAN, THE NETHERLANDS, SOUTH AFRICA, SWITZERLAND, SWEDEN, UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC, UK, USSR

Rs. 420

ARGENTINA, BRAZIL, CANADA, PERU, USA, NEW ZEALAND

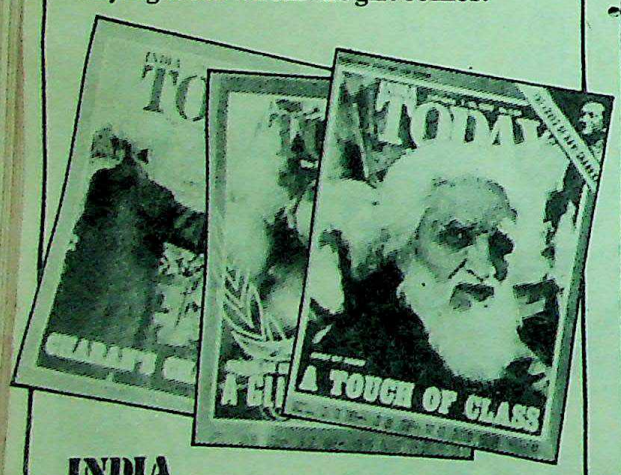
Rs. 190

AFGHANISTAN, BURMA, SRI LANKA

Rs. 100

PAKISTAN (by surface mail only)

Every gift subscription will bear a personal note from INDIA TODAY saying from whom the gift comes.



INDIA TODAY
The Fortnightly Newsmagazine

CRICKET

Patient Tussle

ON a muggy, cloudless day in Madras 14 years ago, a mop-haired, 20-year-old boy playing in his first cricket Test came on to bowl against New Zealand Captain John Reid and veteran batsman Bert Sutcliffe. Sending down innocuous floaters off a four-step run-up, the youngster, much to everybody's surprise—and very possibly his own—managed to unsettle the famed New Zealand batting duo. He finished that series with 21 wickets at 19 runs apiece—emerging as the most successful bowler on either side. The boy was to have, over the next decade and a half, a more chequered Test career than any other contemporary Indian cricketer.

Today a mature 34, Srinivas Venkataraghavan has a Test record that is hardly as imposing as his early performances would have led one to expect. He has been captain, reserve, discard and matchwinning off-spinner in turns; with yo-yo like regularity, his fortunes have fallen and risen.

But all things considered, Venkataraghavan appears the best choice as captain for the forthcoming tour of England. With the ageing Prasanna out of the running for the off-spinner's berth, Venkat for the first time in 14 years is an automatic choice for the Test team. As a strictly neutral bystander in the All-India Cricket Board versus players tussle he is acceptable to both camps. And purely as a leader, he has showed himself to be a cut above his two immediate predecessors—Gavaskar and Bedi. He master-minded South Zone's victory over North Zone in the Deodhar Trophy recently and undoubtedly possesses one of the finest cricketing minds in the country.

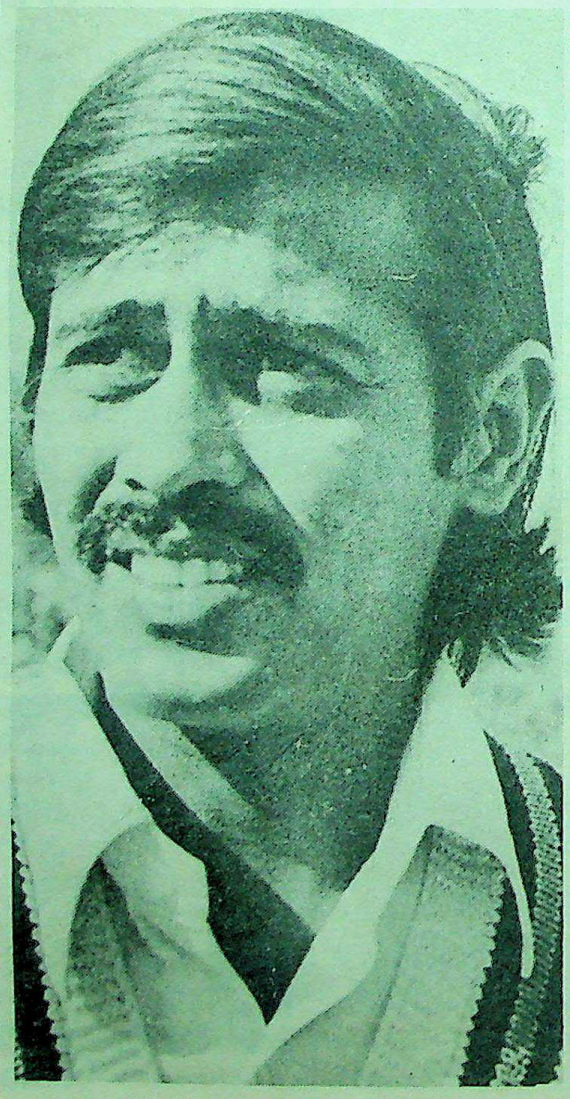
Competition: Perhaps the most important but under-rated quality necessary for a cricketer is perseverance—and Venkat has plenty of it. Otherwise he would have quit the game a long time ago. Till 1970, Venkat had the unenviable task of competing with the world's number one off-spinner, Prasanna, for the one vacant spot in the Indian team.

The only time he could get a look-in was when Prasanna was injured or the selectors felt that playing two specialist off-spinners (particularly on turning Indian wickets) was justified. When Pataudi was axed as Test captain in 1970, 25-year-old Venkat leap-frogged over several older and more experienced players to become vice-captain of the Indian team against the West Indies.

Subsequently, however, he failed to hold his place in the team and was sidelined for much of the time in the home series against England. He fought his way back, this time to the captaincy, in 1975 during the inaugural Prudential World Cup in England. India's disastrous performance, which had little to do with his captaincy, probably resulted in his being sacked.

But Venkat has trudged along, accepting philosophically the rough with the smooth. His patience has now paid off and though critics are already predicting that Indian cricket's enfant terrible, Sunil Gavaskar, will be back as captain against the Australians this winter, Venkat is unlikely to get fazed.

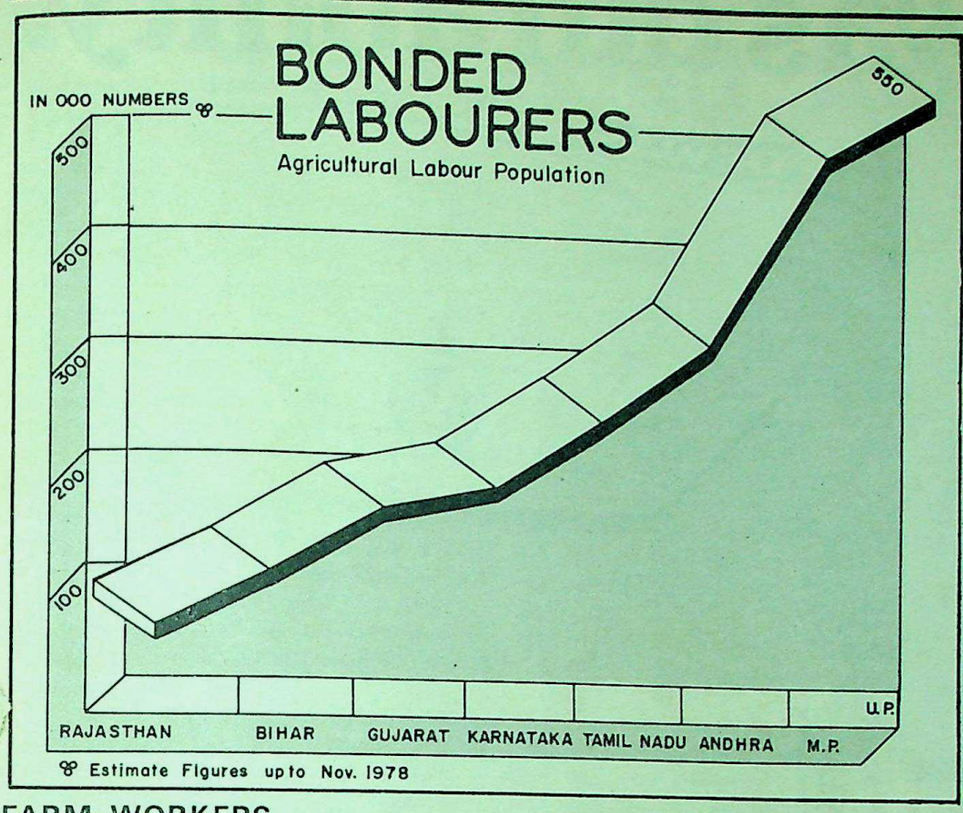
A man of few words with a deep cricketing insight, Venkat has declined to make any predictions about India's chances in the World Cup or the Tests against England. He, however, is the first to realize that on soft, dewy English wickets under a moist atmosphere, his batting technique against the moving ball will be severely tested. So will his ability as a leader of men, two of whom in the present team have captained India in the last 12 months.



Pana-India

Venkat—chequered career

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



FARM WORKERS

Inhuman Bondage

Bonded Labour, wherever it exists, will be declared illegal.

20-Point Economic Programme of the Emergency

ONE in every 20 agricultural workers in India is a bonded labourer, more than three and a half years after this declaration was made to the orchestrated fanfare of the Emergency and the enactment of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act in 1976. Called by a plethora of local names—padiyal (Tamil Nadu), jeetam (Andhra Pradesh), sagri (Rajasthan) and lagua (Madhya Pradesh)—the bonded labourers are little more than commodities to their masters. They have lost their constitutional right to freedom to choose and move to new jobs.

A joint survey of Bonded Labour published recently by the Gandhi Peace Foundation and the National Labour Institute paints a despairing and grim picture of their miserable condition. The report estimates that in eight states—Andhra Pradesh, Bihar, Gujarat, Karnataka, Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Tamil Nadu and Uttar Pradesh—there are at least 2.17 million bonded labourers (see chart). This is about 6.1 per cent of the 37 million agricultural labourers in these states. In Orissa and Maharashtra, the surveys are yet to be completed. The report estimates that the final tally may be 2.7 million. A preliminary survey report by two social scientists, V. Sarma Marla of the Gandhi Peace Foundation and R. N. Maharaj of the National Labour Institute, states that the findings show the incidence of bonded labour to be higher than the Government estimate of 4.2 per cent. When the proportion of bonded labourers to the total agricultural labour population in the country is calculated, the figure is around five per cent.

Maximum: The incidence of bonded labour is the highest in Madhya Pradesh where 11.8 per cent of the agricultural workers are bonded. However, the populous Uttar Pradesh has the largest number—550,000.

The survey has demarcated seven areas with a high incidence of bonded labour and it has identified 12 districts as "bonded labour districts"—each with over 40,000 labourers.

Rural poverty with incomes below the subsistence level is at the root of the system. When a loan is taken, a man pledges himself or a member of his family against the loan. The one who is pledged has to work for the creditor for nominal wages until the creditor declares the loan repaid.

Contrary to the commonly held belief that peasants and labourers borrow mainly for unproductive purposes, the survey shows that domestic expenditure is the most common reason for taking loans. On an All-India level, 47.5 per cent stated that they obtained the loans to meet household expenses. In the case of the jeethas of Karnataka, 79.8 per cent of the instances of borrowing was for this reason. Marriage and other social obligations were given in only 33.7 per cent of the cases.

Caste Basis: The survey, also revealed that 13 per cent of the labourers were in bondage because they belonged to a particular caste or their family had a tradition of bondage to the family of the 'master'. The survey explodes the myth that usurious rates of interest were responsible for bonded labour. According to the report, 45 per cent of the bonded labourers do not pay any interest. Only 11.6 per cent of them pay at the rate of more than 40 per cent. In fact, 92.3 per cent in Tamil Nadu and 78 per cent in Madhya Pradesh do not pay any interest. Apparently, in most cases the value of their labour is pegged so low that they can barely pay back during their lifetime the paltry loans. The report says that 58.1 per cent of the bonded labourers were being held against loans of less than Rs 500, 19.9 per cent against loans between Rs 500 and 900 and 21 per cent over Rs 900.

The report also says that bonded women labourers are used for prostitution in the Jaunsar Bawar area of Uttar Pradesh. The women are Harijans belonging to the Kolta caste who are taken into bondage by Brahmins and Rajputs. They sent them to brothels in towns or set them up in their own villages and appropriate their earnings.

No Hope: Most of the bonded labourers have despaired of any liberation. Sixty per cent of them feel that they have to work for an "indefinite period". They do not, says the report, "see any possibility of freeing themselves from bondage except to wait with the faint hope that the master may some time reconsider their case and release them."

Ten per cent of the bonded labourers have been working for more than 10 years or since their childhood and 10 per cent for more than 20 years.

A shocking revelation of the survey is that 84 per cent of the bonded labourers belong to the Scheduled Castes and Tribes while only 11.6 per cent of them are caste Hindus. Of the 'masters', 84.2 per cent are caste Hindus. Says the report: "The phenomenon of bondage can be identified where there is a distinct social encounter between the landed high-caste Hindus and the poverty stricken Scheduled Castes and Tribes."

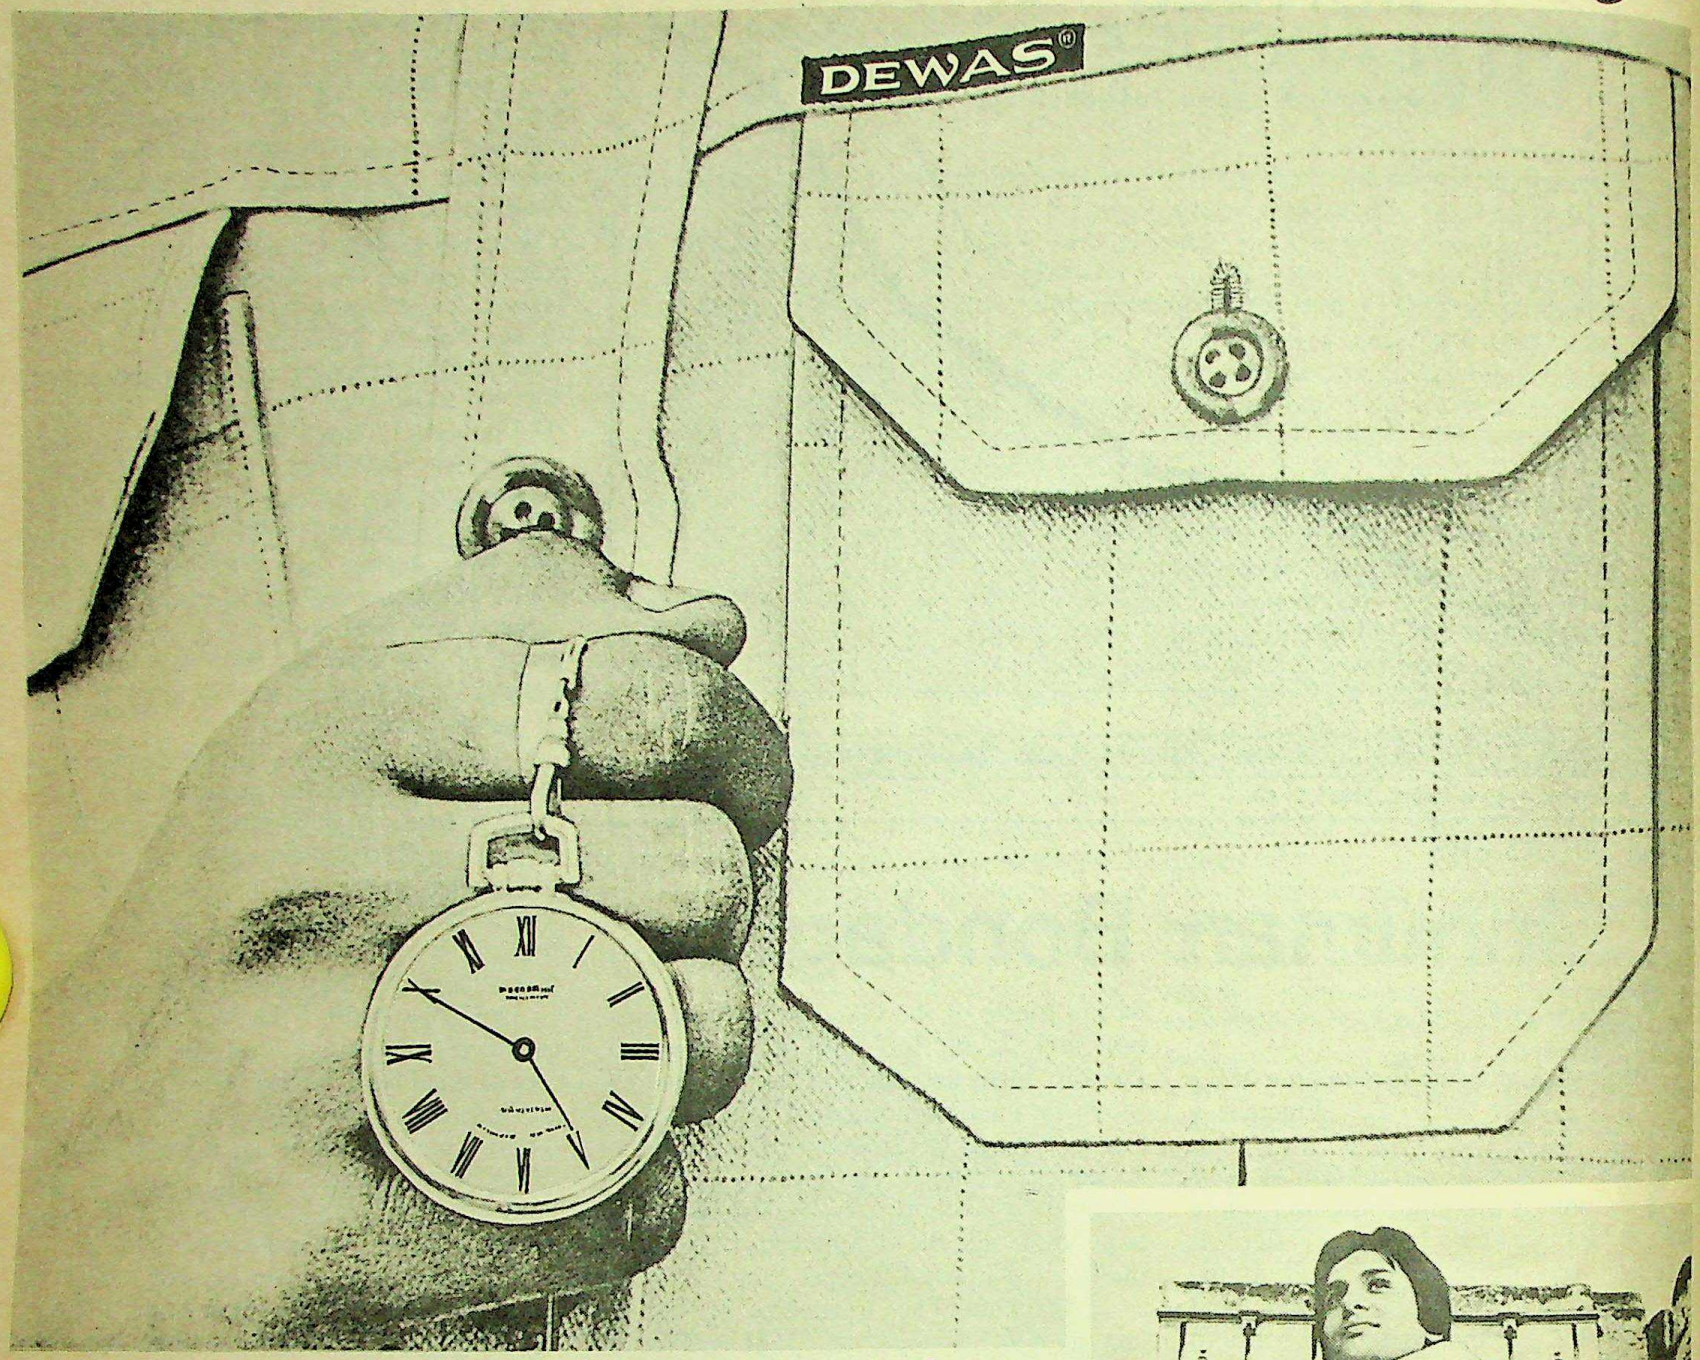
Mocking the democratic and egalitarian pretensions of the political leadership, Marla and Maharaj conclude: "Two million bonded labourers is a considerable source of cheap labour which is being expropriated by the farmers and that contributes substantially to the prosperity of the ruling rural elite. . . . By releasing the bonded labourers the free flow of cheap labour force will be disconnected and the agricultural profits will go down and the prosperity of the neo-rich peasants will experience a serious setback."

—ARUL B. LOUIS

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Dewas durability.



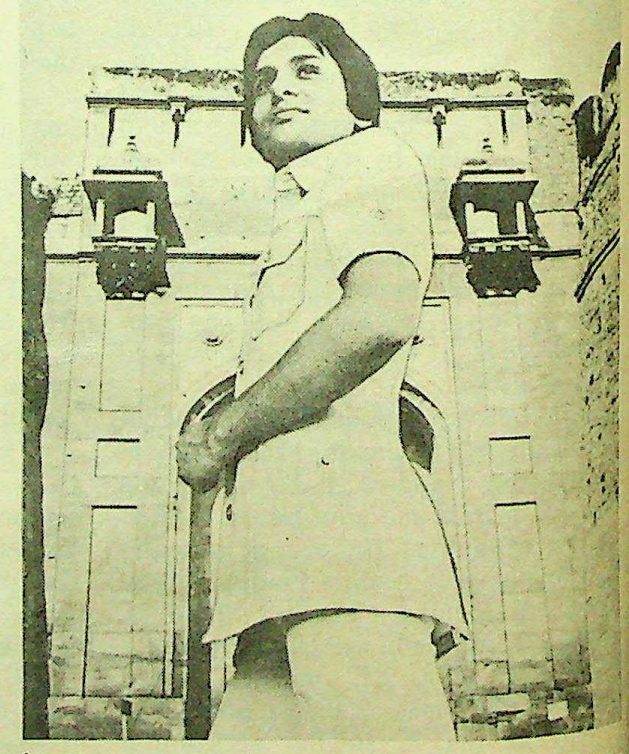
For people who appreciate the finer things in life.

Toughness that withstands the test of time. It comes naturally to the fabric with built-in strength. In every fibre . . . every weave : Dewas.

And it shows on the way it lasts. Use after use.

No wonder, people who see the finer side of life very often select Dewas.

Dewas suitings and shirtings come in a wide range of impressive shades, checks, and stripes.



DEWAS® SUITING/SHIRTING

The finer side of your life.

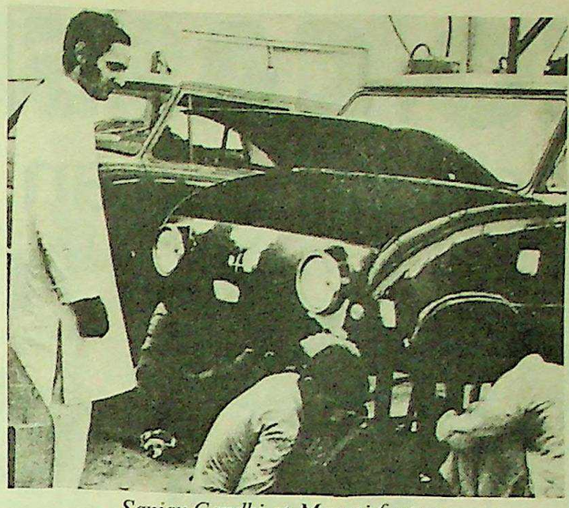
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Commissions

Suspended Animation

"ONE of the cardinal principles of trial is that it should start and conclude early," said Justice Jaganmohan Reddy in his report on the inquiry into corruption charges against former defence minister Bansi Lal, one of the feared minions of the Emergency. The Government should therefore take prompt action against anyone when a prima facie case is established, the judge suggested.

It is seven months since the Reddy Commission report was submitted but the Government is still "considering" it. Like the report of the Shah Commission (INDIA TODAY, April 16–30), the findings of the other Commissions of Inquiry into the various aspects of the Emergency also seem to have been lost in the never-never land of the bureaucracy.



Sanjay Gandhi at Maruti factory

Gupta—sensational revelations?

In his report on Bansi Lal, submitted on September 29, 1978, Justice Reddy held him responsible for the purchase of 50 heavy recovery vehicles from the West German firm, MAN, with a view to helping Sanjay Gandhi.

Favouritism : The report also says that Sanjay Gandhi was favoured by Bansi Lal with contracts to his notorious Maruti Ltd for building bus bodies for the Haryana Government. His involvement in the purchase of two Boeing aircraft for the Defence Ministry was also established.

Justice Reddy had also inquired into the Nagarwala episode which had taken place, before the Emergency, in 1971. He had ruled out any foul play in the death of R. S. Nagarwala, a former defence official, who made the chief cashier of the State Bank of India's Parliament Street branch in Delhi take out Rs 60 lakh from its vaults and hand it over to him by imitating the voice of the then prime minister, Indira Gandhi.

In his report Justice Reddy concluded that the Rs 60 lakh was taken out for "some secret use" and that unaccounted money was kept in the bank. But he disagreed with Prime Minister Morarji Desai that a part of the money belonged to Mrs Gandhi.

But Justice Reddy did find enough evidence to believe that Mrs Gandhi had not ensured proper investigation of the case and some officers in her secretariat had even tried to hamper it. Justice Reddy also criticized some senior doctors for not giving timely and proper treatment to Nagarwala when he was admitted in the Irwin Hospital (now Loknayak Jayaprakash Narayan Hospital) with a heart ailment. The report was submitted to the Government last October, but it has not yet decided whether to accept it or not, let alone take action on it.

Worse : The Grover Commission which inquired into the allegations of misuse of authority by Karnataka Chief Minister Devraj Urs is on a stickier wicket, though not because of the fault of the Union Government. The final report was submitted to it on March 15 and is likely to be under consideration for two months.

In its first report submitted in January 1978, when there was President's rule in the state, the Commission headed by Justice A. N. Grover, had said that at least four of the 60 allegations it was asked to probe were found to be substantially true. But then in the March 1978 state Assembly Elections the Congress (I) won with an overwhelming majority and Urs once again became the chief minister. This has put the Centre in a fix. The state Government, naturally, is not inclined to pursue the Commission's recommendations and Urs has withdrawn the jurisdiction granted to the Central Bureau of Investigation over the state and the Bureau cannot follow up the cases.

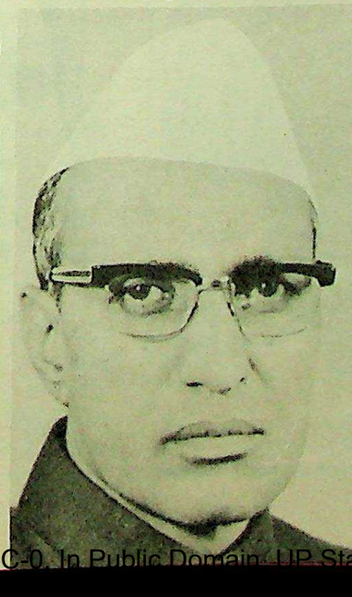
The Gupta Commission, headed by Justice A. C. Gupta, which has tried to unravel the mysteries of Sanjay Gandhi's Maruti Ltd, has also, it is learnt, submitted its report to the Government before its term expired on March 31. The Government will place the report before Parliament after processing its findings. The report is likely to make some sensational revelations.

—BRAJ MOHAN

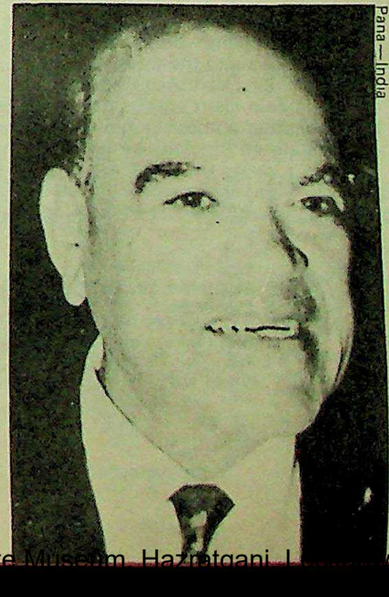
Reddy—disagreed with Desai

Pana—India

Bansi Lal—favoured Sanjay



Grover—report submitted



Pana—India

Urs—playing tough

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, L

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Esquire VIDEO CASSETTES
of popular Indian films

...A place in private entertainment all over the world.

The glamour of Indian films, the dazzle of our stars, the magic of a land mysterious, baffling and yet no puzzle to the people of the country all come alive on TV through Esquire Video Cassettes of Indian films.

Esquire Video Cassettes bring for your entertainment the pick of Indian films—old classics, love stories, thrillers and the latest box office hits.

Esquire Video Cassettes also contain short entertainment material of song and dance film sequences featured regularly on Indian TV network in a series titled Chaaya Geet.

Enjoy the world of Indian films with Esquire Video Cassettes.

Processing Unit:
ESQUIRE VIDEO FILM SERVICES PVT. LTD.
Santacruz Electronics
Export Processing Zone, Unit No. 11,
Andheri (East), Bombay-400 096.
Phone: 56 77 05 Telex: 11-4987 ESQR-IN World Distributors:

ESQUIRE (ELECTRONICS) LIMITED
P.O. Box 560, Kowloon Central Post Office. Kowloon, Hongkong, Telex: HX 75839 ESQUR.
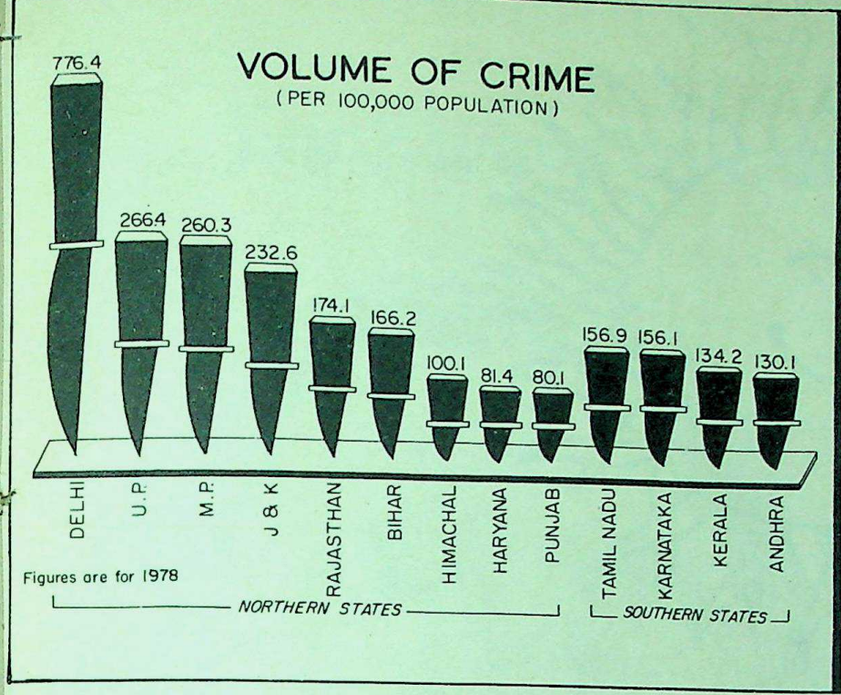
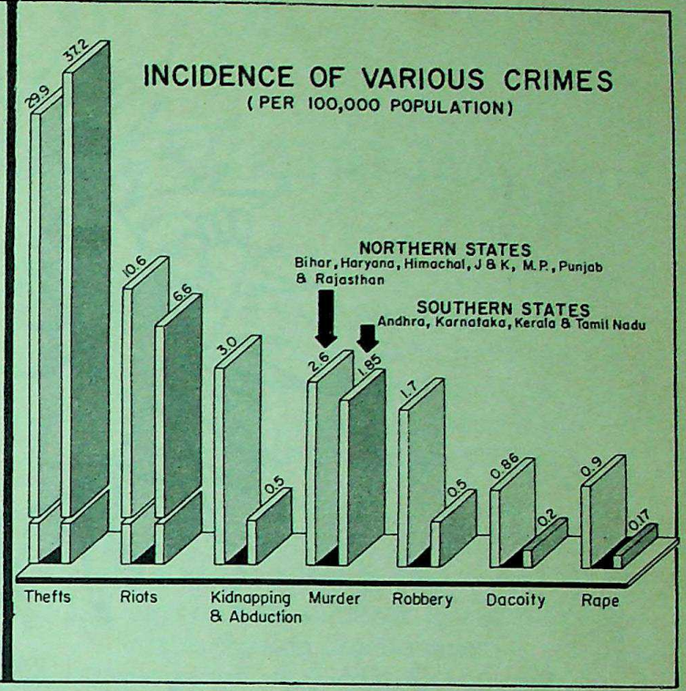
Phone: 3-685209.

Sole Selling Agents:
INDIAN MOTION PICTURES EXPORT CORPORATION LTD.

INDJ-009

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri





NORTH AND SOUTH

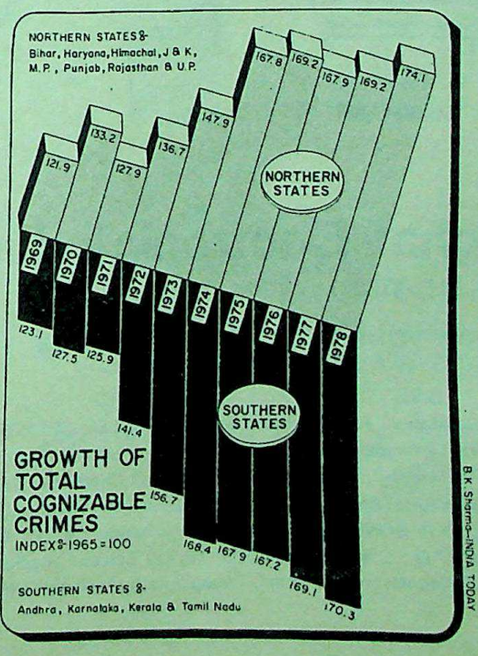
Disturbing Trends

THE south has fortuitously escaped the surging crime wave sweeping the rest of the country in the past two years. During 1978, 7.5 lakh cases were reportedly registered under various sections of the Indian Penal Code (IPC) in the eight northern states—Bihar, Haryana, Himachal Pradesh, Jammu and Kashmir, Madhya Pradesh, Punjab, Rajasthan and Uttar Pradesh—and the union territory of Delhi. But in the four southern states—Andhra Pradesh, Tamil Nadu, Kerala and Karnataka—only three lakh cases were registered. These four states which comprise a fourth of India's 63 crore population, account for 20 per cent of the total crimes reported every year, whereas the eight northern states and Delhi with 40 per cent of the national population register around 50 per cent of the reported offences. In effect, three crimes are committed in the north every two minutes as against one in the south.

The north also makes a larger contribution to the list of serious crimes. Sixty per cent of murders and rapes, 80 per cent of kidnappings and abductions, 70 per cent of dacoities, 30 per cent of robberies and 60 per cent of riots in 1978 occurred in the north. In fact, incidence of all kinds of crimes—except thefts—per lakh population is much higher in this region (see chart).

The north also outnumbers the south in the number of crimes involving property—the national average for one lakh population is 130. But the frequency of riots is the same in both regions. Bihar with 25 riots per lakh of its population (7 crore) leads in the north and Kerala (population: 3.1 crore) with an average of 23 riots annually tops in the south.

Reason: Explaining the reasons for less crimes in the south, a senior police official said: "Dravidians who constitute over 95 per cent of population are more religious and orthodox. And because religious sanction is more effective than the fear of legal prosecution, people are more disciplined." The system of penal action by the community itself prevalent in the south also acts as a deterrent. In the north on the other hand modernization has dented the hold of religion and tradition and consequently the official said "the accepted social norms have gone haywire".



The authorities in the south however, have no reason to be complacent, for if the crime rate continues to rise as at present, it would soon catch up with the north. The index number of crimes (base 1965 = 100) in peninsular India rose from 123.1 in 1969 to 170.3 in 1978 while in the north it increased from 121.9 to 174.1 during the same period (see chart).

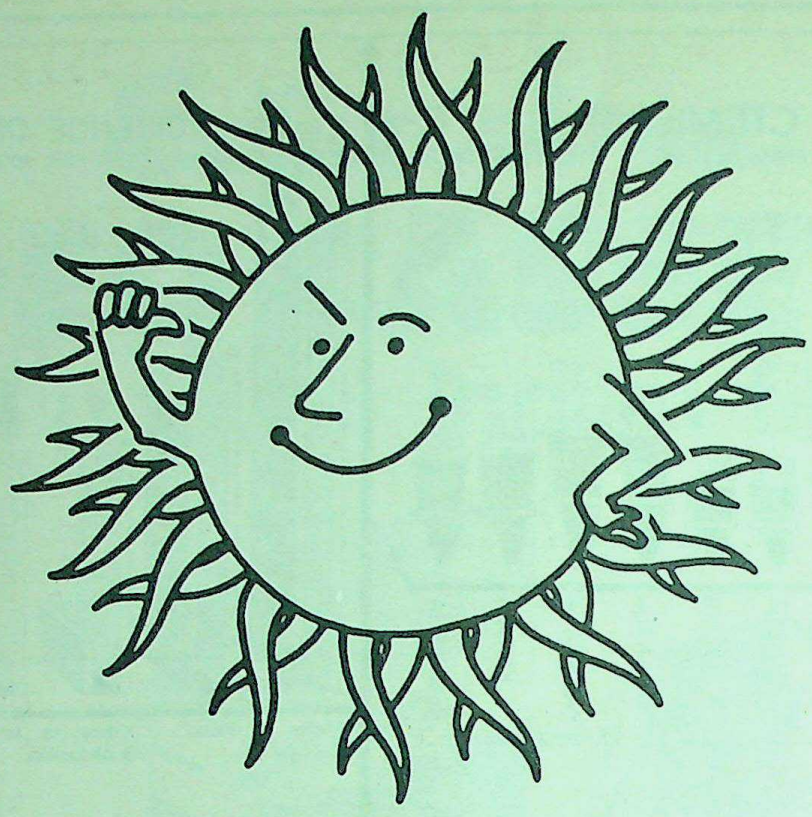
It is the smaller states that have contributed most to the rising rate of crime. For instance, in Kerala, the total number of cognizable offences have almost doubled in the past 10 years whereas in the north, in Himachal Pradesh (population: 34 lakh) the number has shot up by 80 per cent. According to a sociologist the intensive industrialization undertaken by the smaller states recently is responsible for the increase in crime. The United Nations Congress on Prevention of Crime and Treatment of offenders held in 1970 said: "As any area begins to open up, it outgrows its transitionalism and responds to outside influences or new ideas by modernizing, industralizing and concentrating people in certain areas. Its people, and particularly its younger generation, seize the many new opportunities. In doing so an increasing number of them succumb to temptations and seek satisfaction through crime."

The cultural differences between north and south, however, are disappearing fast. An official of the Andhra Pradesh home department commented wryly: "The increasing interaction between the north and the south is not only resulting in the intermingling of their cultural values but also leading to a mixing of their crime cultures."

—PRABHU CHAWLA

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



The right time is here

SOLARTIME
by RAGATRON with alarm

The latest in time. Solar powered battery that lasts and lasts. Housed in an electronic circuit that's light miles ahead of current technology. Split second accuracy. Arrestingly contemporary. Strikingly elegant.

Another quality product from the people who introduced in India— the Girard-Perregaux of Switzerland.

FDS/REIL/12-79

Raghav Electronic Industries (P) Ltd.
Solan, H.P. 173211.

Watch your time. It's precious.

Available at :

AHMEDABAD : KENYA WATCH CO., 4, Swastik Super Market, Ashram Road; SWASTIK SALES CORPORATION, 50, Embassy Market, Near Dinesh Hall; BANGALORE : ESKAY TRADING CORPORATION, 639, Chikkepet ; KRISHNIAH CHETTY & SONS, 35, Commercial Street; BOMBAY : MARCKS & CO., 97/103, Shetty House, M.G. Road, Opp. University; ROOKMANN'S PVT. LTD., 1513 Prasad Chambers, Swedeshi Mill Compound, Opera House; TIME WATCH MAKERS, Empress Mahal, Block A, Dadar; NAROTAMDAS BHAU, 437, Lamington Road ; CALCUTTA : VARAS INTERNATIONAL PVT. LTD., 7-C, Urvashi, 3, Hungerford Street; DELHI : D.N. SONDHI & CO., Fountain, Chandni Chowk; KAPUR-DI-HATTI, 16-L, Connaught Circus GANGTOK : PURANMAL RADHAKISHAN; HYDERABAD : ESKAY AGENCIES, 10, Lal Bahadur Stadium; MADRAS : P.ORR & SONS, 855, Mount Road; VUMMIDI BANGARU CHETTY & SONS, JEWELLERS, 3, Nageswara Rao Road, Panagal Park, T. Nagar; SIMLA : PHOOL CHAND & SONS, 81 The Mall; TIRUNELVELI : GEM WATCH CO., Madurai Road;

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

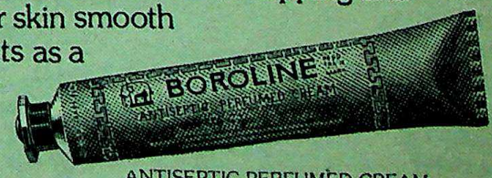
When the heat's on, play it cool. Four ways to outwit summer:

1 The faster the sun dries up your system, the more your skin needs moisture. Drink plenty of water and fresh fruit juice if you can.

2 It's alright to be a sun lover. The sun's rays have Vitamin D which is vital to the skin. But too much direct exposure could harm your skin. An umbrella is a must if you're going out. Wear light, cool clothes to keep out the heat. And guard the delicate skin round your eyes with sunglasses.

3 Oh those lazy, hazy, crazy days of summer with their sweat rash and prickly heat! Have at least two baths a day and powder yourself liberally, specially those places where you tend to perspire.

4 Keep a Boroline tube handy and use it last thing at night. Smooth in this perfumed antiseptic cream all over—specially when you come in from the sun. Boroline prevents summer rashes, chapping and dryness, leaves your skin smooth and healthy. It also acts as a gentle antiseptic for minor cuts and wounds.



ANTISEPTIC PERFUMED CREAM

BOROLINE

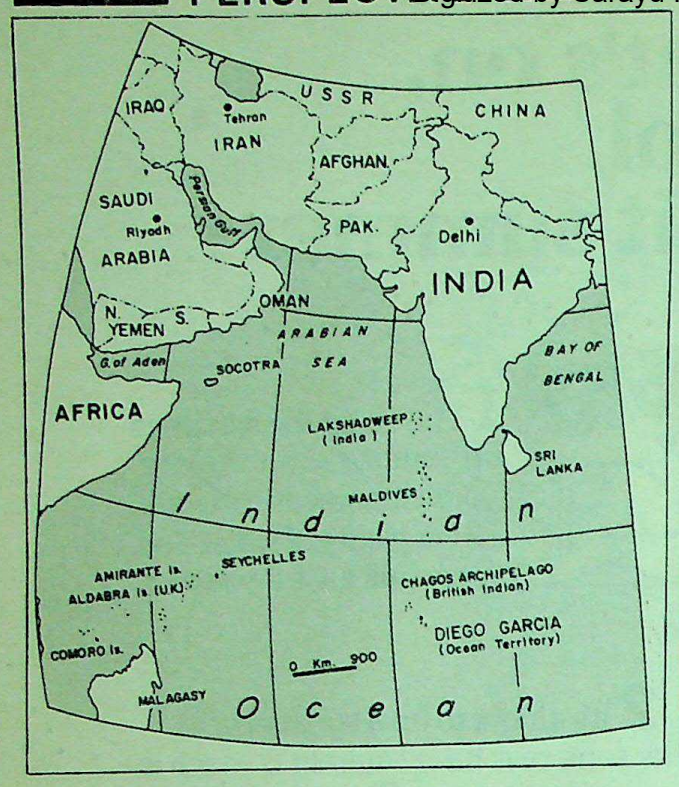
Protects your skin

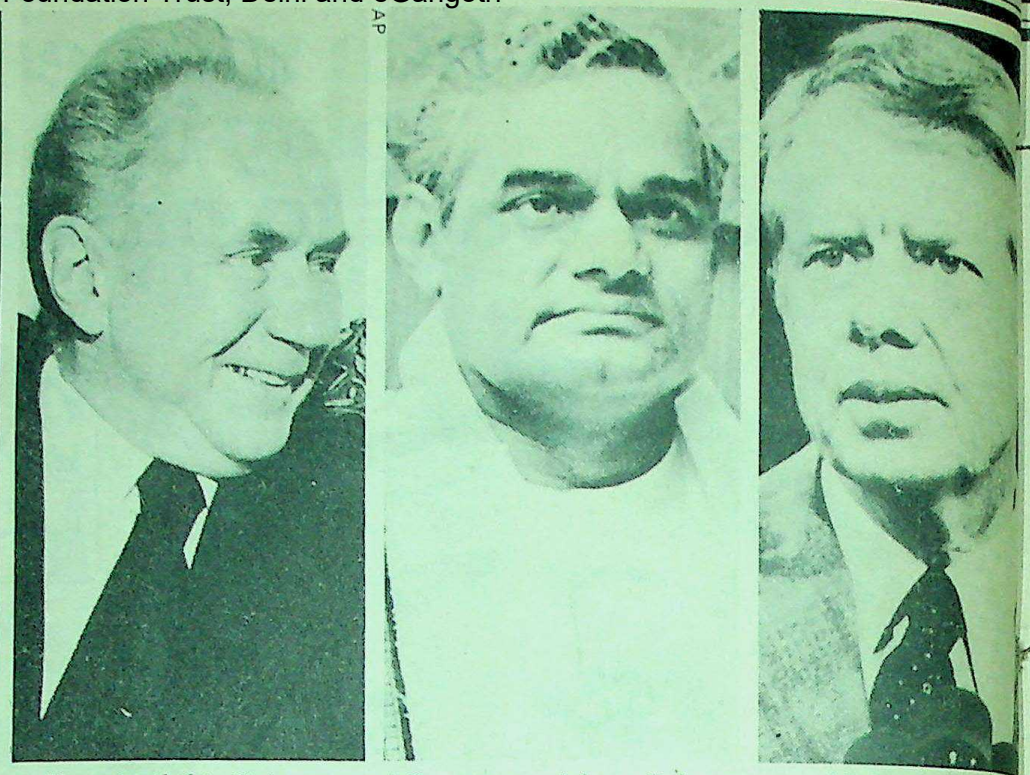
G. D. Pharmaceuticals Limited
Boroline House Calcutta 700 003

GD 3043

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri





Kosygin (left), Vajpayee and Carter—need for a dialogue to establish a peace zone

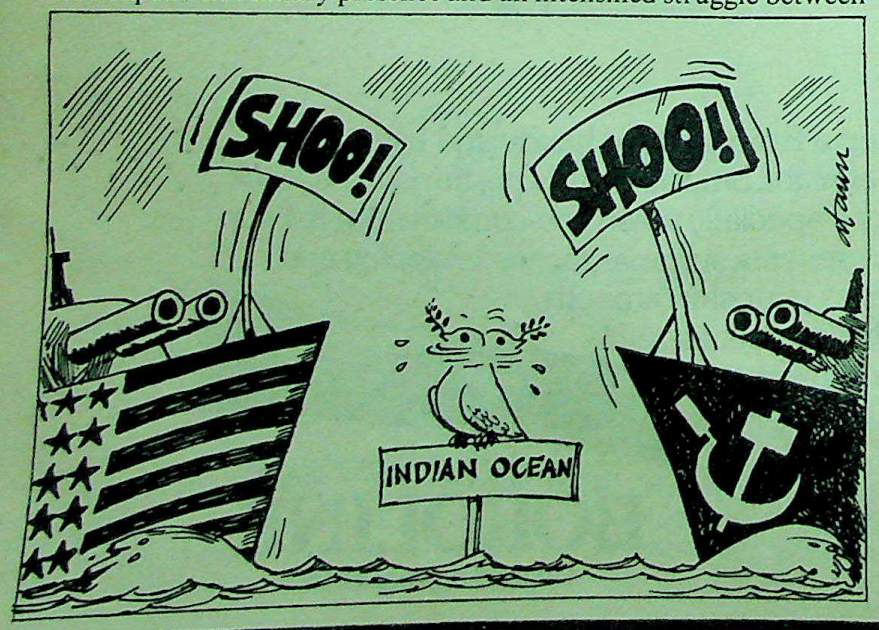
INDIAN OCEAN

Theatre For Super Power Rivalry

POLITICAL and military developments in the western Indian Ocean are causing ferment in the region. Speaking in the Lok Sabha on March 20, 1979, Foreign Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee said: "...increased military and naval strength in the area and enhanced super power presence could have adverse consequences, and add to tensions in the region..."

US activities in the western Indian Ocean include dispatch of a four-ship naval task force: the ostensible reason for this deployment being the events on the Arabian peninsula. A permanent naval presence in the form of a separate fleet, involving an expansion of base facilities in Diego Garcia is also contemplated. Other options before the US Defence Department are deployment of US Air Force F-15 fighters in Saudi Arabia, and the acceleration of arms supplies to North Yemen.

Pravda has warned against US interference in the region, and the danger of "conspiracies which can only aggravate the destabilization of the situation in this explosive part of the world..." It could be anticipated, however, that the Soviet Union would also expand its military presence and an intensified struggle between the super powers in the western Indian Ocean would result.



This heightened rivalry is part of the global interaction between the super powers, which has elements of cooperation, as in the SALT-II dialogue, and rivalry, as in the Middle East. Present strains in détente are related to a deterioration in that total relationship, largely occasioned by the way the United States is playing its 'China card'.

Reasons: More specifically, their rivalry in the western Indian Ocean proceeds for two other reasons. Firstly, Soviet influence in the Middle East was seriously eroded by Kissinger's successful step-by-step diplomacy. Soviet activism in the Arabian peninsula and Afghanistan is partly motivated by a desire to compensate for influence losses elsewhere. This Soviet policy is being resisted by the United States. Secondly, the strategic importance of the western Indian Ocean region is largely related to its being the major supplier of oil to the Western bloc. Consequently, western interests lie in securing these oil supplies, whereas Soviet interests are served by disruption of these supplies, revealing a basic asymmetry of strategic interests.

It is evident that super power intervention could not succeed if conflict situations did not prevail in the region. The changes in Iran have thrown into relief the latent contention between Islamic fundamentalism and secular radicalism. Different guerilla groups have also surfaced, and must be accommodated in the power structure. And the armed forces—divided as they are today—may not wait patiently on the sidelines.

In fact the Iranian armed forces could become more powerful if they are needed to control a Kurd revolt. Iraq has, so far, adopted a low profile. But she could support Kurdish autonomy demands. A certain restiveness is also evident among Iran's other ethnic minorities—Turkomans, Azerbaijanis, Arabs and Baluchis—who comprise almost 50 per cent of Iran's population. The likelihood of instability continuing in Iran, which may be aggravated by external powers is a real possibility.

Tension: In Afghanistan, the Tarakki regime has consolidated its position, eliminated its rivals, and moved firmly into the Soviet orbit. Despite denials, persistent reports of rebel activity—Islamic and pro-monarchical in character—suggests that the regime is not in full control of the situation. Moreover, its accusations of Pakistani and Iranian interference reveal an option available to these countries to encourage Afghan dissidence.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Nearer India, the situation in Pakistan has taken a dramatic turn with the execution of former prime minister Z.A. Bhutto. However, there is little likelihood of a large-scale revolt in support of Bhutto. The factors foreboding instability in Pakistan lie elsewhere, and include the failure of her rulers to balance Punjab's dominance against the aspirations for autonomy in the other provinces, inability to evolve an acceptable political system or a consensus regarding the optimal degree of Islamization.

To the west of the Gulf, the Dhofari insurgency in Oman, competition between Saudi Arabia and Iran for regional dominance, and other tensions add to prevailing instabilities. The broader asymmetric forces within the region are delineated by contention between Shias and Sunnis, traditionalists and progressives, pro-monarchical and radical elements. The prevailing situation, therefore, offers opportunities for extra-regional powers to intervene in the region.

Demilitarization: This is evident in the Yemens. US military aid to North Yemen, along with Saudi credits, is designed to stem the tide of radicalism in the Gulf. Soviet military and economic assistance to South Yemen is intended to retain control over the straits of Bab-El-Mandeb, and establish a springboard for extending Soviet influence into the Arabian peninsula.

Cognizant of the escalatory dangers in this situation, India has suggested a conference of littoral and non-littoral countries to convert the Indian Ocean into a zone of peace. India has also urged the two super powers to resume negotiations for demilitarizing the Indian Ocean. (These negotiations started in 1977 but were suspended some months later, due to strains following the Ogaden war.)

Difficulties in establishing a peace zone in the Indian Ocean are, however patent. First, besides China, no other super power has joined UN resolutions calling upon them to halt expansion of their military presence in the Indian Ocean, and eliminate it thereafter. Second, the littoral countries are divided by historical and ethnic animosities. These are aggravated by territorial disputes, chauvinist ambitions and so on—all clearly visible in the Gulf region. Weaker littoral countries are naturally tempted to invite intercession by external powers to redress the regional balance.

Divergences: On the other hand, there are profound differences in the basic approach of the super powers to demilitarizing the Indian Ocean. The Soviet Union favours a radical approach—elimination of foreign bases, non-creation of new bases, and mutual reduction of military presence by non-littoral states. But the United States prefers a gradualist approach, beginning with freezing, and leading up to limitation of military presence. These divergences reflect the non-symmetrical situation of the super powers in the Indian Ocean. Both have navies, and enjoy varying influence over littoral countries. But only the United States has truly identifiable bases like Diego Garcia. The United States is therefore unwilling to forego its present advantage; the Soviet Union, however, wishes to neutralize its present disadvantage.

The joint communiqué issued after Russian Premier Alexei Kosygin's visit reiterates firm support by India and the Soviet Union to the concept of a peace zone in the Indian Ocean. Further, they favour resumption of talks between the Soviet Union and the United States to achieve this objective. It would be realistic to assess, nevertheless, that the Indian Ocean region in general, and western Indian Ocean in particular, has become a theatre of conflicts which are likely to exacerbate in the near future.

—P. R. CHARI

DR CHARI is Director of the Institute for Defence Studies and Analysis

Grant 8.77 (R)

AO Pure Coconut Oil is made from choice sun-dried coconuts.
Filtered twice.
Crystal clear, with the natural sweet smell of coconuts.

AO Pure Coconut Oil
—Trusted for purity
through the years

Available in hygienically sealed tins: 5 sizes. Bottles: 2 sizes.

AO Pure Coconut Oil is filtered twice to retain the natural goodness and sweet smell of coconuts

AhmedMills
Bombay • Calcutta
New Delhi • Ahmedabad
Bangalore • Dhanbad

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

AND NOW FROM OCM
A touch of class
TRAVOLTA
summer suitings

Available at your friendly OCM dealer.

THE ORIENTAL CARPET MANUFACTURERS (INDIA) LTD., Chheharta, Amritsar.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Electronics technology alone is not enough.

HMV has Sound Experience.

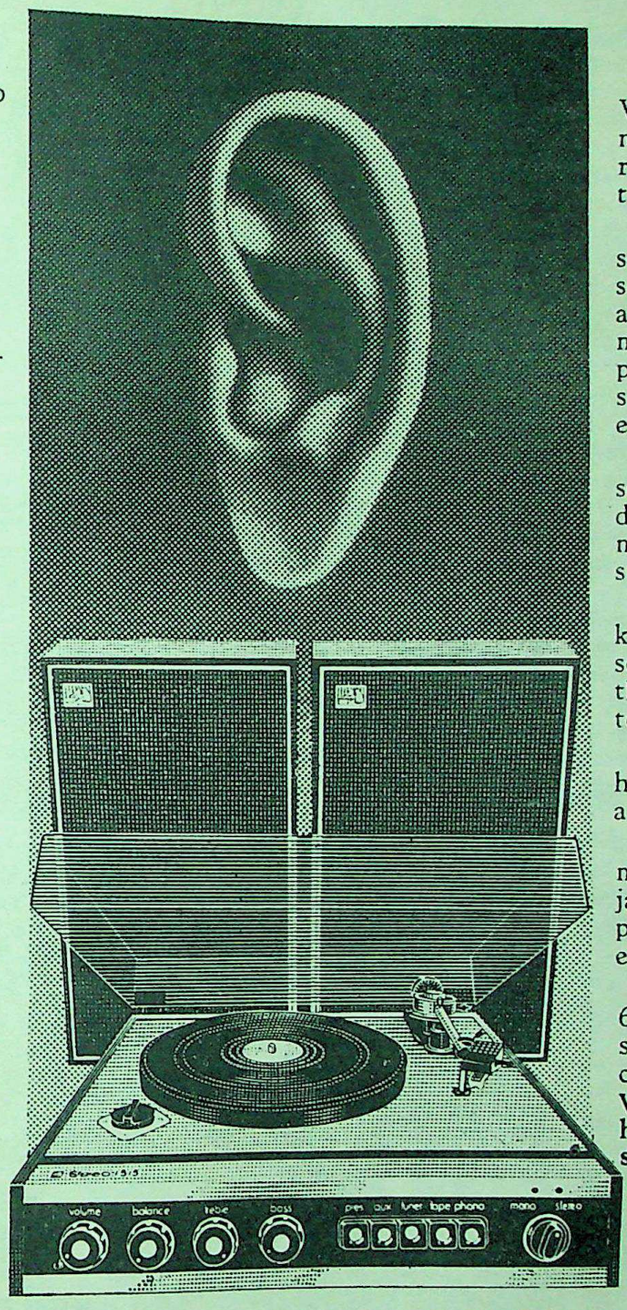
Look at most of the advertisements for stereo systems these days, and what do you see ?

A pretty picture and words, words and more words, words about words like DIN specs, music power rating, power band width, dynamic range, class A—class B operation etc. Words on technical specifications without 'limits' that rarely convey the true performance standards of the product.

We at HMV don't like to confuse you with words. And, believe us, we could because after all, we've been in the business of stereo systems longer than anyone else. And our stereo systems have won the confidence of music lovers more than any other.

So technology for technology, we started earlier and stayed ahead of all others in pre-matched integrated sound systems.

But what is more important, is the sheer experience we've gathered in the business of sound.



The reason is simple. We've made millions and millions of gramophone records. So we know how to make sound.

That special 'ear' for sound and music is something that we have—and no other stereo maker has. That sharp, precise, acute sense of sound that only experience can bring.

That same 'ear' for sound also applies to the designing of our pre-matched integrated stereo systems.

And since we know how to record sound, isn't it obvious that we also know how to reproduce sound best ?

You only have to hear our stereo systems and ask yourself:

"Should I put my money on technological jargon alone? Or should I put my money on sound experience?"

There are over 6,50,000 owners of HMV sound systems who chose experience.

We know how to make sound sound best

STEREO 1515
Max.Rec.Ret.Price.Rs 2,358/- Taxes Extra.

EMI

For a free booklet on stereo terminology 'Audio Talk' write to us enclosing a self-addressed envelope (20 cm x 15 cm) affixing a 50 paise stamp.

HMV

His Master's Voice

C.E.P. (Commercial Division)
THE GRAMOPHONE COMPANY OF INDIA LTD.
33 Jessore Road, Calcutta 700 028

HMV/CAS-1/79

HMV STEREO SYSTEMS

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

THEY are innocent, economical, unassuming and submissive. They work everywhere. In dingy roadside dhabas, in the mushrooming small industries in narrow and stinking lanes—hell houses of pestilence—tens of thousands of children earn their bread without butter. Over 30 million children—about 10 per cent of India's child population—of which 7 million are girls hover around the numerous commercial establishments to earn a few pennies and supplement their family's meagre income. In urban areas every second child works on pavements, and every fourth child gets a job in industrial units where employment of children below 14 is prohibited. And over 1,50,000 children who could not get a job have become beggars or have swelled the ranks of vagrants. While 12 out of 100 children die before they complete the age of five, two out of 10 children die at work.

A bookbinder in Old Delhi employs seven-year-old Rajpal (bottom left), for pasting file covers. He is on trial and in return for a 9-hour day, he gets a measly 75 paise. Son of a slum-dweller, Rajpal has one shirt and a pant. His father, Ramjilal, 39, is a labourer who earns Rs 15 a day which is not enough to support his six-member family.

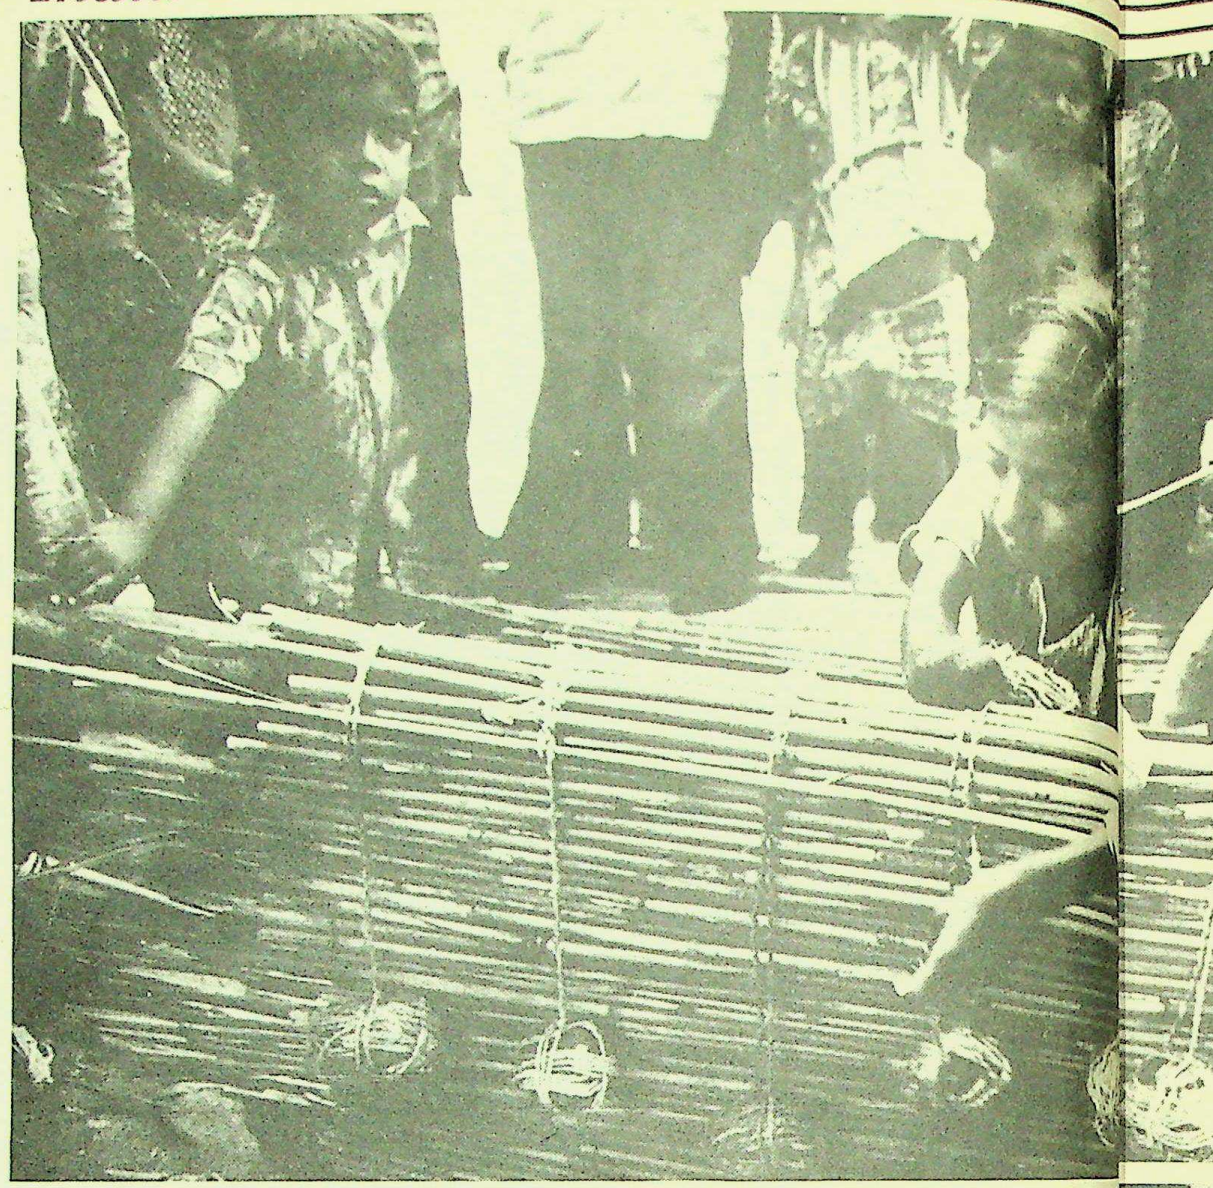
Ten-year-old Akhtar (bottom right) pulls a thela (hand-cart) loaded with carpets and cloth in Delhi's Chandni Chowk. Strong and dark, Akhtar earns Rs 4 for a full day's work. He lives in a thatched house in Jehangirpuri with his family of seven. His father Anwar, 40, a labourer earns only Rs 8 daily. Says Akhtar: "I have a lot of responsibility. I have to earn for my three younger sisters, otherwise they will have no food. I have my meals twice a day—chapatis and potatoes in the morning and chapatis with achar (pickles) in the evening."

Laxmi, 9, (top left) a handicapped girl works for a contractor who makes bamboo curtains in Old Delhi. For eight hours she is paid Rs 2. "I earn for myself," says Laxmi proudly. She chose work instead of school because she did not want to be a liability on her parents. "Life will be easier when I am a little older and start earning more," says Laxmi optimistically.

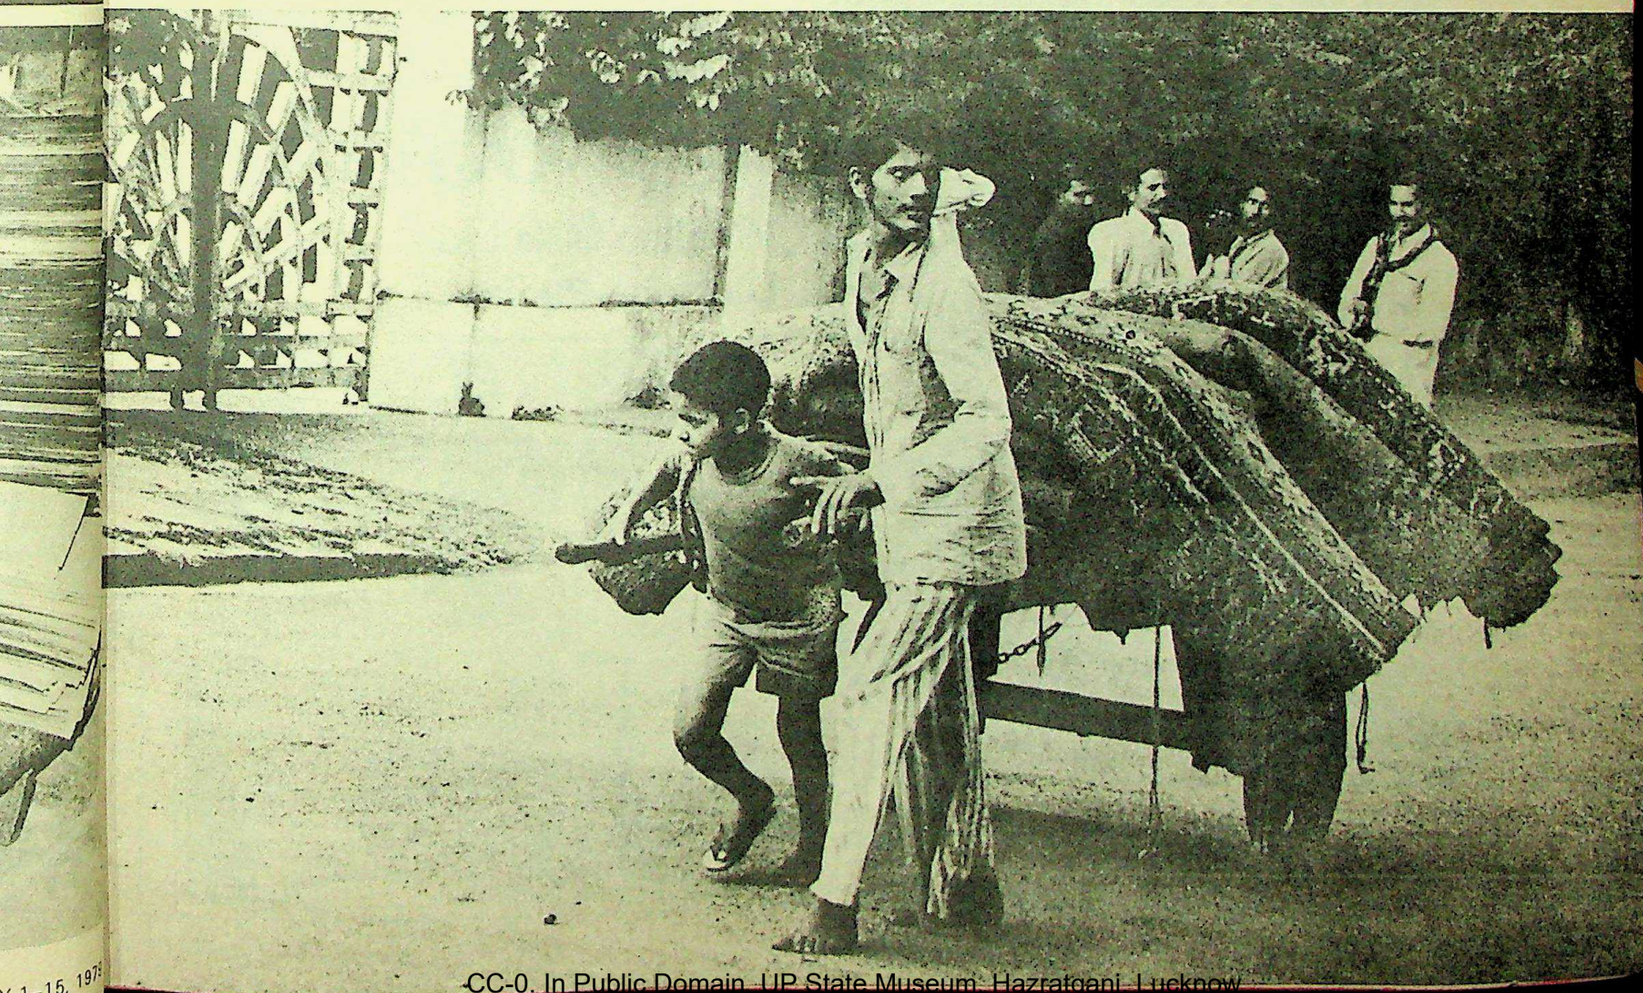
Jai Prakash, 9, (top right) works for a shoe-maker in Delhi's Chawri Bazar. He does odd jobs like cutting the leather and fixing nails into shoe soles. The eldest in the family, Prakash, earns about Rs 7 a day. He dropped out of school because his father could not afford to lose the money Prakash brought home. "I enjoy working. I do not have to carry books or get up early to go to school," says Jai Prakash.

Rajpal, Akhtar, Laxmi and Jai Prakash are meticulous and honest in their working. Yet they are ill-paid and quite often go without a meal. But they cannot get out of the well-entrenched system, which lets the privileged exploit the poor with impunity.

—PRABHU CHAWLA



Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

OSWAL Creation '79

OWM-791

Hello smarty what's up!

Children's world is more colourful with Oswals apparels. Soft for their tender body. Colourful. Like their dreams. With bunny's birds and humpty dumptys to be friends with.

Made with finest polyacry and other imported yarns Oswals rompers and babasuits are just the thing for your little smart darling.

Look for the owm trademark—the better value for your money.

MARK OF INTEGRITY
owm
PRODUCTS

OSWAL

Woollen Mills Ltd.
Ludhiana.Punjab.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

S. K. Sharma

The painting Animal Being by Manjit Bawa (inset)

PAINTING

Mystical Fantasies

AT Dhoomi Mal's last show of the season in Delhi, Manjit Bawa, 38, unfurled his work. Many colours, both brilliant and muted, comprised the body of work, but none was predominant. The gallery walls stood together like a box of crayons thrown open at noon. They flashed at first glance, but then the box was able to contain them.

The creatures on the canvases had different ancestries: human, animal, mythological and the purely fantastic. The mythological borrowings were not acknowledged. The obese Ganesh and the flying Hanuman were titled Falling Yellow and Flight in Green. The idea was perhaps to suggest, not enumerate.

Irrespective of the subject, Bawa's figures had originated from a common seed. None of them stood upright, taking definite postures. They swelled and gangled as water seemed to soak into their beings. The great sphinx sat in a grey lagoon, spineless as a water balloon. A white horse climbed a stair, his bloated limbs exhausting his effort. A tiger lay listless as a six-armed deity hovered in sky.

Double Edge: In the catalogue to Bawa's show, Swaminathan, the eminent painter of nature's mystical images wrote: "Manjit's world is somewhat like the world of Alice, inconsequential, menacing, inexplicable yet inexorable." And true enough, the fantasies of the artist managed to create a double edge. The whole construction of the beings remained protoplasmic as opposed to muscular, but their open stance in a spaceless vacuum did not reduce them to passivity. Always, a detail or two remained disturbing, though sometimes only in colour. A yellow crescent moon against a green sky; the horse's mane descending like ranges of snow-clad mountains; the two tongues of a double mouthed monster; the fingertips that ended as phalluses. But the purpose of the details was not always clear. In a children's book of fantastic monsters, explanations may not have been necessary, but to the adult who sought the answers, they came slow—if they came at all.

It seemed that Bawa's silk screens had blown themselves into canvas spaces, retaining their flawless serigraphic finish. To interpret beyond the image remained a subjective story.

—AMAN NATH

SCULPTURE

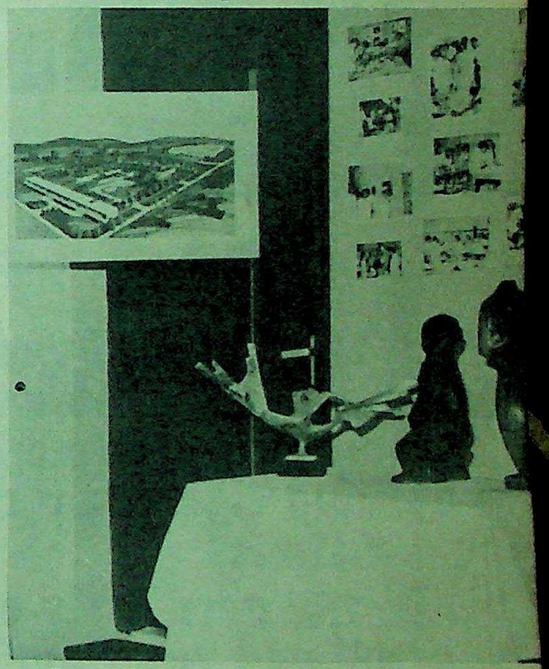
Novel Venture

YOUNG sculptors in the country will soon have the opportunity for self-expression in the backdrop of famous Chandela temples in Khajuraho. A Rs 1.25 lakh sculpture centre is being established there by Shyam Sunder Poddar, 60, managing director of Hotel Chandela, to provide 'guidance' to selected students.

A seat of culture and art during the rule of powerful Chandela kings, Khajuraho (597 km from New Delhi) in Madhya Pradesh was slowly forgotten and lost in the anonymity of tiny villages in the country. "Ten years back you could never locate it on the map," says Poddar. "Today it is a popular tourist destination and linked by air."

Poddar's efforts in the past few years have been directed towards the "resurrection" of Khajuraho. "Now I visualize it once again as a seat of art and culture." His sentiments were echoed by eminent art critics and sculptors who participated in the symposium Poddar had organized to mark the laying of the foundation stone of the centre on April 11. Said an art critic: "Sculpture has been the least supported of the plastic arts. It is good that sculptors will be able to work in the sylvan surroundings of Khajuraho."

Initially the centre will comprise four studios, an exhibition hall and a small administrative office. It shall have facilities to train six to eight students. Their stay and meals will be arranged free by the centre which will also supply the sculpting material. The students during the six-month course will also be given a stipend for personal expenses. A senior resident sculptor will be available to guide the trainees, but "not to instruct them", emphasizes Poddar. "The students will be free to choose their own medium."



Some of the exhibits at the symposium

Poddar believes that intrinsic talent can flower anywhere given the opportunity. He is optimistic that "the exquisite beauty of the temple sculptures will inspire the new generation of sculptors, in spite of the changed times and new forms of expression."

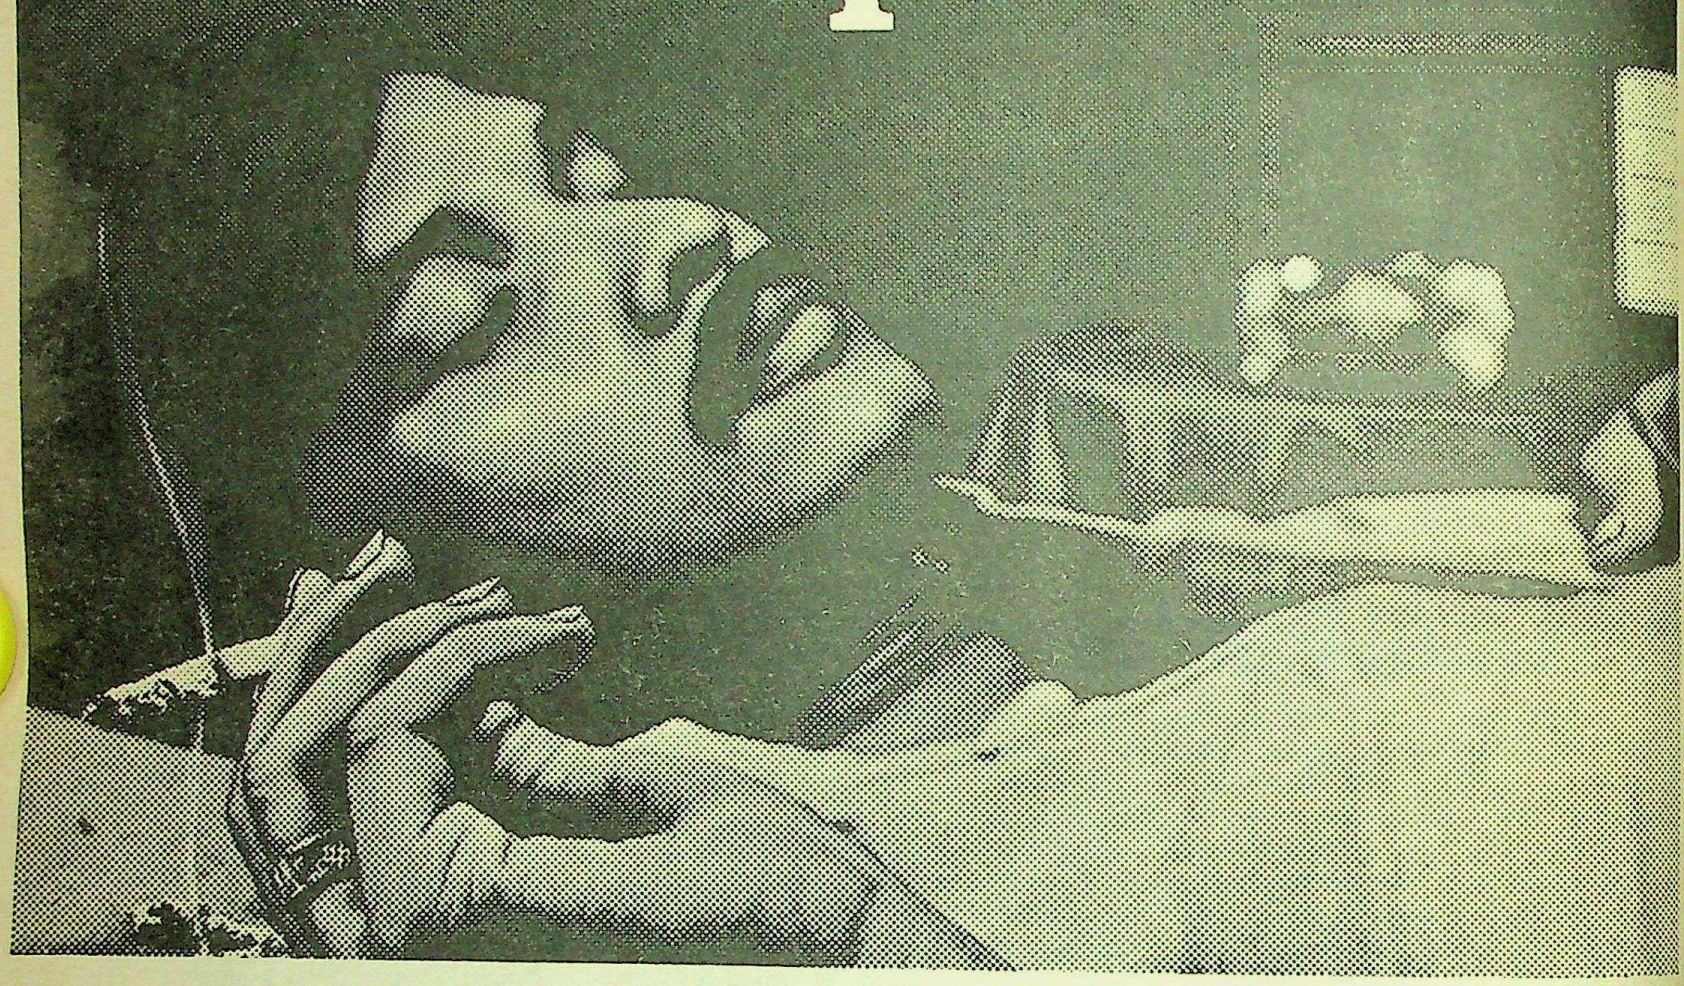
—SUNIL K. ROY

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Do you smoke in bed?

Stop it.



It takes about five minutes for an entire bedroom to be in flames from the moment a burning cigarette is dropped on a mattress.

Do not needlessly endanger yourself and your family.

Your Fire Safety Checklist

Where there's a smoker there could be fire

1. Do not smoke in bed or anywhere else when you are sleepy.
2. Do not smoke till the butt. It could burn your fingers and drop out of your hand.
3. Never leave a burning cigarette around even for a short while.
4. Extinguish cigarettes in metal, ceramic or glass ash trays with water in them.
5. Do not throw cigarette ends into trash cans or wastepaper baskets.
6. Do not smoke inside a cinema, lift, train or bus, a petrol station or in places where smoking is prohibited.

Cut & Keep

LPA wants to work with like-minded people and welcomes your involvement. Please write for details.

LPA
सुरक्षेय समृध्दये

Prevent losses. Promote prosperity.

Loss Prevention Association of India Ltd.

Warden House, Sir P.M. Road, Bombay 400 001.

CASLPA-7-254

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Intimate Touches

JAYAKANTHAN, the renowned Tamil novelist is known in literary circles for his radicalism. Recipient of the Sahitya Akademi Award for his Sila Nerangalil Sila Manithargal (People at Different Times) he has become a box-office draw. Bombay's Amateur Dramatic Club recently staged a play based on Jayakanthan's novel, Brahmopadesam. In fact, the stage version came off better than the book.

In dramatizing Brahmopadesam, Bombay's young amateurs improvised considerably. Verses from the Sankhya Yoga and the Bhagwad Gita have been incorporated effectively. For example, the answer to the question, "Who is a Sthitapragna?" is: "A man who is untouched by the happenings around him, a man who is emotionally free from all worldliness, a man who does not rise to the heights of ecstasy or plunge to the depths of despair if anything happens to him." Rendered in Sanskrit the effect is telling. It is heightened by touches of the 'intimate theatre' with the actors occasionally addressing themselves to the audience.

Scenes from Brahmopadesam based on Jayakanthan's Tamil novel

Exacting Standards: The story of Brahmopadesam in simple. Sarma, a Brahmin cook, feels a person cannot be adjudged a Brahmin by his birth but by his actions alone. While he is looking for the ideal Brahmin husband for his daughter Maitreyi, she decides on marrying her neighbour Seshadri, a Brahmin by caste. Sarma does not consider Seshadri to be a true Brahmin as he is an atheist and spouts communism. Meanwhile Sarma comes across a young man of a low caste, Sadananda Odhuvar, and finds in him all the qualities he is looking for. At the time of Maitreyi's wedding to Seshadri, Sarma declares that Sadananda has measured up to his high standards, declares him to be a Brahmin and whispers to him the Brahmopadesam mantra, as does every Brahmin father to his son.

The presentation brings out what is characteristic of Jayakanthan's brand of revolution. By pointing out what the Brahmin should be, he raises Brahminism to a level that very few Brahmins by birth can even conceptualize, let alone live at.

—RAJA RAMANATHAN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

wake up to the times...

with ador

India's first Digital Electronic Clock of its kind

Times have changed. Styles have changed. And here is a tribute to your new image. ADOR. The new Digital Electronic Clock. With quartz crystal control, volume-adjustable musical chime alarm, snooze facility and other exclusive features.

That's ADOR.
The symbol of changing times.

ADVANI-OERLIKON

Marketed by
ADVANI-OERLIKON LIMITED
Ador House, 6, K. Dubash Marg,
Bombay 400 023 • Tel: 242525

ador
means reliability

Area/Sub-area Offices: P.B. No. 6012, Bombay 400012 • P.B. No. 101, New Delhi 110001 • P.B. No. 4522, Madras 600006 • P.B. No. 19/83, Raipur 492001 • P.B. No. 11213, Calcutta 700014 • Classic Building, 24 Richmond Road, Bangalore 560025 • Vadodara Development Estate, Maganwadi, Sayajiganj, Baroda 390005 • Raj Soudh, Ravipuram, Ernakulam, Cochin 682016 • 5-9, 88/3/A1, 2nd Floor, Faiteh Maidan, Hyderabad 500001 (AP) • Gajraj Mansion, 2nd Floor, Bistupur, Jamshedpur (Bihar) • Akurdi Village, Chinchwad, Poona 411019 • M-4, Jawahar Nagar, Kawuiar, Trivandrum 695003 • Port Reclaimed Area, Visakhapatnam 530001

PRATIBHA-AO-303/79

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

$ Diplomacy

A DANGEROUS PLACE
by DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN
Allied Publishers
Pages: 297; Price: Rs 30

Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the outspoken 52-year-old former US envoy and now a Senator, has been at the centre of controversy wherever he has been. At the United Nations he courted unpopularity among the group of Seventy Seven by having to battle against the Arab attempt to equate Zionism with racism. In India, where he served as his country's ambassador between 1973–1975, he alienated the Indian elite and became disillusioned about his country's foreign policy towards the subcontinent. Now the flamboyant former Harvard professor narrates some of his experiences in various diplomatic postings as well as at the United Nations in an equally eloquent style. The book is his testimony to those fateful events in the Third World and the General Assembly.

What he calls the "innocent enough affair of the heart" soon turned into "great bitterness in India". Besides, it seems he had little to do in India. He writes: "In my two years there, from 1973 to 1975, I gave four speeches, two of them lectures... I held no press conference until my next to last day. Within the channels of the Indian Government I sought to state what American policy was rather than, what I wished it to be. The affair of the heart, surely, was over."

Obviously, besides little labour, there was little love lost between him and the Indians. Says Moynihan: "It was my hope that now that we perhaps like each other less, we might respect each other more." Then comes the admission of his failure in India. "I had no great success."

Washington could partly be blamed for his lack of success. The other factor was Mrs Gandhi. Moynihan notes with a tinge of sarcasm: "Under the rule of Nehru's daughter, the world's largest democracy had, in foreign affairs, become bound to Soviet policy. Worse, it was drifting into an authoritarianism all its own. With my own government collapsing at home, the most I could do was to set about liquidating the extraordinary demi-Raj that the United States had established in India in the mid-'50s and '60s. Rather as the British had, I hoped to march out rather than be driven out."

Foresaw: Moynihan had seen the signs of the Emergency but he left India "in silence. But I was onto something, and I knew it. I was sure she would do what indeed she did do." What Moynihan failed to do for democracy was to speak out before the event rather than record it proudly afterwards.

What irked Moynihan most during his spell in Delhi was Mrs Gandhi's constant harping on Central Intelligence Agency (CIA)'s threat of subversion in India. It appears that he lost a great deal of sleep over the subject and finally decided to press his embassy to go back over the whole quarter century of America's link with Independent India to find out "just what we had been up to".

Mrs Gandhi and Moynihan—thank you

The result: "I was satisfied we had been up to very little. We had twice, but only twice, interfered in Indian politics to the extent of providing money to a political party. Both times the money was given to the Congress Party, which had asked for it (italics added). Once it was given to Mrs Gandhi herself, who was then a party official. Still, as we were no longer giving money to her, it was understandable that she should wonder just to whom we were giving it. It is not a practice to be encouraged."

Bad Luck: Moynihan's disclosures could not have come at a worse time for Mrs Gandhi who is fighting a losing battle for her political survival. It has come at a time when she is being attacked from within her party by those who feel that her son Sanjay should keep away from politics, and should not meddle with the affairs of the party or the country. Moreover the Special Courts Bill is before Parliament and once it becomes law, which should be sometime this month, those accused of excesses during the Emergency will be hauled up before it. Mrs Gandhi and her son Sanjay would probably be the prime candidates for these courts. Furthermore her Congress Party is in total disarray at the Centre as well as in the states. Coming on top of all this Moynihan's disclosures have confirmed that Mrs Gandhi's holier-than-thou posture in Indian politics was a farce. She is shown to be as corruptible as any other two-bit politician in India.

Mrs Gandhi, according to Moynihan, had not only accepted slush funds to bolster up her election campaign, but also invited the Americans to spy on China (see excerpt). Has not someone written a book titled the Two Faces of Indira Gandhi?—CHHOTU KARADIA

EXCERPTS

Of the various joint Indian-American enterprises, none survived the strains of 1971 more successfully than those directed against China. Indian fear of the Chinese was palpable. As much as the Gandhi government may have desired American defeat in Vietnam, once that became inevitable they could see it would not really be to the advantage of India, and in private became ever more explicit on this point. And so we continued, jointly, to spy on the Chinese from the tops of the Himalayas.

These were routine exercises, but not without drama. In 1965 we had sent a climbing expedition to the top of Nanda Devi a mountain of 26,645 feet in the northeast, near the border with China, to put in place nuclear-powered instruments which would record Chinese rocket telemetry and atomic tests. A storm came, the instruments, including the power pack, were cached, and the party returned to base. The climbers returned in the spring to find that an avalanche had swept everything away, and the plutonium was lost in the snow pack at the headwaters of the holy Ganges. Our then-Ambassador Chester Bowles went back to Mrs Gandhi, and the next year a second Indo-American expedition successfully put instruments in place atop Nanda Kot, the 22,400-foot mountain adjacent to Nanda Devi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

to Keltron capability and Bailey expertise in control instrumentation

It's a toast to Bailey of France – the last word in control systems and Keltron – the proven professionals in electronics in India, who together have made possible the setting up of Keltron Controls. A multicrore project bringing tomorrow's technology to the quiet backwaters of Aroor in Kerala. To manufacture the 9020 control system – way ahead in time, design and philosophy.

Incorporating the latest 4th generation technology, this system offers power plants and process industries versatile application possibilities no other system can match.

For instance:

- Monovariable or multivariable control
- With or without intrinsic safety
- Split controller and small command post
- Computer compatibility

The 9020 is the most flexible control system and can be tailor-made to suit your applications. Moreover, a personalisation plug-in-circuit with a surveillance monitor permits rapid replacements of faulty modules.

Keltron Controls – yet another affirmation of the forward-looking dynamism of Keltron. Combining thought plus action.

And now, with the ultimate in control instrumentation, the "toast" of the country!

KELTRON CONTROLS

—a generation ahead

KELTRON

know-how to serve the people.

Bombay • Delhi • Calcutta • Madras • Bangalore • Trivandrum.

* With tender coconut water

KEL 2126 A

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Pushkarna—INDIA TODAY

A woman at the Kisan Rally last December in New Delhi with Charan Singh's picture

Debatable Surmise

SMALL IS POLITICS
Organizational Alternatives in India's Rural Development
by MARCUS FRANDA
Wiley Eastern Ltd
Pages: 296; Price: Rs 45

The title of the book bears a striking similarity to E.F. Schumacher's Small is Beautiful. The politics of Small is Politics is that since India is going through a "distinctly evolutionary process of transformation" there is "little scope for a political revolution" in the country, rural change and development is on the agenda; India may not go the China way and may operate within the democratic framework, if institutions to bring about rural development programmes are organized and credit is made available through them to small farmers.

Franda is very enthusiastic about the Janata Party's emphasis on rural development. The party's industrial policy, rural credit schemes, rural employment strategy, its commitment to panchayats and decentralization, small-scale and cottage industries and support for the ideas of voluntary action as exemplified in the Social Work Research Centre (SWRC) are motivated by a desire to help the "small man".

The challenges to the Janata Party and its economic strategy come from Mrs Indira Gandhi, chronic factionalism, reassertion of urban and heavy industry interests and landlords and rich peasants. Some of the assessments of Franda regarding the constituents of the Janata Party are controversial. For instance, his view that the Jan Sangh represents medium and small businessmen.

Wrong Emphasis: Franda feels that Charan Singh has the capacity to face these challenges, particularly by emphasizing a rural-oriented strategy. The author labours to show that Charan Singh is neither the representative of the rural rich nor the champion of Jats alone. Therefore he is neither a kulak nor a believer in caste. But, then, Charan Singh's budget has not attacked the industrialists, it is inflationary and goes against the urban middle class and urban and rural poor.

The seeming cession in the agricultural inputs will work against even the middle class peasant since the market is controlled by banias. Whatever concern there may be for the small peasant is evident only in the intention to consolidate land holdings for commercialization of agriculture.

The Janata Party's emphasis on rural development and the small farmer is in line with the World Bank's strategy initiated after 1973 by Robert S. McNamara, the president, to achieve a fair deal for rural areas which will be beneficial to a metropolitan capital. Small is Politics does not mention this. The author takes it for granted.

Franda's claim that India has no scope for revolution will be contested by communists of all times and shades. He is correct in saying that the Janata Party's strategy and particularly that of Charan Singh will alienate the Muslims and Harijans and this only increases the possibility of a revolution.

—RAKESH GUPTA

Schizophrenia

MY TRUE FACES
by CHAMAN NAHAL
Vision Books
Pages: 235; Price: Rs 30

E. M. Forster, whose birth centenary falls this year, once commented that during the Raj, Britain sent to India more administrators; soldiers and money-makers than scholars and writers to understand and write about the life and culture of the Indian people. With his A Passage to India a new vista was opened up and many more serious attempts followed leading to a good bulk of English literature by Indian authors today.

But not many attempts are authentic and first-hand because a distant and detached view is bound to be different from that of one who is part of the milieu. Of the handful with a claim to intimate knowledge of India's middle class life today, Chaman Nahal is undoubtedly one. That he has the capacity to offer what can be termed as original material has already received recognition in the form of an award from the Sahitya Kala Akademi.

The dichotomy of the educated Indian's life is the central theme of Nahal's new novel, My True Faces. It is the story of diverse pulls that appear in the individual as well as collective life as a result of different value-scales and attitudes.

The main characters are Kamal Kant, a university teacher who is brought up in a tradition-bound middle class family and his wife Malti who has a western bent of mind. Around their lives is woven a chain of events which leads to a clash between the orthodoxy of one and modernity of the other and a separation between them appears inevitable.

Graphic: The tensions Kamal experiences and a few finely etched cameos are the highlights of My True Faces. For instance, his deep attachment for his dead grandmother is brought out vividly. During the moments of his deepest frustration he visits the peepal tree which to her was a source of courage and strength. Narrations of the busy railway platform and the city suburb and the view it offers of the far-off city skyline, are rendered with imagination.

But a few incongruities have crept in. How Malti's presence at her uncle's home for days together can be hushed up in spite of a report about her disappearance lodged with the police goes unexplained. Also, the hero refuses the siren, the Ghaziabad lady doctor but rushes to the red light district soon after. Again, is the lack of a western type of commode a factor forceful enough among others to lead to a conjugal rift?

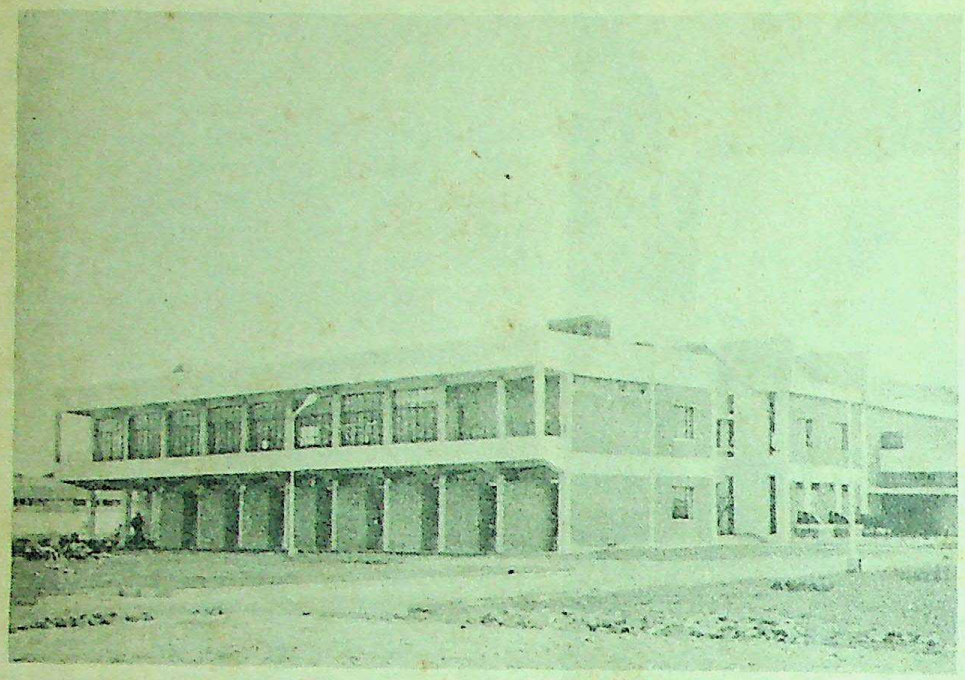
The author's attempt is nevertheless commendable both for its poignancy and appeal. A stamp of authenticity as opposed to a kind of window-dressing marks the work.

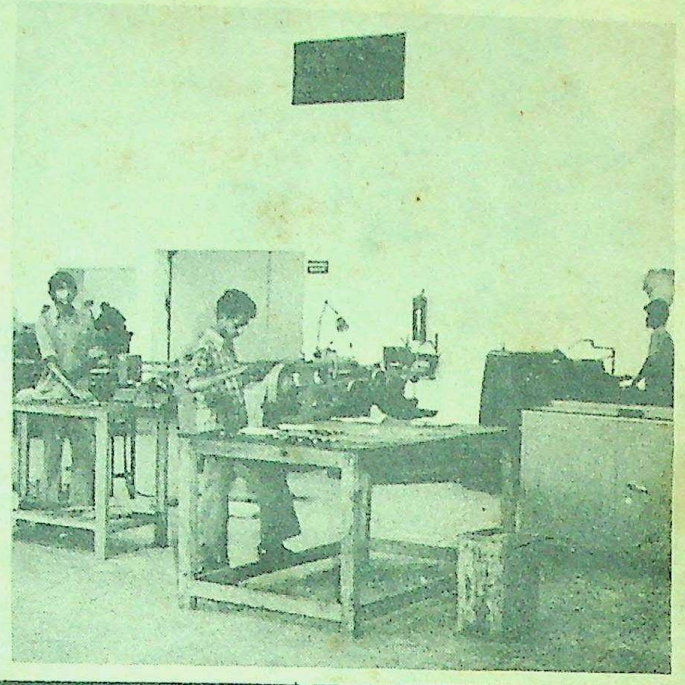
—AJIT KUMAR DUTTA

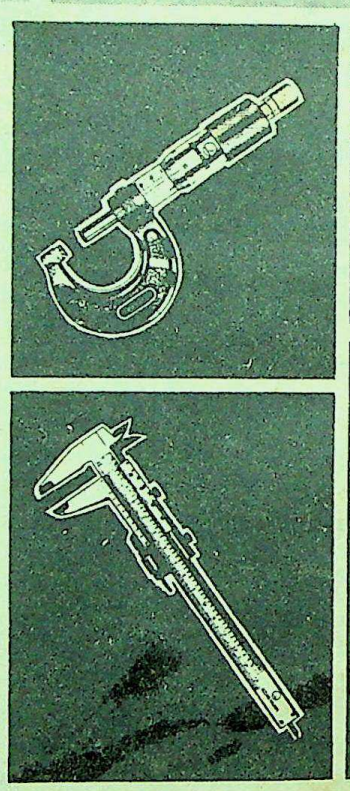
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Accumeasures. Matching the Best of Foreign Precision Instrument Makers.







Accumeasures Punjab Limited. Manufacturers of Precision Measuring Instruments. Micrometers. Vernier Calipers. Vernier Height Gauges. Screw Plug Gauges.

Accumeasures. A company like the best of the foreign precision measuring instruments manufacturing companies. An Indian company which matches the foreign companies in manufacturing technology, quality control, engineering and management staff.

Accumeasures. Good because it is backed by The P-E Consulting Group, of London, master consultants to international industrial giants. P-E are Accumeasures' consultants in manufacturing technology and installation.

P-E know their job. Thoroughly. They have built a powerful reputation. And they maintain that reputation. By backing only those that are worth backing—the best. Like Accumeasures.

Accumeasures. REACHING FOR PERFECTION.

Accumeasures PUNJAB LIMITED B-75, Phase VII, Mohali Industrial Area, District Ropar, Punjab 160051

national 36/79

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

JANUARY 1979 AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION Re-1

SUNDAY

The Guilty Men Behind the Rising Prices

RAJ NARAIN DECLARES INDEPENDENCE

national 36/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

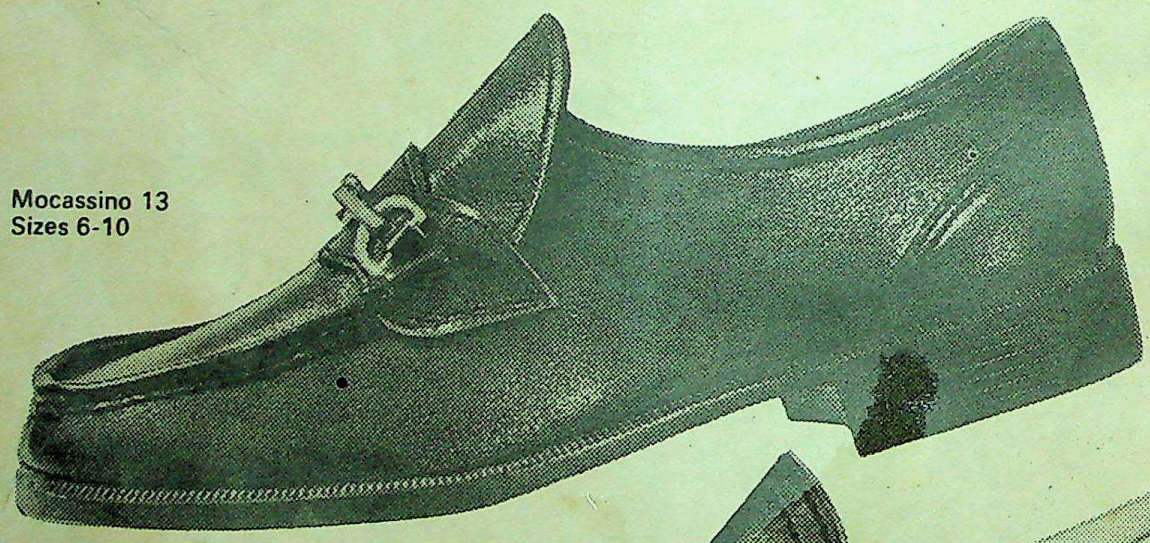
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

We've got comfort sewn up

Mocassino 32
Sizes 6-10

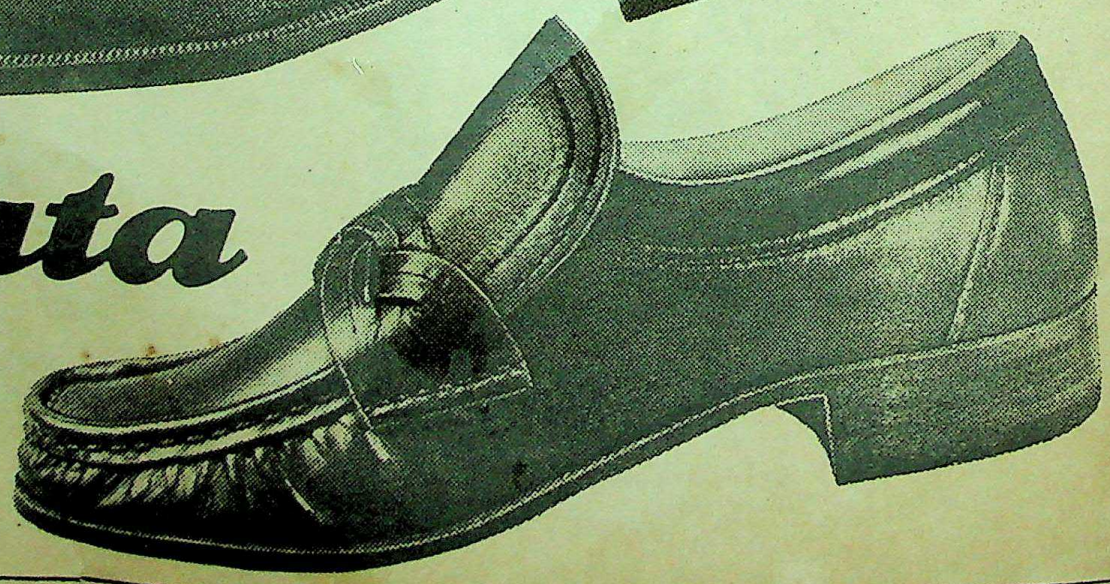
Bring us your feet and we'll wrap them in Bata Mocassins which are the last word in comfort with their high degree of flexibility, snug fit and glove finish. They're dressy too with metal trims and a waxy upper that adds gloss to your wardrobe.

Available both as a casual and lacing shoe. Give your feet the best chance—give them Bata Mocassins.



Mocassino 13
Sizes 6-10

Bata

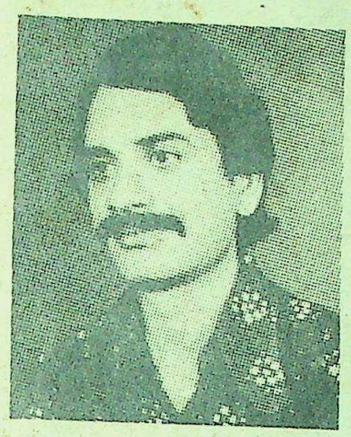


Debonair 47
Sizes 6-10

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Top Positions! Not Just Success!

Here is what IAS Toppers say



This is to acknowledge the help I have derived from your magazine in the course of my preparation for I.A.S. . . . . credit for this success of mine goes to Competition Success Review.

Hrusikesh Panda
I.A.S. TOPPER 1978

Extremely thankful to your magazine for my getting into I.A.S. this year. I, being a regular reader of Competition Success Review, found it very useful.

Syamal Kumar Sarkar
II POSITION IN I.A.S. 1978

To Win Top Positions In All Competitive Examinations, Read This Month And Every Month

competition success review

SINGLE COPY Rs. 3
ONE YEAR Rs. 28

NOW SELLING OVER 1,00,000 COPIES EVERY MONTH.

On the occasion of crossing sale of 1,00,000 copies, we offer SENSATIONAL DISCOUNT OF Rs.26 on 1 year subscription (Free Books worth Rs. 18 plus discount of Rs.8 on annual subscription).

FREE

BOOKS WORTH Rs. 18

to the subscribers of COMPETITION SUCCESS REVIEW — DIARY 1979-80-Rs.12, General Knowledge Today-Rs.6.

DISCOUNT COUPON

Please enrol me as subscriber for Competition Success Review at a concessional rate of Rs. 28 instead of regular news stand rate of Rs. 36. I have sent Rs. 28 by M.O. No_____ Date_____ to Competition Review Pvt. Ltd., 604, Prabhat Kiran, Rajendra Place, New Delhi-110 008.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

_____

_____

Kindly add Rs.2 for despatch of Free Books by Recorded Delivery.

Valid Until July 30, 1979

Available at all leading news stalls or from

COMPETITION REVIEW PVT. LTD.

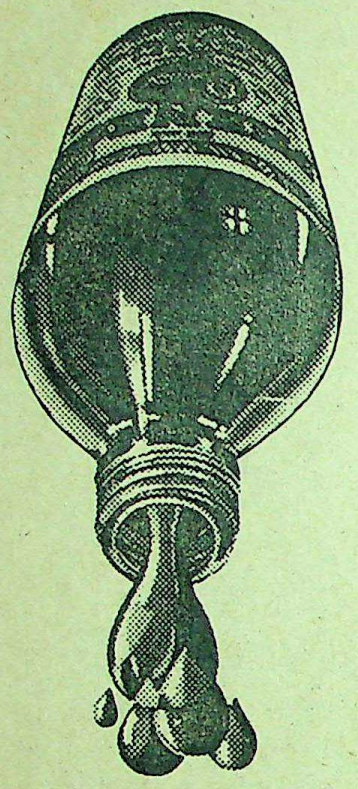
604, Prabhat Kiran, Rajendra Place, New Delhi-110 008. Ph : 582398

TRENDS

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A few drops a day



keep the germs away!

Bengal Chemical's
LAMP BRAND
PHENEOL

- Concentrated disinfectant : a few drops (enough to turn a bucketful of water white) kill millions of germs. Maximum results at a minimum expense !
- Strong odour repels cockroaches, flies, ants and similar household pests. Also counters offensive smells !
- Ideal for use in homes, hospitals, clinics, public utilities, offices, factories and other industrial establishments.
- Available in 450 ml. bottle and new,presentable 5 litre tin.

Bengal Chemical's PHENEOL the concentrated disinfectant that has stood the test of time.

ASP/BC-1/78 A

BENGAL CHEMICAL & PHARMACEUTICAL WORKS LD.
(Management under Government of India)

ADMISSION NOTICE
FOR BOYS & GIRLS

APPLICATIONS ARE INVITED FOR ADMISSION TO THE FOLLOWING CORRESPONDENCE COURSES

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA & INDIAN UNION STATES RECOGNIZED ENGINEERING DEGREES & DIPLOMAS

A.M.I.E. (1), A.M.I.E.T.E. (1), A.M.Ae. S.I. (1), A.M.I.I. Chem. E. (1), A.M.I.I.M.E. (1), I.E.R.E. (U.K.), A.M.E., etc.

(All the above courses are recognised by the Government of India and all Indian Union States as equivalent to B.E. or B. Tech Degree) in Civil, Electrical, Mechanical, Chemical, Metallurgical, Mining, Electronics & Communication Engineering, Metal Engineering, Aeronautical Engineering, Electronics & Radio Engineering, Marine Engineering, Production Engineering, Naval Architect, Automobile, Radio & TV., Agriculture Engineering, Refrigeration & Airconditioning Engineering, Draughtsmanship : (Civil & Mechanical Engineering and many other Diploma Courses)

ADMISSION QUALIFICATION :
S.S.C., or H.S.C.,or P.U.C.,or Inter of B. Sc., or ANY GRADUATE with any Subjects.

1. GOVERNMENT OF INDIA & INDIAN UNION STATES RECOGNIZED COURSE
   I.C.W.A. Cost & Works Accountant
2. C.A. : Chartered Accountancy
3. Graduateship : A.M.I.B.M. (India) Part A & B in Business Management
4. Government of India : Company Secretaries Examinations
5. Diploma : A.I.B.M. (India) in Business Management
6. Chartered Secretaries (London)
7. City & Guilds of London Institute—Diploma Course in Industrial Organization, Management Planning – Estimating & Costing Engineering.

ADMISSION QUALIFICATION :
S.S.C., or H.S.C.,or P.U.C.,or Inter of B. Sc., or ANY GRADUATE with any Subjects.

Remember, experience and facilities are most important in your choice of a Correspondence College/ Institute. The International College of Correspondence (Regd.) is India's leading and most experienced institute with thousands of Indian and foreign students on its rolls.

NOTE : ONLY CORRESPONDENCE COURSES (POSTAL TRAINING) OFFERED FOR ALL ABOVE COURSES FOR EMPLOYED & UNEMPLOYED PERSONS.

FOR DETAILED PROSPECTUS & ADMISSION FORM PLEASE SEND Rs. 6/- (SIX) BY MONEY ORDER TO THE PRINCIPAL :—

INTERNATIONAL COLLEGE OF CORRESPONDENCE (REGD.)
Kothi No. 17, South Patel Nagar, (Main Patel Road)
(Post Box No. 6045, NEW DELHI-110008 (INDIA)

Dentists say
Regular brushing of teeth and massaging of gums check gum troubles and tooth decay

Use Forhan's Double-Action Toothbrush Specially designed to massage your gums while brushing your teeth

Firm blue bristles clean your teeth

Gentle white bristles massage your gums

Learn the Forhan's way of brushing teeth and massaging gums. Write for a FREE colourful booklet on care of teeth and gums to Forhan's Dental Advisory Bureau, Dept. No. B 22-185, Post Bag 11463, Bombay 400 020. Mention language.

Forhan's
Double-Action Toothbrush —a perfect companion to Forhan's, the toothpaste created by a dentist.

194 F-1

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Everybody needs Eveready when it's dark

Eveready.
It's like having an extra pair of eyes in the dark

27 torches. Each one designed to match a particular need, suit a particular budget. Colourful little torches to fit a lady's handbag. Slim torches with pen clips to make for easy carrying in a shir or jacket pocket. Heavy duty brass torches for a lifetime of service. Light aluminium torches that combine good looks with economy. And many more.

The Eveready range has something for everybody. Including you.

OBM-6071C/2

EVEREADY
The only guarantee you'll ever need.

UNION CARBIDE

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Match your mood with

SIRSILK

Get into a happy mood. Dress well. Steal the show. Conquer ...

Count on Sirsilk fabrics. To add a new dimension to your personality ...

Checks. Stripes. Printed. Plain. Sirsilk offers you a wide wild range. In an infinite variety of textures, weaves and colours.

SIRSILK
Suitings, shirtings & dress materials.

SELLING AGENTS : ● TULSIDAS KANORIA & CO., 2-4, Hindustan Building, 1st floor, Jambulwadi, Kalbadevi Road, Bombay ● ASHWINIKUMAR & CO., 5,Fancy Lane, 6th Floor, Calcutta ● HINDUSTAN DEALERS LTD., 4, Stringer Street, Madras ● KEJRIWAL TRADING CORPN., Vishambhar House, 3rd floor, 25/32A, Karachi Khana, Kanpur ● CALCUTTA MERCHANTS & AGENTS P. LTD., Kandulwari Street Vijayawada ● OMEGA INDUSTRIAL CORPORATION 2nd floor, 24, Dharamsingh Market, Amritsar ● MODERN DEALERS P. LTD., Kempagowda Road, Bangalore ● DAGA BROS., 353, Mani Mahal, Kalbadevi Road, Bombay ● ORIENTAL ENTERPRISES & AGENCIES, India Machinery Building, 2nd floor, Exhibition Road, Patna ● RATHI & CO., Mitrakunj, 81A, Central Avenue Road, Nagpur ● HARISH & CO., Mehta Market, Jodhpur ● BOMBAY TRADING CO. P. LTD., Katra Asharfi, Chandni Chowk, Delhi ● RUNGTA & CO., Pathergatty, Hyderabad ● S. NAHATA & BROS., 2nd floor, Babu Bazar, Gauhati Assam ● LATH TEXTILE DISTRIBUTORS & INDUSTRIAL CORPN., Gole Bazar, Sambalpur, Orissa

RETAIL COUNTERS: ● SRI LAXMI TRADING CO., Unity House, Abid Road, Hyderabad ● MANULAL BHAGMAL JAIN, Loha Bazar, Bhopal ● MADHUSUDAN CUT-PIECE STORES, Goenka Bhawan, Tilka Chowk, Wardha ● AGARWALS, 1st floor, Public Utility Bldg., M. G. Road, Bangalore ● NAVRANG, Kamala Chambers, Post Office Road, Nagpur ● APSARA, Opp. Hathwa Market, Bari Path, Patna ● KISHANLAL GHANSHYAMDAS, Prakash Bazar, Tinsukia

ASP/SS/795

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A month with Super Swish Silver

See! You've got through just over half the pack

Super Swish Silver is hardened by a special process . . . Hardex 7 to give you extra-long shaving life. What's the guarantee? Look at the Super Swish Silver dispenser. It bears two great seals of quality . . . the ISI mark and the Centron Mark. That's what your guarantee is.

Super Swish® SILVER

no other blade lasts as long

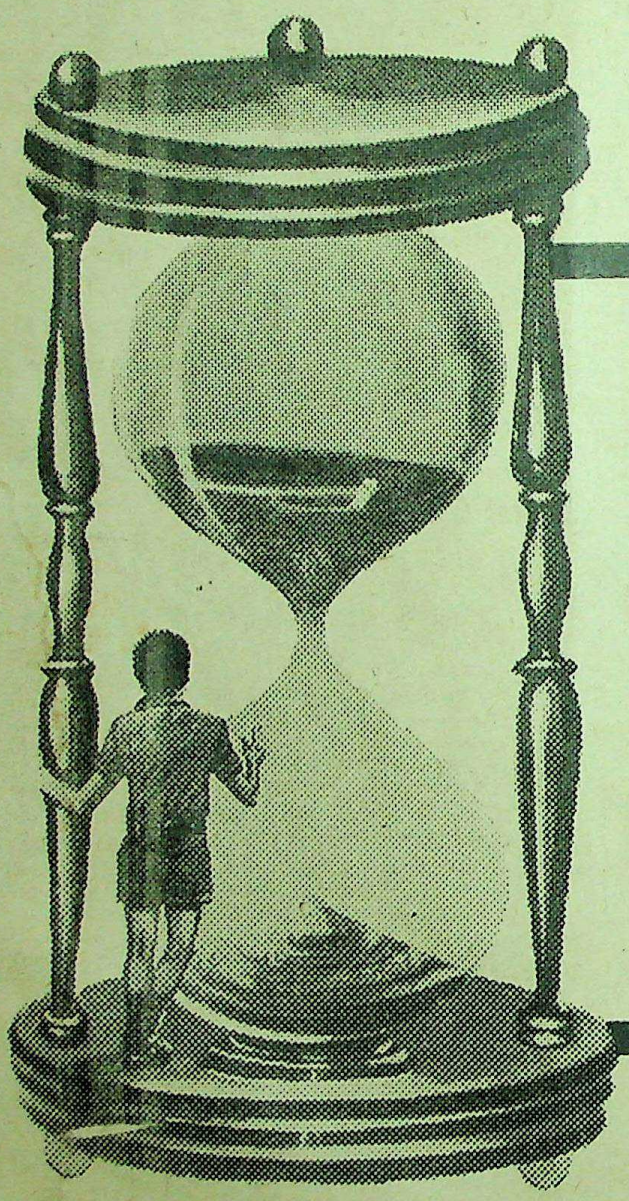
SSS/79

✳ Centron Industrial Alliance Ltd.–Towards a Zero-Defect technology

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Time Slips Like Sand Particles in An Hour-Glass



Tomorrow comes sooner these days and your needs keep growing too. Provide for those additional, ever-growing expenditures the easy and effortless way.

Open a Recurring Deposit Account with PNB today. A sum of Rs. 100/- deposited every month for 63 months become Rs. 8061.00 at the time of maturity. Deposits accepted in multiples of Rs. 5/-.

Don't Wait... Open a RECURRING DEPOSIT ACCOUNT today with PNB

For further details please contact our nearest branch

punjab national bank

(A Government of India Undertaking)

...the name you can BANK upon!

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNDAY VOLUME 7
ISSUE 7
RUPEE ONE
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

July 8, 1979

The country is heading for a first rate economic crisis with an annual 29 per cent inflation rate staring it in the face. The blame for this must lie on the shoulders of an inept and sectarian Finance Minister and his inefficient Cabinet colleagues running the other economic Ministries. With the Janata disintegrating, it is everyone for himself and the devil take the poor, says KEWAL VARMA.

Kalpana, three times winner of the Karnataka Government's best actress award, died on May 11, 1979 in mysterious circumstances. While her family has suspected foul play, the police reports stated that she had committed suicide by taking sleeping pills. Others are confused after seeing her diamond ring sans the stone, wondering if she had swallowed it. RIMA KASHYAP investigates.

Did you know that Goa, now a heady seaside health resort, was once the battleground of a secret spy war ? About four decades ago the German Consul in the neutral Portuguese colony, discovered to be a spy, was kidnapped with his wife, forced to reveal secrets and killed. Shortly afterwards, a party of wartime British veterans from Calcutta was assembled, and sent to Goa on another secret mission — to destroy four German and Italian spy ships in the Goan harbour. MARIO CABRAL e SA recreates the suspense, horror and excitement of those stormy days.

COMMENT

Opinion 10

COVER STORY

The guilty men behind the price rise|Kewal Varma 12

SUNDAY SPECIAL

Goa's secret war|Mario Cabral e Sa 42

INVESTIGATION

Sins of a son|A. K. Chakravorty and Udayan Sharma 28
The mystery of the twinkling star|Rima Kashyap 32

CONVERSATION

Mishra case : the other side|Arun Ranjan 36

NEWS

Raj Narain declares independence|Udayan Sharma 20
Impact of Urs|Ajoy Bose
Sanjay's modesty|Shubhabrata Bhattacharya
The curious case of the stolen buffalo|S. P. Premi
Sheared future|J. M. Menezes
Funny Money|Mario Cabral e Sa

SPORTS

The World Cup in pictures 48

CINEMA

Khaas Baat 50

VARIETY

Comic strip : Peanuts 52
Sundayweek 53
Chess|Bridge|Stamps|Quiz 55
This India 57
India Abroad 57
Humour in real life 57
Without comment 57

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Comics : Asterix 30
The World : The Pope goes home|John Pilger
Delhi Diary|D. E. Nizamuddin 58

Cover transparency of Charan Singh by Raghu Rai.

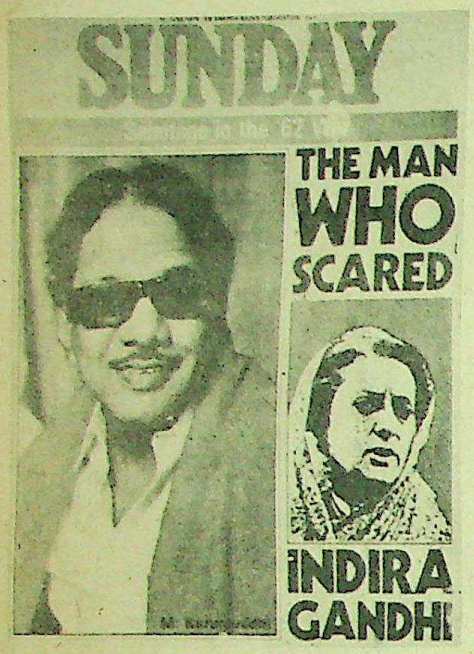
Editor M. J. Akbar

Assistant Editor Subir Roy Editorial Staff Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, Nirmal Mitra, David McMahon, Saumitra Banerjee, Tirthankar Ghosh, S. N. M. Abdi Delhi Correspondent Ajoy Bose
Art Director Bipul Guha Asst Art Director Amiya Bhattacharya

Published from 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001 and printed at Ananda Offset Private Ltd., P-248, C.I.T. Scheme No. VI-M, Calcutta 700054 by Bhagabati Roy for Ananda Bazar Patrika Limited.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Better late

MRS GANDHI's ouster from Parliament, the breakaway of her once-staunch supporter, Devaraj Urs, and MGR's betrayal of her over Thanjavur, are eye-openers enough for Mrs Gandhi to realise it is time for her to quit politics. Her persistent political manoeuvring only proves the adage : "A woman's greed knows no bounds".
M. Dhanapalan, Rourkela.

NOT only did Kalaignar Karunanidhi learn his political craft at Periyar EVR's feet ("He learnt his craft at E. V. Ramasamy Naicker's feet", June 10) but so too almost every other politician in Tamil Nadu, for which reason Tamil Nadu politics has been relatively unaffected by national events. The photograph of the late Chief Minister Arignar Annadurai pointing to Anbil Dharmalingam, the DMK candidate for the Thanjavur byelection, with Kalaignar Karunanidhi was a pleasant surprise.
V. A. Poonkodi Selvan, Thiruvaiyaru.

THE Madras astrologer P. T. Sundaram ("Yes and No", June 10) says : "She (Mrs Gandhi) certainly would have won in Thanjavur but her victory would have created fresh problems for her". This ambiguous statement appears ridiculous without any supporting astrological facts. It is a pity that Prof Sundaram has not noticed the sixth house of the native, a guiding factor which clearly indicates Mrs Gandhi's inability to contest the byelection. Further, how can Saturn, being the Lord of Justice, allow the native to escape the verdict of law during his own period?
M. Bhasker Rao, Lucknow.

NOT Karunanidhi ("Hush-hush meetings in Delhi", June 10) but the Urs-MGR combine defeated Mrs Gandhi. You have given undue prominence to Mr Karunanidhi, in explaining why Mrs Gandhi backed out. Mr Karunanidhi now depends on agitations to keep up his popularity. In his interview ("I am glad I defeated her") he complains that MGR had denied permission to set up a statue of EVR near the Sankaracharya's math in Kanchipuram. This was for good reasons. Had a statue of EVR been erected there, it would definitely have offended the Hindus and provoked a conflict between the Hindus and atheist followers of EVR.
Ramanathan M. S., Tiruninravur.

I WOULD have liked Mr Karunanidhi to speak about the terror that was let loose on the staff of CMC Hospital, Vellore and the kind of punishment that was awarded to agitating graduate teachers during his rule. Mr Karunanidhi's political wisdom would never have been doubted had he resigned as soon as the Emergency was declared. But he stayed put until he was finally unseated by Mrs Gandhi. What is Mr Karunanidhi's reply to the charges brought forward by C.G.K. Reddy about the misuse of power during the Emergency ?
S. A. Alagarasamy, Madras.

MR M. KARUNANIDHI's accusation of corruption against MGR ("What I was fighting for in Thanjavur", June 10) is not simply a case of the pot calling the kettle black, but a pot covered with layers of soot, calling the kettle black. It is common knowledge that during Mr Karunanidhi's tenure as Chief Minister, corruption was systematised. One could get admitted to a medical or engineering college by paying a fixed bribe. MGR may be a nautanki, but he is now Chief Minister, just as a grocer's daughter is now Prime Minister of Britain; to refer to them with such names is in poor taste.
A.R.R. Narayanan, Rourkela.

KARUNANIDHI did nothing to better the lot of farmers during his tenure. He raised the price of electricity from nine paise to 16 paise per unit. He was also responsible for the rise in rice smuggling and the scarcity of rice in Tamil Nadu. MGR, on the other hand, has been trying hard to assuage the hardship of farmers, and done fairly well.
K. Elanthirayan, Madras.

Fascist 'culture'

"THE ambitions of the RSS" (June 10) by Madhu Limaye is an eye-opener. Mr Limaye has left no stone unturned to expose the shameful role of the RSS, which in recent years has emerged as a threat to national integration and development. Under the garb of nationalism and cultural awareness, it is playing a dubious role. It should mend its ways and act as a liberal cultural organisation without dabbling in fascist politics.
Soubhagyabanta Maharana, Bolangir.

ACCORDING to Mr Limaye, the RSS is drawing inspiration from the Nixon-Kissinger-Brzezinski-Carter line. He also states that the RSS wants friendship with China because America supports China. This is not denied. But when the USA 'tilted' towards Pakistan during the 1971 Indo-Pak conflict, did the RSS support Pakistan? He also claims the RSS used Subramaniam Swamy to denigrate Janata leaders. Considering Mr Swamy's attacks against Mr Vajpayee, this would mean the RSS is unhappy with the latter. But Mr Limaye contradicts himself by stating that any criticism of Mr Vajpayee, no matter how mild, is resented by the RSS.
Sudhendu Ranjan Pandey, Bhagalpur.

THE picture showing the RSS chief Balasaheb Deoras as a woman rocking a baby (Morarji Desai) in her arms ("Mother India ?", May 20) is not, as you would have us believe, the handiwork of the RSS. The picture was made by an ardent socialite who had attended the All-India Angrezi Hatao Sammelan at Nagpur. The artist had shown the picture to "Netaji" (Raj Narain) while he was addressing a Press conference. Besides, how a picture showing Deoras as a woman would gladden members of the RSS, eludes me.
A. K. Sharma, Nagpur.

Bank on husbands

MISS S. CHATTOPADHYAYA's letter (Opinion, June 10) reminded me of my own experience with a similar private bank, with its headquarters in Delhi. After taking all the trouble to go for the interview, it was disappointing to see that the interviewer had no intention of giving me a job at all. He asked me as to why I needed a job at all when my husband was earning enough to feed me and my child. If they are of the view that girls with earning husbands have no right to seek jobs, why was this not made clear in the advertisement itself ? Another friend of mine who suffered the same fate at an interview for a bank officer's job in Bangalore was asked why she was so greedy for more money when her husband was a bank officer himself. It is high time women resisted such humiliation.
R. Devi, Bombay

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

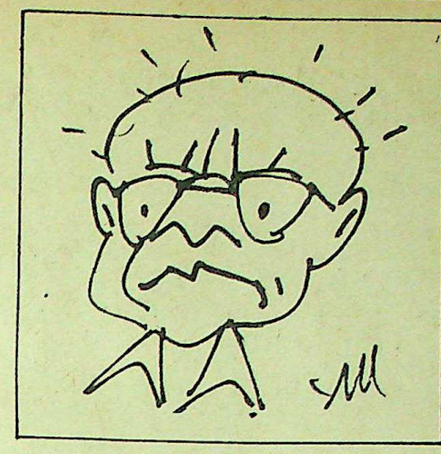
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Naughty baby

M. O. MATHAI's "Nobel words" (Opinion, June 10) was amusing enough to be included in "Humour in real life". Rajiv Gandhi, apparently a very docile and non-committal person, was either asking for some reaction from Mathai, which goes to credit his sense of humour, or was just being plain honest and dumb in the interview ("Rajiv Gandhi answers", May 13), which reflects, as Mathai so bluntly put it, the size of the brain his head contains. In any case, Mathai was provoked.

Now, this does not speak much of the "goodwill that he still retains towards Rajiv", nor does it prove his statements about Rajiv in his book to be true. On the contrary, it destroys the credibility of his story. Maybe Mathai hoped to get away with certain allegations concerning Rajiv in his book, not realising that Rajiv was no more a cry baby and had something to say for himself. Mr Mathai, one can be sure, was not one bit amused. He was insulted.

Mitali Gupta, Secunderabad



M. O. MATHAI says in his letter that even for an adult, memory is in direct proportion to the size of the brain. Any neuro-surgeon will tell you that this is utter nonsense, that no person, however brainy, is likely to retain for long, events of a routine and inconsequential nature. But then, writing nonsense has become a prerogative of Mr Mathai.

R. Ravichandran, Madras

Rank incompetence

IT IS shameful that responsible high-ranking officers in the Indian Army on whom depends the security of this country, lack competence and integrity and do not hesitate to bring disaster to their country in exchange for wine, women and wealth. The extract "Sabotage in the 1962 war" by Lt Col J. R. Saigal (retd) (June 10) should serve as an eyeopener to everyone in service, and every citizen of India. The examples of sabotage cited in the extract should be inquired into by the Government, and the Armed Forces' administration should be cleansed. Admittedly, excessive political interference in the army makes it ineffective and irksome, but it should not be immune from a system of checks and balances.

Jasvinder Singh, New Delhi.

LT COL SAIGAL's historical narrative, if it can be so called, is an incoherent compound of personal attacks on commanders, senior and junior officers and even NCOs. As a former gunner, he takes devilish glee in swivelling his gun on all except himself. How the amorous acts of military intelligence officers, or their love for booze, can be the subject matter of the NEFA debacle is beyond our comprehension.

Jahan Das and Kartick Chandra Das, Calcutta.

First languag

NEELAKANT PATRI's article "North Eastern States take up the cudgels" (May 6) helps to focus attention on the indispensability of English as an essential language in India. English besides being the mother tongue of several thousand Indians, is also the de facto official and academic language. Again, English is almost the mother tongue of those living in the North Eastern States, who are confronted with a choice between a number of undeveloped dialects and English. We should accord English its legitimate status.

C. O. Sadasivan, Trivandrum

IF AFTER so many years of Independence, a few tribal groups do not learn a language recognised in the Constitution, it certainly isn't the fault of the Government. I am not aware of the number of years Mr Patri has spent in the North Eastern States, but as one who has lived here for four decades, I can say that notwithstanding English becoming the "official language", it is used only by the elite and not by the masses.

B. K. Mandal, Bongaigaon

THE attitude of the West Bengal Government towards English is fast becoming an enigma. On May 9, 1977, I attended the Rabindra Purashkar awards ceremony. The gathering was addressed by, among others, Mr Jyoti Basu and Prof Sambhu Ghosh. While Mr Basu explained the need for the introduction of Bengali at all levels, with which I agree, Prof Ghosh expressed his unhappiness at the fact that Bengalis very often use English while talking. Yet, he praised the attempts of a foreigner, Dr Dusan Zbavitel, to master the language of Tagore and Nazrul. I fail to understand his logic. If we praise a foreigner for learning our language, we must also praise a Bengali for learning a foreign language.

Rathindranath Chattopadhyay, Calcutta.

Illustration /Ahi Bhusan Malik

Generally absurd

LT GEN GILL has achieved the impossible ("Are Generals above the law?", May 20). At least over his misdemeanour, the Government, the Opposition, and the Fourth Estate are of one mind — a rare thing to come by! All of them are ardent champions of freedom of expression, and yet believe members of the Armed Forces should not express their views. But why? Political standpoint and activism are not one and the same thing. Ajoy Bose has quoted regulations which were framed in the colonial past. We do not hesitate to amend our Constitution, but why such Bourbonism only for the Armed Forces? We have gurus advocating free sex, journalists extolling the virtues of instant gratification, luminaries preaching urine therapy; but when a cranky brasshat makes a stupid comment, why the dickens can't it be ignored?

Mr Bhupesh Gupta should not be unaware that in the USSR Party membership is encouraged in the Forces (which are, albeit sectarian, politicised all the same). Yet when he goes into tantrums over an inconsequential utterance from a person who is intellectually even more inconsequential, surely he does not show his professed concern for fundamental human rights! Neither does the Government, nor does Ajoy Bose.

Brig Gopal Bose (retd.), Madhupur.

A stinker

IF RAJNEESH finds the culture of Pune stifling ("Pune stinks", June 10) he is welcome to quit the city. He is a hypocrite who professes the anti-culture of degeneration in the name of spiritualism to unassuming westerners, but has failed to impress the local population. The hypocrite in him stands exposed when he persists in his harangues against the heritage of the country on its very soil. Only the refined cultural ancestry of the city, and the country, prevents people from throwing dropouts like him out of India.

P. G. Vijairaghavan and K. Krishnan, Pune.

Religious killing

THANKS to Associated Press for the exclusive photographs of executions in Iran ("Iran executes", June 10) under the regime of the religious leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, who was called the "JP of Iran". As far as I know, our JP is neither a religious leader nor a killer. It will be several generations before the Ayatollah achieves the eminence and nobility of our JP, simply because a person who presides over a wave of senseless executions fulfils no role of a religious leader.

Amrit Lall, 24 Parganas.

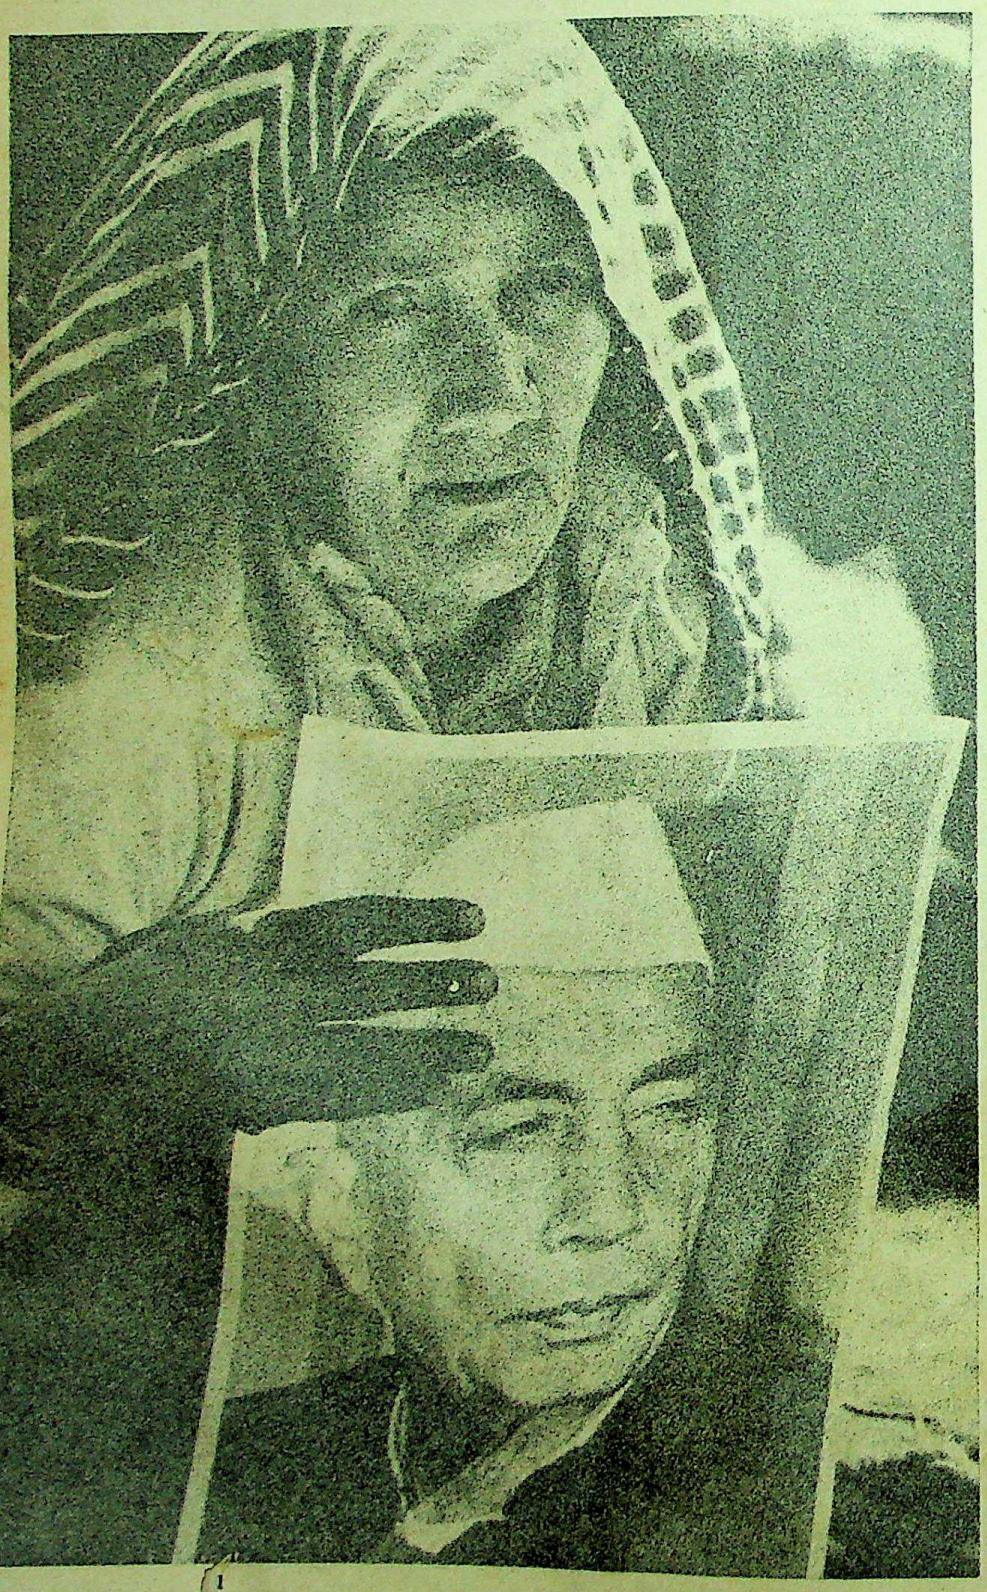
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Guilty Men Behind the Rising Prices

To start with, Finance Minister Charan Singh must go

By KEWAL VARMA



Raghu Rai

THE country is beginning to pay the price. Two years of total mismanagement and reckless economic policies have brought the day of reckoning for the Janata Party very near. The dry powder of an economic crisis has been accumulating for quite some time. But it has been left to Chaudhury Charan Singh to ignite the powder with his archaic, parochial "Baghpet" economic philosophy. In the last four months during which he has been the country's Finance Minister, the annual rate of inflation has been 29 per cent. The official wholesale price index increased from 183 on February 10 to 200.6 on June 9: a 9.6 per cent increase in four months. During the corresponding period last year, the index increased by merely 1.2 per cent, from 181.4 to 184.6, proving that the current price increase is not seasonal. Nor is it just a coincidence that the present inflationary bout started within two weeks of Charan Singh becoming the Finance Minister. If the present trend is not tempered, Charan Singh will have gifted to the country a record inflation. What is worse is that it is a pure and simple man-made inflation.

The main cause of the present inflation is that too much money is chasing too few goods and the excessive expansion in money supply has been caused by huge budgetary deficits. In the first two years of Janata rule, the total budgetary deficits added up to Rs 2,525 crores (This does not include the Rs 555 crores of accumulated deficits by the States.) In the current financial year of Chaudhury Charan Singh's regime, measures taken by the Central and State Governments so far have created a built-in budgetary deficit of over Rs 2,500 crores. This consists of about Rs 1,370 crores of uncovered gap in the Central budget and Rs 700 crores due to increase in prices of imported crude and petroleum products and various wage increases granted so far. In addition to this yawning budgetary deficit, the total market borrowings of the Central Government are planned to increase by Rs 200 crores this year. Unless credit to the private sector is further cut, the increased market borrowings are invariably financed by created money.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

In fairness to the Janata, it must be said that it inherited a highly mismanaged monetary economics from the previous Indira regime. Mrs Gandhi's 1975 anti-inflationary package, though draconian and highly iniquitous, did restore equilibrium and order in the economy. The oil shock was also absorbed. In itself, it was a great economic feat, with few parallels in the non-socialist, non-oil-producing world. But then came the Emergency and with it the emergence of Sanjay. He laid down the outlines of the 1976 budget, which was the most irresponsible budget in the fiscal history of the country. Instead of mobilisation, there was in fact demobilisation of resources. The only mobilisation of resources undertaken in the Emergency year of 1976 was a futile search for hidden gold in a Jaipur fort.

As a result of the 'Sanjay budget' all the so-called economic gains of the Emergency were wiped out. The money supply expansion which was contained by the 1975 anti-inflation package, again started getting out of hand. It increased from 11.3 per cent in 1975-76 to 20.3 per cent in 1976-77. The Janata Government made only a half-hearted attempt to bring the situation under control. The rate of the money supply expansion in 1977-78 was about 17 per cent, and this went up to 18 per cent in 1978-79. If the current economic policies continue, the money supply expansion in the current year could be about 25 per cent. In the mean time, the accumulated heat of uninterrupted excessive money supply expansion of the last three years has already started displaying its after-effects in the shape of 29 per cent annual rate of inflation.

But why have prices started rising only now when the money supply has been expanding for the last three years? The answer is simple; it has been given by the Janata Party President Chandrashekhar himself: "There is a crisis of confidence in the country". The Janata Government has lost its credibility. More than anything else, it has lost on the psychological front. As a result, an inflationary psychology has gripped the country. In economic terms, the inflationary psychology incerases the velocity of money i.e. the rate of circulation of money. Excessive expansion in money supply with accelerated circulation of money compounds its inflationary impact. Under the inflationary psychology everybody, the consumer, the trader and the manufacturer, tends to hoard, obviously, according to their respective capacities. This only accentuates artificial shortages and further stokes the fire of inflation.

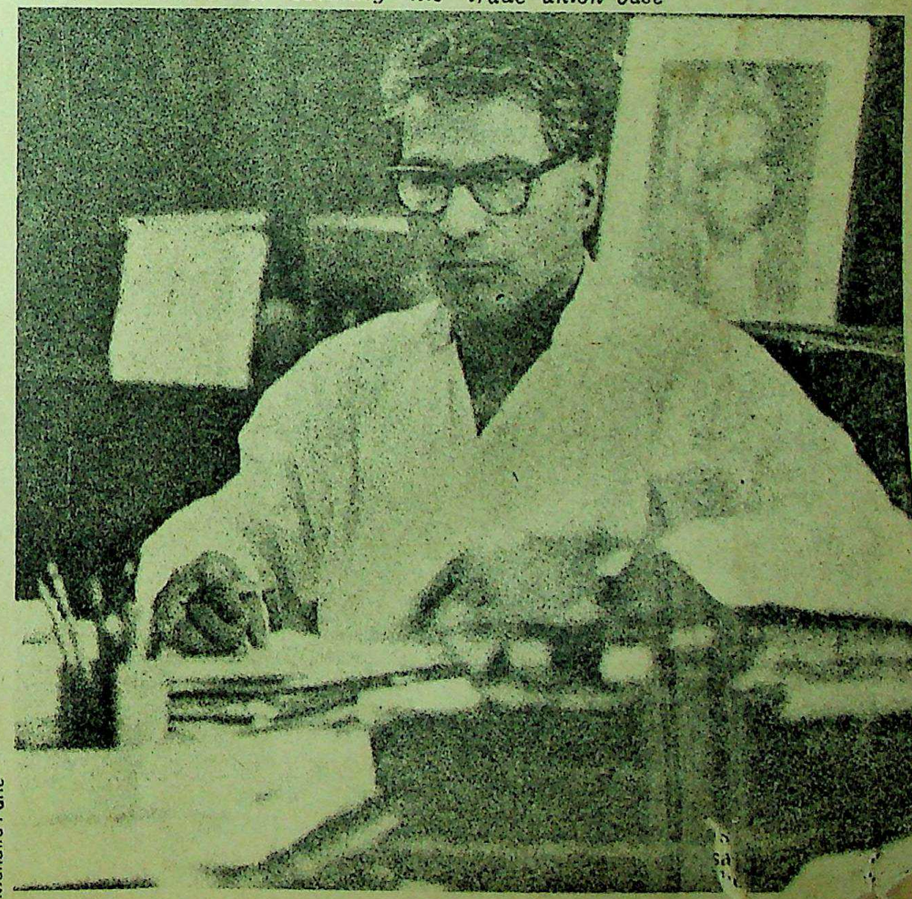
The man-made shortages are further compounded by a virtual total collapse of public sector management in the key economic sectors of railways, coal, power, ports and steel. Though all are under one Government, we witness the strange spectacle of one department blaming the other. The railways complain that they do not have sufficient coal and power, the coal people complain that they are being let down by the railways, and power stations complain that they are not getting coal and the railways are not doing their job. For the past nine months, a monitoring sub-committee of the Cabinet is supposed to be going into the problems of these sectors. Apart from asking various departments to put up notes, it has done pretty little. In the mean time, the vicious circle is becoming more and more vicious, holding the whole country to ransom.

> If the present course is not tempered Charan Singh will have gifted to the economy a record inflation of 30 per cent or more.

Railways

What's wrong with each of these sectors? Let's take them one by one. The railways carried 212.6 million tonnes of freight in 1976-77. In the first year of the Janata rule it came down to 210.8 million tonnes, and in the second year to 198.9 million tonnes. The beginning made in the third year indicates that there will be a further slump. How helpless the railways are cannot be better illustrated than by quoting the latest Press handout of the Ministry of Railways. It says : "Various factors, mostly beyond the control of the railways, affected rail operations resulting in loss of revenue-earning traffic during April, 1979, the first month of the current financial year. Mechanical breakdown in the Central India and Talcher coalfields, labour strikes in certain Bengal-Bihar collieries, shortage of power in the washeries affecting movement of raw coal to the steel plants, breakdown of reclaimers at Bacheli for about 10 days and accumulation of ore stocks at Vizag port restricting loading potential for movement of iron ore for export, and immobilisation of 2,000 wagons for more than a fortnight in the Jamshedpur area on account of disturbances, were some of the factors. Rail operation in the eastern sector remained interrupted on account of various agitations and wild-cat strikes by the railway staff. As a result of these factors, the railways moved only 15.21 million tonnes of the originating revenue-earning freight traffic during April, 1979,-as against 17.06 million tonnes moved during April, 1978. The approximate number of passengers booked in the month of April, 1979, was 256 millions, a drop of 46.64 millions compared to April, 1978. Both suburban and non-suburban traffic registered a drop, the former by 19.9 per cent and the latter by 10.5 per cent over the corresponding month of last year".

George Fernandes is securing his trade union base



Mandira Puri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Drop, drop, drop

Now, power. After West Bengal, it is Maharashtra's turn, and as a result, the country's two most industrialised States are afflicted with a power crisis. God forbid, but if the rains are inadequate, practically the whole country will become West Bengal and Maharashtra. Fears that 1979 will be a year of darkness in the event of a monsoon failure, are based on the performance of thermal power stations last year. The generation of electricity of thermal power stations in 1978-79 increased by only 2.8 per cent. The latest bulletin of the Central Electricity Authority admits : "The plant load factor of thermal stations, including nuclear, during 1978-79 declined to about 48.4 per cent from the 1977-78 level of 50.8 per cent". The maintenance and coal supplies to thermal stations have further deteriorated. As a result, there is no hope of reversing the downward trend in the performance of the thermal stations. In a way, the Janata has been very lucky. There have been good monsoons and, as a result, the generation of hydel power increased by 23.9 per cent in 1978-79. This covered the shortfalls in thermal stations. If luck does not favour the country this year, such an option will not be available. In the mean time, the Energy Ministry is trying to live through the crisis through bluffs. It claimed that a new generating capacity of 3022 MW has been added during 1978-79. But the Power Engineers' Association has challenged this claim. According to power engineers, not more than 1800 MW new capacity is ready for commissioning this year.

In coal, about Rs. 1,100 crores of new investment has been made in the last five years. This is in addition to Rs. 400 to Rs. 500 crores of accumulated losses in this period. But where has this additional investment gone? The production in the last three to four years has been hovering round 100 million tonnes. For the last three years, coal production targets have been revised downwards almost every six months.

In steel, there was absolute decline in production in all the integrated steel plants except Bokaro during 1978-79. If production did not fall in Bokaro, it was because it was commissioned last year and its production cannot but pick up gradually. In April last, it was decided to deliberately cut the steel production by eight per cent to build up coal stocks for the monsoon period. But in the last three months, despite the cut in steel production, coal stocks at steel plants increased by only 13,000 tonnes. Since coal movement inevitably slows down during the rainy season, it is feared that with the available coal stocks, the steel production will have to be cut drastically in the coming months. As regards ports, at one time as many as 120 ships were waiting on the high seas as they were not getting berths at ports.

Inefficient, inexperienced ministers

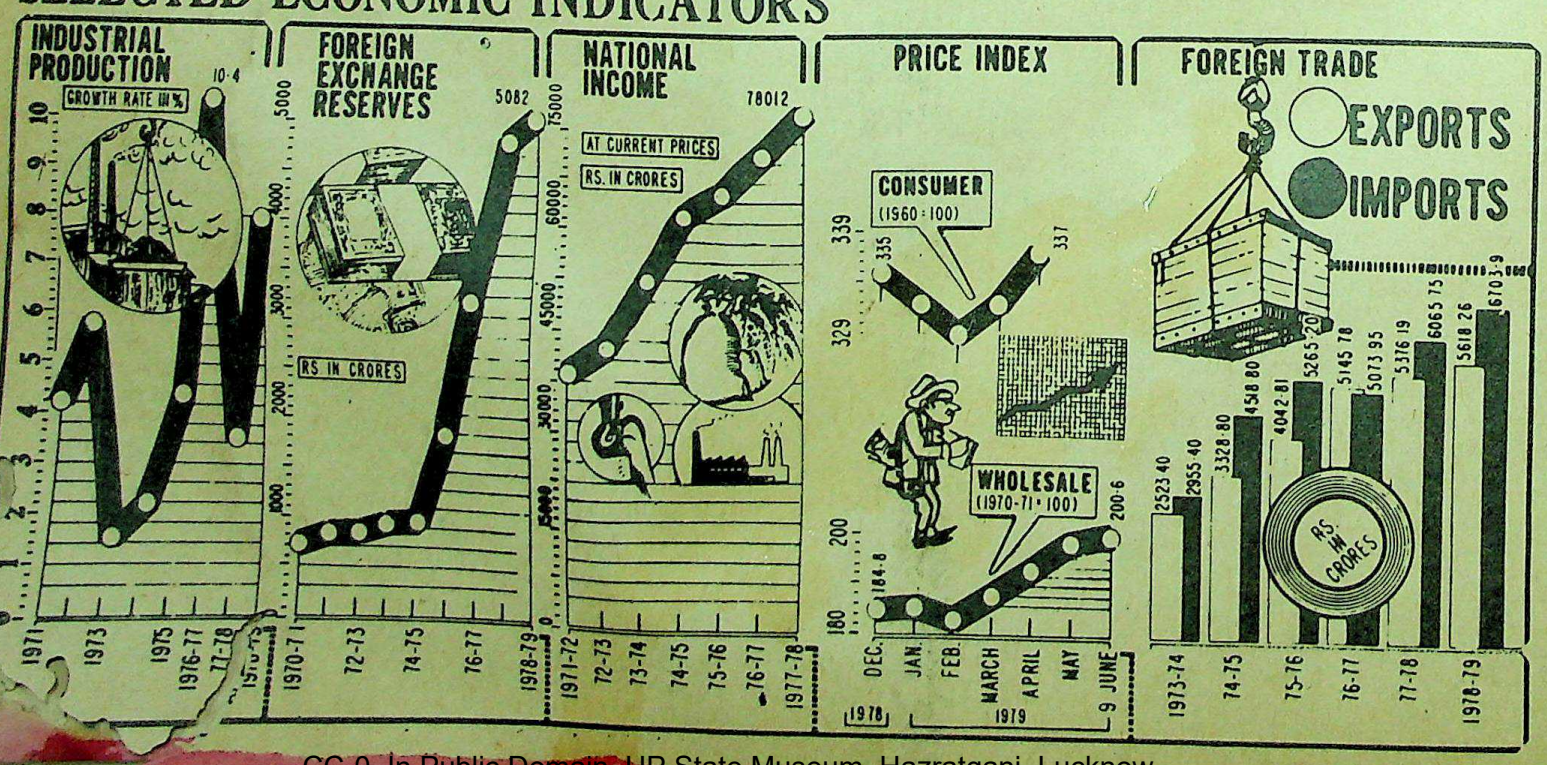
The collapse of the public sector infrastructure can be traced to the inefficiency and inexperience of Janata Ministers managing these departments. The only administrative experience the Energy Minister Ramachandran has is that of a housekeeper at Kamaraj's residence. It is said that he was very good in making coffee for Kamaraj's chosen friends. Before he became Minister at the Centre, Ramachandran did not even have the experience of managing a municipality. But in this world, blind loyalty to great men pays.

Now Madhu Dandavate is a goody goody soft socialist. He promises everything to everybody, and cannot say "no" to anybody. In the first flush of Janata's enthusiasm he got all those involved during the 1974 railway strike reinstated. A strict disciplinarian like Morarji Desai could not stop this; and this affected the morale of railway officers and bred further indiscipline. Gradually, Morarji became desperate. Like King Lear, his whole wrath came down on the innocents—in this case, the Railway Board chairman K. S. Rajan. When Dandavate demurred, Morarji told him : "Either you go or Rajan will go." Rajan went. This has further damaged the morale of railway officers.

Ravindra Varma was quite successful in labour management as long as the CPI(M) was playing ball with the Janata. But now the Marxists are becoming militant, adding to the headaches of Varma. And he has been stabbed in the back by some of his own colleagues, like George Fernandes, who have started instigating labour. As a result, Ravindra Varma's effectiveness as a Labour Minister has reduced considerably. In his helplessness, he can only tell his Cabinet colleagues : "Et tu, Brutus". And what can one say about Chand Ram. Coming from landlocked Haryana, he, perhaps, saw a ship for the first time after he became the Union Shipping Minister.

But of the Ministers of the economy, Biju Patnaik is the biggest disappointment. As Orissa Chief Minister, he had earned the reputation of being a good administrator, particularly in the sphere of economic development. But as Steel Minister, he has proved to be a bluffer and a braggart. It seems that he has no heart in the Steel Ministry; perhaps the Ministry is too small for his ego.

SELECTED ECONOMIC INDICATORS



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

However, perhaps more than the inefficiency and inexperience of individual Ministers, it is the collective incompatibility of the Janata coalition which is mucking up the economy. With the Janata withering away at a growing pace, each constituent and each top Minister is in a great hurry and has become desperate to consolidate his mass base. If the Janata breaks up, which it will, George Fernandes, for instance, will have to fall back on trade unions to survive politically. The Jana Sangh depends on traders, and Charan Singh on kulaks. In fact, this free-for-all game was started in its worst form by Chaudhury Charan Singh when he became the Finance Minister and, of course, the Deputy Prime Minister also. In his budget, he offered windfall gains to kulaks at the cost of urban people. Against all economic rationale and advice of the Planning Commission, he abolished all duties on fertilisers, power tillers and PVC pipes for irrigation, and reduced duties on diesel for pump sets.

Subsequent to the budget, Charan Singh most skilfully used the credit instruments and his authority over other economic Ministries to transfer gains to his rich farmer constituents. Charan Singh comes from the heartland of the sugar-growing districts of western UP. He seems to have entered into an unwritten understanding with sugar magnates that he would enable them to earn massive profits provided they paid high prices to growers. Thus, when he became the Finance Minister, the wholesale price index of sugar, khandsari and gur was 130; now it has crossed 190. All in four months. The sugar industry was given most liberal bank credits. This created the holding capacity in the industry. Simultaneously, the sugar syndicate, despite massive production, regulated the sugar supplies in such a manner as led to the rigging of the retail sugar prices. When the sugar syndicate was manipulating the prices, the Government became a passive spectator. In fact, Bhanu Pratap Singh, a dyed-in-the-wool kulak and Chaudhury protege, proved too smart for his senior, Sardar Surjit Singh Barnala, and for all practical purposes controls the Food Ministry which is in charge of the sugar department. It is only now that the Government has taken over the monthly releases of sugar. But the sugar syndicate still wields considerable influence over the sugar controller's office.

As in the case of sugar, the wholesale price index of edible oils in the last four months increased from 149 to 172. First, in his budget, Charan Singh announced a basic customs duty of 12.5 per cent on imported palm oil, rapeseed oil, soyabean oil, sunflower oil and palmolive oil. This set in motion a price rise in edible oils. Also, tankers bringing imported edible oils were not accorded priority and were not given berths in ports for weeks together. It is worth investigating who conspirated in this delay. This was enough to create an artificial scarcity of edible oils.

Charan Singh's pro-kulak bias knows no limits. He has now put a ceiling of Rs. 100 crores on the food-for-work programme for the current year. This programme is, perhaps, the only positive economic achievement of the Janata. Even though it was conceived and made possible by the previous Government, the credit for implementation certainly goes to the Janata. Despite leakages and corruption in the programme, it provides employment and increases the wage level of agricultural workers. It is catching up in a big way. Apart from pushing up the wage levels of agricultural workers, it has reduced their abject dependence on rich farmers. Agricultural workers and marginal farmers conserve food from the quota they receive under the programme; as a result, they will not have to go to village moneylenders and rich farmers for food in the lean season at "any price" — either in cash or in kind. This is enough to enrage kulaks. So they have nipped the programme in the bud. When the food stocks have swelled to 22 million tonnes — experts think that beyond 16 million tonnes food stocks are counter productive — Charan Singh will let food stocks spoil in the ■ God forbid, but if the rains are inadequate, the whole country will become West Bengal and Maharashtra, power-starved. The Energy Ministry is trying to live through the crisis through bluffs.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

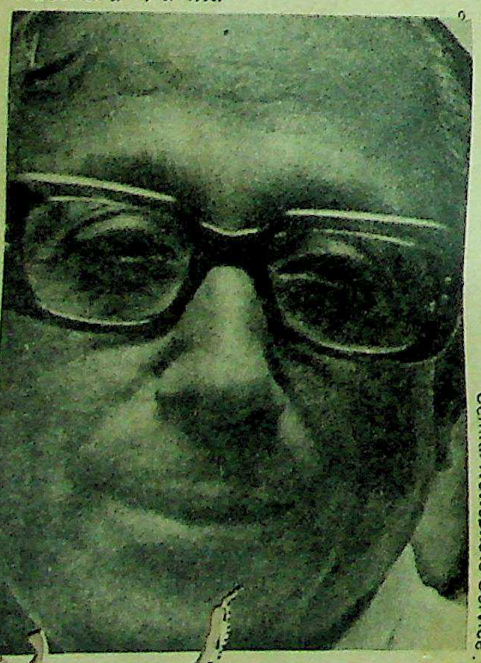
rains and be eaten by rodents rather than by the hungry millions in the rural area. After all, American kulaks also either keep their land fallow or burn their grains in the fields rather than wipe out hunger in the developing countries.

Earlier, the widening budgetary gaps did not deter Charan Singh from increasing the subsidy on fertiliser. Now, he is increasing the subsidy on food. With the big increase in productivity, the cost of production of agricultural commodities has come down this year. Yet, the procurement prices of wheat have been increased, and of rice and cotton are being increased in the teeth of opposition from the Planning Commission. The Agricultural Prices Commission, which recommends these increases, is packed with kulaks and is headed by a kulak-oriented administrator, Avtar Singh Khaloon; there is no representative of consumers in this commission. The Finance Ministry, which normally should play the role of a moderator in such cases, is openly aiding these moves even though in the process it is making its task of fiscal and monetary management more difficult. Charan Singh's keenness to help middle and rich farmers is so strong that he recently raised the limit of Government subsidy for installing irrigation pumps from 5-acre holdings to 10-acre holdings.

A free for all

When Chaudhury Charan Singh is so unabashedly using his governmental position to shower undeserved windfall gains on his constituency, which by no stretch of imagination belongs to the weaker sections of the society, he has no moral authority to deny the same privilege to his other Ministerial colleagues and constituents of the Janata Party. The Jana Sangh has started instigating traders to demand abolition of sales tax. Why should traders pay sales tax, when reports reaching

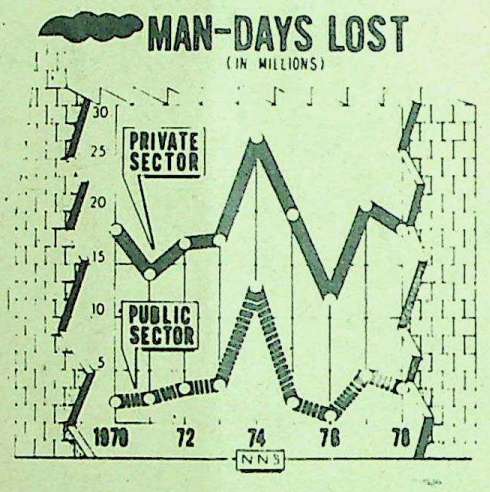
Ravindra Varma

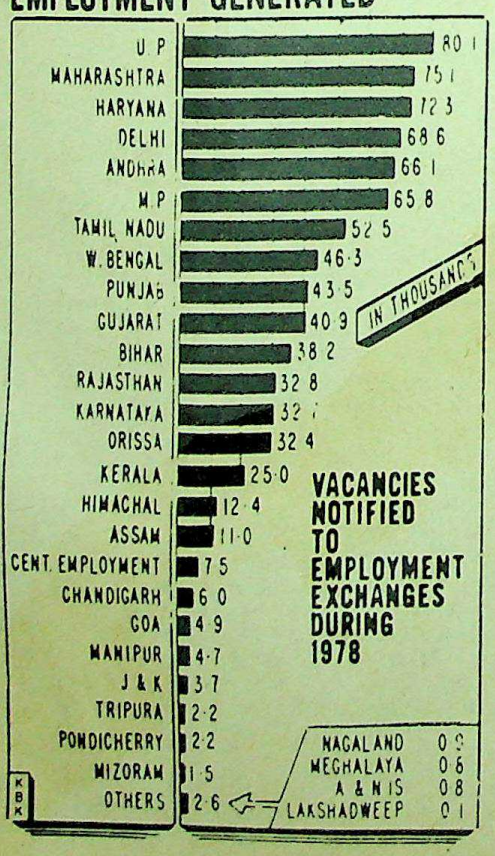


Central Newsphoto Service

Of the Ministers of the Economy Biju Patnaik is the biggest disappointment. As Steel Minister he has proved to be a bluffer and a braggart.

Vijayendra Tyagi



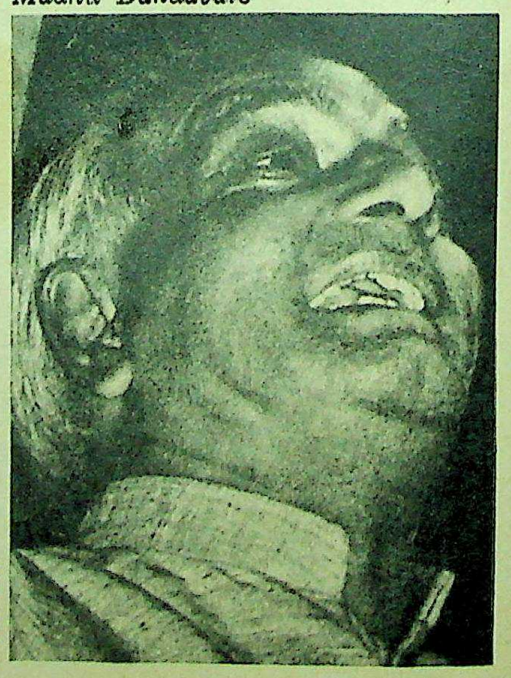


Delhi indicate that in many parts rich farmers are not paying land revenue because they feel they have their own Government? It is reported that they are not returning loans of cooperative banks since the supreme bank in the country, namely the Reserve Bank, is now under the control of their leader, Charan Singh.

Earlier, when the Gujarati mafia had monopolised all the critical economic instruments, it also followed the axiom : charity begins at home. The Gujarati's lust for gold is well known. They had an eye on the nation's gold stocks built with the sweat and tears of the people. The former Finance Minister, H. M. Patel, auctioned gold to reduce prices. But with every auction, the gold price went up and the country, on a very conservative estimate, lost Rs. 50 crores. Anybody with any knowledge of international economics should have known that with the erosion of confidence in the dollar, and the proposed official restoration of gold contribution in the European monetary system, the international prices of gold would inevitably go up, and this would inevitably have an effect on domestic prices of gold in India. But who bothers about the nation's interest and disinterested intelligent projections, when money-making by policy makers and their friends is the primary motivation?

In this free-for-all atmosphere, organised and unionised sections of employees, both white collared and blue collared, cannot be expected to remain far behind. More so when they have such a vocal and irrepressible political patron as George Fernandes in the Cabinet. Bank employees in particular made a mockery of the feeble attempts to evolve a wage policy. At first, Morarji showed his impotent anger. He threatened to issue an ordinance to ban bank strikes. But his Cabinet colleagues, responsive to urban middle class pressure, browbeat him and bank employees got what they were demanding. Then Charan

Madhu Dandavate



Sri Bikash.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

'The Janata will not administer tough medicine'

Dr Raj Krishna, a member of the Planning Commission since 1977, has been an important spokesman of the Janata Government's overall economic policies. At the turn of the year he extolled the Government's good economic housekeeping in a long newspaper article. A brief six months later the tide has turned dramatically and it is an altogether more defensive Dr Krishna who answers AJOY BOSE's questions.

Q What are the causes of inflation and what are the prospects if the present policies continue?

A : There has been an unnecessary controversy whether the budget caused the inflation or not. In any country inflation is caused by three basic reasons : the cost push factor, the demand pull factor and scarcity. Fortunately we have not had very much scarcity. But the cost push factors have become very strong because of the recent increase in prices of petroleum products, cement, steel, etc. There is also some increase in indirect taxes because of the last budget. On the demand pull side, the main cause of concern is the 18 per cent increase in the supply of money in the last year, partly due to the very large Government deficit of Rs 1,400 crores. So the present inflation is due to cost push factors and demand pull factors. Which factor is stronger is, I think, a largely academic question, because from the policy point of view, both should be attacked.

Q : What are the components of the anti-inflationary package suggested by you ?

A : We have basically recommended four measures. First, the rate of growth of the money supply should be brought down to 10 per cent, particularly by squeezing commercial credit given to traders. But the productive credit flow should be maintained. Second, the non-developmental expenditure of the Central Government should be cut down by at least 10 per cent. Third, the bank interest rate should be raised from nine per cent to 10 per cent and other interest rates should also be raised upwards. And finally, the prices of four essential commodities, grains, sugar, edible oil and common varieties of cloth must not be allowed to rise at all. Zero inflation in all these commodities is possible because the Government can either have buffer stocks or import these commodities. It is absolutely important that these prices are not allowed to rise. Further, increases in administered prices should be postponed and partial increases in the price of coal, petroleum products, rice and cotton which have been proposed, should be postponed until the price situation has stabilised.

Q : Will the Government really take up these measures?

A : Well, out of the package, it seems that the Reserve Bank of India is already squeezing credit and the Government has also taken action to bring down the market price of sugar and also started releasing more edible oil in the open market. But, so far there has been no action to raise interest rates. And no substantial action is being contemplated to reduce non-developmental expenditure. This is very necessary because we feel that if the Government deficit continues to be large it will not be possible for the RBI to reduce the growth of the money supply. The Government should also be careful not to raise the prices of coal, rice, petroleum products and cotton even if they are necessary.

Q : But do you think that the Janata Government has the political will to implement the whole package?

A : No. I don't think it is possible. This is because of political reasons. Any of the proposed expenditure cuts will adversely affect some interests. All these interests have strong representation in the Government. For instance, agricultural subsidies cannot be cut and probably subsidies for some agricultural products will be raised. Similarly, staff emoluments have also to be raised. Defence expenditure will probably not be reviewed. The expenditure on prohibition will also have to be incurred. All these expenditures cannot be cut because of political reasons.

Q. What would then be the effect of the anti-inflationary package?

A : Well, it would be like administering half the required dose to the patient. The easier medicine like credit squeeze and supply management of essential commodities will be administered. But the more difficult medicine, namely cutting down of non-developmental expenditure and the raising of interest rates, would not be possible.

Q : What then are the prospects and which section of the population would be hit by the inflation?

A : Well, the rate of inflation will rise to 12 per cent in this financial year. And as in all inflationary situations, it will be the agricultural labourers, factory workers, fixed salary earners—all whose incomes do not rise with prices—who will be hit the worst. Whereas manufacturers and businessmen will gain since their incomes rise with prices. Some big farmers will also gain if agricultural prices rise.

Q. What effect will this inflation have on the plan and the growth prospects of the country?

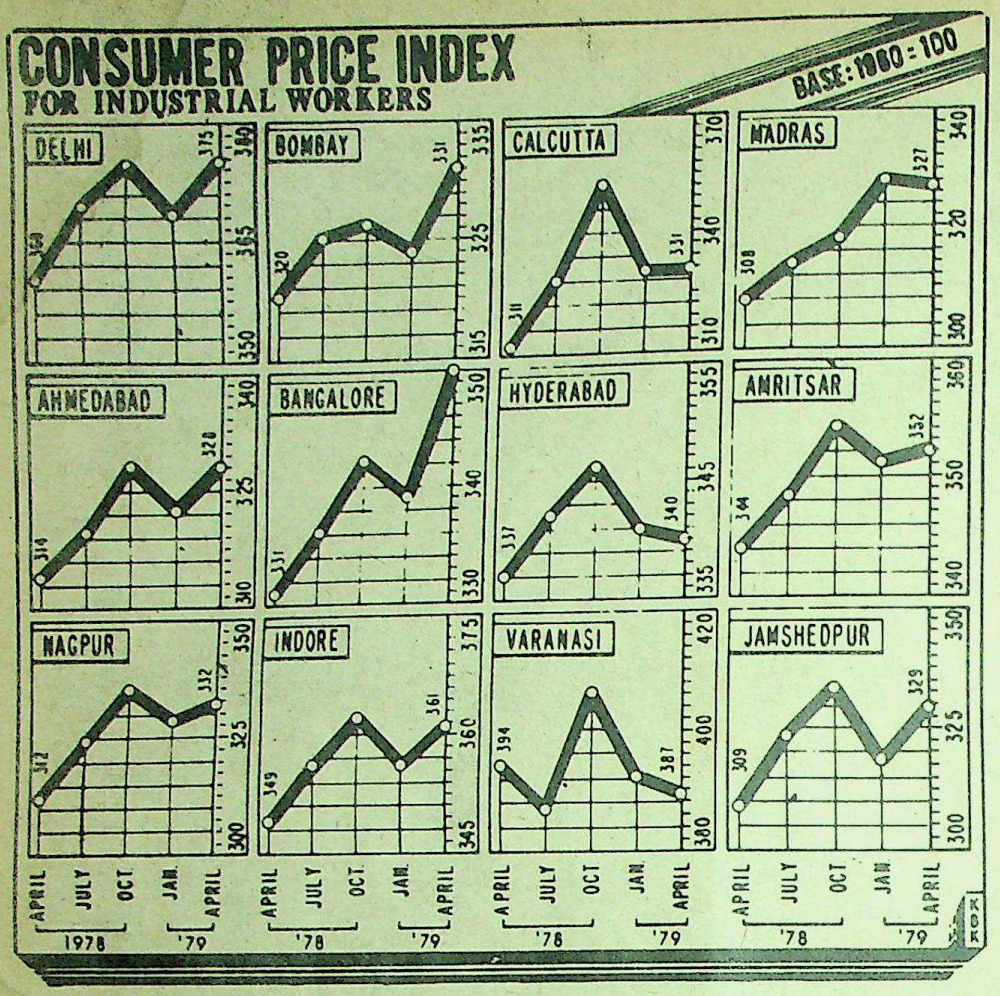
A : Inflation will force the Government to spend more and more money on non-developmental items and less on planned projects. Inflation is always regressive. It does not increase the rate of investment nor does it help the growth prospects of the country.

Q : How desperate do you think is the situation?

A : Fortunately, we have a food buffer stock of 22 million tonnes and foreign exchange reserves of Rs 5,000 crores. This makes it easier for the present Government to deal with the situation than was the case in the early seventies. The situation is bad but we will survive.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Singh tried to be firm and said that in the public sector he would not let wages increase by more than the 10 per cent ceiling fixed by the Bureau of Public Enterprises. But in the mean time, coal miners demonstrated their unity through a token strike and threatened an indefinite strike. This unnerved the Government. Twelve hours before the strike was to start, it conceded an 18 per cent increase in the coal miners wages. This has opened the floodgates of wage explosion and the so-called wage policy of the Janata Government is in a shambles.

Now a big fuss is being made on the bonus for railwaymen. George Fernandes has made it clear that he will remain in the Government only if railwaymen get bonus. If he goes out of the Government, he will make things impossible for the Government, at least through the railways. Chaudhury Charan Singh, who has been opposing bonus, perhaps realises this. So he is entering into competitive radicalism with George. In his letter to the Prime Minister, he has said that if bonus is given to railwaymen, it cannot be denied to employees of other departmental undertakings and State and Central Governments, including the security forces. This will cost Rs. 600 crores per annum to the exchequer. In addition, the sudden countrywide police revolt cannot but lead to a hefty increase in their wage bill : Punjab, with its panicky response, has already set the pace in this regard.

Back to the blackmarket

One of the most serious failings of the Janata has been the reemergence of blackmarketing during its regime. In the last two years, more than Rs. 200 crores of black money must have been generated through blackmarketing. And in commodities for which the Great Socialist George is responsible. Paper is openly selling at treble the controlled price, cement at double the price, tyres and tubes at 50 per cent higher. Steel prices in the open market are 50 per cent

Central Newsphoto Service

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Central Newsphoto Service

Charan Singh (here addressing the kisan rally) is openly partial to his electoral base higher than those fixed by the Government, and soda ash is selling at about 70 per cent higher than fixed by manufacturers. The value of property and gold has shot up by 100 per cent in the last two years. Cotton prices have come down, but cotton textile prices have gone up. Traders, emboldened by their political power, are indulging in black-marketing with impunity. And our George is not raising even his little finger. Perhaps this is the price he is paying for seeking Jana Sangh support to dislodge Devi Lal. Mr. Fernandes cannot keep his credibility with empty threats alone. Only lately he came out against the rising communal violence but the next day took back a lot of what he had said.

The finance ministry remains most complacent. It has become a victim of its own propaganda that the budget has caused an increase of only 0.8 per cent in the price index. It is trying to deceive itself that with foreign exchange reserves and the food stock, there is nothing much to worry about. But with congestion in ports, it may not be possible to arrange timely imports. Also, the international price of practically every commodity is higher than the domestic price. In other words, the greater the imports, the higher will be the imported inflation. Also, shortages of some non-tradeables, i.e. items which cannot be imported, like power and transport, are becoming serious. After some time it may not be possible to import unlimited quantities of petroleum products and crude to meet the shortfall in the sources of domestic energy. As regards food, it is true that even with one drought there should be no problem of wheat and rice. But we are entering a phase where "not by bread alone" will be literally true. A starving man does not revolt. He submits to his fate. Only a man with something in his stomach demands more. And it is that "more" which is becoming scarce and costly. This "more" is sugar, edible oil, cloth, a house etc. When the current wave of wage explosion runs its full course, this "more" will be increasingly sucked into the whirlpool of hyper-inflation. The Government is also caught between the devil and the deep sea on the question of increasing the prices of coal and petroleum products to economic levels. If their prices are increased now, it will only add to the inflationary psychology. If the increases are postponed, budgetary deficits will increase further, and this will also increase inflationary potentials even in the short-term. In the mean time, Chaudhary Charan Singh is so supremely unconcerned with the plight of the consumers that he has said that he cannot guarantee bank credits to launch the public distribution scheme prepared by his colleague, Mohan Dharia.

There is now much talk of an anti-inflationary package. When national interests are suborbinated to sectional interests, God alone can save the country. In fact, even the sectional gains are illusory, since sooner rather than later they are eaten away by inflation. In this free-for-all situation, the only sufferers will be the unorganised majority of the Indian people, and the future generation. Inflation will eat into the growth potential. What makes the situation grave is that as in 1974-75, economic and political crises have converged. The Janata Party is at breaking point; the political and moral authority of the Government is at the lowest ebb; the police are revolting, communal riots have broken out, and the sensitive north-east region is in trouble again. In this situation, a political crisis will feed on the economic crisis and vice versa. There are very disconcerting signs. In the wake of the police revolt and the mounting economic crisis, Morarji has declared that he cannot effectively govern the country without a preventive detention law. If democracy is to be saved, the country indeed needs a 'Veer-Abhimanyu' to break up the 'Chakravyooha'. Alas, 84-year-old Morarji is not equal to the task. He is leading a most incompatible and disorganised team. Behind the facade of a strongman, Morarji will make any compromises to continue as Prime Minister. In 1975, the anti-inflationary package resolved the economic crisis by placing additional burdens on salaried classes and peasantry. The burdens were most unequally distributed, but the country's economy was saved. Somebody has to make the sacrifices this time too. But, in the Janata, who will bell the cat? As a first step, Charan Singh will have to be sacked to save the economy. But who will do it? ■

The only administrative experience the Energy Minister has is that of a housekeeper at Kamaraj's residence. It is said he was very good at making coffee.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Raj Narain declares independence

And Haryana will be his fort

Vijendra Tyagi

RAJ NARAIN must surely be the most underestimated politician in the country. And the blame for this must, to an extent, be shared by Mr Raj Narain himself: His colourful hyperbole and dramatic style do not exactly conform to the middle class notion of a "respectable" politician, who is expected to be sober, thoughtful, committed and possibly honest too. In fact, the only adjective that does not apply to Raj Narain from that list is "sober" : the others fit him. Not merely this : Raj Narain has played a crucial role in the recent political history of this country. One is referring not only to his singular victory over Mrs Gandhi, first in the law courts, then on the electoral battlefield. On crucial occasions, Raj Narain has acted as the catalyst, the mover of events that have had significant consequences. Once again, this might happen.

June has been an important month for Mr Raj Narain, and perhaps it was a sense of history that made him resign from the Janata Party on June 23. It was an interesting time. In the South, Mr Devaraj Urs was getting ready to leave Mrs Gandhi, and set in motion an effort to provide an alternative to both the discredited Janata Party and the discarded Congress(I). The North was in a mess. The Jana Sangh-Congress(O) Ministry in Bihar was already in trouble; Ram Sunder Das was still unable to form a Government. The anti-RSS forces in Bihar were waiting to pounce. And in Haryana, the battle between the Jana Sangh and the anti-RSS factions of the Janata Party was coming to a head. Rajasthan was unsteady. All over, in fact, what might broadly be called the pro and anti-RSS sections of the Janata Party were fighting with an acrimony they had never exhibited in the past, a passion that would surely make it impossible for them to cooperate in the future (although, of course, nothing can be ruled out in the corrupt political climate that exists in the country).

By the end of the month, the coming split in the Janata was even clearer. George Fernandes, who had been calmly ignoring the RSS menace at the expense of all he had stood for, came out with an anti-RSS statement. And Chandrashekhar, whose affection for his Prime Minister had reached such proportions, finally realised that there was a crisis in the country, and the Prime Minister was responsible for it. Bahuguna issued a statement against the RSS, and it was a safe bet that he was preparing to eventually join the revived Congress. Of course, none of this can be directly attributed to Mr Raj Narain's resignation from the Janata Party — but once again, it was Raj Narain who had made the first move, perhaps the decisive move. And the issue he had chosen, the RSS, was the issue that would break the Party.

But the most curious reaction to Mr Narain's resignation was from his supporters. The first question was : Was this a prelude to a general resignation by Chaudhury Charan Singh and his followers, leading to a collapse of the Morarji Government? The answer was available very soon —No. Charan Singh was still not ready to give up power. But it is possible that he might be waiting for an opportune moment, for the right economic issue to arise. It would be more dramatic, would it not, if he resigned on the bonus issue — converting a decision to give railwaymen bonus into another concession to the city at the expense of the village. According to the theorists (and their number is legion in the capital city) Raj Narain's resignation was a trial balloon sent up by the Chaudhury camp. It would be followed by the resignation of about ten MPs. And if even this did not change things in the Janata Party and the Government, the great exodus would start.

Events, some startling, could overtake the theorists. A period of uncertainty, in which the only certainty is the failure of the Government, has begun, and the different politicians could do some unexpected things. There could be betrayal — hardly an unknown element in Indian politics. But what is most likely is that two anti-Morarji-RSS and anti-Mrs Gandhi Parties will emerge within the next few months. One of them will be the Congress, the other the old BLD (what names these Parties eventually acquire is a secret of which only god is aware at the moment). The two could work in harmony in the coming electoral battles.

In the meantime, the ludicrous battle for power in Haryana is the

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

dawn which shows the day. Devi Lal and Raj Narain have left no one in any doubt about their intentions : They would rather destroy the Janata Party than allow the RSS to dominate it.

OM PRAKASH describes what happened in Haryana :

THE Bihar drama was reenacted in Haryana. The Jana Sangh, Socialists, CFD and Congress(O) joined hands to oust the BLD Chief Minister, Devi Lal. Much has been and can still be said against Devi Lal's style of functioning but the high-pitched drama which took place in Delhi in the last three weeks of June with the open connivance of the Central leadership can have serious repercussions in the Janata Party in particular and national politics in general.

It all started with the fateful decision of Devi Lal to sack four Jana Sangh Ministers, Dr Mangal Sain, Kamla Verma, Ram Lal Vadhura and Bir Singh. There was no immediate provocation for this ill-timed decision. But it was a typical 'Jat' reaction to what had earlier happened in Bihar and UP. Charan Singh advised Devi Lal not to do so but the latter was adamant and complacent that he could easily ride out the storm.

The four ousted Ministers camped at 11 Ashoka Road in New Delhi which is commonly shared by three bachelor MP's. Besides Jhandewala (RSS Delhi office) this is also virtually a camp office of the Sangh. The entire Haryana drama was rehearsed and played out here. After persuading their Central leadership the four Ministers contacted, nagged and persuaded the other constituents of the Janata Party to stage a coup d'etat against Devi Lal. And on June 8 after getting a green signal from his mentor and Party President, Chandrashekhar, Gajraj Nagar raised the curtain. He, along with Bhajan Lal (CFD), Mehar Singh Rathi and Sher Singh (both BLD dissidents) announced his resignation from the Devi Lal Ministry. S. C. Malik, deputy chairman of the State Welfare Board, was also present on this occasion.

The BLD camp was taken aback. Devi Lal himself was touring the inner parts of Haryana distributing the matching grants to the rural folk. An unruffled Devi Lal said in his Jat English "worry not". And thus also spake the ever cool, calm and composed Jagjivan Ram while briefing pressmen about his tour of East European countries. It is nothing new in Haryana politics. Nothing would happen. Little did he know then that exactly two weeks later he would have to throw his whole weight behind his protege Bhajan Lal to get him the CM's seat.

Devi Lal was sure and so were Haryana watchers. But the dissidents under the shrewd leadership of the Jana Sangh high command were more than obsessed by the horse-trading tactics of Devi Lal. They had seen that Devi Lal was a past master at the numbers game. They had been robbed of almost certain victory twice. So they pressed for a fresh confidence vote. Chandrashekhar was closeted with the Prime Minister twice but Mr Desai said; "Nothing doing. I am not going to believe these Haryana MLAs". They had twice wasted his connivance in ousting Devi Lal. Forty-three MLAs paraded before him. But he said not so soon. "Let me come back from USSR." Bhajan Lal went to see off Mr Desai at the airport. He even told this correspondent that the new leader would be elected by him and Chandrashekhar.

R. K. Hegde announced that the Janata Parliamentary Board would discuss the Haryana issue on June 22. Devi Lal got 10 days to manoeuvre. The dissidents got jittery. Even at the rate of one MLA a day Devi Lal could turn the tables. He was capable of even more. The Jana Sangh, however had an ace up its sleeves. Remove the MLAs from the scene. What would Devi Lal barter with ? And that really worked. Twenty-eight MLAs were sent in three groups in air-conditioned luxury coaches for Bharat Darshan. But with a rider. They could visit only the saffron capitals, i.e. Jaipur, Bhopal and Simla. And meanwhile their leaders kept on claiming their majority

Creative Eye

Bhajan Lal

Devi Lal, for the first time in his chequered career, found himself outwitted. He requested Bhairon Singh Shekhawat to clinch a deal. You scratch my back I will scratch yours. Shekhawat said I have no dissidents. You do. Hence it can't be a deal. A humiliated Devi Lal was rebuffed by Shekhawat who had put his MLAs in luxurious captivity. Devi Lal even made the husband of an MLA issue a rescue cry for his wife. He sent his elder brother, Saheb Ram, to the dissidents' guide, philosopher and friend, Muktiar Singh Malik, to issue an appeal to spare his brother. But before that some loyal bureaucrat had issued a statement from Haryana Bhawan that Malik had been ostracised from his 'khap' (community). Devi Lal even resorted to holding the sarpanchs' meeting, calling upon their elected legislators to return in case they decided to oppose Devi Lal. But nothing worked. The die had been cast. Devi Lal's days were numbered.

Devi Lal, in a desperate attempt, threatened to dissolve the Assembly. When Chandrashekhar took strong exception to his right to do so, he denied having made such a threat. One MLA even quoted the Prime Minister that Devi Lal would not be allowed to dissolve the Assembly. The PM's secretariat did not contradict this assertion. On the eve of the JLP meeting Devi Lal resigned from the leadership but retained the CM's post. It was an abortive attempt to frustrate the MLAs' attempt to pass a no-confidence vote against him. Chandrashekhar again rejected his request to cancel the meeting. Just before the meeting Devi Lal resigned unconditionally. The 72 MLAs unanimously accepted the resignation. The meeting to elect the new leader was billed for the next day. The climax was approaching. Before this Devi Lal had circulated the name of the PWD minister, Lachman Singh, for the new leader. But on seeing the dissension he denied his support.

June 26 was the most crucial. Each faction held its own conclave. The PM wanted Balwant Rai Tayal. Chandrashekhar wanted Gajraj Nagar. Chand Ram wanted Rizak Ram. The Jana Sangh had no nominee. They were looking for the most vulnerable candidate to render their support. At this juncture Chandrashekhar and Jagjivan Ram met Mr Desai. The CRP and army clashes were fresh in their minds. The PM and his protege, H. M. Patel, were the target of the attack. Chandrashekhar, shrewd as he was, lashed out at the PM for not assessing and appreciating the dangers confronting the country. Mr Desai had little to explain. Jagjivan Ram had always waited for such an opportunity. He subtly mentioned the name of Bhajan Lal who had the blessings of Kanti Bhai and Suresh Ram. The only hurdle was Chand Ram who was adamant on Rizak Ram. But he was persuaded on the plea that the atmosphere was not in favour of a Jat candidate.

Bhajan Lal's public image is not enviable, so feel many. There are many skeletons in his cupboard. His detractors can always capitalise on them. So he would be compelled to play second fiddle. What else could the Jana Sangh have wanted? They pocketed another State capital.

In this review it is noteworthy that it was Sunder Singh Bhandari who tilted the balance in favour of Bhajan Lal after Krishan Kant walked out in exasperation and disgust. It was apparent to Krishan Kant that Sunder Singh Bhandari had already decided and was bent upon imposing Bhajan Lal on the Party, though Bhandari was skilfully playing the part of a democratic negotiator to arrive at a consensus. It will be an all Jana Sangh Government from the word go, which was amply evident in his first Press conference which was not only held at Bhandari's house against Bhajan Lal's wishes but, what is more, was addressed by Malik and Mangal Sain.

Tailpiece — One cynic quipped : Now that Bhajan Lal is elected we better amend the Constitution to add corruption and smuggling to the ninth schedule so that both occupations also enjoy protection from the courts of law.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The impact of Urs

It can be found everywhere

THE expulsion of Mr Devraj Urs by Mrs Indira Gandhi from the Congress which has split for the third time in a decade has ironically at the same stroke prepared the ground for the various Congress factions to come together on one platform against her.

Urs's call for a realignment of political forces has struck a very responsive chord in the various existing factions of the Congress today. Whether it is the numerous dissidents inside the Indira Congress or the Swaran Singh Congress or even the breakaway State factions like the Sharad Pawar group—all are keen to make common cause with Urs to fight against the authoritarian style of functioning that Mrs Gandhi has come to represent.

The unity talks between the two Congresses which were suddenly scotched by Mrs Gandhi at the insistence of Sanjay, have again been reactivated, but this time, without her. While most members in the Indira Congress still remain hesitant about coming out openly against Mrs Gandhi, more and more dissident groups in the various State Pradesh Congress Committees are thinking seriously of the Third Force alternative that Mr Urs has proposed. A few, however, have already come out openly in support of this move. "It is high time that we stopped Mrs Gandhi coming in the way of a revitalised Congress Party just because her son does not want it so", said Mrs Tarkeshwari Sinha, a bitter critic of Sanjay and his caucus. Mrs Sinha who vehemently opposed the emergence of Sanjay in the Congress at the AICC (I) Conference held in April might face expulsion from the Party for her open support of Mr Devraj Urs and her criticism of the non-democratic style of functioning in the Party.

"I remember L. N. Mishra used to say in 1974, when Sanjay started his Maruti, that we should all try to raise money to make his car company a success. Otherwise, he warned, this boy is going to turn to politics and that would be disastrous for the Party and the country. That is exactly what has happened," Mrs Sinha said.

What is interesting is that while the Karnataka controversy had nothing to do directly with him, Sanjay Gandhi seems to be the main issue on which most dissidents in the Indira Congress are united.

The best example is Mr Lalit Maken, General Secretary of the Delhi Pradesh Congress Committee and one of the most vociferous supporters of Mrs Gandhi, both during and after the Emergency. Mr Maken was responsible for gathering crowds for shouting slogans supporting her. This he did with great zeal and in fact when Mrs Gandhi was being whisked away in a CBI car after her arrest in October 1977, it was Maken who jumped on the car and tried to stop it. What he failed to do, however, was to placate Sanjay who had his own ideas of showing support for Mrs Gandhi. "The main difference beween me and Sanjay was that where he wanted to deliberately provoke violence, I wanted to follow the old Gandhian path of satyagraha", Maken said. Maken was also taken to task after his father-in-law, Mr Shankar Dayal Sharma, at the time of the 1978 split sided with Mr Brahmananda Reddy. Further, his wife, Geetanjali Maken (nee Sharma) was removed from the Presidentship of the National Students' Union of India.

Lalit Maken

Ironically, Mr Shankar Dayal Sharma made his way back sometime later into the Mrs Gandhi camp while Mr Maken became increasingly alienated from her. An interesting tale which Mr Maken has to relate is the blood donation incident. Evidently, the Delhi Pradesh Congress Committee took up a blood donation drive in 1978. They decided to donate blood equivalent to the weight of Mrs Gandhi but ultimately donated four times her weight. For this Mr Maken was praised by Mrs Gandhi. This year, however, when the Red Cross approached Mrs. Gandhi to ask her supporters to donate blood again, she wrote to them saying that Mr Maken had nohing to do with it last year and the Red Cross should approach Mr Jagdish Tytler, a noted Sanjay supporter.

It is not strange, therefore, when the day after the Congress Working Committee decided to set up the ad hoc Committee in Karnataka, Mr Maken held a Press conference denouncing the move and openly supported the stand taken by Mr Urs. He was expelled soon after from the Party.

According to Mr Maken, of the seven General Secretaries in the Delhi Pradesh Congress Committee only Mr Sajjan Kumar, one of the juniormost General Secretaries is a staunch Sanjay supporter. "The rest of them are just watching the situation. They are unhappy about the dominance of the Party by Sanjay and support Urs for his stand against him but they are still afraid to take an open stand against him like me," he asserted.

The situation in the other States is very similar. Most dissidents would like to join Mr Urs but are afraid of taking an open stand against Mrs Gandhi. As Maken puts it, "How do you suddenly call Mrs Gandhi a dictator if you have been shouting for so long from rooftops that she was the greatest leader of the country".

The biggest beneficiary of the Indira Congress split has been the Swaran Singh Congress. The Congress (S) which has been lying dormant for so many months has suddenly, within a space of a week, been reactivated. "Devraj has given us a supreme opportunity to revive a united and dynamic Congress which could be a real alternative to the Janata Party", said Mr Chandrajit Yadav who is in almost daily touch with Mr Urs, to work out a strategy for a united front. "My calculation is that if we manage to put up a united platform for Congressmen to come together, at least 40 per cent of the Indira Congress will come over to us", he said. Mr Yadav was also certain that this would also lead to considerable erosion in the Channa Reddy Government in Andhra Pradesh, the only remaining State ruled by the Indira Congress.

The gains for a unified Congress could indeed be immense. Mr Sharad Pawar has already given the green signal for such a move and is also in touch with Mr Urs. If the united front succeeds, the Congress could well govern both Karnataka and Maharashtra and might then succeed in also capturing Andhra Pradesh. In Parliament, a unified Congress could easily dislodge the Indira Congress from being the majority Opposition Party. Mr Urs himself can bring 12 MPs and more from other States are likely to follow suit.

Even in Mrs Gandhi's own camp there are few who are basically against a unified Congress. In the 20-member Congress Working Committee there were as many as 17 who were for unity before Mrs Gandhi forced the unity talks to break down. Except for the three hawks—Mr A. P. Sharma, Mr Pranab Mukherjee and Mr Stephen, all the others were wary of adopting a hard line against Mr Urs. It would be interesting to see how long the few who are with Mrs Gandhi today, stay with her.

AJOY BOSE, New Delhi

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Decency in distress

Eveteasers are doing worse than teasing

PLAINCLOTHES policemen swarm all over the Lucknow University campus to check what has been described as the "eve-teasing scourge" by the District Magistrate of the city, Mr Yogesh Narain. The district authorities were forced to sit up when the traditional form of eve-teasing by passing lewd remarks was replaced with such brazen acts as dupatta snatching, back-patting and in some cases even forced kissing.

"We are determined to put an end to the activities of campus terrorists," fulminated the DM. "A handful of hooligans cannot trifle with the rights of a silent majority." It was only a week later that Mr Narain realised the magnitude of the menace he was so anxious to eradicate. No records of residents of the University hostels are available with the Provost. Consequently no action could be taken against students, though it was found that even outsiders had brazenly occupied rooms while hundreds others still stood on a waiting list. Lethal firearms, including country-made bombs, pistols handgrenades and even teargas shells were found in several rooms.

It was also discovered that campus dadas served as liaison officers for contractors looking for work on campus. For this they pocketed hefty commissions that went as high as 25 per cent. Even more incredibly, over 100 students armed with fake degrees secured admission into the University at pistol point.

Lucknow University is not the only campus plagued by the campus terrorists, however. Gang warfare, in the words of a senior police officer, has assumed "apocalyptic proportions" in almost every university campus in the State. Students of Kanpur University stormed a police station recently and gave the policemen on duty a sound thrashing for police failure to "protect" law-abiding students. Students of BHU nearly assaulted a State Minister when he refused to meet a student conducting a hunger strike. The police had to wage a pitched battle with armed students before the President of the students' union. Mr Chanchal Kumar, could be arrested. In Bareilly, the Deputy Registrar of Rohilkhand University was gunned down by students inside a restaurant. Pantnagar, still limping back to normalcy after the April 13, 1978 massacre, was witness to a renewed outbreak of violence on November 27 when, there was a clash between two rival groups of Jats and Purabis. In the ensuing carte blanche two students were gravely injured and two professors, Dr Sharma and Dr Golakotta, were precariously poised between life and death for two weeks. A shaken Vice-Chancellor, Mr Mathur ordered the University closed sine die. It reopened nearly three months later, after disciplinary action had been instituted against nearly 50 students.

Riotous students of Lucknow University hijacked two mini buses and set them ablaze sometime ago. In another incident, hundreds of students waged a pitched battle with the police who attempted to disrupt the unruly mob even as panic gripped commuters in the city. The students were protesting against the "murderous assault" upon a student by a conductor for allegedly travelling without a ticket.

Universities throughout Uttar Pradesh are in turmoil. Not one of the 17 universities in the State was able to hold its examinations on schedule. Campus violence has risen by 30 per cent over the last twelve months. During the first half of 1978, 7,434 students were arrested in 146 riotous incidents in the State whereas throughout 1977 only 588 students were arrested in 67 incidents.

The trend of violence on Kanpur's campuses assumed monstrous proportions during the Emergency, when one college was discovered to have its own virtual arsenal. There were other trends too: the S. D. Singh Commission of Enquiry was appointed in 1971 to investigate reports of sex abuse on the campuses of Lucknow University and had warned of the existence of a Mafia that either

Sanjay's modesty

IS Mr Sanjay Gandhi in politics or out of it? This is a question which is answered differently by different people. The Congress(I) leaders, including Mr Gandhi's mother, Mrs Indira Gandhi, assert that he is not in politics. The non-Congress(I) politicians say that he is. Mr Devaraj Urs and his supporters say that they have left Mrs Gandhi's Party because of Mr Sanjay Gandhi's interference in the Party's affairs. While this debate is on, Mr Gandhi has been leading Congress(I) demonstrations in various parts of the country and his statements to the Press have been, to say the least, political.

Take June 22, for example. Mrs Indira Gandhi was in Srinagar and her younger son had flown to Calcutta to lead a Congress (I) rally. Mrs Gandhi told newsmen in Srinagar that "Sanjay is neither a member of the Congress (I), nor in politics and his participation in any demonstration is in his individual capacity". While the news agencies flashed this statement by the former Prime Minister, Mr

Tarapada Banerjee

Sanjay Gandhi was telling newsmen at the Calcutta airport that Mr Urs had violated Party discipline by refusing to accept the ad-hoc committee of the State Congress (I) in Karnataka. This surely was not a statement of a person who is not involved in Party politics!

That afternoon Mr Gandhi "participated" in a Congress (I) rally. He was among the five people who went in a deputation to the State secretariat, the Writers Building, and handed over a memorandum to the Chief Minister, Mr Jyoti Basu. If Mr Gandhi had participated in the rally in his "individual capacity", then why was he included in the five-member delegation? Moreover, Mr Basu told newsmen soon after the meeting with the Congress(I) deputation (which included the State unit President, Mr A. B. A. Ghani Khan Choudhury) that he had promised Mr Sanjay Gandhi that he would enquire into the specific cases listed in the memorandum. Did the Congress (I) leaders take a back seat during their talks with the Chief Minister and let the leadership be in the hands of a person who had joined them in his "individual capacity"?

Every citizen in India has the freedom to be a member of a political Party, and if possible, lead it. Then why this hide and seek, Mr Sanjay Gandhi?

S. BHATTACHARYA

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

terrorised girls or enticed girls into the flesh trade. Organised copying is yet another irritant to the University authorities. Groups of students are reported to have intimidated professors into leaking examination papers. Invigilators have been threatened and even beaten up. Some students have even taken their answer scripts to their hostels to work in a more congenial atmosphere. In a Meerut college four boys and girls ejected an invigilator, locked themselves inside the examination hall and only emerged six hours later. In Rohilkhand University copying was done so brazenly that a self-constituted Nakalchi Sena (Copying Army) chanted slogans extolling the virtues of copying outside the examination hall while their colleagues copied with impunity.

Authorities are alarmed at the increasing involvement of students in political riots. Most of the 500 youths arrested in the Lucknow Youth Congress (I) rally at midnight on May 6 were enrolled students. Aligarh Muslim University and Benares Hindu University are hotbeds of political violence between rival youth groups dominated by the Jamaat-e-Islami on the one hand and the RSS-dominated Akhil Bahritya Vidhvarti Parishad on the other. "Political involvement of active student unionists is almost 100 per cent," according to a police officer. Not a pretty picture at all.

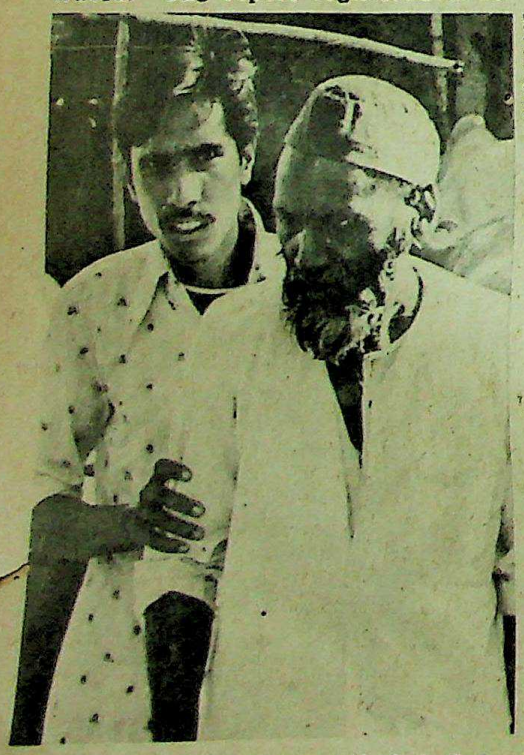
ACHAL MEHRA, Lucknow

The curious case of the stolen buffalo

Starring an ex-Minister of UP

MILCH cattle are a weakness with Ravindra Kishore Shahi, the former Minister for Power and Irrigation in the Ram Naresh Yadav Government and an active RSS man. A recent incident now under investigation by the local police throws some light on Shahi's love of cows and buffaloes.

It was on March 30 that Shahi's servant, Paras Nath Pandey, lodged an FIR with Husainganj police station. The report said that a buffalo belonging to the former Power Minister was missing since 10 a.m. and despite efforts it could not be traced. The report registered under Section 379 said that the missing buffalo was short and had a tail with a black end. So fond was Shahi of his buffalo that he telephoned the District Magistrate, Yogendra Narain, and Senior Superintendent of Police, Sriram Arun to trace his buffalo and restore it to him within 24 hours.



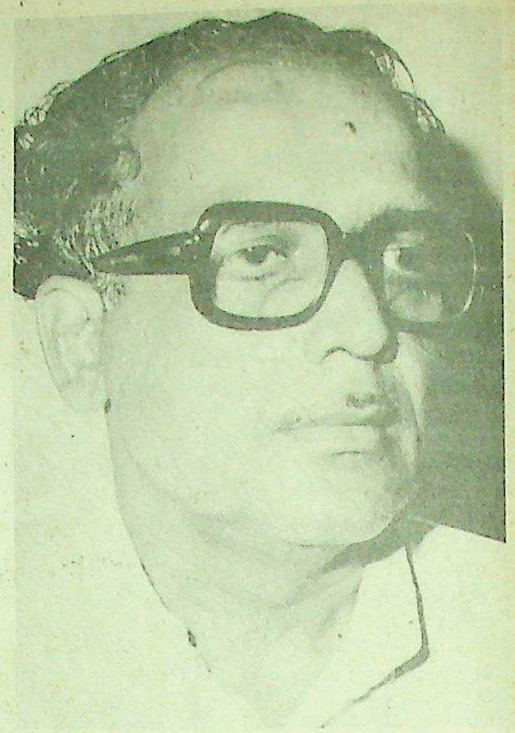
S. P. Premi

Ghulam Nabi with his blind father, Rahim Buksh

Shahi, though no more a Minister, is still in the habit of throwing his weight about as he feels that being a dissident belonging to the Jana Sangh faction gives him more power over the administration today than he had as a Minister. They tried to prove their efficiency and by the next evening the Station House Officer of Husainganj brought a buffalo to Shahi's house. Shahi, however, was not satisfied by the buffalo's performance, though its looks had convinced him that it was his. He sent the buffalo back to the police station after keeping it for three days and three nights. "This is not Mantriji's buffalo," Paras Nath told the baffled police officer, "because its milk-yield is very low." The police had willy-nilly agreed to continue the search for Shahi's original buffalo while the one returned by Shahi went back to where it had come from.

After a three-week lull, the buffalo front was again activised by Shahi. Ghulam Nabi, a cowherd of Havelock Road, not very far from Shahi's Mall Avenue residence, was chased away by the Husainganj police station on April 21 when he went to report that one of his buffaloes had been forcibly taken away by some men of one Ravindra Kishore Shahi who according to the same people was a former Minister.

For three days Ghulam Nabi was running from pillar to post and had knocked on almost all the doors.



S. P. Premi

Ex-Minister, R. K. Shahi

But nobody seemed to pay attention to his words. Finally, his cause was taken up by a member of the Janata Party, who just about a year ago lost to the Congress (I) candidate in a byelection for the State Assembly. Belonging to the former Socialist Party, Akshaiber Mal has in recent months developed a political dislike for the former Jana Sangh men. Mal first gained the sympathy of a dissident leader, to whose group Shahi now owes allegiance at least in public. Like Shahi he comes from Deoria district. Mal was shrewd enough to do so and thus neutralized the affair before it could take a turn for the worse involving Ministers. He then accompanied Ghulam Nabi with a letter to the District Magistrate detailing his complaint against the robbers who came from Shahi's residence. According to Ghulam Nabi, Shahi's men not only took away his buffalo by force but also beat up his blind father, Rahim Bukhsh, who tried to resist.

Nabi has claimed that he purchased the buffalo from Munir Ahmad of Meerut for Rs 2,000 (to be paid in instalments) and readily produced a receipt to prove his purchase. He requested the District Magistrate to treat this complaint as an FIR to the police station (which had refused to entertain his complaint on April 21) and direct the local police to take appropriate action for immediate restoration of his buffalo.

Although the police and the local administration is tight-lipped, reliable sources say that the former Minister's claim to this particular buffalo (whose milk-yield is almost as much as that mentioned in the report registered by the former Minister's servant Paras Nath) rests on very flimsy ground. Shahi was unable to produce any evidence to prove that he had purchased the buffalo. "It was born in my house," he is reported to have told the police.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

"Its mother was bought by my men in Bihar." But Shahi could not produce any document to prove his later statement either. The report lodged by Shahi's servant had stated that the former Minister's buffalo was short and had a tail with a black end. To the amazement of the police officer, Nabi's buffalo (now claimed by Shahi) was not only taller but has a tail with a white tip. But Shahi is not ready to go back on his claim to this buffalo.

There is yet another discrepancy which could only be verified by a veterinary doctor. According to Shahi the buffalo has produced a calf once. Nabi had told the police that the buffalo, yielding seven litres of milk twice a day, has produced three calves — the last did not survive. The veterinary, Dr R. K. Paramhans, who was taken to Shahi's residence to examine the buffalo and gave his opinion said that he would not examine the buffalo until he received instructions in writing. He also said that he had informed all concerned he would like the buffalo examined at the hospital by a panel of three veterinary doctors. According to Shahi's neighbours and some of his servants, the buffalo responds to Nabi's call and recognises him among other members of Shahi's household.

The dispute between an ordinary citizen and a VIP has become a problem for officials. They do not know which way to decide the case — on merit or on other considerations. If Shahi becomes a Minister again he is not the kind of man who is going to forget and forgive and would surely take his revenge. If they decide the case in his favour (and Nabi is deprived of his buffalo) the people in authority today may take them to task for doing injustice to an ordinary citizen.

"Shahi has a weakness for milch cattle and all cattle-owners should know," said a senior official of the State Government. He recalled a Call Attention motion in the State's Vidhan Parishad about a year ago. It was mentioned in the House that a retiring station officer of Tarkulwa Thana in Deoria district had left a guidance note for his successor in the police station's register number 8 (which acts as a brief on the criminals within the jurisdiction of that police station.) The register contains the following note about a notorious cattle-lifter of the area. "... this bad character is at present residing in Lucknow having become a Minister. This has naturally resulted in decreased incidence of cases of cattle-lifting. Even then the vigilance (on him) must not be relaxed." Shahi had refuted the allegation on the floor of the House that he was ever suspected of cattle-lifting. But when the leader of the Opposition had challenged the Government to produce the said register in the House to disprove his statement that the entry was related to Shahi, the Government had preferred to remain silent. "Maybe habits die hard as people say," murmured the harassed officer, who has to take a decision on the two complaints.

S. P. PREMI, Lucknow

Funny money

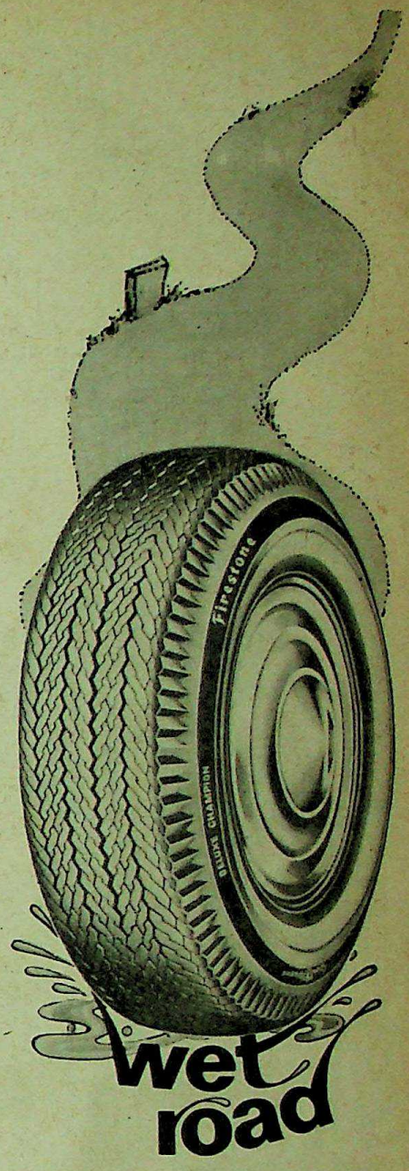
It's no longer a crime to hoard old currency

WHEN money is old it could be bought at ten thousand times—or more—its face value. It can be hoarded. You can possess foreign money—if it is out of circulation, mind you—without fearing an encounter with the Enforcement Branch. You can even counterfeit old coins and old notes with impunity.

When the Rs, 10,000 and Rs 1,000 notes were legal tender, their possession could create problems. You might have had to explain the source and lost it all or, more likely, you may have had to share some of it with the "long limb of the law", a cliche which enlightened etymologists suspect was coined after it was realized what lengths corrupt officials can reach to grab a bribe. You may now frame all your Rs 10,000 and Rs 1,000 notes on your parlour wall, and no one can do a thing about it. It has ceased to be money.

As money oddities go, old money may be obsolete, even antique; but it has been exempted from the Antiquities Act. And so it is safer to possess a rare Aureus of Geta—one such was auctioned in 1975, in Switzerland for 65,000 Swiss francs, and is today worth upwards of 100,000 in the same currency—than to possess the framed likeness of your dear departed mother-in-law. For, if she was as ancient as most mothers-in-law are, you come under the purview of the Antiquities Act, and besides keeping her darling daughter happy and contented, you will have to periodically fill forms and returns, to remain on the right side of the law. You may, of course, gift your framed ma-in-law to the National Museum, and get rid of the headache for that, in essence, is the final aim of the Act. But talk of coins and you are safe.

An Advocate in tiny Goa, Mr Kotambi Desai is reportedly negotiating with the Government the sale of one of the largest and rarest hoards of coins. He is said to value it at Rs 15 lakhs, though the Government is willing to pay a limit of Rs eight lakhs. Dr T. Gune, the Director of Historical Archives (and an authority



Another good reason to use Firestone tyres

Skidding can happen anytime. But when you're on Firestone tyres you have a chance to avoid it. Firestone tyres are designed and engineered to drain water, eject slush to provide a sure grip and ensure directional stability and handling.

Firestone

78 YEARS OF INTERNATIONAL EXPERIENCE

RADEUS/FS/CT-4/78

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

on Deccan King coins) was shocked and scandalized when I rang him to seek confirmation of the deal. He initially did not get my name right and thought by "my aggressive tone" of voice that I was a Government Secretary. He meekly agreed that a proposal for the deal was under way, then asked my name again and, in a quavering and high pitched voice, admonished me saying that it was "wrong to ask such things", they being "top secret". Anyway, if the deal goes through, the Government will come in possession of what is perhaps the only existing Gupta period coins, circa 300 or 400 AD. In the theft at the National Museum, New Delhi in the mid sixties, coins of the same vintage disappeared and have not been seen or heard of since.

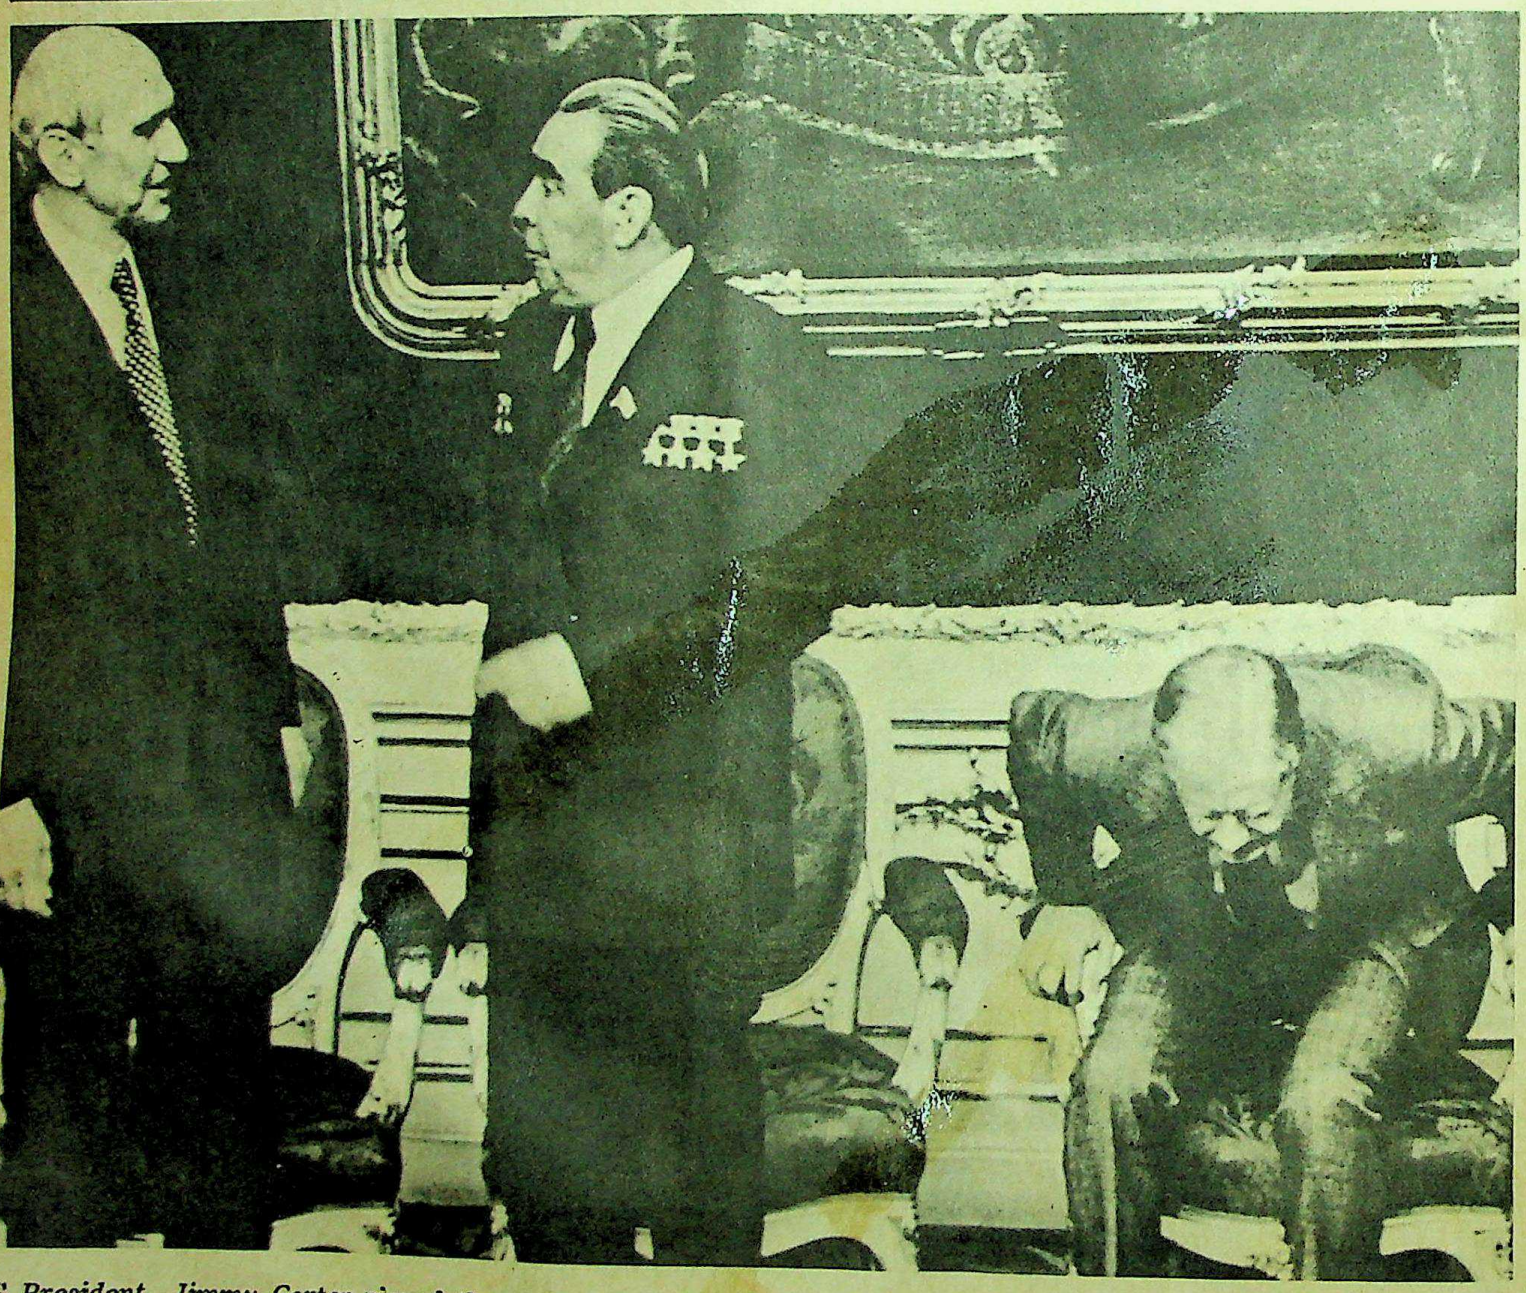
Kotambi Desai's hoard probably includes Deccan King coins (circa 100 BC) and rare Portuguese issues (a gold coin with a face value of one rupee was sold in 1975 in London for £ 750). Fenelon Rebello, probably the most respected authority on Portuguese issues in India, says that it is difficult to say what Kotambi's collection is worth as it has not been catalogued.

Money can be so funny that, if you fake a coin, it could be worth a fortune as a fake, provided, of course, it is well faked and, further, if you "tender" it as a "fake." If, however, you merely try to pass on a fake buck, you may have to reckon with Section 420 of the Indian Penal Code, for it would be cheating. A goldsmith who knows a lot about casting fakes, tell me that most collectors being fakes themselves—if not out and out fools—for they have nothing but an irrepressible possessive urge, you can always get out of a "fake" jam very smoothly: by taking it back or replacing it or, as often done, "you can always say that you sold in good faith. And that you yourself were a victim." With luck, the collector may agree to buy the fake at a lower price, hoping to pass it on and get away with it.

Mr Rebello estimates that, of the silver coins floating around, a sizable portion consists of fakes. They are faked in Goa, at least at three places, as well as in Belgaum and Karwar.

MARIO CABRAL e SA, Goa.

CARTER'S UTMOST FOR SALT-II



UPI

US President Jimmy Carter signed the SALT II agreement with the ailing Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev on June 18 in Vienna. The Treaty which runs until 1985 limits both the Soviet Union and the USA to 2,400 missiles and bombers within six months of SALT II's ratification and later to 2,250 bombers. The Russians will have to lessen their present capacity of 2,500 bombers while the Americans will increase their fleet from their present figure of 2,058. SALT II will lead to more American spending on nuclear weapons to offset the present Russian lead in short-range nuclear weaponry most of it based in Europe. Soviet President Brezhnev (centre) talks to Austrian President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger during the first meeting at the Hofburg Palace in Vienna while US President Jimmy Carter (right) seems to be having a hard time getting to his feet.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Come... Celebrate the return of Rawsilin

You Loved It Before And So We're Back With More

It's better looking than ordinary textiles. It's softer. It stays fresh longer. It's cool. It's crease-resistant. It's easy to take care of. It retains its sheen and texture longer. It's stronger.

It's Rawsilin.

An extraordinary textile that Jiyajee brings back in an even wider range.

It's the same Rawsilin with just one change... This time it comes to you with a sensational range of Rawsilin Shirtings !

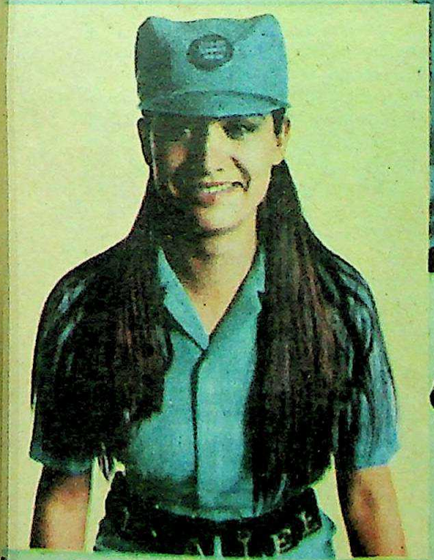
Rawsilin
SUITING SHIRTING



JIYAJEE

JIYAJEERAO COTTON MILLS LIMITED,
BIRLANAGAR, GWALIOR (M.P.)

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The sins of a son

A. K. CHAKRAVORTY and UDAYAN SHARMA report on the new found wealth of Om Prakash Saklecha, son of the Madhya Pradesh Chief Minister

When a 21-year-old undergraduate carries around lakhs of rupees, a lot of eyebrows are raised. When that undergraduate is the son of a Chief Minister, a lot of doubts are raised in addition to the eyebrows. The Chief Minister in question is Madhya Pradesh's Virendra Kumar Saklecha, whose son Om Prakash is now in the limelight.

Om Prakash Saklecha caught the public eye at a DDA (Delhi Development Authority) auction on January 17, 1979. The 777-square metre plot that was put up for auction fetched the incredible price of Rs 1.33 crores and enterprising journalists later discovered that Om Prakash had been the second highest bidder. He had baulked after the bidding crossed the one crore and thirty one lakh mark. However, the Jana Sangh CM's son had carried a startling sum of Rs 25 lakhs in cash and bank drafts to the auction: under DDA rules 25 per cent of the sale money has to be deposited on the spot by the bidder. This sudden flush of money caught the attention of certain real estate businessmen present at the auction and also prompted the Revenue Intelligence to enquire into the lad's business connections.

The Chief Minister initially denied that his son had even been present at the auction. The issue was then raised in the Rajya Sabha by Mr N. K. P. Salve but Mr Sikander Bhakt took it upon himself to shield Om Prakash by stating that DDA records did not maintain a list of bidders' names. It was only later when Mr Jyotirmoy Bosu raised the matter in the Lok Sabha that the Minister was hauled over the coals. At that stage he admitted that "Om Prakash Saklecha was the second highest bidder". Mr Saklecha (Sr) now admits that his son was present at the auction but he claimed that he was bidding on behalf of Mr R. K. Gupta, a businessman.

Om Prakash, who never made a mark in the academic field, was launched by his father in business when he was hardly 19 years old. He is fond of the good things in life and is an extrovert in the mould of his father. A lot of the political clout commanded by Mr V. K. Saklecha by virtue of being Chief Minister has rubbed off onto his arrogant son. Om Prakash made his maiden venture into the realm of business early in 1977 when he purchased industrial sheds in NOIDA (New Okhla Industrial Development Authority) with the intention of setting up a cardboard manufacturing unit. Saklecha Udyog, a partnership concern was established the same year, registered in Jawad, Madhya Pradesh. The partners in the firm were Mr V. K. Saklecha, Mrs Chetan Kumari Saklecha and Om Prakash Saklecha. Later that year, on June 26, Mr Saklecha substituted his name with that of his minor son, Vijay Kumar Saklecha, as he had been inducted as Minister for Industries in Madhya Pradesh.

Om Prakash skilfully utilised his father's connections and obtained generous grants from the Uttar Pradesh Financial Corporation, thanks to the good offices of the Jana Sangh Minister for Industries in Uttar Pradesh, Mr Ram Prakash Gupta. Om Prakash now possesses two sheds in addition to the NOIDA plot and has switched over from the manufacture of cardboard boxes to machines required for plastic moulding. He has set up two plastic injection moulding machines, the market value of which is anything between Rs 15 and 18 lakhs. The UP Financial Corporation has given Om Prakash loans totalling Rs eight lakhs. Mr Ram Prakash Gupta had taken a personal interest in sanctioning the loans bypassing the normal procedures.

V. K. Saklecha, after his election victory in 1978

Certain new interesting facts have come to light regarding the Madhya Pradesh Chief Minister, Mr V. K. Saklecha's shady business connections and investments made by him in real estate. Only a thorough probe by the Department of Revenue Intelligence and other independent agencies of the Government can bring out the truth.

Mr Saklecha purchased two flats in Gopal Towers situated in Rajendra Place Commercial Complex in early 1978. The two flats are valued around Rs 5 lakhs. The Gopal Towers, a multistoried building, is owned by a construction firm, United Builders. The managing director of United Builders is Mr R. K. Gupta. It may be recalled that Mr R. K. Gupta had accompanied Mr Om Prakash Saklecha, the eldest son of MP Chief Minister, to the January 17 DDA land auction at which the latter made a bid up to Rs 1.31 crores. It is now learnt that Mr Saklecha was legal adviser to United Builders for the last 13 years. He was also at one time a director of United Builders.

Mr R. K. Gupta has floated a firm called Madhav International whose ostensible purpose is to construct hotels and to promote tourism. For this specific purpose they were able to get clearance from the Government to utilise remittances from abroad by Indian businessmen, which is said to be substantial. When Om Prakash Saklecha unsuccessfully participated in the DDA auction on January 17, 1979 he carried hefty bank drafts purchased by Madhav International. The Parliament Street branch of Canara Bank handles the banking operations of Madhav International. Incidentally, Mr Saklecha had deposited Rs 2.5 lakhs in Canara Bank, Bhopal, between August 3 and 8, 1977 in the names of his family members and no satisfactory explanation has been given about the source.

When the O. P. Saklecha auction issue found an echo in Parliament and there was the possibility of a probe, the executive secretary of Madhav International, Mr J. P. Sharma, resigned from his job. Mr J. P. Sharma resigned out of fear that the Government may haul him up for "illegally" diverting company funds (foreign exchange) meant for a specific purpose. Mr J. P. Sharma was earlier working as general manager in a public sector hotel.

Besides Mr R. K. Gupta, other partners of Madhav International are Mr Haribhau Shah, a businessman from Kenya, one Mr Harbans Singh, an Indian settled in New Orleans (USA) and two others, Mr Bhism Agarwal and Mr Brahm Agarwal. It is alleged that Mr Saklecha has Prakash loans totalling Rs eight lakhs. Mr Ram Prakash Gupta had taken a personal interest in sanctioning the loans bypassing the normal procedures.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

benami shares in Madhav International.

The diversion of funds—that too foreign exchange—meant specifically for a purpose permitted by the Government of India attracts the penal provisions of COFEPOSA (Conservation of foreign exchange and prevention of smuggling Act).

A detailed inquiry by the Government into the affairs of Madhav International can only unravel the truth. The revenue intelligence should be immediately asked to seize the bank accounts and other probable incriminating records now with Madhav International.

The affairs of United Builders and its kingpin Mr R. K. Gupta require close examination by the Finance Department and its agencies. It will also help clear doubts about the extent of black money reportedly funnelled by Mr V. K. Saklecha and his family members into the activities of United Builders.

HOW Om Prakash, who began as a young entrepreneur in 1977, could muster the huge investment required for plastic injection moulding machines has yet to be satisfactorily answered by both father and son. The DDA auction gamble and the confidence with which he carried the money has aroused widespread suspicion and mutterings about black money being used.

In 1978, Om Prakash had filed an affidavit before the Delhi Development Authority, stating that his elder sister (from whom he had obtained a power of attorney) was a resident of Nyawala in Old Delhi. According to the affidavit his elder sister owned a house in Nyawala which had been demolished during the Emergency. Om Prakash therefore sought compensation for the damage and claimed that a plot measuring 165 square metres be allotted to him in an industrial area for business purpose. The DDA made the land allotment measuring 165 square metres in the Okhla industrial area. Om Prakash then presented a fresh application to the DDA in late 1978, stating that the allotment of the 165 square metre plot was inadequate for his business purposes and requested that another industrial plot measuring 556 square metres be allotted to him. He expressed his willingness to pay the market value of the land if it was allotted to him. Three addresses are mentioned in the affidavit. One of them is No. 10 Janpath, the official residence of Mr Larang Sai, the Union Minister of State for Labour and Parliamentary Affairs.

DDA officials, surprised at the fresh demand, wondered whether Om Prakash was in a position to pay the sum of Rs 3,20,000, the market value of the land he sought. But they were in for a jolt. Om Prakash sent four reminders within a week, asking that the allotment be made as he was prepared to foot the bill.

At this point of time, a Land Management officer ordered an investigation to verify the details mentioned in the affidavit. In the course of the inquiry it came to light that the affidavit itself was a concoction, every word of which was false. Legal experts in the DDA suggested that Om Prakash be hauled up before a court of law for filing a false affidavit. It is learnt that some M.P. Government officials who are on deputation to the DDA, soft-pedalled the issue, fearing the wrath of the Chief Minister. The affidavit is now believed to be in the custody of Revenue Intelligence authorities, according to whom it prime facie establishes that Om Prakash was in a position to pay the amount of Rs 3,20,000 for the land. The affidavit was seized from the DDA office by the Revenue Intelligence Department.

Two of Om Prakash's godfathers are Delhi-based businessmen, Mr R. K. Gupta and Mr J. C. Rishi. According to reliable reports Mr V. K. Saklecha had instructed the two to teach Om Prakash the fundamentals of business. Mr R. K. Gupta, once a junior engineer in Haryana, is today a leading real estate businessman. He has an excellent rapport with top Jana Sangh leaders and recently expanded his business operations to Kenya and some Arab countries. Mr J. C. Rishi began his career as an accountant with a mine owner in Bilaspur (MP) and can today boast of being a director of over two dozen firms. Rishi, who has his head offices in Nehru Place, New Delhi was close to such Congress leaders as S. C. Shukla and V. C. Shukla before the 1977 elections. He has wormed his way into the Janata Party, claiming that he had given shelter to a top RSS boss during the Emergency. Rishi also has the dubious distinction of unsuccessfully contesting a Rajya Sabha seat from Madhya Pradesh on six occasions. He also has extensive mining interests in Madhya Pradesh.

Mr Rishi's son, Ravindra Kumar Rishi, travelled with Om Prakash to Japan, Hong Kong and Singapore obtensibly to further the interests of the Rishi Electronic Company. There are allegations that Om Prakash Saklecha has sizable shares in the Rishi Electronic Company. Incidentally, Mr Sitala Sahay, the MP Minister for Health who was in Hong Kong on an official visit spotted Om Prakash and Ravindra Kumar at the airport. Mr Sahay reported the matter to Mr Kushabhan Thakre, the RSS boss of MP, on his return. Significantly, Mr Ramashankar Singh, former Minister for Planning whose resignation was recently obtained by Mr V. K. Saklecha, has disclosed that official agencies are investigating a report that Om Prakash deposited a sum of Rs 10,00,000 in a branch of Midlands Bank in Singapore.

MYSTERY also surrounds Om Prakash's acquisition of a plot of land in Atana village, Jawad tehsil Mandsaur, with the connivance of his father. Om Prakash submitted an application on August 17, 1977 to the gram panchayat of Atana village for a plot of land in the village in order to build a house, even though he is not a resident of the village. As the area enclosing the plot was common village land, the district panchayat officer, by virtue of a written order dated December 18, 1976, had prohibited the allotment of this piece of land to any individual. In spite of this order, pressure was brought on the panch by Mr V. K. Saklecha, as a result of which the land was allotted to Om Prakash Saklecha on September 14, 1977. Significantly, the sarpanch of this gram panchayat, Mr Shyam Sharma, is the driver of Mr V. K. Saklecha.

On Prakash also travelled with his father when the latter flew in the State aircraft on a mysterious visit to Kathmandu in mid-1978. The allegations that Saklecha deposited money in the Nepal Rashtra Bank have now been substantiated by a team of IB and RAW officials, who went to Nepal to investigate their accusations. It is still not clear whether the money belonged to the RSS or Saklecha himself. Recent investigations by Revenue Intelligence officials into the business contacts of Om Prakash Saklecha have revealed that he is interested in Madhav International, a firm which constructs hotels and is in tourism otherwise also. Some Jana Sangh leaders including Mr K. N. Sahani, the chief executive councillor of Delhi, have financial interests in the concern and it has been revealed that part of the money which Mr O. P. Saklecha carried on the day of the DDA auction came from Madhav International. The secretary of the firm, one Mr Sharma has since resigned in protest, fearing that if official agencies investigate, he will be answerable for illegal use of the company's fund.

To avoid further exposure of his son's business operations and contacts, Chief Minister Saklecha has shifted his residence from Madhya Pradesh Bhawan to a bungalow in Lodi Colony when he is in Delhi. The bungalow was hitherto occupied by the Special Commissioner of Madhya Pradesh in Delhi. Om Prakash Saklecha, on the other hand, is said to be benami owner of a house near Green Park. No outsiders are permitted to enter. Mr V. K. Saklecha's brother-in-law, Mr G. C. Surana, who is now an insurance executive, has been asked to shadow Om Prakash while he is in Delhi, lest he be trapped. Mr Surana, who was earlier an insurance agent in a branch office in Ajmer was brought over to Delhi on a salary of Rs 2200 per month. The general insurance firm extracted its price for the favour and in return got insurance worth Rs. 40,00,000 from various State and autonomous departments in Madhya Pradesh. The company has also given him a loan for a car, which he recently obtained from Premnath Motors. But Mr Surna is seldom seen in the Fiat which is at the disposal of Om Prakash Saklecha.

Om Prakash Saklecha's activities and the spate of corruption charges levelled against his father, the Chief Minister, have embarrassed even the RSS leadership. They too have a "Sanjay" in their midst. ■

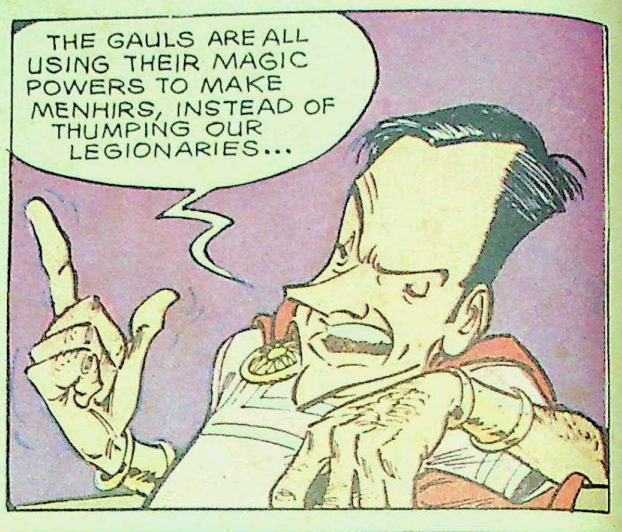
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

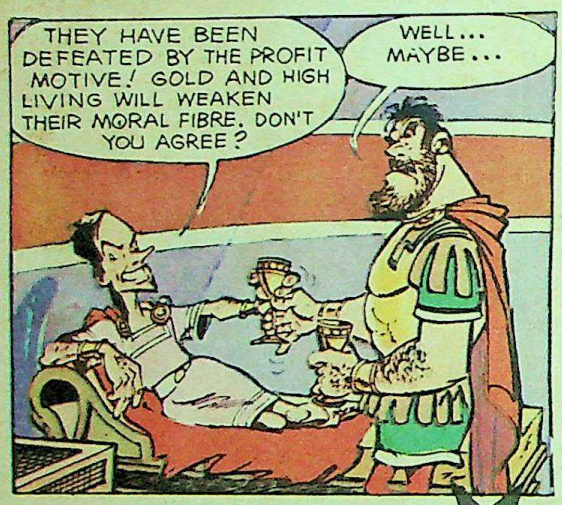
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

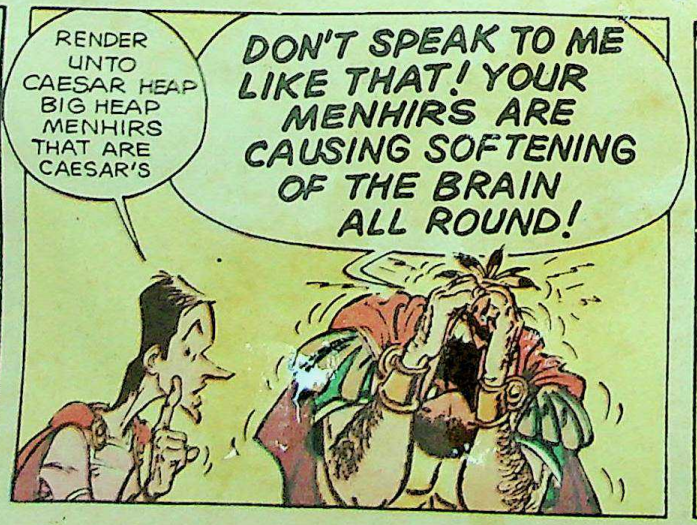
An Asterix Adventure

OBELIX AND CO.

by GOSCINNY and UDERZO

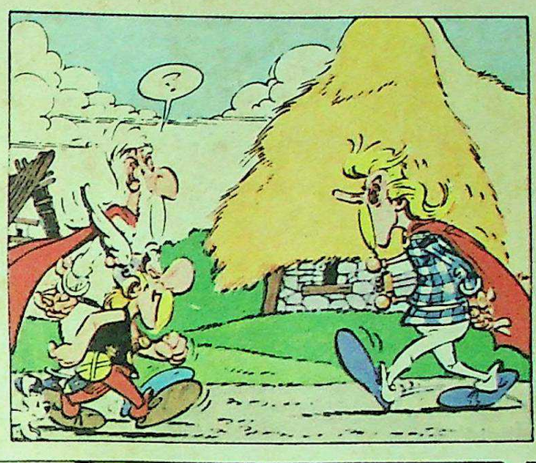


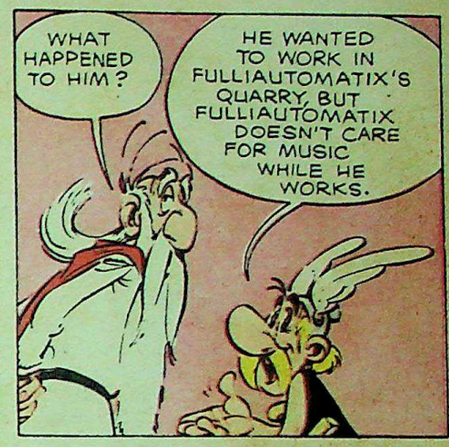


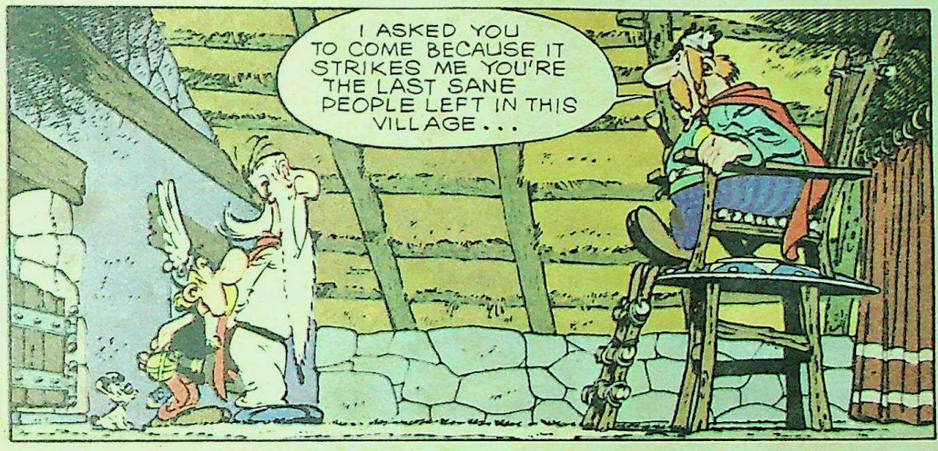


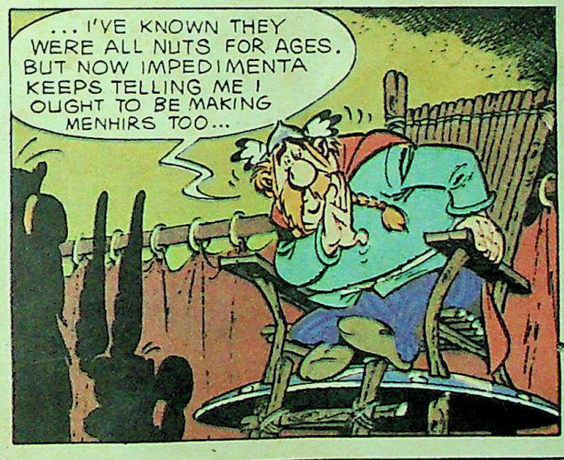
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

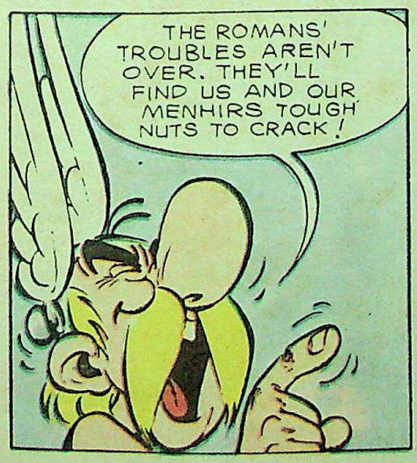
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

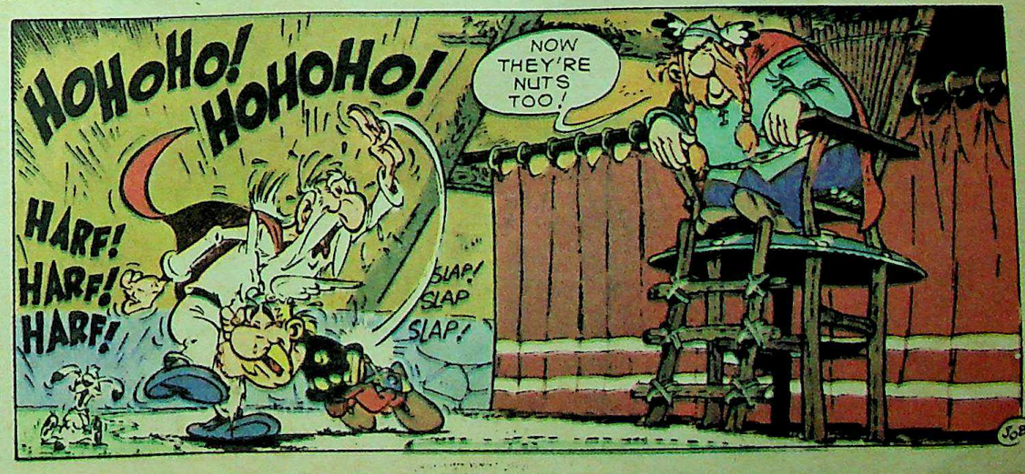












CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The mystery of the Twinkling Star

Several questions about the death of filmstar Kalpana remain unanswered, reports RIMA KASHYAP from Bangalore

SHE was called "Minugutare" (Twinkling star) because of the zest and beauty she threw into her screen roles. They were all unconventional roles—mostly tragic—but she threw herself into her roles with a passion that sent shivers down the spine of the audience. On May 11 this year, Kalpana, three times winner of the State Government's best actress gold medal, was found dead in the Gotur Inspection Bungalow, 50 kms from Belgaum.

The initial reports all said that she had committed suicide but the method she used was not clearly apparent. Her personal attendant, Sakkubai, said that she was in the habit of consuming dozens of sleeping pills before going to bed—but then it was noticed that the diamond in her ring was missing.

The discovery that the diamond was missing caused quite a stir because in one of her most popular movies, "Gejje Puje" (Initiation), Kalpana playing the part of a girl from a Devadasi family is reluctant to join the family business after her education. She swallows a diamond from her ring and dies after the religious ceremony initiating her into the profession. The film won the Best Film award from the State Government, and won her the best actress award as well. Did Kalpana re-play her make-believe movie death in real life as well?

Her family members were informed of her death the next day through a cryptic phone-call from the police asking what they should do with the body. Kalpana's aunt requested them to keep the body intact till they arrived to take it. When the postmortem had been completed, the police sent the body back to Bangalore in a van. The family members met the van en route and "in total darkness, while it poured outside, the body of the beautiful girl was given to us from the dicky of the car." The next morning the body was so disfigured and decomposed that it seemed as if the Twinkling Star had been struck by a meteor. The cremation was held soon after—and immediately after that newspapers, which had earlier accepted the suicide report handed over to them by the ever-compliant cops, echoed the thoughts of the family—suspecting foul-play.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The matter was brought up in the council, one of Kalpana's close friends being Mr Viswanath, MLC. The Opposition leader Subbiah, stated in the council that her body bore marks of injury; that the proprietor of the drama company owed her money and that the suicide letter was unsigned. A letter dated May 9 which reached her mother a day after the cremation said almost gaily that she was well. She enclosed a bank draft of Rs 300 adding that she had sent her younger brother in Bombay Rs 400. She also wrote she would send her mother Rs 1,200 by money order within 2-3 days. "I have some throat trouble", she wrote explaining the reason why she could not act and therefore unable to send more money.

On May 14, the Chief Minister Mr Devaraj Urs, said in the council that the police had not received any complaints about her death. This he did when he was forced to make a statement.

Four days after her death the proprietor of the theatre company, a rich landlord named Basavaraj appeared before the police. He was known to be "close' to Kalpana and in a statement to the police he announced that he had secretly married the star in July 1978 at her residence. Apparently the fact that he has a living wife and six children forced him to keep the marriage a secret. But family friends of Kalpana ask why he should suddenly disclose his bigamous relationship. Relating the events prior to her death Basavaraj said that Kalpana playing the role of Rama's young mother in "Kaliyuga Rama" missed the cue in her dialogue on the night of May 10 while playing at Sankeshwar—a small town near Belgaum. Hot words were exchanged and he slapped her. The next morning he alleges she was in tears and her eyes were red and swollen. According to Sakkubai she later gifted her sarees and clothes to the Bungalow staff.

Meanwhile the post-mortem report released by the police said that her death was not due to strangulation or even consumption of diamond dust. The surgeon added that there was no evidence of external or internal injuries. A lot of time was spent on analysing a book in which a diamond

Kalpana's career

DAUGHTER of a businessman, Kalpana was born Sharat Kumari. She spent some years at St. Ann's Convent, Mangalore and completed her schooling. At 17, she decided she wanted to become an actress. This decision, according to her family, is the reason her father left disapprovingly. Her career on the screen began with "Saaku Magalu" (Adopted daughter). Her small role was not a great success. In fact, it was believed that she would never be successful because of her unconventional beauty and the way she spoke Kannada. She came to the screen via the stage and by the time she acted in Laxmi Narayan's "Naandi" (The beginning) she had attracted attention. She played Raj Kumar's wife who dies in childbirth. Her portrayal of the character earned a lot of sympathy. The film was a success and Kalpana started to rise.

In her very first leading role in Puttana Kanagal's "Belimoda" (Cloud with a silver lining) she enacted what many consider her best film. Playing the fiancee of a young man (who goes abroad and returns and changes his mind about marrying her), she showed various moods—happiness, frustration and desperation.

It was the kind of role that she would subsequently revel in and it gave her the name she was known by—Minugutare (Twinkling star).

Her next, "Uyyaale" (swing) saw her protraying a married woman who falls in love and finally gives up her lover; in "Hannele Chiguridaga" (Rebirth of an old leaf) she played a young widow. The film had tragic undercurrents which by then had become her forte. And it was then that she is said to have become involved with her director Puttana Kanagal.

It was in his film, "Gejje Puje" that the diamond-swallowing episode occurred followed by "Shara Panjara" (Cage of arrows) in which a pre-marital affair haunts her after marriage and ultimately drives her mad.

When she reached fame Kalpana suddenly seemed to have found the position too much for her. Her relationship with Puttana collapsed and she broke up with him—at least professionally. She became very demanding—and even Raj Kumar dropped her as his leading lady. She got fewer roles and at a Press conference at that time she wept and said that "the Kannada film industry had deserted her." Her only trip abroad to Bylo-Russia in 1972 was the only distraction for her that year.

In 1974, she began redecorating a house she had bought on Davis Road. The 5-bedroomed house is done in immaculate taste—white wrought iron pelmets with rich purple curtains and upholstery on white cane in the verandah; cream carpet and a sofa set in the living room. Her books were neatly divided into English and Kannada—Denise Robbins, best sellers, roses and books on trees adorn the room. She had even been asked to do the decor for the West End Hotel some years ago. Often she designed her own clothes for her films—her sexy clothes for the role of the young widow caused quite a controversy.

She thought she was a star and wanted to be treated like one. Whenever she travelled a dozen coconuts and various other fruits surrounded her along with her trunk full of clothes. Even on the last day, a dozen coconuts lay under her bed and a similar number of musambis were on her bedside table. A kathakali dancer in her earlier years, she was known for her lavish hospitality. After her success in films many felt she had become arrogant, but no one ever dreamed that she would take her own life.

R. K.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Trail-Blazer in masculine fashions

GRAVIERA® SUITING GR

The Suiting that is synonymous with sophistication and style

(Mfgd by: BHIWANI TEXTILE MILLS (Prop: The Gwalior Rayon Silk Mfg (Wvg). Co. Ltd.) Birla Colony, Bhiwani (Haryana)

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

like dent was discovered. Kalpana had asked for a metal file, Sakkubai said, and later a hammer, it transpired. The diamond has to this day not been found.

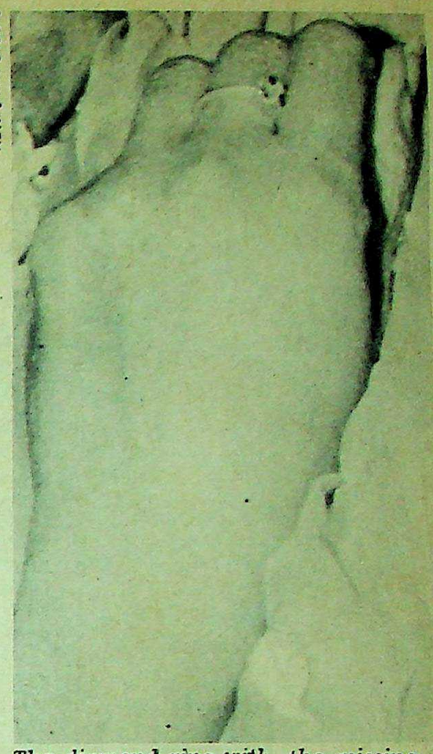
With witnesses making inconsistent statements—and the quick acceptance of the suicide theory by the police which made it difficult to recreate the scene of her death—it became difficult for the COD (Corps of Detectives) team of eight policemen appointed by the CM to find any evidence to support the theory of foul-play.

Evidence there was in plenty. 27 Hypnotex-S pills were found in the room; doubts were expressed about the suicide note; the forensic experts established that she had ingested a toxic dose of a sleeping pill—but hesitated to say whether death was due to the drug or a diamond, and was reluctant to clarify whether it was a case of homicide or suicide.

The police, having already committed themselves to a premature statement of suicide would prefer to let the statement lie. But family members and friends of the star are convinced, like many in Hubli and Belgaum, that the star was either murdered or forced to swallow poison.

Some points made by her aunt, Seethamma. are that Kalpana had a signature which was difficult to copy. Both in English and Kannada she signed with swirls and squiggles. The fact that the suicide note was not signed is very strange. The note, besides, merely says: "Do not worry about the marks on my face—they were caused accidentally when I braked the car to avoid hitting a cow. Do not think I was hit..." She asks: would a girl about to commit suicide write such a note?

There were visible scars on both sides of her forehead, and the tip of her nose was burnt and blistered. Seethamma feels these were probably due to hot tea being poured over her head in anger by someone. As to Sakkubai's evidence, Seethamma scornfully said: "Kalpana's personal attendant for 13 years, Chinnamma was not allowed to go with her for the first time. They (the drama troupe) begged Kalpana for two days to join their troupe. As a matter of fact, they were so insistent they took her baggage with them but they would not allow her own attendant to accompany her and engaged Sakkubai for her." Sakkubai is alleged to have said that she gave some breakfast to Kalpana that morning. Photographs prove that plantain leaves were strewn on the floor of Kalpana's room. "Kalpana was so fastidious about her room she would never have eaten and left her plantain leaf on the floor," said her aunt.



Katti's Art Studio

The diamond ring with the missing diamond

According to the "Artha Vikasa" —a Hubli newspaper of June 10— the viscera examination showed traces of an ingredient which is not found in the Hypnotex-S pills. These pills were later found in her room. The newspaper also asks why no attempt has been made to find out what happened to her between the night of May 10 when she had an altercation with Basavaraj and the night of May 11 when she was found dead.

The jewellery Kalpana was wearing, many of her personal assets and her clothes have yet to be returned to the family. The diamond on her ring was cleanly removed. Would she carefully remove the diamond and then put the ring back on her finger? Where is the drama troupe she was working with? Not one of them had shown up to pay their condolence to the family.

The proprietor of the troupe and the man who claims to have been secretly married to her "disappeared in Hubli for four days after the fight." He made statements that she owed Rs 1.5 lakhs for her house and was pestering him for money. Kalpana's family instead, insist that he owed her money and on the promise of paying her back lured her to Belgaum. "In fact, on the telephone earlier and even in her letter of May 9, she has said that she was going either to Bijapur or Jamkhandi—there was no mention of Sankeshwar till that time." The detectives are to submit their report. One hopes it will be a fair one to the memory of the Twinkling Star. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CONVERSATION

Mishra Case : The other side

"It's politically motivated"

The former Chief Minister of Bihar, DR. JAGANNATH MISHRA, is the younger brother of the late L. N. Mishra. He was present at the Samastipur railway station when Mr L. N. Mishra was injured due to a bomb blast. Dr Mishra was also hurt in the blast. Presently a Congress (I) stalwart and the Leader of the Opposition in the Bihar Vidhan Sabha, Dr Mishra feels that the demand for a fresh probe into his brother's murder is politically motivated. He wants the people found guilty by the CBI prosecuted and the CBI's findings honoured till any substantial evidence is found to the contrary. ARUN RANJAN spoke to him in Patna on May 15.

Krishna Murari Kishan

Q: Why are you opposed to a fresh probe into the murder of Lalit babu?

A: I am not opposed to a fresh probe. There has been some misunderstanding. I do not want the probe to be inspired by political motives. Those who have been found guilty by the CBI should not be considered innocent, until some fresh evidence is found. One thing is clear, the demand for a fresh probe has come up with a motive—that the Ananda Margis found guilty in the case should be released. Take, for example, the last despatch on the Tarkunde report which was published by the Indian Express. In that a strong appeal was made for building up public opinion in favour of a fresh probe, and in case the Government does not yield, for a writ petition. This was the motive behind the Tarkunde report and each of the reports published in the Express. Are these (the Express) people and Mr Tarkunde pursuing their respective professions — journalism and law—or are they advocating the case of a particular group? What is new in the story or the theory of the Tarkunde report? The present DIG (Vigilance) was the DIG (CID) at the time of the murder and the present SP (Vigilance) was the SP of Samastipur. These two had managed to get a confessional statement at that time, which was not accepted by the Government. Now these two gentlemen, sitting in the Vigilance Department, want to give credibility to the theory advanced by them earlier and gain rewards. The people who are demanding a fresh probe and those who are accused in the case are in league with each other. One of the accused, an Ananda Margi, Ranjan Dwivedi, has in the past worked as a junior lawyer with Mr Tarkunde. Mr Tarkunde himself has worked as a lawyer for the Vigilance Department in which the two officers (mentioned above), Sahay and Ojha, were in charge. The journalist, B. M. Sinha, on whose so-called investigations the reports in the Indian Express were based, is committed to the Ananda Marg. He has in the past been arrested as an Ananda Margi. According to my information, Mr Sinha had been to jail during the Emergency for being an Ananda Margi. The Government's intentions are also clear from the fact that the findings of Mr Tarkunde were not made available to all the newspapers but to one newspaper, and the reports were released after much planning and consideration. It is the Ananda Marg and some vested interests who are behind the demand for a fresh probe.

Q: How did you become the Chief Minister after Lalit Babu's death? It is alleged that the post was offered to you in order to keep you silent.

A: There is no justification for this (allegation). The move for removing Mr Abdul Gafoor (as Chief Minister) had started long back, during Lalit Babu's lifetime itself. He did not enjoy the majority support in the Party. The Party High Command knew this. When the Party had expressed its lack of confidence in Mr Kedar Pande, two-thirds of the Party's legislators had expressed their confidence in me. But at that time I had informed the High Command in writing that I did not want to take up the leadership. Therefore, to say that I was made the Chief Minister for any other reason is totally wrong and baseless. Was Gafoor really removed? When he saw the lack of support for him (within the Party) and the growing unrest, he had no option but to resign. I enjoyed a massive majority in the Assembly, so I was elected unopposed. Another thing: when Lalit Babu died due the bomb explosion, I had a narrow escape. I was near him. I could have been killed and he could have survived. Do you think that I am shielding the people who may have killed me? Even today I feel the pain of the wounds caused by the bomb splinters. Why don't you look at the case objectively? Everything would then be clear.

Q: What was the relationship between Ram Bilas Jha and Lalit Babu? What are your terms with Jha now?

A: As far as I know he (Jha) was Lalit Babu's trusted man. He used to carry out Lalit Babu's orders. I do not know him intimately.

Q: What were the political and personal relations between Mrs Gandhi and Lalit Babu in the period immediately preceding his death?

A: As far as I know, till January 1, 1975, their relations were extremely good—both political and personal. This I know because he (L. N. Mishra) used to confide in me about political matters. Therefore, I can confidently say that their relations were never bad. Despite a forceful campaign by his opponents, Mrs Gandhi did not agree to either removing him from the Ministry, or to an enquiry against Lalit Babu because he was her trusted lieutenant. What other proof do you want?

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Q: Then how do you react to the statement of Lalit Babu's widow, Kameshwari Devi, that Mrs Gandhi wanted to remove Lalit Babu from the Centre and make him the Chief Minister of Bihar?

A: This is wrong and baseless.

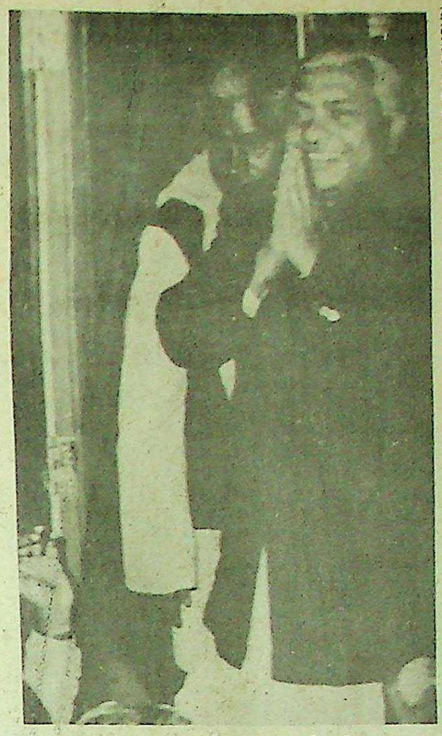
Q: Do you have any reservations regarding the role of the two CID officers, Mr Shashibhushan Sahay and Mr D. P. Ojha? Do you doubt their integrity?

A: Both these officials have political motives. They have been more involved in politicking than policing. Perhaps that is the reason why, instead of being punished, they have been getting promotions. The Mathew Commission had held the local administration of Samastipur guilty of neglecting the security criterion (on the day of the murder). Ojha was then the SP of Samastipur, so he knew about his failing. Even then the DIG (CID), Mr Sahay, entrusted the initial investigation to Mr Ojha. The so-called confessional statement was obtained at the instance of these two, who wanted to get rewards. A cash award of Rs 25,000 was recommended for Ojha and a President's Police medal for Sahay. I removed Sahay's name from the awards list because he had wrongly recommended Ojha's name for the cash reward. I had opposed this duo's investigative theory. These facts were known to the former Janata Chief Minister, Mr Karpoori Thakur.

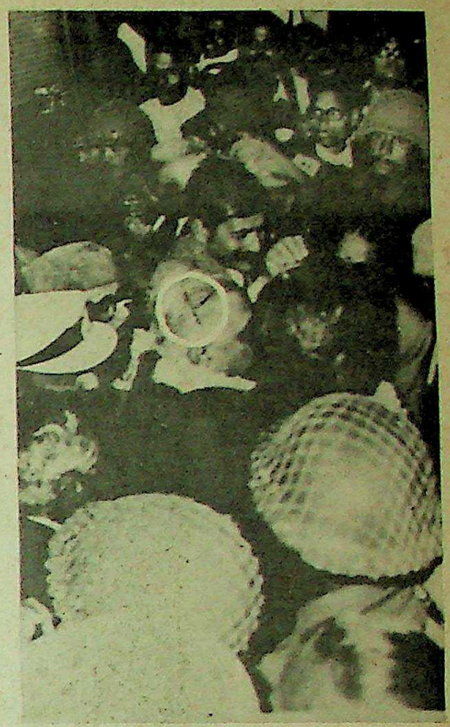
Mr Karpoori Thakur posted these two officials to the Vigilance Department for two reasons. First, to advance his political interests. For example, they seized the incriminating letters from Haridwar Pandey. Secondly, these officers were entrusted with the task of filing false cases against me, because as the Leader of the Opposition I had been a strong critic of the Thakur Government. These two officers took full advantage of Thakur's weaknesses. On these people's instance the former Chief Minister had instituted the Tarkunde probe. Because there were close ties between these two officers and Mr Tarkunde, they managed to advance their old theory through him. Based on their old theory and some untenable arguments, these two prepared a 35-page report and got it signed by Mr Tarkunde. Karpoori had no option but to order the Tarkunde probe because these two officers had in their possession the incriminating letters seized from Haridwar Pandey, which were in his (Karpoori's) own handwriting.

Q: You reached Lalit Babu moments after he was hit by the bomb. Is it true that he told you that it was the work of some 'high-level' people?

A: As far as I remember, he suspected the railway union leader George Fernandes and the striking railwaymen. He suspected that a conspiracy was hatched by these people. This is broadly what he had said; I do not remember what exactly he had said, four years after the incident.



Krishna Murari Kishan



L. N. Mishra arrives at platform no 3 of Samastipur railway station

Q: Why was no post-mortem done on Lalit Babu's body?

A: There was no talk of a post-mortem then. He had been operated upon, and the reason for his death had been declared by the doctors. What was the need for a post-mortem then?

Q: Was there any 'unidentified person' in the train that brought the injured Lalit Babu from Samastipur to Danapur? Was Lalit Babu carrying some documents? If so, what happened to them? Did anybody offer any food to him during the journey? If so, who, and where?

A: I was injured and in pain. I was in a state of semi-conciousness. How could I have known about any unidentified person? We were in the same bogey, but in different compartments. There was some luggage with Lalit Babu which was taken off the train at Danapur. He was under the care of Dr Bhalla. He must have eaten only what the doctor had given him to eat.

Q: What do you have to say about the so-called confessional statements of Arun Thakur and Arun Mishra?

A: Neither are their statements reliable, nor is there any logic in them. The strong motivation that should be evident in the murder of an important man is missing in the weak statements given by them. In any case, does the law accept confessional statements obtained forcibly?

Q: What are the steps you have taken in this matter, apart from making public statements that there should be no fresh probe, or that the probe should be on the correct lines?

A: I wonder why the Government is so interested in the murder case. The Mathew Commission submitted its report. It was approved by the Cabinet. Even the Janata-dominated Parliament approved a part of the report. Should not action have been initiated on at least that part of the report which has been approved? Shouldn't action have been taken against the two officers? They were held responsible for the lack of security arrangements. Shouldn't they have been given exemplary punishment to ensure that in future Government officers did not act in such a negligent manner? What was Karpoori Thakur's duty—to appoint the Tarkunde probe, or to punish the guilty officers? The intentions of many people (who are dealing with the case) seem doubtful. It is ironical that a tragic murder case should be politicised by a Government and the people should remain silent spectators. More than the urge for finding out the murderers of Lalit Babu, these people are interested in shielding the Ananda Marg. One day, this will prove tragic for Delhi.

Dr Jagannath Mishra

Krishna Murari Kishan

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

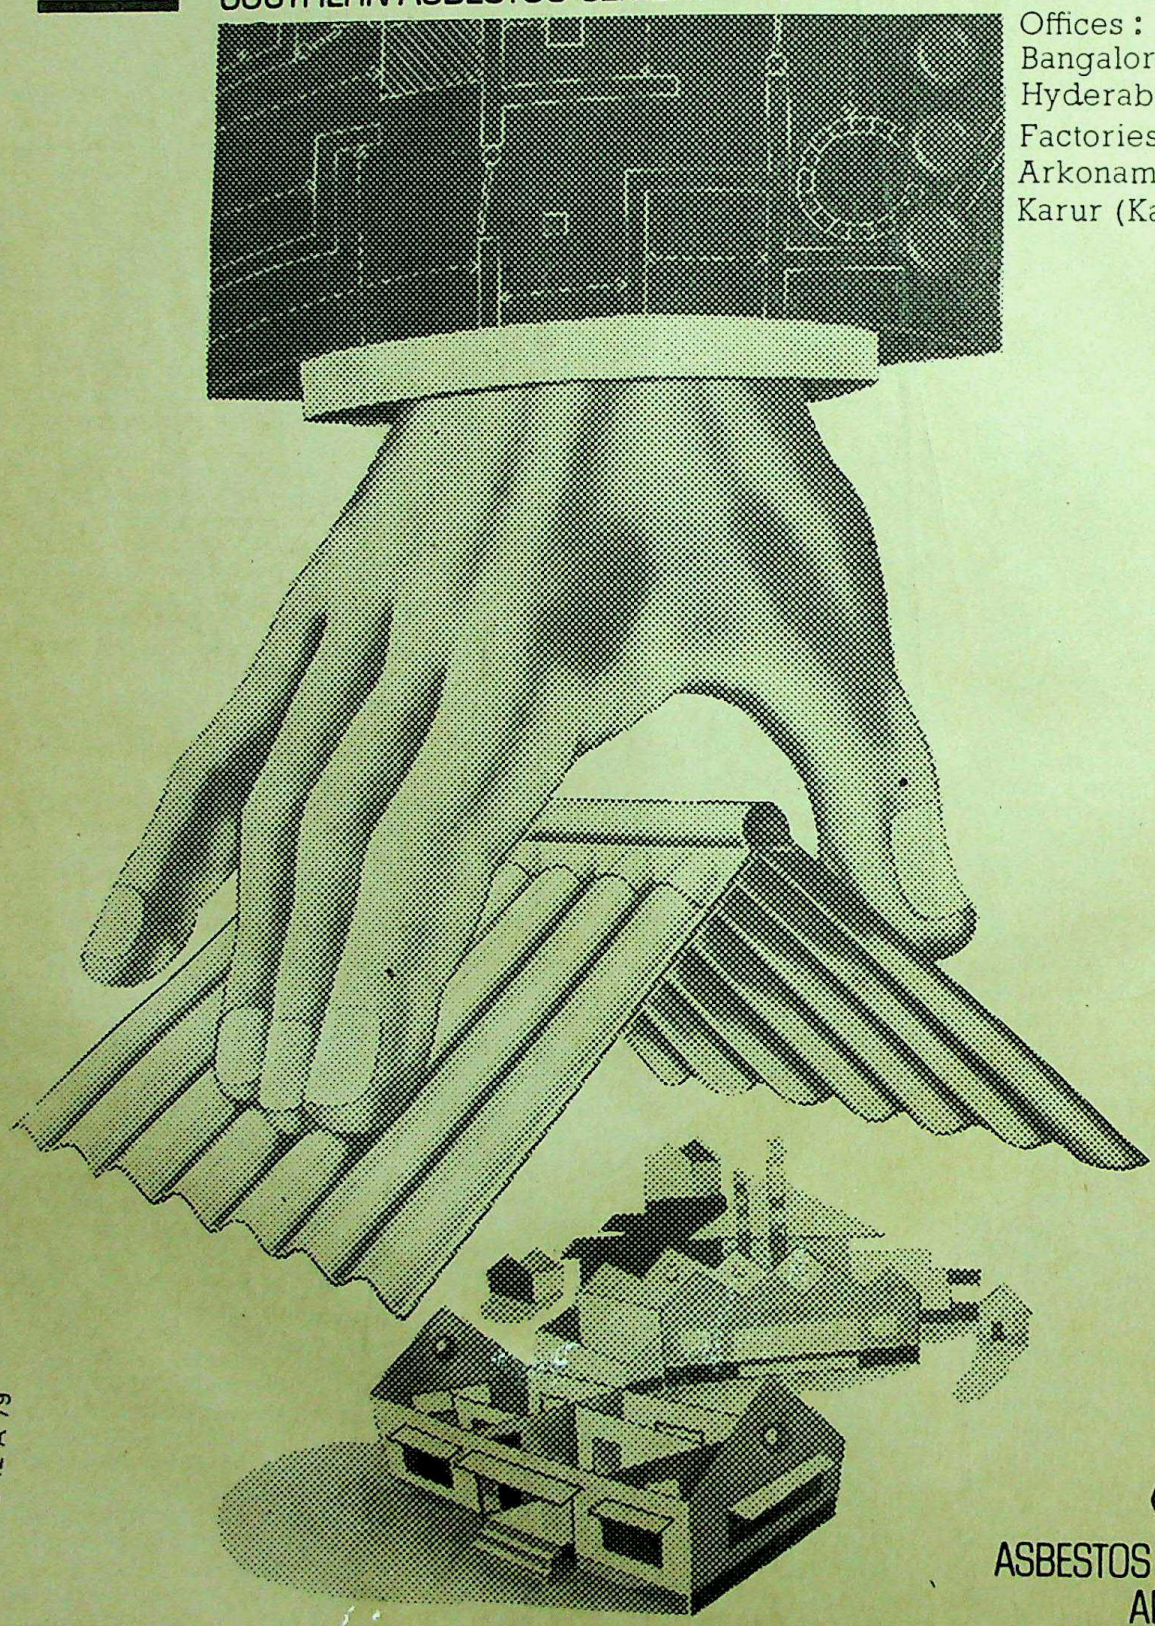
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

RAMCO'S RULE:

A ROOF IS JUST A ROOF, EXCEPT...

...when it is a Ramco roof. All asbestos cement roofs look alike. But Ramco asbestos cement sheets are the choice of leading architects and builders. And that sets them apart. Because these people are very demanding... About strength and durability. Fire and corrosion resistance. Weather proofing... In short, they look for permanent protection with minimum maintenance. Ramco gives them all that. Stringent quality control and modern plants ensure that Ramco performs best. A roof is a roof...But leading architects and builders know the exception – Ramco!

SOUTHERN ASBESTOS CEMENT LTD., 739 Anna Salai, Madras 600 002



Offices :
Bangalore • Vijayawada
Hyderabad • Cochin • Pune

Factories :
Arkonam (Tamilnadu),
Karur (Karnataka)

Ramco
ASBESTOS CEMENT SHEETS
AND ACCESSORIES

ACIL SAC 12 A 79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

"They tortured me for 27 days"

In the second week of May, one of the chief accused witnesses in the L. N. Mishra murder case, Arun Kumar Mishra, along with another witness, Arun Kumar Thakur, arrived in Patna. They were very keen to meet a senior Congress leader. Of medium build and height, fair complexioned, a short hair cut, a moustache, with a towel placed on his shoulders, Arun Kumar Mishra is in the habit of speaking in a bossy manner. We present his story, which he told ARUN RANJAN, in his own words. This is strictly Arun Mishra's version.

ON January 8, 1975 people from the CBI came to my house to look for me. At that time I was in Mohiuddinnagar. When I returned people told me that the CBI had been looking for me and that I should go and meet them. On January 10, I met a CBI officer, Ahuja. From January 10 to 28, 1975, I was interrogated. They even searched my house. In the end they said I could go.

Suddenly, on February 3, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon the SP of Police, Mr D. P. Ojha, Inspector K. P. Singh, along with other CID officers, raided my house. They were accompanied by a police contingent. They surrounded my house. I asked Ojha: 'SP saab, what is the need for such a large force? Whenever you have called me, I have gone and met you.' Ojha replied: 'I have brought this force along with me for security purposes. IG saab has come and he wants to meet you.' They took me to the Samastipur thana. At 10 o'clock at night I discovered that I was under arrest. For three days I was fine. From the fourth day the interrogation started. On the fifth day I found that Arun Thakur had been brought here too. In fact, they purposely made me see him from a distance. I understood that Thakur had also been detained in connection with the L. N. Mishra case. Soon after, we were shifted to the Dalsinghsarai IB (office) Even in Dalsinghsarai, there were heavy security arrangements. It was at this place that an interrogation cell had been opened. We were kept separately. My interrogation started: 'How did you know Thakur? How was the murder plan drawn up? Who all were present and where?' I said that from 10 days before the incident I had not met Thakur. I kept on repeating this and then they showed their true colours. First, both my legs were tied up, I was turned around and my legs were tied to the window. Then they started hitting me with a rod on the soles of my feet. They carried on hitting me and asking me questions: 'Which prominent people and politicians are involved in this?' When I could not answer, they untied my legs and tied my hands, separately, to the window—crucifixion style. It was very painful. Whenever I tried to rest by lowering my head or closing my eyes, they threw ice-cold water on one. It was winter, so you can well imagine my condition. This torture carried on for 27 to 28 days. In between, for two days, I was made to lie down on ice. The police made sure that I didn't die. They used to keep warm water next to me. When my blood began to freeze, I was removed, and washed in warm water till I felt better, and, then put on ice again.

Krishna Murari Kishan

Ram Bilas Jha, alias "Boss" Jha

Now you might ask why I was implicated. In 1973, at the Bhagalpur jail I had met Shiv Narain Vishwakarma (alias Sharma) for a short while. After he was released from there, Shiv Narain started writing letters to me. The police got hold of a letter and some leftist pamphlets which he had sent, from me. Arun Thakur had written a booklet called "Red Revolution". They had found a part of that. On the basis of these, the police were preparing a case. And they were asking me to confess.

Even then I did not listen, and the next part began. Along with the beating they gave me an opium injection. Under the influence of the opium, people normally do not become unconscious but tend to give an exaggerated account of things. They wanted me to corroborate their version. I was forced to give an oral statement. One day, the SP, Ojha, gave me a paper to read. I got to know later that under the table, they had placed a tape-recorder. When I read the paper Ojha had handed over to me, all that I read got taped. When it had been taped, the IG of Police, Ghosh saab, came to Samastipur. I was brought before him. He told me of this statement. I denied it. Then the tape was played. I told IG saab that I did not know anything, and that I had read from a piece of paper which Ojha saab had handed over to me, and he had taped this without my knowledge. Naturally, when IG saab went away, Ojha beat me mercilessly for having said what I had before the IG.

Not having got anything from me, they started turning their attention towards Arun Thakur. One day they got a confession from Thakur. They gave it to me to read, and said: 'See, had you done the same, the Government would have made you an approver. Now we will release Thakur. But there is still time; if you make a statement in front of the magistrate, we will also release you.'

Under these new circumstances, I got a bit nervous. I said, 'OK, since Thakur has given his confession, I will consider it'. I was taken to the SP's house. There, after a long time, I was served good food. When SP saab went to sleep I was given Thakur's statement, so that I could read that and prepare my own statement. Till late at night I was reading it. Suddenly I realised that all this was very wrong. So in the morning, I refused to give a statement. When SP saab came, he came to know that I had got the statement, but after reading it, I had decided not to give a confession. He got angry and said, 'All right, lock him up'.

After that I was kept in Samastipur jail. I did not know what these people were up to. There the jailer, Rahman, started pampering me to give a confession. He said that Thakur had already given his statement and asked me to mention a few names among which Ram Bilas Jha's name should be mentioned. The truth is that I would not recognise Ram Bilas Jha even today. One day the jailer prepared some questions and answers and started drilling me, just the way children are drilled in order to make them learn their lessons. He was asking some questions about the case—'Yes, then what happened?' This was the way he extracted a statement from me and taped it. Later on, with a lot of fanfare, this was displayed as my second confession.

In reality, I had not given any confession. During Holi, the Director of CBI, D. Sen, along with some other CBI officers, arrived in Samastipur. The jailer, Rahman, on the pretext that it was Holi, made me drink a lot of liquor. Then I was brought before D. Sen. There the jailer played the manipulated tape. Every one was congratulating the jailer for what he had done. The jailer was under the impression that under the influence of alcohol, I would say 'yes' to whatever they asked me. But I again told them the entire story of how a list of questions and answers had been drawn up and how the entire thing was made to look like a statement.

The L. N. Mishra murder case is being brought up again. See what people like us, who are weak, alone and innocent have to face.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Pope goes home

UPI

The Pope in Warsaw's Victory Square

SOMETIME back, a cocktail party was held in the Holiday Inn, just outside Krakow on the road to Auschwitz. It was a hearty, almost triumphant occasion with vodka supplied by the Bison Brand people who had been dispensing their fine product, gratis, plus Bison Brand desk flags, key rings and ballpoint pens to the thousand or more foreign Press covering the Pope's tour of his homeland. It was an invitations-only affair hosted by the Foreign Ministry of the People's Republic and with guests drawn from four distinct groups: the hierarchies of the United Workers (Communist) Party and the Polish Church, the Vatican and the media. "This is such a wonderful celebration", said a bishop to a senior Ministry 'spokesman', whose arm appeared to be fixed to the bishop's shoulder, as if a tango were contemplated. "There is much to celebrate", said he; and the happy, crumpled faces of both God's and Ceasar's servants seemed to indicate this was so. Certainly, the Press could not have been happier; shrewd nannying by the Government Interpress Agency was almost American-style with cataracts of handouts and translations, interpreters, 'shuttle' buses and batteries of phones and Telex machines wherever we went, including a 'Press centre' in the Gate of Death at Birkenau extermination camp, overlooking the ovens and the chimneys.

But what was the celebration really about? From what I could gather here, a great many commentators in Western Europe and America have seen the Pope's tour in trusted Cold War terms of good (the Church) triumphant over evil (Communism); and of course it was nothing of the sort. Of all the hisctoric 'firsts', the most significant was scarcely mentioned: the striking of an unwritten deal between the Vatican, representing spiritual imperialism, and the Polish leadership, representing Stalinist imperialism. It is a deal involving great gamesmanship, under which, for the sake of self preservation and 'continuity', each recognises the other's boundaries of power in Poland—power, that is, to subdue and tame the Polish people. At the Pope's airport farewell the Polish President, Henryk Jablonski having been bear-hugged by the Pontiff, put it like this. There is now, he said, a "convergence between Church and State in Poland." There is in other words, another 'concordat', though much more subtle than the last which was consummated between the Vatican and Germany in 1933.

On the eve of the Pope's arrival, I was introduced to a senior Government bureaucrat, a man responsible for much of Poland's foreign trade dealing by one of his 'liberal' friends in the film world. He said: "If you come here and wish to see this event as an heroic Pope returning home and thereby challenging the power of the State, that is your mistake. The reality is quite different. Poland is the political volcano of the Soviet bloc; the workers brought down Gomulka and two of his predecessors and ninety per cent of them are Roman Catholic. Without an accommodation between Church and State neither will survive in their present form. Anyway, look how much we have in common! We are both totalitrian. We both wish to control people and to instruct their minds! The Pope is a Pole; he knows this better than anyone, and as Pope it's his job —his sacred duty!—to accommodate with the lesser evil..."

Such measured cynicism is echoed by those who oppose or rather resist the regime as best they can: especially writers and filmmakers who have survived by perfecting what they call 'the code of the metaphor'. (A radical Polish film currently doing the rounds here is called King Fu, which to the politically initiated means 'struggle for freedom'.)

Throughout his tour the Pope's generally vapid jibes at the regime were blown into headlines and given a significance they did not deserve, especially when you compare them with his effusive flattery of the Central Committee. To Edward Gierek, the Party Chairman, he said, "I express my esteem for all your solicitude that has as its aim the common good of fellow citizens". To the assembled Politburo, he said, "I have regard for all of you, the distinguished representatives of the authorities and for each one in particular and the dignity which you hold..." And they all beamed and shook on it.

In his book, God's First Love, probably the most documented account of the Vatican's 1933 Concordat with the Nazis, Frederich Heer wrote: "Archbishop Grober, in the Handbook of Contemporary Religious Questions which was published with official church approval in Freiburg in 1937 and which gave the authoritative view of the German churches on all political and religious questions of the Nazi period, declared the Concordat to be "a proof that two powers, totalitarian in character, can reach an agreement, if their spheres are clearly differentiated..." That is precisely what they were celebrating the other night at the Holiday Inn.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

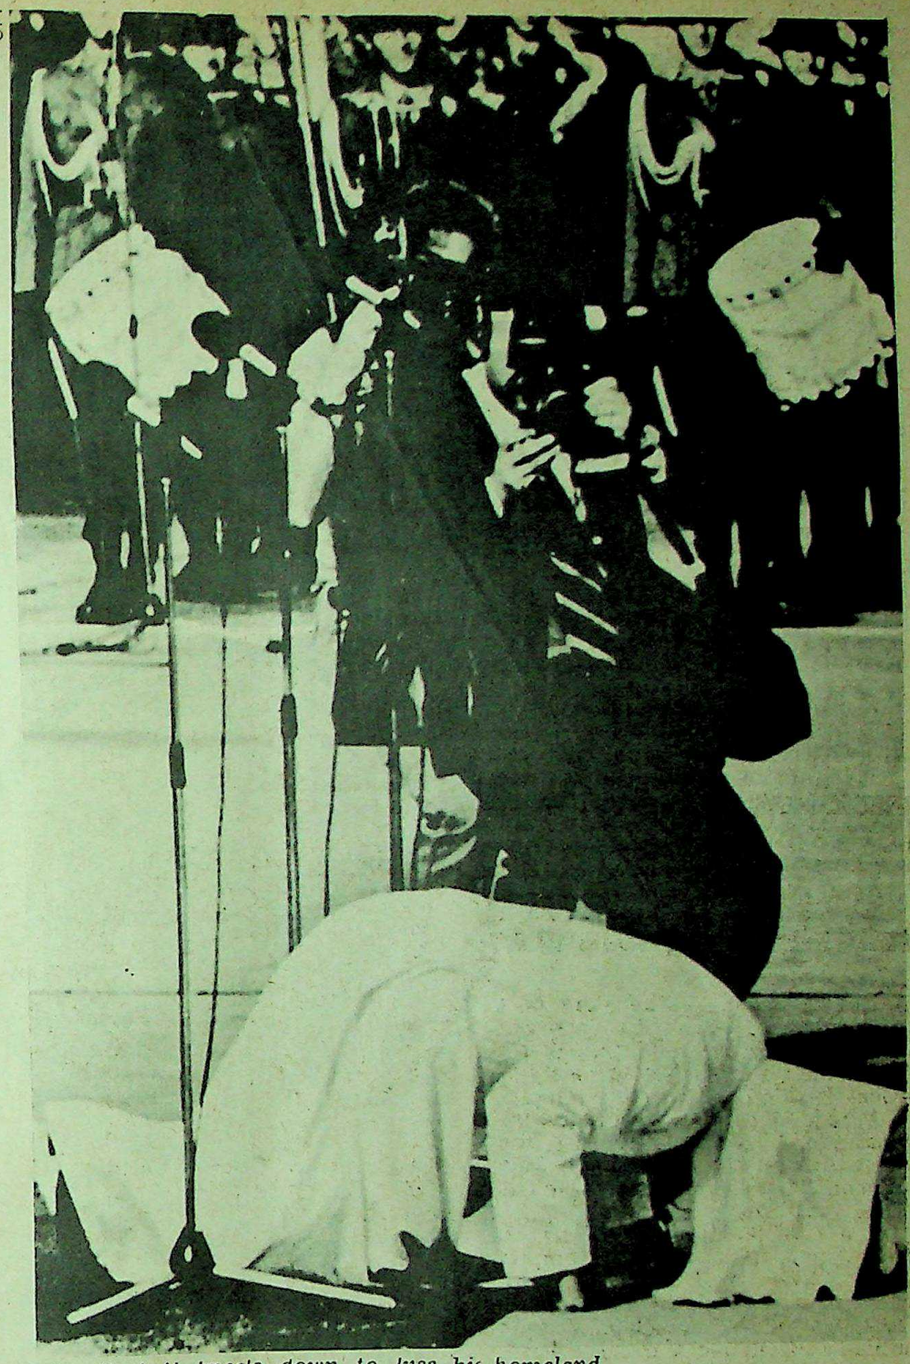
OF course, Pope John Paul II is a very different man from the reclusive, tortured character that was Pius; but what the ballyhoo surrounding him on his Polish odyssey concealed was that like Pius and Paul (John was an aberration: the one true radical), he is a profound fundamentalist, a preserver at all costs.

Since his installation as Pope, his considerable energies have been directed almost exclusively to shoring up the archaic fortress of the Catholic church, as exemplified by the Polish branch, which produced him and is still very much medieval at heart. (One unforgettable sight was a long line of confessional booths, on a meadow beside the Jasna Gora monastery, with a queue of passive sinners awaiting their turn.) Do those who have exalted the Polish Church's 'struggle for freedom' seriously suggest that the Poles would have more democratic freedoms if they swapped Edward Gierek for the despotic Cardinal Wyzynski?

Indeed, in the short time since Karol Wojtyla became Pope, he has wasted no time in condemning all the main liberalising forces within the Church: those that champion a more humane attitude toward birth control, abortion, divorce and the celibacy rules for priests. In his Puebla speech he said nothing about those Christians, including many priests, who have suffered in the torture chambers of Latin America and have died in the defence of human rights and their Christian faith. I was in Mexico, shortly after the Pope's visit and met young priests, superb men, trying to battle with poverty, the State oligarchy and their own hyper-orthodox masters, and who waited for a powerful word of support from Joh Paul II. One of them who bore the scars of a torture session in El Salvador, said, "I despair his silence". The 1970's may be a very different world from the 1930s and 1940s; but Pius, in his obsession with the preservation of Fortress Vatican, alas said nothing about the thousands of similar sufferers.

John Paul II is undoubtedly the first 'media Pope'. I have been to a number of 'media events' around the world; I have never been to one like that staged at Auschwitz and Birkenau death camps during his visit. At Birkenau, the Pope's large white helicopter landed in a plantation of chimneys: hundreds of horrific sentinels built at ground level and with the ovens beneath. Nearby was a prefabricated edifice for the Mass, a kind of Papal reviewing stand, with the gold and velvet Papal throne, a giant cross girt by barbed wire and two priests, former prisoners, wearing copies of the infamous striped uniform. And half a million people. And stalls selling busts of the Pope, plastic Dying Christs, ice cream, Coca Cola and sizzling sausages—the first meat, incidentally, many of the faithful had seen for weeks. Those photographers who managed to escape from the 'media enclosure' and try for a creative angle of His Holiness were swiftly apprehended by armband wearing toughs from the parishes; heaving a camera strap from behind was favourite method of ecclesiastical arrest. If revolutionary fires had been lit in the great crowds, it would have been these soldiers of the Church who would have put them out.

Over all this was a whiff of of hypocrisy. Most of those murdered here were Jews, and they died while church bells continued to peal in Germany. And here was the leader of the Church celebrating mass at the epicentre of their agony. Of the Jews he said this: "The very people that received from God the commandment, 'Thou Shalt Not Kill', itself experienced in special measure what is meant by killing. It is not permissible for anyone to pass by this...with indifference." And that was all he said about them. If ever there was a historic opportunity to publicly repudiate the Church's darkest age since the Inquisition—the Concordat with the Nazis which, in effect, condemned many Jews to death—this was such an opportunity. But he made no mention of it, which is a pity.



UPI

John Paul II kneels down to kiss his homeland

JOHN PILGER from Poland

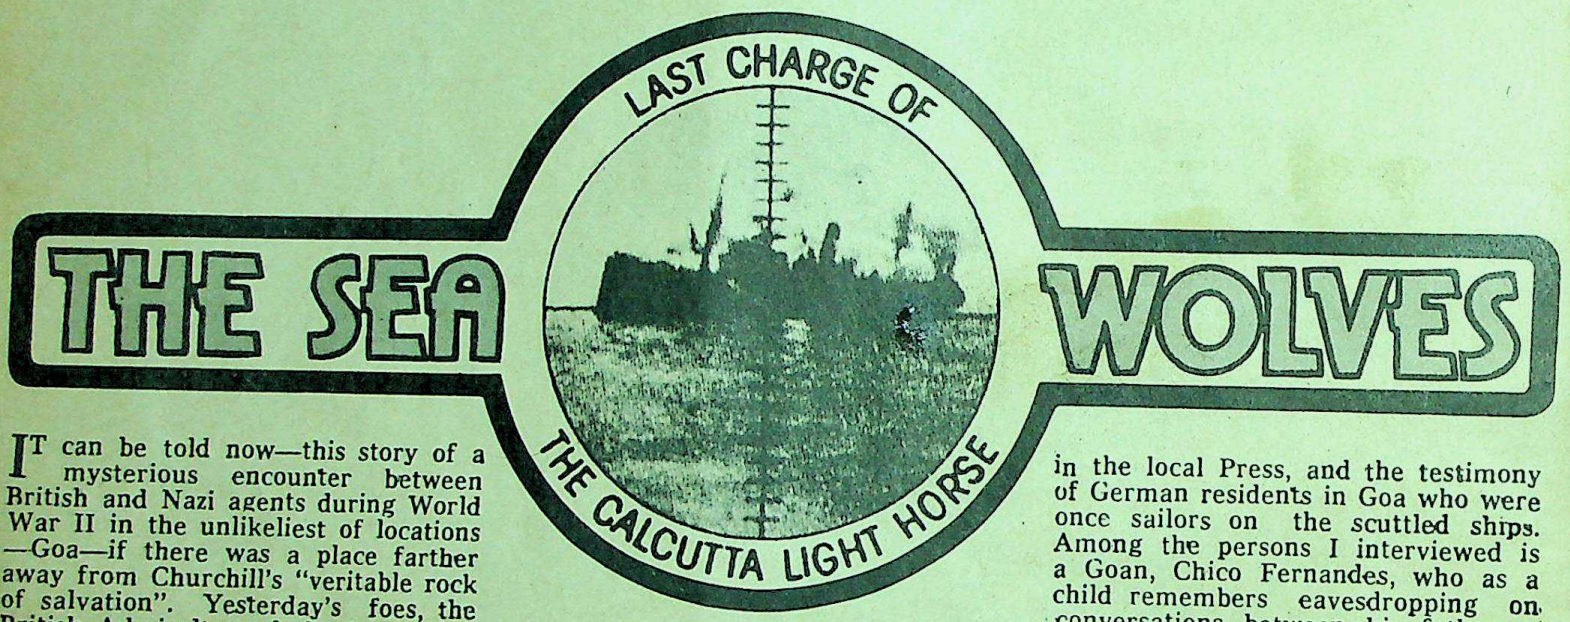
(By arrangement with New Statesman)

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Goa's secret war

Thirty-six years ago, Goa was the scene of an unexpected encounter that might have shocked those who thought India was a safe-enough distance away from Nazi Germany. The German Consul in Goa, then a neutral Portuguese colony, and his wife were kidnapped, whisked off to Belgaum, forced to give out secrets, and shot dead. The attack followed the discovery that the Consul was a spy who regularly transmitted details of Allied ship movements to Germany. MARIO CABRAL e SA met residents of Goa who remember the affair, and got the full story of this secret war.



IT can be told now—this story of a mysterious encounter between British and Nazi agents during World War II in the unlikeliest of locations —Goa—if there was a place farther away from Churchill's "veritable rock of salvation". Yesterday's foes, the British Admiralty and the Bonn Government, have got together to tell it all. 36 years later.

On a carnival dawn, of March 9, 1943, Panaji was woken from its drunken haze by loud blasts. The southernmost tip of the town, Dona Paula, was lit by the blaze of four burning ships in the Marmagoa harbour, one Italian and three German. Smudges of blood shimmered on the emerald green sea, and dead bodies floated amid the debris of the burning ships.

Three months previously, Robert Koch, the German Consul in Goa, and his wife Greta, were kidnapped from their house in Panaji's elite residential district of Altinho, before aghast Goan housewives, still in their rollers and nighties, talking sleepily to the bakers outside their half-open bedroom windows. Disguised as a bona-fide representative, Koch was part of the formidable, worldwide Nazi spy network and operated under the code name 'Trompeta'. And what a silent operator he was, despite the name! On intelligence regularly supplied by him, German U-boats were sinking upto an average of 40 Allied ships a month in the Arabian Sea, under the very nose of Mountbatten's South East Command, based in Colombo.

These facts have been culled by James Leasor from the records of the British Admiralty, the statutory limit on their secrecy of 35 years having lapsed in 1978. Leasor's book, The Boarding Party (published by William Heinemann, London, May 1978, priced at £ 4.90), was serialised in London's Sunday Express in spring last year. Euan Lloyd, the producer of Wild Geese and Guns of Navarone, has bought the filming rights. The film is to be shot in Goa around October this year, apart from some location work in Calcutta, where the British had mustered the 'boarding party' from among the armchair soldiers of the Light Horse (also called the Tight Horse, for their love of alcohol) and the Calcutta Scottish, both clubs of disgruntled soldiers, and Cochin, from where the 'party' sailed for the assault by the Phoebe, a dredger secretly arranged for the operation by the Calcutta Port Commissioners.

James Leasor's account, though not authentic in detail, is by and large credible. (I gleaned material for this feature from such sources as the Historical Archives in Goa, police records, a thesis on Portuguese diplomacy by Dr P. Shirodkar, reports in the local Press, and the testimony of German residents in Goa who were once sailors on the scuttled ships. Among the persons I interviewed is a Goan, Chico Fernandes, who as a child remembers eavesdropping on conversations between his father, a schoolteacher, and a Colonel of the Portuguese Medical Corps, a Goan, both of whom collaborated with Koch, and spoke in whispers about the war and the secret operations afoot.)

LISA was eighteen and slender. Her father, Paul Gasse, repaired watches and had been an engineer aboard one of the spy ships scuttled in the Marmagoa harbour. After his ship floundered, he spent with the other survivors, ten years in a Portuguese prison in Goa, after which he decided to stay back and send for his family. Germany, for him, was done for. But he was still proud of being a German: an Arab merchant settled in Panaji, who smuggled gold to India, had once sent him a signed blank cheque. "Fill in the amount and send me your daughter," he had said in a note attached. But Gasse knew better. He sent back the cheque and kept his daughter. "The Reich may have fallen, the Germans still had their pride." Paul is now dead and Lisa, aged and frail, lives in Germany. She still plays the accordion, as when I knew her, and she still is a 'navy girl'—her husband is an engineer in the merchant navy.

Madame Hepp was a tall, bony

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

blonde—a bit mousy perhaps, but still great fun. She would step out of her virgin-white bedroom, tiptoe gingerly to the centre of the dim-lit parlour, flip open her green and black bathrobe, and rush back into her room before the sex-starved Portuguese officers, gathered for a sundowner, had caught a glimpse of her sparsely-haired pubis. If encored, she would be back, cackling loudly as a hen that had just laid an egg, curtsey and fling around rubber condoms, customarily 'made in Deutschland'. Some had embossed scales no larger than a lizard's, others had a cock's comb on the top. "Try them. good night." And Madame Hepp would finally get into her bath, alone.

Like a bunch of little children clutching their lollypops, the Portuguese officers would grab their rubbers, troop out in a bustle, climb excitedly into their waiting Volkswagens, and shoot out into the night, looking for a whore.

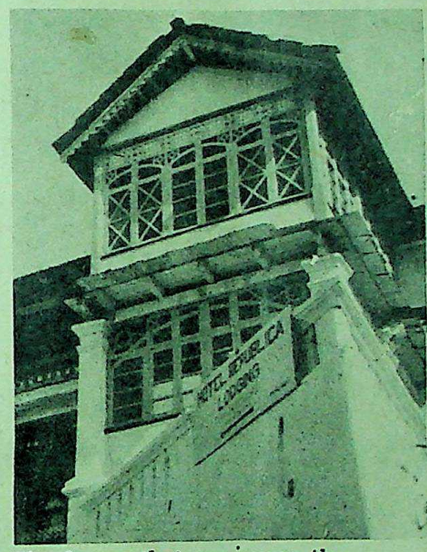
That was Panaji, circa 1954. For a living, Robert Hepp (Madame's husband) sold cars—German cars, of course—by the thousand. And understandably, because Madame Hepp's titillation always worked. It was an ingenious arrangement, and business was brisk. And no wonder. Robert Hepp had a talent for ingenuity: He had been a radio officer aboard the spy ship Ehrenfels and knew 'Trompeta' very well, as he must have, for how else would Koch have sunk so many British ships in the Arabian Sea?

Chico Fernandes markets tyres in Goa. As a child he recollects having overheard his father and a doctor friend talking in whispers about certain radio transmissions. One of the transmitters in question was concealed in a small, inconspicuous private shoe-polish manufacturing laboratory near the town post office. The laboratory had a small range of unimportant products: shoe polish, and tranquillizers for hysteria.

When World War II was on in full cry, Portugal was a neutral country, and so Goa too, being a Portuguese possession. But the British did not take any chances with Goa, knowing it to be a secret base of German espionage. They posted a stocky officer of the Bombay CID in Goa, Inspector D'Souza, to tail 'Trompeta' wherever he went. Mr D'Souza bred poodles (I knew him as a teenager; in fact, he had given my sister one of his poodles as a gift. His son Daniel D'Souza, once a Free Press Journal sports reporter, worked for me when I was editing a local daily in Goa) and pretended to be a Goan come home on an extended holiday. The British Special Operations Executive (SOE) and radio monitoring services had thoroughly investigated the German secret operations in Goa. 'Trompeta' was found to supply clear and precise data to the German U-boats. One of them, U-181, commanded by Lt Wolfgang Luth, had sunk the Dorrington Court, a 5,000 tonner and seven other ships in almost as many days. British intelligence also grew wise to who and where 'Trompeta' was. In fact, 'Trompeta' and Inspector D'Souza's contacts were common. The good Nazi that he was, 'Trompeta' was haughty and worked almost singlehanded. SOE found out about his secret transmissions from India, which seemed unbelievable to those who still maintained Britannia ruled the waves.

The British, on the other hand, wished to avoid doing anything that would hurt the Portuguese, particularly in Goa, because it was Portugal's oldest colony, and Portugal Britain's oldest ally. True, the Portuguese were neutral, but it was a neutrality that betrayed a sympathy for the Allies, who were already making full use of the Portuguese Archipelago of the Azores, in the Atlantic.

Apart from Inspector D'Souza, the SOE had their own man in Goa, a lanky six-footer, Gavin Stewart. He had detected from radio monitoring services that 'Trompeta' sent his coded messages from Marmagoa through a transmitter in the Ehrenfels, a 7,752 tonner of the Hansa Lines. Ehrenfels had been to Calcutta earlier and an Indian agent, posing as a port fireman, had reported to SOE that she had decks made of reinforced steel, concealed gun mountings, two six-cylinder two-stroke Mann engines and a cruising speed of 18 to 20 knots which enabled her to double as an auxiliary cruiser. A sister ship of the Ehrenfels, Kandelfels, had done just that, sinking in the process 28 Allied ships, before the Cornwall got her. Ehrenfels' Captain, Rofer, was an exceptionally experienced and daring man. He had managed to pull his ship out of the Hooghly without a pilot, and disappear even before the British could start working out a capture plan. He brought the ship to neutral Goa and dropped anchor at Marmagoa where, shortly after his arrival, the Anfora, a 5,452 tonner of Lloyd Triestino under the Italian flag, and two other Hansa Lines ships, the Drachenfels (6,342 tons) and Braunfels (7,847 tons) also joined the Ehrenfels in seeking asylum.



The house that was once the "Hotel Palacio" where Nazi and British spies stayed

The SOE's problems were many and serious. First, Ehrenfels was a regular enemy transmitting station. Second, there was every possibility of her slipping out and sailing for Singapore to join the Japanese. Third, any rash attempt to capture the ship from Marmagoa might antagonise the Portuguese and turn them in favour of the enemy. Officially, the Ehrenfels was unarmed and stationed in a neutral port, though the Salazar regime in Lisbon was undisguisedly fascist. So, with the circumspection and cunning characteristic of wartime British commanders, the SOE decided to despatch an agent to Rofer.

THE crews of the Italian and German ships were on the dole. They had no money, and subsisted on making small deals of pilfered cargo with grocers and ship chandlers, some of whom presently own crores of rupees. In a document I read, Robert Hepp, among others, is said to have represented to the Portuguese Government that the crews were putting up with great hardship because they were unable to communicate with their own Government in Bonn, and the Portuguese were not allowing them the use of the official wireless station to send their messages home, asking for money. A bold ruse, no doubt, considering Ehrenfels had a powerful transmitter of its own.

SOE's agent to Rofer was instructed to offer him £20,000 and raise it to a maximum of £30,000 for getting him to sail three miles out of the Marmagoa harbour. Once the ship was three miles out, the British would pounce on it and give Rofer and the crews money and safe conduct to wherever they chose to go. The ship was well worth over £500,000, and for a bribe of £30,000 it would be a handsome bargain. But Rofer would not listen. Next, a plan was chalked out —and abandoned— for smuggling time bombs on board the ships in baskets of mangoes and oranges. But it was a foolish plan, considering the bombs when exploded, would not cause much damage beyond the decks and the storeroom.

SOE then decided on a final plan—to silence 'Trompeta'. Lewis Pugh and Gavin Stewart were sent from their headquarters in Meerut, the seat of the Ministry of Economic Welfare, to Calcutta. Pugh, then director of Country Sections, was in his late thirties, blue-eyed and sandy-haired. He knew the members of the Calcutta Light Horse too well, most of whom, with "their thickening waists and thinning hairlines"—as Leasor describes them—had been relegated from active service. Their long discourses about patriotic zeal and the pains of rejection were fuelled with the best Scotch. No wonder they were called the 'Tight Horse'. But they could still be of great use, as was later proved.

The Light Horse was commanded by Colonel Bill Grice, the managing director of a Calcutta-based chemical

CC-0. In Public Domain. (In C

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

INFLATION

It gobbles up notes. Eats up profits. And feasts on credit!

It has an insatiable appetite. And doesn't believe in diets!

If we don't fight this pest today, there may be nothing left to fight for tomorrow.

Consumers, traders, workers, entrepreneurs – we'll all have to join the war on inflation. To prevent waste and careless consumption. To reduce inventories and stockpiling. To work sincerely and increase output. To ensure efficiency and optimum productivity.

It's a national cause with personal gain for every one of us. Because we have to act today to secure the future for us and our children.

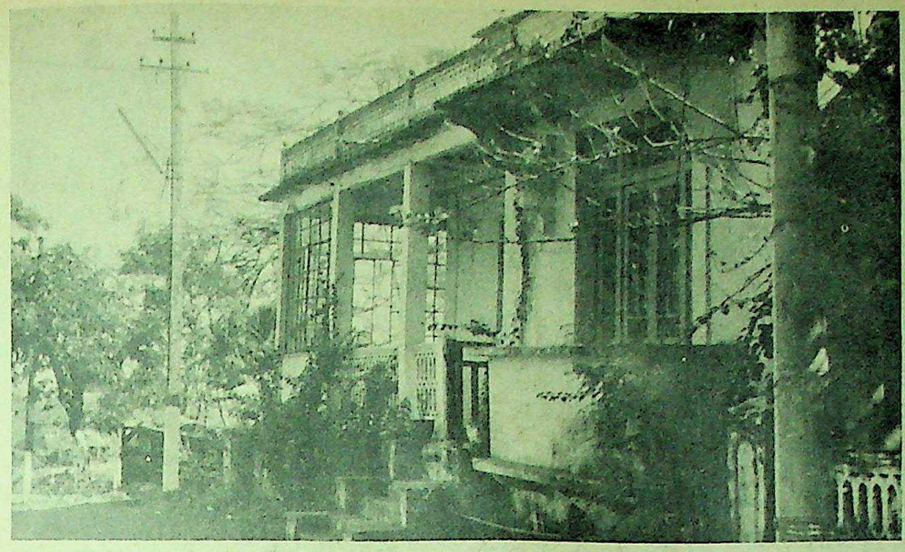
FIGHT INFLATION
Save with IOB

Indian Overseas Bank
Good people to grow with

Sista's-IOB/ 83/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Here lived Trompeta until he and his wife were kidnapped and killed company, and had other resourceful members—planters, jute merchants, insurance and shipping executives, like Harry Square, a merchant who had arranged the money to bail out the Calcutta zoo from financial stringency. Harry's plan was simple. He had rhino urine sold at a high price for its aphrodisiac properties, real or imagined. The stocks imported from Africa were of suspect quality, so Harry had the rhinos of the zoo defecate while the keepers dangled carrots and sugarcane bits in front of them. The urine was collected and sold fresh, almost from source. In the bargain, he raised a few thousand rupees every month, from 'natives' praying for a hard-on.

Pugh got Grice, who had extensive business contacts, to write a letter to any Goan shipping agent, introducing them as bonafide businessmen. And so, with forged letters and a borrowed Ford V8 station-wagon, specially chosen for its roominess, given the mission in mind, they came to Goa, drove straight to the Hotel Palacio, (which still stands), bang opposite the Secretariat.

'Trompeta' got his intelligence from, among others, Ram Das Gupta, a drop-out from the Aligarh University, and a staunch nationalist. Ram Das's mistress in Bombay would ever so often, hand him an envelope to carry to Goa. He would go to Goa, and at an appointed place — generally a cafe — he would meet 'Trompeta', give him the envelope, collect the money and return to Bombay. Not a pleasantry was exchanged. 'Trompeta' was a strong man, crew-cut like other brother-Nazis, and pushing 40. He was constantly tailed by the British Consul in the colony, also a resident of Altinho. And tailing him was not difficult, considering Goa was a small place. But most of the data that could be collected by tracking him was of little value; 'Trompeta's' principal operations were confined to the Ehrenfels, to which the British Consul had no access.

The Light Horse men, Pugh and Stewart, were quick and energetic and deliberately crude. They learnt that 'Trompeta' never received visitors before nine in the morning. So they went to his Altinho house before eight, and called out to him in German. He answered from behind the closed door, but refused to open up. Soon they coaxed him into letting them in. Once inside, Stewart drew his colt .32 and pressed the muzzle against 'Trompeta's' ribs. They ordered him to clasp his hands behind his head, walked in, and told his wife to follow suit. On the way to the waiting station wagon outside, Greta made a bid to run away. Stewart grabbed her, covered her bleeding mouth with a massive hand, lifted her and shoved her into the rear seat. 'Trompeta' had already collapsed on the seat after being hit on the head with the pistol butt. On the drive, they were given a shot of pentothal.

"Are you going to kill us?" Greta asked when she came round. There was no trace of fear in her eyes, just a little feminine curiosity.

"No, just to make you drowsy," Pugh answered flatly.

'Trompeta' and his wife were driven to Belgaum, where, under relentless interrogation, they gave out Ram Das's name. Ram Das and his mistress were subsequently captured, and killed.

CHICO FERNANDES recalls how that night, his father and his doctor-friend had suddenly shut down their shoe-polish manufacturing laboratory and "spoke into some gadget". A few days ago they had tried in vain to hide Koch and his wife after learning that British agents had arrived in Goa and were on their track. Perhaps, they had relied overmuch on Portuguese neutrality, and 'Trompeta' was caught off guard.

After 'Trompeta' was killed, his work was continued by "people" (whom Chico Fernandes will not name) who would drive to a point on Dona Paula Hill, opposite Marmagoa, and send semaphore signals which Ehrenfels picked up and transmitted.

That meant another mission. So Pugh left his headquarters at Meerut and went to Calcutta again. It was clear the 'Tight' Horse were now going to find themselves in a tight corner. SOE's mission for them was explicit: "No medals if it goes right! You'll be disowned if it goes wrong." In any case, no one was to know of the plan at that stage, except Grice. He was to summon 18 volunteers and ask them to tell their wives that they would be for some time at Ranchi, for drill and exercises. Grice got 14 men from the Light Horse, and four from their peacetime rivals, the Calcutta Scottish.

Pugh's plan was for a hopper barge, the Phoebe, acquired from the Calcutta Port Commissioners, to take the 'party' to Marmagoa. Here they would seize the spy ships and get them out of territorial waters, failing which the ships would be destroyed. The Phoebe was built in 1912, was 206 feet wide, 38 feet long, and had just two bunkers. The only toilet on the ship resembled a telephone booth, except for its slatted floor. It was not oceanworthy. For camouflage, she had been fitted with a funnel and looked very much like an oiler, but the funnel gave her a list when she rolled.

To evade the obvious, Indian 'laskars' were to take the barge to Cochin, where the 'sahibs' would board it. Smaller risks and greater glory went together, after all.

Jack Cartwright, a heart patient who had offered himself for a number of assignments and had been rejected, was sent to Goa as a scout. His son had been captured by the Japanese and Jack wanted to avenge it, somehow. His task in Goa was to pre-empt possible German resistance. SOE's plans were to get as many of the German and Italian officers and crew out of the ships at the time of the attack by the 'boarding party', which was to be carefully planned.

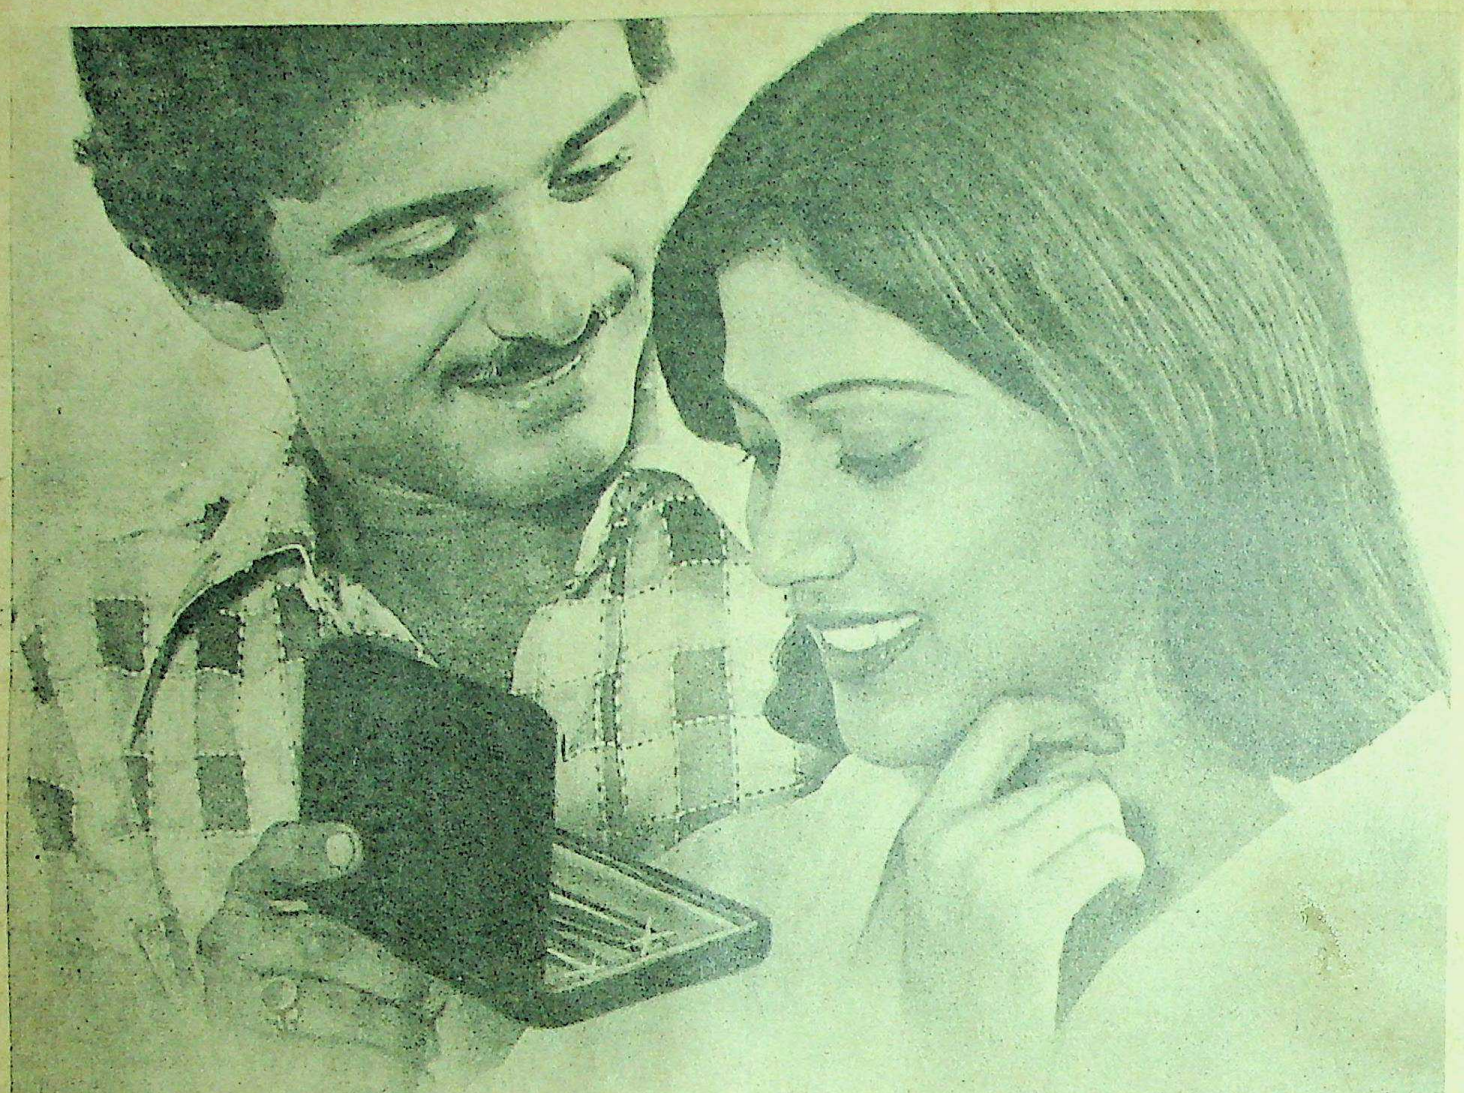
It was carnival time in Goa — for all men and women. For the three days preceding Lent, the Portuguese and Goans just let themselves go. Before Lent's abstinence and penance, there was to be joy and merriment, with no holds barred. So Cartwright organised, through a Goan contact, a Grand Carnival Ball. Just then, two Portuguese sloops had arrived at Marmagoa with a total of 1,800 troops on their way to the Far East, to defend the Portuguese islands of Macau and Timor against the invading Japanese. The officers on all the ships in Marmagoa were welcome to the ball, which was to be a free show. Cartwright also organised, through a pimp in Vasco da Gama's red light area of Baina, a free bacchanal for all the sailors.

When after the arrangements were finalised, Cartwright returned to his hotel, his wife rang up to inform him that their son had been found, a POW in a Burmese camp.

THE Calcutta Light Horse had not seen action since the Boer War in 1900. The 'boarding party' comprised men well past their prime, all

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Lucknow

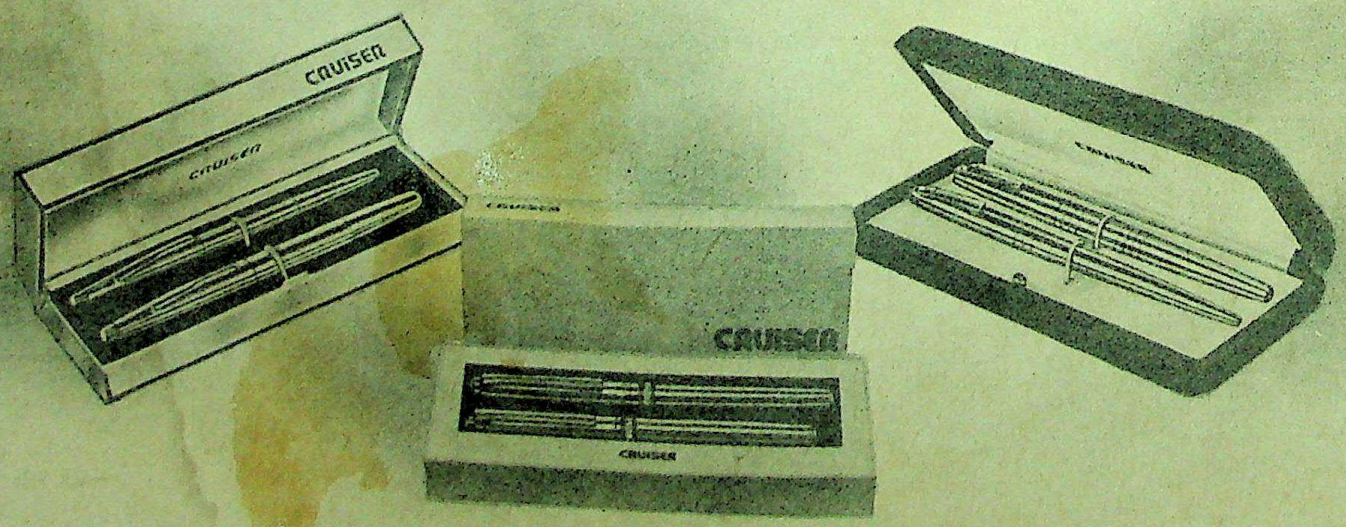
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



CRUISER

A pleasure to give... a joy to receive

Wonderful Cruiser gift sets: nestling in cozy gift packs. To greet the happiest New Year, congratulate a newly-wed couple, or a bright student. Choose from an attractive range, including the distinguished Cruiser Quartz... and celebrate!



OBM/3396

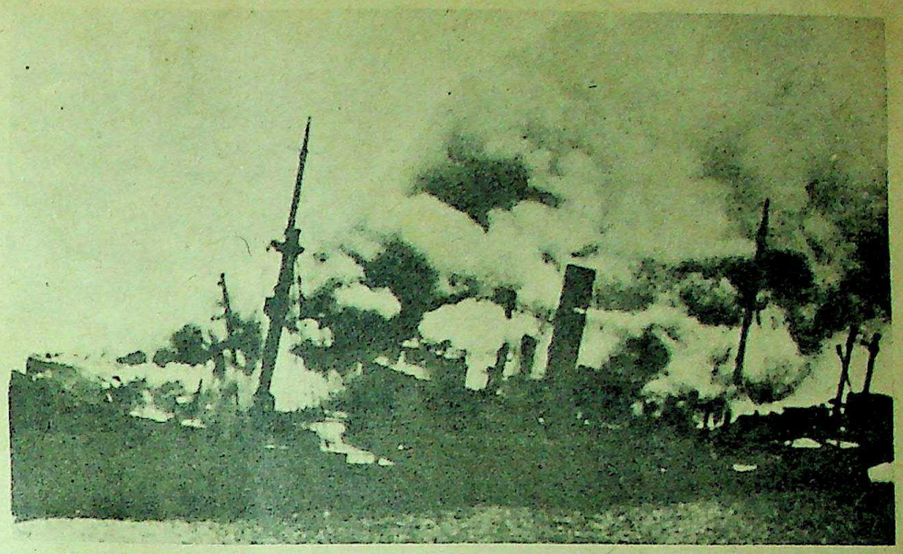
Flair PEN COMPANY

Flair Pen Company, 4, Sonal Apartments, Jai Prakash Nagar, Goregaon (East), Bombay 400 063.
Telephone: 683564 Grams: CRUISER PEN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

40 plus. And they were all men well placed, used to the best things of life —as boxwallas, then were. Here, in the Phoebe, they were just so many untrained, if daring, volunteers, in a huge "iron bathtub with an engine in the middle". They had to sleep on bedrolls spread around the huge hatch in the centre—in which, normally, the Phoebe collected the silt it dredged from the Hooghly to throw into the sea. But they kept their cool—and their sense of humour. Theirs was a mission with no rewards if they succeeded, nor liabilities to Britain if they failed. Bill Manners, a one-eyed volunteer, once a good hockey player (that's how he had lost his eye), every night, before he hit the sack, took out his glass eye, wrapped it in flannel and kept it in his pocket, lest it rolled out into the stormy sea.



Drachenfels in flames after the attack

ROFER "knew" something was in the air. He had been waiting for it, since Koch's death. He had a conference with the other Captains —the Anfora's Garibaldi, the Drachenfels' Schmidt, a man who suffered from chronic dysentery and had a paralytic leg, the Braunfel's Johan Biett—a "great man", according to Karl Brietloff, a sailor and a citizen of Kiel, now settled in Goa "for good".

Rofer took charge of all cargo in the hatches of the ships. The Drachenfels had brought in 2,000 bags of explosives for blasting iron ore mines. The Anfora had tin, aluminium sheets, marble slabs, wheat flour. The Braunfels had oil cakes which she was to take to Finland, and car batteries.

Karl Breitkopf, a crew-member of Braunfels, who still lives in Vasco near the Marmagoa harbour.

Rofer boobytrapped all the ships with the explosives and the car batteries; he covered up the traps with flour and marble. He had made devices which, at the sound of an alarm, would spray the decks with grease and diesel, making the boarding difficult, if not altogether impossible. And Schmidt's huge Kingston valves would be opened in the final act of the ships' scuttle.

"We will not give up the ships. We will die," Karl Brietkoff remembers Rofer saying.

"Those damn Italians cried," Karl recalls. "They were only good for music and women. You won't believe. They had made a garden in the ship and reared pigs."

The Phoebe made the trip from Cochin to Marmagoa on schedule. In the holds, they had chickens and goats. If the chicks stopped laying they were killed, so were the goats if they stopped yielding milk..

On March 9, 1943, under cover of pre-dawn darkness, the Phoebe emerged from nowhere and touched Ehrenfels. Rofer deliberately had not joined the Carnival revellers. He had stayed back. He had also seen the Phoebe, mistaken her for an 'oiler', but was, nonetheless, suspicious. The sentry was to sound the gong "if, she came too close for comfort," were Rofers' orders, before he retired to the bridge.

But the 'boarding party' was made of desperate men. They had nothing to lose—what they were about to do was sheer madness. And they did it well. Red Mac, a boozard of a Scot, shot dead the sentry. Pugh and Stewart who were the only professionals in the group, boarded Ehrenfels, spoke some German to confuse the crews, and the 18 British volunteers, soon enough, were all on board—on bamboo ladders, which were all they had. The Indian 'laskars' manned the Phoebe, all through.

And just then, hell broke loose. The siren in Ehrenfels went dead. The sailors on shore hurriedly picked up their pants and ran out of the whore shops. The officers deserted their waltzing partners, in midstep.

"Is it Carnival? That Thiga was asking me, man. He was so drunk, man, he tried to go forward and come back. Oh, how we laughed, man. But we knew what it was. It was no laughing matter." Karl tells me, his little eyes blinking in the hot sun of Marmagoa's jetty. "We were here"—and he points out to a portion of the Port. (Recently, Karl salvaged for the Marmagoa Port Trust 700 tons of steel scrap, which once was the hull of Ehrenfels.)

Rofer, almost singlehanded, faced the British. One by one, the ships blew themselves up. It was an inferno, to which the squealing pigs on Anfora added a touch of comedy.

"It was all over man, just like that" says Karl, and snapping his massive thumbs, more in sorrow than in anger.

Dimzak, also an ex-German sailor, and presently Panaji's best watch repairer—actually, he is an expert in musical boxes—is German enough not to admit that the British did it. "It was something I do not know." And 36 years have gone by. "People talk, you know," he says, without believing it himself, and shakes his ageing head.

CAPTAIN Rofer was killed during the scuttle. Captain Schimdt slit his wrists in the hospital, determined not to submit himself to interrogation. The Portuguese accused the Germans and the Italians of having destroyed the ships "after a drunken carnival brawl". And, for ten years, they were in jail—much after the war had ended.

Of the "boarding party", only two were injured, but they were retrieved and taken back.

And "as the paint of the burning ships burst in giant blisters", the Phoebe revved its engine. Back in the Phoebe, Pugh passed around bottles of rum, brandy and what have you—a good hard drink to a mission accomplished. For no rewards!

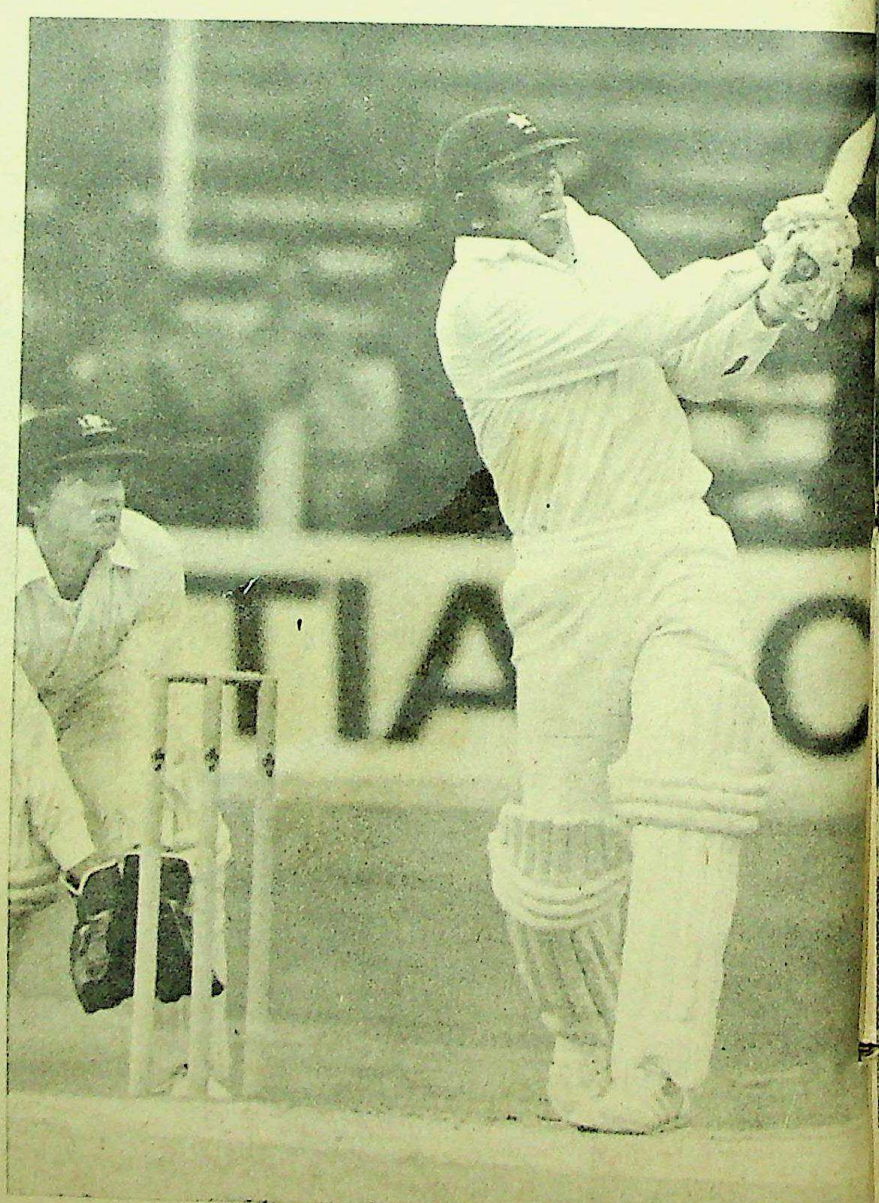
Bill Manners took out his glass eye from his pocket and fitted it into his empty socket. It was dawn. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

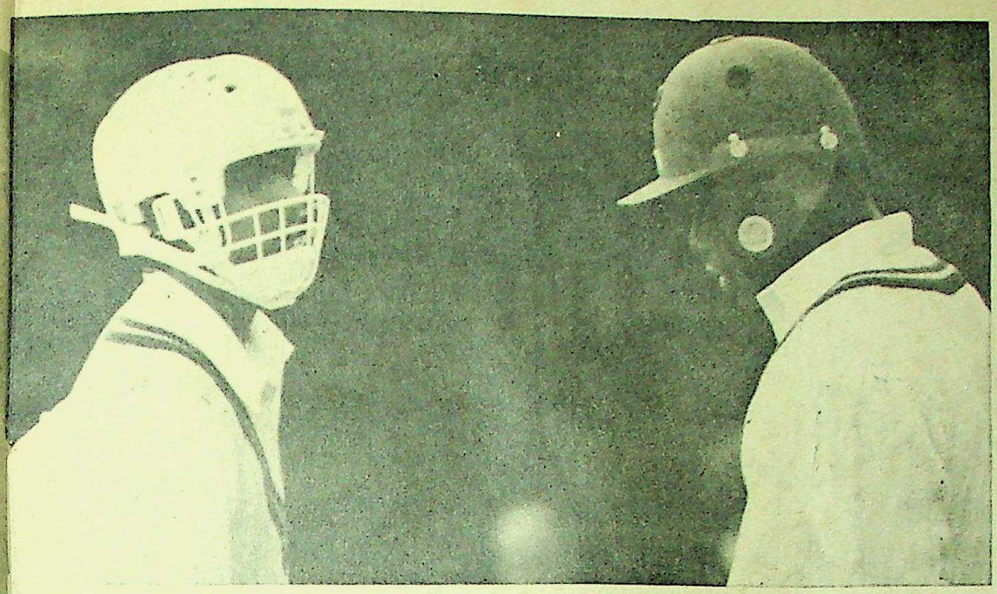
The Cup that cheered the West Indies

Photographs by Patrick Eagar



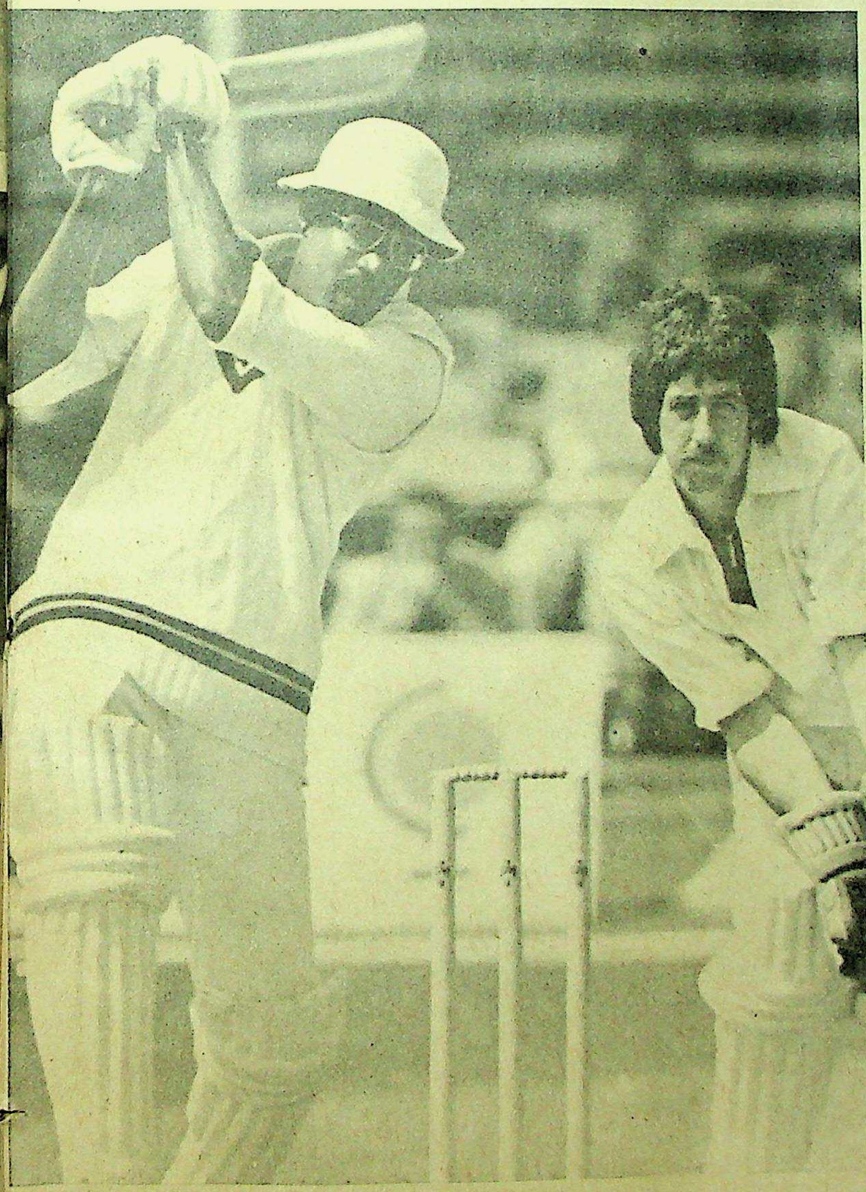
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



LEFT PAGE : Below right, Pakistan's Majid Khan savours a hit in the match with Australia at Trent Bridge. Below left, Geoff Boycott bowls in the match between England and Australia at Lords; Boycott took two wickets. Top right, Bob Willis clean bowled by Sikandar Bakht in the match between Pakistan and England at Headingley.

RIGHT PAGE : Top left, contrasting headgear. West Indians Faoud Bacchus (l) and Desmond Haynes (r) discuss tactics in a warming-up match against Middlesex before the start of the Prudential Cup. Below right, one of the many lusty shots West Indian Gordon Greenidge brought off in his sparkling 106 against India at Edgbaston. Below left, West Indian Clive Lloyd in action against New Zealand at Trent Bridge.



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

KHAAS BAAT

THE one actor who is never short of new stunts, when it comes to getting publicity for himself, is Ranjeet. This guy had been complaining for a long time that his girlfriend-mistress, Pushpa, the leech in his life, Simple Kapadia and all the servants in his bungalow were taking undue advantage of his kindness, generosity and good nature. At that time, he claimed that he was fed up of all the jhanjhats and teda ways of the world. He stated that he wanted to live his life in peace, "just go for my shooting and come home and relax." He also requested his friends from the Press to stop writing about him because he wished to be a recluse. For a recluse, Ranjeet's latest behaviour is very puzzling. He has got himself a new girlfriend (he claims she is a foreigner) and it is with great pride that he has been attending every possible function with the girl hanging on his arm. But if Ranjeet knows what is good for him he will go only this far and no further. When I last met Pushpa, she was gritting her teeth in anger. She refused to comment on the new girl in Ranjeet's life, but I noted that she was filing her nails with great care that day. And Pushpa's scratches leave lasting impressions as Simple Kapadia can testify!

KAMALAHASAN, the superstar in the South, has been offered roles in Hindi films by many Bombay producers, but he has not accepted any of them. Rumour has it that it is wife Vani (ex-actress herself) who has been dissuading him from working in the Bombay industry. Why Vani? Don't tell us that grapes are sour!

HAS Padmini Kapila got a new godfather or something? She was glowing like a roadside neon when I saw her in a restaurant the other day. I overheard her telling her companion (and film stars automatically develop extra loud voices when they are in public places) that in another fortnight something really exciting was going to take place in her life, which was going to change things completely for her. Being a serious-minded person myself, I took it for granted that she was referring to her film career. But for all one knows, she may have merely been talking about her next trip to exotic Dubai. In case that has set you wondering, let me tell you that Padmini's famous Dubai trips have been commented on and suspected, in many Bombay film magazines.

Padmini Kapila : something exciting

EVEN before she has completely hooked Rishi Kapoor, Neetu Singh is trying to put on massive airs with her friends in the industry. When she goes for her shooting assignments, she no longer laughs and jokes with the unit workers as she used to do before. She holds her nose up in the air and pretends that all of them are worthy of nothing but her contempt since she is the great 'Mrs Rishi Kapoor' (to be). On the sets of Chorni, Sonia Sahni tried to chat with her, but Neetu answered in monosyllables and showed her reluctance to talk openly, by yawning, asking Sonia the time, etc.,. Any other person would have got the message, but not Sonia. She kept jabbering, quite oblivious to Neetu's nakhras. In the end, Neetu had to burst out laughing at the shameless Sonia, and join in the light-hearted banter. And as Neetu laughed, one could almost see signs of the old Neetu, the likeable, appealing Neetu who had been so popular with everybody!

AMRISH PURI, the character-actor who tried his best to scare the lights out of everybody in Jaani Dushman, is convinced that he is the Indian version of Christopher Lee. In fact, before he started shooting for that film, it seems he used to sit with books on the make-up of Count Dracula and study them intensively, late into the night. Though why he should require make-up, I don't know. He looks like Dracula as he is.

RITA BHADURI, the talented actress who is being ignored by Hindi film producers, seems to be doing quite well for herself. She is working in a lot of Gujarati films and doing a lot of TV work, too. It won't be long before the Bombay producers wake up to her true worth. If I were Rita, I would teach them a lesson by refusing to work with them.

SHIRJEE

Rita : food for producers' thought

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

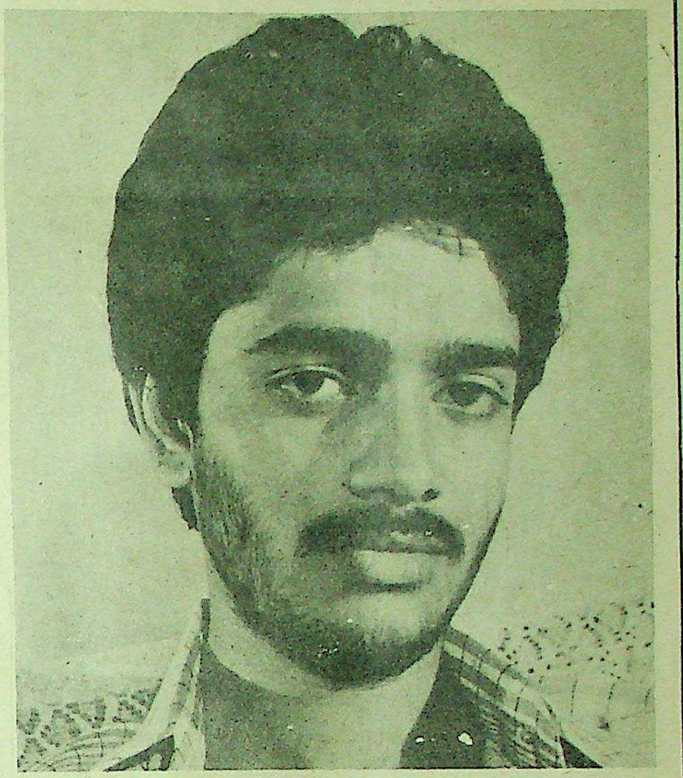
KHAAS BAAT

"SHOULD every call girl go around wearing blouses with plunging necklines?" asked Sharmila Tagore. In Madras, after a long gap, to act in a Malayalam film Chuvanna Chirakukkal being directed by N. Sankaran Nair, Sharmila declared that she won't wear revealing clothes. Ioman is cast opposite her : the film is being shot at breakneck speed and is being readied for release in August. Director Nair was a bit disappointed with Sharmila's refusal to titillate the audience, but he's confident that his film will sell as it presents "an altogether different kind of call girl", not the self-pitying, virtuous type but a spirited call girl who's not ashamed of her profession, who's obsessed with the idea of becoming the highest-paid professional.

SRIVIDYA, the wide-eyed heroine, is hoping that she will soon come out of dark tunnel which she is in at the moment. Due for immediate release is Imayam. Though it's dominated by Sivaji Ganesan, she hopes she will shine in a few good scenes. And there's the untitled Tamil film, rumoured to be a version of Khatta Meetha, in which she's paired with Vishnuvardhan. Vidya still has plenty of charm, but she should give serious thought to her figure. So what if Sripriya, K. R. Vijaya and many other "fatties" are accepted by the audience? It isn't as if Madras audiences do not appreciate slim, graceful heroines.

JAYAN has got an excellent boost through the fantastic success of his Malayalam hit Sara Pancharam, a story of a horse-keeper whose sexual passion wrecks the lives of a mother and daughter. The film is soon to be remade in Tamil, but Jayan may not play the lead role. His mannerisms are too close to those of Rajnikant: naturally, Tamil producers are wary of him.

Sheela played the role of mother in Sara Pancharam after the success of I. V. Sasi's Yeetta in which she played the role of a lusty woman. Producers are keen on casting her in similar roles. In fact, in Sara Pancharam it is she who arouses the passion of the horse-keeper.



Suresh : from Kenya with love

KENYA-born Suresh, a family friend of director Sankaran Nair, was quite impressive in Tamburatti one of those much discussed "sex" films from Kerala. After having crossed swords with the censors, and with many of the so called "hot" scenes butchered, the film is running again. And doing very well. Suresh, however, isn't keen on continuing in films — doesn't like the tense atmosphere. And he has plans to go back to Kenya, or maybe to the UK and plunge into business. In the meanwhile, director Nair is trying to feature him in one of his productions.

KRISHNACHANDER, the young boy who made love to Jayabharathy in Rathi Nirvedham looks like a regular sissy, but the producers in Kerala see in him the desi edition of Errol Flynn. Following the box-office success of Rathi Nirvedham, he was cast in a dozen films in which he was made to seduce and flatter women older than him. Maybe the women couldn't produce the excitement among the audience like Jayabharathy did, maybe the audience waited for Krishnachander to grow up (he didn't). All these films, F14 Vayasile included, failed at the boxoffice.

WHEN comedian Nagesh started hitting the bottle in a big way, a few years ago, his rivals said that he wouldn't last long. But something keeps Nagesh going. Despite many domestic problems, Nagesh has managed to continue to make people laugh.

Surulirajan and Thengai Srinivasan have benefited from Nagesh's personal problems. They have bagged many of his assignments. And yet the Nagesh fans are happy to see their favourite actor now and then. For, who down South, can so superbly blend pathos and humour? Nagesh even managed to get Telugu producer, Rama Naidu, to sponsor a film which he directed with Jayasudha as the heroine. The title of the film is Murattadu Naidu heard the outline of the story from Nagesh and gave him the green signal. The film wasn't a masterpiece, but it was a welcome change from the routine Telugu melodramas and it turned out to be an average success. More offers came Nagesh's way but he was somehow not too keen on taking up another film for some time. "Give me good roles," he asked the producers. Some of them did. Yet one wonders if Nagesh can produce the kind of comedy he did in Kathalikka Neramillai.

MADHU MALINI was featured in a small role in a Tamil film Thayillamal Nanillai. The advertisements proudly acclaimed that she was a Bombay "star"! Never mind the misleading ads, her sexy dance in the film was received with lusty wolf-whistles. And now she's busy stripping herself to glory, though some meaty, emotional roles are on her way.

IT's a pity that a smart actress like Raji hasn't gone places, but she seems to have made one good conquest. Upcoming actor Chakrapani's name is being increasingly linked with Raji's : the two met for the first time while working in a film being made by veteran actress Bhanumati. Soon assorted tongues started clattering about the impending marriage. No wedding bells have been heard, and a liberated Raji may not want a marriage so soon.

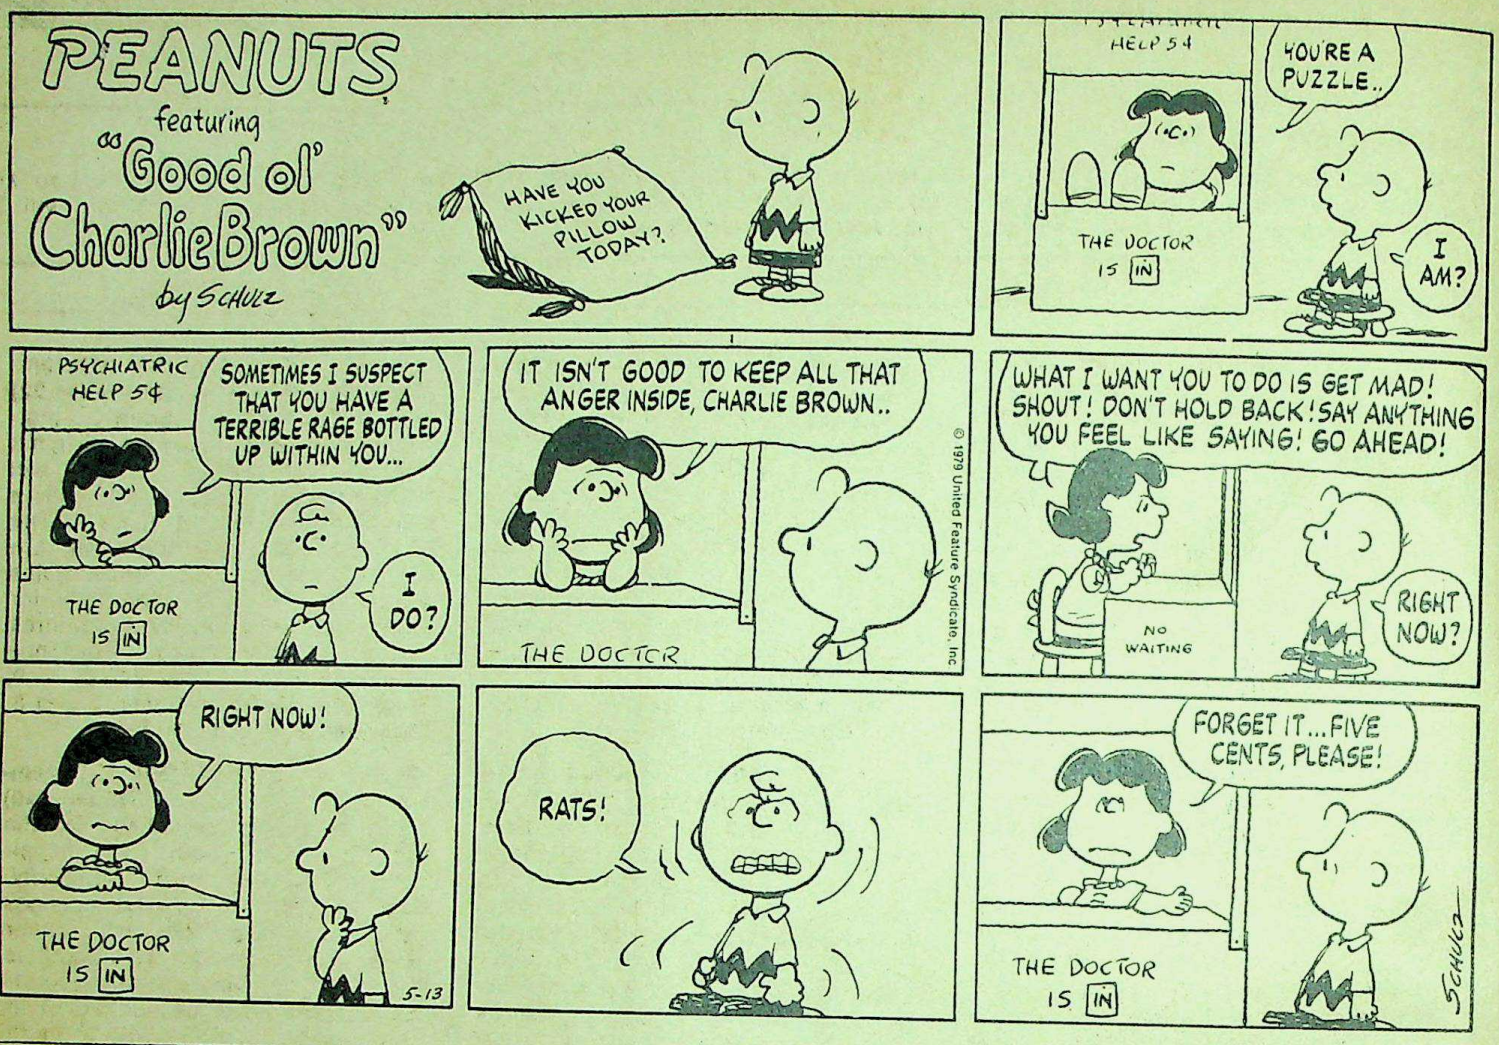
THEY called her the 'dark fluke'. They swore that she just won't click. And that her godfather, K. Balachander, would regret casting her in Maro Charitra. When the film turned out to be a golden jubilee hit, the so-called box-office pundits said, "Congratulate Kamalahasan, he's responsible for the super success".

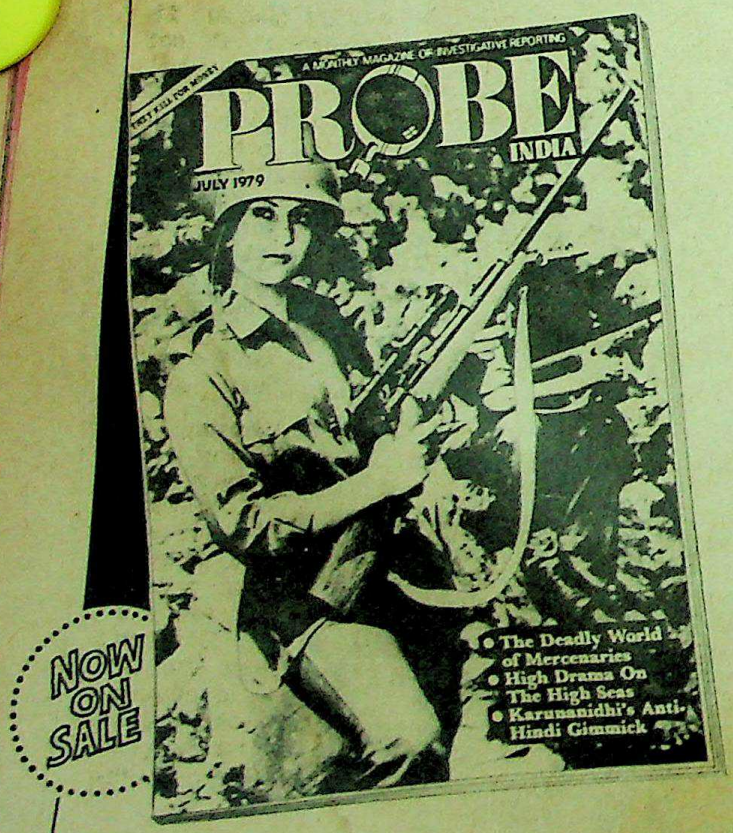
But Sarita is going places. And how. This very 'plain' looking woman is now enjoying the success of two more films, Vijaya in Telugu and Ponnu Oorukku Pudusu in Tamil. Taking keen interest in her is Kamalahasan, who believes that Sarita is one of the most intelligent actresses he has ever come across. And knowing the general IQ of actresses down South, one is inclined to believe Kamalahasan.

PIOUSJI

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri





They kill for money

—The Deadly World of Mercenaries

They deal in death and destruction all the world over. Among them are also "Quick Run Girls." Who are these dealers in death?

High Drama on the High Seas off Madras
It was an 80-hour hell for all those aboard the S.S. United Vanguard caught in the ferocious cyclone on May 9, 1979. Where did the drama end?

Karunanidhi's Anti-Hindi Gimmick
Is it Karunanidhi's fight against Hindi or a handle for his political revival? A team of Probe correspondents unfold the drama behind the language war.

The Public Sector Pindaris
A shocking story of plunder of public money.

How much can a woman stand?
Dramatic story of Kesro who was discovered after 30 years on the roads of Poonch.

Also:
Jaipur Jeweller's Murder in New York, Untold Story of the Pioneers of I.A.F.

Plus many more interesting and exciting features from PROBE India.

A monthly magazine of investigative reporting

PROBE INDIA

Mitra Prakashan Pvt. Ltd., Allahabad 211 003.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Beginning July 8

This week the Sun alone is in Gemini, Jupiter and Mercury are conjoined in Cancer. Rahu and Saturn are in Leo and Uranus is in Libra. Neptune alone is in Scorpio, Kethu is in Aquarius and Mars is in Taurus. The Moon will be moving through Sagittarius, Capricorn and Aquarius from Scorpio.

ARIES (March 21 — April 20) You are warned not to make sudden erratic changes. Watch finances carefully. Your success will be praised by your friends and relatives. Your health will improve. Some medical expenditure in the family is in the offing. Utilise your energy and initiative in your career. Good dates: 11, 12, 13 and 14. Lucky numbers: 2 and 3. Favourable direction: West.

TAURUS (April 21 — May 22) The week is auspicious and a new friendship is in the offing. Guard against trickery and deception especially in financial matters. Your affairs make good progress towards the middle of the week, although there might be some anxiety and annoyance from family members. Love and social activity is forecast. In general, this is a week of happiness. Good dates: 8, 9, 10 and 13. Lucky numbers: 4 and 6. Favourable direction: North.

GEMINI (May 23 — June 21) Everything progresses on an even note this week. Health will need extra care. You might have to make some unfavourable decisions. Your own industry and initiative will help you gain fortune. You will not be successful in meeting people but you will be able to maintain your prestige with your juniors. Good dates: 9, 10, 12 and 14. Lucky numbers: 4 and 7. Favourable direction: North-west.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) This is going to be a week of mixed fortunes for you. An unexpected upheaval will result in financial gain. There might be chances of deception and misinterpretation from friends. Pending legal suits will cause you mental worry. Reply to letters immediately if they are concerned with love. Good dates: 8, 10, 12 and 13. Lucky numbers: 9 and 10. Favourable direction: East.

LEO (July 23 — August 22) Don't neglect your job. You will have to strive hard and in the process you will gain a little. You need not worry about your family. Everything proceeds on a normal course. You will have to spend money on yourself for medical treatment. Businessmen are advised to make decisions after careful consultation with partners. Good dates: 8, 10, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 2 and 7. Favourable direction: South.

VIRGO (August 23 — September 22) There will be many perplexing problems this week which you will have to overcome. There will be some sudden unexpected events beyond your control. Follow your intuition since this is a critical week for businessmen. Be sareful before entering into new contracts. Some might pe transferred. Take care of yourself since there is a possibility of a mild attack of cold. Good dates: 11, 12 and 14. Lucky numbers: 1 and 10. Favourable direction: South-west.

LIBRA (September 23 — October 22) Some fortune is in the offing. Businessmen are advised to take care in matters involving law and property. Meet your relatives and discuss alliances regarding marriage with them. Some will gain through speculation, lotteries and betting. A letter from a distant place will bring good news. Good dates: 8, 9, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 2 and 9. Favourable direction: South-east.

SCORPIO (October 23 — November 21) In the beginning of the week there will be new opportunities ani this will help you in gaining plenty of confidence. The end of the week sees a reversal of trends. You will have to spend some money in maintaining your status. Be ready to be a host at a social occasion. The end of the week will bring good news. Do not depend on others as regards speculation. Good dates: 8, 9, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 7 and 9. Favourable direction: West.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22 — December 22) Stellar portents indicate success and happiness which will come through young people. Elders will cause anxiety at times. The first three days of the week are bound to bring you some gains financially. This is good time for attempting new business ventures and finalising contracts. Romance proves fruitful. Good dates: 8, 9, 11 and 14. Lucky numbers: 2 and 8. Favourable direction: East.

CAPRICORN (December 23 — January 20) The beginning of the week will see happiness and prosperity. New friends, successful changes and travel are foreseen. Your health will be good. This week is favourabe for marriage and courtship. Children will be successful in their studies. Letters will bring in good news from far away. Sportsmen and technicians gain. Good dates: 9, 11, 12 and 14. Lucky numbers: 1 and 5. Favourable direction: West.

AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) Do not be afraid to adopt novel ideas in business. However, beware of arousing hostility by your impulsive actions. Concentrate on your vocation rather than on love and marriage, since some sort of disappointment is in the offing. An unexpected event will cause anxiety and expense in the middle of the week. Good dates: 9, 10, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 1 and 5. Favourable direction: West.

PISCES (February 20 — March 20) This week promises to be one of more than average good fortune. You will be able to complete some of your unfinished work. Beneficial changes in your professional career and travel are in the offing. Children will be successful in their studies. Businessmen are advised to acquire and stock new stores. Good dates: 8, 9, 12 and 14. Lucky numbers: 4 and 9. Favourable direction: South-west.

M. B. RAMAN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNDAY

NEXT WEEK

THE LAWLESS LAWMEN

The police-Government confrontation has assumed disastrous proportions. Has the Central Government become impotent ? SAUMITRA BANNERJEE, from Bokaro, and AJOY BOSE, from Delhi, report on perhaps the most dangerous revolt in independent India.

NADIA : COMMUNAL DACOITS

Another spark of violence, and this time in West Bengal, which has not known a serious communal riot for years. SHYAMAL CHAKRABORTY describes another expression of mass insanity.

All agree Physics is usually the toughest in

IIT Entrance Exam

We revel in tough problems, Look what our students have to say.

I was very glad at the way the Postal tuitions were planned and conducted. The lessons were very systematic and self explaining. I am particularly all praise for the Physics department for its layout of the lessons

Bhadury
Bombay-6
29-3-79

And at last Many Many special thanks to Professor in Physics. I could manage the paper very easily. Really 'Brilliant' Tutorials makes "Brilliant" boys more 'BRILLIANT"

P. Radhakrishna
Kaghaznagar
5-5-79

250 more problems are being added to our Postal Tuition papers for 1980

B BRILLIANT TUTORIALS

12, Masilamani Mudali Street, T.Nagar, Madras-600 017, Phone: 442099

5 month Postal Tuition for IIT Entrance '80 from 1st July '79

When you want a battery to last ask for Toshiba Anand first

It's yours for the asking. Unique TWO WAY PROTECTION which no other battery gives.

Toshiba Anand's tamperproof Factory Seal guarantees you all 100% of the power we pack into our batteries. While it's Metal Jacket guards against leakage and corrosion.

It all adds up to more usable power. Hour after hour The first battery to really last. Toshiba Anand.

Toshiba ANAND

GUARANTEES 100% POWER

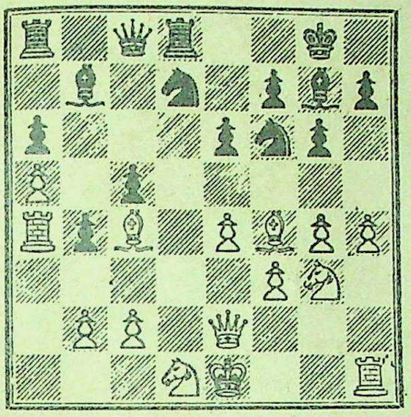
HEADSTART / TA / 7977

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A galaxy of grandmasters

Nunn (Black) to play



Letzelter (White)
Position after White's 18th move

By winning a strong international tournament in Budapest last summer John Nunn became the fourth English player to qualify for the title of Grandmaster in a period spanning not much more than two years. John deserves great credit for his fine achievement. He is not only a leading chessplayer but also one of the country's most promising young mathematicians. How he finds time to concentrate on both pursuits I shall never know.

Why the sudden spate of English grandmasters? Until Tony Miles captured the title in 1976 England had never had a grandmaster in her history, yet since then we have produced more than the rest of Western Europe combined. Have we suddenly conceived a generation of bionic chessplayers, or is it the fluorine they put in our drinking-water? I think the explanation is rather simple. There always have been and always will be chessplayers of great potential in this country, but only recently have any serious efforts been made to develop their talents. A lot of people are doing a lot of work to provide strong, competitive tournaments for developing players and the results are almost inevitable. This is the first generation lucky enough to be given regular opportunities to compete against grandmasters and so acquire their special skills and techniques. There's no magic, just a simple question of practice making perfect.

The main quality of John Nunn's play is his incisiveness. The shortest distance between two points is a straight line and John will always find the most direct line of play. I give an example of his ferocious style taken from the Olympiad in Haifa 1976. Nunn's opponent is happily preparing his own attack when he is suddenly flattened by a series of tactical bombshells. A dazzling display.

White: J. Letzelter (France). Black: J. Nunn (England). Haifa 1976. Pirc Defence.
1. P—K4, P—KN3; 2. P—Q4, B—N2; 3. N—QB3, P—Q3; 4. B—K3, P—QR3; 5. Q—Q2, P—QN4; 6. P—B3, N—Q2; 7. P—QR4, P—N5; 8. N—Q1, R—N1; 9. P—R5, KN—B3; 10. R—R4, P—B4; 11. P x P, P x P; 12. B—KB4, R—R1; 13. B—QB4, O—O; 14. P—KN4, B—N2; 15. N—K2, Q—B1; 16. N—N3, R—Q1; 17. Q—K2, P—K3; 18. P—R4 (Diagram). White has successfully blockaded the queenside and seems well set for a standard kingside attack with P—R5, but Nunn produces a devastating counter-attack out of a clear sky.

18. . . . N—Q4! For if 19 P x N, P x P the opening of the K-file is disasterous for White.
19. B—KN5, Q—B2! 20. B x R, R x B! Deftly played. If 20. . . . Q x N+, 21 Q—B2 White succeeds in exchanging the queens. Black's onslaught bears the unmistakable signature of Tal.
21. P x N. P x P! White is now a rook ahead but his whole position is in flames.
22. N—K4. What else?
22. . . . P x N; 23. P x P, Q—N6+; 24. N—B2, B—Q5; 25. P—B3, P x P; 26. P x P, B x N+; 27. Q x B, Q x P+; 28. Q—Q2. Losing immediately, but there is of course no defence anyway.
28. . . . Q x Q+; 29. K x Q, N—N3+; 30. B—Q5, N x R; 31. K—B2, B x B; 32. P x B, R x P; 33. R—R1, R—Q5; 34. R—QN1, R x P; 35. R—N8+, K—N2; 36. R—QR8, P—B5; 37. R x P, R—N7+; 38. K—B1, N—B4, 39. R—B6, N—N6+ and White (belatedly) resigned

MICHAEL STEAN

bridge

SOME 'equals' are not quite so equal as others. Would you think it could make any difference whether East, defending against Six Spades, played the King of clubs or the Jack on the opening lead?

Dealer, East N-S vulnerable

	♠ A K 8 6 4 2 ♥ A 10 5 ♦ 10 3 ♣ 9 4
♠ 7 3 ♥ — ♦ Q 8 7 4 2 ♣ 10 7 6 5 3 2	N W E S	♠ 9 ♥ K Q J 9 7 3 ♦ 9 6 5 ♣ K J 8
	♠ Q J 10 5 ♥ 8 6 4 2 ♦ A K J ♣ A Q

East, playing weak Two-bids, opened Two Hearts and the bidding continued:

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
—	—	—	2♥
dble	No	3♥	No
3♠	No	5♠	No
6♠	No	No	No

It was as well that North did not become the declarer, because the spade slam cannot be made after a heart lead and a ruff.

Against Six Spades by South, West led ♣ 7, following the current style of second best from weak suits. East played the King and South won. Deciding that East had already shown his ration for a weak Two-bid and that West must hold ♦ Q, South played for a loser-on-loser elimination, arriving at this end position:

	♠ K 8 6 4 ♥ 10 5 ♦ — ♣ —
♠ — ♥ — ♦ Q 8 7 ♣ 10 6 5	N W E S	♠ — ♥ K Q J 7 ♦ 9 ♣ J
	♠ J 10 ♥ 8 6 4 ♦ J ♣ —

South led ♦ J. West played the Queen and a heart was discarded from dummy, leaving West on play.

When a defender who holds K J can be certain that his partner has not underled the Ace it is usually good play to put in the Jack. For one thing, you discover who holds the Queen. Here the play gains in a different way. If East plays ♣ J at trick 1 South may place West with the King of clubs and East with the Queen of diamonds. If he takes that view and finesses ♦ J he loses the contract.

TERENCE REESE

stamps

PIONEER Australian airmen are portrayed on four new stamps issued in Australia to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the first trans-Pacific flight. This one features Sir Charles Kingsford Smith and Southern Cross, the aeroplane in which he and Charles Ulm, with two American airmen, flew in 1928 from Oakland, California, via Hawaii and Fiji to Brisbane. The other stamps portray Ulm, Bert Hinkler and Harry Hawker. All four men died in different air crashes, three of them while still in their thirties and Hinkler at the age of 41. The new stamps are also available in a miniature sheet containing one of each value with a map of the flight and a commemorative inscription.

C.W. HILL

quiz

QUESTIONS

1. Where is the Airbus manufactured?
2. What was the name of the Soviet pilot who flew in a MIG-25 into a Japanese airport?
3. Who owns the French left-wing daily 'Liberation'?
4. What is the meaning of the word 'Id-ul-Fitr'?
5. What is the MIRV?
6. Who was the first president of China?
7. In printing terminology, what does an 'em' mean?
8. In which year was the SALT-I agreement signed?
9. How often is the Kumbha Mela held?
10. Who is the only man before Bjorn Borg to have won the Wimbledon title thrice in a row?
11. Where is the Orly airport?

ANSWERS

1. In Toulouse, France.
2. First Lieutenant Victor Belenko.
3. Jean Paul Sartre.
4. Id from Ida meaning holiday and Fitr means alms.
5. Multiple Independently-targeted Re-entry Vehicle.
6. Dr Sun Yat Sen.
7. A measure of width of a column.
8. 1960.
9. Once in every 144 years.
10. Fred Perry.
11. Paris.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

If even Saridon can't relieve your bodyache, consult a doctor.

One Saridon quickly eases muscular pain away. Leaves you relaxed and refreshed.
Sometimes however, a bodyache can be so severe or stubborn that even Saridon may not help

At such times consult a doctor. Let the doctor prescribe what's right for you.

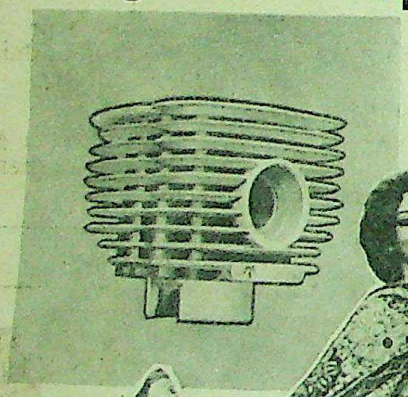
Saridon 'ROCHE'

The strong one. The safe one. Just one is enough.

BP 4161

Suvega: still at the top–in mopeds

First with Aluminium Alloy Hard-chromed Cylinders—for extra life, extra Kms.



SAA/MIL/433

Suvega
Everything a moped should be

For Suvega, the lead, right from the start, continues. As the top-notch brand that's stayed ahead on pioneering product development.

The advantage of Aluminium Alloy Hard-chromed Cylinders:

Instead of the conventional cast iron cylinders, Suvega mopeds use only these special types. The result? These cylinders last several years longer—drastically reducing cylinder piston replacement costs. And longer life, naturally, means 'extra' mileage in the long run!

Plus all these star features:

- A chain drive and internally reinforced box-section frame for better stability.
- Automatic clutch for ease and economy.
- Needle roller bearings for smoother movements and longer lives of parts.

And, on top of it all, Suvega is backed up by the widest after-sale service network and all-India availability of spares. No wonder, Suvega is still at the top—in mopeds.

MOPEDS INDIA LIMITED
Tirupati, Andhra Pradesh

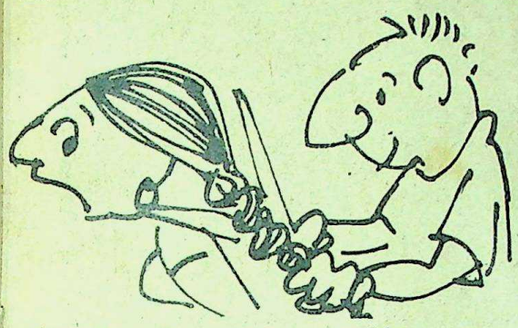
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

VARIETY

this india

prize rs. 30 for the entry given first



SURAT : A young superstitious man landed in custody after being caught while carrying out his vow to cut the braids of as many as 120 young girls to propitiate the goddess "Khodiar". The man, a petty hawker, was caught while going for a 22nd braid. He was held while working his scissors on his victim in a State Transport bus in Amod, a taluka town in Broach district adjoining Surat. The Amod police produced him before a magistrate in Broach who sent him to judicial custody. The police said that the culprit had told them that had he succeeded in offering 120 braids to the goddess his mother would have "died" and he would have lived a "prosperous" life. Except three, all the 22 girls who lost their beautifying plaits of hair to him were unmarried, the police said—The Hindu (S. Ignatius Mohan, Madras)

SIRSI : The change in name of two districts from North Kanara (Karwar) and South Kanara (Mangalore) to Uttara Kannada and Dakshina Kannada has caused confusion—at least to the postal authorities. Uttara Kannada is referred as U.K. in postal circles here. A letter written by the private secretary to the State Finance Minister to the Secretary of the Ankola Town Municipality last July travelled all the way to England and back here nearly after 10 months. The address was given as "Ankola, U.K.." —The Hindu (GN. C. Sailesh, Bangalore)

CALCUTTA : Customs authorities at Calcutta Airport were baffled when an Indian national who came in an Air-India flight from Bangkok, persistently refused to open his folio bag. A custom officer was only allowed to feel the bag from outside. It was soft. "What is it?", he asked. "Halua", replied the man. Everyone around laughed but not the Custom man. He suddenly gave a pull at the zip fastener and "Hiss...ss..."—a live cobra. The man and his snake, which measured four feet but had its venomous sting removed, were handed over to the police but before that he had to pay a nominal fine of Rs 50 for violating aircraft rules —Hindusthan Standard (Pradip Kumar Datta, Calcutta)

TRIVANDRUM : Believe it or not they wrote together and passed together the pre-degree examination of the Kerala University this year: a 55-year-old mother and her 17-year-old daughter. While the mother, Mrs Annamma Patil made it in the first class her daughter Gloria had to be content with a second class pass. As for the mother who is now a grandma, it was the realisation of a 39-year-old dream. She received the happy news from her own journalist son while her ten-month-old grandson was on her lap playing with the granny—Indian Express (I. K. A. Salam, Kerala)

TELLICHERRY : Four pieces of stone thrown to disturb a reception meeting organised by the Muslim Youth League, were auctioned for Rs 365. The function was held to felicitate Mr Ahammad Maniyur and others who had resigned from the Opposition Muslim Students' Federation. As the stone pieces were being auctioned the situation worsened when soda bottles were freely used. Police had to intervene and chase the miscreants and the meeting continued. The police have registered a case—The Hindu (S. Issias, Trivandrum)

india abroad

LONDON: Three Indian children have become a problem of the British authorities. They are unwanted by their grandparents in India. They are too old to look after them. Home Office officials say their mother who is here, is also not interested in them. Jayesh, 16, Sajesh, 13, and Dipesh, 10, should have already been with their grandparents by now but for the fact that two of the brothers suddenly fell ill. So the authorities decided that the third should not also go. The two brothers have not recovered from illness. They may be sent back to India next week, depending upon the outcome of an appeal by the former Labour MP, Mr Robert Bean. Mrs Patel, mother of the children came to Britain in 1975 having left her husband in Kenya and having sent the children to their grandparents in India. In March this year, the children came here to join their mother. Home Office officials are now sending them back because their mother could not look after them during the period. "This is not true," according to Mr Bean. He says, he has evidence to prove that Mrs Patel has been looking after them. Mrs Patel works for British rail. Mrs Patel came to Britain with an entry passport. Although she was able to stay in Britain the fact that her children came to the country in March makes the case complex. The children have Indian passports but are also registered on their mother's British passport. The Indian High Commission is looking into the case as well—Patriot

without comment

I HAVE seen enough, done enough, earned enough, wasted enough, so I thought let me do something for my country—Biju Patnaik

INDIRA "AMMA" (mother) finds an "Appa" (father) in Urs—Headline in Blitz

YOUR CONCEPT of command from above and implicit obedience from below, is a concept of the bygone ages—Devraj Urs to Mrs Gandhi

IN WEST Bengal, power shortage, like death, comes without any warning—G. D. Birla

JOHN PAUL II's not just a pop religious figure. He is a religious phenomenon for all seasons—A prelate quoted in Newsweek

WITHOUT Christ it is impossible to trace the history of Poland—Pope John Paul II

I SHALL return to Iran. I believe in Providence...I am a religious man—The exiled Shah of Iran

YOU CAN keep your technology, your problems and your evils, and we will just keep our oil—Colonel Gaddafi of Libya to an American interviewer

SALT II is not a favour we are doing for the Soviet Union—US President Jimmy Carter

WE COULD have had a good affair—Jane Fonda on her father Henry Fonda

humour in real life

A NEWSPAPER advertisement says : "Wanted a mad-servant for a mental hospital" — R. N. Senpati, Balasore

SIGNBOARD at a petrol station now reads — "EAT TYRES ... GIVES MORE MILEAGE — Kallikal Rahmu, Tellicherry

prize rs. 30 for the entry given first

Illustrations/Ahi Bhusan Malik

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

DELHI DIARY

EXPLOSIVE BUSINESS

THE Balasubramaniam raid case is giving Kanti Desai the jitters and his father some uneasy moments. The Union Finance Ministry is taking up the matter with the Prime Minister. And it is quite possible that the Minister in charge, Mr Charan Singh, will enter into a dialogue with Mr Desai on the issue. The famous Desai-Charan correspondence which ultimately led to his ouster from the Cabinet last year may be repeated all over again. Whatever the outcome, one thing is certain. Both sides are pretty cautious in launching moves and counter-moves, for this time there will not be any peacemakers and this will be a round which will be fought to the finish. Incidentally, the free Press has not exactly covered itself with glory by the way it has handled the Balasubramaniam story. It has generally refused to touch the case whose ramifications lead up to the doorsteps of the Prime Minister and treated it like the plague. The champions of Press freedom have been digging up the ghosts laid to rest long ago—the L. N. Mishra murder for one—but seem to have no time and patience for the shenanigans of the regime in power. An agency story put out from Madras following raids there in connection with the Balasubramaniam-Sanjay-Kanti axis was consigned to the dustbin by most newspapers and even when a single newspaper used it, the item was put on the back page among local titbits about stabbings and snatchings in the city.

CHAUDHURY : HOT, COLD OR LUKEWARM ?

SENIOR Deputy Prime Minister, Mr Charan Singh, is caught in a dilemma. His most vociferous supporters in the Janata want him to take a hawkish line and fight it out with the detractors of the former BLD, whereas the Chaudhury himself wants to take a more conciliatory approach and does not want to say or do anything that will plunge the Party into another crisis. Former Health Minister Raj Narain and about a score of MPs had virtually served notice on Charan Singh that if he does not scotch the attempts of the Jana Sangh-Congress(O) combine to knock out former BLD men from various positions of power in the Janata Government and Party organisation, they will walk out of Janata and form a separate group in Parliament. Now Mr Raj Narain has taken the plunge.

Mr Singh, aware of the incensed mood of his close followers, has decided to take the middle path: neither peace nor war. He would write a strong letter to Party President Chandrashekhar and also take up the issue with Mr Desai but would not go to the Press as he did last time when he made the famous "pack of impotents" statement. All in all, an ominous situation for the faction-ridden ruling Party. The Janata cookie seems to be crumbling once again. Meanwhile, Raj Narain is threatening to take the Balasubramaniam-Kanti scandal to the streets. One does not know how long Mr Singh will manage to keep the irrepressible former Health Minister on the leash.

Biswaranjan Rakshit

BUREAUCRAT ILL-TREATS CM

ASSAM Chief Minister Golap Borbora made a formal complaint to the Prime Minister, Mr Morarji Desai, that despite repeated requests to the then Railway Board chairman, Mr Rajan did not increase the supply of wagons to Assam and North Eastern Council States. He said that whenever he met Mr Rajan, he treated the Chief Minister as a subordinate. Mr Borbora told the PM, "How long shall I be treated like this?" After hearing this the PM personally called Mr Rajan and asked for an explanation. He found the explanation unsatisfactory and the ground for Rajan's removal was thus prepared.

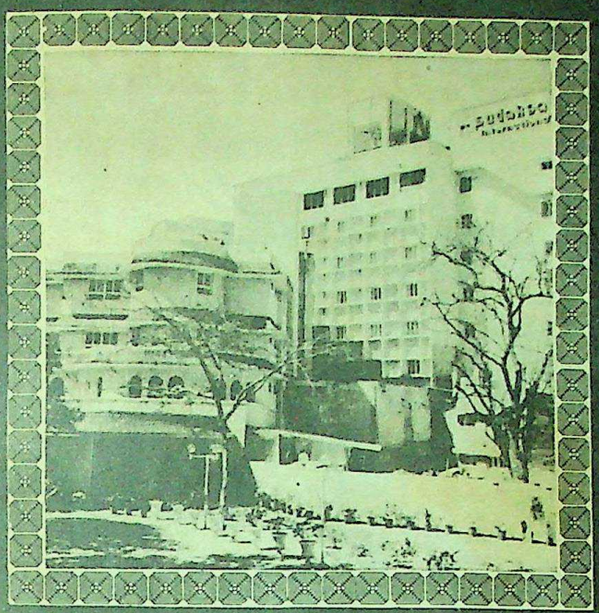
WESTWARD HO !

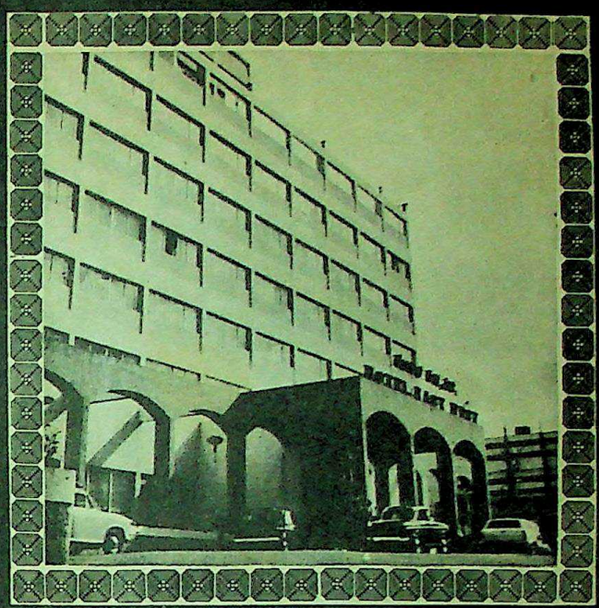
THE summer exodus of VIPs from Delhi is in full swing. It has made no difference that the Janata Government is at the helm of affairs. Ministers and officials have found some excuse or other to escape from the Delhi heat. Yet, there is an unfortunate senior official whose proposal to go abroad has been turned down by the Cabinet Secretariat. Prof. B. Nag, who joined the Department of Electronics as secretary and chairman of the Electronics Commission in December last year, had chalked out a programme to visit some European countries from the first week of July. But the proposal was turned down by none other than the Prime Minister who is in charge of the Electronics Department. The reason given is said to be that Prof. Nag's presence in the capital is necessary in view of the stormy Parliament session beginning July 11. It would not be proper for the secretary to go out of the country "at this time". The proposal has been withdrawn and the trip "postponed". But no such consideration prevented our Energy Minister, Mr P. Ramachandran, from going to Egypt to advise its Government on electricity matters or our Housing Minister, Mr Sikander Bakht from going to several countries to solve their housing problems. We wish Egypt and the countries Mr Bakht is visiting a speedy recovery from the Ministerial advice.

D. E. NIZAMUDDIN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



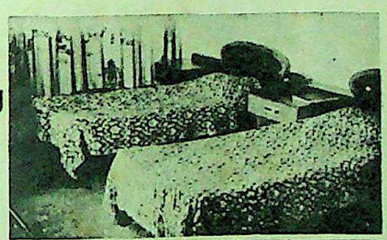


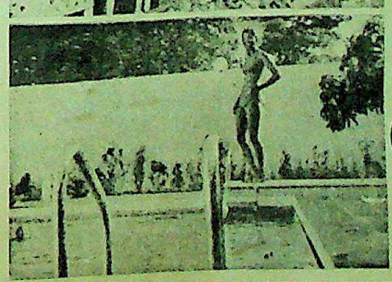
The most exciting five star fare down south

The kind of excitement having its source in luxurious comfort, endearing hospitality, incomparable personalised service.

* Centrally air-conditioned.
* Spacious well-appointed rooms & suites.
* International gourmet restaurants.
* Exclusive Chinese restaurant at Madras & Vegetarian restaurant at Bangalore.
* Permit room at Madras: Mustang Bar and round-the-clock Coffee Shop at Bangalore.
* Swimming pool & Health club with Sauna at Madras.
* Conference room & Convention hall to seat 450 at both places.
* And scores of other facilities.

All these on a down-to-earth tariff





Instant reservation —

Call	812061	Madras
	230890/231061	Bombay
	53265	Bangalore
	562383	Delhi
	263887	Calcutta

SUDARSAN GROUP OF HOTELS

hotel Sudarsan International

Montieth Road, Madras 600 008
Phone: 812061; Telex: 7453

A MINI WORLD WITH MAXI COMFORTS

hotel Sudarsan EAST WEST

Residency Road, Bangalore 560 025
Phone: 53265; Telex: 567

LUXURY WITHIN YOUR REACH

ARIES/HSI/304

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Regd No. WB|CC|256

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

63704? 6347.
63760

GOLD has both— smoothness and satisfaction

Are you looking for smoothness without having to give up satisfaction?
Then the brand for you is GOLD FILTER.
A rare combination — of both smoothness and satisfaction.

CHARMINAR
GOLD
FILTER

Smoothness has never been so satisfying.

Rs. 2.25 for 20
(Local taxes extra)

MAIN DEALER : SULTAN SALEEM & SONS, WARANGAL

STATUTORY WARNING CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

CASVS-196-244

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

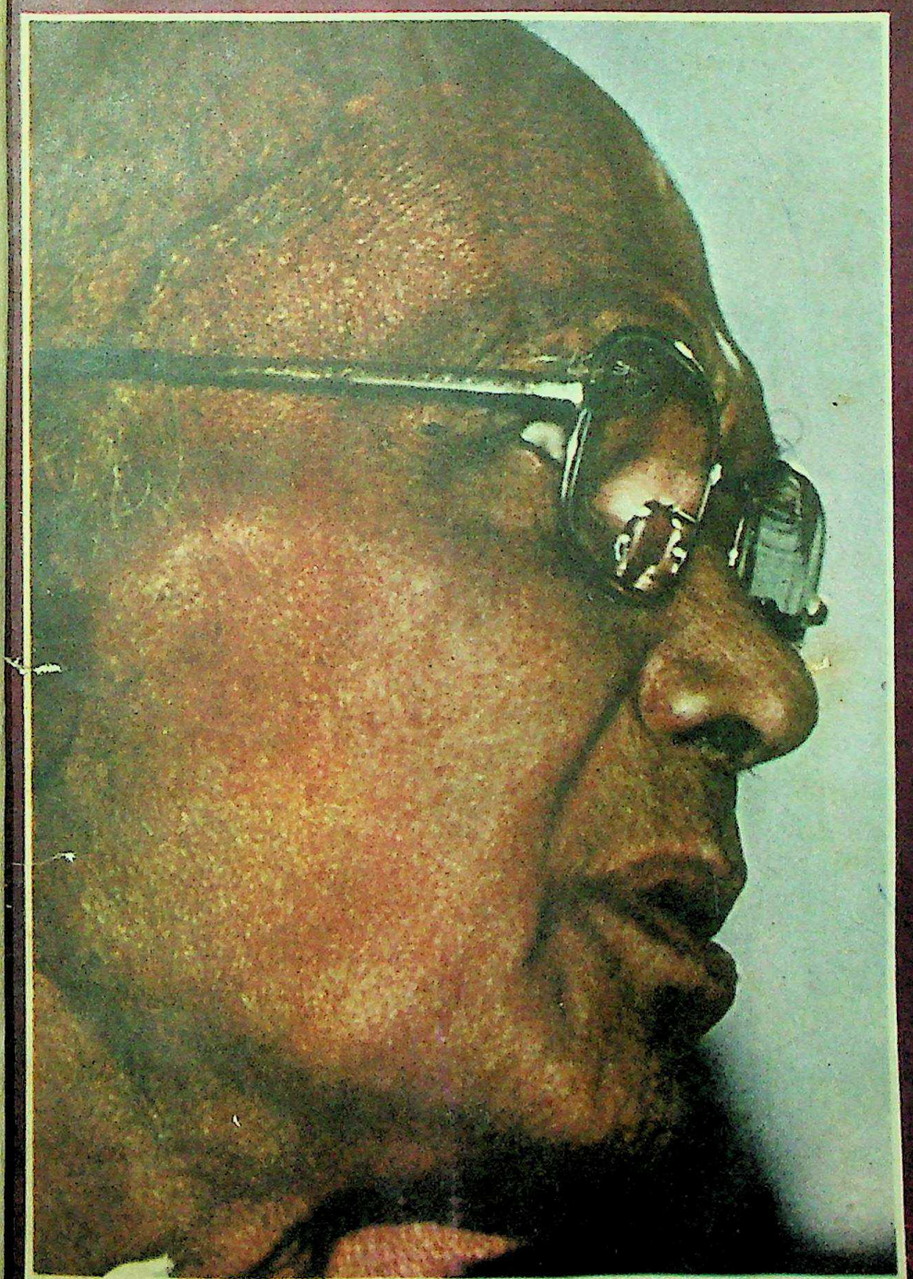
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust & eGangotri

12 AUGUST 1979 AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION Re 1

SUNDAY

Politicians are cynically using his name

THE EXPLOITATION OF JP

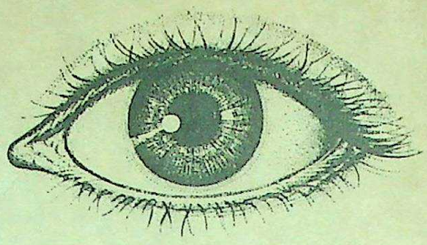


HOW AYUB KHAN LOST IN '65

By Air Marshal Asghar Khan of Pakistan

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Prayag

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



THE EYE-CATCHERS

HINDON

SUITINGS, SHIRTINGS, DRESS MATERIALS, SAREES.

HINDON RIVER MILLS

Fabrics from the Most Modern Mill

DCM TEXTILES

asian/HRM/1

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

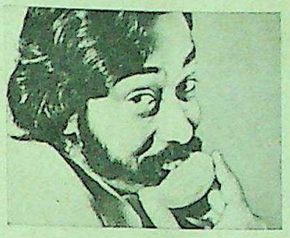
On toasts

Between breads

Over crackers

With desserts

Inside



puffs...

We're getting ourselves into a lot of jams to please you

NOGA

Mixed fruit jam
The choicest fruits get themselves into this jam.

Orange M-m-marmalade
Made from fresh-picked Nagpur oranges. A delicious way to enjoy an orange.

And 4 other fruity ways to toast yourself at breakfast

Pineapple jam
Mango jam
Strawberry jam
And Guava jelly

NOGA - IT'S ONLY NATURAL!

MAIDC Maharashtra Agro-Industries Development Corporation Ltd. Noga Unit, Nagpur.

MAID 6/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CORPORATION BANK'S KIDDY BANK

Saving is an instinct. Let your child make it a habit—through Corporation Bank's Kiddy Bank.

The jingling sound of coins in the toy bank will help your child learn the value of money—money saved every day.

Besides, the child gets a colouring book free for every Rs. 100 saved.

Give your child Corporation Bank's Kiddy Bank today.

Corporation Bank Limited

—Where friendliness is a tradition

Regd. Office: Udupi Administrative Office: Mangalore Chairman: N. N. Pai

maa CBL 81

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The 7 a.m. Experience.

Shave with the extra-thick, rich foam only Williams Shaving Cream* can give. Do it lazily, pleasurably. Indulge yourself.

Then splash on a cold, thrilling palmful of Aqua Velva aftershave—that clean, sophisticated and boldly masculine fragrance.

Ahhh...

Aqua Velva & Williams Shaving Cream.

For the sheer, manly pleasure of shaving...

LDS-1572

*Available in luxurious Lanolin Regular. And super-cool Menthol Lanolin.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CAUTION
Beware of imitations

odonil lavender

ODONIL
AIR PURIFIER & ANTI-MOTH

BALSARA
—FOR MODERN AIDS TO BETTER LIVING

BALSARA & COMPANY (PRIVATE) LIMITED
43, Nagindas Master Road, Fort, Bombay 400 023.

Because ODONIL drives away moths and cockroaches, makes sure our clothes stay fresh, fragrant and safe from insects.

- 30 times more powerful than naphthalene balls.
- Keeps the air fresh and fragrant in homes . . . especially in toilets.

CHAITRA-BLS-186

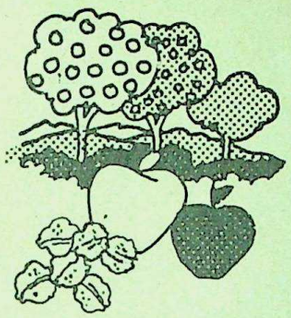
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

It's exciting ropeways, fruit-laden orchards, chinar leaves turning gold.

It's a refreshing holiday.

Kashmir in autumn is golden colours in a dreamland. With shady forest glades where yellow and gold leaves lie in a rustling carpet. There's such a lot to see and experience. Such a lot to do. Riding, boating, golfing, strolling... everything you've always wanted to do on a holiday.



There's a chairlift at Gulmarg for a wonderful view of the Himalayas. Picturesque mountain cabins near Pahalgam. Cosy houseboats and sacred Amarnath. A new winter blowing down the valley.

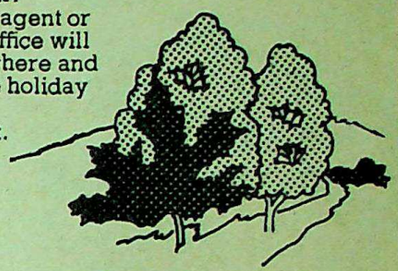
And a lot more.

Bring your family and your budget along.

You can spend Rs. 300 a day. Or just 30. Without missing out on anything. Accommodation is good and plentiful. Direct flights operate from Delhi to Jammu and Srinagar. State transport buses and taxis ply upto Srinagar.

Your travel agent or nearest tourist office will tell you when, where and how to go on the holiday of your life.

On a budget.



Your kind of holiday. On your kind of budget.

J&K TOURISM

For further information contact Tourist Officer, J & K Government

New Delhi
Chandralok Building
Janpath
Tel 345373

Bombay
129 Manakjee Wadia Bldg.
M. G. Road
Tel 273830

Ahmedabad
Airlines House
Lal Darwaza
Tel 20473

Calcutta
12 Chowringhee
Tel 233268

Hyderabad
Room No. 30
Lal Bahadur Stadium

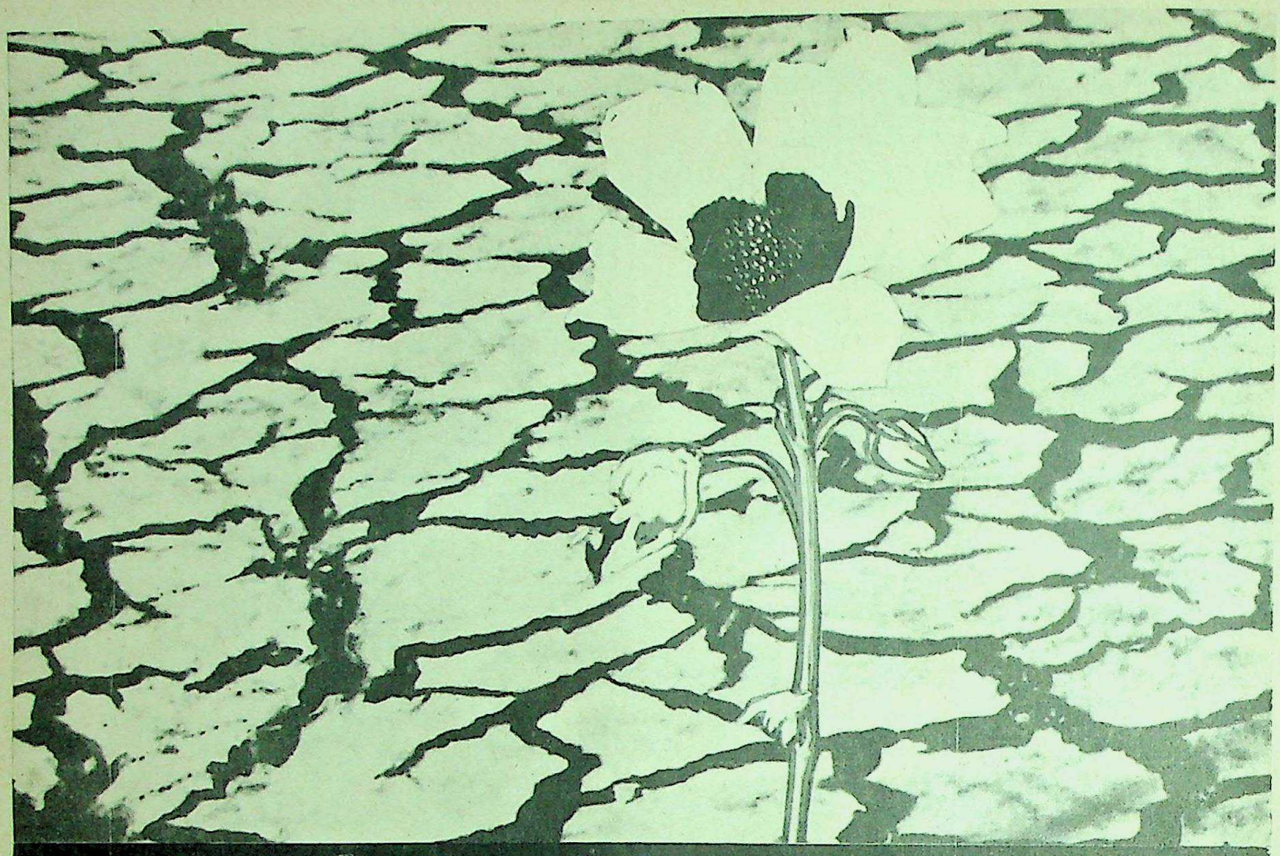
Amritsar
2, Court Road

Kashmir in Autumn
It's fun and frolic.

ITDC/CAS-131-A

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



In a parched land Hope springs again...!

APDDC'S contribution to Andhra's Drought Areas.

Ever heard of prosperity in a drought stricken area?

The Andhra Pradesh Government brought it about when it implemented the Union Government financed Drought Prone Area Programme (DPAP). Under this scheme the State Government spent Rs. 363.76 lakhs through the Andhra Pradesh Dairy Development Corporation for the development of Dairy Farming in the Rayalaseema area—Andhra's drought prone region.

15,000 milch cows and buffaloes valued at Rs. 150 lakhs were distributed under the DPAP to the small farmers in the region at subsidised rates. The vast farming community who till then had been praying futilely for rains, suddenly found itself a new occupation. Dairy Farming. APDDC launched a vigorous programme of assistance to milk producers—enabling them to get free land for grazing, providing nutritious and balanced cattle feed at controlled prices and ensuring free veterinary care. A complete Dairy Extension Service. The results were dramatic.

Milk production shot up eightfold —from 41 lakh litres in '74-'75 to 364 lakh litres in '78-'79. Small farmers haunted by starvation with no means of livelihood now had a minimum daily income of Rs. 7-Rs. 10. And most important of all, the dairy movement cut through caste and communal divisions. It became a crusade for the betterment of the community as a whole.

APDDC has set up a Milk Products Factory in Chittoor District and another is coming up at Proddutur. This will be in addition to the four District Dairies, and seven Milk Chilling Centres, that the APDDC already runs in the Rayalaseema Area.

APDDC: A new hope for the backward areas.

ANDHRA DAIRY

Breaking the limits of growth

5 YEARS OF DYNAMIC DAIRYING

The Andhra Pradesh Dairy Development Corpn. Ltd. Hyderabad 500 789.

FDS APDDC 2901 A

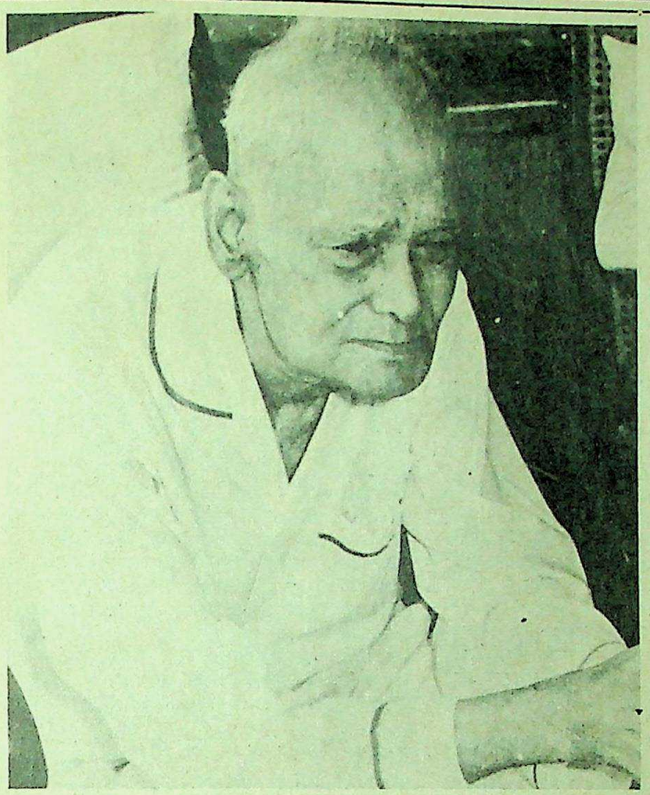
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNDAY VOLUME 7
ISSUE 12
RUPEE ONE
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

August 12, 1979

Bhola Chatterjee



Very late in his life JP came to occupy a unique position on the national scene. Without holding any official position he exerted considerable influence. Tragically his health has rapidly deteriorated in the same period. The nation has consequently witnessed the shocking spectacle of the name of the man, frail in mind and body, being dragged into partisan conflicts in aid of the contending factions. The exploitation of JP goes further—there are grave doubts about the way the Rs 75 lakhs (or is it 90 ?) raised in his name is being handled. A thorough investigation by a team of SUNDAY correspondents.

Could Pakistan have won the 1965 war against India ? Yes, says Air Marshal Asghar Khan of Pakistan. Though the national morale was high, lack of coordination and vacillation on the part of Ayub Khan made him settle for a ceasefire and, in the process, he threw away possibly the only chance Pakistan had of winning a war against India. Exclusive extracts from his book "The First Round, Indo-Pakistan war of 1965".

The Christian faith has been facing an unprecedented crisis of confidence in the last hundred years, the worst in its 2,000 years of existence. But Christianity survives —and flourishes—today, despite the dire prognostications of the sceptics. The faith somehow refuses to be buried in spite of many apparently terminal ailments.

COMMENT

Opinion 10
The Media 49

COVER STORY

The exploitation of JP|A Special Correspondent 12

SUNDAY SPECIAL

Why I am a Christian|Paul Johnson 42

SPECIAL REPORT

Revive Hinduism|Subir Roy 21

NEWS

USSR sabotaged Bhaskara|A Special Correspondent 24
Uncivil Ministers and civil servants|M. V. Kher
Ditchers from Deutschland |Milap Chand Dandia

CINEMA

Khaas Baat 50

VARIETY

Chess|Bridge|Quiz|Stamps 53
Sundayweek 54
Comic strip : Peanuts 55
This India 57
India Abroad 57
Humour in real life 57
Without comment

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Book extract : How Ayub lost in '65|Asghar Khan 32
Comics : Asterix 40
Delhi Diary 58

Cover transparency by Kamal Sahai

Editor M. J. Akbar

Assistant Editor Subir Roy Editorial Staff Nirmal Mitra, David McMahon, Saumitra Banerjee, Tirthankar Ghosh, S. N. M. Abdi Delhi Correspondent Ajoy Bose
Art Director Bipul Guha Asst Art Director Amiya Bhattacharya

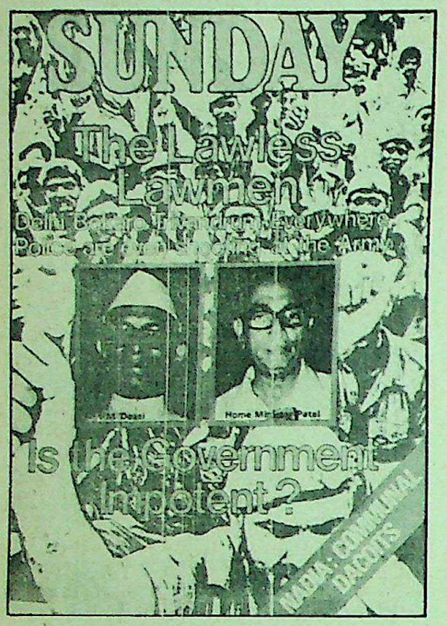
Published from 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001 and printed at Ananda Offset Private Ltd., P-248, C.I.T. Scheme No. VI M Calcutta 700054 by Bappaditya Roy for Ananda Bazar Patrika Limited.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Revolt for uniformity

YOUR coverage of the police revolt ("The lawless lawmen" by Saumitra Banerjee, July 15) was factual and thought-provoking. The episode was the immediate cause of the Janata Government's fall, and also marks the watershed in our national life. A sweeper in Bokaro earns twice as much as a CISF jawan, and a peon in a bank more than an average doctor. Such distortions are bound to cause ill-feelings. The cue was too obvious for the policemen to miss. Our Governments should realise that it is impossible to maintain tiny islands of discipline in a sea of chaos. The jawans can see for themselves that a clerk in a bank or insurance firm is able to extort three times his pay by resorting to deliberate and organised dereliction of duty—euphemistically called a "democratic trade union right", "collective bargaining", etc. If that be so, how can one deny the same right to others, including men in uniform?
S. K. Bain, Calcutta

EVEN after 32 years of Independence, some police officers suffer from a superiority complex, and maltreat their subordinates. This often leads to insubordination.
A. Vincent, Sgt. (Retd.), Coimbatore

THE CISF jawans were "made aware" of their rights perhaps by the labour forces around them in the Steel City. You have rightly pointed out the dangers of employing other sister forces, and the Army in particular, to crush the police uprising. The police never took up arms against the state. They were demonstrating peacefully. The strike was started more for fun's sake than anything else, by some overenthusiastic young policemen. How this warranted a commando-type military operation cannot be understood. In the post-Emergency period it was emphasised that the law and order situation was in the charge of the respective State Governments. Yet the former Janata Government asked for and used the CRPF more frequently than the previous regime.
Nihar Ranjan Ray, Silchar

THE Army should be used to protect the country from foreign aggression, not to solve the country's internal problems.
A. Sagayarajan, Salem

WE are sitting atop a volcano which can erupt any time. There is no law and order in the country. The police and CRP personnel feel neglected, cheated and humiliated by the politicians, who use them to serve their own personal political ends. There is constant interference in their work by politicians. Now these same politicians threaten them and woo them at the same time.
Pramod Mishra, Convener, Hindustani Andolan, Orissa

AJOY BOSE's report "Is the Government impotent?" (July 15) delves deep into the background of revolt and agitation by the police, paramilitary forces and the Army. Right from the year 1950, the dreadful spectre of police revolt has been haunting everybody. Now, with the revolt having erupted, the Government tried desperately to placate the policemen by offering certain benefits. But the system of maintaining orderlies in the police and Army is bound to generate further mistrust, hatred and indifference toward the Government.
Soubhagyabanta Maharana, Bolangir

MR BOSE quotes the CRPF Director General, Mr R. C. Gopal, as threatening the agitating policemen: "If you don't give up your agitation, I'll blow you up with tanks." Such a remark is not surprising from a person like Mr Gopal. The Home Ministry should be blamed for appointing an irresponsible person like him in such a high position.
V. R. Purushothaman, Hyderabad

THE trouble and violence in police camps can be directly attributed to the senior officers who seem to have lost their equation with their men. Ajoy Bose would do well to spend a few days in an Army unit deployed in inhospitable terrain to understand how Army officers and their men live, work and rough it together with pride, little caring for better working conditions, the orderly system and changing times.
Radha B. Kunneth, West Hill (Kerala)

An apology

IN "Goa's secret war" (July 8) I portray Mr Chico Fernandes' father as one who "collaborated with Koch". While so doing I had in mind the general pattern of attitudes of staunch Indian nationalists—as the Fernandes family—in World War II, the Germans being regarded as "friends" because they opposed the British. Mr Fernandes has now made it explicitly clear to me that his father had no role as such in the spy drama. He was only a close friend and admirer of the Goan doctor, who, actually, was Koch's friend. Mr Fernandes' activities, if any, were only peripheral and with no other intention than of being helpful to a dear friend. In as much as Mr Chico Fernandes, who happens to be my personal friend, was unhappy at the manner of his late father's characterisation, I would like to unconditionally apologise to him for whatever inconvenience, even if unintended, I may have caused him and his family.
Mario Cabral E Sa, Piedade, Goa

The answer

IT appears VIP sons are just born to sin in this country ("Sins of a son" by A. K. Chakravorty and Udayan Sharma, July 8). Starting with Mrs Gandhi, those who have suffered in one way or another due to their sons include Messrs Morarji Desai, Jagjivan Ram, Devi Lal, Bansi Lal and V. K. Saklecha. And apart from VIP sons, privileged sons-in-law too have not lagged far behind: Messrs Charan Singh, Devaraj Urs, Mirza Afzal Beg and Sheikh Abdullah will bear testimony to this. How about making celibacy a prime requisite for holding political office in this country?
Nancy Koul, Jammu Tawi.

First lesson

MRS INDIRA GANDHI is the first Indian woman to become PM, the first to enforce the Emergency for so long, first for her cruelty, the first MP to be expelled from Parliament, the first PM to face a Special Court, the first professed democrat to believe in authoritarianism, and would stand first in any 'mother' competition. Now here is a tip to help her attain more distinction. She should teach her son Sanjay healthy politics, and persuade him that it is not birth, but the personality of an individual that brings him success.
Harshananda Mallik, Phulbari.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Startling logic

B. GHOSH (Opinion, July 1) thinks troublemakers are behind the demand for zabeeha chicken, as though the Muslim boys had invented the practice. He has taken pains to twist a simple practice, and generalise about the religious susceptibilities of all minorities. The next thing he would say is: "Burn you dead and avoid trouble", proceeding with his logic of generalisation.

Sayed Shamsul Huda, Sardhapur

THE letter by Mr Ghosh exhibits contempt and lack of a sense of accommodation. I am pained to learn that some misunderstanding is spoiling the high traditions of IIT, Kharagpur, of which I am a proud alumnus, and am sure the problem can be resolved with some mutual understanding. Among meat dealers, the difference between meat and flesh is that meat is free from blood. Meat is considered tastier without blood, and many people prefer it that way. While slaughtering an animal or bird in order to ensure good bleeding, the spinal cord behind the neck is not cut. Only the two veins, windpipe and alimentary canal are cut. If the spinal cord is cut, the bleeding is incomplete, and blood clots and sticks to the flesh. As far as Muslims are concerned, blood is a prohibited item in food. For this reason, the slaughter must be done according to the practice of 'zabah' or 'halal', which ensures complete bleeding. The slaughter must be done, not for any cruel pleasure it gives, but as food permitted by God, so the name of God must be taken while slaughtering the bird or animal. I do not think any Hindu friend will fail to understand these sentiments.

Dr M. S. Abdul Kadir, Trichur

Bigoted, or blind

I WRITE, nauseated by Satish Mehta's letter (Opinion, July 15) in which he says: "Except for a couple of misdeeds, Hitler was one of the greatest leaders that Europe, if not the world, has produced". Mr Mehta means to say that the concentration camps in which millions of Jews were gassed to death vindicated Hitler's theory of Teutonic superiority, and all this was just a misdeed!! If he cannot see anything wrong in a closely knit organisation in the country idolising a man who could feel proud about such "misdeeds", he is either a fanatic or blind. As a rational human being, I am opposed to religion which transcends its purpose of providing fellowship in prayer. Further, as a culture, the characteristic attractive feature of Hinduism is its tolerance and melting-pot nature. The RSS and allied organisations negate both the above, and yet it has an important plus point: The fact that it is a disciplined body—so rare in our country now.

But for its foundation, its philosophy of Hindu rashtra being disgustingly narrow, the RSS would have been a most potent force—and unobjectionable too. To gain a firm mooring in today's polluted political ocean, the Jana Sangh seems to be ready to discard its ideology. It would be so much better if this change were genuine, and not merely dictated by expediency.

What is happening in many Islamic countries in the name of God and religion should be enough to warn us off a parallel path. The first thing to do is to put Hitler back in his place.

K. A. Paul, Trichur

TILL today I always thought of the RSS as an overdisciplined organisation with archaic religious ideas. But thanks to Mr Mehta, I have developed a rabid hatred for it now. If this is the way an RSS "sympathiser" thinks, I shudder to think of how the mind of an RSS fanatic works. Regarding the Aligarh riots, he talks about the "clean chit" given to the RSS by Mr Chandrashekhar as if it were any fitness certificate. He absolved the RSS only to appease the powerful Jana Sangh lobby. Regarding Mr Dinanath Pandey of Jamshedpur, Mr Mehta refuses to believe there are any RSS MLAs. What Mr Madhu Limaye meant by that term was MLAs with RSS affiliations. Surely no one can claim there are none of them.

D. Satya Murthy, Visakhapatnam

NO sane person can laud the barbarism of Hitler. Every single act of his against Jews was a blot on human civilisation. Hitler's madness should never be repeated. If people really know him, they would stop comparing him to Indira Gandhi or even Idi Amin.

T. Santhanam, Bombay

MR MEHTA says: "It was Hitler who from the brink of bankruptcy made his nation one of the foremost in Europe and the world." Perhaps he is not aware of the records of history. Hitler capitalised on a situation which may be described as the "darkest hour before dawn". The immediate post-depression era was undoubtedly a trying period for Germany but recovery was well within sight when Hitler came to the saddle.

S. K. Basu, Calcutta

IF the RSS's aim is to establish and encourage a nation in which people of different faiths can live in peace and harmony, why the emphasis on the word Hindu? I am sure neither Muslims nor Christians would like to be called so.

Abha Pandey, New Delhi

Correspondence on this subject is now closed.

Callous policy.

"INSURING uphappiness" (July 1) by Indeera Chand exposes the callous attitude of highly-paid employees towards the economically weaker sections of the country. If SUNDAY found it exasperating to help a poor woman collect her dues from the LIC, one can guess the plight of numerous other policy beneficiaries waiting on the staircases of LIC offices all over the country.

P. Ramraj, Erode

THOUGH the experience narrated by Ms Chand is an almost everyday occurrence all over the country, there is yet no provision for claim cheques to be personally handed over to any claimant. This appears to have been overlooked. It requires a massive public effort and a powerful campaign by the media to redeem the monolithic set-up of LIC and make it work for the benefit of the small policy-holder, which is the real motive for its foundation. Presently, the management, instead of managing the institution's affairs, is locked in litigation against not only its own employees, but also policy-holders. Though the former Janata Government appointed a panel to review the entire working of the LIC, the induction of bureaucrats and ex-bureaucrats in the panel will mean that it will be just another eyewash.

R. L. Jain, Agent, LIC of India, Satna.

MS CHAND forgets that LIC officers are to abide by some norms and procedures which are not their creation. At the time of final payment, it is understandable for the concerned officer to ask for the policy-holder/beneficiary's proper identity.

Pradip Hom Roy, North Lakhimpur.

Poor state of affairs

IT IS disheartening to note the problems faced by the poor and weaker sections in obtaining destitution and poverty certificates from Tahsildars. A destitute is admitted to an orphanage on the basis of a destitution certificate issued by the Tahsildar, when he is satisfied that the parent or guardian earns not more than Rs. 300 per annum. The voluntary organisations housing destitutes are given grants at the rate of Rs 14 per month per inmate on the basis of these certificates. But the redtapism in Government departments creates great difficulties in obtaining these certificates, for which reason the poor have to suffer in hardship. The system of obtaining certificates, starting from the level of the village munsif, is so cumbersome, it takes a month to cross all hurdles, by which time admissions to orphanages are closed.

S. Rajaram, Sivananda Orphanage, Kattankolathur

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

It begins with the country's topmost leaders and has the connivance of his secretariat. BHOLA CHATTERJI and S. P. SAGAR detail how a sick man is being "used" for cynical personal gains.

THE EXPLOITATION OF JP

D. P. Sinha

IN the sunset years of his life Mao Tse-tung was said to have been a captive in the hands of the "gang of four". The policy statements and decisions which carried his signature were alleged to have been those of the three bad men and a woman and not his. Although everything was done in the name of the Chairman, the real voice behind the show was that of the "gang". For, both physically as well as mentally, he was an invalid. One theory was that the "gang of four" did this to keep alive the fiction that the all-seeing and all-knowing Mao was infallible, that he continued to be the nation's pace maker, his feeble state of health notwithstanding. This only betrayed the totalitarian character of the regime, the theory continued. This sort of diabolical play acting could never take place in an open society like India. For, in a democracy, it would not be possible to palm off such a fraud on the people.

But any such feeling of superiority that we may possess will have to be given up now. There are Indians who will not hesitate to stoop so low as to ape even the "gang of four". And they are located right at the place where a 77-year-old sick man, who was said to have saved Indian democracy from being consigned to limbo, is living on borrowed time.

First, how sick is Jayaprakash Narayan? Is it only the flesh that is giving up or are his other faculties also failing? This his doctors alone can tell, but they will not, hamstrung as they are by the eithics of their profession. But circumstantial evidence would confirm that he is sick beyond any hope of recovery. And his physical sickness has had its deep impact, much more than is generally believed, on his mind. So much so that it is beyond him today to arrange his train of thoughts and ideas as logically as would be necessary to correlate issues and events, see things in their right perspective and get to the heart of a problem. Perhaps the Janata Party president had this in mind when he observed sometime ago that JP should not be involved in partisan politics.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

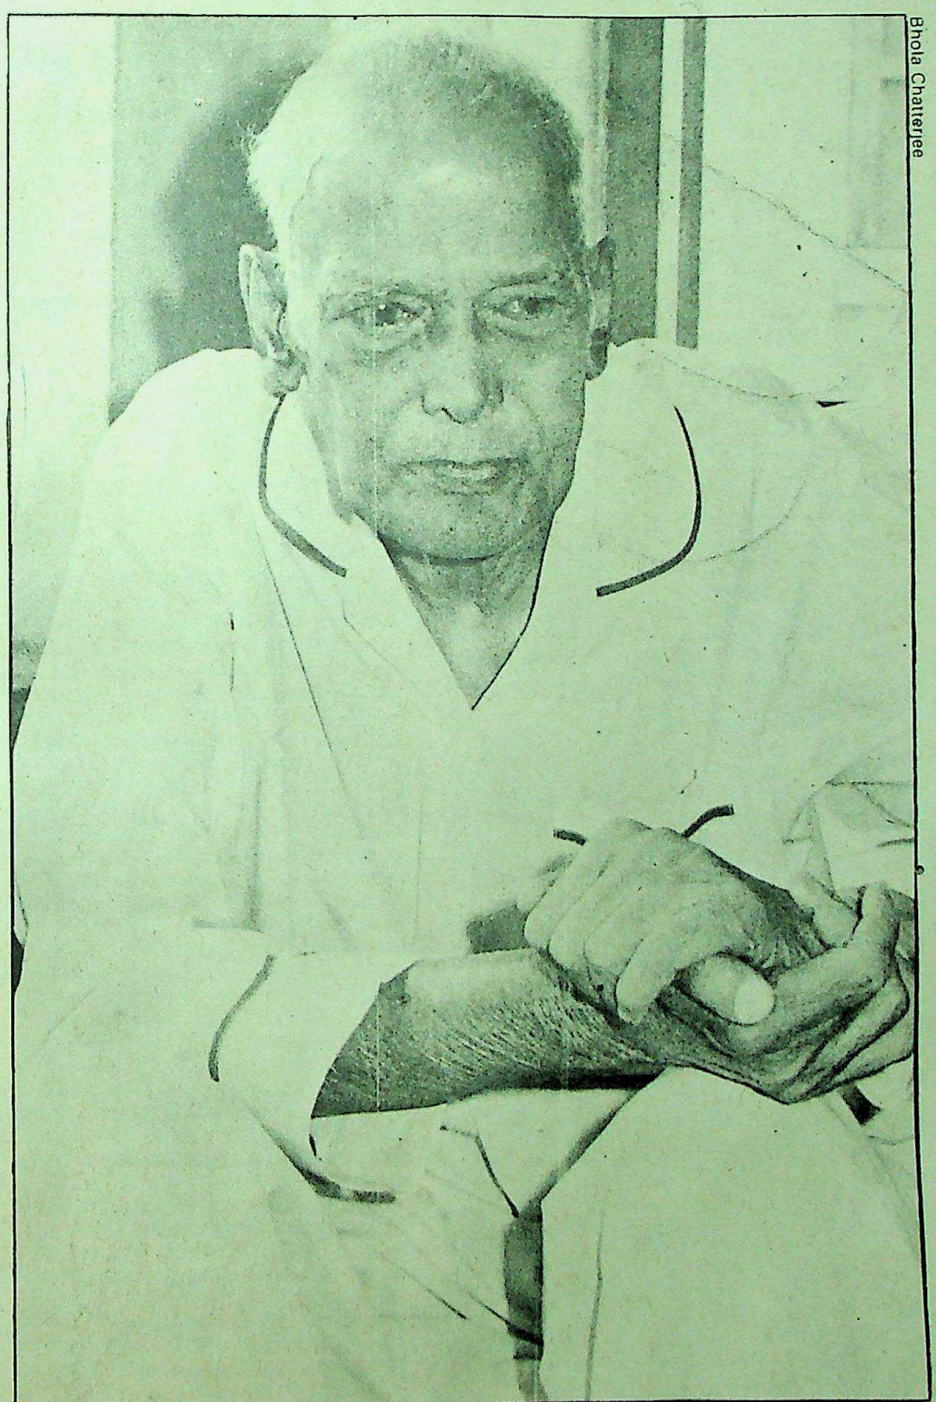
The point that must be emphasised is that JP's weakening heart condition since his return from Jaslok Hospital early last month has added a complex new dimension to his existing ailments. The administration of blood along with the dialysis complicates matters in that it forces the heart to overwork in order to assimilate the transfused blood. Again, repeated blood transfusions may have an adverse effect on his liver which surely is not in sprightly condition. As Dr M. K. Mani of Jaslok Hospital, who has been attending JP all these months, put it soon after examining him on July 25 : "This is a condition known as ischaemic colitis. There is no cure for this condition and the only treatment available for him is blood transfusion to make up the blood lost as well as to strengthen the blood to carry oxygen to the intestine." JP has an ulcer in his colon causing rectal bleeding, which requires a major surgery that his present health will not enable him to withstand. Because of the rectal bleeding he needs regular transfusions which have to be administered not in drips but along with the dialysis.

On July 23 as the Janata Party breathlessly waited to end its days, its chief architect hovered between life and death. The past 24 hours had been a critical time and the doctors attending JP kept their fingers crossed. What with rectal bleeding, nausea and breathing trouble, JP gave his friends and physicians a very anxious time. They had a feeling of fear and uncertainty about the future; and none made any effort to suppress it. But it was quite another story when it came to the question of the men who ran his household. One instance out of many will tell the tale. Around 11 in the morning of July 24 Devendra Prasad Singh, a former vice-chancellor of Bhagalpur University and one of JP's close associates, had to beg of the police security guard (JP's Kadam Kuan residence is literally crowded with security men, oddly enough) to allow him to go upstairs. He did so just to get a glimpse of JP from outside his room. What he saw was much too depressing for him not to agree with JP's younger brother, Rajeswar Prasad, that his condition had further deteriorated.

That touched Sachidanand, JP's secretary, to the quick. Rudely he told them that they should not indulge in such "defeatist" talk. The expression of anger, this 'more royalist than the king' attitude, was not a little embarrassing for the urbane Rajeswar Prasad. After all, he knew only too well all about the present state of his elder brother's health. There is no getting away from the fact that JP is in bad shape, both physically and mentally. But it is not very difficult to guess why some men are morbidly averse to letting the world into the truth about the present condition of JP's body and mind. The fact is that they have an axe to grind. Which is why they insist that the myth must remain in circulation that JP has complete control of his mental faculties that neither his mind nor his memory has suffered impairment despite the punishing ailment which afflicts him.

The cold fact of life is that JP is no longer in a position to address himself to the kind of rigorous and methodical mental exercise that would be required to comprehend and dissect any complex issue and pass judgment on it. The man's once alert, incisive mind, almost elephantine memory and the unique capacity for taking a dispassionate view of men and events are a thing of the past. One hoped things would get better, but as it is they are getting worse. That partly explains why Sachidanand stubbornly resists any request for a taped interview with JP—he does not want others to discover the truth. With the possible exception of the humane Thomas Abraham who administers dialysis to JP, none of the other decision makers in the JP household—Sachidanand, Janaki Bahen (JP's adopted daughter), her husband Kumar Prashant and former socialist Jagdish Babu who hails from JP's home district of Ballia—hesitate to treat him as an object of cynical exploitation. The touch of philistinism that is so evident at JP's residence and



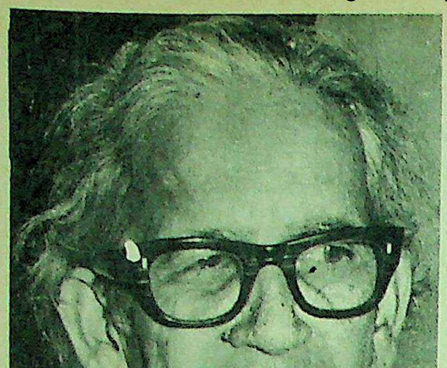
Bhola Chatterjee

JP photographed after his reurn to Patna

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Bhola Chatterjee



S. M. Joshi

the utterly conscienceless use of his name that goes on day in and day out for small political and materia! gains are indeed sickening.

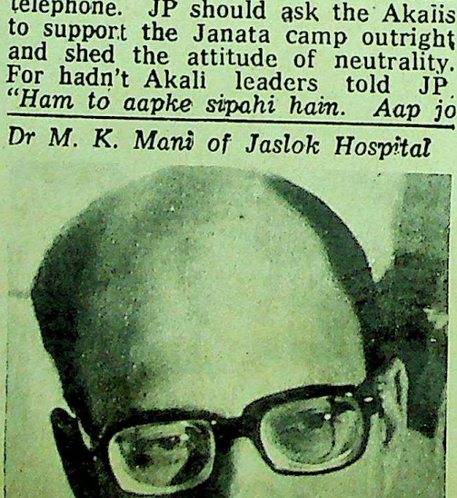
The most recent glaring example of JP being "used" is his letter to the then PM Morarji Desai requesting him to quit in favour of Jagjivan Ram as leader of the Janata Parliamentary Party. The sordid business was rigged up in a manner that would beggar discription. On July 17, Mr S. M. Joshi, had a talk with the Madhu Dandavate-Surendra Mohan group of former Socialists. If Mr Jagjivan Ram became the JPP leader, he would get many more MPs along caste lines even from other Parties, they concluded. Mr Desai was dragging his feet and clinging to the JPP leadership, almost "holding on to it physically". Mr Joshi broached this to Mr Gore at a dinner and the two decided to approach Mr Jayaprakash Narayan to enlist Babuji who gleefully said, "Aap chahte hain to jaroor kijiye" (If you so like, do it).

The problem was who would carry the letter of S. M. Joshi to Mr Narayan. Joshi had talked to JP's secretary Mr Sachidanand, and the arrangement was made that Joshi should detail the situation in a letter since he was not free to come to Patna. Joshi would have liked Mr Madhu Limaye's wife, who was like a daughter to him, to be the confidante to do the emissary's job. But right there was Mr Arjun Singh Bhadoria who suggested the name of his wife, Mrs Sarla Bhadoria. Mr Joshi drafted his letter to JP and described how Jagjivan Babu would be a better man in that situation. Thus came about the controversial visit of Mrs Sarla Bhadoria. The lightning speed with which she did the magic startled everybody. She came by the morning flight on July 18, and got back the same afternoon with Mr Narayan committed to support Mr Jagjivan Ram in black and white. It was July 18, Wednesday, a day for Mr Narayan's routine dialysis. This is a forbidden day for most visitors. The dialysis was delayed. Two letters, one for Mr Desai and another for Mr Chandrashekhar, were hastily drafted, signed by Mr Narayan and despatched through the courier. All this was done with remarkable rapidity. "We were even prepared to delay the dialysis for half an hour to ensure that Mr Narayan signs the letters", someone confided at JP's house. Indeed, when Joshi's letter was read out to Mr Narayan, he agreed to the line of argument. Yes, Jagjivan Babu should be the JPP leader and all others, including Mr Chandrashekhar, should support it. The letters were despatched through Mrs Bhadoria. She, it is said, telephoned Delhi at the first available opportunity. The contents were disclosed even before she had reached Delhi. Mr Arjun Singh Bhadoria had spoken all about it at Jagjivan Babu's residence and the Advani-run All India Radio was parroting it over and over again. The whole feat would not have been possible without Sachidanand's active co-operation.

The immature publicity given to Mr Narayan's letters even before they had been delivered deeply pained him. He chose to remain indifferent to the Janata squabbles. But the following day, Mr Prakash Singh Badal with three top Akali leaders, besides Sheikh Abdullah of Kashmir, arrived in batches to seek JP's "guidance in the hour of national peril". It seemed he was again going to be caught in a fresh controversy. The Akali leaders and the Shiekh in their separate talks urged him to visit Delhi to offer his good offices. They were concerned that instability at the Centre would badly affect the states. The Akali leaders suggested that alternatively JP should summon national leaders to Patna. But no. JP would not be drawn into it again. He had had enough of it.

The last to make a vain attempt at JP's house was Mr Harbhanjan Singh, a Socialist leader of Punjab. He came and later pursued it over telephone. JP should ask the Akalis to support the Janata camp outright and shed the attitude of neutrality. For hadn't Akali leaders told JP "Ham to aapke sipahi hain. Aap jo kahenge ham wahi karenge" (We are your soldiers. We shall do what you ask us to do.) But JP quietly replied "Ab ham ye jhamele mein jyada nahin parna chathe hain" (Now I don't want to be dragged in the controversy any more).

Dr M. K. Mani of Jaslok Hospital



It is a well known fact that seldom does JP take an initiative in either sending a letter or issuing a statement. It is always done at somebody's behest and all that JP does is to trim the wording to make it conform to his own feelings as much as possible. This holds good for the series of letters and statements that he supposedly issued out of his own free will in 1978 and afterwards. Those who know JP say that "he is too good a man, too simple, least assertive, most generous and obliging. Gandhi was greater than he was, but then Gandhi was shrewd too. JP is not shrewd and hence is often cheated, easily impressed by wheedling words."

A well known example of this is his message issued at the time of Mrs Nandini Satpathy's election. This is how the message was obtained. JP was in Bombay at the Express Towers. Mrs Satpathy was seeking election in 1977 against Mrs Malati Chaudhury. Someone on Mrs Chaudhury's behalf, counting upon the Sarvodaya links, pressed JP for an electoral message. JP was reluctant for on the other side was a Janata candidate. But he could not say no for long. He sent a mesage of good wishes to Malati Chaudhury making it clear that it was for Mrs Chaudhury only. Soon the courier rushed to the Press and gave the portion that wished Mrs Chaudhury all success. So after the courier had left the scene JP wanted the message to be withdrawn. But by then AIR had flashed it. The controversy became so bitter that even Mr Chandrashekhar and Mr Desai publicly commented against JP's supposed stand against Mrs Nandini Satpathy in favour of a non-Janata candidate.

It is a common complaint in Patna that the men who run JP's household are very choosy about whom he should meet, what letters should be read out to him or which messages or reports should be brought to his notice. The formidable list of people who have suffered indignities in trying to meet JP includes some of his longterm friends and close associates like Bihar's additional advocate-general Radha Raman, Sundari Devi, one of JP's relations, the late Phulan Prasad Varma's wife (Phulan Babu, a Socialist member of the Constituent Assembly, was among JP's inner circle of friends), and another close friend of JP, Brijnandan Azad, who was a former editor of the Indian Nation. The secretariat has made enormous contributions towards keeping JP away from the masses. People seeking appointments are needlessly harassed, for which JP has had to apologise later. People from all over the country write to him but seldom get replies thanks to a secretariat which has its own axe to grind.

Ever since the Janata Government came to power in Delhi people close

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust. Gangotri to JP have aligned themselves with one faction or the other. He has become a virtual puppet in their hands. A statement supporting one group will be signed by an ailing JP and released promptly to the Press. Then the other group will get a contradictory statement signed and released to the Press. The more ambitious among the men around him have their respective politician and industrialist patrons who loosen their purse strings as and when necessary. One recent entrant to the secretariat, who is said to owe his allegiance to Mr Morarji Desai, sat beside JP for hours, dinned into his ears the virtues of the former Prime Minister, pried into all official correspondence and took objection to any statement issued by JP disapproving of Mr Desai. And with the fall of the Morarji Government this great social worker simply disappeared. He is of course none other than Siddharaj Dhadda.

Mr Jagganath Kaushal, the then Governor of Bihar received a letter signed by JP which requested that a certain person be favoured. The Governor, who apparently knew JP's signature well, found out that the signature on the letter was forged. The Governor sent the letter to JP's secretariat which confirmed that it was a case of forgery. The matter was immediately hushed up and there were no attempts to track down the miscreant.

Those in Patna know well that frequent letters would reach the Bihar government for favours of one nature or the other saying that "JP desires that.....". A bunch of such letters was carried by a Minister and shown to JP and after that the speed with which these letters surfaced slowed down. The last but not the least instance is one of a new recruit of the secretariat. The smart young boy wrote a letter to George Fernandes, then Industries Minister, for a job. The letter was written on JP's pad, and was supposedly signed in JP's own hand. Bad luck for him that the matter was referred back and the cat was out of the bag.

JP's house and his life have thus become a thoroughfare. Politicians will stop at nothing to use him for the fulfilment of their ambitions. when, if they had even a shred of decency, they would have left him to his peace in his last days among us. His modest house at Kadam Kuan, Patna, which could not have been further in anyone's imagination from a palace, is now a hotbed of intrigue. Sachidanand, his secretary, plays politics upto the hilt, Siddharaj kept watch for Mr Desai while he was in power, Kumar Prashant is not officially in anything but has a finger in every pie and Jagdish Babu is hardly there for selfless service. The final symbolic act that has removed JP and his secretariat from the public is the closure of the secretariat's office downstairs. (Some letters had reportedly disappeared from the files.) The stairs are blocked by a collapsable gate with security guards. But what good is that when the undesirables are all upstairs? ■

A fund to dishonour the Loknayak

That is how Sarvodaya worker, Baburao Chandawar, sees the Amrit Mahotsava Kosh, reports OLGA TELLIS.

WHERE has the Rs 90 lakhs collected on the eve of JP's birth anniversary celebrations in 1977 gone? This is the question that has been haunting the humble workers wedded to the fulfilment of JP's unfinished total revolution. These workers are pained, saddened and angry that this fund, collected to further JP's dream of a total revolution, is neither available to the humble mainstream workers nor does anyone know where the money is and how it is being used. There are vague indications that some of it is in Delhi, some in Bombay and Ahmedabad and elsewhere with the conveners who collected the money. In sheer despair, Baburao Chandawar, who has worked with JP for 30 years in Bhojpur district of Bihar and shoulder to shoulder with the Naxalites since 1974, has announced that he will go on fast from October 2 this year if the Amrit Mahotsava Kosh does not give an account of how much money it has and what it intends to do with it.

When I met Chandawar in his modest home in Bhiwandi about 50 miles from Bombay, he was at work on his book on Bhojpur. Surrounded by his teacher-wife Vanita and three children, Chandawar looked deceptively docile but was seething with anguish inside, his firm jawline underlining his determination to call a halt to the "deliberate attempt on the part of capitalists, Gandhians and liberal democrats to tarnish JP's image and kill the movement JP envisaged for the landless and the downtrodden."

JP sells well: Jaslok Hospital bookshop

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Explaining the root cause of his decision to go on fast, Chandawar said, "those who were against the idea of total revolution and those who never participated in the 1974 Bihar Movement are today controlling the Amrit Mahotsava Kosh. None of them were ever in the Bihar Movement, yet they became trustees of the Kosh. The chairman of the collection fund was Acharya J. B. Kripalani until last year when he gave up all public posts. The managing trustee of the Kosh that was formed is Mr Radhakrishna, the secretary is Govindrao Deshpande and the other trustees are Mr L. C. Jain, treasurer of the Janata Party, Mr Siddharaj Dhaddha, Mr Ramnath Goenka and Mr Ramkrishna Bajaj. None of these were anywhere near the Bihar Movement. (Mr Goenka, of course, aided the movement but perhaps for his own reasons.)

"In fact Acharya Kripalani ridiculed the idea of a total revolution. In an article in Dharmayug he had said that he does not believe in total revolution because violence is involved. In fact, all Gandhians attacked the idea. Yet Kripalani was made chairman of the fund and the fund was meant to propagate total revolution."

JP, Chandawar continued, was aware that his total revolution was being ridiculed. That is why he wrote in Navbharat Times on April 13, 1977; "The total revolution has been mocked at and hatred and scorn has been poured over it. They said it is only a dream. Therefore I want to repeat again that I believe in total revolution and I promise that when I am well I will take up this work again."

From the very beginning the capitalists, Gandhians and liberal democrats sought to downgrade the idea of a total revolution. Says Chandawar, "In January 1977 when the elections were announced some others and I sat with JP for three days and discussed that the programme of total revolution should be put before the people when asking them for their vote. But people surrounding JP were quick to dissuade him. They said if you do this you will alienate the upper middle class and middle class people. So JP had no alternative but to bow to their thinking. You know JP is not an aggressive person. Besides, his ill health makes him submissive. These Gandhians, capitalists and industrialists therefore misuse him and his name.

"I will tell you something else. When the talks were on for the formation of the Janata Party, JP asked them all to resign first from their respective parties and then form a brand new Party. But Nanaji, Goray and Surendra Mohan did not agree to this. So JP sent a letter through me to Krishna Kant saying that since the Janata Party could never become a vehicle of total revolution because of the way in which it was constituted, all the socialists, Young Turks and Sarvodaya people should come together and form an organisation that would work for ushering in total revolution. But no one could proceed any further because Acharya Kripalanj intervened and put a stop to everything."

Asked whether he had ever approached Ramkrishna Bajaj or R. N. Goenka personally about the problems of the fund and its utilisation, Chandawar said, "How could I go anywhere near them. They are mighty people. It's so difficult to even get near them, leave alone talk with them. Besides when in Bihar the movement was started in 1974, JP sent me to these people several times but we got no response nor any cooperation from them. Therefore, I told Siddharaj that people like Ramkrishna Bajaj had no moral right to be trustees on the Kosh. That is why today the Kosh has no programmes for the landless, the weaker sections of the people oppressed by the evils of caste. I have been with JP for 30 years and he always thought in terms of the landless, the downtrodden and the victims of casteism. But none of these have been incorporated in the Kosh for which money was collected in JP's name.

Bhola Chatterjee

Sachidanand

"In fact JP did not know anything about the trust. When the purse (a piece of paper) was presented to JP at the Gandhi maidan, Mr Ramkrishna Bajaj in his introductory speech announced the formation of the trust. When I met JP later I asked him about the trust and he said he hoped the money would be used for total revolution work. In his speech earlier he said that the method in which the money was to be spent should be discussed with the main stream workers. JP told me that no one had discussed the trust deed with him at any time. When we were talking, Thakurdas Bang and Siddharaj Dhaddha were seated with us. I asked Dhaddha why JP was not informed about the trust and he said within hearing of everyone that there was no time, 'We had to form the trust soon to avoid income tax'. However JP stressed the need to clear all this before the people but nothing was ever done. It was then that I had decided to go on fast on November 15, 1978. However, the Sarva Seva Sangh people, Dada Dharma Adhikari and others tried to dissuade me. They said they would find out the money that was collected. Even Acharya Kripalani, whom I informed about the fast, said he knew nothing about the trust that was formed and said it was a good idea to go on the fast. I had seen the trust deed in Delhi and I saw that they had made an institution and there was not a word about total revolution programmes. There was mention of work during floods, drought and some social work, etc, which would only help in boosting the image of the trustees. I was told about some work they are doing like having selected 100 areas for experiment and paying 200 workers for bogus work like spinning, weaving and about education. This may be constructive but it is not revolutionary like land reforms."

Talking about the background of the fund collection drive, Chandawar said, "I was against the manner of collection from the beginning. When I was invited by Mr Thakurdas Bang to participate in the deliberations of the committee set up for the purpose of raising funds I made it clear that it was wrong and the move should be abandoned. I gave them the experience I had with the Gram Swaraj Kosh (Village Self-government Fund) collected on the birth anniversary of Vinoba Bhave. There were large scale irregularities in handling the money and this became the order of the day. No accounts were maintained and nobody knew how the Rs 75 lakhs collected was ultimately spent. I understand the money was frittered away on a trader who wanted to start a business and on another official who wanted to buy a car, etc. But they went ahead with the collection. On January 28, 1978 I wrote a letter to JP expressing my anguish over the whole affair. In this letter I voiced serious misgivings about the move and its effectiveness in furthering the cause of total revolution. You know my fight is for values. If we want total revolution our strategy should be honest. Till you have a programme, to collect funds is a mistake.

"I met JP a number of times and also wrote letters to the Amrit Mahotsav Kosh on this issue. Once JP himself directed Siddharaj to place before the country the details of how the funds were being disbursed. When Thakurdas Bang submitted a report on the manner of disbursement it was so vague that JP asked Siddharaj to make the report more clear and specific. Yet the people were nowhere in the picture. A trust consisting of VIP's was formed and it was clear that there was a gap between the thinking of the trustees and JP. And the result is that there is absolutely no scheme in the entire budget of the Kosh which in any way touches the weaker sections of the people and as such the whole process runs counter to the basic assumptions of the total revolution."

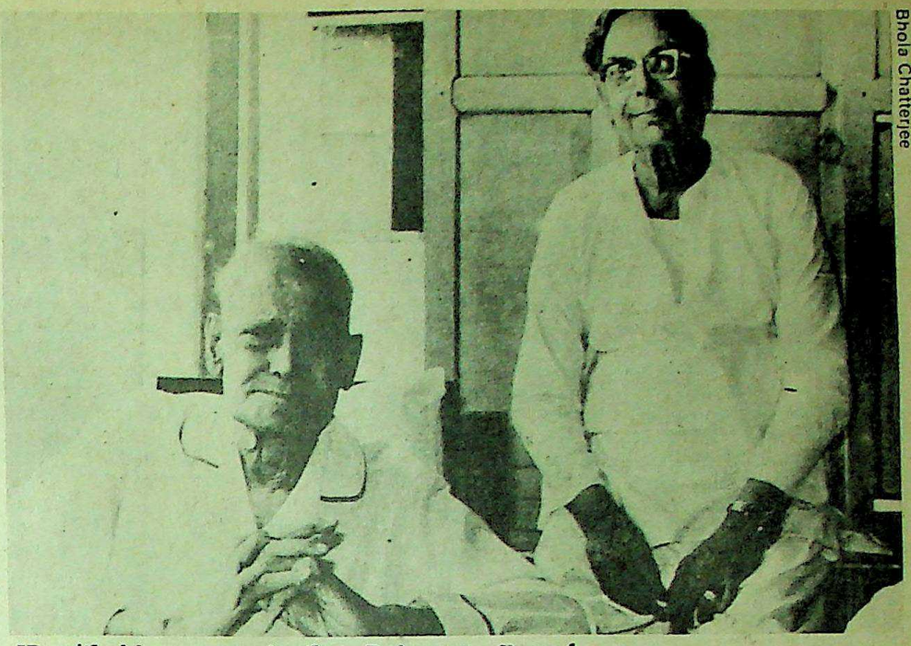
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CHANDAWAR is also angry at the way the money was collected. "The rules framed for the collection drive stipulated that 60 per cent of the funds would come from subscriptions ranging from Rs 100 downwards and the rest may be subscribed by persons commanding greater resources. This was to avoid black money from coming in. But in practice, it was just the opposite. The 60 per cent came from Rs 10,000 and above and 40 per cent from the small contributions. This was disclosed by Mr Ramkrishna Bajaj, the treasurer of the fund, at the Gandhi Maidan speech in Patna, on the occasion of the presentation of the purse to JP. In fact some of my Bombay friends tell me that out of the Rs 40 lakhs collected in Bombay only Rs 5 lakhs came in small contributions. All the remaining came from big business and even from smugglers notwithstanding the fact that they gave in cheques. Large scale irregularities have been reported in fund collection and many friends think that over Rs 90 lakhs must have been collected. No one bothered to clear all these doubts that I and friends like me had and so I decided to go on fast on November 15, 1978. I then postponed it since everyone prevailed upon me and promised to get the matter rectified. Since nothing has been done to date, I have announced an indefinite fast from October 2 this year to express my feelings against the corrupt practices and irregularities in collecting and operating the fund.

"I am convinced that the capitalists, Gandhians and the liberal democrats are out to demolish the total revolution. JP told me recently that the movement started by Gandhi died after his death and the total revolution movement will also die. But I am determined to see that it does not. Ramkrishna Bajaj and Goenka and people like them are definitely against total revolution.

"I will give you an example of how we have been hitting our heads against the wall in trying to get their assistance. In November 1977 when I was to go to Bhojpur again for work, JP wrote a letter to the Gandhi Peace Foundation and others asking them to cooperate and assist me. He had wanted to start the second phase of the total revolution. In his letter he had written: 'The increasing social tension and its manifestation in sporadic class and caste conflicts and continued clashes in some parts of Bihar should set us all thinking. These are symptoms of a deep rooted malady which calls for revolutionary solutions. The student and youth movements which snowballed into a massive people's movement in 1974-75 was perhaps the beginning of what might have been a violent upheaval. Having sensed this I tried to channelise it in a peaceful direction. I called it total revolution. But the movement assumed the shape of a political struggle for the preservation of democracy against the totalitarian tendencies of the Congress regime. With the end of the Congress misrule and restoration of democracy under the new Janata regime the people heaved a sigh of relief. The Janata Government symbolised the aspirations of the people who expected it to solve their urgent economic and social problems. The Janata Government's inability to offer quick solutions is likely to make the people restive... I have always held that our basic problems cannot be solved except through organised people's power, youth power. A friendly Government can only extend a helping hand. I appeal to all social and constructive workers including youth and student activists who had participated in the 1974-75 movement to come together and carry forward the programme of total revolution. They have to organise the people, specially the weaker sections of society, along peaceful lines and show them the way to solve their problems. The exploited classes have no alternative but to unite to assert their rights. I am not suggesting that class struggle should be invited and fomented everywhere. But when it becomes inevitable it must be waged peacefully and firmly...I am particularly concerned about the explosive situation in Bhojpur district where in the last few years many landless harijans are reported to have been killed in the course of clashes with well-to-do farmers in the area...' In this context JP introduced Chandawar as a senior Sarvodaya activist worker from Maharashtra and asked them to help him in his task which he had undertaken in Bhojpur. But this brought no response. In fact it was anathema to the capitalists who were only interested in using and abusing JP's name and image. They saw to it that JP was separated from the people whom he loved.



Bhola Chatterjee

JP with his younger brother Rajeswar Prasad

Baburao Chandawar

In Jaslok Hospital and the penthouse of Mr Goenka in Bombay, only the rich and powerful were allowed near JP. The others were driven away. All these dinners and lunches they had for him with food from five star hotels were designed to tarnish JP's image of the man of the people, the man whose heart and soul was with the downtrodden and weaker classes. That is why, says Chandawar sadly, JP does not want to move away from Patna again. You know his people in Bombay cannot afford JP the treatment he needs nor the care and the food so he becomes a victim of the capitalists and industrialists. He has realised this and has pleaded that he should be allowed to remain and die in Patna.

Chandawar is now trying to build public opinion against the "treachery" indulged in by the trustees of the Kosh at the cost of the downtrodden and the landless. As he says, "There are many little groups working in Bihar, eastern UP, Orissa and elsewhere, but they need money for their work. Money is needed for little things like transport conveyance, letter writing, postage, etc. Mobility is very important. But ironically the money which is collected for this purpose has been kept out of the reach of the people who desperately need it. My fight is for making this available for the downtrodden for the second phase of the total revolution." ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

JP had nothing to do with the fund

By BHOLA CHATTERJI

THE Jayaprakash Amrit Mahotsava Samiti was set up sometime after the March '77 elections to celebrate the seventy-fifth birthday of the Loknayak, which would fall on October 21. The sponsors of the committee also decided to present JP with a purse of Rs 75 lakhs. The people and organisations concerned, including the JP Birth Celebration Committee of which J. B. Kripalani was the chairman, enjoined that certain principles must be observed while collecting money for the proposed purse. That these principles were honoured more in the breach right from the word go is apparent from the statement JP issued in early October, 1977. "I strongly disapprove of unauthorised collections made by all sorts of people in my name. I warn the public against such persons". It is worth noting that JP was then in full command of his senses and in comparative good health.

But few cared to pay any heed to JP's entreaty. Soon after the Amrit Kosh Trust was formally launched, accusations of misuse of funds came in thick and fast. Also people began to approach JP for assistance from the fund. Once again JP had to clarify his position regarding the Amrit Kosh Trust. On September 18, 1978 he said: "I have been receiving requests for help from the Amrit Kosh fund that was collected on the occasion of my seventy-fifth birth anniversary last year. I take this opportunity to make it clear that although the fund was collected in my name and formally presented to me, it actually vests in the Amrit Kosh Trust that came into existence on October 11, 1977. This trust alone is responsible for and competent to disburse any part of the fund for purposes in keeping with the aims and objects laid down in the trust deed. I would, therefore, advise all concerned to send their requests for any help or assistance directly to the managing trustees of the Amrit Kosh Trust located at the Gandhi Peace Foundation, New Delhi."

Here lies the rub. JP had nothing to do with the trust and yet his name continued to be exploited, as and when necessary, in connection with its functioning. The doubts that Chandawar has expressed about the way the fund was raised and its disbursement are not new to those who have kept track of the whole thing. I found the Patna air thick with incriminating reports on the working of the Amrit Kosh Trust even as early as April 1978. It was in JP's residence that I chanced upon Sarva Seva Sangh leader Siddharaj Dhaddha, one of the members of the trust. When I referred to the rumours and asked for his clarifications the following interview emerged. The point that needs to be stressed is that the doubts raised then have not been cleared up in the intervening period of over a year.

Q: How did you come to join the Sarva Seva Sangh and what was your politics before you joined it?

A.: From the very beginning of my college days I had been influenced by Gandhiji's ideas and my coming to the Sarva Seva Sangh was only a culmination of what I had been working and living for for the last 40 years.

Shiddharaja Dhaddha

Q: What's your age now?

A: I am now 70.

Q: Well, you look quite sprightly for your age. Incidentally, the Bihar Government State Guest House (where Mr Dhaddha was staying) is a relatively comfortable place. It seems a world apart from where the common man lives. Also, the arrangement and upkeep of the place do not appear to have changed much from what they were in the colonial days.

A: Well, so far as I am concerned personally, it makes no difference to me whether I am here or in a small hut in the village. It is the work and the mission that you have got that is more important.

Q: I understand that about Rs 90 lakhs was collected during Jayaprakash Narayan's Amrit Mahotsab year. I also understand that a trust has been formed and you are one of its leading members. How do you propose to spend that money?

A: The trust has had its preliminary meetings and it has chalked out a programme and decided upon certain items on which the trust money will be largely spent. The items naturally are those in which JP has been interested all these years. His programmes, his activities and his ideas form the main nucleus round which the activities that will take place will be financed by the fund.

Q: Have you already spent any money from the fund? For that matter, has anything been done so far?

A: No, not yet. The first meeting of the trust was held only early this month. We have decided to publicise this thing in the newspapers and call for suggestions from the people keeping in view the broad objectives, of which I told you. If anybody has got any plan, he will send it to the trust and then the trust will finalise it.

Q: Did you ever publish any list of donors, I mean people who contributed to the fund?

A: It comes out (inaudible) by the State committees. So far as the small collections are concerned, it is not possible to publish the list because they have been collected through coupons. And coupons had been given one rupee, two rupees, five rupees (denomination). So far as the bigger donations are concerned certainly a list will be published.

Q: Report has it that some of the large contributions to the fund were not clean money. It is even said that smugglers also contributed to the fund. Is there any truth in it?

A: Anything can be said in a democracy, we cannot prevent people from saying anything. Everything that has been collected has been collected by receipts. It is there for everybody to see.

Q: Don't you think that to take out the sting of that report, the best idea would be to publish a list of the big donors?

A: That is what we are contemplating to do.

Q: What about accountability? People would naturally like to know how the money is spent? You know, in the past there had been such trust funds, but when it came to the quesion of accountability one could see that there was not very rigid adherence to rules which ought to have been observed. What do you propose to do regarding that?

A: As I told you, the trust is a public registered trust. Its proceedings are there and everything will be decided by the trust. Loose talk does not help and, unfortunately, there has been quite a lot of loose talk during previous years. I do not say that undesirable things may not have happened. But for public trusts and public institutions, since their reports are always open, anybody can see them and derive a measure of satisfaction. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

RAJENDRA SINGH: 'Mr Limaye's article contains many wrong and half-wrong facts'

The RSS General Secretary responds to our invitation to reply to Madhu Limaye's "The ambitions of the RSS" (SUNDAY, June 10)

A MAN who normally tells the truth and only occasionally an untruth is a dangerous man, because his untruths may be mistaken for truths. But one who has a lot of misrepresentation and distortion to his credit does not cause much damage because people learn to make discounts to his assertions. As such Shri Madhu Limaye's article contains so many wrong and half-wrong facts and surmises that it was not necessary to contradict it. People know the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh sufficiently well not to be misled by Shri Limaye's so-called scathing attack. We do not like to indulge in controversies because the nature of a constructive worker is essentially different from a political demagogue. Still, since Shri Akbar was very keen that some records must be set right, I am writing this brief reply.

Shri Limaye says in his article that RSS work was started with the blessings of the princely States. Why then did it not start or flourish in those States? Why was it confined to Nagpur and its vicinity in those early years? Then, without any proof, he asserts that we were great admirers of Hitler. One earlier edition of Shri Limaye, the late Shri Govind Sahai of U. P., even disclosed in his book that our founder had been to Germany and our work started on Hitler's instructions. People know that the RSS was started in 1925, eight years before Hitler was even heard of in India.

Shri Limaye feels that his meetings in M.P. have been disturbed by RSS people. Our swayamsevaks neither bother about his foreign policy nor are they trained for such activities. We never have morchas nor slogan-shouting of "zindabad" or "murdabad", and our branches, which are a must, mostly hold their get-togethers in the evenings when Shri Limaye must have been holding his meetings. He thinks we have become admirers of China. Let him remember that one of the first to bring to the notice of the people the Chinese invasion was Shri Guruji, and let me also refresh his memory with the words used by the USSR in those days: "India is our friend but China is our brother". We would like every nationalist to look to our national interest and not try to become more loyal than the king himself.

Then he talks at great length about my affidavit about the RSS being a political Party. I have given a public statement that no such affidavit was given. First it was sought to be propagated that this affidavit was given to get exemption from income tax by the RSS, since political Parties are exempt from it. Now they have changed that stand and say that submissions have been made at the Nagpur court against the judgment of the Charity Commissioner ordering the RSS to register as a religious charitable trust. We are contesting the case on the basis of the famous Kesari Maratha Trust judgment of the Supreme Court. In order to clearly differentiate our work from religious and charitable, we have submitted that it is cultural social work with a patriotic purpose some of whose activities are akin to political. If, in clearly differentiating the human species biologically we say that it is akin to the ape, man does not become an ape. Tearing sentences out of context and presenting them to suit one's objectives may be cunning, but certainly has nothing to do with truth.

Then there is a reference to Shri Bala Saheb Deoras delivering an inflammatory speech at Jamshedpur, causing the riot. The Sarsanghchalak and myself visit almost two hundred and fifty places every year. Why do no riots take place elsewhere? He should also have tried to get an authentic version of the speech which is tape-recorded. I was present at the function and I am confident that Shri Limaye cannot point out one single sentence to substantiate his contention. Probably he himself delivers inflammatory speeches and naturally he thinks all others follow his methods.

Shri Limaye then goes on to make a fantastic assertion that 70 per cent of RSS workers had sent in apologies during the Emergency. How was it that in Maharashtra 8,000 RSS activists responded to the satyagraha call, and not so many hundreds came from Shri Limaye's camp? On insinuations from people like Shri Limaye a question was asked in the Maharashtra Assembly on October 18, 1977 as to how many people tendered apologies during the Emergency. The answer given by the then Home Minister Shri Sharad Pawar was—only two, one belonging to the Ananda Marg and the other to the Jamait-e-Islami. So far as U.P. and Bihar are concerned, where I was in direct charge, let him produce evidence of even one per cent apologies. Having not even a few hundred to offer satyagraha during Emergency, trying to denigrate others may be Limaye's logic, but does not do credit to a Gandhian which he swears he is.

Certainly Shri Limaye cannot be so naive as to try to understand the Sangh through Dr. Subramaniam Swamy. Dr. Swamy did some excellent work during the Emergency here and abroad but that does not make him an authority on the RSS and he need not be quoted.

The whole article is full of many such inaccuracies and untruths. Shri Limaye should fight out his political battles with his Janata Party opponents but need not drag in the RSS. Let us be permitted to do our work of nation-building quietly. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

With Dulux you'll run out of walls long before you run out of paint

Because just a little spreads a lot more

It's true.

And to prove it, Dulux's coverage was tested in the ACCI Paints Laboratory against that of three other brands.

Four boards of equal area were prepared in an absolutely identical manner to receive coats of the three other brands and Dulux.

What happened is interesting.

To cover the same area with equal opacity, the three other brands needed to be applied in far greater quantity—while only a minimal amount of Dulux did the job. Covering the surface of the board with a smooth, even finish.

Proof that Dulux covers more square metres with every litre—flawlessly. Proof that Dulux gives you greater economy right from the start.

ICI Dulux paints. Now and for years ahead

'DULUX'—made and marketed in India by The Alkali and Chemical Corporation of India Limited.

The ICI roundel and 'Dulux' are registered trade marks of Imperial Chemical Industries, Ltd., London.
Licenced users : The Alkali and Chemical Corporation of India Limited.

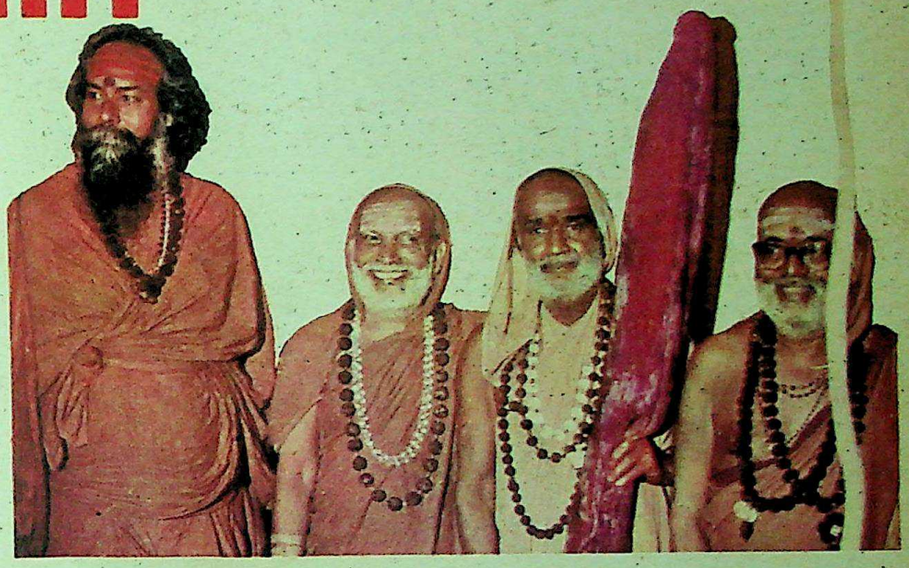
OBM—6318A/1

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Revive Hinduism!

SUBIR ROY went to Sringeri to report on the meeting of the four standard bearers of the Adi-Shankaracharya : the Swamijis of Sringeri, Dwarka, Puri and Badrikshetra. The four were meeting for the first time in history to take stock of their common heritage.



SRINGERI math, set amid the green hills of pretty Chikmagalur, hills that turn blue when the heavy clouds of the south-easterly monsoons brood over them, is just about the finest place where anyone could have built a temple to god. It speaks volumes about the perspicacy and wisdom of the Adi-Shankaracharya that he selected this spot to plant firmly the standard of Hindu dharma in the south, to match the mountain-top math he built in the north at Badrikshetra. He also set up two more maths, one on the western coast at Dwarka and the other in the east by the side of the Bay of Bengal in Puri, thus staking out what he considered was an indisputable claim for Hinduism in what to him was Akhanda Bharat.

Twelve centuries later, on May 1, the birthday of the Adi-Shankaracharya, the four present standard bearers, the Shankaracharyas of the four maths, met for the first time in Sringeri. The event had all the pageantry of a Hindu festive gathering of its kind. At precisely 10 a.m. on the day the three guests of the Sringeri swami arrived at the portals of the math to be received by him and accompanied in procession to the temple. The milling crowd of bhaktas surged around as cries of Shankaracharya ki jai rent the air. The police struggled to keep a cordon around them as the bhaktas, a mixture of women in colourful South Indian silks and men with half bare torsos and wrap-around dhotis and bibhuti marks on the foreheads, jostled and pushed.

What immediately stood out through the crush was the sublime calm on the faces of the swamis. All of them were in flowing saffron and each carried the standard of his math, straight at the shoulder, with which he is never parted when venturing out. As the parade of the sages, the procession of the godly moved forward towards the main temple a group of musicians, with a quaint mixture of western saxaphones and South Indian drums, took up the strains of invocational, repetitive Karnataki music. Soon it was the half light of the temple interior that enveloped everybody. The crush was greater, the half light punctuated by the photographers' flashes and the TV camera's staccato blinding glares. Once within the inner sanctum, the swamis offered brief pujas to the ruling deity, Sarada. In a few minutes the arati flame was brought out and again it was a mass of surging hands trying to partake a little of the warmth and be blessed. The swamis then went round the inner sanctum in a ritual pradakshin and proceeded to the adjoining inner courtyard where in the centre was another temple. There in a room by its side, the four Shankaracharyas went into a secret conclave, assisted only by their closest junior swamis or incongruous modernisms in the persons of "private secretaries."

The frenzy dies down. People squat in the corridors and courtyards, the musicians recover their breath, the photographers mop their brows and the myriad sanyasis and junior swamis wait anxiously before the closed door for a call from inside to re-enter. For an hour the swamis sort out their problems. Suddenly, stirrings. A procession of bearahs carrying offerings of garlands, flowers and fruits troops in with a tall handsome man at its head, a little nervous. The State Governor sends his pranams through his secretary. He will be there shortly. The door is opened, photographers rush in, the swamis are disturbed, a little annoyed, but deem not to notice. Everyone waits. The Puri Shankaracharya keeps talking. (So it was his voice that was heard the most from the outside!) In a few moments the Dwarka swami gathers his angabastra with an air of finality, says something about a committee and that the time for his medicines has come. The photographers become active, questioning eyes turn to the private secretaries, the Shankaracharyas are requested to stand in a line please. The Joshimath swami towers over the Puri swami, the goodly Dwarka swami has a glazed look, the Sringeri swami is calm and perceptive.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Photographs over, they come out in procession again, the bhaktas send up their cries, more pujas at the temple in the courtyard. the swamis come out and stand at the edge of the raised temple verandah. It is like a small-town election rally where the candidate and his assistants take the cheers of the crowd. Brief speeches are made by the Dwarka and Sringeri swamis who both speak in Kannada: "We have come from the corners of this country to bless you." The flame comes out on the thali once again, the hundred hands lunge out again, the musicians resume their drones, the procession returns to the portals. The sun has ascended the zenith. The bhaktas disperse, tired but with an overbright gleam in their eyes. Something which has been in preparation for 12 years has come to pass. At last the four have met.

THE life of Shankaracharya, who was born twelve centuries ago, is a bundle of unverifiable legends. But his work is not. First the legend. Shankaracharya was born in a place called Kalti in Kerala. From childhood he was possessed with an urge to seek enlightenment and this made him leave his home, take up sanyas as a disciple of Bhagwan Gobindacharya. At the instructions of his guru, he wrote tracts like the Brahmasutra to enhance the knowledge of the people in Vedic matters. He then went on two journeys around India, visiting all the holy places and trying to rediscover their significance. He set up four maths in four corners of the country for the propagation of the Vedic religion. Historians are, however, undecided as to whether all the maths were set up in his lifetime. In a brief lifetime, he is credited with having turned the whole tide of Bhudhism and set resurgent Hinduism firmly on its tracks.

But by tremendous contrast with the unclear details of his life, Shankaracharya's writings have great clarity and there ought not to be any confusion about the message.

The revivalistic nature of the Adi-Shankaracharya's message and mission lives well in his late twentieth century apostles. Nobody should have gone to Sringeri looking for broad-minded reformism. On the afternoon of May 1, the four Shankaracharyas held a marathon public meeting which lasted over five hours, during which the lights went out twice and storm clouds menacingly rumbled once. Right through the meeting the mood was militant. The fundamentalist character of the creed was asserted in the most emphatic terms by the Sringeri swami who said that the Adi-Shankaracharya had no special personal credo to offer, there was no Shankar mantra as such, Shankaracharya merely revived the Vedic mantra.

While the morning's ceremonies were typical of such a religious gathering and full of impressive ritual, the evening's gathering was a concession to modern times. A resolution was passed, a committee was appointed, a joint communique was issued and many speeches were made. In style they were more akin to political speeches rather than religious discourses. But even there ritual added colour and mystery. Before every Jagatguru spoke, a disciple of his would stand up and intonate a long ode to the glory and many virtues of his illustrious master. If God's humble servant is also God's proud warrior, and king by his authority of the spiritual realm, then the latter characteristics were the more prominent.

The Shankaracharyas spoke at length on many matters frankly political but weren't veteran politicians enough to be circumspect on matters delicate. Perhaps they will live to regret a little their outspokenness, though never to doubt their convictions. Between them the swamis were a fascinating study in contrast, set forth against a common mould. All tended to command instant respect with their grave, sublimely peaceful manner and a kind of natural authority that lifetime's sadhana gives. But beyond that they were delightfully human and different. Sir Abhinava Tirtha of Dwarka is a goodly old man with a baby face who tends to meander a little. Sri Niranjanadeva Tirtha of Puri is an iracible old 'John the Baptist' who would rather walk up to the gallows than deny his faith, and said as much. Sri Swarupananda Saraswati of Joshimath is easily the most impressive, a towering bearded hermit who speaks the most simple, precise and terse prose. Sri Abhinava Vidyatirtha Mahaswami of Sringeri appears to possess the keenest intellect which reflects clearly in his discerning eyes and a quiet assured manner.

That many current political developments in the country were seriously agitating the Swamis became apparent right from the word go. A printed one-page joint communique that was issued spelt it out thus: 'From time immemorial it is the desirable thing to follow one's own religion. Therefore if someone tries to influence or change the religion of a person with the help of inducement, fear, force or harassment then that is a great wrong. May we always be engaged in the pursuit of our own religions'. The same fears and apprehensions that had been working on Mr O. P. Tyagi and caused him to introduce his Freedom of Religion Bill, were apparently visited on the Swamis. The Joshimath swami wanted phoney conversions among Adivasis stopped. The Dwarka swami spoke of his concern in a related field. He had just returned from a tour of North-East India where the balance in the population was being upset by a largescale influx of Muslims from Bangladesh.

But the one great issue that exercised all the swamis the most, other than the all-pervasive decline of religion (by which they of course meant Hinduism) was cow protection. The resolution that was passed made several references to it. They were happy that steps were being taken by the Union Government to ban cow slaughter and urged political Parties not to make it an issue of partisan politics but take it up as a national policy. They urged people to use cow energy, wanted the Government to prevent the sale of cows for slaughter and felt that only the hide of the dead cow should be utilised for leather. The Sringeri swami observed in his speech that the cow had done us so much good that he could not allow anyone to harm it. This drew the audience's applause.

The resolution made a reference to the solemnisation of marriage, which it felt should be done in the Hindu dharmik manner. The ceremonies should also be simple and not extravagant. The Puri swami added poignancy by narrating how thousands were spent on decorations and feasting but the poor brahmin priest was sent off with a five-rupee note.

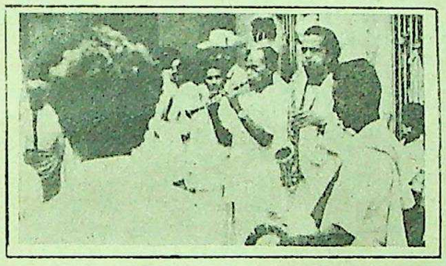
Always hovering in the background was the question of the caste system. The resolution strongly asserted that the backward classes were on abhinya ang of our society. The Puri swami later clarified that the term "abhinya ang" was vital and he had insisted on its use in place of the word "ghatak". He even joined issue with the Karnataka Governor, Mr Govind Narayan's narration of an incident in the Adi-Shankaracharya's life in which he had met enlightenment in an "untouchable". Sri Niranjanadeva disputed this translation and favoured the word agraj, or, he who comes before— an elder brother—to describe the caste Hindu. Speakers repeatedly expressed themselves in favour of the Varnasram dharma or the caste system but asserted that untouchability was not a part of it. As Sri Niranjandevji would like to have it seen, it was really a matter of relationship between elder and younger brothers. The Joshimath swami felt that Varnashram didn't mean disrespect to anybody.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Right through the meeting certain views, familiar among one section of political opinion in the country, were repeated. Mr Gopal Shastri, an important office bearer of the committee formed to commemorate the Adi-Shankaracharya in various ways bemoaned the fact that Hindu society was not going forward. There were laws in the country only for the majority community. The Dwarka swamiji lamented that there was no Hindu rashtra in the world except in little Nepal. The Joshimath swami found it galling that while the nation recognised the Buddha Jayanti and Mahavir Jayanti it didn't take notice of Shankara Jayanti. The Puri swami didn't mind the minority community getting special treatment but there should not be discrimination against the majority community as through the Hindu Married Women's Endowment Act. He even raised the slogan, which was lustily taken up by the audience: "Dharm ka jai ho, Adharm ka nash ho..."

The smooth flow of similar viewpoints parading before the audience was interrupted only once when the Karnataka Minister of State for Information, Mr K. H. Srinivas, an invitee, embarked on what he thought was a free exchange of views. It almost became a free for all. Mr Srinivas said that the point to consider about the Freedom of Religion Bill was why people who had been with us for so many years had left us. Was it because we were unable to look after a large chunk of our society? Also, we had not really abolished in practice casteism and untouchability. At this point the Sringeri swami stopped him short. "Don't create a controversy here. I can answer your criticisms." From the audience there were shouts: "Don't make a political speech here. It is the Government that is sustaining the caste system." The Minister's speech quickly ended thereafter and the faithful went back to listening to what they were used to.



BUT by far the strangest aspect of the whole gathering was that while much was said in loud condemnation of the enemy without, there was the persisting nagging presence of the enemy within. Why had the Sankaracharyas met? To spread the good word, to bless the faithful, put the fear of God in the heart of the wayward? Certainly. But there was also this little matter of territorial claims, a problem of poaching, of pretenders and false prophets, a need to tell the faithful on whom the mantle of the Lord really rested. An inconvenient little problem of having to assert: We four and no more.

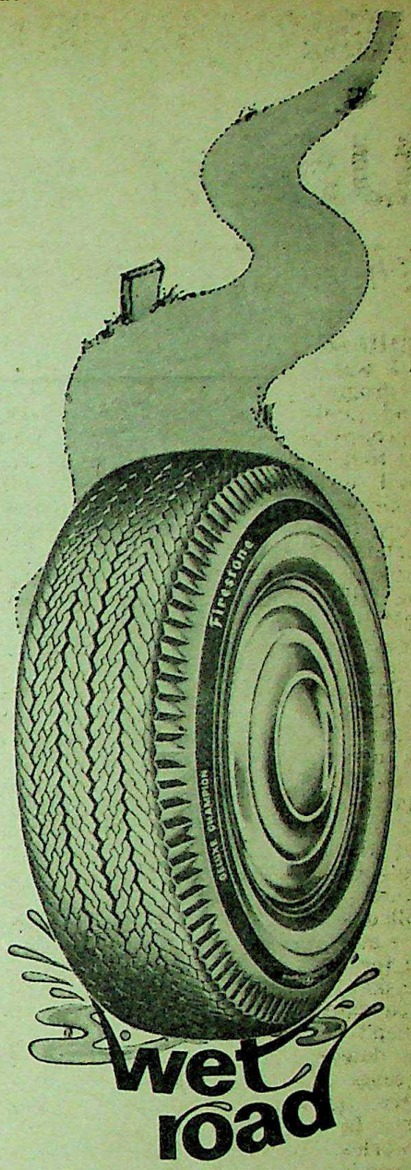
The biggest unseen presence at the whole gathering, in fact the man who perhaps made it all possible, was the Shankaracharya of Kanchi, Acharya Chandrashekharendra Bharati. His math is also known as Sureshwarapith and it is claimed that the first disciple of the Adi-Shankaracharya resided there after he died at that spot. Now the following paragraph comes fairly early in the joint-communique:

It is known that in order to spread the religion and learning that he had acquired through his own efforts, Shankaracharya established four maths in the fours corners of India... At the end of all his work he put an end to his physical form and work by leaving his human body in the cold and snowy Kedarkshetra. However, many people in order to enhance their own prestige have spread it about that Shankaracharya belongs to their province. In India there are many legends circulated about him in person. Naturally there are no proofs in these matters. This fact should be known by all. They should know that the swamis of the four maths believe firmly that Shankaracharya died in Kedarkshetra.

This 'fact' was repeated several times by several speakers in various oblique ways. One reason why the problem may have gained immediacy is that the present swami of Kanchipuram is a rather exceptional person who has developed a large following (reportedly among many top Delhi bureaucrats) and has been organising extensive philanthropic work. A more unseemly incident that came up for repeated mention was the throwing into a river of an image of the Adi-Shankaracharya that the Dwarka Swami had put up at Badrikshetra, presumably because some people resented the mention of the name of the Dwarka math at the base of the statue. Consequently the resolution stipulated that the memorial that would be set up to Adi-Shankaracharya at Badrikshetra should not bear the name of any math.

This has in fact been the state of organised Hindu religion in the country since independence. Any large denomination or sect is riven by internecine fighting among its followers. The end of the last century and early part of this century saw several reformist movements trying to rescue the essentials of the Hindu religion from the dead weight of sterile and repressive dogma. But that period is certainly over. The Sringeri swami, although Kannadiga bred and Kannadiga born, told reporters the next morning that there was a need for an Indian link language. The English had come across the seven seas and brainwashed us into losing our cultural identity. Maybe it was the continued use of English and our store of knowledge gleaned from English books that were causing the faithful to fight among themselves. Maybe. ■

Photographs by Subir Roy



Another good reason to use Firestone tyres

Skidding can happen anytime. But when you're on Firestone tyres you have a chance to avoid it. Firestone tyres are designed and engineered to drain water, eject slush to provide a sure grip and ensure directional stability and handling.

Firestone

78 YEARS OF INTERNATIONAL EXPERIENCE

RADEUS/FS/CT-4/78

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

USSR sabotaged Bhaskara

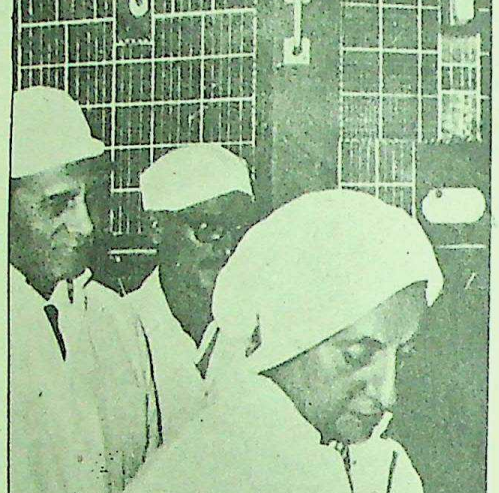
There's no other explanation for the failure

BHASKARA, the space satellite, was launched from a Soviet cosnodrome on June 6, amidst fanfare and jubilation. The excitement was unconcealed, New Delhi was pleased. At that time it looked as if India was well on her way to achieving self-sufficiency in her space programme Now, the Bhaskara project is almost certainly a 100 per cent failure. It is evident that the information about the failure of its TV cameras, X-ray detectors and other scientific instruments were passed on to the Press in a rather low key.

The major scientific programmes of Bhaskara project consisted of (i) mineral location experiments proposed to have been carried out on the Bihar mica belt, Chitradurga belt and the Deccan trap near Pune (ii) soil survey near and around Hyderabad, Hissar and Indore and (iii) evolving geo-climatic parameters for future planning. About 600 highly skilled and competent Indian scientists and engineers had been working for the last four years to build Bhaskara.

To date, the TV cameras set up haven't been turned on even once. The detectors designed to register the torrents of cosmic rays coming from outer space ended up in the same way. In effect, Bhaskara is numb, powerless—it does not seem to respond to any signal from the ground stations.

Is this another spectacular failure, like so many other failures in our scientific programme or is there something more sinister at work? From the evidence already available it looks as though Bhaskara programme was sabotaged by the Russians, right from the beginning. On the day of launching, the satellite was finally handed over to the Russians, who, as the report goes, insisted that beyond a certain point the security rules would not permit any Indian scientist to go. So, on that fateful day, Bhaskara was with the Russians and Russians alone, just before it was stationed on top of the Russian rocket—long enough for the Russians to pull out all the relevant connections to the power-pack.



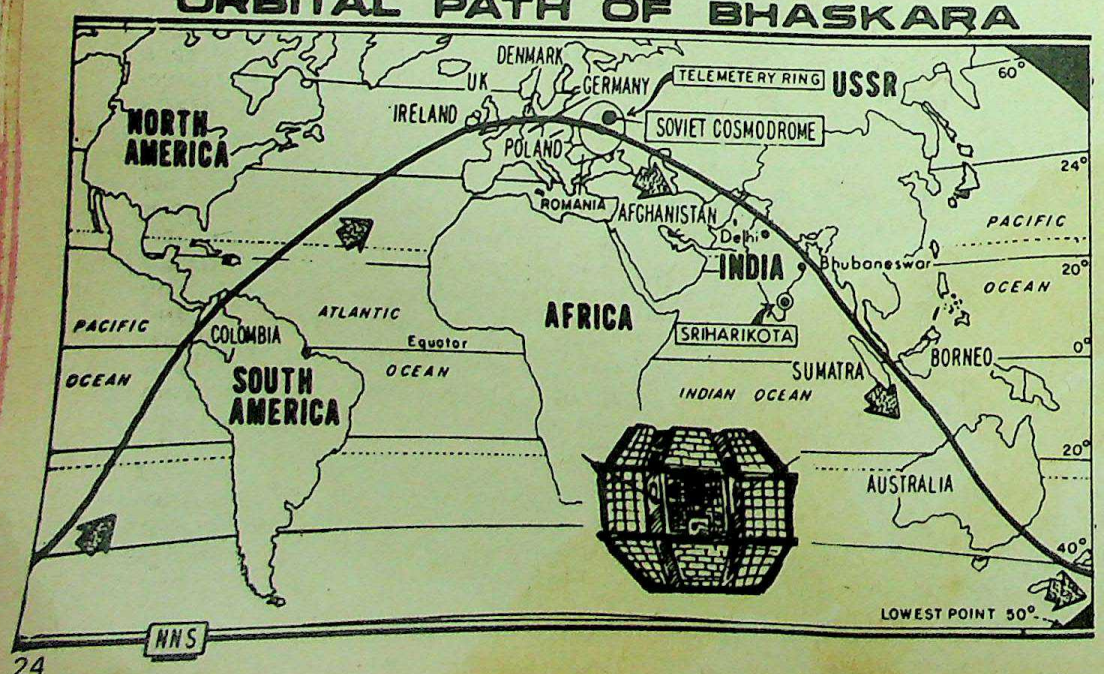
Ex-Prime Minister Indira Gandhi at the Indian Satellite Project

No country in the world likes the idea of being watched by any foreign agent, especially if the agent happens to be a satellite taking pictures from outer space. As Bhaskara spins around the globe, there is no reason, at least theoretically, why a few pictures of Russian missile bases could not be flashed back to Bangalore or Ahmedabad; indeed, there is no reason why a few shots of PINSTECH in Pakistan could not be flashed back either. In simple strategic terms it is not in the Russian interest to have another satellite remote-sensing Russian soil. The response of Bhaskara to any signal being entirely negative leaves us with the only conclusion that the act of sabotage was neatly performed in the high security enclosure of the cosmodrome.

Why? The Russians, after all, helped to launch Bhaskara; so why should they destroy the power-pack? Why should they sabotage a space programme as prestigious as this? Ironically, the Russians have gained all the advantages, political and strategic, and India has lost out. If Bhaskara had been working that would have neither enhanced nor reduced Russian credibility. Soviet participation started and ended with the launching of the satellite. A 100 per cent functioning remote-sensing Bhaskara spinning round the globe would have been a slip in the equations of Russian strategy.

If Bhaskara had been sabotaged by the Russians, Indians have to swallow a grim message. In sensitive scientific activities, be it a space programme or atomic energy for that matter, it is not credible for our scientists to be competent only upto a point. No part of the programme can be left to the mercy of any foreign nation. Tarapur is the most famous example. India's scientific programme in sensitive areas has to be self-sufficient to the last detail. The decision to go all out for total self-sufficiency is, however, a political one and not entirely scientific; the decision for the financial resources, adequate for building up a self-sufficient space programme or atomic energy programme has to come out of the complex decision-making inner circle of the political hierarchy. It would be an illusion to think that any nation could usher in the progress of India in these sensitive areas. Charity is an unknown quantity in the murky equations of international politics.

A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Ditchers from Deutschland

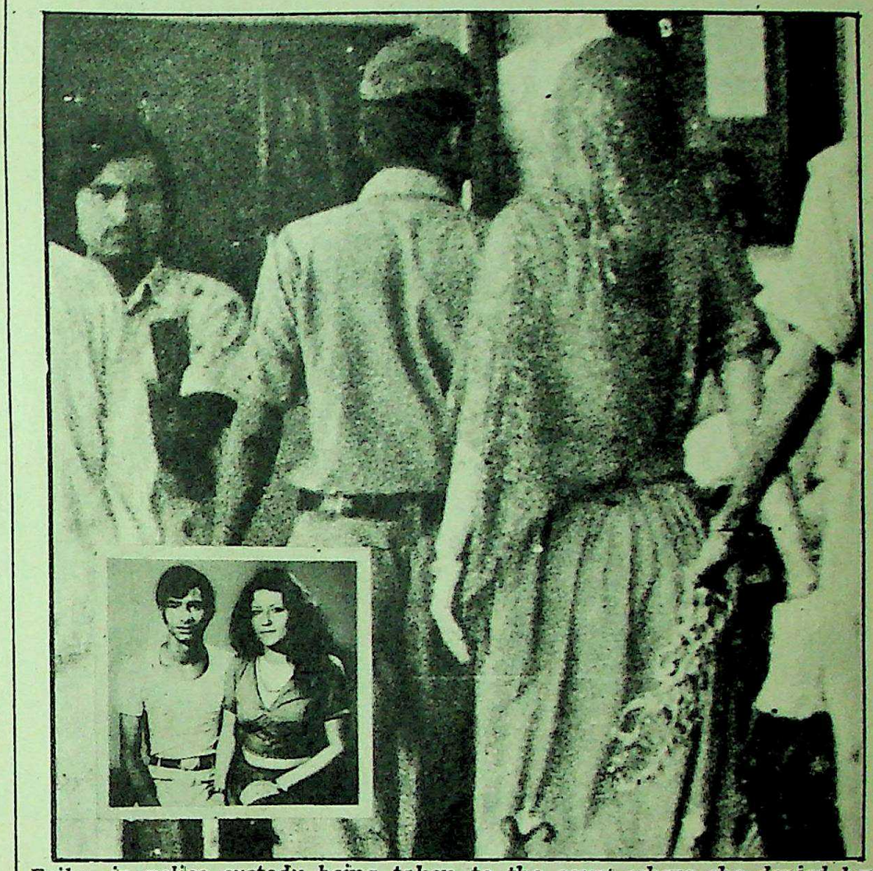
Rickshaw-pullers are being taken for a ride

PRETTY, young German girls have invaded Jaipur. Like the love stories of the harems of yore, their affairs are the talk of the town. They came into the limelight for the first time when one of them married a rickshaw-puller. Almost simultaneously another German girl too married an ordinary citizen of Jaipur. The third one is in a Jaipur jail along with the wife of the rickshaw-puller. As many as seven of these girls were reportedly in Jaipur during the same period.

Tall and shapely 22-year-old Erika, who wears a ghagra and choli and chain-smokes bidis, was the first West German girl to hit the headlines by marrying rickshaw-puller, Gopal Singh Chauhan. But she is now in jail. Her husband, who initially was overwhelmed with joy for getting a gauri mem (white-skinned lady) as his spouse, is now a broken man. Erika is under judicial custody for trying to forge her passport. Gopal Singh is making a desperate bid to get her out of the four walls of the Jaipur Central Jail. After marrying the German girl, Gopal Singh sold his rickshaw—his only source of livelihood—to get money for celebrating his honeymoon in a befitting manner. The girl had assured him that her parents were rich and they would send enough money to her. "After this there will be no dearth of money with us and we will leave for Germany."

As luck would have it, Gopal Singh's dream of settling in West Germany as the son-in-law of a well-off family appears to have been shattered with Erika being sent to jail. Back in the realm of hard realities, he has again started pulling a rickshaw which he has now hired at Rs 4 a day. Though Gopal Singh has succeeded in getting a court order for his wife's release on bail, the task of producing a surety of Rs 10,000 and a matching personal bond is not an easy one. But the rudest shock to him has come from Erika herself: She has now told the court that Gopal is not her husband, he is out to blackmail her, and any act of his to get her released on bail should not be taken cognizance of. This change of heart seems to have come about after officials of the West German Embassy visited Erika in jail.

What did Erika find in Gopal ? He is not her equal either economically or intellectually. Neither is he very obviously handsome. She spent most of her time with Gopal Singh for about 15 days before they got married in the Arya Samaj. In the words of her jail-mate, Miss Brigtte Preis, "Erika likes poor and simple people." But after the arrest Erika appears to have changed her views about India and Indians. She told one interviewer, "I am not an Indian nor do I want to live in India. I like to be called a German and want to go back to my country. In any case I cannot leave my parents." The couple was also sore over the publicity that their marriage had attracted in the Indian Press.



Erika, in police custody, being taken to the court where she denied having married the rickshaw puller. (Inset) Edith Erika and Gopal Singh Interestingly, only a few days back she got herself converted to Hinduism to marry Gopal Singh. The Arya Samaj, where the marriage was performed, gave her a Hindu name—Sita Devi. But for the generous help from an office bearer of the Arya Samaj the Erika-Gopal Singh marriage would not have taken place since neither of them had the Rs 110 needed for the various rituals. The Arya Samaj official contributed the money to help perform this punya karya (noble work) of making a foreigner a Hindu.

What connections Erika has got with Brigtte Preis, her German jail-mate, who too is involved in a similar case of passport forgery is still to be found out. Brigtte Preis is reported to have come to India with a boyfriend. When they reached Varanasi, the boyfriend came into contact with a sadhu and under his influence got his head cleanshaven. Too much of intoxication had an adverse effect on his mind and hence Brigtte managed to send him back from India. Slim and charming Brigtte (26) is five months pregnant. She was remanded to judicial custody on June 29 this year. Eleven days later she was joined by Edith Erika under orders of the chief judicial magistrate. Erika, however, used to visit Brigtte Preis before she was lodged there on July 9. Both the girls have identical habits and are chain-smokers. But unlike Erika, Brigtte was not penniless when she was taken into custody.

Jail records show that at least Brigtte Preis is not quite unknown in Jaipur. After being in jail a German couple visited her. Two foreign students studying in Rajasthan University also visit her regularly and bring cigarettes and other presents. One of these students is said to be a Kenyan and the other one is from Uganda. One line of speculation, particularly after the new turn the Gopal-Erika matter has taken, is that there is more than love and the waywardness of western youth in this mini-invasion of Jaipur by rootless German girls.

MILAP CHAND DANDIA, Jaipur

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A vôtre service!*

* With tender coconut water in champagne glasses.

Or rather at your service. Totally. With everything offered to you on a platter. From Keltron Controls who now introduce a new range of services along with the 9020 system. Incorporating the latest 4th generation technology from Controle Bailey of France.

These services from the Keltron Controls team of engineers and technicians include:

- Discussing your requirements
- Designing tailor-made systems
- Delivering, erecting and commissioning on a turn-key basis
- Training maintenance personnel
- Providing spare parts and after-sales service

What's so marvellous about this most evolutionary system available in the control realm is that it offers such flexibility and is so easy to operate. The information presented at the control post is so clear that the operator knows that everything is functioning correctly at a single glance. Your operators will be relaxed and happy in front of their control posts.

So will you—when such superb service is laid on.

Keltron Controls—yet another affirmation of the forward-looking dynamism of Keltron. Combining thought with action.

KELTRON CONTROLS

—a generation ahead

KELTRON

know-how to serve the people.

Bombay ● Delhi ● Calcutta ● Madras ● Bangalore ● Trivandrum

FDS KEL 2128A

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

No skeleton in their cupboard

A school's reputation is being ruined

THE skeleton of a student of class IV was found in a school in Ranchi when it reopened after the summer vacation, according to the secretary of the Bihar Pradesh Congress(I), Mr Harinarayan Singh, said a news agency report sometime in the middle of July. It added that the student had complained of stomach ache to his class teacher on the last day of school before the summer vacation. The teacher had asked him to lie down on one of the empty last benches. At the end of school everyone seemed to have forgotten about the student and apparently he had been locked in for the whole of the vacation. When the school reopened after the holidays the skeleton of the student was said to have been found in the classroom. This news was guaranteed to cause widespread gossip. Such "news" is bound to spread fast, particularly in a place like Ranchi, which is not too large as cities go. Detailed investigations revealed that the story had no basis whatsoever, it being an unlikely one in the first place The Deputy Commissioner, Mr. B. P. Sinha, also felt that there was no basis to the rumour. He had not received any orders from the Home Department in the State capital, Patna, to look into the case.

Finding the school was a problem in itself since no one seemed to have a clear idea of the name of the school. After being misled a number of times I managed to reach the Shri Chandmal Jain Bal Mandir. The principal of the school, Mrs Leena Verma, acknowledged that the news I had heard indeed referred to her school. "I don't know who is spreading such stories about this school," she said. She offered to show us the attendance registers of all the classes in the school—Kindergarten to Class V. There are 435 students in the school—both boys and girls—and no name had "A" written beside it signifying "Absent", after June 18, 1979. The school's summer vacation had started on May 23 and continued up to June 17.

I asked her about the manner in which the students were sent home every day after school, to find out if any child left behind or locked up in a classroom could be accounted for. She explained that the school closed at 3.30 pm and the teachers stayed behind till every child had left—sometimes as late as 5.30. The cleaning staff of the school made up of five maids start their work around 4.30 pm. They go through each classroom meticulously since many children leave their books and sometimes their satchels behind. The principal also said that there was no reason why the child could not have been discovered during the holidays because the school classrooms were cleaned even during the holidays while the school office remained open for two hours every day. The school authorities did not receive visits or complaints from parents or guardians with regard to this case either during or after the holidays. In fact, Mrs Verma wanted to meet the person who had mentioned the news to the Congress(I) secretary. This rumour, she said, would destroy the reputation which the school had built up over a period of 25 years.

Tirthankar Ghosh

The Chand Mal Jain Balmandir

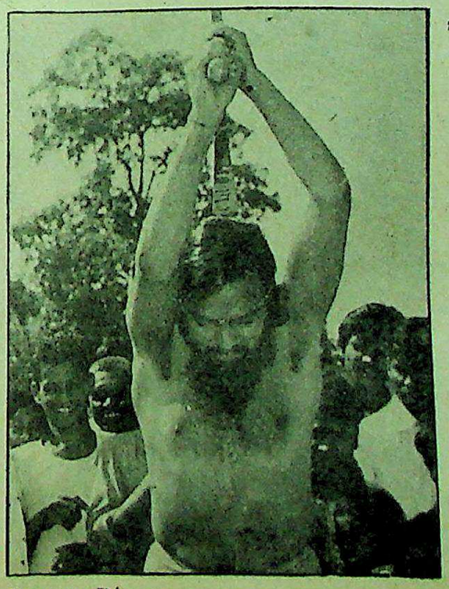
It was obvious that whoever had circulated the news had plans to finish the school. The principal said that hers was the oldest junior school in Ranchi. Just beside the school there is a factory, the Bihar Engineering Works, which is built on land owned by the school. Many years ago, the school authorities gave the land to the factory owner for his use: it was not sold or donated. A few months ago, when the factory owner started claiming that the land was his, the school started a case. Ultimately, the factory owner, Mr Nemichandji, lost the suit. The secretary of the school committee, Mr Basudev Kataruka, was of the opinion that the school's reputation was being tarnished by persons who had ulterior motives. In fact, the school is sandwiched between the factory and a Congress(I) office. If a rumour was to travel from the factory to the Congress(I) office, it would have to traverse only a block. Mr Harinarayan Singh, the Bihar Pradesh Congress(I) secretary owes everyone an explanation.

TIRTHANKAR GHOSH, Ranchi

Uncivil Ministers and civil servants

Ministers 'shoe' the way



Pawan Diwan

GAZETTED officers of Madhya Pradesh under the Janata Govment are faced with a new kind of hazard over which they are concerned and agitated. The members of the State Cabinet in a sudden fit of temper, when they lose all sense of reason and propriety, assault and publicly humiliate officials. The latest victim of such Ministerial wrath is Mr H. P. Siroliya, Block Development Officer of Geedum in the tribal district of Bastar. He was dragged by his hair in public by the Tribal Welfare Minister, Mr Baliram Kashyap. The Minister had even taken off one of his shoes to beat Mr Siroliya. This incident has created a wave of anger and frustration in the civil service circles of the State.

The story goes something like this. On June 13, the Minister for Tribal Welfare arrived at Geedum and was furious when he saw a well constructed near the bus stand. He had all along opposed its construction. He rushed immediately to the BDO's office, called the officer out, held him by the hair and asked: "Under whose

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

FDS KEL 2128A

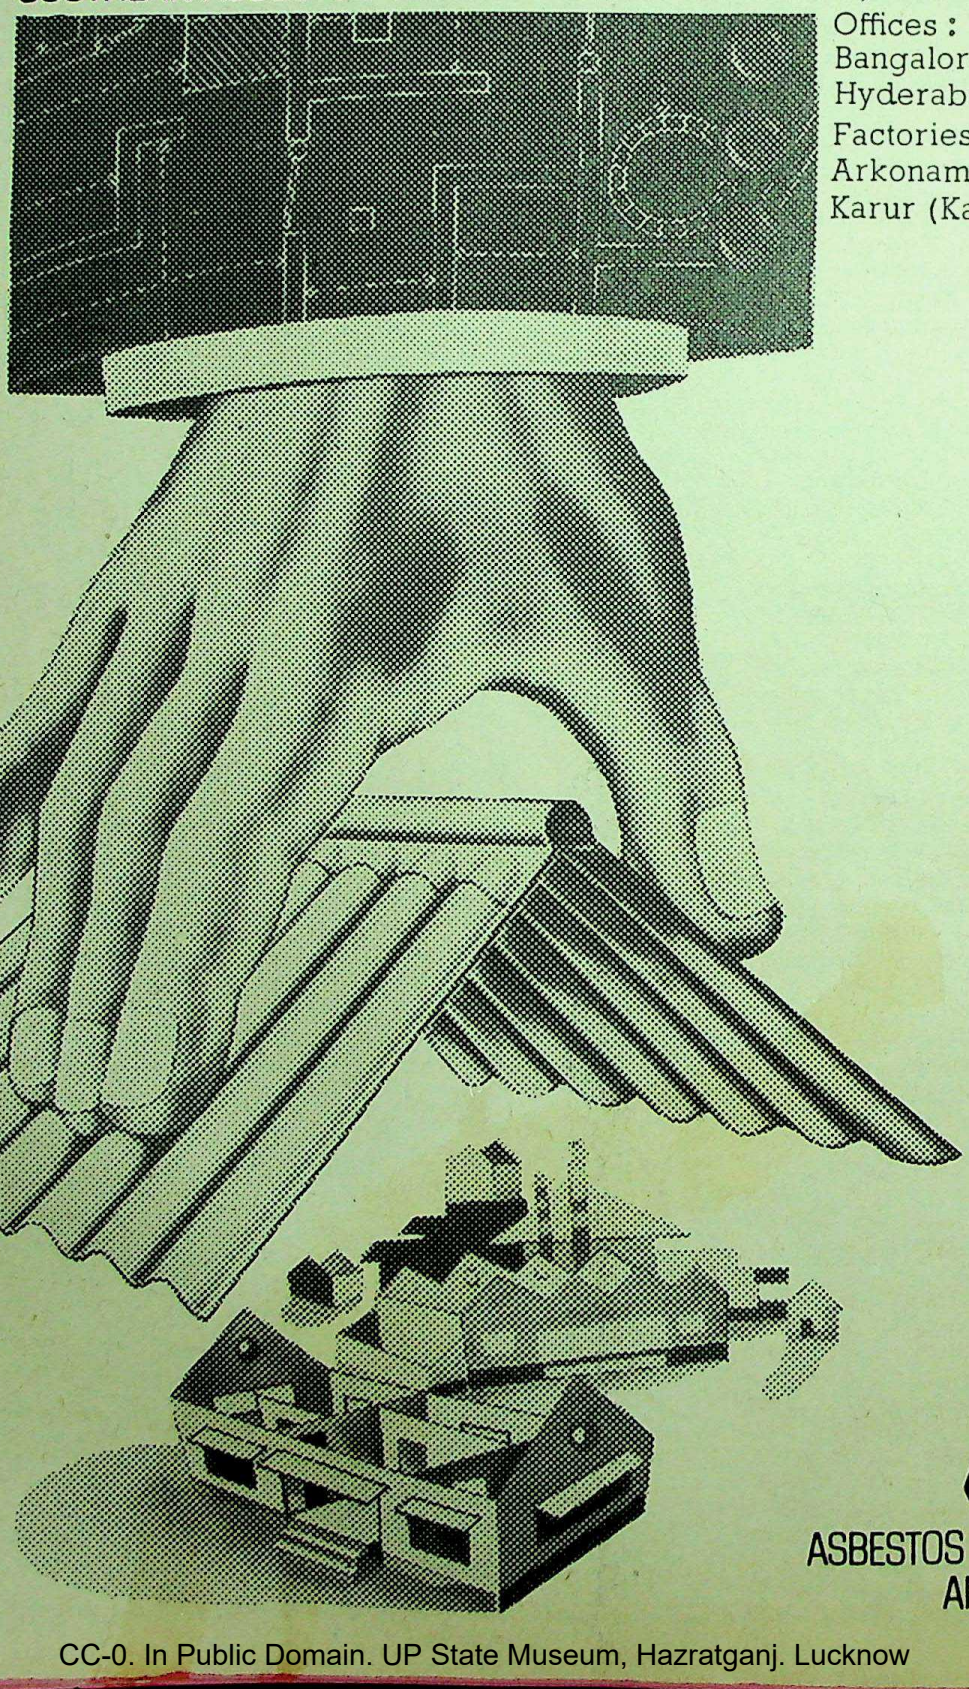
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

RAMCO'S RULE:

A ROOF IS JUST A ROOF, EXCEPT...

...when it is a Ramco roof. All asbestos cement roofs look alike. But Ramco asbestos cement sheets are the choice of leading architects and builders. And that sets them apart. Because these people are very demanding... About strength and durability. Fire and corrosion resistance. Weather proofing... In short, they look for permanent protection with minimum maintenance. Ramco gives them all that. Stringent quality control and modern plants ensure that Ramco performs best. A roof is a roof...But leading architects and builders know the exception–Ramco!

SOUTHERN ASBESTOS CEMENT LTD., 739 Anna Salai, Madras 600 002



Offices:
Bangalore • Vijayawada
Hyderabad • Cochin • Pune
Factories:
Arkonam (Tamilnadu),
Karur (Karnataka)

ACIL SAC 12 A 79

Ramco
ASBESTOS CEMENT SHEETS
AND ACCESSORIES

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

instructions has the well been constructed?" While the BDO, Mr Siroliya, was explaining that the construction had gone according to a resolution adopted by the Geedum Janpad Panchayat and that he was dutybound to implement the decision, the Minister dragged the officer to his jeep and took him to the bus stand where he showered the choicest abuses on him. He then took out one of his shoes to hit the BDO. Meanwhile the Janpad Panchayat Chairman, Mr Jaya Kishore Sharma, along with about 100 persons reached the spot. They protested against the Minister's behaviour. Infuriated at this intervention the Minister treated the Janpad Chairman in almost the same manner. He roared: "I am a Minister and can act in any way I like. Nobody can intervene". But judging the mood of the crowd, which then wanted to teach the Janata Minister a lesson, he left the place in a hurry.

The Minister motored directly to Jagdalpur, the district headquarters of Bastar where he was to address a Press conference. He stayed with the Pressmen for a few minutes and abruptly left the place for some unknown destination. Neither had he spoken about the Geedum episode nor had the Pressmen been aware of it.

The Janpad Chairman and the BDO, meanwhile, lodged a complaint with Geedum police station the same day i.e. June 13. The Minister then chose to contradict Press reports about the incident on June 17. Mr Baliram Kashyap in his denial said that the BDO and the Janpad Chairman, who incidentally, is a Congress-(I) leader, were involved in a scandal of Rs 52,000 by showing an old well as a new one. To hide this fact they had circulated false reports in the Press.

Before Mr Kashyap reached Bhopal, the Press carried reports of the incident which were flashed all over the State including the State capital. On enquiry, the Chief Minister was informed by the district authorities of Bastar that the incident was true and any denial at the official level would create complications. The district authorities were then asked to get a written statement from the BDO that he did not want any further action on his complaint to the police. The Minister was advised to issue a contradiction on his own at the political level. The Directorate of Information and Publicity were directed by the Government bosses not to issue denials of the incident.

Mr Kashyap is not a loner in his actions. Ramanand Singh, Minister for Local Government (Urban) had shown his temper to the IAS Administrator of Indore Municipal Corporation—since the officer had told him that it was not his duty to see if the bathrooms of the Circuit House, where the Minister was supposed to stay had no soap and towel. Despite Mr Ramanand Singh's best efforts, the officer could not be suspended, though he was summarily transferred.

The sanyasi Minister of Jails Mr Pawan Diwan, is no sanyasi. He has become a terror among the officials. He once directed the students at Mahasamund to give his personal assistant a shoe-beating because the students had complained that the PA had not submitted their demands to him. However the students proved to be more sober; they did not act on the Minister's advice. The sanyasi Minister once got a trader of Mahasamund beaten by people when they complained to him that the trader had charged higher prices. He once suspended an officer because the officer was not present when the Minister went on an inspection.

Filthy abuse is the stock-in-trade of Thakur Darbar Singh Minister of State for Food and Civil Supplies. And he is not miserly about using them on all occasions. He is also known for his loud voice. Sometime back when the returning officer appointed for the Rajnandgaon civic poll, rejected an application of a Janata candidate for a recount on the grounds that it did not have any valid reasons, Mr Darbar Singh Thakur personally joined the people in a protest demonstration against the officer. Taking his cue from the Minister's behaviour a Janata VIP along with his colleagues entered the office of a Chief Municipal Officer of a Municipal council in Raipur district and beat him up, with an announcement: "This is the beginning of a big show."

There is another instance where he created a scene. On June 23, he was to travel from Bhopal on the Chhattisgarh Express on which he had his reservation. The conductor of the railway coach could not give him correct information about his reservation. As a result he was delayed and missed the train. Some of his luggage which had been put on the train was carried away and had to be brought back from Itarsi. Mr Thakur Darbar Singh stormed into the room of the Assistant Station Master demanding an explanation for the act of the conductor. This was followed by filthy invective from the Minister on railway employees in general and the station staff of Bhopal in particular.

M. V. KHER, Raipur

WHAT A BLUMER !

UPI

It was a sight indeed! Miss Kristi Blumer of Pennsylvania is all surprises on being congratulated by Miss Jackie Houston from California after she was named Miss Nude World in Cambridge, Ontario, recently. In her unconcealed joy she covers her face and, of course, nothing else.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

It takes two to blend.
Two of a mind.

Like 'Terene' and Wool.
Now fashionably together in the perfect blend.
55/45.

In a variety of checks,
stripes, herringbones,
or striking plains.
Outspoken or subtly subdued.

Enough variety, in fact,
to put you in two minds
except on one point.

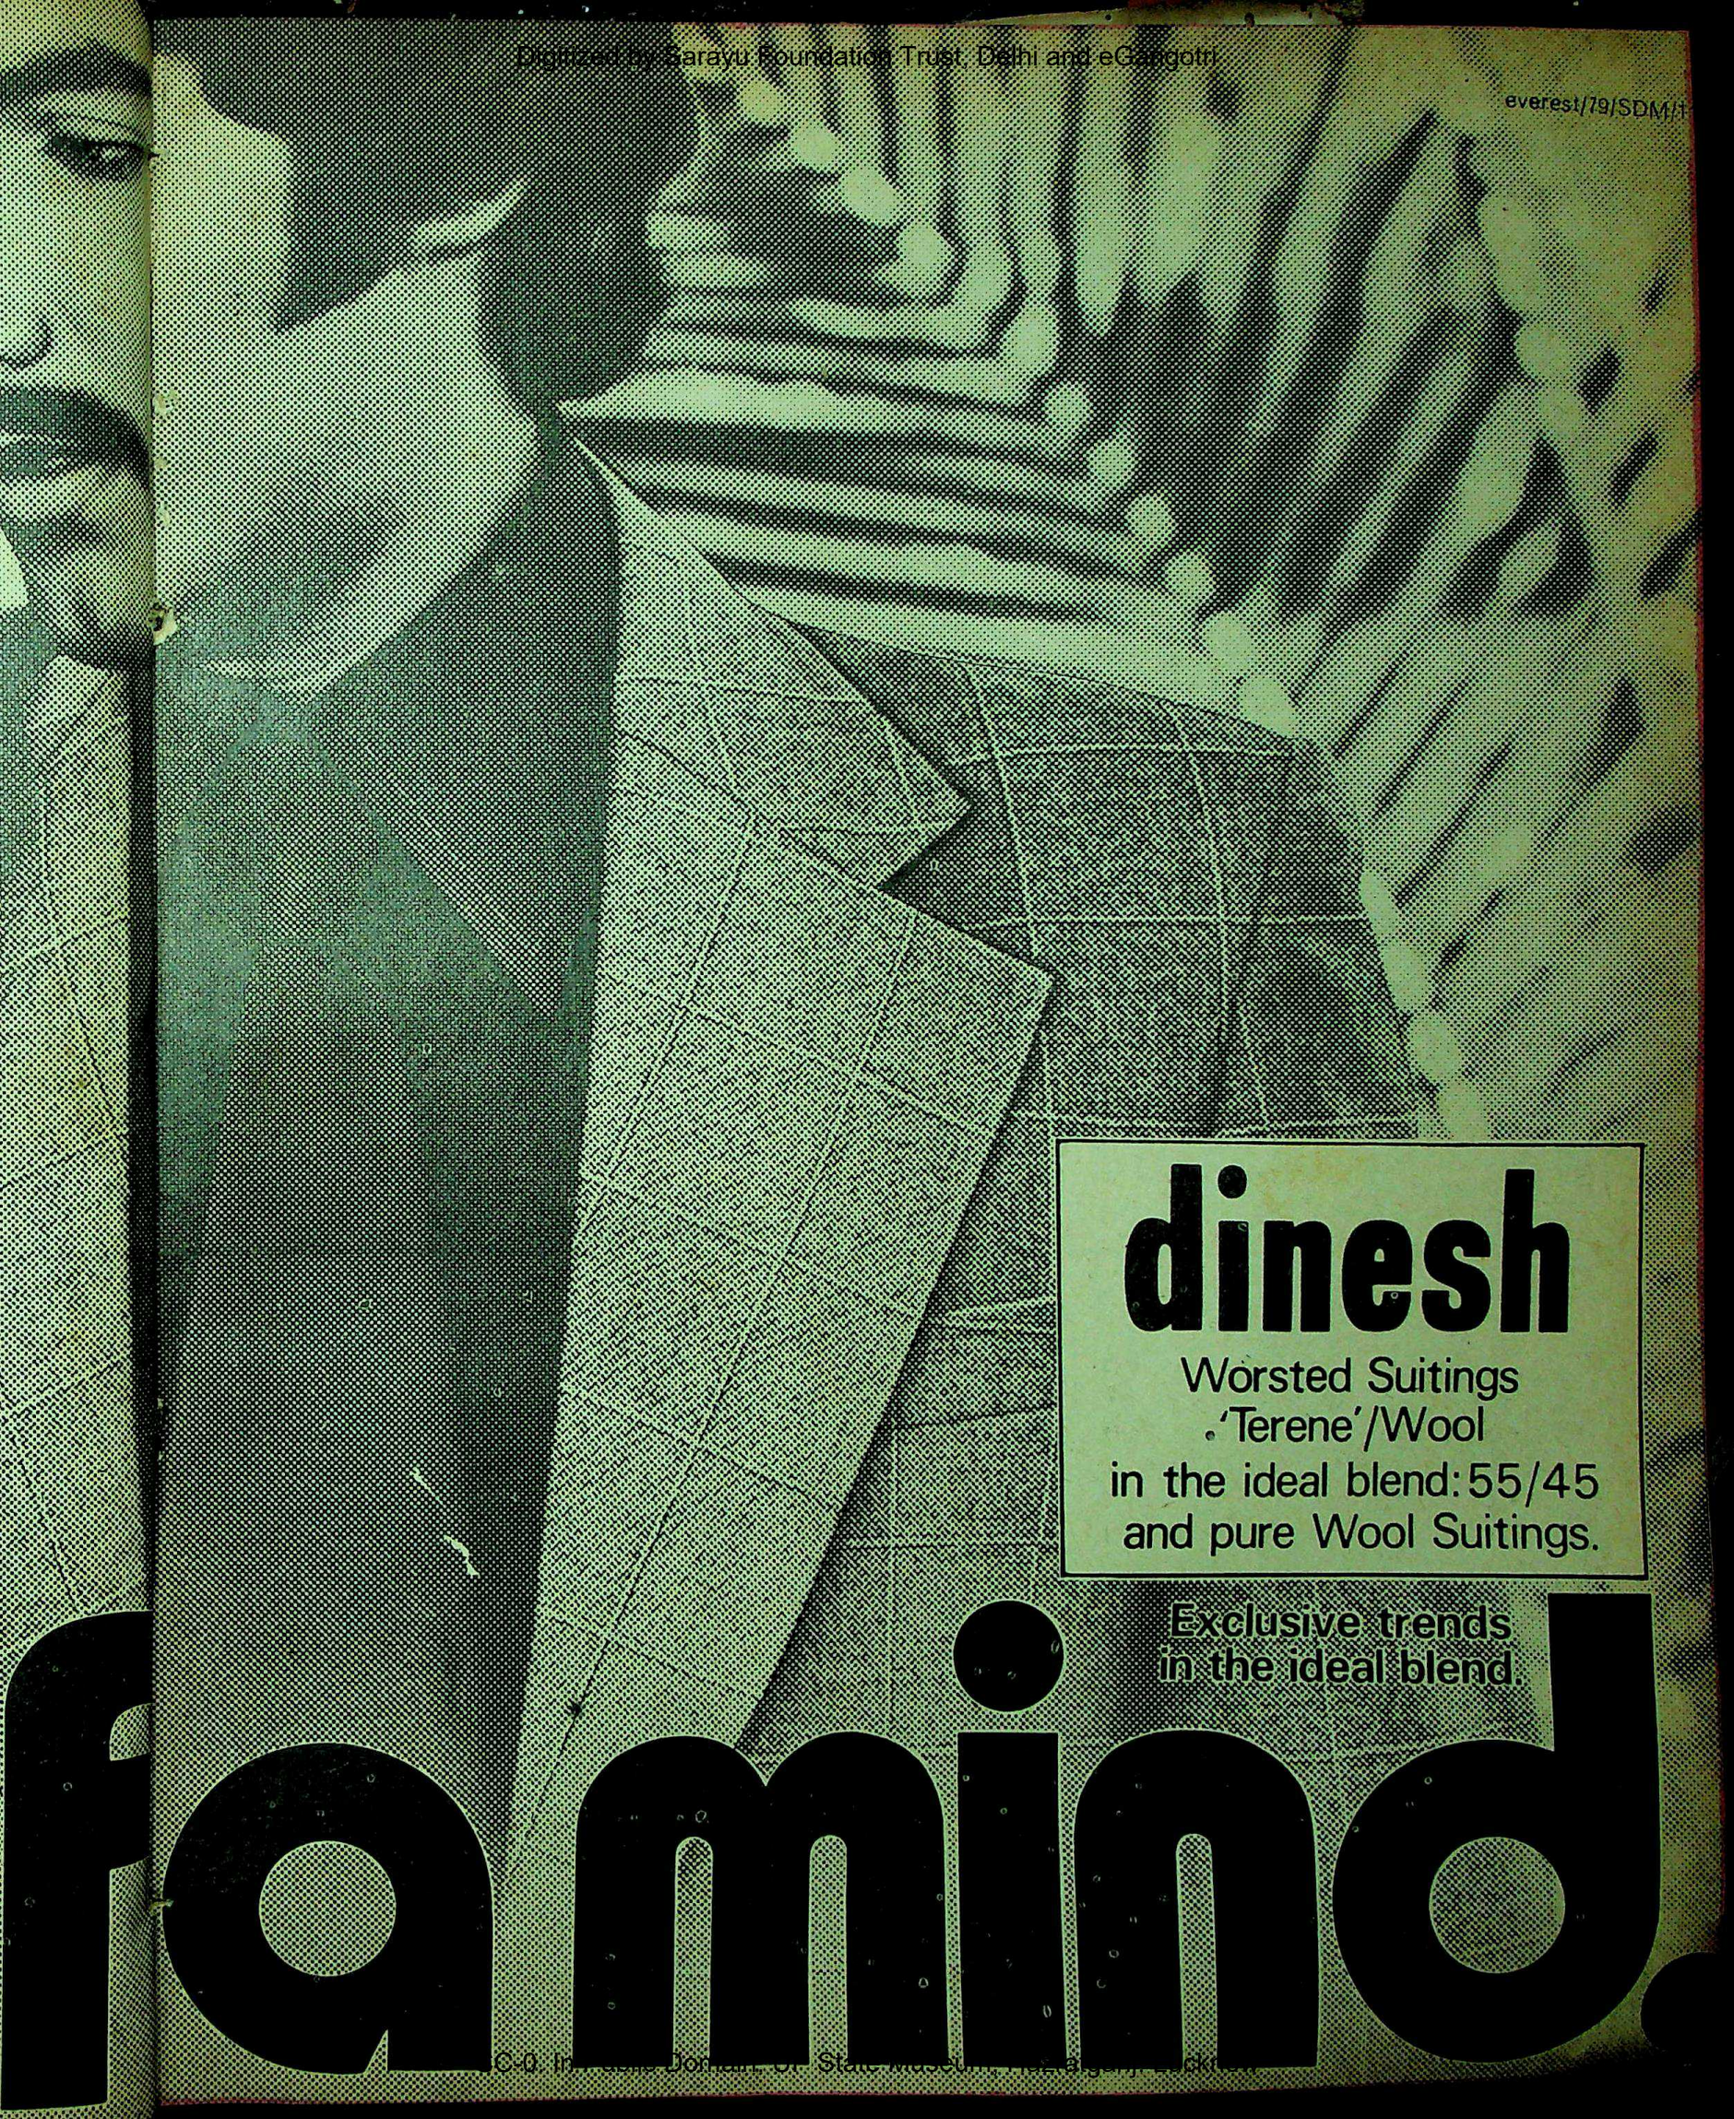
Dinesh.

Two of

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

everest/79/SDM/1



dinesh

Worsted Suitings
'Terene'/Wool
in the ideal blend: 55/45
and pure Wool Suitings.

Exclusive trends
in the ideal blend.

famind.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Dr. State Museum, Hyderabad. Digitized by eGangotri

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

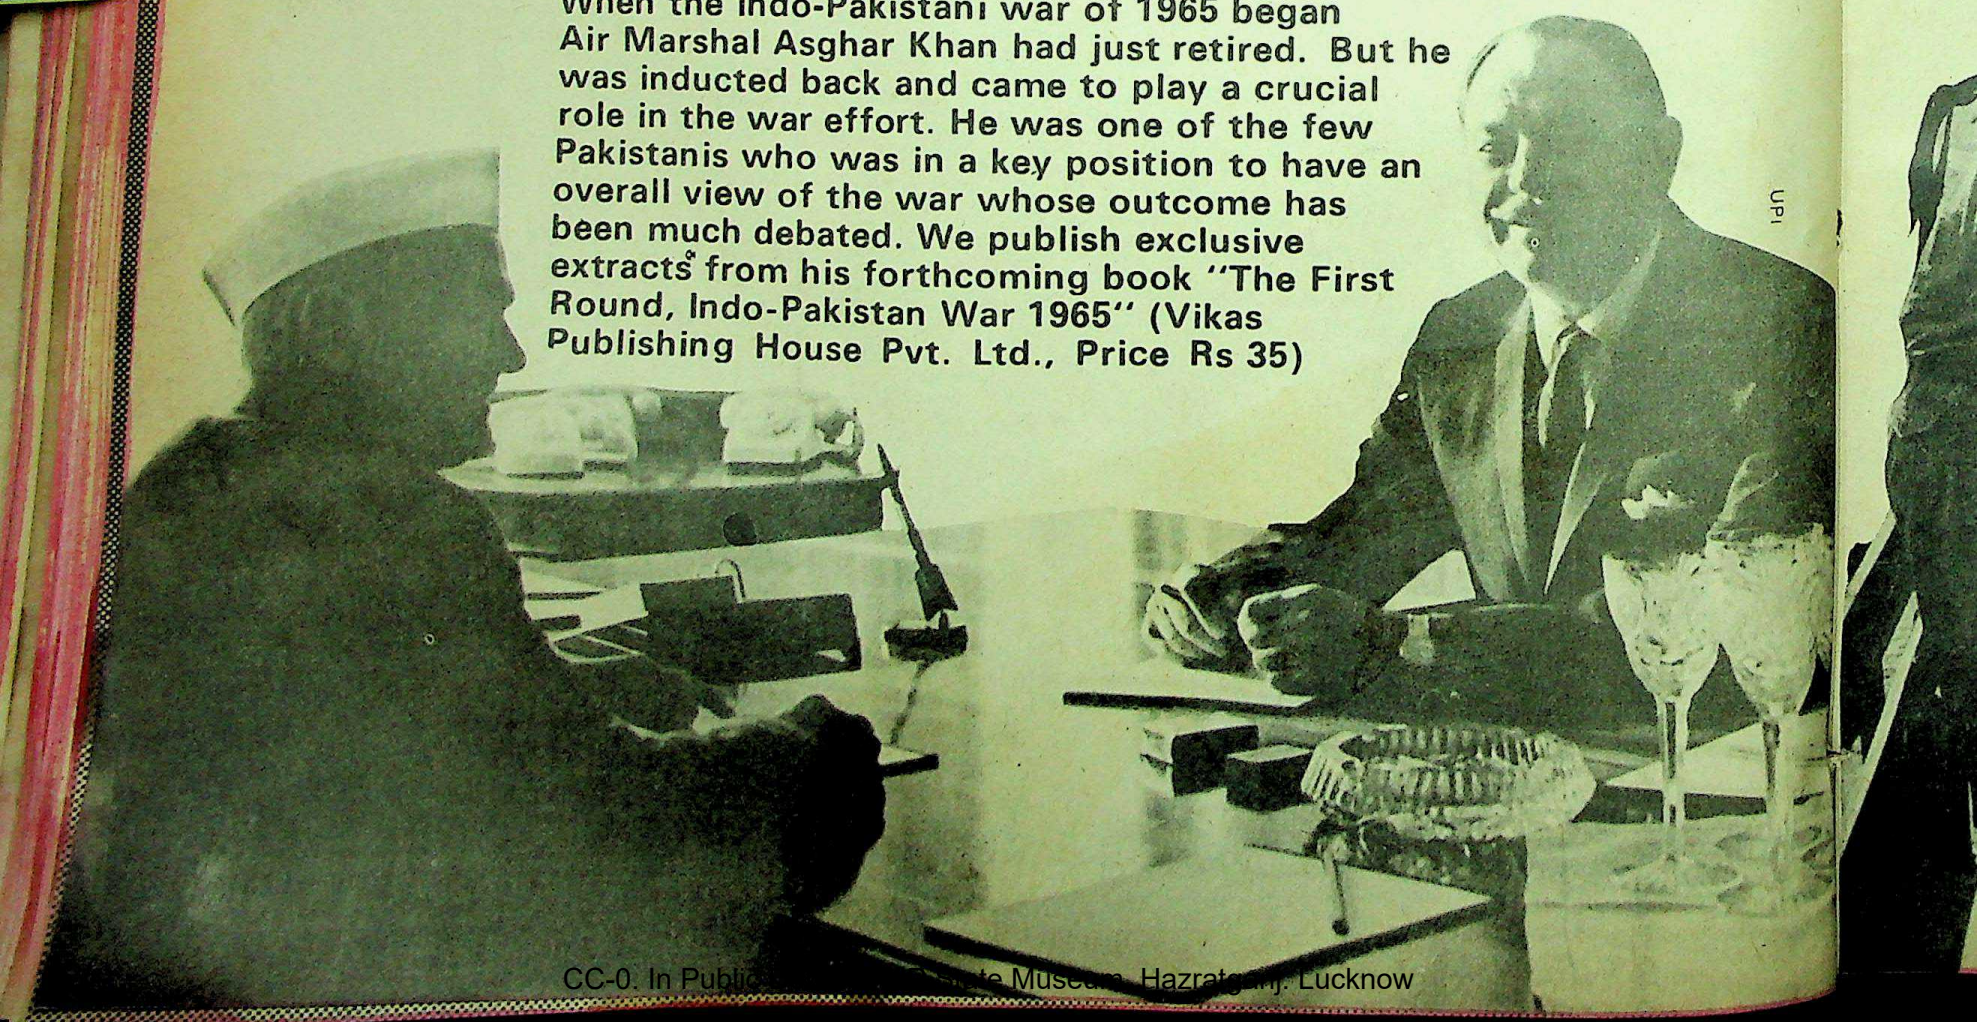
DURING my absence from Pakistan, the Indian Air Force had bombed Peshawar, and although they had done little damage to the airfield, a number of civilians had been killed in the city and in nearby villages. The air traffic control building and a portion of a hangar had been hit. It was lucky that no aircraft were destroyed because our bombers were at the time lined in strength on the airfield loaded with bombs and fuel in preparation for a raid on Indian airfields. Although a few aircraft received splinters, no aircraft was seriously damaged. The Indian raid over, our bombers took off to return the compliment, leaving behind more telling memories of their visit. The Indians also bombed Kohat and repeated the attack on Peshawar. In both these raids no serious damage was done to Air Force property, although civilians again suffered.

UPI

HOW AYUB KHAN LOST IN '65

By Air Marshal Asghar Khan of Pakistan

When the Indo-Pakistani war of 1965 began Air Marshal Asghar Khan had just retired. But he was inducted back and came to play a crucial role in the war effort. He was one of the few Pakistanis who was in a key position to have an overall view of the war whose outcome has been much debated. We publish exclusive extracts from his forthcoming book "The First Round, Indo-Pakistan War 1965" (Vikas Publishing House Pvt. Ltd., Price Rs 35)



UPI

CC-0. In Public ... te Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Sargodha had also been visited by Indian Canberras at night. This airfield remained the main target for Indian attacks at night throughout the war. Although the Indian Air Force dropped an estimated 500,000 lbs of bombs in the area around Sargodha airfield, it did remarkably little damage. The net damage on the airfield was one fire-crash tender damaged and its driver injured, a twenty-five foot crater near, but not on, the landing strip. One bomb hit a village about six miles away from the airfield killing twenty-one inhabitants.

Apart from these night bombing raids, the Indian Air Force had been relatively inactive and the Pakistan Air Force was in command of the situation. Indian aircraft had given up day-time adventures. Sporadic raids at night were to continue for another few days with little more than nuisance effect. The situation on the ground was less encouraging. Our armour, which had been moved to the Gujranwala-Wazirabad area, was being used to contain the Indian advance towards the Lahore-Rawalpindi railway line. The Indians had made some gains in the Lahore and Sialkot sectors but the momentum of their attack had been lost and the battle was now static.

The Army had been using up its ammunition faster than expected and it was considered desirable to arrange replenishment of these stocks. Our weapons were American supplied and the only countries that had similar weapons and could be expected to help were Iran and Turkey. They were also operating the same aircraft as we were and I thought it necessary to visit Teheran and Ankara. Armed with Ayub's letters for President Gursel and the Shah of Iran, I left for Karachi on my way to Ankara and Teheran. Karachi was a transformed city. Black-out was effective and complete and trenches had been dug extensively for use as bomb shelters. A few Indian aircraft had flown over the city but no part of Karachi had been bombed or damaged. I understood that All India Radio, in reporting the success of these bombing raids over Karachi had said that Bunder Road lay in ruins and that serious damage had been done to the Lyari Air Force base. Lyari is well known for its fishing colony, for its odours and for a few other unattractive characteristics, but not for its air base. The airfield at Mauripur had been untouched. In Karachi I saw Admiral A. R. Khan at his headquarters and then left for Ankara.

President Gursel received me kindly and, after an exchange of views on the military situation, said that Turkey would do whatever was possible to help us in this emergency. I later called on General Tansel, the Air Commander-in-Chief, and the Prime Minister, Mr Orguplu. It was obvious that the Turks were under some strain and were embarrassed by the situation. All their equipment was American and they were wholly dependent on the United States for their day-to-day military needs. They were members of NATO to which all their military forces and resources were allotted. It was not proper for them to supply any weapons to Pakistan without informing NATO and obtaining their consent. It was also unlikely that they could send major items of equipment such as aircraft or tanks without their NATO allies getting to know that this had been done. The Prime Minister explained that he was the head of a coalition and, like most coalitions, his Government had no common views on many issues. On the issue of the Indo-Pakistan war, he said, they were unanimous in their support of their Pakistani brethren, but they were divided on the manner in which this assistance could or should be given. One party would like to go all the way in their support of Pakistan; a second party would prefer to adopt a cautious approach, giving us all possible material assistance without in any way jeopardising Turkey's own international relations or military commitments; and the third party, more mindful of U.S. reaction, would like to follow an even more cautious approach. Considering all these difficulties, he said they would supply us whatever they had by way of munitions, arms etc., but he expressed his inability to give us either combat aircraft, aircraft spares, or tanks. I thanked him for his frank expression of views and was a little disappointed, though not surprised, at the Turkish reaction to our predicament. On reflection, I have felt that it would not have been realistic for us to expect more help from Turkey than she gave. She gave generously and kept PIA busy, flying all we could into Pakistan.

UPI

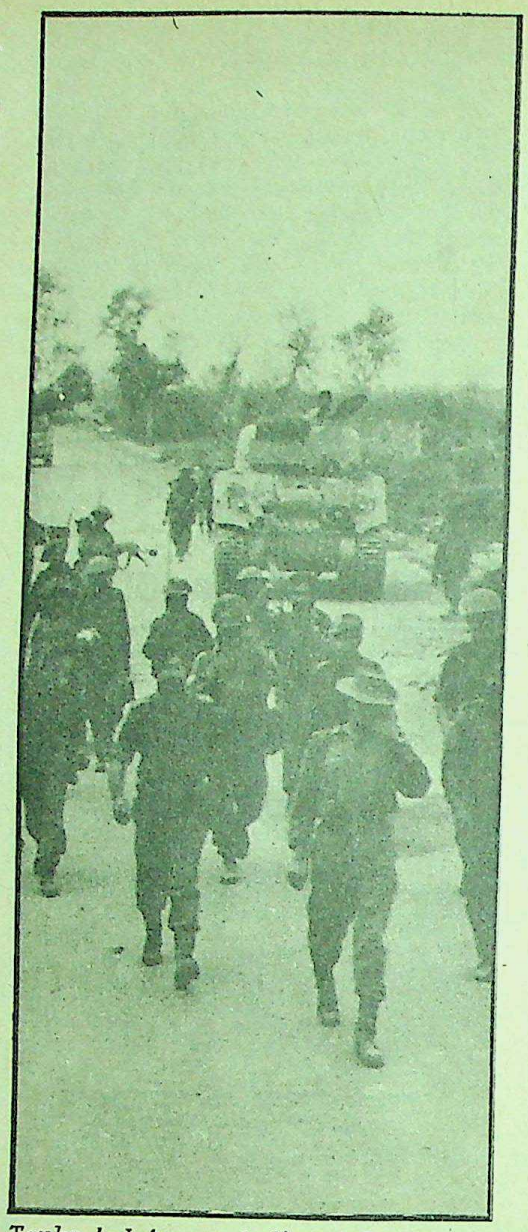
UPI

Pakistani armymen loading a truck with the dead bodies of their jawans at Dogria

CC-0. In Public Domain. Panini Kanya Maha Vidyalaya Collection.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

AT TEHERAN the Shah received me soon after my arrival. In his letter to the Shah, Ayub Khan had expressed disappointment at Iran's attitude towards the Indo-Pakistan conflict. A meeting of the Foreign Ministers of Iran and Turkey had taken place a few days earlier, at the conclusion of which a communique had been issued. In this the Foreign Ministers, whilst expressing sympathy with Pakistan, had concluded that both countries should accept the United Nations' proposal for a cessation of hostilities. Many in Pakistan felt that we had a right to expect more vigorous diplomatic support from these two countries than this communique indicated. Our Foreign Office, moreover, had understood from our Ambassador in Turkey that this lukewarm attitude of the Foreign Minister had been conditioned by the Shah of Iran's insistence that Iran and Turkey must not adopt a partisan attitude in this conflict. Iran, like Turkey, was the recipient of military and economic assistance from the United States, and her ability to stand up to American pressure in such a situation was, to say the least, doubtful. The Foreign Office had concluded that Iran had played a leading role in wording the communique in a manner that put us at some disadvantage in adopting a stronger negotiating posture. Thus Ayub Khan in his letter had expressed disappointment at Iran's role in these talks and had said in plain words that Pakistan had a right to expect a more positive response from Iran in this, our hour of tribulation. The Shah read the letter over twice. His face showed that he was hurt that Ayub Khan should have addressed him in such terms and that Iran's role or motives in these talks should have been suspect. He said that it was a pity that he could not say all he knew about this matter. If he could, Ayub Khan would be satisfied that Iran had not been responsible for the effect that the communique had produced. He showed great concern over the situation and congratulated me on the performance of the Pakistan Air Force. I had arrived in the midst of their national holidays and we had experienced some difficulty in getting certain military stores that had already been allotted to Pakistan by Iran. I therefore asked if he would order his people to work throughout the holidays to meet our needs. He issued instructions in my presence that all personnel connected with the programme must work night and day to keep the stores moving and that our entire needs in explosives and ammunition were to be met until their own stocks were reduced to zero. He, like Orguplu, did not see his way to giving us fighter aircraft as these were closely watched by the United States Military Assistance staff, but he agreed that we should let them have a list of our requirements in aircraft and equipment. I had brought this with me and handed it over later to Iranian officials.



Tanks led by an Indian infantry platoon

Having seen the Shah, I returned to Karachi and then to Rawalpindi. In both Turkey and Iran I had been received with sympathy and warmth. It was obvious that the people of Iran and Turkey were greatly disturbed by the situation. It was not unnatural that, notwithstanding the deep brotherly sentiments that existed in both these countries for Pakistan, the Governments of Iran and Turkey did not find it possible to adopt a more positive attitude in this conflict. Both were too deeply involved with the United States and both had a certain mistrust of the People's Republic of China. They could not, in the face of such conflicting pressures, have been expected to do much more than they did in these troubled times. Since the conflict had been unexpected — at least by our Government — they had not received from us any prior warning of a situation arising which necessitated their active support. Considering the short time that had elapsed since the outbreak of hostilities, their support must be considered speedy and effective. International involvement in such conflict is usually a gradual process. In this case, when the war lasted only 17 days and peace talks and feelers were initiated within the first ten days of the outbreak of hostilities, it would not have been reasonable to expect any serious commitment on the part of Iran or Turkey.

Whilst in Turkey I had heard of the appointment of Ghulam Faruque as Defence Adviser to the President. On my arrival in Rawalpindi a message was awaiting me that he wanted to see me as soon as possible. Having briefed Ayub Khan, the Foreign Minister, and the Foreign Secretary about my mission, I met Ghulam Faruque the same evening. A man of great energy and drive, he appeared excited about his new job. He explained that as Defence Adviser he was required to deal primarily with the procurement of explosives and stores to keep the armed forces supplied so that the war effort was not interrupted. I had, without being appointed, already begun to perform these functions and had collected an inter-services staff which was by then functioning in the Ministry of Defence. I therefore told Ghulam Faruque that I would be available for advice and assistance, and I briefed him on what had been done so far and what had been planned for the future. The situation was, I felt, satisfactory and although we were running short of stocks in certain types of explosives, I was confident that with the ships that were on the way and the PIA Boeings and Constellations that were bringing equipment and stores, the Army would not run out of essential weapons and explosives. I continued to function in this role of a self-appointed coordinator until the war ended, when I returned to Karachi.

His appointment, Ghulam Faruque told me, had been suggested to the President by the Governor of West Pakistan, Nawab Amir Mohammad Khan of Kalabagh and by Air Marshal Nur Khan. Nur Khan had said that Ayub Khan, like Churchill in the Second World War, needed a 'Beaverbrook' and that Ghulam Faruque would be eminently suited to fill this role. Alas, if we also had a Churchill, Pakistan's destiny might indeed have been different today.

War without a GHQ

IN RAWALPINDI, the control and direction of the war was woefully lacking. At a meeting of the Commanders-in-Chief with the President, some six years earlier, I had suggested that we should give serious thought to higher command and control in war. It was important that we should be clear where the Government would function from during war. Who would direct the national war effort and where would the Commander-in-Chief of the Army normally be? This was necessary because the control of modern war is made possible only by a complex communications system. This communications system has to be laid down in peace time and at considerable cost. The staff at a headquarters functions as the extension of a commander's brain, and the brain must have speedy and efficient communication with the limbs or the formations that a commander controls. These communications between the field formations and the headquarters are not single lines but an intricate network of radio and telephone circuits connecting various people dealing with logistical and operational matters at different places. Similarly, the commanders of the three services require communications not only between themselves but also with their staffs. The three Service Commanders have also to be connected with the person or persons who control and coordinate the overall war effort. All this should be common knowledge for people possessing even an elementary knowhow of modern warfare. I was, therefore, a little surprised when I was asked why it must be decided in advance where the war would be controlled from. When I explained the requirement, Ayub Khan replied that he would be conducting the war personally from the battlefield. Almost as if to clarify the situation, he added that he would certainly not be in Rawalpindi. General Musa (Commander-in-Chief of the Army) always quick to follow Ayub Khan's lead, had added that the only place he was certain not to be in was the General Headquarters (at Rawalpindi) and that he would be in the field, conducting the Corps battle from the Corps Headquarters. These views would have been comic if they had not been expressed by people who were responsible for the security of the country. I argued that I thought it most unlikely that the President could remain for long in the field, and that the many calls on his duties would inevitably force him to spend most of his time in the Capital. The coordination of the overall war effort, the hour-to-hour assessment of the military situation, the need to mobilize the nation's resources, such as food, rail and road transport, and the need to keep civilian morale at a high pitch were some of the things that would require his presence at the seat of Government. Similarly, I tried to explain that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army was responsible for coordinating and directing land operations from Sindh in the south to Baltistan in the north and was also responsible for the situation on land in East Pakistan as well as the entire North West Frontier from Chitral to the Baluchistan coast. It was to me inconceivable that he could perform these functions efficiently away from his headquarters. I also did not see the need for him to sit on top of the Corps Commander, unless, of course, the Corps Commander was not fit to perform his functions. I was appalled at the complete lack of understanding of this basic problem of control in war.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Twice again I raised this point at the meetings of the Commanders-in-Chief presided over by Ayub Khan. Although I failed to get my point of view recognised, I proceeded on the assumption that contrary to the direction that I had received the control and direction of war would be from Rawalpindi and that the President would not be in the field. Similarly, I assumed that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army would be based for most of the time at his headquarters at Rawalpindi. The Air Force then proceeded to lay all its communications to fit this situation. Since it had been assumed that the President and the Commander-in-Chief of the Army would be in Rawalpindi, it was important that the Air Force Chief should also be there. In war there are numerous calls on the Air Force. It is, therefore, important that the Air Force Commander should be readily available to advise the Supreme Commander on how the Air Force is being used. If this is not done and this advice is not readily available, the chances are that under the many pressures that are likely to arise, the Air Force will be misused and the air effort wasted. This is more likely to lead to serious consequences when the air effort available is small. It was thus necessary that the operational element of Air Headquarters should function from Rawalpindi. Suitable arrangements were, therefore, made by the Air Force to make this possible and an elaborate communications system was set up for this purpose. When the war broke out, the Air Force, which had its permanent headquarters at Peshawar, was able to function from its operational headquarters at Rawalpindi with ease and efficiency. The communications that had been laid between the operational headquarters of the Pakistan Air Force and its

Indian Air Force pilots

CC-0. In Public Domain. State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

other formations, as well as the other services had been tested and tried and been brought to a high pitch of efficiency. The speed with which the Pakistan Air Force was able to react to a fast changing situation was due in large measure to this preparatory work in the field of communications.

As I had anticipated, Ayub Khan [illegible] no move out of Rawalpindi throughout the seventeen days of war and Musa's travels were restricted largely to his sorties between his house, his office and G.M.Q. Operations Room. The occasional visit to the President's House in Ayub Park was, apart from one visit to a Corps Headquarters, perhaps the nearest he got to the battlefield further east. The war on the ground was run by Brigadiers Gul Hassan and Bilgrami. A Lieutenant-Colonel of the Pakistan Artillery helped these two in directing the effort of the Army. Considering the lack of direction from the top, and considering the generally negative nature of this guidance whenever it was forthcoming these officers did admirably well. Whatever guidance the Army was able to get was largely the result of the initiative shown by these officers who worked under great strain and under frustrating circumstances. They were, however, not alone in this predicament, for this feeling prevailed also in the lower echelons of the Army. Ability had not been the yardstick in the selection of commanders and for too long had lip-service and mediocrity been at a premium. This business of selecting the right type of officers for senior appointments is so vital to a nation's ability to wage war, and so crucial to a nation's security, that I may be permitted a slight digression from the main course of events.

Changing horses in midstream

I FOUND it difficult to believe that the President, who had always been cautious in his approach to international relations, particularly as they affected our contacts with India, should have agreed to a policy that had the germs of a conflict on major scale. In the first week of August we read in the newspapers of the incursion of Azad Kashmir volunteers across the cease-fire line into Indian held Kashmir. As these incursions began to increase in intensity it became obvious that a major shift had occurred in our policy towards Kashmir. Until a few months earlier, Ayub Khan had recoiled whenever a suggestion had been made that we should encourage just such a development and accept the risk that such a move entailed. What had happened to cause this change in his thinking?

Ayub Khan, like most other Pakistanis, had felt exasperated by India's attitude on Kashmir but he, more than the rest of his countrymen, had believed in seeking a peaceful solution to the issue. When his overtures towards India, culminating in his meeting with Pandit Nehru in 1960, produced no results, his sense of frustration increased. During this period of disappointment certain international events had a gradual but nevertheless significant effect on his thinking. The heroic struggle of the Algerian people and the eventual withdrawal of French power from North Africa, the conflict in Vietnam and Indonesia's confrontation against Malaysia influenced his thinking. The failure of a big power like the United States to win a military victory in Vietnam, and Indonesia's success in keeping British forces in South-East Asia fully stretched showed the inherent strength of well led national movements against outside forces.

The sharp and successful encounter of the Pakistan Army with Indian Forces in the Rann of Kutch area further reinforced Ayub Khan's rising faith in our inherent strength. The Rann of Kutch operation also did much to bolster Musa's morale and his assessment of the Army's strength rose in proportion to Ayub Khan's increased faith in the military superiority of our forces. The unlimited capacity of some people for flattery found full play in the wake of successes in the Rann of Kutch operation. Other well-meaning and honest observers were genuinely proud of our Army's performance and they expressed these feelings whenever the opportunity arose. The Press also played its part in creating an atmosphere of triumph and invincibility. This would have affected lesser mortals than Musa, who now began to show greater confidence in his own ability and that of the Army to deal with India. Finding the President more receptive to a bolder course in relationship with India, the Foreign Office began to take a tougher line. Senior civil servants supported this line of thought and G.H.Q. was persuaded to produce a plan of action. The task was entrusted to Major-General Akhtar Hussain Malik, the General Officer Commanding No. 12 Division, who was responsible for the defence of Azad Kashmir. A bold and imaginative officer, the plan reflected his outlook and character. Thus was operation 'Gibraltar' born. The President's approval of the plan was acclaimed by top civilian advisers and Musa, seeing which way the President was inclined, lent it his full support against his basic instincts and military judgment.

This decision was based on three important premises. It was assumed that widespread support existed within occupied Kashmir to make such a guerilla campaign a success. It was also considered unlikely that, as a consequence of this action, India would be inclined to attempt a large-scale military offensive against Azad Kashmir territory. Lastly, the possibility of India crossing the international frontier either in East or West Pakistan was ruled out.

Whereas it was true that widespread goodwill for Pakistan existed in occupied Kashmir, it was unrealistic to expect that this feeling of resentment against India could be mobilised within a very short time and thereby make the execution of large scale operations behind Indian lines possible. The selection of personnel, many of whom knew neither the area nor the language, made the operation in occupied territory a difficult task. The operation was launched as hurriedly as it had been conceived, and it was surprising that with all these drawbacks it was such a success. The stepping up of the tempo, however, was not gradual enough to give it the character of an internal uprising, nor was it controlled sufficiently to keep it within the bounds of Indian political and military acceptability. When the Indians were faced with a rapidly escalating situation, which endangered their position in Kashmir, they were persuaded by the Army to retaliate. This they decided to do in an area in Azad Kashmir which would be strategically important enough to recapture some of the lost prestige that India had suffered and the loss of which would place Pakistan militarily at a disadvantage. The Haji Pir salient, which provided Pakistan with a link between the northern and southern sectors of Azad Kashmir, was a natural region which fitted this pattern. On 24th August the Indians launched a strong attack on Azad Kashmir positions in this area, which were relatively lightly held, and by the 28th they were in control of sufficient territory to cut the shortest line of communication between Mazaffarabad, the capital of Azad Kashmir, and Kotli, a major communication centre in the southern half of Azad Kashmir. The attack on Haji Pir Pass was the first major violation of the cease-fire line by organized military formations in eighteen years and gave a fresh dimension to the conflict. Pakistan was left with little alternative but to retaliate in an area in which the Indians were vulnerable and where a relatively small effort could produce decisive results. The Chamb-Akhnur area, which permitted the use of armour and which would provide a base that could threaten the vital Jammu-Srinagar road communications to the valley, was selected for the purpose. No 7 Infantry Division, located south of Lahore, was ordered to move to the Chamb area. The attack was, however, to be carried out initially by a brigade placed under No. 12 Division, commanded by Major-General Akhtar Hussain Malik. The move of No. 7 Division from its concentration area south of Lahore had far reaching consequences and was a decision of great significance. This division, along with No. 1 Armoured Division formed our main counterattack force and thus the main punch of our Army. Its move away from the area of concentration could only mean that the use of this force against India was not considered likely, at least until after No. 7 Division could return to its concentration area.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

As formations of No. 12 Division moved swifty towards Akhnur, India was faced with a difficult military situation. Just as we had not expected an attack on the Haji Pir Pass, the Indians did not expect an attack in such strength in the Chamb-Akhnur Sector. The use of tanks and heavy artillery was, moreover, unprecedented in the Azad Kashmir conflict, and Pakistan's initial successes created considerable panic in Jammu and throughout occupied Kashmir, and shock and surpise in India. The capture of Akhnur by Pakistan would seriously threaten the lines of communication between India and the Kashmir Valley and it could result in the loss of a large portion of the Indian Army in northern and central Kashmir. Its effect on the morale of the Indian Army could have been catastrophic and the effect on the nation's will to face Pakistan would certainly have suffered a serious blow. The Indians were left with little choice but to remove this threat to the security of their vital strategic areas and rather than confine the contest to Azad Kashmir, decided to extend the area of conflict to West Pakistan.

Of all the places in West Pakistan, Lahore was the natural choice. An important communications centre and the political and cultural capital of West Pakistan, it has a special place in the hearts and minds of all Pakistanis. A threat to its security could not fail to draw forces to its defence, and this could well remove the threat to Jammu and Akhnur.

It is possible that the Indians started their offensive with this limited objective. They had not, I believe, reckoned on the all-out retaliation that this attack caused. Only thus can their decision not to use their Air Force on 6th September—except to attack a railway train near Wazirabad—be explained. When the attack on Lahore triggered off a full-scale war, their armour, which had already been moved to the Jammu Sialkot area, was launched in what turned out to be their main offensive against Pakistan.

NO. 7 Division's move to the Chamb area was completed on the morning of the 2nd, about thirty-six hours after the offensive launched by No. 12 Division. On the same day, Major-General Yahya Khan, the General Officer Commanding No. 7 Division, was given command of this sector and Major-General Akhtar Malik was ordered to return to his earlier location further north. This had a profound effect on the course of operations in this area and on that of the war with India. Akhtar Malik had conceived the general strategy of operations in his area of responsibility, which included the Chamb-Akhnur sector. He had been instrumental in persuading the President to embark on a course of action which had led to this situation and he felt a personal stake in the outcome of this contest. By temperament and outlook, moreover, he was suited to lead an operation that required boldness and vigour. Above all, he was on the move and was making satisfactory progress. Yahya Khan, with part of a force located about two hundred miles away, had been preparing for months now for a completely different role. His move to the Chamb area involved a major administrative and logistical switch which was completed with speed and with the inevitable problems that attend such unplanned moves of large military formations.

No. 7 Division arrived after two to three days of continuous preparation and movement and made contact with Indian troops on 3rd September. As it joined battle, the General Officer Commanding No. 12 Division was withdrawn to return to his headquarters farther up country in Azad Kashmir. Just as Akhtar Malik resented being removed from the scene of battle at a critical time, Yahya Khan was not enthusiastic about the thought of implementing a plan with which he had not been associated.

The decision to change commanders in the midst of the Chamb battle was as ill-conceived as the decision to withdraw No. 7 Division from the main force farther south in the Punjab. It was clearly based on the assumption that the Indian retaliation to an attack on Akhnur would come in the Azad Kashmir area in the north and not against Pakistan territory in the south. Whatever the political appreciation, to have weakened the main offensive force of the Pakistan Army at a time when, to say the least, our relations with India were strained, was a blunder of the first magnitude and to have replaced a successful commander in the midst of battle was also indicative of an unrealistic approach to military problems that has seldom been precedented.

As Pakistan changed horses in mid-stream, India began to make a last desperate bid to stiffen her crumbling defences in the Akhnur area. The change of formations slowed down our advance sufficiently to allow the Indians time to consolidate their positions, and as they crossed our borders in the Punjab on 6th September, the morale of the Indians in the Chamb-Akhnur sector began to recover.

The Mujahid operation inside Kashmir had in the mean time gained momentum. Pakistan's support of the liberation movement rekindled fresh hope amongst the people of occupied Kashmir, and open war with India appeared at last to provide the opportunity for which many had waited for these long years. Seldom have a valiant people been betrayed in this manner by a nation in whom they had complete trust. This was perhaps the darkest chapter in Pakistan's history and one which patriotic Pakistanis will long remember with a feeling of shame and guilt.

Superiority of numbers

BY ABOUT 17th September, the situation on land had stabilised. Apart from some operations in Azad Kashmir, in the Ferozepur area and the Sind-Jodhpur border the main Indian thrust had been in the Narowal-Sialkot sector. By launching their main offensive in that area the Indians hoped to cut our main lines of communication between Lahore and Rawalpindi, outflank the defences of Lahore, and also provide protection to their vulnerable supply lines between Pathankot and Jammu. Opposite Lahore the Indian advance had been contained about seven to eight miles from the outskirts of the city but we were not able to regain much of our lost ground. Nor did the Indians have the strength to push further forward. The battle in the Narowal-Sialkot sector developed into a struggle for control of the Narowal-Wazirabad railway line. Partly because of lack of imagination at the top, we had been forced into a defensive posture with the initiative largely with the Indians. In the Sialkot-Narowal area they had one armoured division and three infantry divisions as against the equivalent of one armoured division and one infantry division of ours. They were also numerically superior on other fronts. In war, whether it is in the air, at sea or on land, the only way a numerically inferior force wrests the intiative from a numerically superior enemy is by bold offensive action.

It was inevitable that the personality of the commander should have a profound effect on the course of land operations, and our response reflected his outlook. Because of our lack of resources and numbers, it was tempting to be cautious rather than bold, to be on the defensive rather than take the initiative. This for a weaker force is the road to disaster. That we managed to avoid disaster was a tribute to the fighting qualities of our men and the leadership of our younger officers who showed great heroism in difficult circumstances.

The restraint and timidity that was forced on our Army ran counter to the natural inclination of our men and the judgment of our commanders in the field. In most cases they were forbidden to take the offensive even if their assessment showed that they could do so with advantage. It is not necessary in war that a commander should have to ask his superiors before he can attack on his own front. Yet this is what was frequently happening. Commanders in the Lahore and Sialkot areas had been told to obtain approval of G.H.Q. before taking offensive action. Such a request would, therefore, emanate from a Company or Battalion Commander, and by the time it travelled to Brigade, Division and Corps Headquarters, valuable time would be lost. If all these commanders thought that it was a sound idea, it would reach G.H.Q. The usual answer from G.H.Q. would be to wait, or not to attack at all.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The decision to attack is taken by a commander as the result of his assessment of the factors as he sees them. Some of those can be measured, others are based on certain intangibles that only he can judge, such as the behaviour of the enemy, the lay-out of their positions, the terrain, the morale of his men and their mood. These things are difficult to convey to higher Headquarters. In any case, if you are fighting a war, you do not have to ask before you fight. This attitude caused a general paralysis in the field, making the timid commanders more timid and the bold more cautious. I am amazed how, in these circumstances, our Army was able to do so well.

Partly because of shortage of infantry but largely because of unimaginative and timid leadership, we were forced to use our armour in an anti-tank role. The battle in the Sialkot-Chawinda area became a slogging match between tank formations. Tank casualties were heavy on both sides and it soon became evident that a stalemate had been reached which only superior generalship could remove. This appeared to be lacking on both sides. The Indians, though greater in number, were unable to do more than make small and cautious moves to by-pass our defences. In the main, their effort was directed against our primary defensive positions. Their strategy and their determination were not equal to the task, and they were unable to make much headway. The war of mobility appeared to have ended, a period of consolidation had begun.

The launching of our armour in the Khem Karan area was the high spot in Ayub Khan's career. He had expected great things from this move. So unrealistic had been the appreciation, so faulty the timing, and so inadequate the preparation that success in the venture would have been, to say the least, most unlikely. With the failure of this armoured attack his spirits began to flag and as the battle in the Sialkot-Narowal area reached a stalemate, his morale began to suffer. It was obvious that he had begun to reproach himself for having got into such a situation and was harbouring doubts about the chances of a military success. In situations such as this, when the nation watches and waits on every move, action and word of their leader, his attitude was infectious.

Defiance and faith sustain a country's will to continue the struggle, while defeatism seriously weakens the will to resist. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, the Foreign Minister Nazir Ahmed, the Defence Secretary and I made it a point to visit the President every evening when he usually sat on the lawn of his 'blacked-out' house. We tried to paint an encouraging picture of the battle situation and of India's difficulties, while Nazir Ahmed often talked of what Napoleon and Churchill had said and done in similar circumstances. Thus was Ayub Khan's morale sustained for a few days longer than it would otherwise have been. It was clear that it could not go on much longer. After Bhutto's departure for the United Nations, Nazir Ahmed and I kept up this talk and attempted, as best as we could, to sustain the President's morale and his will to continue the struggle. Since I had taken upon myself the responsibility for the movement and supply of stores, explosives and weapons from abroad, I assured him that the position was generally satisfactory and that the flow would be maintained. The Army would have enough for its needs.

On about 18th September, the President addressed a Press Conference in which he made a very poor showing. His shaky performance gave a clear impression to those who were present—amongst them many foreign correspondents—that he was weakening. The British High Commissioner, Morrice James, had been making frequent appeals to the two countries to agree to a ceasefire. The President had begun to see him alone, which was rather unusual and indicative of his desire to express views that he did not wish his own advisers to hear. This, and his general attitude and mood, clearly indicated that he was seeking a settlement. Morrice James, an experienced diplomat, had been quick to assess the President's mood and had used the opportunity presented by these solitary interviews to warn him that Pakistan would suffer serious consequences if the war was not stopped immediately. In this testing hour the Service Commanders were of no help. Musa had for years acted as the faithful deputy. His cardinal principle had been to assess the mood and view of his boss and agree with these even before he had fully understood what they were. Realising that the situation was difficult and knowing Ayub Khan's feelings in the matter, he painted the picture Ayub Khan already had before his eyes—a small Army fighting against great odds, short of ammunition, outnumbered and without adequate resources. He maligned the civilian advisers who, he said had led the President into this situation and he suggested an end to this madness.

Nur Khan was not timid like his Army colleague, but with him other considerations weighed more heavily. The Air Force had done remarkably well and its reputation was at its zenith. A prolongation of the war would inevitably result in attrition and unless losses were replaced a stage would be reached when the Air Force would perforce be grounded. The Indian Air Force could, he felt, outlast the Pakistan Air Force, by sheer weight of numbers. This would be a sorry postscript to a spectacular performance, and one he naturally did not relish. There was also the very weighty advice of Nur Khan's uncle — Nawab Amir Muhammad Khan of Kalabagh, the Governor of West Pakistan—to whose charm both he and Ayub Khan were susceptible.

NAWAB Amir Muhammad Khan was a typical nineteenth century landlord Feudal in outlook and conservative by temperament, he exercised great influence over Ayub Khan who regarded him as a practical and down-to-earth person in whose judgment and advice he had implicit faith.

The Nawab saw things from Lahore and to that extent was nearer the battlefield. But he, no more than Ayub Khan, reflected the mood of the people. He saw in the continuation of the struggle the possibility of the crumbling of the social structure of which he was so staunch a pillar. There is no question that his advice was an important factor in deciding the course of events.

At about this time Afghanistan announced mobilisation and recalled military personnel from leave. This was done ostensibly to prepare for any disturbance that might occur during their national elections, but more probably it was a gesture to India to offset, to some extent, the effect of Chinese moves on her northern borders. Afghanistan's relations with India had always been cordial, and her claims on certain portions of our territory were well known. This move by Afghanistan was, therefore, not a surprise. Though coming as it did when the President appeared to be looking for just such an excuse to step up negotiations to end the conflict, it had a significant effect on the situation.

I have often wondered what Afghanistan would have done if the struggle had continued much longer. I believed then, and I still hold the view, that Afghanistan's active intervention was not likely until a complete collapse had occurred in Pakistan and until India had made spectacular advances in the Punjab. It is true that our north-western borders were very lightly held. In that difficult country, however, even lightly equipped forces could have offered effective resistance. Moreover, the Pakistan Air Force could operate even more effectively against Afghanistan than it had against India. But even more relevant than these military considerations was the general political philosophy of the Afghans and their ethnic and religious ties with Pakistan. It would be difficult for any Afghan government to arouse enough enthusiasm for a war against Pakistan when we were engaged in a war for survival against India. The reaction of the Afghans to the war in Kashmir in 1947, when large numbers of Afghan volunteers came to fight along with Pakistanis in what many considered a holy war against injustice and tyranny, would certainly have been remembered in Kabul. There was also the unknown factor of the Chinese attitude and the very real threat that she posed along frontiers where, barely three years earlier, she had inflicted a military defeat on India, which had shaken the very fabric of Indian society and had almost toppled its Government. Lastly, the attitude of the Muslim world, which almost without exception was now giving full and effective diplomatic support to Pakistan, could not be easily ignored. This attitude would have certainly influenced the Afghan people, if not their Government. There must also have been the lurking thought in the Afghan mind—so well trained in international diplomacy — that militant Hinduism was now on the march. If allowed to overrun Pakistan it could not be contained for long on the banks of the Indus. It would be only a matter of time before Afghanistan would also be threatened. Although Yusuf (Lt General Mohammed Yusuf), our Ambassador in Kabul, had been assured by the King and the Prime Minister that this mobilisation was not directed against Pakistan and that the Afghans could never stab their Pakistan brethren in the back, Ayub Khan was not convinced of Afghan intentions. Such was the background when I saw Ayub Khan early on the morning of 21st September.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

First steps towards a ceasefire

ALTHOUGH I entertained little hope of being able to swing him round to my way of thinking, I did want to try. The situation on land and the increasing tempo of peace talks required early and effective treatment. I started by saying that I was concerned with the situation as it was developing. The performance on the ground had not been satisfactory, and I attributed this to poor generalship and, in particular, to the lack of direction the Army had received. Ayub Khan asked me to explain what I meant and I went on to say that I was surprised that certain officers had been appointed advisers to corps and certain divisional commanders to guide them in the discharge of their functions. This indicated that the commanders could not be relied upon to conduct the battle. I suggested that if this were so, it was essential that these commanders be replaced by people—the advisers if necessary—who could run the show. I also said that he must no doubt know that the Army could not do much unless it was led by persons who had the requisite professional qualities. Ayub Khan felt that I did not appreciate the difficulties the Army had to face. They had been fighting against heavy odds and had done remarkably well. I tried to explain that I did not in any way underestimate the heroic manner in which the Army had fought, but I did feel that given better leadership, they would have done and could still do greater things. Ayub Khan was not convinced and I then switched to the other matter which weighed heavily with me.

I had reason to believe that Ayub Khan was contemplating reaching a settlement on a cease-fire with India and I felt that it would be a mistake if this were done at this stage. I explained that there were three things in our favour which we might never have again. National morale was extremely high and the will to fight so great that the country was prepared to suffer any amount of hardship. The state of national fervour had to be seen to be believed. Its intensity exceeded our expectations and constituted an asset of inestimable value. The Air Force had already won the air battle and had complete mastery of the skies, and the Indian Navy was confined to its harbours. This situation, when the enemy had both qualitative and quantitative superiority in equipment, had been achieved by training and preparation for almost a decade. I was not certain that this situation would be repeated a second time. Lastly, China had moved her forces to India's borders. I knew of what had transpired before this had become a reality, and the decision of the Chinese could have a profound effect on the course of our struggle. I said that China might not repeat this gesture a second time.

I urged the President that if he believed, as I did, that Indian expansionism must sooner or later only lead to conflict, then this was as good a time to fight as any. I also reminded him of a military truism, that in war the side that shows greater stamina is usually the victor. War is a matter of nerve, and the side that shows greater determination and endurance will usually achieve decisive results. When things do not go well, it is easy to magnify one's own weaknesses because those one knows well. In such circumstances it is well to remember that the enemy has his difficulties too, and that these could be more serious than one's own. I expressed the view that history might well show that in this war, at this point in time, the Indians were in an even more unsatisfactory situation than we were, and that a prolongation of the struggle might have serious consequences for their over-stretched resources in logistics and communications. I also pointed out that their morale was not as good as ours and that they, rather than we, would benefit militarily from a cease-fire.

Probably because these views were so different from what he had heard from his advisers during the last few days, he appeared to welcome the discussion. He listened to me with patience, but it was clear that his mind was made up. 'We are under pressure', he said repeatedly. Pressure is something that is difficult to define. It is a state of mind. If a person believes that he is under pressure, it is difficult to convince him that he is not. I saw the futility of continuing the discussion and left his office, disappointed but not surprised at the results of my efforts. As if to put a seal on Ayub Khan's rejection of my views, Morrice James was waiting to see him and was ushered in as I left the room.

As the tempo of negotiations increased, the President began to feel the pressure even more. The Army, which had been under considerable restraint, was placed under even greater control and what little initiative the commanders had enjoyed was withdrawn. The Air Force also became a little less active. There appeared to be little purpose in wasting men and material if a cease-fire was just round the corner. There was widespread disappointment in official circles in Rawalpindi and, as the United Nations met to discuss the matter in New York, those of us who knew the trend of events waited for the announcement that was made by the President on 23rd September. Shortly after Bhutto had announced the acceptance of the terms of the cease-fire in the United Nations, Ayub Khan addressed the nation. Millions of people heard him with surprise and anger. Many in the armed forces, who felt that they could have seen this thing through to a successful end, wept as Ayub Khan spoke. They were baffled to know why, when the Indian advance had been arrested, and before we really had an opportunity to retaliate effectively, a cease-fire had been ordered. Why, when the Air Force had gained such decisive success, was the situation not exploited to its logical conclusion?

Ayub Khan gave the answer in his broadcast as best as he could, but it was not convincing. In fairness to him, however, it must be said that in acting as he did, he had nothing but the security of Pakistan in mind and that he saw in the prolongation of the conflict danger to the safety of the country and the well-being of its people. Whether he was right or wrong, time will show. The answer will, I feel, hinge on India's ability to live in peace and harmony with her neighbours. Should India succeed in showing a change of heart, Ayub Khan's decision will have been vindicated. If, however, a more militant India, increasingly industrialised and better equipped, should embark again on a military adventure against Pakistan, when our economic and military resources are in comparison even less favourable than they were in 1965, my fears will have been justified. The war of September 1965 would then have been only the first round. ■

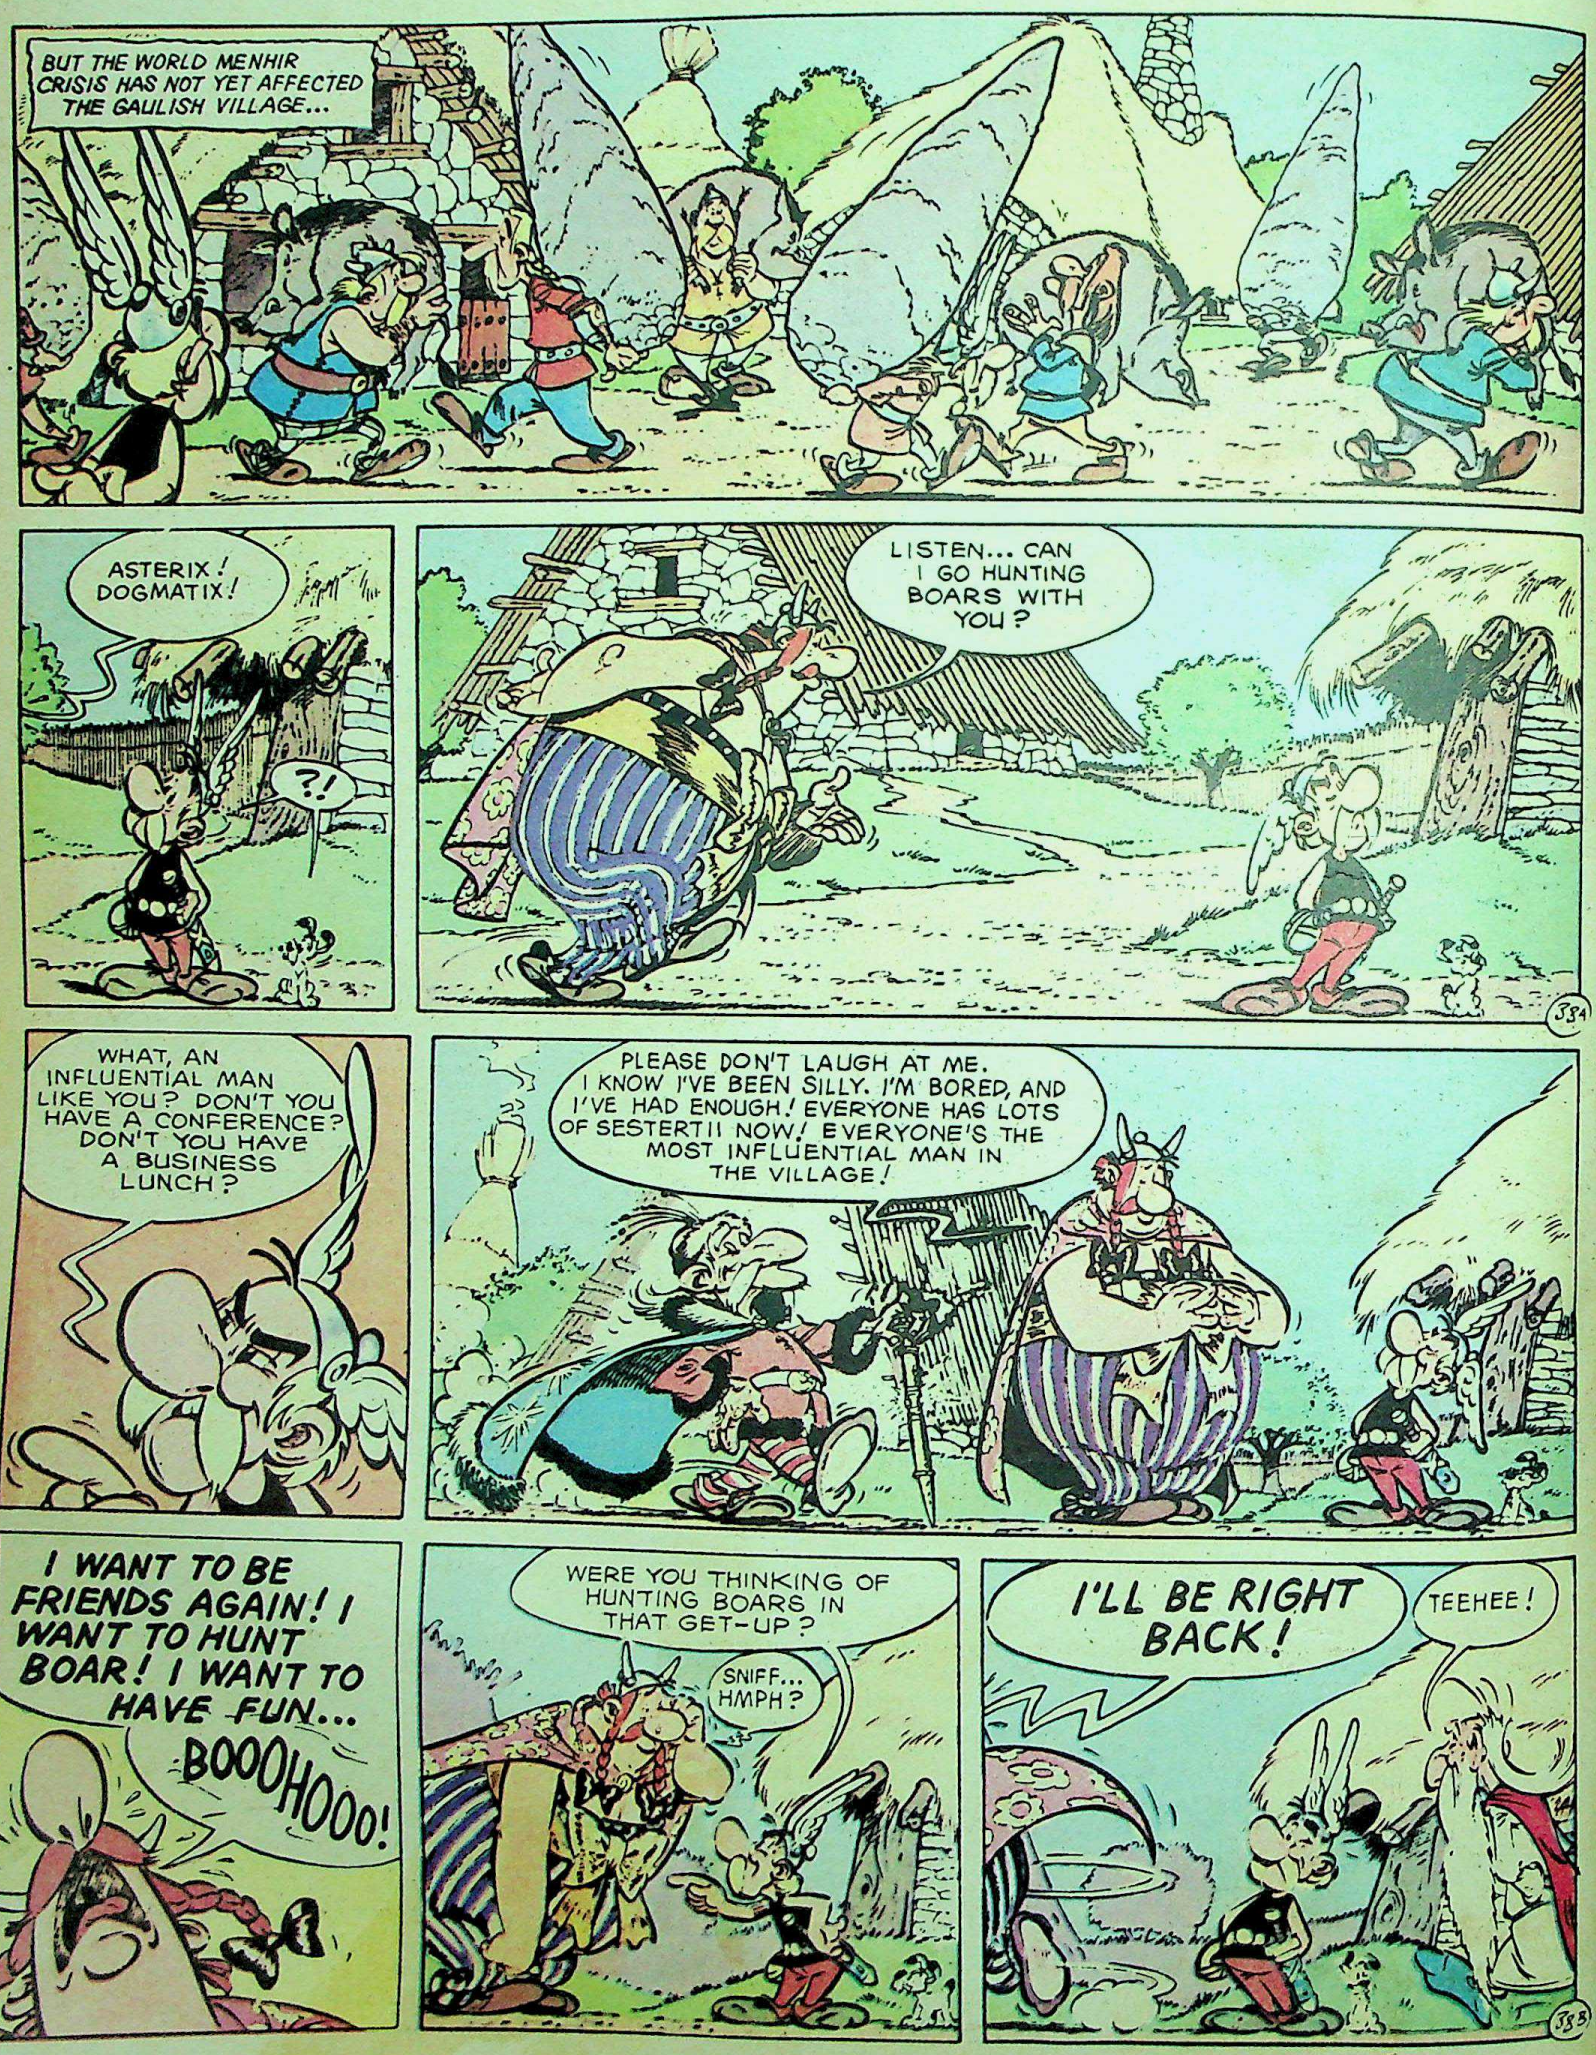
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

An Asterix Adventure

OBELIX AND CO.

by GOSCINNY and UDERZO

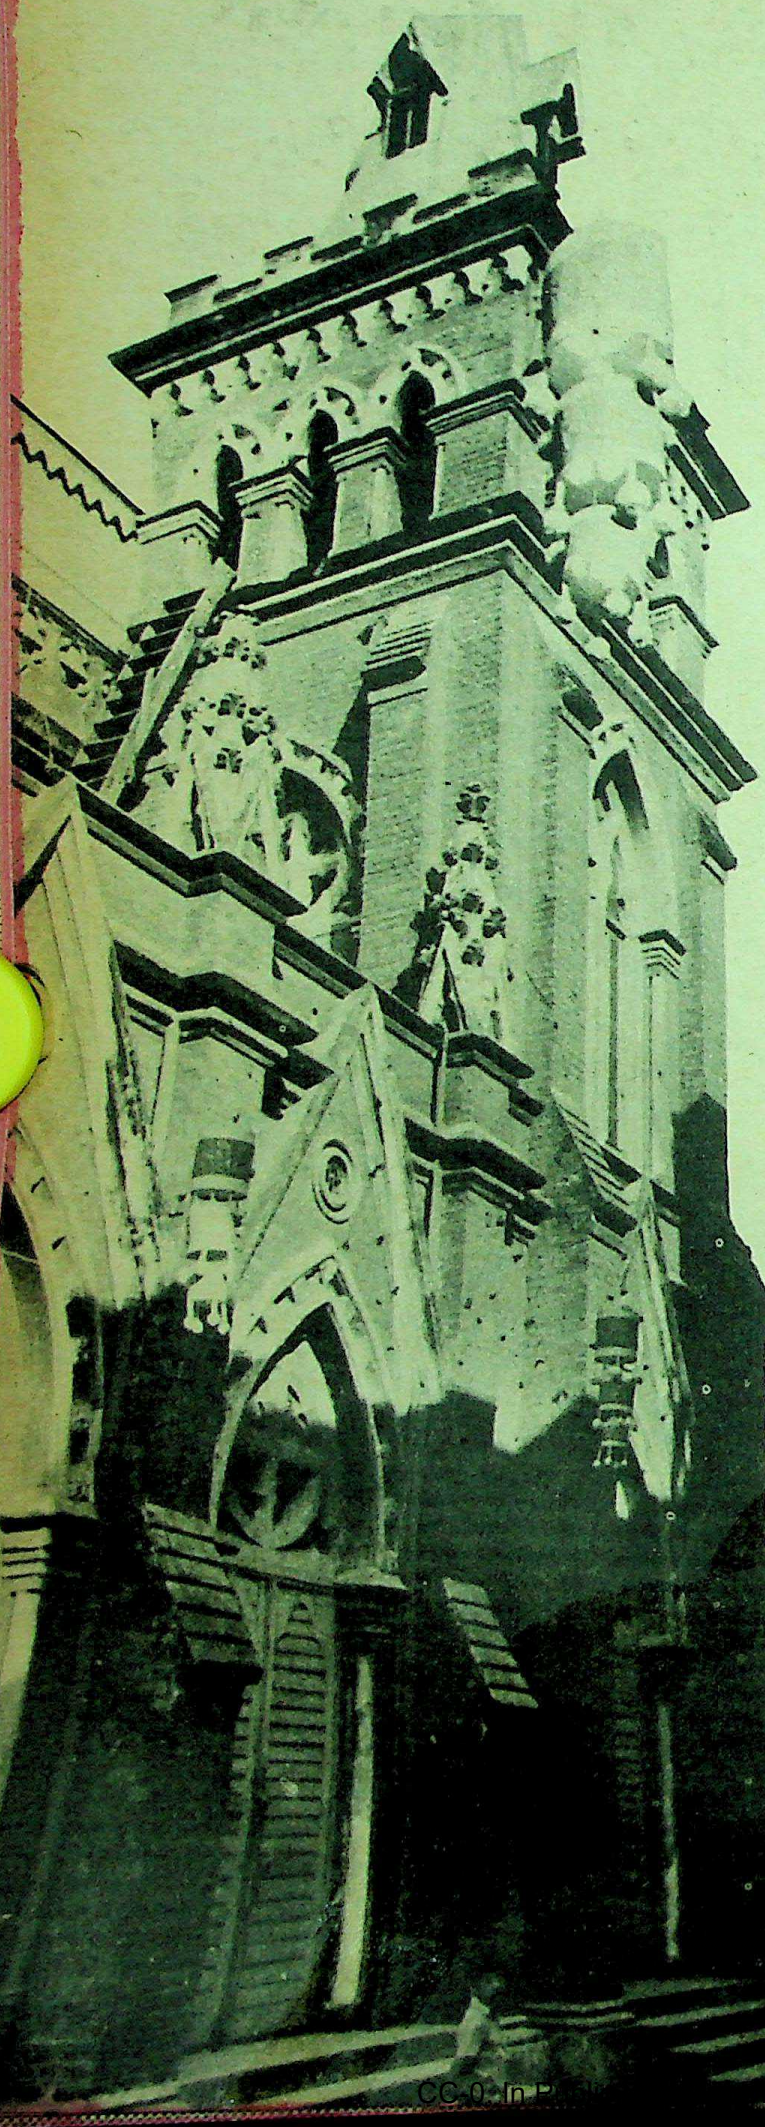


CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Devi Prasad Sinha

Why I am a Christian

PAUL JOHNSON explains how the faith continues to defy critics and sceptics.

NEAR the city of Luxor, the Egyptian police recently found the bones of a 35-year-old Canadian lady, who had disappeared two years before. She had stumbled into a deep labyrinth of archaeological diggings, 16 feet below the surface; and, unable to escape, had died of thirst and hunger. Before she did so, however, she described on a postcard what had happened to her, and added that she was preparing herself for death. This pitiful tale, lit up as it is by the calm resolution with which the woman faced lonely and terrible extinction, underlines the awesome continuity of human attitudes. For it was near Luxor, more than 2,000 years before Christ, that the theologians of Thebes first clarified the concept of individual death and judgment.

Preparation for death is a commentary on the notion that life is a mere prelude, and death itself no more than a judicial gate through which we must pass. This notion is perhaps the most powerful and indestructible idea ever conceived by man. What implemented it in the first place is not immediately obvious, for immortality does not flow from any process of reasoning from the facts of nature—on the contrary. But once grasped, the idea has enormous strength and leads mankind to impose upon itself dolorous disciplinary systems. As Albert Camus puts it, in The Myth of Sisyphus: "The certainty of God giving meaning to life far surpasses in attractiveness the freedom to behave badly with impunity."

The strength of Christianity, derived in part, but only in part, from its Judaic origins, lies in its chrystaline eschatology: its notions of death, judgment, hell and heaven were proclaimed with absolute clarity, and superb self-confidence, from the start. St Bede, in his Ecclesiastical History of the English People, relates the speech of one of King Edwin's earls, when Paulinus first proposed Christianity to the Northumbrian court. The earl compared life to the flight of a sparrow, in winter, through the king's hall, from icy darkness into light, and then into darkness again; "This life of man appears for a short space, but of what went before and what is to follow, we know nothing. If, therefore, this new teaching gives us certitudes, we should follow it."

BUT God is always dying. Atheism is not an unrepeatable event but a recurring phenomenon. God dies but somehow never gets buried. In the second half of the 19th century the rapid progress of natural science produced an acute attack of deicide. There was an event known as the "secularisation of the European mind', a process which Dr Owen Chadwick, in an entertaining course of lectures, has shown was neither so straightforward nor so conclusive as we had supposed. The "crisis of religion", if that is the right expression, is more than a century old. We think of ourselves as tossed in a sea of doubt; but the supposedly placid mid-Victorians felt no less giddy and insecure. "My belief," wrote Cardinal Manning to Gladstone in 1871, "is that faith is gone.....morals are going.....The end of this must be anarchy or despotism." "Our own," wrote John Morley in 1874, "is characteristically and cardinally an epoch of transition in the very foundations of belief and conduct." Frederick Harrison described his loss of faith as "but one case of the dreadful anarchy in which we live" (1863); and six years later: "There is abroad a strange consciousness of doubt, instability and incoherence." People, said Morley, had the "hurried, uneasy mien" of those who live "amid earthquakes...all is doubt, hesitation and shivering expectancy".

CC-0. In P... Collection. ...seum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

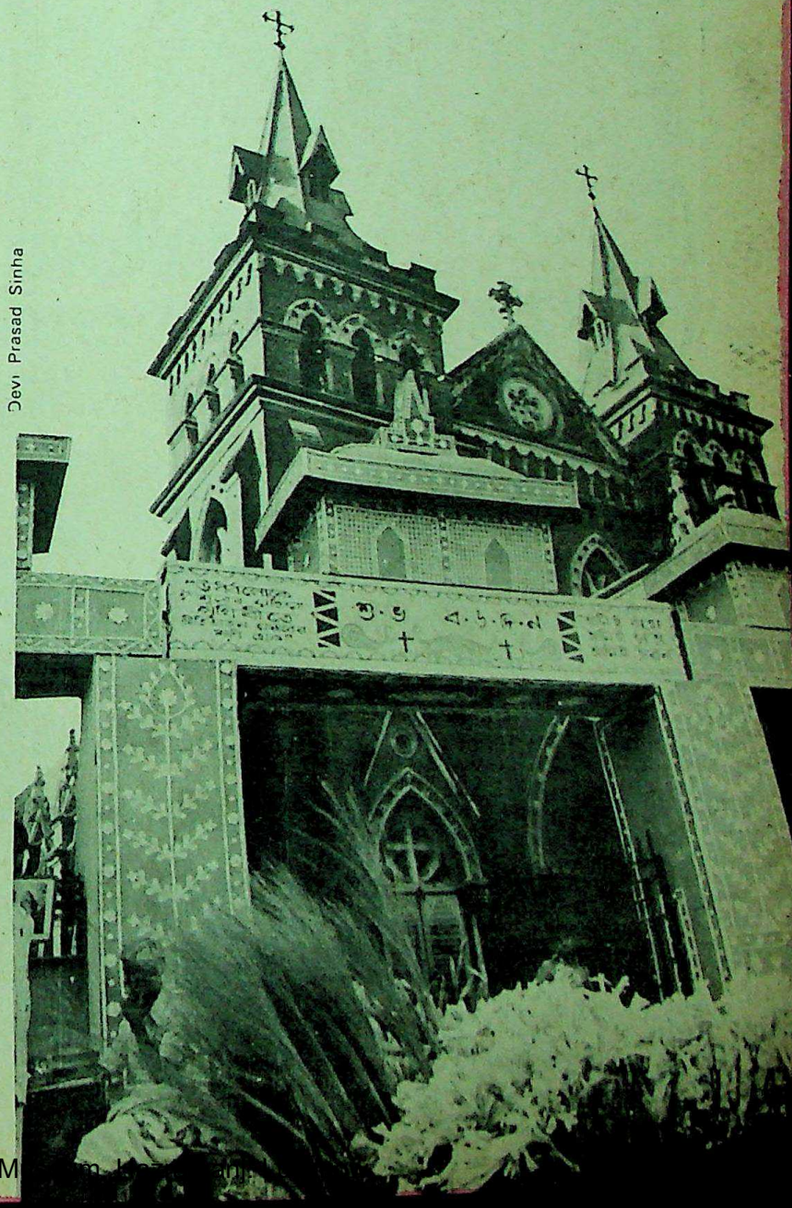
Yet it is an illusion that "progress" and "secularisation" inevitably go hand in hand. Such was the fear of Pio Nono; and, at the other end of the spectrum, the hope of Holyoake and Bradlaugh. But progress has always been a two-edged sword. In the 16th century printing led to the expansion of faith, as well as its contraction. While the scientists of the 1850s and 1860s were forcing theologians to reconsider Genesis, the new railways were reviving the mass-pilgrimages of the Middle Ages and so re-establishing the Ultramontain papacy—just as, today, cheap jet-flights have universalised the journey to Mecca and rekindled the fervour of Islam.

Looking back from the vantage point of 1979, we find it is the slogans of the anti-Christians that have worn badly. "Theological religion", wrote Voltaire in 1764, "is the enemy of mankind." I doubt if anyone thinks that today. In The Martyrdom of Man Winwood Reade insisted that "the destruction of Christianity is essential to the interests of civilisation." Who would now agree with him? Renan laid down that history could prove "beyond possibility of contradiction" that Christianity was not "a supernatural fact". We still await such evidence. The more positive statements of the Victorian atheists stand up no better. Thus, Karl Vogt: "Thoughts come out of the brain as gall from the liver or urine from the kidneys." Jakob Moleshoot: "No thought without phosphorus." Huxley said that the thoughts he was uttering were "the expression of molecular changes in my body". Tyndall believed that all of life was "once latent in a fiery cloud". Taine said "Man is a spiritual automation...Vice and virtue are products like sugar and vitriol." Littre, in his dictionary (1858) defined "soul" as "anatomically, the sum of functions of the neck and spinal column" and "physiologically, the sum of functions of the power of perception in the brain". Haeckel, by contrast, asserted "We now know that...the soul (is) a sum of plasma-movements in the ganglion-cells." All these men were highly respected intellectuals in their time.

THE trouble with these science-based systems of belief was that they inevitably tied themselves to a transient view of nature; their god got out of date and died too. The 'advanced thinkers' of the 19th century both overestimated and underestimated the potentialities of science. Comte offered as an example of unattainable knowledge the chemical composition of the stars; the conventional scientific wisdom was that atoms were immutable and to suppose wisdom was alchemy; but it also assumed that natural science advanced by a series of steadily improving approaches to the truth. Few grasped that the new knowledge would progressively raise as many problems as it solved. Thus the new "alternative religions" were founded on illusion, and their pathology underlined Newman's claim in The Idea of a University: "True religion is slow in growth and, when once planted, is difficult of dislodgement; but its intellectual counterfeit has no root in itself; it springs up suddenly, it suddenly withers." Comte ended up reading The Imitation of Christ, while his followers splintered under the impact of odium theologicum; Wells, a great peddler of science-based systems in his day, spent the last year of his life painting a mural depicting evolution on the wall behind his house in Hanover Terrace: the final panel showed horned devils, and beneath Man he wrote: "Time to go".

The only one of these alternative religions to survive (so far) is Marxism, thanks to its adoption as a state faith. It was close to Positivism in that it analysed history according to laws of evolutionary determinism—the notion of social laws similar to scientific ones was common to all these intellectual systems. Like his master, Feuerbach, Marx thought religion a social phenomenon: "Religion has no content of its own and does not live from heaven but from earth, and falls automatically with the dissolution of the inverted reality whose theory it is" (1842). It is "the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world, the soul of a soulless environment. It is the opium of the people" (1843). It enables us to bear what would otherwise be unbearable; and because it makes the sickness of society bearable it removes the motives for curing and the will to cure. Marx saw Judaism in terms of opium (a fashionable analogy in the 1840s because of the Opium War), but he hated Christianity more because it encouraged the vice he detested most, servility: "The social principles of Christianity preach cowardice, self-contempt, abasement, submission, dejection, all the qualities of the canaille."

The stigmatisation of religion as a form of social control was not new. Throughout the 18th century, there had been constant talk, among rebels against the Ancien Regime, of strangling the last king with the entrails of the last priest; and it was a cynical commonplace among well-to-do rationalists not to discuss atheism in front of the servants lest they steal the spoons. Voltaire called religion "the salutary yoke". Some Christians, like Kingsley, conceded the point. Marx's analysis at one end of the political spectrum was echoed by Archdeacon Wordsworth at the other: "What, Gentlemen, is Conservatism? It is the application of Christianity to civil government...I say it with reverence: the most Conservative book in the world is the Bible" (1865). But equally, others had pointed out the demonstrable fact that the system of social control (if that was what religion was) plainly did not work. Such was Milton's view: he saw among the Mob (1673) nothing but "Pride, Luxury, Drunkenness, Whoredom, Cursing, Swearing, bold and open atheism everywhere abounding." And Swift said he was "not of the least of opinion with those, who hold



Devi Prasad Sinha

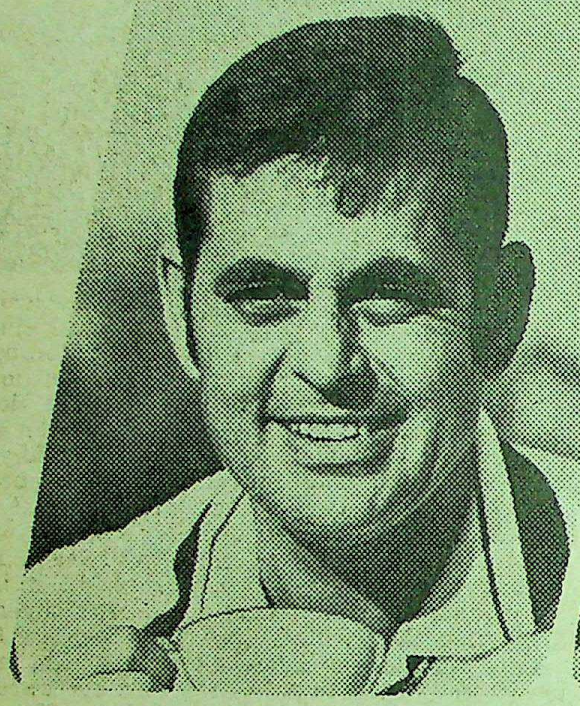
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State M

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Like father, like son!

"You call it Maltova now. But it's been with me ever since my first tennis years..."

says Premjit Lall, Davis Cup veteran, one of India's foremost tennis players.



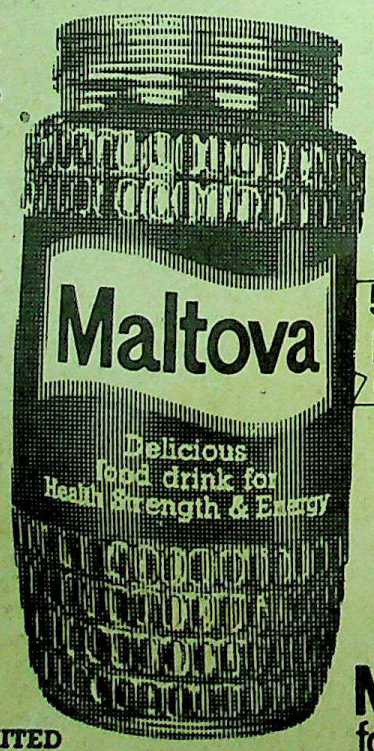
"Maltova and tennis– both run in the family blood!"

adds Dev Lall, Premjit's son, India's promising new tennis entrant.

Maltova
The delicious energy drink for an action-packed life.

Premjit Lall, Dev Lall, Illustrious father, illustrious son. Generations bound together by undying family traditions like love for tennis, zest for action and that special taste of what is now MALTOVA.

And, like Premjit, Dev too knows that MALTOVA'S body-building proteins, health sustaining vitamins and minerals make for an active body. Give that extra burst of energy to succeed And emerge the winner. No wonder, Premjit has a Davis Cup record that covers 17 illustrious years ! And Dev is on the threshold of an exciting tomorrow.



500gms
Rs.13.99
Local Taxes Extra

ASP/JIL-10-23.16

JiL JAGATJIT INDUSTRIES LIMITED

Maltova
for that special taste of success

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

religion to have been the invention of politicians, to keep the lower part of the world in awe, for fear of invisible powers...For I look upon the many or the body of our people here in England, to be as freethinkers, that is to say staunch unbelievers, as any of the highest rank". In Marx's own day, social workers reported that the proletariat scoffed Hell. Among those most in need of the opium, religion had little impact: regular churchgoing was a sign, rather, of upward social progress, and Hellfire sermons were particularly popular. Hell worked best with children, which tended to confirm Comte's "law" rather than Marx's.

NEEDLESS to say, the Marxist assumption that religion would disappear with capitalism has proved false. I find it hard to accept that Marx himself actually believed in such an outcome, though one has to remind oneself that in his day a great many intellectuals agreed that theism in any form could not long survive the hammer blows of science. Marx was descended from rabbis on both sides and was saturated in Biblical determinism; in his case, naturally, it was disembodied from Revelation and so took the form of a rationalised superstition. If Comte rewrote the Sermon on the Mount, Marx produced a weirdly radicalised Deuteronomy. I am inclined to agree with Renan when he said that one should never believe a German who claims he is an atheist. And, as Bacon argues, superstition is much worse than atheism as a public theory; "Atheism leaves a man to sense, to philosophy, to natural piety, to laws, to reputation; all which may be guides to outward moral virtue, though religion were not; but superstition dismounts all these, and erecteth an absolute monarchy in the minds of men." Bacon noted that a superstition degenerates faster than a new religion: it "bringeth in a new primum mobile, that ravisheth all the spheres of government...and in all superstition, wise men follow fools; and arguments are fitted to practise, in a reversed order." That is more or less what has happened to the Marxist faith.

The opium theory of Marx and others was, of course, an early example of reductionism applied to religion: a set of beliefs was explained in terms of something quite different, and so explained away. All forms of reductionism rest on the assumption that there is an essential difference between the proclaimed content of a set of religious beliefs, and its real but hidden content; and that the reality can be discovered by psychoanalysis, psychology, anthropology, sociology and so forth. Now one of the difficulties about these various forms of reductionism is that they are not complementary, but mutually exclusive. Freud thought that religion, like war, was the product of infantile neurosis. This, and other psychological explanations of religion are false, according to the sociologists, because they are based upon the notion that individuals form society, whereas in fact society forms individuals. Thus Durkheim laid down the axiom that a psychological explanation of a social fact is always wrong because a social fact is the creation of many minds. But the best Durkheim himself had to offer was that religion was a form of worship of society: beliefs reflect (and cement) social bonds: "The moral efficacy of the rite, which is real, leads to belief in its physical efficacy, which is imaginary." The fallacy in Durkheim's argument is that it applies equally well to moral and political beliefs, which he claims are real. And the sociological explanation, in turn, is contradicted by the anthropological form of reductionism, which sees primitive religion as a type of knowledge based upon ignorance of natural causes: I doubt if many now find this line of argument, which derives from Frazer, very plausible; it was effectively demolished by Wittgenstein. As Noel Annan put it, the Golden Bough, designed as 'an ironical epitaph on Christianity', is nowadays 'one of the most beautiful ruins in the history of thought'.

These various and contradictory forms of reductionism have in common the notion that the important question to ask about religion is not "Is that belief true?" but "Why does anyone have that belief?" Or, more politely, "What makes you believe that?" But true religious belief is irreducible: it does not say anything except itself, and it is not explicable in terms of any academic discipline. This fairly obvious truth has been obscured by the emergence of Christian reductionists, who seek to make religious belief intellectually respectable by demythologising it. This form of theological enquiry is essentially fugative, since its viewpoint is anthropocentric —it discusses God purely in terms of the way man sees him—and human fashions date quickly. The Honest to God line has already been elbowed aside by the Myth of Christ Incarnate, and that in turn is a rapidly fading memory. But Christian reductionism is more than academic fashion: it harbours the real danger of turning religion into something autonomous, or rather man-controlled into a purely human form of cultural self-expression. Once religion is cut off from its external source it becomes capable of monstrous crimes, as are secular superstitions like Marxism. "Religionless Christianity", to use Bonhoeffer's term, produces an agregious form of sin, in which religion becomes an internal dialogue in our minds, self-centred, self-regarding and self-justifying. Thus demythologising rapidly breeds (say) "Liberation Theology" and in turn murder in the name of Christ. This was the error of the Zealots, and the Crusaders.

Tapan Das

An alternative manner in which Christians seek to modernise theology is to reverse the process of scientific explanation and restore theology to its old position as Queen of the Sciences. This is a more profitable venture than it might seem at first glance. In one sense, theology (or metaphysics) is always necessary to supply gaps in our knowledge and our ability to explain things—gaps which are seen to be bigger, not smaller, than they appeared in Victorian times. Theology only seems to be unnecessary when, as in the 19th and early 20th century, the intellectual elite is under the illusion that it possesses a sufficient nontheological explanation of the universe. God returns when theory fails, just as, at an emotional level, religion comes to the rescue when we are miserable or frightened: God can serve as an intellectual as well as a physical opium. In some ways, for example, Einstein accepted theology as a science. What he called "the mystery of the world's comprehensibility" inspired in him "profound faith". Science, he wrote, was "blind" without religion. He defined scientific knowledge as a series of "primary concepts" or "fundamental relations" which are directly and intuitively connected with experience; all other scientific notions are connected to this basis by theorems. Our knowledge of God cannot be abstracted and expressed in theorems: it is direct and intuitive.

SO Far so good. Where the argument, so it seems to me, becomes risky is when the "scientific" approach to God is linked to particular developments in knowledge. Thus, Professor Torrance, in God and Rationality (Oxford 1971), argues that theology has been 'harassed' by the 'imperialism of mechanistic concepts, emanating from a dogmatic empiricism, end-products of the Newtonian era of science'. It is a mistake, he says, to see "a rigidly mechanistic concept of physics" as "the model of all true science". On the contrary, "the hard concept of determinism and idealisation of mechanical explanation, after

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Give Ambiqueen Sarees the total test...

Check the fabric:
The texture and weave of the fabric is what gives it good wearing qualities.

Check the finish:
A smooth finish is what makes the fabric feel nice...next to you.

Check the design:
Designs could be contemporary or classic – with an accent on the changing fashions.

Check the quality:
Make sure of the composition of the blend, the fastness of colours and its wash-n-wear properties.

Check the price:
Analyse and satisfy to yourself that you are getting your money's worth.

Check the name:
The final and often the only thing you need to check. 'AMBICA'— the name that carries the stamp of quality.

'AMBIRISED®'
PRE-SHRUNK FABRIC

Shri Ambica Mills

Bidhan-AG-40A

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

the emergence of quantum mechanics and the breakdown of the old principle of causality, is a strange anachronism." He thinks that "a more adequate understanding of science ...will help to deliver theologians from their fear of it", and he suggests that Field Theory can be a fruitful analogy for the way in which the existence and workings of God can be demonstrated.

No doubt it can, but as analogy only; and analogies like pictures of God, get out of date. In the 18th century, progressive bishops saw the universe as a clock, and God as the primal clockwinder. Hume destroyed the notion, simply by changing the metaphor, in a single sentence: "The whole presents nothing but the idea of a blind nature, impregnated by a great vivifying principle, and pouring forth from her lap, without discernment or parental care, her maimed and abortive children." Nor do I think theologians should rejoice that physics has been obliged to break free from an immutable logico-causal relation; after all, theology is not primarily an exercise in physics: it is an exercise in history. Cosmology is relevant to religion only in so far as it provides a satisfactory cosmogony. We need to know how it all happened in the first place. For, to use a deductive principle of Lord Peter Wimsey's "Once you know how, you know who."

OF course in each age theology has to be restated in terms which contemporaries respect. But a theology which involves itself with Field Theory or any other scientific theory is bound to prove ephemeral. The notion that religion must somehow keep pace with science seems to me a 19th century fallacy. As Darwin observed: "Science has nothing to do with Christ, except in so far as the habit of scientific research makes a man cautious in admitting evidence." It is tempting, nonetheless, to pounce upon a cosmological explanation as confirming the theistic notion of a "first event".

Listening not long ago to a radio talk on the first few minutes in the history of the universe, I was startled by the familiarity: not so very different from the first chapter of Genesis. It is argued that the discovery of microwave background radiation provides virtually incontrovertible proof that there was a big bang in which the universe formed; it is also argued that it may have appeared out of a vacuum, and expanded from a zero-radius point. But we cannot yet prove that the universe is a unique happening, as theology would seem to demand. It may be, as Dr Edward Tryon puts it (Nature, 1973, 393) that "Our universe is simply one of thousands that happen from time to time." Cosmology, as an exact science, is in its infancy; and, as Professor J. D. North points out in his history of modern cosmology, we have not yet succeeded in defining the notion of "universe" scientifically, since any description ties it to current scientific belief and makes it an impermanent entity.

Objective knowledge is some kind of compound of observation and logic. But our observation of the universe is provisional only, and we are beginning to realise that logic, too, is unstable. In Kant's day, all seemed firm: "There are but few sciences that can come into a permanent state, which admits of no further alteration. To these belong logic and metaphysics.... We do not require any new discoveries in logic since it contains merely the form of thought." As recently as 1940, a leading logician wrote: "Dictators may be powerful today, but they cannot alter the laws of logic, nor indeed can God do so."

But this was to tempt providence. There are now many deviant logics: many-valued logics, intuitionist logic, minimum logic, quantum logic, tense logic, deonitic logic and so on. On changing logics (for example, the "law of the excluded middle") Professor Quine writes: "What difference is there in principle between such a shift and the shift whereby Kepler succeeded Ptolemy, or Einstein Newton, or Darwin Aristotle?" It may well be that some of the "necessary truths" of classical logic may turn out to be wrong for empirical reasons: and perhaps we should regard classical logic as a mere theory (though of a general kind) on a par with other scientific theories. New notational or modal logics seem to breed like reactors. In his examination of the Lewis-Modal systems, Professor Zeman writes: "One gets the uneasy feeling as one discerns and studies more of the systems belonging to this family, that it is literally a family, and has the power of reproducing and multiplying, proliferating new systems without limit".

Such discoveries need not make us uneasy; the cautionary tale of the Medieval schoolmen, and their all-embracing systems, has long ago revealed that logic is a delusory instrument. But empirical knowledge, as we are now learning, is also capable of a baseless triumphalism. The road to belief, once found, can be lit up by logic and science, but the discovery must be our own. It is an individual act, and even when we are aware it has taken place, we may not be able to describe it, I am impressed by the number of gifted writers, from Augustine to Newman, who completely fail to conjure up for us the actual moment of acceptance; there is always a missing page in such confessional autobiographies. The loss of faith is equally vaguely described: What might be called the Dover Beach Syndrome occurs only sometime after the strickening event. My explanation, a variant of the theory of grace, is that the connection (or disconnection) between God and man is always an interior one; it can be recognised but not described. Belief in God is intuitive; and such intuition is the consequence of grace — grace made real, almost manifest, in the mind of man. The road to grace is through prayer. If, therefore, anyone asks me: "Does it make sense to pray to a God in which I do not believe?", I answer: "Yes, it does." Francis Thompson makes the point more eloquently:

Not where the wheeling systems darken, And our benumbed conceiving soars/ The drift of pinions, would we hearken,/ Beats at our own clay-shuttered doors./ The angels keep their ancient places;/ Turn but a stone, and start a wing!/ 'Tis ye, 'tis your estranged faces,/ That miss the many splendoured thing. ■

(By arrangement with the "New Statesman")

æ

Sales Executives

Ananda Bazar Group of Publications wish to recruit representatives and executives for their Advertisement and Circulation Departments to be located at Calcutta, Bombay, Delhi and Madras.

Candidates should be graduates with 2-3 years of selling experience of consumer products. Experience in publishing industry will be preferred.

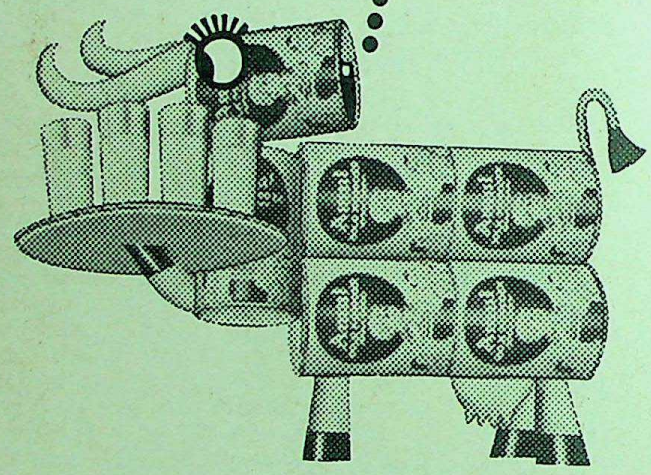
In addition to an attractive salary, benefits include HRA, LTA, Medical and Bonus. Retirement benefits include PF, Gratuity.

Applications in strict confidence giving details of age, qualifications, experience, salary drawn etc may be sent within 15 days to the Personnel Manager, Ananda Bazar Group of Publications, 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street, Calcutta 700 001.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

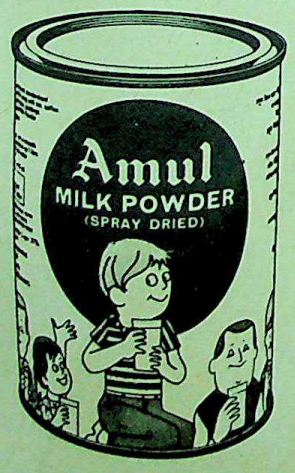
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Here's Amul Milk for your family



Put 2½ heaped tablespoons of Amul Milk Powder into a ¼-litre tumbler. Stir into a smooth paste with a little warm water. Add hot water up to top and stir. Milk is now ready for drinking. Good for use in tea and coffee, and for making curds and desserts. Makes you thankful for its convenience. Guaranteed pure.

Amul
MILK POWDER
It's like having a dairy in your home

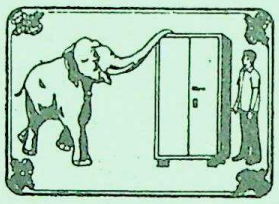


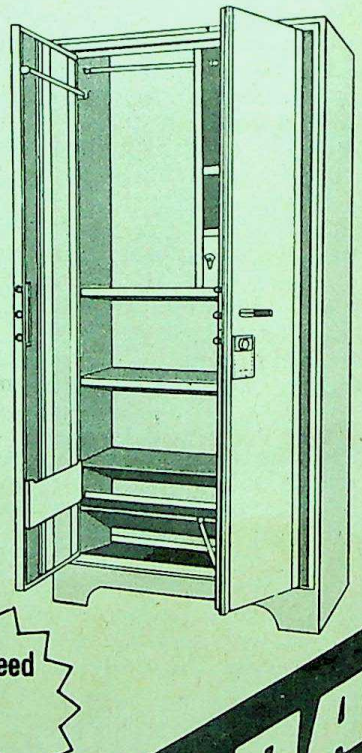
Marketed by:
Gujarat Co-operative Milk Marketing Federation Ltd., Anand.

When you think of SECURITY of valuables at your home

Remember

Safe-Deposit Almirah





Guaranteed for 5 years

RAJ & RAJ

18, Rabindra Sarani (Poddar Court) Calcutta-700 001.
Phone : 26-9443

OTHER SHOWROOMS :
28/3A, Gariahat Road, Calcutta-700 019. Ph. : 46-9539
Kamani Centre, Bishtupur, Jamshedpur

iaa 808

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The revolving door

WHEN the Congress Government collapsed in March, 1977, Mrs Gandhi at once became a non-person for the Fourth Estate, her existence to be ignored except for the passing snide remark. But several days after Chaudhury Charan Singh had assumed office. Akashvani, Doordarshan and our newspapers were still regaling us with approving dollops of Mr Morarji Desai's lofty strictures against the machinations of a Government of defectors in a display of loyalty to the fallen that was truly touching.

Mr Purushottam Kaushik, the new Informaion and Broadcasting Minister, may be tempted to point to this difference as revealing the change from his predecessor. "You will have a real free Press now" was, after all, among the new Prime Minister's earliest promises. It seems legitimate, therefore, to claim that released from the illiberal Janata regime's control, our free and fearless media is not afraid of voicing its misgivings about the ethics of the Chaudhury's achievement.

But this would be an oversimplification. A more accurate explanation for the deference with which newspapers continue to publicise Mr Desai's pronouncements is to be found in the close nexus between Press owners and the Janata leaders which was reflected also in the partisan manner in which the crisis was reported. The transgressions of radio and television were, not unnaturally, the subject of political complaints. But while the two official media were presumably operating under Mr L. K. Advani's instructions, newspapers gave vent to their own proprietorial attitude towards the disintegrating Janata Party and its never-say-die leader. Having created the Janata Government out of its opposition to Mrs Gandhi, our Press magnates were not prepared to let their handiwork perish without a struggle.

Hence the editorial anguish over the immorality of defections as if the phenomenon were new in India, introduced by Mr Charan Singh, and quite unknown to that personification of purity, Mr Morarji Desai. The bias of the Press was made known in those subtle ways that are part of the sub-editor's trade. What emerged was boundless sympathy for Mr Desai not inhibited too much by rational assessment of news value. That Mr Chavan had been asked to form a government merited only a modest double column headline in the Calcutta edition of The Statesman, while the paper's New Delhi issue buried it below the fold, giving far more prominence to a speculative story called "What next if Chavan fails" which must have baffled readers who had to scour the page to discover what he might fail at. It's hardly surprising that the Delhi Statesman lags behind all other papers published from the capital. Even Patriot displayed more realistic news sense with a lead story on the invitation.

No less biased was the Delhi edition of the Indian Express which on July 16 thought the Janata(S)'s claim to form a government merited a single column against the six columns showered on a similar claim by Mr Desai. When the President asked Messrs

Purshottam Lal Kaushik

Desai and Charan Singh to prove their majority, that too was given a one-column heading (July 24) though optimistic speculation about Mr Desai's chances boldly led the next day's paper.

The Express also gave wary readers a few interesting lessons in the use of quotation marks and attributive names. The straight heading "Janata to cut link with RSS", without quotation marks or a source, suggested clearly a statement of fact: there was nothing to indicate only an announcement by Mr Chandrashekhar without any mandatory force. But at that stage of desperation with Janata trying frantically to persuade defectors to re-defect, the Express undoubtedly felt obliged to help out its hard-pressed protege in 1 Safdarjang Road. If the delinking could be presented as an accomplished fact, some of those who had rallied round Mr Charan Singh's secular standard might even have returned to Mr Desai's fold.

There were other stories with which the Express clearly did not wish to be identified. "Reddy's duty to call Charan to form Govt." was one such: a heading that appeared within inverted commas plainly to indicate that it was only the opinion of Mr S. N. Mishra, unshared by anyone on the paper. No such fine distinctions impinged on the Express conscience when it reflected Mr Jagjivan Ram's views in headings on two days running—"Govt. will not last long" (July 29) and "Just a caretaker Govt." (July 30) appeared without quotation marks though admittedly with attribution.

It was reminiscent of the wry observation by General Booth, the Salvation Army founder, that he knew he had finally arrived when The Times, (now alas! still hibernating) like our own Times of India, first printed his military rank without inverted commas.

But while the Express, the Hindustan Times and the Statesman continued to wring their hands in despair, over the unprincipled manoeuvres on the New Delhi stage—without much mention of the Janata Party's own unsuccessful counter-manoeuvres—Abu's cartoons in the Express displayed none of the political squeamishness from which the paper's subs, reporters and leader-writers obviously suffered. They continued, impartially and delightfully, to take swipes at all the leading contenders.

Another honourable mention for Janardhan Thakur of the Business Standard who was probably (I am open to correction) the only reporter to discuss the buying and selling of M.P.s. Perhaps it is appropriate that this news should break in what is primarily a commercial publication: the Standard could usefully follow up its advantage with a more exhaustive survey of the finances of such operations. There cannot have been one on a grander scale and everyone is anxious to know the price of an MP.

Meanwhile, Mr Kaushik is proving his emancipation by demanding explanations of AIR. Mr Raj Narain, Mr Biju Patnaik and Mr Chavan all have complaints; all implicitly claim the right to pick up the telephone and give a dressing down to the radio executive unfortunate enough to answer the call. It may be the turn of the Press next. For nothing ever really changes in India. The revolving door just revolves. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

THERE is a well-known actress—call her a comedienne if you like—whose attitude and manners are worth being emulated, especially by her colleagues. Her off-screen joviality, for instance. Her name is Shammi. Recently, after her break-up with hubby producer Sultan Ahmed, the whole of filmland was up in arms against the man, all to her defence. Yet she maintained her innate goodness in the face of a lot of unfairness. Then when Sultan was down with a heart attack, Shammi would quietly go up to the hospital and inquire from the authorities about his progress. When she learnt that Sultan's new wife had been asked to keep away from him, with talk of a break-up between them in the air too, she began visiting him in his room and lunching with him daily, till he was well enough to go home. Folks thought it was a reconciliation, but no; Shammi was being plain foolish. When she found he didn't need her any more, she kept away too. She is happy with whatever roles come to her. Her only problem is producers, and fans aren't sure of whether she is in films or out. For those interested: she is very much back.

Matilal Mondal

Zaheera: a new role

Rishi: hair-raising difference

ASHA SACHDEV has a few kinky ideas about beauty and hair-care. But she is very possessive about them, it is said. Each time she tries out something new, she tells a person or two about her latest health-tip, and then gets bugged if anyone else has found out about it. If she is smart enough to devise curealls she should let the world know about them and feel proud about it—not pout in that mean way of hers.

BEATS me how that devil-may-care, tough little minx that Ranjeeta is, or rather was at the start of her career, feels about her name still being linked with Akbar Khan for whom, one can be sure, she still carries a torch, in the core of her heart—especially because of thickening rumours about her growing attachment to Mithun Chakravarty. Unless she is merely trying to turn Akbar on (like, make him feel jealous) or pull off a publicity gimmick, and is really getting involved with Mithun, Ranjeeta seems the type who would go in for a fling if she wasn't convinced she was doing the right thing.

A FAMILIAR face we won't be seeing any more in films is that of Zaheera, who, honest to herself at least, decided that the time she had spent on Hindi films and made good use of—eleven years—was enough. When she found she could not get beyond average roles, she decided to quit. Now she's back in London, her hometown, and has plans for some constructive work, like starting a magazine for the Pakistani and Indian youth settled there. Should be lucky this time.

IT'S a real pity Neelam Mehra's (remember the likeness of Simi who was annoyed if she was compared with her?) career did not go beyond a film or two. And then when you heard she was settling down to marry producer-actor Shiv Kumar, you thought she might, just as well. Her attempt at career-building did not succeed anyway. Now she is back to square one—with a broken marriage and a baby, and has already begun trying to get into films all over again. Knowing filmworld, it's going to be tough for Neelam, unless she compromises with the roles they are going to offer her—with the flood of aspirants we have. She's only kidding herself about there being a dearth of good heroines, and the need for new faces. Her's is not new—but here's wishing her loads of luck.

WHAT'S this new hairstyle Rishi is sporting? His hair is done up with a longish, sleek look that makes him resemble Jeetendra, his bosom pal. What a comedown! I mean, both Jeetu and Chintu are Kapoors, all right, but there is a wide difference of class that sets one clan of Kapoors apart from the other. Why, oh, why did Chintu have to try looking like Jeetu, unless he was advised he would look a trifle taller with this new long hairdo (which he does look now, actually)? ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

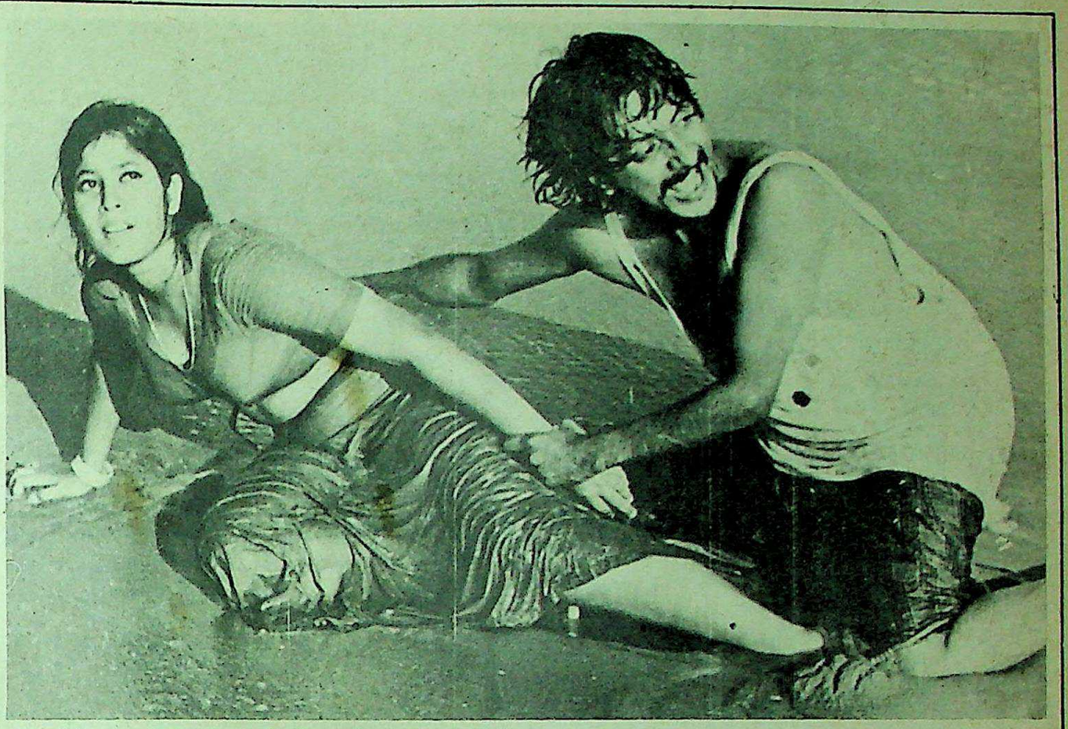
IT wasn't just Surekha's bosom which prompted him to sign her for his Malayalam venture Thakara says director Bharatan. She is a good actress too, he emphasises. But is that true? All that one saw in Thakara was Surekha's uninhibited anatomical gyration and generous display of her cleavage.

Surekha started working for Thakara even before she finished her schooling at Madras' Holy Angels Convent. She plays a frustrated young woman who learns the facts of life not by observing bees and birds, but by watching her father's stud-bull being used to cover the village cows! She casts her amorous glance in all directions but unfortunately, the village carpenter, who she dislikes, takes interest in her; but the person who gets her in the end is the village moron, Thakara, a rolling stone, who people think will never look at a woman.

As Thakara, Pratap Pothen has come up with a convincing performance: a graduate from the Madras Christian College, Pothen made his debut in Bharatan's Aaravam and currently he's acting in six films. "In the first film, I played a loser. My wife ran away with the bus-conductor," Pratap recalls. "And in Thakara I go to sleep with the woman but I lose her in the end..." Well, it's good to know Pratap has six films on hand, but if he goes around accepting films in which the accent is on the heroine's thighs and breasts, people may not really notice him.

THE next time Padmini Kapilla disappears from Bombay, gossip columnists needn't think that she's on one of her trips to the Middle East. She's appearing in a Malayalam film, Chithalukal being directed by Bharatan. She plays the mistress of a businessman who compels her to sleep with men who'd help his business to flourish.

Bharatan is yet another Malayalam director who has imported a Bombay actress. But getting Kapilla to act in the Malayalam film shouldn't have posed any problem at all: she certainly doesn't have many films on hand. Would he be making her strip for the film like he did with Surekha in Thakara? I asked Bharatan. This one is going to be a sober film, he assured me. But you never know, he may change his mind; and Padmini, who refused to show her panties in a Mohan Segal film, could have become bolder now.



Surekha and Pratap Pothen in "Tharaka".

THE panel which selected South Indian films to be sent to international film festivals consisted of 15 members drawn from all the four southern States. But as it happened, only six members turned up, and it was dominated by Telugu speaking people; P. Pullaiah, the veteran film maker who was its chairman, actresses Jamuna and Sowcar Janaki and writer Arudra, an enlightened soul. But "Daddy" Pullaiah conducted the proceedings like a school headmaster and was primarily responsible for the selection of jejune, sick Telugu films like Pranam Kareedu and Chali Cheemelu. There were some interesting Malayalam films: Ashwathamma and Yaro Oral, slow moving existentialist stuff but "Daddy" Pullaiah didn't even think of sending them upto Delhi where the central committee could see them. "Well, I may be in the mud, but I have been asked to judge these films" he remarked candidly. Next time, the festival directorate should insist that at least 10 panel members should attend the screening.

VANI GANAPATHY is amused that some people should believe the story that she doesn't want husband Kamalahasan to act in Hindi films just because she couldn't make any progress in Bombay! Well, for one thing, Kamalahasan just cannot give up his film assignments down South: conservative estimate has it that he has 30 films on hand. And as a matter of fact, Bombay producers haven't shown much interest in him. There was talk that Messrs N. C. Sippy and Hrishikesh Mukherjee would remake the Kannada hit Kokila and cast Kamalahasan. But nothing has materialised as yet. Balu Mahendra, the director, too has been thinking of remaking it in Hindi with Kamalahasan and Shoba but it has been in the planning stage for over a year. Incidentally, Meeta Meeti Baaten, the dubbed version of Kamalahasan's Tamil hit, Manmatha Leelai did reasonably well all over North India: yet Bombay producers are not taking interest in him.

FOR his Kanchana Seetha (Malayalam), filmmaker Arvindan used Andhra tribals to act in the film. Interestingly the result wasn't disappointing at all. Arvindan has the genius to spot real talent: in his newest Malayalam film, Kumatty, an enjoyable fairy-tale he has picked up dancer Ramunni and extracted a delightful performance from him.

Kumatty is a popular fantasy figure of many folk songs in Kerala and often grandmothers frighten children by invoking Kumatty's name. And one day there emerges on the scene, across the expansive prairie lands down the hills, along the winding footpath, shrouded by shrubbery, the dark, bearded, dancing Kumatty with the 'totem pole', held horizontally across his shoulder. And in direct contrast to the Kumatty of lore, this real-life Kumatty is a fun-loving, free man who teaches the children how to come alive. Kumatty has already been released in pockets of Kerala and has received modest box-office success: Like good wine, it ought to travel well beyond the borders of Kerala.

PIOUSJI

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Come alive with freshness

Totally different LIRIL. Rippled green with the exciting freshness of limes. Tangy, tingling LIRIL ...makes a fresh new woman of you.

Liril
THE FRESHNESS SOAP

with the exciting freshness of limes

LINTAS-LR. 27-2416

A Quality Product by HINDUSTAN LEVER

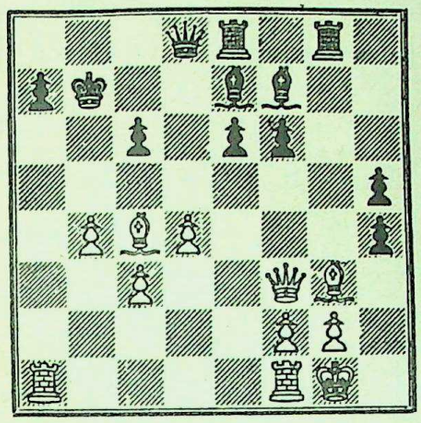
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

VARIETY

chess

Rogoff (Black)



Larsen (White) to play
Position after Black's 22nd move

Lone Pine time

This week marks the beginning of the annual Louis D. Statham tournament in Lone Pine, California. A nine-round tournament played under the Swiss system does not sound like anything very special even if it is played at a rate of one round per day. However, if you want to play you need a US rating of over 2,400 (that's equivalent to a British rating of 225!). The fact is that Lone Pine is the strongest chess tournament in the world. Last year's entry totalled 68, of whom nearly 30 were grandmasters, including such names as Petrosian, Polugaevsky, Portisch, Timman, Larsen. . .not to mention nearly all the top names in American chess. Many countries sent small 'teams' of players, including England, who were represented by Miles, Stean, Mestel, Speelman and Taulbut.

What attracts so many leading players to Lone Pine? Ask any competitor and he will tell you about the Californian sunshine and the fresh mountain air (Lone Pine is some 5,000 feet above sea level and only a few miles from Mount Whitney, the highest peak in North America). He might incidentally mention the prize fund. Last year first place was worth $12,000 and this year it is going up to $15,000 (the positive side of inflation?). Such rewards may be approaching respectability for tennis players or golfers, but for chessplayers they are astronomical.

Eventual winner last year was Larsen, who after losing to Speelman in the first round nonchalantly collected 7½ points in the remaining eight rounds to take first place. He will be trying to repeat his success this year, but the opposition is expected to be stronger than ever. There is a good possibility that even Korchnoi may be playing.

Here is Larsen's last round game, which won him the massive first prize. Not a hint of nerves from the Danish grandmaster who polished off his opponent inside two hours.
White: B. Larsen. Black: K. Rogoff
Caro-Kann Defence
1. P—K4, P—QB3; 2. P—Q4, P—Q4; 3. N—QB3, P x P; 4. N x P, N—Q2; 5. N—KB3, KN—B3; 6. N x N+, N x N; 7. N—K5, N—Q2. Passive, but the theoretical continuation 7. . . B—B4; 8. P—QB3, P—K3; 9. P—KN4! is very strong for White.
8. B—KB4, N x N; 9. B x N, Q—N3; 10. B—Q3! P—B3. 10. . . Q x NP; 11. O—O would leave Black dangerously behind in development.
11. B—N3, B—K3; 12. Q—K2, B—B2; 13. O—O, P—K3. Here 13. . . Q x QP; 14. QR—Q1, followed by B—B5 is murderous.
14. P—B3, O—O—O; 15. B—QB4, R—K1; 16. P—QN4, P—KR4; 17. P—KR4, R—N1; 18. Q—B3, B—K2; 19. P—R4, P—N4, 20. P—R5, Q—Q1; 21. P—R6. Decisive. Black's queenside defences are destroyed.
21. . . P x KRP; 22. P x P+, K x P [DIAGRAM] 23. R x P+!, resigns. After 23. . . K x R, 24. Q x QBP, there is no defence to the threats of Q—R6 mate and R—R1+

Castle while you can

Played in Poland, 1974.
White: Kostro. Black: Adamski.
Sicilian Defence.
1. P—K4, P—QB4; 2. N—KB3, P—Q3; 3. P—Q4, P x P; 4. N x P, N—KB3; 5. N—QB3. P—QR3; 6. B—K2, P—K3; 7. B—K3, Q—B2; 8. P—B4, P—QN4; 9. P—QR3, B—N2; 10. B—B3, QN—Q2; 11. Q—K2, R—B1; 12. P—KN4, P—K4; 13. N—B5, P—N3; 14. N—N3, P x P; 15. B x P, N—K4; 16. P—N5, KN—Q2; 17. B—N2, B—N2; 18. N—B1? (O—O!), N—B5; 19. N—Q5, B x N; 20. P x B dis ch, K—B1; 21. P—B3, N x NP; 22. K—B2, N—B4; White resigns.

MICHAEL STEAN

bridge

THE semi-final of the Spingold, America's main team event, had a dramatic finish. With two boards to go in one of the matches, Brachman, the more fancied team, was 16 points down to Martel. This was board 62

Dealer, South. N-S vulnerable

	♠ Q 5 ♥ A J 8 6 2 ♦ A K J 9 ♣ A .
♠ K 7 ♥ Q 10 9 7 5 ♦ Q 8 6 3 2 ♣ 7	N W E S	♠ 9 8 3 2 ♥ 3 ♦ 7 ♣ Q 10 9 5 4 3 2
	♠ A J 10 6 4 ♥ K 4 ♦ 10 5 4 ♣ K 8 6

At the first table the Martel team bid with too much exuberance

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
Freisner	Passell	Lebensold	Kantar
No	No	1♥	4♣
dble	No	5♣ (1)	No
6♠ (2)	No	7♣ (3)	No
7♥	No	No	No

(1) These sequences are not too well chartered, and no doubt he was afraid that Four Diamonds might not be treated as forcing
(2) He had a difficult bid now, because his partner had invited a slam and there wasn't much room in which to select the best contract. Perhaps 5NT would have been a good natural bid, but it might have been interpreted as a grand slam try in hearts.
(3) Here, too, there was much to be said for 6NT.

Seven Hearts was two down. This, at the state of the match, would not have been a disaster but for a sad misjudgment at the other table

SOUTH	WEST	NORTH	EAST
Goldman	Stansby	Soloway	Martel
No	No	1♥	4♣
dble	No	6♦ (1)	No
No	dble(2)	6NT	No
No	dble	No	No
No

(1) This seems precipitous and inferior to Five Clubs or 4NT
(2) The sort of mistake whose recollection you carry with you to the grave; if opponents are going to fail in Six Diamonds you don't need 200 in place of 100, especially when you have entered the last quarter 26 points ahead.

Six Notrumps was easy to make. The Martel team lost 18 points on the board, and a further 6 on the last board.

The main lesson to be drawn from the bidding is that, after an opponent's pre-empt, 4NT and 5NT should be natural, not conventional. A notrump contract is so often desirable, because suits tend to break badly.

TERENCE REESE

stamps

ALTHOUGH Britain has never done so, many countries have issued special stamps intended for use only on airmail correspondence. Some of those issued in small quantities for specific flights, such as the overprinted stamps provided by Newfoundland between 1919 and 1933 for several of the early west-to-east transatlantic crossings, are now very rare. Among the more recent rarities are two Dutch stamps issued in 1951 for general airmail use. With face values of 15 and 25 guilders (then about £4), they were neglected by collectors. A lightly mounted mint pair in a Phillips auction recently realised £280.

C.W. HILL

quiz

QUESTIONS

1. What was the Abdication Crisis ?
2. When and where was the term 'concentration camp' first applied ?
3. What was the Duma ?
4. What is graphomania ?
5. Who wrote the national sea-song of England, "Rule Britannia"?

ANSWERS

1 The crisis that arose in December, 1936, from the desire of King Edward VIII to marry a commoner, Mrs Wallace Simpson.
2. In the Boer War, to the camps in which civilians were interned by Kitchener
3. The name of the Russian Parliament created by Nicholas II after the 1905 revolution.
4. An obsessive urge to write, indicative of some mental disorder.
5. James Thomson (1700-1748).

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Beginning August 12

This week Jupiter, Sun, Mercury and Venus are in Cancer. Saturn and Rahu are in Leo, Uranus is in Libra, Neptune is in Scorpio, Kethu is in Aquarius and Mars is in Gemini. The Moon will be moving through Taurus and Gemini from Aries.

ARIES (March 21 — April 20) This is a good week for artistic and intellectual pursuits. It would be however wise to keep an eye on expenditure. A secret association will bring happiness and if you are careful, your health too will make remarkable progress. Letters from both far and near will bring good news. This week is also good for love and romance. Refrain from playing with the law. Act discreetly. Good dates : 13, 14 and 18. Lucky numbers : 1 and 5. Favourable direction : South.

TAURUS .(April 21 — May 22) You will make new friends and also pick up new hobbies to pass your leisure time. The health of your family members will improve. The domestic scene will be a source of joy and happiness. You may change your profession in the near future. Artistic and intellectual pursuits will progress this week. You may undertake a journey. Some unexpected gains are also indicated. Good dates : 14, 16 and 18. Lucky numbers : 4 and 9. Favourable direction: North-west.

GEMINI (May 23 — June 21) Forge ahead on all fronts; stellar influences make this a very lucky period for you. You can even take a few risks. This is a time to make changes. Make new acquaintances and contacts with an eye on the future. You must however guard against impulsive actions. Avoid speculation. Your financial front improves radically. Good dates : 14, 15 and 16. Lucky numbers : 1 and 8. Favourable direction : West.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) This will be a week of mixed fortunes. Stellar influences indicate both losses and gains. You may be separated from the person you love and adore and health too may pose a problem. You will long for change and variety in your life. You must meet the challenge bravely. Good dates : 16, 17 and 18. Lucky numbers: 2 and 7. Favourable direction : South-west.

LEO (July 23 — August 22) The investments that you made in the past will prove beneficial now. You will earn the praise of your friends and relatives. Lawsuits and debts, if any, should not worry you. The domestic scene remains pleasant. New friends and hobbies will keep you occupied. Good dates : 12, 13, 14 and 15. Lucky numbers : 3 and 4. Favourable direction : North-east.

VIRGO (August 23 — September 22) Do not be careless in dealinig with professional matters. Eschew doutful relationships. Though luck may favour you, do not gamble. Women will be of great help to you this week. Your financial sitution will definitely improve. You may have to do a good bit of travelling this week. Letters will bring good news. Good dates : 12, 13, 16 and 18 Lucky numbers : 5 and 7. Favourable direction : West.

LIBRA .(September 23 — October 22) Your financial position will improve rapidly. You may even be promoted in the near future. A secret association will progress rapidly and prove beneficial for you. Businessmen should adopt original methods to reap maximum profit. All documents and letters should be read carefully and replies promptly sent. Love and romance are indicated. Good dates : 13, 14, and 15. Lucky numbers : 10 and 7. Favourable directions : North and East.

SCORPIO .(October 23 — November 21) The early part of this week brings about financial expansion. Employers and those in authority will prove cooperative and very helpful in the latter part of the week. You may be separated from a beloved one. You may also have to face the wrath of your close relatives. Letter will bring bad news from distant places. However do not lose heart; the next week will be better. Good dates : 11, 14, 15 and 17. Lucky numbers : 4 and 7. Favourable direction : South-west.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22 — December 22) This is a good week for love and romance. Letters may bring matrimonial offers. Luck will favour you at every step. Friendships made during this week will prove helpful in the future. Some people will shift residences. Your domestic problems are approaching a solution. You must maintain your status wisely; hasty steps may ruin everything at this juncture. Good dates : 12, 14, 16 and 18. Lucky numbers : 5 and 3. Favourable direction : North.

CAPRICORN . (December 23 — January 20) Your problems are not likely to be solved; they will drag on for some time more. For businessmen and politicians, this is an unlucky phase. Be very careful in your dealings with superiors and those in authority. You may have to postpone a journey due to unavoidable circumstances. Health will remain unsatisfactory and medical expenses will be incurred. Good dates : 14, 16 and 17. Lucky numbers : 2 and 3. Favourable direction : South

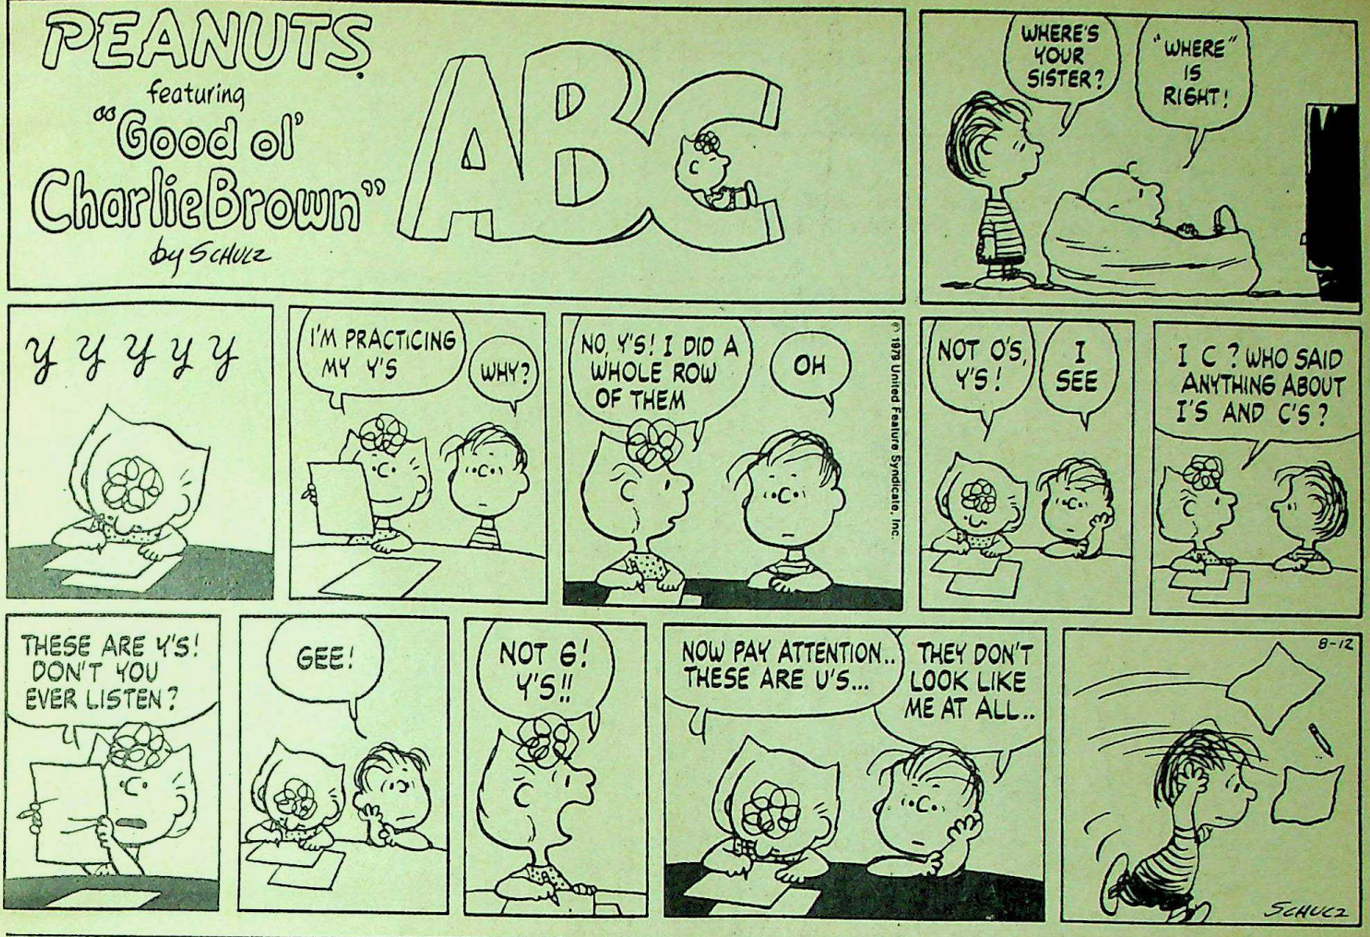
AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) A good week for matrimonial negotiations. The domestic scene remains peaceful; you are advised to spend more time at home with your family. New undertakings have bright prospects. For professionals and businessmen, letters will bring good news. Good dates : 12, 14, 16 and 17.Lucky numbers : 2 and 4. Favourable direction : East.

PISCES (February .20 — March 20) You will be attracted by new ventures. This may involve meeting business magnates. Exercise your wit and discretion in all business dealings. The financial front is bound to show rapid improvement. A new friendship will prove helpful. A good week for love and romance. Good dates : 12, 13, 14 and 19. Lucky numbers : 3 and 9. Favourable direction : South-east.

M. B. RAMAN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Are you
A YOUNG GENIUS?

Having an eye on All India Rank within the First Ten or atleast within the First Hundred in IIT Entrance Exam.

then you can ill-afford to do without
★THE YOUNG GENIUS' SUPPLEMENT being appended to

BRILLIANT'S POSTAL TUITION For IIT ENTRANCE '80

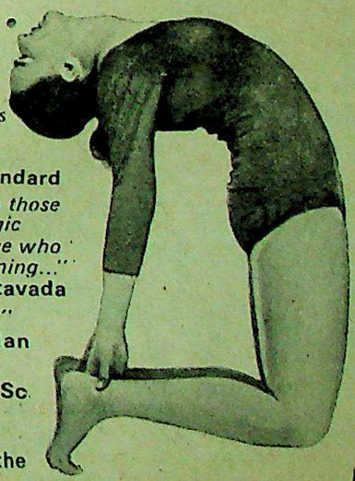
★A CHOICE COLLECTION OF 250 INTRICATE, INNOVATIVE PROBLEMS IN PHYSICS USUALLY THE DECIDING FACTOR IN IIT ENTRANCE EXAMINATIONS

BRILLIANT TUTORIALS
12, Masilamani Mudali St., T.Nagar
Madras-600 017. Phone: 442099

POSTAL TUITION ENROLMENT NOW ON

Yoga in daily life
Dr. K. S. Joshi

For Developing Physical, Mental & Spiritual Powers



"Gives clearly and concisely main points of the ancient philosophy of yoga... questions and answers on yoga add to the value of the book."
Sunday Standard

"Of immense value to those who already know yogic asanas as well as those who want to make a beginning..."
Hitavada

"A wonderful book!"
Voice of Man

The Author
Dr. K. S. Joshi M.Sc. M.A., Ph.D. is the Head of the Dept. of Yogic Studies, at the Univ. of Saugor

Fully Illustrated Rs. 5/-

ORIENT PAPERBACKS
Mail Order Division
KASHMERE GATE, DELHI-110006

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

PEOPLE WHO NEED HELP MOST

seldom
ask for it

Some people need a little push in life to get them going. Canara Bank is giving just that to thousands of people in towns, in villages. Suggesting a trade here, encouraging a skill there, setting someone up in business, creating opportunities where none existed.

Just a loan of money is not nearly enough. A total involvement is called for and ungrudgingly given at every one of Canara Bank's over 1180 branches all over the country. Each person helped along to better times is another tiny unit of progress in the nation's economic countdown.

SERVING TO GROW GROWING TO SERVE CANARA BANK

CANARA BANK
(Wholly owned by the Government of India)

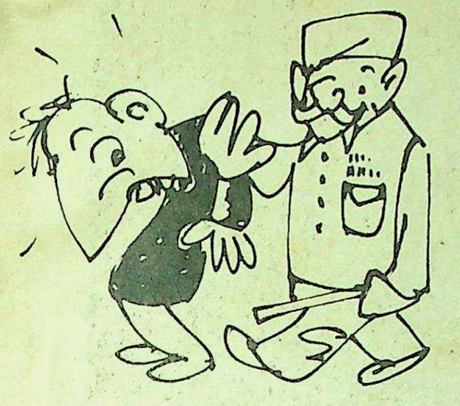
maa CB 12 A-79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

this india

prize rs. 30 for the entry given first



THANJAVUR : Mr C. Raghavan, Special Judicial Second Class Magistrate, handed over an Advocate, Selva Durai Pandian, to the police for alleged disorderly behaviour. Police said that according to the complaint the Advocate began to offer comments and shout in the Magistrate's court. Though the Magistrate warned him he was alleged to have continued to behave in a disorderly manner. The Magistrate asked the police to arrest him. The Advocate was alleged to have been in a drunken condition after examination by a doctor. The police arrested him and filed a case. Some Advocates represented to the Magistrate seeking his release. He told them that poor people were arrested for alleged drunkenness and in the eyes of the law everyone was equal and no lenience could be shown—The Hindu (S. Balakrishnan, Trichy)

ROHTAK : The crisis at the Centre seems to have affected the common man. On Saturday, July 21, three farmers from a nearby village, after getting drunk, started discussions on the national political scene in a shopping centre. Two of them were of the view that Mr Charan Singh should become Prime Minister while one thought Mr Jagjivan Ram was a better candidate. The discussion soon turned into a fight and the Charan Singh supporters gave a good beating to the third one. A big crowd gathered and the police were informed. When two policemen arrived, the two farmers attacked the policemen as well. They were severely beaten. Later, more policemen came and arrested the farmers.—Indian Express (P. Jain, Srujansarh)

GONDA : The eunuchs of this town have urged the President Mr N. Sanjiva Reddy to invite anyone of the leading members of their community to form Government at the Centre in order to resolve the present impasse. In a letter to the President they said as neutralists they would serve the nation without indulging in rivalry which had led the country to the brink of disaster. Moreover, the letter said since their cabinet would be comprised of eunuchs there would be no problems of corruption by sons and sons-in-laws of the Minister which is currently plaguing the political scene. The letter regretted the political opportunism which was cutting at the root of democracy in the country—Deccan Chronicle (B. Madhu, Andhra Pradesh)

KANPUR : A pesticide distributed by the Government to villagers came handy for a young couple to escape the pangs of hunger. 24-year-old Hori Lal, a casual farm labourer of Jalapur village had been ill for the last two months and without any food. On Monday, July 22, they took the fatal dose. The villagers discovered the bodies entwined together in their dilapidated hut today — Indian Express (Mrs Sarasa Raman, Bangalore)

NIZAMABAD : A father of three children chopped off the head of the six year daughter ostensibly to propitiate his family deity at Malapati village of Yellareddy Taluk. Chitti was sleeping in a room with her mother and the other children when Narasimha Reddy, her father, quietly picked her up at midnight. The next morning the girl's body along with the bloodstained clothes of the father were found lying nearby—Deccan Herald (S. Krishna Murthy, Bangalore)

india abroad

PORT OF SPAIN : Dr Bhawaalal Bhootra, an Indian physician has been sacked from his post at the Trinidad and Tobago General Hospital and given one month's time to leave. Dr Bhootra came to Trinidad just over three years ago from Engand to take up appointment as a pathologist at the hospital but was shortly after assigned the job of a forensic pathologist. Dr Bhootra ran into trouble following a murder case in which he gave evidence resulting in the acquittal of four persons charged with gunshot slaying. In the beginning of July, the Government appointed a commission of enquiry into the conduct and evidence given by Dr Bhootra and an Assistant Superintendent of Police, Mr Malcom Bobb. The commission cleared Mr Bobb but sharply criticised Dr Bhootra and suggested that he be given further training in forensics. The commission also recommended that Dr Bhootra's evidence should not be accepted —The Hindu

Illustrations/Ahi Bhusan Malik

without comment

HE (Morarji Desai) has got no future. He will die in another few years. He wanted to die as Prime Minister so that his son could tell everyone that his father died as PM- -Raj Narain

HOW CAN you do without politicians? How can the Government be run without politicians—Morarji Desai's reply to a question that people had lost all faith in the politicians

I HAD lived a life of judicial seclusion wherein the fluctuating fortunes of political Parties could have only an academic interest—H. R. Khanna on his resignation as Union Law Minister

FIFTEEN years ago you could discuss corruption and make that an issue. Today, it is accepted as a way of life—George Fernandes

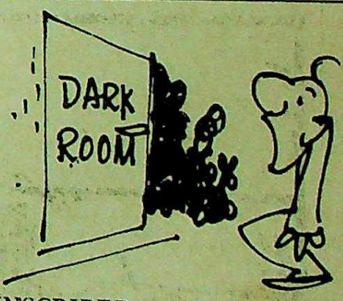
DEVARAJ Urs is an absolute non entity—C. M. Stephen

WE WILL arrest Kanti Desai...He (Morarji Desai) does not have a mind—how can he have a mental state—Raj Narain

I HAVE a dream of a world order where all people live together in peace. Now, I would like to be Prime Minister of that World Government—Charan Singh

WE ARE here to win everything —India's cricket captain Venkatraghavan's first public statement of the English tour

humour in real life



INSCRIBED on the door of a photographer's darkroom: "Please keep darkroom door closed. If it is left open all the dark leaks out"—Sudhakar, Rourkela.

A YOUNG engineer was filling in forms for himself and his wife to claim medical benefits from his company. Against 'Occupation', for his wife he was told to put down 'Housewife'. So when it came to the same item in the form for himself, he put down 'Husband'—Mandira Das Gupta, Calcutta.

prize rs. 30 for the entry given first and rs. 10 for the other items

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

DELHI DIARY

THE REAL THING

IT will hardly be unfair to Mr Samarendra Kundu, the last Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, to rename him "Mr Genuine Kundu". His fondness for the word "genuine" seems to be very genuine. He still argues that the Indian Government must retain the term "genuine nonalignment" instead of simply referring to "nonalignment". He has already written to the new Prime Minister, Charan Singh, expressing his shock over the fact that the Chaudhury dropped the word "genuine" when describing the country's foreign policy as nonaligned. Well, it was Mr Kundu really who started to use "genuine nonalignment", and he still thinks that the change that he effected was a positive shift. Perhaps if Mr Kundu has participated in the recent "genuine realignment" "genuine nonalignment" might still have been an article of faith with the present Government.

ACCEPTABLE TO NONE

DINESH SINGH has been an unknown commodity in the sharply divided Janata Party. The former member of Mrs Gandhi's kitchen cabinet in her heyday has been more than willing to take up the cook's job in the kitchen cabinets of the four Janata stalwarts: Mr Desai, Mr Ram, Mr Singh and Mr Chandrashekhar. But his application has been rejected by all four of them. During the recent Janata turmoil Mr Dinesh Singh was a frequent visitor at the residences of Mr Ram, Mr Desai and Mr Chandrashekhar. The story goes that what he learnt at the house of one he told the other two and what he learnt at the house of the other two he told the former. An endless circle of gossip and interested, motivated talk that kept the three apart from each other was in no small measure kept going by Dinesh Singh, looking for a steady patron who could bless him with a ministership.

STAR STRUCK

APART from the politicians and their hangers-on another tribe that had a field day during the recent political upheaval at the Centre was that of soothsayers, tantriks, astrologers and what have you in the realm of the mystical.

Dharm Vir Jayner

Mr. Raj Narain and Mr Charan Singh depended solely on two: Mr Chandra Swamy and a certain Kapoor of Lucknow. There was not a move in the intense political power struggle that was not timed by the two in accordance with the wishes of the astrologers. Finally when Mr Singh got the invitation to form the Government the swearing-in time of 1.30 pm was determined by Messrs. Chandra Swamy and Kapoor. No Prime Minister of the country had chosen the afternoon for swearing-in; it was always in the morning or sometime in the evening but Mr Singh insisted on 1.30 pm for it was declared "auspicious" by his soothsayers.

Meanwhile, President Sanjeeva Reddy, whose lunch and siesta routine was upset by Mr Singh's odd timings, in a way foiled the plans of the Prime Minister designate's astrologers. Mr Reddy administered the oath only at about 1.34 pm. Now, of course, the astrologers are finding out the auspicious day on which Mr Singh should summon the Lok Sabha to win the crucial confidence vote which can be, like the Prime Ministership, a touch-and-go affair.

SELF-CENSORSHIP

THE champions of free speech know exactly which side their bread is buttered. Two senior journalist chamchas of Babuji have now started visiting the residences of the Chaudhury and his followers. In another case, a journalist had written two articles scathingly critical of the Chaudhury and Raj Narain, but these pieces were not used after the new PM was sworn in. However, the wiser journalists are keeping both sides happy: Who knows who will be in power tomorrow? But the most interesting case was the coverage of Janata President Chandrashekhar's Press conference in Lucknow. With the exception of the Patriot, no other paper carried the most revealing answers. Mr Chandrashekhar had said that "the Janata Party has sought Congress(I) support in Bihar to save its Ministry against the onslaught of Janata(S) and other Opposition Parties ... There was nothing wrong in it. The main task facing my Party is to save its Governments in States from the onslaught of Janata(S) and if Indira Congress offers to help in such cases, we will certainly take their help". Mr Chandrashekhar also revealed that recently some Janata leaders had met the Indira Congress leaders, and he said that he saw no reason why his Party should not accept Mrs Gandhi's help. Later, when faced with criticism, Mr Chandrashekhar modified his remarks, but in any case, an indulgent Press had saved him some embarrassment.

But a young journalist, Om Prakash of Samachar Bharati, gave a better account of himself. He took up the cause of a young photographer, who suffered some indignity at the hands of Mr Suresh Ram at Mr Jagjivan Ram's house on July 18, 1979. Having been manhandled in the discharge of his normal duties, one would have expected the photographer to take up the incident at the professional level — News Photographers' Association. But no. He even requested Mr Om Prakash not to put out a news item on the event through his agency if the former had not done so, though one or two newspapers had carried the item on their own. One would have also expected the magazine employing the photographer to take up the cause. This too did not happen. The incident speaks volumes about the nation's fourth estate, of which photographers are very much a part.

THEY'RE AT FAULT, NOT ME

MR MORARJI DESAI feels very strongly that the revolt in the police and in the Central Industrial Security Force was directly due to some of the statements made by the Police Commission. At least that is what he has been telling friends.

D E NIZAMUDDIN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Lure girl...dream girl

Lure Shampoo
Cleans hair in seconds, leaves it fragrant for hours. Choose from Lime, Egg, Beauty and Shikakai.

Lure Beauty Mask
Cleanses and tones the skin. Leaves it fresh and radiant.

Lure Almond Hair Oil
Nourishes and strengthens the hair. Keeps it soft and gleaming.

Lure Cold Wax Hair Remover
Removes hair from the roots. Keeps skin soft and smooth longer.

Lure

Creative Unit 4130

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Regd No WB|CC|256. TN|MS (C)|376 Sunday Weekly 12 August 1979
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Swan is flying high

With the Swan Fashion Parade of beautiful fabrics – superb designs, joyous colours, exquisite textures. No wonder Swan sales have soared to even greater heights!

Swan Mills Ltd

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

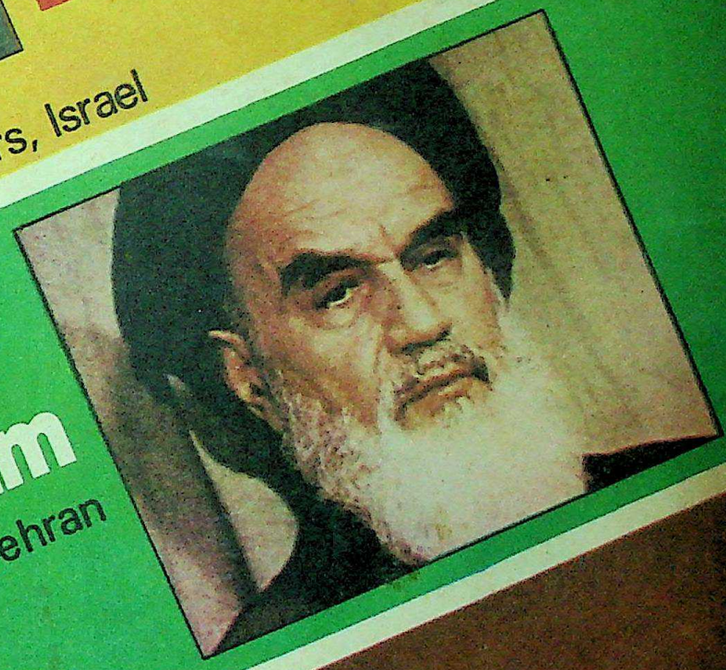
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

7 January 1979 ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION Re 1

SUNDAY

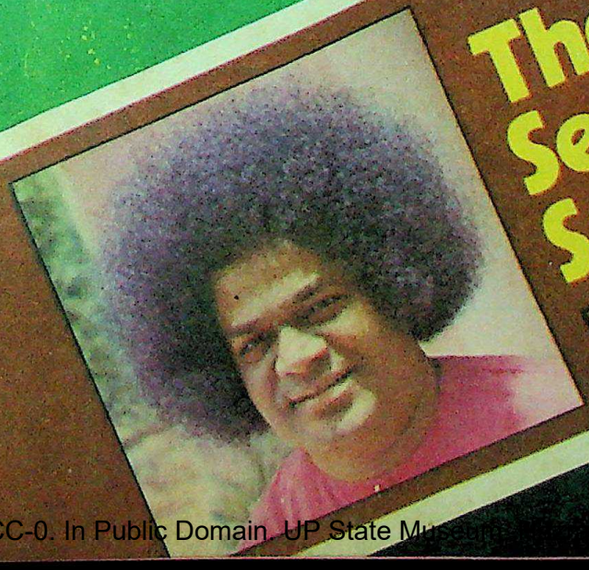
The Amazing Affair of Balasubramaniam

Balasubramaniam with Eisenberg, Chairman of Consolidated Packers, Israel



Iran's Fascist Islam

Report from Tehran



The Secret Sex Life of the Sai Baba

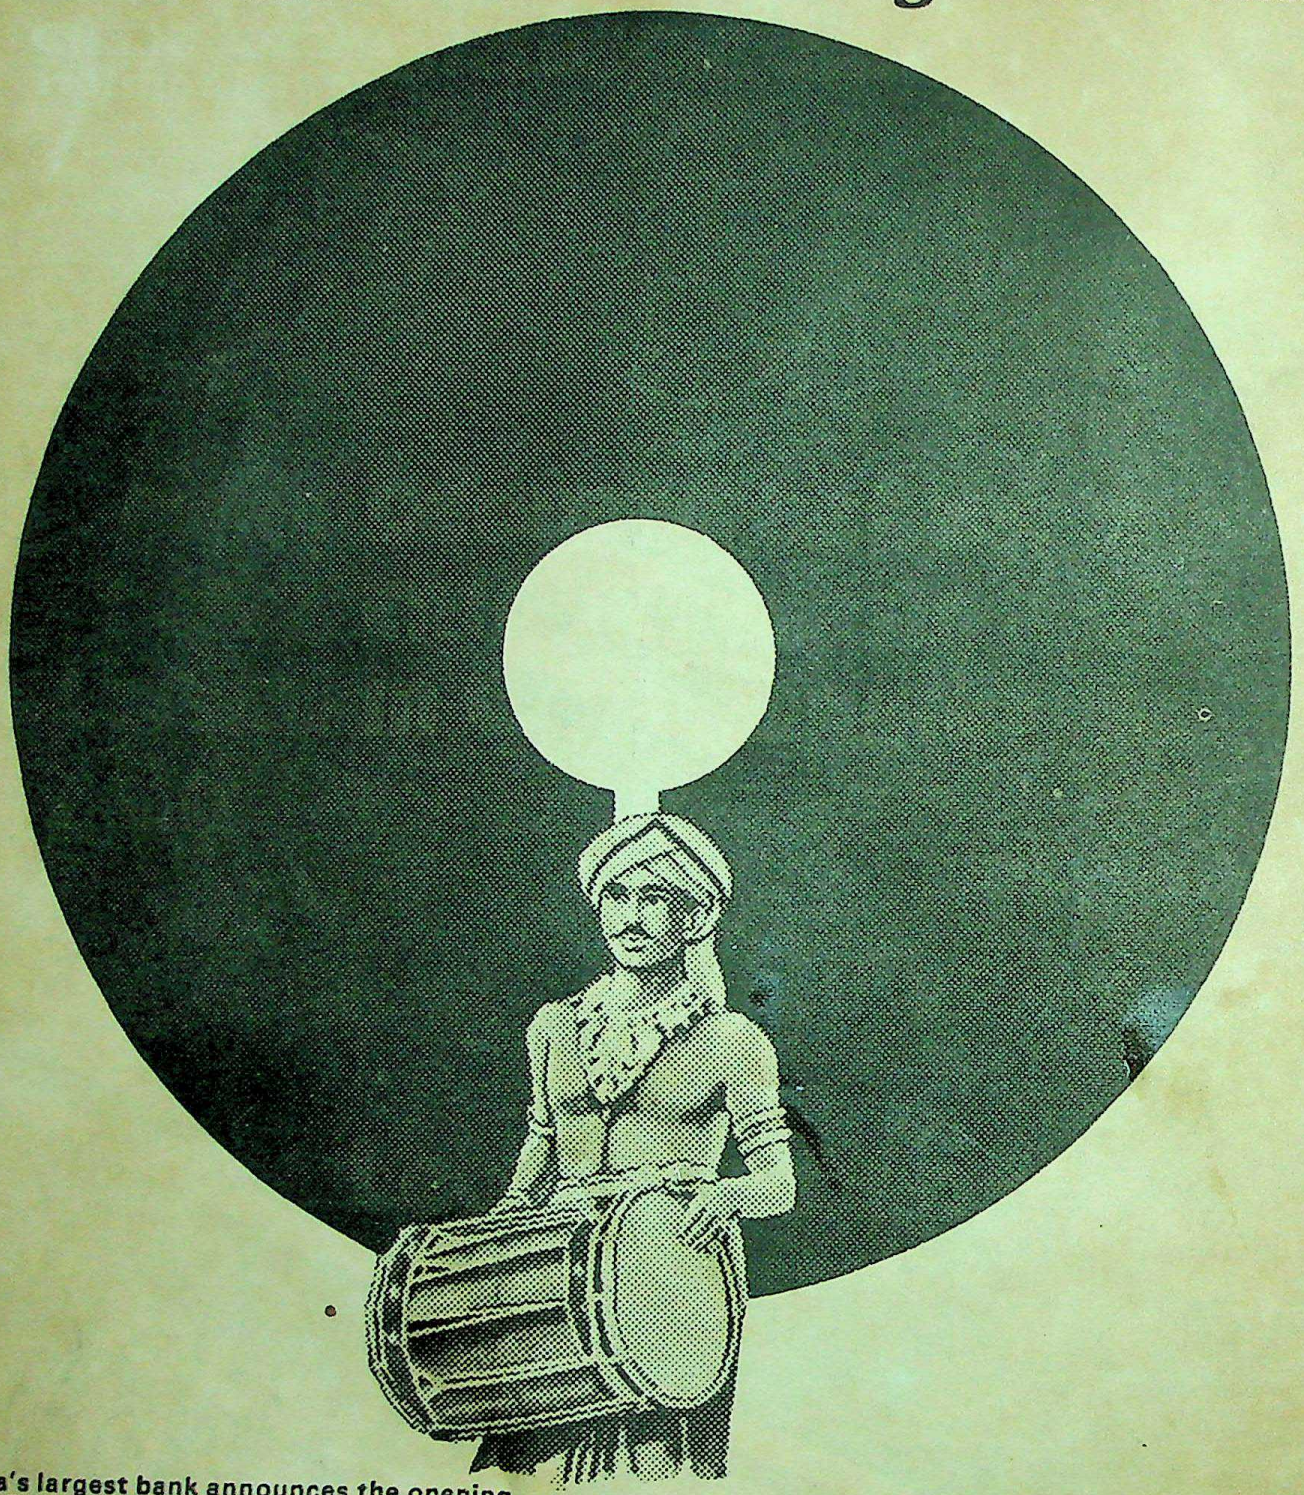
By Pritish Nandy

Starting ELECTION SPECIALS

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

We're giving entrepreneurs in Colombo's FTZ something to celebrate.



India's largest bank announces the opening of a Foreign Currency Banking Unit in Colombo.

State Bank's Colombo FCBU is its fifth offshore operation—after Nassau in the Bahamas, Bahrain, Singapore and Cayman Islands—mapping the different time zones and spanning the international money markets.

Whether you are looking for opportunities in the incentive-packed Colombo Free Trade Zone (FTZ) or for international banking services of the highest range, or BOTH, your choice must be State Bank. State Bank has had an operating presence in Sri Lanka for over a century now—since July 1864.

The functions of State Bank's new unit will consist of accepting time and demand deposits and extending loans and advances to non-residents, Free Trade Zone units and certain approved category of residents. The Unit will also offer a comprehensive range of international banking services such as assistance for joint ventures, export/import finance, comprehensive guidance and services for turnkey projects. It will also offer finance for projects approved by the Greater Colombo Economic Commission.

Remember our address:
State Bank of India,
16, Sir Baron Jayatilaka Mawatha, P.O. Box No. 93, Fort, Colombo-1, Sri Lanka.
Cable: Thistle, Colombo
Telex: 1286 Thistle, Colombo
Telephone: 26133-35

State Bank
Let's come closer

SB.4956A

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

modella

CREATES A PERFECT BLEND of elegance and comfort

When it comes to your suitings, it's the blend of worsted wool and 'Terene' that really matters.

In a man's world of fashions, where trends are fast changing from conventional to casual, modella keeps pace, with a selection of shades, designs and softer finishes.

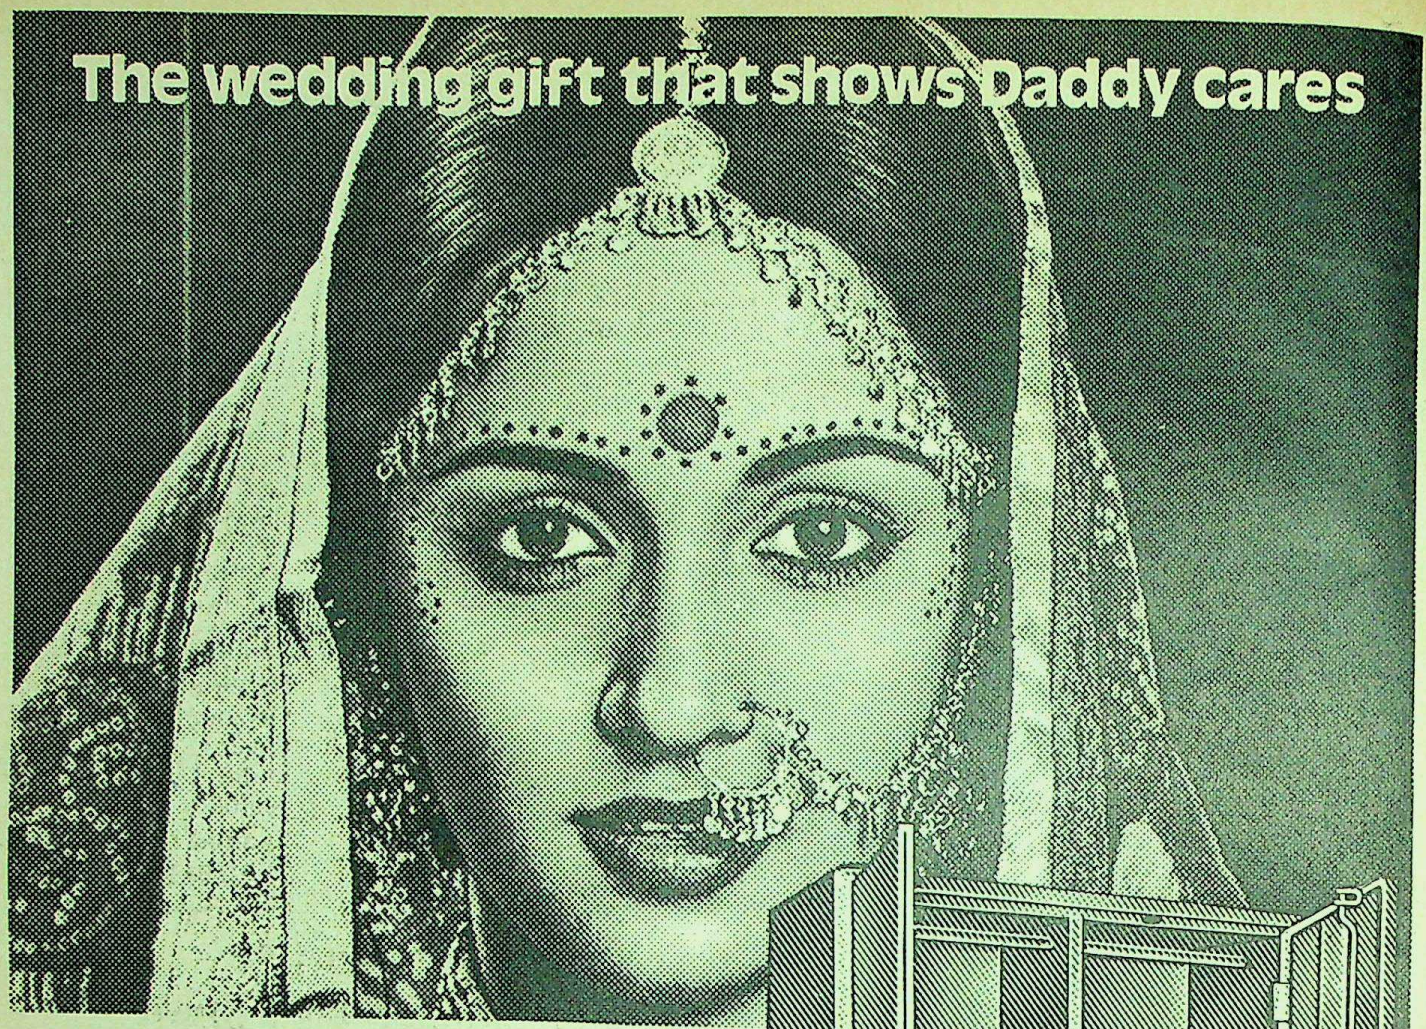
That's what puts modella in line with international suitings.

modella suitings lend a style to the lion in you.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

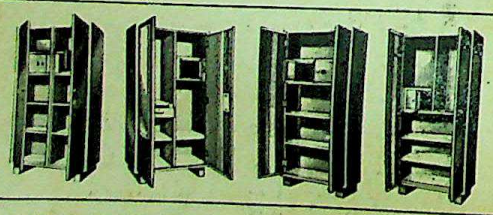
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The wedding gift that shows Daddy cares



Chandan wardrobe
It's as big as Daddy's heart

Visit your Chandan dealer to see the big-value Chandan Wardrobes—Homaker, Tvinlok, Universal, Unihom, Unistar, Selecta, Bantam, etc. Available in over a dozen combination of accessories including lockers, drawers, shelves, mirror, hanging rod, tie bar, etc. Choice of 4 colours.



CHANDAN METAL PRODUCTS PRIVATE LIMITED
Gorwa Road, Vadodara 390 016, Gujarat.

Fine Steel Furniture and Security Equipment.

CMC Chandan®

It says a lot for your judgement

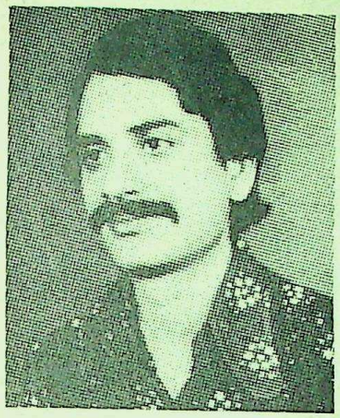
DEALERS AT ALL IMPORTANT CENTRES. DEALERSHIP ENQUIRIES WELCOME. everest/78/CMP/417

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Top Positions! Not Just Success!

Here is what IAS Toppers say



This is to acknowledge the help I have derived from your magazine in the course of my preparation for I.A.S. ..... credit for this success of mine goes to Competition Success Review.

Hrusikesh Panda
I.A.S. TOPPER
1978

Extremely thankful to your magazine for my getting into I.A.S. this year. I, being a regular reader of Competition Success Review, found it very useful.

Syamal Kumar Sarkar
II POSITION
IN I.A.S. 1978

To Win Top Positions In All Competitive Examinations, Read This Month And Every Month

competition success review

SINGLE COPY Rs. 3
ONE YEAR Rs. 28

NOW SELLING OVER 1,00,000 COPIES EVERY MONTH.

On the occasion of crossing sale of 1,00,000 copies, we offer SENSATIONAL DISCOUNT OF Rs.26 on 1 year subscription (Free Books worth Rs. 18 plus discount of Rs.8 on annual subscription).

FREE

BOOKS WORTH Rs. 18

to the subscribers of COMPETITION SUCCESS REVIEW — DIARY 1979-80-Rs.12, General Knowledge Today-Rs.6.

DISCOUNT COUPON

Please enrol me as subscriber for Competition Success Review at a concessional rate of Rs. 28 instead of regular news stand rate of Rs. 30. I have sent Rs. 28 by M.O. No_____ Date_____ to Competition Review Pvt. Ltd., 604, Prabhat Kiran, Rajendra Place, New Delhi-110 008.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

Kindly add Rs.2 for despatch of Free Books by Recorded Delivery.

Valid Until - NOV. 7, 1979

Available at all leading news stalls or from

COMPETITION REVIEW PVT. LTD.

604, Prabhat Kiran, Rajendra Place, New Delhi-110 008. Ph : 582898

TRENDS

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Both fabrics were stamped polyester.

Low content polyester fabric

'Terene' stamped fabric

The 'Terene' Trademark made the difference!

These days, the market is flooded with inferior blends of polyester fabrics all stamped to confuse you. These fabrics do not live up to the promise of polyester. After a few washes they crease, they shrink, they look shabby—because of insufficient polyester content.

Only mills fabrics which have passed CAFI's strictest inspection tests for crease recovery and shrinkage can carry the 'Terene' trademark. 'Terene' fabrics have the correct blend—the right polyester content. That's why they stay smart, look as good as new, wash after wash.

Don't take chances. Be 100% sure you're buying correctly blended polyester. Pick the fabric with the 'Terene' trademark—it gives you value for your money.

TERENE®

means the correct blend–everytime!

® Registered Trademark of Chemicals and Fibres of India Limited (CAFI)

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

WE PROMISE

Your dreams will come true in a variety of ways at different times... If you act now.

All your dreams have one common factor—a better tomorrow, a better life for you and your family, more importantly for the little ones.

You would love your children to be healthy, highly educated, fully equipped to face the challenges of life. You'd like to give them what you missed when you were young. For this, you need money. A lot of it.

Act now, today, for a better tomorrow. Start saving with Syndicate Bank in a systematic, planned manner. We have several schemes to help you meet your needs.

Call at the nearest branch of Syndicate Bank. We are waiting for you. Rest assured we will take care of your money problems now or in the near and distant future.

OUR SPECIAL SCHEME

CHILDREN'S WELFARE SECURITY CERTIFICATE

Available in denomination of Rs. 100 or its multiples.

For example :

A certificate of Rs. 1000 matures to

Rs. 1273.50 after 39 months

Rs. 1596.00 after 63 months

FAITHFUL SB FRIENDLY

SYNDICATE BANK

Where your children's welfare is our concern

maa SB 64

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Murphy 5503. The all-new 3-band radio cassette recorder with crystal clarity. The Murphy 5503 is encased in a tough plastic cabinet. It costs about the same as any other 2-in-1, but with Murphy sound.

It can switch off automatically.
A sleep switch that switches off in the amount of time it is adjusted for. So you can fall asleep listening to your radio. You don't have to stay awake to switch it off.

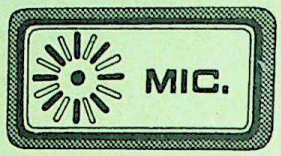
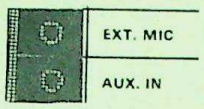
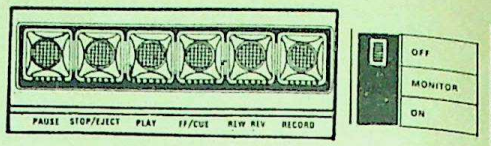
It can record off the radio or a live performance.
There are facilities for internal and external recording The built-in microphone can be conveniently used for voice and sound recordings. The microphone is sensitive enough to pick up sound even from a distance of 10 metres. There's a plug for an external microphone that can be used to reinforce the strength of the recording.





It can tape a telephone conversation.
You can record a whole telephone conversation by using a pick-up coil!



Finally, the 5503 can also be used with an external loudspeaker.

Listen to the 5503 through its built-in loudspeaker or through an external loudspeaker; the choice is yours.

The best buy at the price. On mains or batteries, you'll thrill to the richness, tone, texture of its truly professional sound.

murphy

You'll love the Sound.

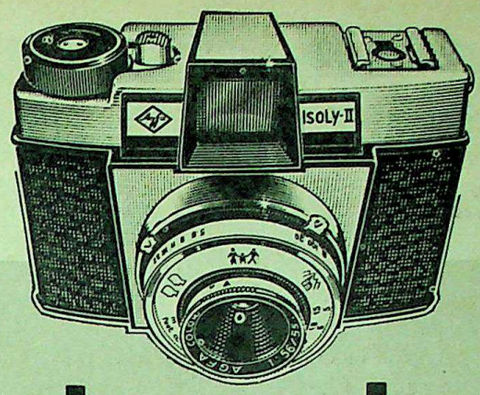
Only from Murphy

The great new 2-in-1: Murphy 5503.

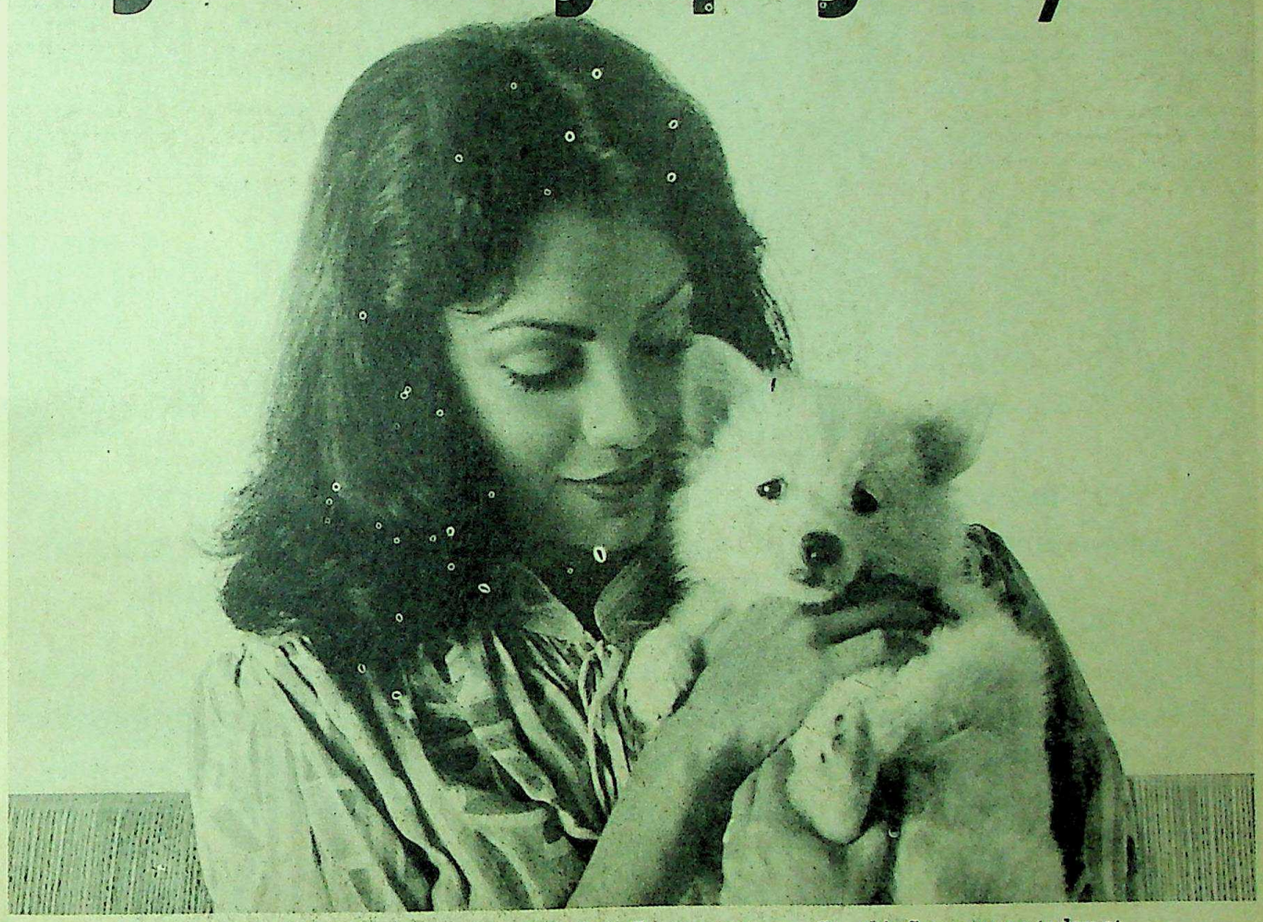
SIMOES/MU/7A/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Agfa Photography at f/5·6



The Agfa Isoly II takes perfect snapshots in dim, soft light. Open the aperture wide to f/5.6 to get as much light as possible to the film. Set the shutter at 1/30 second, slow enough to allow correct image registration. Shoot from a distance of 1.83 m. with the Isoly firmly on a tripod. Use slow film for greater sharpness—125 ASA. The result? A perfect picture in low light.

The Agfa Isoly II is a great all-round camera. You simply adjust settings, distance and film to freeze a sports scene forever, capture every detail, near or distant, of a landscape or get close enough to snap a leopard snarling!

The Agfa Isoly II is built to German specifications and undergoes over 100 exacting tests.

See this fine camera today at your friendly Agfa dealer.

AGFA

Distributors:
AGFA-GEVAERT INDIA LIMITED
Branches: Bombay • New Delhi
Calcutta • Madras
® Registered Trademark of Agfa-Gevaert, Antwerp/Leverkusen. Manufacturers of Photographic Products.

Agfa® ISOLY-II
for professional results.

SIMOES/AG/C/78

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

This may be The Year of The Child. But what of the future years?

In 1990 this youngster will be a productive citizen of India. She will live in an environment based on the results of today's fundamental and applied research. Including that of the Hoechst Group, world-wide.

Nearly 4500 scientists and technologists are working ceaselessly in Hoechst Research and Development Laboratories in Germany and in other countries of the world to produce more effective medicines, sera and vaccines and new diagnostic and therapeutic techniques. To invent better methods and make better products to help farmers increase their yields.

At the Hoechst Centre for Basic Research and Quality Control Laboratories of Hoechst Pharmaceuticals in Bombay skilled and experienced scientists and technicians are researching for new and better products and newer applications. Hoechst has already spent over Rs. 8.5 crores on Research and Development in the country and continues to spend Rs. 1.2 crores annually.

Hoechst scientists are shaking hands with the future, helping to shape tomorrow's world. Your children's world. Your world too.

Hoechst

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Best of Fontana Armada Books

PERENNIAL BEST SELLERS

MORRIS WEST

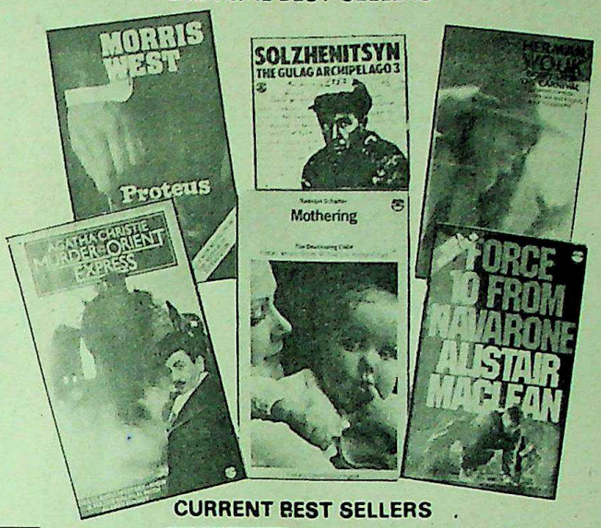
Proteus	Rs. 15.00
The Ambassador	Rs. 14.72
The Big Story	Rs. 13.80
Daughter of Silence	Rs. 13.80
The Devil's Advocate	Rs. 14.72
Shoes of the Fisherman	Rs. 15.64

ALISTAIR MACLEAN

Force 10 from Navarone	Rs. 14.72
Breakheart Pass	Rs. 14.72
Caravan to Vaccares	Rs. 14.72
Golden Rendezvous	Rs. 14.72
Ice Station Zebra	Rs. 15.64

AGATHA CHRISTIE

Murder on the Orient Express	Rs. 13.80
The Adventure of Christmas Pudding	Rs. 13.80
After The Funeral	Rs. 13.80
The Mirror Crack'D from Side to Side	Rs. 13.80
Poirot's Early Cases	Rs. 14.72



ALEXANDER SOLZHENITSYN

The First Circle	Rs. 35.88
The Gulag Archipelago Vol. I	Rs. 23.00
The Gulag Archipelago Vol. II	Rs. 18.40
The Gulag Archipelago Vol. III	Rs. 32.00

HERMAN WOUK :

Aurora Dawn	Rs. 9.20
The Caine Mutiny	Rs. 27.60
Don't Stop the Carnival	Rs. 23.00
Marjorie Morningstar	Rs. 27.60
The Winds of War	Rs. 35.88

THE DEVELOPING CHILD SERIES

AIDEN MACFARLANE

The Psychology of Childbirth	Rs. 23.00

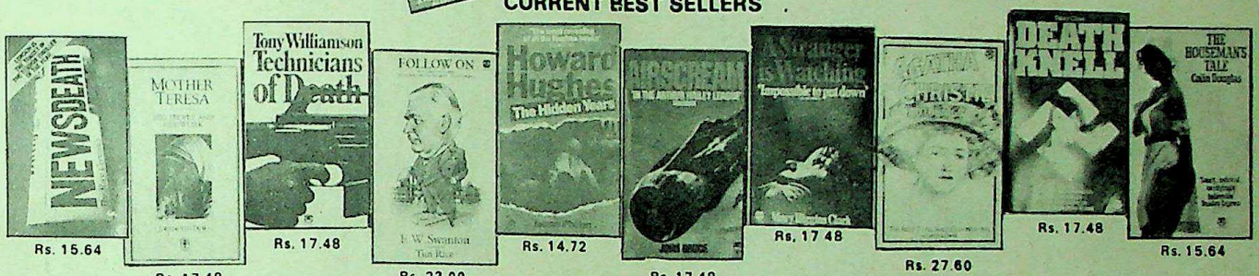
RUDOLPH SCAFFER

Mothering	Rs. 23.00

FREDERICK LEBOYER

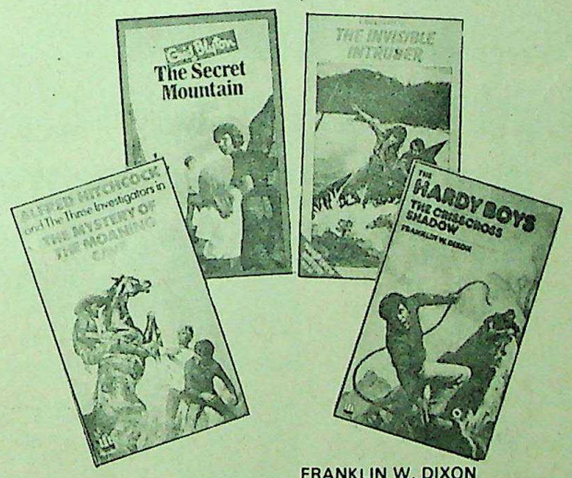
Birth Without Violence	Rs. 35.88

CURRENT BEST SELLERS



Rs. 15.64 | Rs. 17.48 | Rs. 17.48 | Rs. 23.00 | Rs. 14.72 | Rs. 17.48 | Rs. 17 48 | Rs. 27.60 | Rs. 17.48 | Rs. 15.64

CHILDREN BEST SELLERS



ENID BLYTON

The Secret Mountain	Rs. 9.20
The Secret of Moon Castle	Rs. 9.20
The Secret Island	Rs. 9.20
The Secret of Spiggy Holes	Rs. 9.20
The Rubadub Mystery	Rs. 9.20
The Rilloby Fair Mystery	Rs. 11.04
The Rockingdown Mystery	Rs. 11.04
The Ring O' Bells Mystery	Rs. 9.20

FRANKLIN W. DIXON

The Crisscross Shadow	Rs. 11 04
The Mystery of the Aztec Warrior	Rs. 11.04
The Artic Patrol Mystery	Rs. 11.04
The Mystery of the Whale Tatoo	Rs. 11.04
The Mystery of the Desert Giant	Rs. 11.04
While the Clock Ticked	Rs. 11.04
The Waiting Siren Mystery	Rs. 11.04
The Sign of the Crooked Arrow	Rs. 11.04
The Clue in the Embers	Rs. 11.04

ALFRED HITCHCOCK

The Mystery of the Moaning Cave	Rs. 9.20
The Mystery of the Vanishing Treasure	Rs. 11.04
The Mystery of the Screaming Clock	Rs. 11.04
The Mystery of the Talking Skull	Rs. 11.04
The Mystery of the Laughing Shadow	Rs. 11.04

CARLOYN KEENE

The Invisible Intruder	Rs. 11.04
The Secret of Shadow Ranch	Rs. 11.04
The Mystery of the 99 Steps	Rs. 11.04
The Club in the Crossword Cipher	Rs. 11.04
The Clue in the Old Stage Coach	Rs. 11.04
The Clue in the Broken Locket	Rs. 11.04

Fontana Books are available at all good bookshops.

Important : The above Bestselling selection will be on special display at the following bookshops between 30th September and 14th October '79.

AHMEDABAD : Kitab Kendra, Pocket Books Centre, Sastu Kitab Ghar.
BANGALORE : The Bangalore Trac?& Book Society, Gangaram's Book Bureau, Higginbothams Ltd., R, Basant & Co.
BARODA : East & West Book House.
BHUBANESHWAR : Modern Book Depot.
BOMBAY : Bestsellers, Causeway Book Depot Danai Book Shop, Ensign Book Stores, Eros Book Centre, Eve Books Games and Records, Modern Book Stall, Nalanda Book & Record Shop, New Pustika, Readers Paradise, Ritika Book House, Strand Book Stall, Thacker & Co Ltd.
CALCUTTA : Family Book Shop, Jonaki, Khannas, Modern Book Depot.
CHANDIGARH : Fancy Book Store, Variety Book Stores.
COCHIN, Pai & Co., Branches at Calicut and Trivandrum.
DEHRADUN : English Book Depot, National News Agency, Natraj Publishers
GAUHATI : Western Book Depot.
GOA : Book Fair, Jeevanti, Varsha Book Stall.
HYDERABAD : A.S. Hussain & Co.
JAMSHEDPUR : Sanyal Brothers.
KARNAL : Readers'Paradise.
LUCKNOW : Universal Booksellers, Universal Book Distributing Co.
MADRAS : C.L.S. Book Shop, Higginbothams Ltd., Kennedy Book House, Pai & Company.
NAGPUR : The Western Book Depot.
ISPCK Nagpur Book Shop.
NEW DELHI : The Book Shop, Deepco, Karachi Stationery Mart, Teksons.
POONA : English Book Depot, Manneys, Popular Book Shop, Utkarsh Book Services & Library.
SECUNDERABAD : J.C. Pinto & Co
SHILLONG - Ratna's Mascot.
SIMLA ; Batish Sons, Minerva Book House.
TRICHUR ; Minerva Book Stall.
VARANASI ; Universal Book Company

MARKETED BY
THE MACMILLAN COMPANY OF INDIA LIMITED
* Mercantile House, Magazine Street, Reay Road (East) Bombay-400010
* 294, Bepin Behari Ganguly Street, Calcutta-700 012
* 21, Patullo Road, Madras-600 002
* 2/10, Ansari Road, Daryaganj, New Delhi-110 002

Also at BANGALORE, HYDERABAD, LUCKNOW AND TRIVANDRUM.

* Prices subject to change without prior notice.

TULIKA/139/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

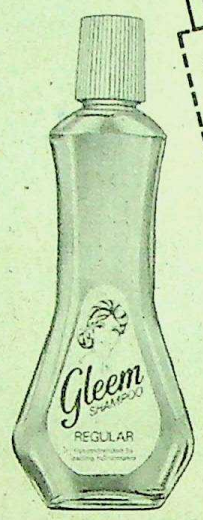
Minna De Souza of Chiron Beauty Parlour, Centaur Hotel, Bombay says:

'No more wondering which shampoo to use for different hair types! Gleem has just the variety for each customer's hair.'

Each Gleem variety complements your kind of hair with its special ingredients, rich lather, lingering French perfume and long-lasting economy.

Gleem Regular	Gleem Egg	Gleem Tonic
Makes normal, healthy hair silky, clean, manageable	Nourishes lifeless hair to give it luxuriant body and health with pure egg protein	Cleans problem hair, loose scales, itchy scalp

G 51A

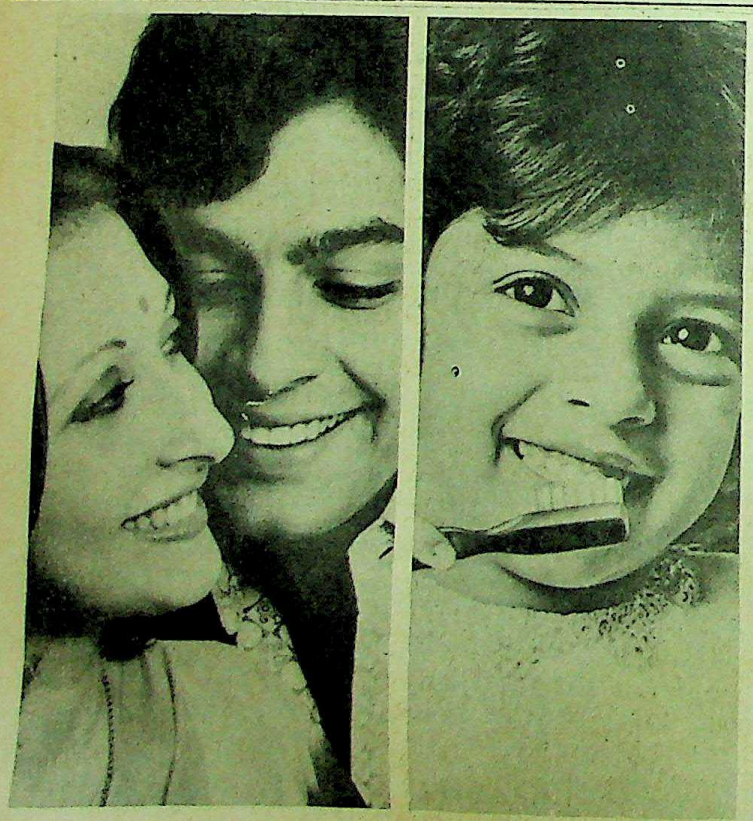


NOW also in a convenient 60 ml size

Gleem SHAMPOO

recommended by leading hairdressers

Geoffrey Manners & Co. Ltd.



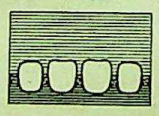
Stop bad breath... fight tooth decay with Colgate Dental Cream

Brush your teeth with Colgate after every meal. It protects you just the way dentists recommend all over the world.

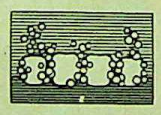
Bacteria grow in food particles left between your teeth. These can cause bad odour, and later—painful decay.

So always brush the Colgate way right after eating. It's proven most effective to freshen your breath, whiten your teeth and fight decay.

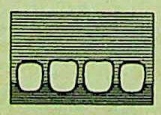
How Colgate's trusted formula works



Odour and decay causing bacteria grow in food particles trapped between your teeth.



Colgate's unique active foam reaches deep to remove dangerous food particles and bacteria.



The result : attractive white teeth, fresh breath confidence, protection against decay.

For cleaner, fresher breath and whiter teeth more people buy Colgate than any other toothpaste in the world!

For complete dental care use Colgate Trigard Toothbrushes. They guard tooth enamel, guard against dental plaque and guard gums. 8 varieties to suit everyone in your family.

Only a dentist can give you better dental care.

DC.G.64.78

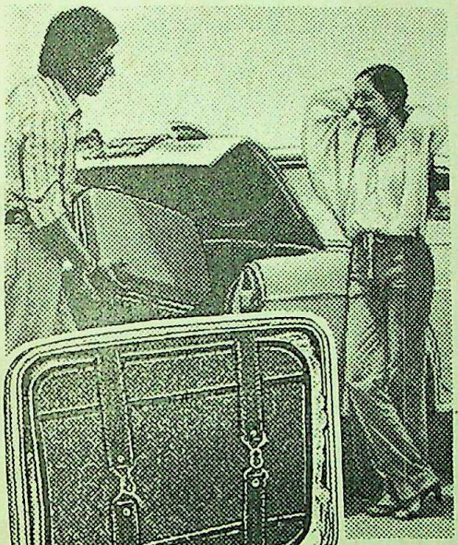
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

'V.I.P.' Carry-ons. They carry on. Regardless!

Two for three!

For 3-day trips (easily extended to 4!), two exciting options. Both 53 cms (21"). Spacious—so you don't carry rumpled collars and frayed tempers along on your trip! Both with a divider and straps. Junior, from the 'V.I.P.' Classic range—richly lined and finished. Price: Rs. 340. T-500, from the 'V.I.P.' Travelite range—great for weight-watchers. Price: Rs. 265.



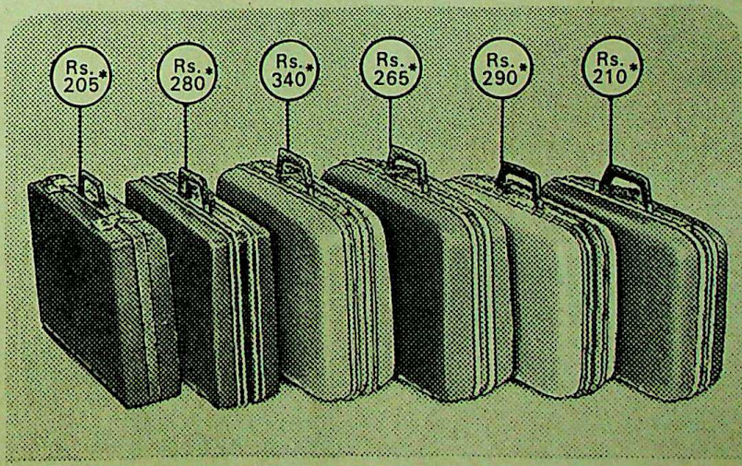
For weekend, after weekend, after weekend...

For a great weekend. For uncreased clothes and unruffled spirits. Two happy suggestions from 'V.I.P.' Each a roomy 46 cm (18") case. With a divider and straps. Minor in the 'V.I.P.' Classic style. Price: Rs. 290. The other, the light-weight Travelite T-400. Price: Rs. 210. Take your pick!

For every short trip, 'V.I.P.' has a long-term answer!

It's the widest range of Carry-ons!

'V.I.P.' offers you the largest choice. Six exciting shapes and sizes. Twelve lovely colours. Beautiful styling. Each model is compact enough for an Airbus flight. Or a quick car or train trip. All are made of tough polymer. With sturdy locks and hinges. And have the exclusive 'V.I.P.' quality of being able to carry on . . . and on . . . Regardless!



*Prices are inclusive of all taxes and duties.

V.I.P.™ spells class. Anywhere in the world.

BLOW PLAST LIMITED,
P.O. Box No. 9145,
Bombay 400 025.

Sista's-BP-616/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Saving... not peculiar to man alone. But man perfected it.

Squirrels – most advanced and successful of all rodents. Found all over Eurasia, Africa and the Americas. Most common in India is the Ground Squirrel with three stripes on its back.

And Andhra Bank has further refined it.

There are many examples of savers in nature. The squirrel for instance saves and stores food for the needy day.
Man, with his superior intelligence, has extended the range of saving.
Saving quite a few essentials.
And money, most important of all.
Helping him save money for all his needs, is Andhra Bank. Through a range of schemes tailor-made to suit everyone in the family.

Our Schemes :

- Kalpatharuvu • Bhagyalakshmi
- Kiddy Bank • Samraksha
- Samkshema • Janasahaya
- Gruhakalpa • Karshakasahaya
- Social Security Scheme for Women • Cash Certificate.

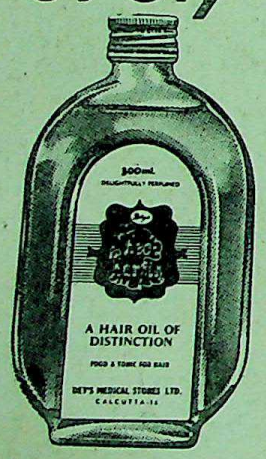
Andhra Bank
– the bank responsive to people's needs.

The Andhra Bank Ltd.
Regd. & Central Office:
Sultan Bazar, Hyderabad-500 001.

Chairman: O. SWAMINATHA REDDY

KIRON/AB/79-1

Nourishment in every drop!



For lustrous growth of my hair, I use Keo-Karpin every day. Gently perfumed, non-sticky Keo-Karpin is so light... yet so nourishing !

Keo-Karpin
Hair Oil

A Product of Dey's Medical

O/KE-2/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Horlicks

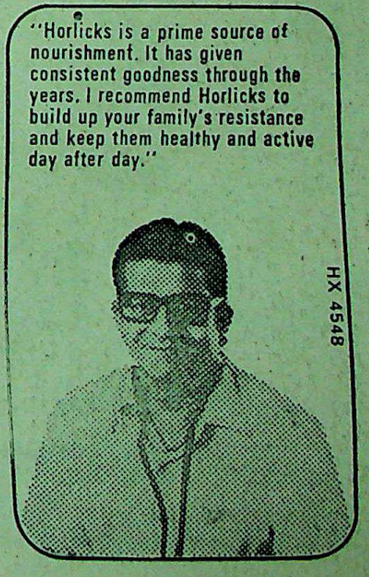
The nourishment that builds resistance, safeguards health day after day.

Horlicks, taken regularly, gives your family the nourishment that builds up their resistance and keeps them full of health. Health that means success and happiness. Health that keeps you fit and active and builds security.

Horlicks... It's the only one that doctors all over the world recommend. The only one that gives so much nourishment because its rich, pure ingredients are combined by the unique Horlicks process which retains their natural goodness and makes them easy to digest.

That's why Suchitra has made Horlicks a part of her family's life. She knows that Horlicks gives them health protection.

Like Suchitra, give your family Horlicks every day and watch them grow in health and strength through all the years ahead.



HORLICKS
The Great Nourisher.

Horlicks is a Registered Trade Mark.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Happy bathday to you !

naa HSI.794

Hindustan Sanitaryware
Soma Metal Fittings
Somany-Pilkington's Wall Tiles

Hindustan Sanitaryware come in exciting colours. Soma Metal Fittings with international precision. Assures no-leak, no-drip service.
Elegantly styled. Guaranteed for 5 years.
Somany-Pilkington's Wall Tiles—
in enchanting designs and colours
Easy to clean.

VITREOUS HINDUSTAN SANITARYWARE & INDUSTRIES LIMITED
Makers of India's largest selling, largest exported bathroom equipment

Soma Plumbing Fixtures Limited
A wholly owned subsidiary of Hindustan Sanitaryware

SOMANY-PILKINGTON'S LIMITED

2, Red Cross Place, Calcutta-700 001

JUST MONEY WILL GET HIM A FEW GOOD MEALS

but involvement will change his life

As the fifth largest bank in the country, Canara Bank has shouldered its responsibility to the environment it grows in. We are involved: in towns, in villages, in helping people to find a foothold in life. In uplifting the standard of living. In fighting unemployment. With loans of money — yes. But also the irrepayable loan of involvement in teaching a skill, suggesting a trade, locating an opportunity. Improving lives. You cannot do it by money alone.

Through its widespread network of over 1180 branches Canara Bank is sowing effort where it counts.

SERVING TO GROW GROWING TO SERVE CANARA BANK

CANARA BANK
(Wholly owned by the Government of India)

maa CB 13c-79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Freshness you can feel
Proof you can see

Sprinkle charcoal powder on water. Pour a drop of Binaca Top solution in the centre. See how fast Binaca Top spreads in all directions, clears the dirt and leaves a pure, clear surface behind.

This is exactly how Binaca Top's special dispersing agent spreads to every corner of your mouth—clears out tooth decaying bacteria and prevents bad breath.

BINACA TOP

FOR TOTAL MOUTH PROTECTION

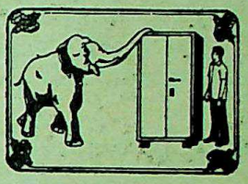
CIBA-GEIGY

ARMS/CBT-1-78

When you think of SECURITY of valuables at your home

Remember

Safe-Deposit Almirah



Guaranteed for 5 years

RAJ & RAJ

18, Rabindra Sarani (Poddar Court) Calcutta-700 001.
Phone : 26-9443

OTHER SHOWROOMS :
28/3A, Gariahat Road,
Calcutta-700 019. Ph. : 46-9539
Kamani Centre, Bishtupur,
Jamshedpur

iaa 808

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

High-protein health
Body-building goodness
Vital nutrition
A taste your family will love...

NEW

Try

Mealmaker

today!

Pep up your health!

Mealmaker is rich in soya protein—the best and most efficient source of vegetable protein. It fills the vital protein gap in a normal Indian diet.

250 gms of Mealmaker contains as much protein as 3.9 litres of milk or 1 kg of mutton or 24 eggs.

Only Mealmaker can give you such nutrition with such economy!

And low in fat. Mealmaker has practically no fats, cholesterol or saccharides, which makes it the ideal food for the whole family.

Available as chunks and granules— now in all leading stores.

It's completely vegetarian!

Mealmaker is 100% vegetarian. When added to any dish, because it is high in protein, it makes every Mealmaker dish a highly nutritive one.

Great for meat-eaters too!

Though vegetarian, Mealmaker blends perfectly with meat. Extend meat dishes with Mealmaker—serve it every day and stay within your budget.

...and tasty, tasty, tasty!

Your family will love the taste of Mealmaker. Remarkably versatile, Mealmaker absorbs the spicy flavour of any dish. Mealmaker makes a delicious variety of vegetarian and non-vegetarian dishes—and sweets, too. Look for the recipe leaflet in every pack.

Mealmaker

for great-tasting nourishment.

maa VL 4E

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

HMV Fiesta Popular. It's India's largest-selling record player.

When we put the Fiesta Popular in the market, we hoped to put music within the reach of as many homes as possible. We gave it everything music lovers would want in a compact, sturdy set. Starting with a very reasonable price tag ! For both AC and Battery models. We built in a powerful wide-frequency range amplifier and a place-it-anywhere, lid-mounted, matching speaker. A tone control for fine adjustment of bass and treble sounds. A 3-speed turntable to play all types of records. All this because we wanted the Fiesta Popular to take more music to more people...and, before we knew it, it had become the largest selling record player in the country ! Today, there are 3,00,000 Fiesta homes spread all over India. You can be sure there's an HMV Fiesta playing somewhere right now.

Maximum recommended retail price Rs 499 Including excise duty, Local taxes extra.

The largest range of quality sound equipment—Fiesta Popular, Calypso and Popstar record players; Safari and Swinger radiograms; Tenor cassette recorder and Consort II radio cassette recorder.

GC 3365

HMV His Master's Voice
The future is sound

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

With Dulux you might want a fresh colour-scheme before you need a fresh coat of paint

So when you choose your Dulux shade, remember it's a long-term investment.

Everyone knows that Dulux outlasts other paints, but very few people know that there's an actual proof behind this belief.

In the ACCI Paints Laboratory, Dulux's wear-resistance was tested against that of three other brands by an instrument called a Wet Abrasion Tester. Electrically operated, this tester works at a speed of 40 strokes per minute, moving a wet sponge back and forth over a painted surface to test how long it takes for the paint to wear out.

What happened is interesting.

The board with Dulux stood up to more than 4,000 strokes of the tester without any damage to the paint film. The surfaces of the boards painted with the other three brands began to wear out long before Dulux's record was met. Proof that Dulux can take more wear and tear than other paints—to last longer in your home.

So pick the shades you like from Dulux's wide range of colours—and enjoy their freshness for years.

Dulux paints. Now and for years ahead

OBM—6314C

'DULUX'—made and marketed in India by The Alkali and Chemical Corporation of India Limited.

The ICI roundel and 'Dulux' are registered trade marks of Imperial Chemical Industries, Ltd., London. Licensed users : The Alkali and Chemical Corporation of India Limited.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNDAY VOLUME 7
ISSUE 18
RUPEE ONE
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

October 7, 1979

SORRY, AGAIN !

Once again, we have slipped behind our schedules, due to a large number of reasons. As one reader pointed out, SUNDAY first became 'Any Day' and now it is tending to become 'Any Week'. Our apologies, and we can only hope that you treat us with the same kindness you have shown in the past, the kindness and affection that has made your magazine the fastest growing weekly in Indian publishing history.

And we are happy to announce that we are actually on the point of solving the problem of delays. We have started printing an edition from Madras: the copies which are sold in the South will now be printed in Madras and distributed directly from there, instead of making the long and disjointed train journey from Howrah station to the hundreds of points on the map to which SUNDAY goes. We thought that this was the least we could do for our valued readers from the South. Due to the long Puja holidays in Calcutta, we shall skip two issues (dated September 23 and 30) but from this issue we hope to be back on schedule, trying our level best to keep you well-informed about the fascinating things that happen in our country. We particularly promise you extensive and detailed election coverage: we will be sending our reporters to every nook and corner of the country, into the superstar constituencies and ordinary contests; we will probe the minds of leaders and try our best to expose dishonesty and corruption where we find it.

We hope you enjoy reading your magazine during the exciting months that are ahead. We would welcome suggestions from you on what you would like to know in particular. We hope that the SUNDAY family will continue to grow—and at the same pace. —Editor

P. N. Balasubramaniam—industrialist, fighter pilot, political operator and onetime friend of Kantilal Desai and Suresh Kumar—is nobody's fall guy. He came under a cloud when the income tax people raided his Delhi house in June. The mystery deepened when he jumped bail and fled to Europe. Then confounding everybody he has come back, reportedly escorted by PLO agents for security. All the details of this amazing case, along with a transcript of his confession to the police.

How are various political Parties preparing themselves for the elections ? Starting this week, a new section "Election Specials" shall cover all events, issues and personalities connected with the electioneering that has already begun all over the country. This week : the Bangalore AICC session; fallout of Oct 2 and what happened when Mrs Gandhi went to Tirupathi.

SUNDAY in the past has called the bluff of the Sai Baba's supernatural powers by having a leading magician equal him in his little off-the-cuff miracles. Now a long review of a book by a thoroughly disillusioned former disciple who got too close to the godman for comfort—spiritual or temporal.

COMMENT
Opinion 25

COVER STORY
The amazing affair of Balasubramaniam| O. P. Malhotra and Udayan Sharma 28

SUNDAY SPECIAL
The secret sex life of Sai Baba|Pritish Nandy 34

SPECIAL REPORT
Drought in Bihar and UP| Arun Ranjan 58

THE WORLD
Iran's Fascist Islam|Fred Halliday 53

NEWS
The censorship game|Anil Grover 38
Convention stripped bare|Mandira Purie
Mohun Bagan supreme|Arijit Sen

ELECTION SPECIALS
The fallout of October 2|M. J. Akbar 44
Mr. Urs takes charge|Subir Roy

CINEMA
Khaas Baat 42

VARIETY
Sundayweek 67
Chess|Bridge|Quiz|Stamps 69
Comic strip : Peanuts 71
This India 73
India abroad
Humour in real life
Without comment

OTHER DEPARTMENTS
Delhi Diary|D. E. Nizamuddin

Cover transparency of Ayatollah Khomeini by AP

Editor M. J. Akbar
Assistant Editor Subir Roy Editorial Staff Nirmal Mitra, David McMahon, Saumitra Banerjee, Tirthankar Ghosh, S. N. M. Abdi
Delhi Correspondent Ajoy Bose
Art Director Bipul Guha Asst Art Director Amiya Bhattacharya

Published from 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001 and printed at Ananda Offset Private Ltd., P-248, C.I.T. Scheme No. VI-M Calcutta 700054 by Bappaditya Roy for Ananda Bazar Patrika Limited.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Nature's secret discovered!

makes you noticeably fairer ...in Nature's own gentle way.

Fair & Lovely contains a unique ingredient that works within your skin to reverse the process of darkening—naturally, gently, safely. It thus makes you noticeably fairer in 6 weeks of daily use.

Fair & Lovely –the gentle way to a fairer skin.

LINTAS-FALOV-9-2415

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The ultimate gambler

KEWAL VARMA in his cover story on "The gamblers" (August 26) apparently forgot to mention the fourth gambler who is very much in the running. He is none other than President Sanjeeva Reddy. After all, the post of a Prime Minister is one step ahead of the Presidency. Reddy's actions and modus operandi should not surprise anyone because it is only natural to aspire for the best. It would also be worthwhile to investigate why our President was so soft towards Charan Singh and company.
M. N. Bhide, Pune.

KEWAL VARMA's story reminds us of the evil forces operating in the country today. SUNDAY is certainly an excellent medium for popularising secularism, socialism and democracy. I fully endorse the idea of a grand alliance led by Charan Singh against the anti-democratic and communal political lobby. Pro-Janata (S) leaders could well emerge as our next rulers. We can trust the Indian electorate to vote for the right people in the forthcoming midterm poll. However, Indian voters have sometimes proved elusive to professional commentators and political pundits. But the people's verdict has been firm both in 1971 and 1977. The people of India will watch the results of the next elections with great interest.
Amar Nath Keshri, Danapore

YOU have rightly observed that the alliance of Janata (S) and other smaller Parties is only a shade less despotic than the original Janata. It is to be seen whether they can sweep the coming elections, which to me appears frankly quite imposible. Even if the Janata (S) comes to power it is very unlikely that they would work unitedly for the nation's good. Going through your intelligent pre-poll assessment, I am compelled to think that SUNDAY could well become an adviser to the caretaker Government.
Arun Kumar Khattri, Varanasi.

THE cover story is a grim reminder that the fortunes of our country are in the hands of unscrupulous political elements lusting for power. The men with dices are surely jeopardising democracy, as you have pointed out. These slapstick developments in New Delhi and other regional centres of power reminded me of two movies; Gambler in Hindi starring Dev Anand and The Gambler, an English film of the Sixties. Like the movies, the Indian political gamblers did provide some entertainment and comic relief but viewed in retrospect, the films and the politicians wasted the precious time of millions of Indians to line their own pockets.
Rehana Huq, Jamshedpur.

APROPOS of M. J. Akbar's interview with Charan Singh, "I was driven to the wall" (August 26), the Chaudhury now blames the Jana Sangh for ousting him from the Janata Party. The acting PM however conveniently forgot that it was the Jana Sangh which prevailed upon Morarji Desai to bring him back into the Cabinet. Had Vajpayee not insisted on Charan Singh's return, the Janata Party would not have been bifurcated. thus (possibly) paving the way for Mrs Gandhi's return.
Maharaj K. Koul, Srinagar.

IN THE interview, Charan Singh refers to Raj Narain as "Raj Narainji" but calls the Loknayak simply Jaya Prakash Narayan. This shows the man's wrong order of priorities. On the whole the politicians of our country have given a very poor account of themselves. The money collected from the poor kisans, harijans and minorities only keeps their airconditioned cars in running condition.
Zahur Ahmed, Jammu.

YOUR assessment of the political situation in the cover story is prejudiced and smacks of ignorance. I hadn't expected such a lopsided review from you. In your blind praise of the Janata (S) you conveniently forget that this is a Party of opportunists and defectors. Why did Mr Charan Singh wait to submit his resignation until Morarji resigned? The role played by Charan Singh in UP politics, his promises and assurances to Muslims before he became Chief Minister and what he did after coming to power all need to be probed.

You have deliberately underplayed the Congress (I)'s popularity. Most of the Congressmen have now joined the Congress (I) and they are not doing it to get election tickets alone. All Indians have now realised for the better that it is only Indira Gandhi who can rule this country.
Javaid Asrar, Karimgunj.

What thief?

WE ARE amused to read an item published in SUNDAY (August 5) titled "Sheikh's servant helps himself" by G. S. Kartha from Trivandrum. We would like to point out that the information you published does not make a news itsm and it obviously induces a lay reader to believe that Ummer stole valuable jewels from the Sheikh's palaces. Your journal's "verdict" is wholly unwarranted and strictly speaking, the report amounts to contempt of court. The magazne can also be prosecuted for defamation. Two courts in Kerala, namely, the Second Class Judicial Magistrate's Court, Trichur and the High Court of Kerala exercise jurisdiction over the alleged crime. The writing, whether you call it a commentary, article or anything else, has violated the standard ethics of journalism, not to mention the scant regard shown to our judiciary and our laws.

But as counsel for Ummer in habeas corpus proceedings before the High Court of Kerala and another writ petition before the same court to quash the prosecution, we had interviewed Ummer inside the jail on two occasions. He revealed a number of facts which we are legally bound not to divulge. The truth will be duly revealed only in the course of a properly constituted judicial enquiry. For reasons of propriety and legal restraint we do not propose to detail the circumstances in which the valuable jewels of the Sheikh found their way to India.

All the same, we are anxious to inform your readers through these columns that in the hot pursuit for recovery of the "treasure jewels" of the Sheikh, the Central Government has overlooked all legal procedures and created an impression in the minds of general public that our laws could be bent to suit expediency of a particular situation as the executive may dictate.

On the basis of the allegation against him in court Ummer is a "fugitive criminal" (offender committing a crime in a foreign state and escaping to his home country) and the Central Government should intervene to give sanction for prosecution before a First Class Judicial Magis-

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Thackersey bridges the generation gap

Thackersey creates fashion fabrics for the whole family. Famous since 1873 for their superfine cottons. And the first to introduce Polyester Blends. An infinitely delightful range of prints, colours and textures in voiles, linos, cambrics, poplins, two x two, dhotis, jacquards, furnishing, CRONOLIZED (pre-shrunk) and TEBILIZED (for tested crease resistance) cottons. And polyester blended suitings, shirtings, dress materials and sarees.

HINDOOSTAN SPG. & WVG. MILLS LTD.

since 1873 symbol of a rich textile tradition

Dattaram HM 14

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

trate under Section 188 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The Magistrate can then hold an enquiry under the Extradition Act and send a report to the Central Government recording whether a prima facie case is made out or not against the fugitive criminal and then the Central Government can decide whether the criminal has to be extradited or not. Since there is no extradition treaty existing between India and the UAE as on the date of the alleged crime, extradition is impossible. What is possible is only a trial in the home state invoking extraterritorial jurisdiction under Section 4 of the Indian Penal Code. It is only during the course of such a Magisterial enquiry that the question of releasing such articles can arise.

What baffles one is why the Central Government has bypassed these procedures established by law and permitted the Sheikh to take away the articles. Has the Sheikh, simply because thousands of Indians are employed in his country, held our laws to ransom? For the folly of one man should the Sheikh terrorise thousands of innocent Indians and on that account should the Central Government prostrate before the Sheikh? Our diplomats and executives have reduced the dignity of our nation. Behind the undue haste shown by the executive to return the articles, violating all established procedures, there is something more

O. O. Mathew, Advocate, Cochin

Here's some help

IN HIS reply to my letter (August, 19) J. M. Menezes asks me if I can deny that "because of the Catholic Church's condoning attitude, Mussolini and Hitler could send millions to their deaths." Yes, I can—and I do. Under the leadership of Cardinal Von Faulhaber, many German Catholics resisted Hitler, some of them with their lives. True, Cardinal Pacelli, the future Pius XII, signed a Concordat with Nazi Germany in 1933, but a Concordat is not an act of condonation. On the contrary, it is an attempt by the Church to wring a few concessions from a tyrannical government. Thus the Vatican has never had to make a Concordat with India. Recently published documents reveal the full extent of the Vatican's efforts on behalf of Jews and other victims of Nazism during the war years. The rest is rumour and innuendo. But that should not deter Mr Menezes from making further accusations.

As a Catholic priest I am naturally distressed that even a non-practising Catholic (whatever that is!) should attack the Church of his fathers. As a teacher I am annoyed that he should do it so badly. I would suggest that in future Mr. Menezes stick to verifiable facts and avoid sweeping, unsubstantiated generalisations such as that contained in his allegation that the Church condoned the crimes of Hitler and Mussolini. Also, may I recommend the Inquisition as a source of future material? He will find it a goldmine. It has been somewhat overworked but can still yield a few choice nuggets to a diligent searcher. And he won't have to invent anything.

Mr. Menezes is scandalised that a Catholic religious order should advertise in Playboy magazine. I must confess that I am a bit baffled myself. But perhaps they were thinking of Him who said, "I did not come to call the just, but sinners."

As for bad popes, I am afraid that Mr. Menezes will have to abandon Leo III. He had much more to his credit than the crowning of Charlemagne. As alternatives I suggest John XII and Benedict IX, a couple of real bounders from the 10th and 11th centuries. Indeed the whole century from 950 to 1050 will provide dozens of juicy scandals to throw at us. Of course it was a long time ago, but never mind, mud is mud.

Finally, I must add that while reading Mr. Menezes's strictures against the Catholic Church, I was reminded of what Gandhiji said about Katherine Mayo's description of Hinduism: "A drain inspector's report."

J. W. Whelan, S. J. Darjeeling

Hindu rashtra

IN "Is Babuji selling out?" (August 5) Kewal Varma remarks : "The RSS people pointed out that they believed in a Hindu rashtra, not a Hindu state. We are sure that Mr Chandrashekhar and Mr Surendra Mohan understood the difference between a Hindu state and a Hindu rashtra: nobody else does." Let me explain. In the USA, the Constitution does not establish Christianity as an official religion, so the USA is not a Christian state. Yet in one of its pronouncements, the US Supreme Court has said: "We are a Christian nation". The Constitution of Turkey declares it to be a secular state. Yet, Turkey considers itself a Muslim nation and participates in conferences of Muslim countries. There are thus many countries whose constitutions do not align themselves with Islam or Christianity, and yet these countries call themselves Muslim or Christian nations. The reason is obvious.

V. P. Luthera, Delhi.

RSS's unruly friends

MASROOR AHMED's letter (Opinion, August 26) was really surprising. Mr Ahmed's attempt to whitewash the activities of the Jamaat-e-Islami is really condemnable. Has he forgotten that in his own State the so-called 'ideological organisation' hosted a banquet, and gave gifts to the RSS chief shortly before outbreak of the Jamshedpur riots? It may also be pointed out that the Jamaat-e-Islami sent an extremely rude and insulting letter to the editor of a prominent Urdu daily of Bihar while he was engaged in relief work in Jamshedpur. The Jamaat also sought to cover up the killings, even going so far as to say that the massacre of women and children in the minibus which was set ablaze by an RSS mob was only an accident. It is a shame that educated Muslims continue to support a fascist organisation

Syed Reza A. Sami, Patna.

Mannerly Minister

I REFER to the article "Uncivil Ministers and civil servants" (August 12). The whole paragraph on Pawan Dewan, the Minister for Jails, Madhya Pradesh, has been written with malice and political motivation. I would like to clarify the following points. Few students wanted to meet the Jail Minister at about 2 pm, when the Minister was taking rest. So I asked them to come in the evening. They got angry and went away. Later on, they complained to Mr Dewan and he was furious with me because I had not allowed them to meet him. But he did not ask them to beat me up. After all, Mr Dewan is a human being. When he came to know about the high prices he may have asked the people to raise their voice against rising prices. What is wrong in that? The third incident took place in Raipur. Mr Dewan was on a mass-contact tour. The administrator had been ordered to be present during Mr Dewan's tour. But he preferred to be present elsewhere, neglecting the Minister, causing irritation and inconvenience to the people who were meeting the Minister with their grievances. Several complaints were pending against the administrator, and the citizens of Raipur know about them. Thus the Minister was left with no option but to order the suspension of the official on the recommendation of a local MLA, Mr Ramesh Verlayani.

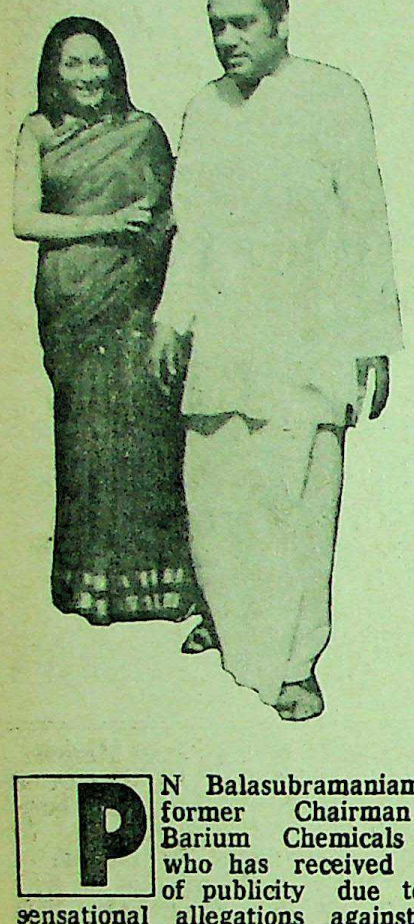
Bhagwandhar, Personal Assistant, Minister for Jails, Madhya Pradesh.

I HAVE met several Ministers and a couple of Prime Ministers. Most of them have been arrogant, proud, rude and stubborn. It is not so with Mr Pawan Dewan, the Jail Minister of Madhya Pradesh. In fact, he is a Minister with a golden heart. I have had several sittings with him. Anyone can meet him any time, unlike other Ministers. Mr Dewan listens patiently to everybody's complaints and takes immediate action. He himself phones up the concerned Minister or official and in addition, gives a letter.

Thomas Titus, Editor, MOD, Bhopal

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



The Amazing Affair of Balasubramaniam

O.P. MALHOTRA and UDAYAN SHARMA
filed reports upon which the following series of stories are based

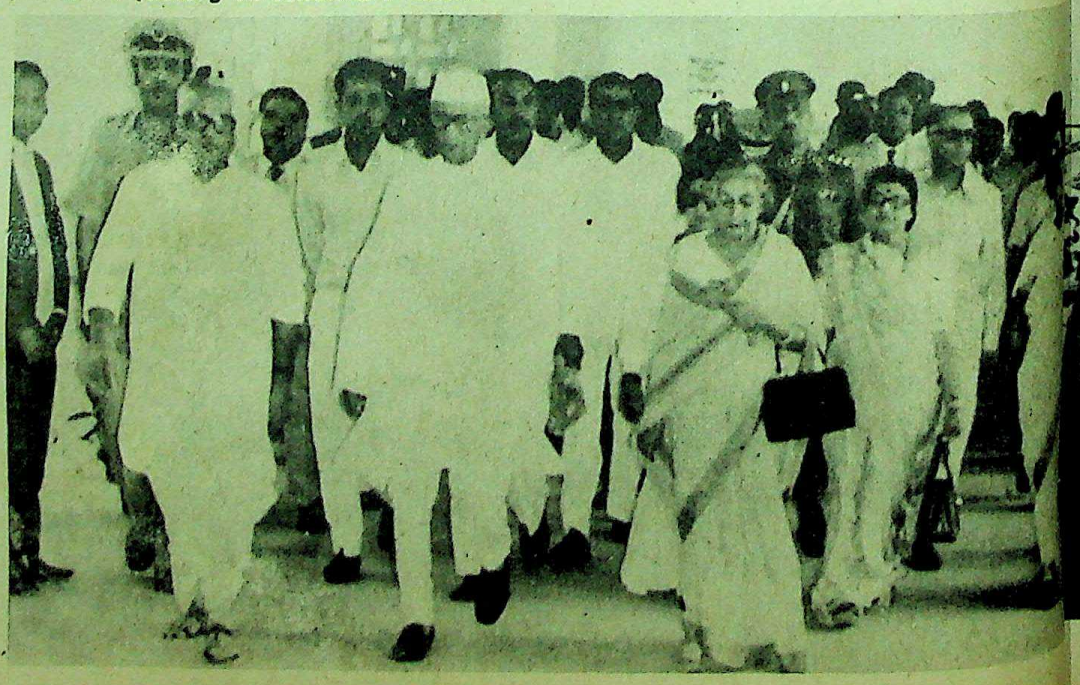
PN Balasubramaniam, the former Chairman of Barium Chemicals Ltd, who has received a lot of publicity due to his sensational allegations against the sons of two VVIPs—former Prime Minister Morarji Desai and former Defence Minister Jagjivan Ram—is a man with wide national and international contacts, both commercial as well as political. While he has himself shed some light on his close connections with Kantilal Desai, not many people know that Balasubramaniam was once very close to Mr. Krishna Menon, a former Defence Minister of India. Besides Mr. Menon, Balasubramaniam was a close friend of such important people as Nityanand Kanungo, the late Mr. Raghuramaiah, two other former Union Cabinet Ministers. There was always at least one Union Cabinet Minister on whom Mr. Balasubramaniam could rely for support.

Many are now trying to shy away from Mr. Balasubramaniam. But he has friends in almost all political Parties, be it CPI, CPI(M) DMK, AIADMK, Congress, Congress(I), Janata or Janata(S). Among the present day politicians, he had had close relations at one time or the other with Dr. Channa Reddy, Chief Minister of Andhra Pradesh, Mr. Vengal Rao, former Chief Minister of Andhra Pradesh, and Mr. Brahmanand Reddy, former Home Minister in Mrs Indira Gandhi's Government and the present Industries Minister. Mr. P. Ramamoorthy of the CPI(M), Mr. Rajaram of the AIADMK, Mr. Rajashekhar Reddy of the CPI are old political acquaintances of Balasubramaniam.

Balasubramaniam also struck up a friendship with Mrs Amteshwar Anand, mother-in-law of Sanjay Gandhi. According to one source, Sanjay Gandhi's mother-in-law used a frustrated friend of Balasubramaniam, V. Kalyanam, to expose the other Prime Minister's son, Kantilal Desai, when the Janata Government started troubling Sanjay Gandhi.

While the motivation behind Kalyanam's anti-Janata Party activities is a matter of speculation, it is a fact that he was tipping off anti-Desai leaders about the activities of Kantilal Desai, particularly where he stood to gain monetarily. Kalyanama who is staying in the USA now has, in a communication to Blitz (September 15) claimed credit for predicting that the trust the people of India had placed in the Janata Party under the leadership of Morarji Desai was misplaced. Kalyanam says, "I had predicted this in a circular on January 30, 1978 meant for all members of Parliament. Advance copies were sent to Mrs Gandhi, Charan Singh, Jayaprakash Narayan, and a dozen other important personages."

The ex-Prime Minister, Morarji Desai (second from left), Kanti Desai (third from right), Sharada Mukherjee, Governor of Andhra Pradesh with P. N. Balasubramaniam who can be seen behind and between Morarji Desai and Sharada Mukherjee. This photograph was taken in Balasubramaniam's factory in Andhra Pradesh



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

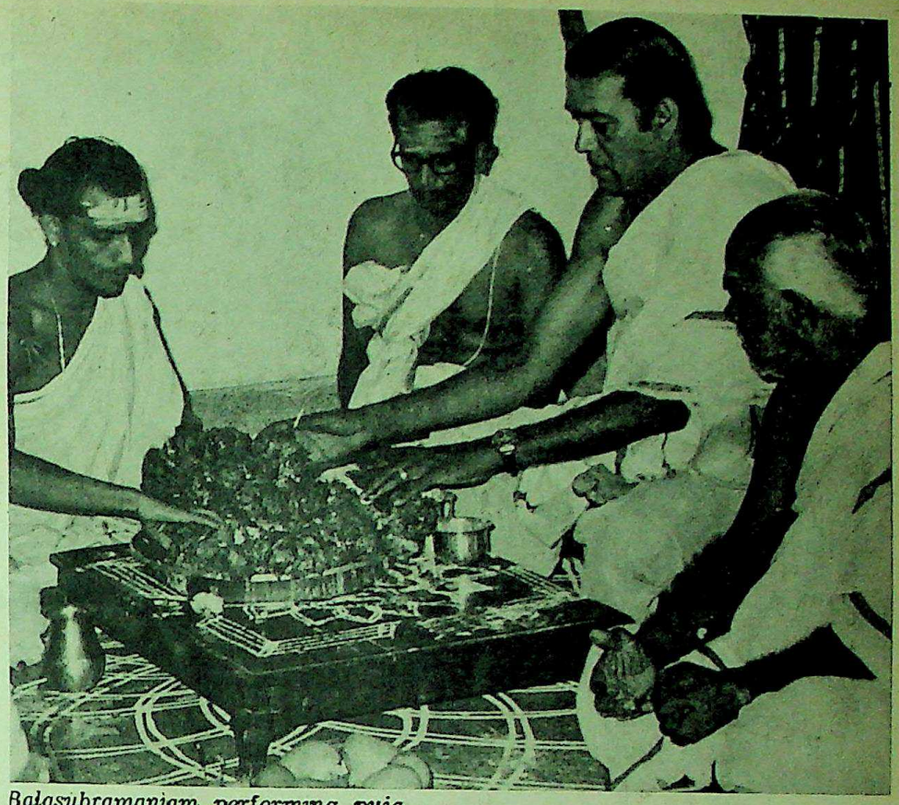
Whether Kalyanam exposed Kantilal Desai's activities to Morarji's opponents on his own, on Mrs Anand's suggestion or Balasubramaniam's direction remains to be determined but the fact is that he was very close to Bala and almost depended on him for his livelihood at one time. What is very strange, however, is that while Bala, who had jumped bail to go to Europe after the raids on his residential and business premises on June 4, 1979, decided to return to India after Chaudhury Charan Singh came to power and reveal the whole truth to an investigating agency regarding all the deals in which Kantilal Desai and Suresh Kumar (Jagjivan Ram's son) and other received foreign money, Kalyanam who is supposed to have tipped off Charan Singh about Kantilal Desai's affairs has decided to stay on in the USA. From there he is firing off communications condemning all politicians for the present ills of India. Had he only done that he would not have aroused suspicion. But after playing the character assasination game he began issuing good-conduct certificates to the CIA and foreign powers. The following sentence from Kalyanam's letter published in Blitz is significant. "For all the ills India is undergoing today, the politicians right from Prime Minister down are responsible not the CIA, not the foreign powers..."

A few things are, however, known about Mr. Balasubramaniam's international dealings as well. One, he was among the first dozen or at best two dozen businessmen in India who established strong business relations with socialist countries. Balasubramaniam was the sole agent of a Moscow based firm selling medicines and surgical instruments to foreign countries. He was also exporting goods to the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. Bala was also dealing with a Czech. firm and was instrumental in establishing a factory producing motorcycles with Czech collaboration. Mr. Balasubramaniam can of course argue that as a businessman he was not dealing with Russians and Czechs alone. He also had successful business collaborations with British, German, French and Japanese firms. (One could add to this list some Arab countries as well.) The picture would, however, be incomplete without mentioning the Israeli connection of Balasubramaniam through his one-time friend Kantilal Desai.



Balasubramaniam performing puja

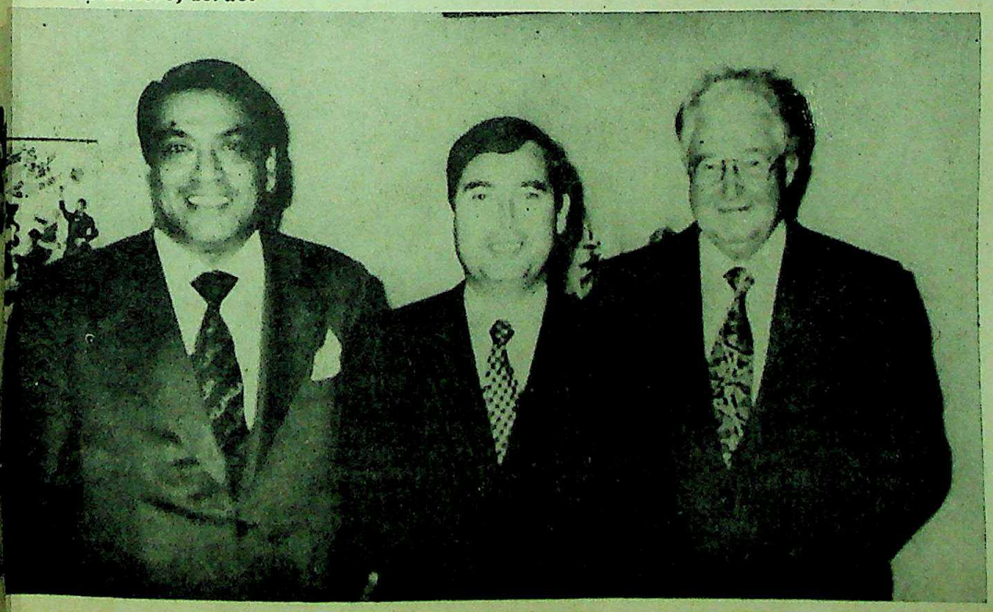
In his letter to the Prime Minister, Bala has alleged that Kantilal Desai had connections with an Israeli business firm, Consolidated Packers. In one of his statements Mr. Balasubramaniam has also alleged that he had received Rs. 30 lakhs from that source in foreign currencies in Geneva. "The amount", according to Mr. Balasubramaniam, "was paid to me by a partner of Kantilal Desai, Mr. Israel, one of the proprietors of Consolidated Packers, one of the richest men in Europe who was the official agent of the Israeli Government (and had) most probably a cover organisation of CIA."

Another aspect of Balasubramaniam's international links is exposed by yet another fact. After jumping bail in June when he went to Europe and after coolly rethinking his connections with Kantibhai he reported to his counsel Mr. Garg that he would come back to India "whenever the court wants me," he found himself being threatened by some Israeli agents. He thereupon decided to return to India. According to one report he came via Nepal escorted by PLO volunteers.

The fact that Mr. Balasubramaniam was very friendly with the late Krishna Menon, known for his anti-Americanism and leftist views, and that he is being defended in law courts by his able counsel R. K. Garg, also a known Communist, are indicative of Mr. Balasubramaniam's leftist associations.

There is no doubt that Balasubramaniam is in possession of such information and evidence which would prove fatal not only for some politicians, but bureaucrats and businessmen as well.

Balasubramaniam (extreme left) with Eisenberg, chairman of Consolidated Packers, Israel

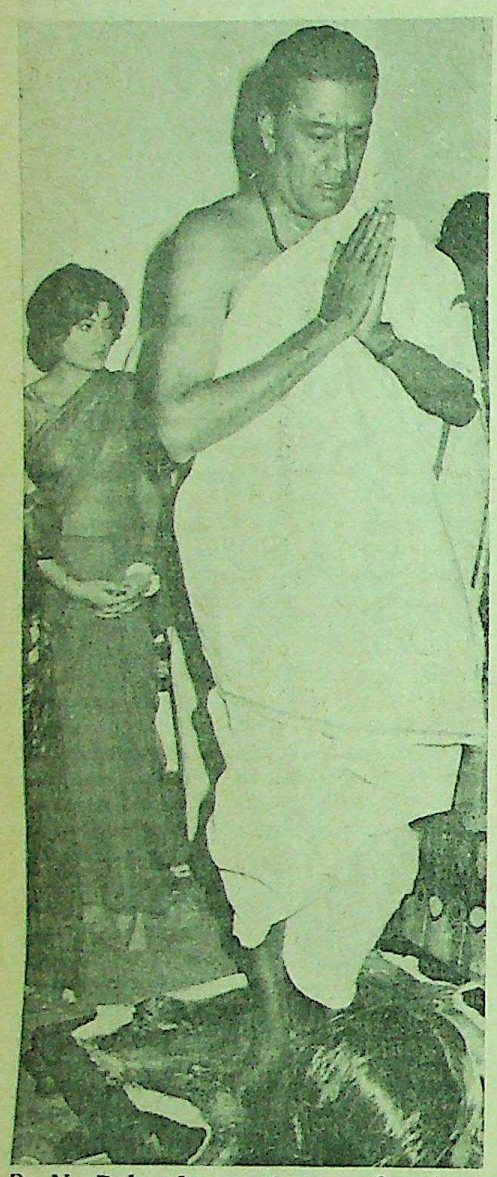


CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Man behind the myth

A profile of the colourful personality that is P. N. Balasubramaniam



P. N. Balasubramaniam performing puja. The woman behind him (in short hair) is Maneka Gandhi's younger sister

P. N. BALASUBRAMANIAM who prefers to call himself a technical-financial consultant is a very colourful personality. He was a student leader in pre-Independence days, a combat pilot in the Indian Air Force during the Second World War, a technician and administrator, an importer, an exporter, a business executive, a promoter of successful public limited companies, director and owner of several private limited companies, a man who has led a very fast life and travelled all over the world. He is also a man of religion — a yogi and a commissar (politician, if you wish to call him). It is true Bala (as he is known) has come into prominence recently because of his connection with Mr Kantilal Desai, ex-Prime Minister Morarji Desai's son. But Bala is not a sycophant of Kanti Desai. Though he is interested in business as well as in politics, he is not one who hangs around politicians to make most of the opportunities which come to him. Nor is he the kind of politician who depends on business houses for his personal and political needs. Anyone who has met Bala and observed him for some time from close quarters should not treat him lightly when he promises to tell the whole truth before "an appropriate machinery of investigation and enquiry." It is certain Bala will tell the truth of his shady deals at an appropriate time. Some striking features of Bala's colourful life and career are detailed below.

Born on April 15, 1924, in a Brahmin family of Tiruvannamalai, in the North Arcot district of Tamil Nadu, Bala was interested in politics when he was a student. He took part in the activities of the All India Students Federation and was its vice-president for South India, when Ansar Harvani, a former MP, was its All India president. Bala also was president of the Students' Union of Salem, from where he did his graduation. The intrepid young Bala wanted to do something striking and adventurous in his life. The war was on and it had offered opportunities to many a spirited young man to make a good career. Bala was attracted by flying and decided to become a pilot. He joined the Indian Air Force in 1942 and was soon commissioned as a combat pilot. A Flight Lieutenant now, Bala was on administrative duties and special assignments for the Indian Air Force both in India and abroad till March 1947. From a combat pilot and officer in the IAF he became a senior officer in the department of civil aviation, Government of India, in April 1947. This was a stepping stone for Bala but it did not sustain his interest for long. He resigned in April 1950.

After leaving the cosy and comfortable Government job Bala tried to renounce worldly comforts and become a sanyasi. But soon on the advice of a guru he took to a more adventurous life — of business combined with politics. He founded a firm called Balan and Rao, which owned mines of mica, iron ore, barytes, kyanite and gold. This firm had its offices throughout India and in leading cities abroad. With money already flowing in from the import and export businesses as well as mining, Bala began to forge political links. Since many of his compatriots of the student movement days were already in national and State politics, Bala did not have much difficulty in establishing contacts with political leaders. Though that did not help him to procure a ticket of any political Party, in the first General Election, Bala contested the Krishnagiri Lok Sabha seat as an Independent but lost. This setback in politics brought him back to business, in which his efforts were amply rewarded. During 1954 and 1957, Bala became a proprietor of Trans-World Trades and the sole agent in India of a Soviet firm, Med-export, Moscow, for dealing in bulk drugs, patent medicines and surgical instruments. Simultaneously he had several other general agencies, including the sole agency in India for Motokov, a Czech firm, in partnership with Ideal Motors, Bombay, for dealing in Jawa motorcycles. Bala, now a mine-owner, an exporter and importer and a sole selling agent of several foreign products decided to launch himself in industry as well. He obtained an industrial licence in the name of Ideal Motors for the manufacture of motorcycles and helped in setting up a plant in Mysore for the manufacture of Jawa motorcycles. From 1957 to 1961 his business activities expanded further and Bala managed industrial licences for two more plants — Barium Chemicals and Electric Portable Tools. Bala who had travelled all over Europe concluded the preliminaries for setting up the above plants including making arrangements for foreign collaboration, finance, etc.

Bala is a godfearing man and whenever he makes money as a result of successful business deals, he becomes more religious and turns to worshipping his gurus. His house in New Delhi to which access is not easy for a journalist, has a room for pujas. Bala lives in that room. One of Bala's gurus, the 155-year-old, Baba Atmanand Saraswati, has ordained that Bala should retire into a life of sexual abstinence — which is why no woman is allowed to enter his room. Seeking the advice and blessings of sages and sanyasis is a fad with Bala. His houses in Madras and other places in Andhra Pradesh too, have sacred places for worship. He is fond of holding religious ceremonies and businessmen as well as politicians flock to his house on all such occasions.

Bala's respect for religion and religious people has, however, not stopped him from leading a colourful life in the past. Bala can boast of beautiful friends, including ladies from many of the world's glamorous capitals — London, Paris, Prague, Bonn and New York. Living alone now (having divorced his wife some 15 years ago who had borne him a son, Ravi and a daughter Ranjeetha) Bala does not hide the fact that he has had many female friends who frequented his house. His photo-albums are full of colour and black-and-white photographs of many parties thrown by Bala in India and abroad. Some also show his children. What makes Bala an interesting character is his methodical manner of doing business, which he plans to the last detail. He has a way of approaching higher-ups and using them

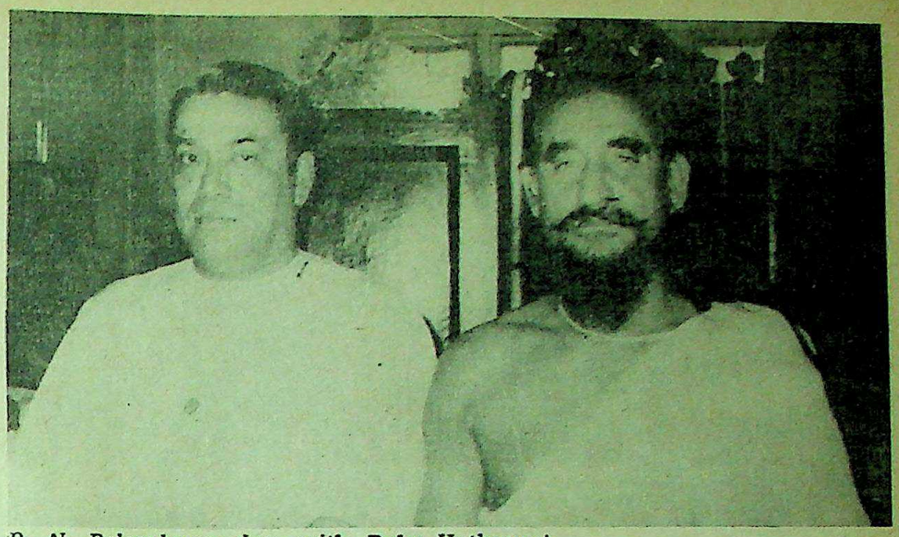
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Although he resigned from his Government job in 1950, he realised that no businessman could succeed in this country unless he had some top bureaucrats on his side. To get their support one needs to enter their circle. Bala did this by making friends with some former ICS men back in the Fifties and when he got the opportunity he demonstrated to the business community and bureaucrats that the country's best brains were with him. The Sixties were his heyday when he floated a public limited company, Barium Chemicals Limited, and became its chairman and managing director. He held that position till November 1973. Bala persuaded a number of former ICS officers — like V. P. Menon, the former Home Secretary — to serve on the board of directors of that company. So jealous was T. T. Krishnamachari, another Tamil Brahmin, with the announcement of the names of the board of directors that on the day the company's shares were offered for public issue, TTK wrote an article in a leading daily describing the board as a "Pinjrapole of former ICS officers". Bala was later involved in a legal battle with TTK which he won. His new company, according to Bala's estimates, saved £450,000 a year for the country by way of import substitution. The company, however, brought Bala once again into politics. He joined the Swatantra Party and contested the Warangal Lok Sabha seat, a stronghold of the Communist Party, and lost it only by a narrow margin. Though he lost the election he had by that time developed friendships with politicians and their families, including that of Mr Morarji Desai. Bala has described how he slowly but surely worked his way into Mr Desai's circle through Kantibhai, during his battle against TTK.

After over two decades of ascendancy in 1973, Bala sold Barium Chemicals Ltd. to the Sahu-Jains, an act that started a period of depression in his life. He lost a lot of his money in speculative ventures and for the next two to three years had to undergo hardship.

Bala is now leading a quiet life in his New Delhi house at 186, Golf Links. He has not been keeping good health and has left his defence in the court cases to his experienced and able counsel Mr R. K. Garg, a senior Supreme Court lawyer and former legislator of the UP Vidhan Sabha. Mr Garg normally refuses to appear as a counsel to defend tax dodgers or violators of the Foreign Exchange regulations but has taken up Bala's case because of its immense political importance. Incidentally Mr Garg had appeared for Barium Chemicals Ltd in the legal battle against T. T. Krishnamachari. Waiting to depose before an investigating agency in connection with the defence deals and other cases, Bala is avoiding journalists. He says, he will not speak to the Press because lawyers don't want him to say anything. However, he has not kept quiet. Recently, when Defence Minister, C. Subramaniam, discounted the possibility of payoffs in the Jaguar deals, Bala sent him a letter pointing out, "your defence of your predecessor and of the Jaguar Company can cause considerable harm to the nation as was done by your decision to devalue the rupee in 1966." Bala's letter received publicity in some newspapers and later the Defence Minister changed his stand and said action would be taken if evidence of payoffs in the Jaguar deal was discovered.



P. N. Balasubramaniam with Baba Hathayogi

'I was being used as an innocent pawn'

Transcript of P. N. Balasubramaniam's taped confession

I HAD a meeting with the Prime Minister of India at 2 p.m. on the 6th of June, at his office in South Block at Delhi. The meeting was arranged by his son Shri Kantilal Desai. I was told that the Prime Minister generally does not take any action unless matters are given to him in writing, and I was advised to take whatever I wanted to say in writing; so that action could be taken. So, before I went for the meeting, I took the contempt petition. I took with me the copy of the letter addressed to the Secretary, Home Affairs asking for permission to prosecute the officers against whom I had filed an FIR for theft and other criminal offences. I had also typed a note about the implications of what I was going to say, particularly the raid that took place at my residence at 186, Golf Links, New Delhi-3 on the afternoon of 4th June. In addition, I had also given in writing another statement that was looked after by my lawyers. I was prepared to pay the price for my mistakes, etc. The reason I went across to see him was because of a deep-laid conspiracy to unseat Mr Morarji Desai by his enemies, and the enemies of the country. I was being used as an innocent pawn in this high, powerful intrigue game. A little bit of my background is necessary before I record what took place between me and Mr Desai at this meeting.

I was the chairman and managing director of the Barium Chemicals Ltd. during the days of my battle with Shri T. T. Krishnamachari who was subsequently forced to resign because of the memorandum, submitted to the President. A major portion of the battle had been fought by me, with the help of my friends. Mr Kantilal Desai, the son of Mr Morarji Desai, and myself became close friends. Of course we became friends on the precept that the enemy's enemy is your friend! Later on, the very same selling agency of my company, the Barium Chemicals Ltd., for aspiring to which Shri T. T. Krishnamachari lost his job, was given to Mr Kantilal Desai's company, Bombay Industry and Chemical Company which is a family firm of Shri Morarji Desai, his sons, daughter-in-law and grandsons. Mr Morarji Desai had also invested in the firm, his money, family trust and also the money of his grand-children, for whom he was an additional trustee.

We had a very satisfactory relationship. They were given a commission of six per cent as their agency commission. I got a 'kick-back' of four per cent from them under the table. The arrangement lasted very well; it was a sellers' market. So there was no difficulty in selling the goods, and of course any premium that was available went to the benefit of selling agents. Again under the table, it was only because of the premium which was being paid to them under the table, that they were able to pay me back the 'kick-back', also under the table. In the year 1973 symptoms of arteriosclerosis appeared and my health became bad. I was forced to sell the management of the Barium Chemicals Ltd. to the Sahu-Jains. Whatever compensation I got, I lost in speculative ventures and I became a penniless pauper literally starving for my day-to-day sustenance, for a period of two-three years.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Throughout my life, I have been an anti-Congressman. I was a member of the Swatantra Party. I had contested the elections for the Parliament in the year 1952 from the Krishnagiri Parliamentary constituency and later again for the Parliament in the year 1967, from the Warangal Parliamentary constituency. On both occasions I lost by a very narrow margin. Throughout my life I had very good political connections and contacts. Mine was a quasi-political-economic-business exercise. I never had any family worth mentioning or any emotional involvement. So I was able to devote all my time and concentration to business, politics and other social activities.

During the Emergency I was in an unfortunate predicament of doing no business at all. My sympathy was with the Opposition. As a matter of fact, when Morarji Desai went to the Maidan to address the crowd, Mr Kantilal Desai flew that very evening to Geneva. I had earlier in the morning learnt from some of my friends, that all the leaders were going to be arrested that evening. I conveyed that to Mr Kantilal Desai, who consulted his father and left by nine o'clock that evening, by Lufthansa to Geneva. In his place, I took his father to the Ram Lila grounds and was with him. I was woken up at four in the morning by Balram and was told that Morarji Desai (babuji) was arrested and was being taken away. By the time I rushed to the place, he was gone. So I had been present right through the drama of the Emergency and the arrest of the top leaders of the Opposition. I went to the Parliament Street police station and learnt that Chandrashekhar and other leaders were also arrested at that time. Anyway, I came back. I informed Shri Kantilal Desai's wife that 'Babuji' had been arrested and that she should telephone her husband in Geneva. I did not want him to come back. Mr Kantilal Desai had given his address in London as that of Mr Ram Narain Kapoor of the Ritz Group of Hotels as well as the telephone number. I rang up Mr Kapoor from my telephone at night and told him to get in touch with Kanti, at Geneva, and inform him not to come back as things were serious. In other words, I was close with the family for over two decades, through thick and thin, politically, business and otherwise, and I was accepted as a part of the family.

Three months after the arrest of Mr Desai, Mr Kantilal came back after we got assurances from Mrs Gandhi that there would be no harm done to him. He used to visit my house regularly. Sometimes he used to stay with me at 186, Golf Links. In those days when he was treated by all business and social friends like a 'pariah', I used to boldly flaunt him as my friend, take him to the Club, take him out for lunches and dinners. Sometimes I used to take both Kantilal and Tonpe out on Sundays to the clubs—whether it be the Defence Services Club or the Delhi Gymkhana Club, and then tease Kanti; "Look at your friends, where are they?"

In March 1977, when the Janata was swept into power, wiping out the Congress, I played a leading part along with Mr Kanti Desai and other political friends in ensuring that Shri Morarji Desai was elected the Prime Minister by the Party, in preference to Mr Jagjivan Ram. As a matter of fact, for Jagjivan Ram, the Dabriwal brothers were paying two lakhs of rupees per Janata MP voting for Mr Jagjivan Ram. I came to know of it. At that time I met Mr Kalyanam, who was, about two months earlier, till the arrest of Mr Jayaprakash Narayan, his secretary. Kalyanam was earlier also secretary to Mahatma Gandhi, Lord Mountbatten and Jawaharlal Nehru. He went for a couple of years as secretary to Dr Subbarayon when he was in Indonesia. Morarji had brought him in, to be his private secretary at Delhi. But Mr Kantilal Desai did not like South Indians to be in his household. So he had joined me, and he was staying in my house, even though he was working unofficially as private secretary to Mr Morarji Desai. This was before Morarji Desai was elected Prime Minister.

Kalyanam and I got together the MPs, along with the money they had received from the Dabriwal brothers. We woke up Mr Jayaprakash Narayan and Mr Kripalani in the middle of the night, and proved to the satisfaction of both, that money was taking part in subverting the great revolution by making Mr Jagjivan Ram, the nominee of the big capitalists as the Prime Minister of India. It was because of this that both Mr Jayaprakash Narayan and Mr Kripalani came to the conclusion at about two in the morning, that the system of voting that was resorted to for electing the leader of the Janata Party should be scrapped, and that they should go by a system of consensus. Had there been voting Mr Jagjivan Ram would have won hands down. Because it was a consensus, a little fraud was perpetrated on the Janata Parliamentarians, by the 'Father of the Revolution', Mr Jayaprakash Narayan, and by the Sindhi, Acharya Kripalani. They decided that the consensus was in favour of Mr Morarji Desai. And that is how he became the Prime Minister of India.

We were the first, at four in the morning, when Morarji was ready, to garland him, to do the 'arathi' and everything. The first thing that Morarjibhai did before going to the Rajghat was to see Charan Singh in the hospital and obtain a letter from him stating that he will not join the Cabinet or the Janata Party if Jagjivan Ram were to be elected Prime Minister. This was another factor which made both Jayaprakash Narayan and Acharya Kripalani nominate Mr Morarji as the Prime Minister of India, and hide themselves under the word 'consensus'. As a matter of fact, I was with Morarjibhai throughout once it was announced that Morarji was the Prime Minister of India.

At about 11 o'clock in the morning, the President's officers came in, to 5, Dupleix Road to arrange for the swearing-in ceremony, the protocol details, etc. It was I who suggested to Morarji that he should not wait for the protocol to take place at four o'clock, as there was almost a civil war taking place within the Janata ranks by the supporters of Mr Jagjivan Ram, who were swearing and shouting. So, he was rushed before anybody else to the Rashtrapati Bhavan and sworn in as the Prime Minister of India much before all the other formalities could be made, so that the fact that he was the Prime Minister of India could be established beyond any doubt and there could be no disputes later on about it. All these and many other small and big actions of mine in that crisis, carried out perfectly with utmost discretion, made me close to the members of the Morarji family. It strengthened our relationship and our bond, and ideologically I was with them.

At one stage, I even had political ambitions of becoming a Minister of State if not a Deputy Minister at least. It was Mr Kantilal Desai who dissuaded me from becoming a Minister and persuaded me to concentrate on business and make some money. I said, I am a single man, what do I want with the money. This is a golden opportunity to do some service to the country, to be near his father and see that the Janata revolution succeeds. He said: "Listen to me. I need some trusted friends around me. For various reasons the Party is bankrupt, it needs money. It has to be maintained and consolidated. Where will I get a more dependable and reliable friend, with the finesse and experience that you possess. So don't be hasty. I will tell you when you should enter politics actively and when you should get into the Government, etc." And that is why I restarted my business which I had closed three years earlier.

The revolution of the people making the Janata Government in power which created terror in the hearts of those bureaucrats who were toadies and sychophants of the Gandhi regime and Ministers under Mrs Gandhi. They were the very first to try and curry favour. One such person who used to harass me and prosecute me the maximum was Mr S. B. Jain, director of Enforcement. Even though

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

I didn't know him he walked into my house one day and said that: "Mr Subramaniam, I know that you are close to the seat of power. Why don't you help me and save me." I said: "I have nothing against you, if you are innocent I will certainly help you." Naturally, I took him to the Prime Minister's residence, 5 Dupleix Road, and introduced him to Mr Kantilal Desai who exploited the situation, to settle the cases of his friends like Arvind Killachand, Dr Rossy and the bottling people—Chauhan—amongst hundreds of other close friends who were under cloud with the enforcement directorate. In May that year Morarji was going to London to attend the Commonwealth Conference. Mr Kantilal Desai said that I should also be in London at that time.

All the time Mr Kantilal Desai and Mr C. B. Gupta used to worry about the funds for the Party. Then they said: 'Bala why don't you apply your mind and see how best we can make some money'. In one of my casual discussions, when Mr S. B. Jain used to regularly visit my house, I said: "Come on, give us the names and particulars of the top smugglers, black-marketeers, bootleggers, and foreign exchange racketeers, so that we can try and get some money out of them for the Party." He said, "If you want the money for the Party it is very simple." I said: "How is it simple?" He said: "After the lifting of the Emergency at least 80 per cent of the people against whom warrants had been issued cannot stand the scrutiny of the law. We have no grounds at all for their detention. We could get away with it because of the Emergency. Now we have no other choice but to cancel the warrants issued against them—almost 95 per cent of them are outside India, without realising that the warrants issued against them are likely to be cancelled before law. All you have to do is to find out the names of those persons against whom the warrants have been withdrawn. The warrants' withdrawal will not be published as their issue was also not published and it is a Government secret. I will get you the list from Mr Ramachandran, joint secretary, Enforcement, and if you are clever you can bargain with them and collect some money without violating the rules and laws of the country."

I obtained the list of the persons and there were 140 names against whom warrants had been issued and cancelled. I also found out from Mr S. B. Jain, where these people were living abroad and also their addresses from their relations in India. Having got this, I concentrated on the people living in England. The first few I concentrated on were the Gupta brothers of Jaipur — all the four brothers were wanted under warrants, under COFEPOSA. They had escaped to Nepal and from Nepal they went to England. They had made a fortune in England during the Emergency and did not know that the warrants against them had been cancelled. I tried my first experiment with them. I called them over to my friend's flat where I was staying, told them that it was a golden opportunity to get the warrants against them under COFEPOSA cancelled, if they could meet my friend, Mr Kantilal Desai, and through him the Prime Minister of India. They said they would like to meet them. So I took all the four brothers to Mr Kaul's house—our High Commissioner in London—where Morarji Desai and Kantilal Desai were staying. There I introduced them to Mr Morarji Desai and later on we made a deal in my room at the hotel with the four brothers. The brothers agreed to pay rupees one crore if they were allowed to enter India and if the warrants against them would be cancelled. Of course, warrants against them had already been cancelled and there was no warrant pending against them. So we told them to first pay rupees 25 lakhs to Kantilal Desai and one of them should take the risk of coming with us to India. If nothing happens to you, you know that the warrants have been cancelled. All you have to do is to call on the Enforcement directorate and say that: 'Sir I have come to surrender. Is there anything you are going to do', and the Enforcement director would record a statement saying that there was nothing against them and they can go back after their explanations to certain queries. We tried this with the youngest Gupta first and then the second brother came after which the third brother came and then the fourth. Of course, all of them paid the money first, which was deposited in the account of Mr Kantilal Desai in Geneva.

Bala (second from right) with former Andhra CM

Then the Gupta brothers saw to it that the other people who were afraid of the COFEPOSA warrant and who were living in Hong Kong, Indochina, Switzerland, Europe and America were informed about the bonanza that had fallen into their lap, by having Shri Kantilal Desai and Shri Subramaniam to arrange for the cancellation of their warrants. Then one by one, everybody started queuing up to come home. In this manner, 180 COFEPOSA persons who were living abroad, against whom in the normal course the warrants were cancelled by the Government of India paid Mr Desai and the Janata Party over rupees 18 crores to my knowledge. But after some time Mr Desai started dealing with them directly so that I do not know the actual amount that has been collected by him. And I did not come to know about this transaction after the first three months when I had established it as a fool-proof exercise of collecting funds for Mr Desai and the Janata Party. I got a lumpsum payment of thirty lakhs in India and when I remonstrated that it was no use to me in India and that I wanted it abroad, an equal amount was paid to me in Geneva. The amount was paid to me by a partner of Mr Kantilal Desai, Mr Israel, one of the proprietors of Consolidated Packers—one of the richest men in Europe, and the official agent of the Israeli Government for all their factories' production, but most probably a cover organisation of the CIA.

Mr Kantilal Desai, after the Prime Minister was sworn in, made sure that his personal friends alone became the men of importance around the Prime Minister. Mr Shankar was with the Cochin Shipping, of his friend R. N. Kapoor before the Janata victory, he was also working for B. M. Birla; Mr Hasmukh Shah is again Kantilal's man as also Mr Tonpe. All the PAs appointed were those PAs who were Kantilal's men when Mr Morarji Desai was Deputy Prime Minister. No new person was allowed to enter the Secretariat, either in the South Block or the residence until Mr Kantilal approved them. In other words, the Prime Minister was a prisoner of his personal staff, who were all Kantilal Desai's men. And the main principle of collecting money for the Party and other extraneous purposes was to use this whole organisation en masse S & T for privacy, security/secrecy and other factors. This firm, Consolidated Packers had three partners, the top-most brilliant man is Mr Israel Enoff, the second is Mr Joseph Herman, then Mr Natham Rothe, who was the Head of the Security of Israel and the Head of Intelligence of Israel and the Head of the Security of the Israeli Airlines—Elal—the mastermind and the perfect executioner of the Entebbe exercise carried out by the Israelis. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Secret Sex Life of the Sai Baba

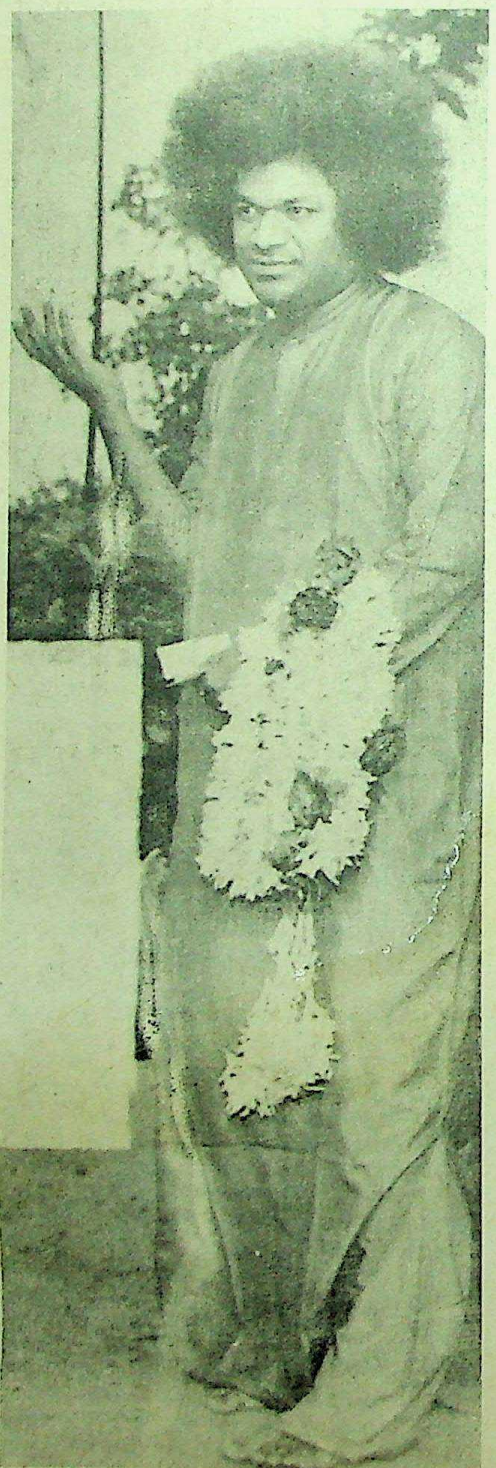
By PRITISH NANDY

WHAT can you say about a wandering American who sells his home and hearth and comes to India in search of new spiritual pastures—and stumbles headlong into a diabolic racket of miracle men and millionaires, which he exposes, writes a book, collects his hardback royalties, and then catches the first flight homewards, with tears in his eyes, mumbling the nineteenth chapter of the Book of Revelations under his breath?

Would you say that he is honestly and truly a champion of truth, who has done society yeoman service by exposing the miracle man of Puttaparthi, at reportedly considerable personal risk? Would you say that this peripatetic American came to the land of yogis and snake charmers, gurus and godmen to discover the hidden meaning of life—and was hopelessly disappointed by the magic potion offered him in the inner sanctums of Whitefield, where the diminutive avatar resplendent in his bright red robe, Bronco Nagurski hair-do, and cherry pink lips reigned supreme with his baby talk and legerdemain? Or would you say that he is the stereotype of the typical mixed-up young man from the west who was up to his neck in a harsh, materialistic world of cut-throat competition before Calvinistic guilt and existential despair took over in predictable symbiosis—and he chose to opt out, right into the hirsute arms of a crazy, Dravidian hermaphrodite who took him on a magic ride through a short-lived phantasy world of myth, miracle and multicoloured lust?

I, for one, would rather believe that Tal Brooke, the mendicant tyro, is, like the Sai Baba himself, an expert bluff master who has made his millions by charlatanry of the same genre, writing a book that is as crass, crude and in abysmally bad taste as the books that the Baba sponsors himself to line his pockets and establish his credentials as India's most charismatic approximation to God incarnate. Quite honestly, there is very little to choose between the two. Baba is obviously a fraud even as he sits on his millions at Puttaparthi. Tal Brooke is a scheming little neophyte who chances upon the skeletons in the Baba's cupboard and tries to make a quick buck. And as the macabre spiritual chess game is played out between the lascivious luminary and his apostate apostle, he who shells out Rs 75 to buy this book is given a ringside glimpse into the palace intrigues at Whitefield.

Sai Baba, Lord of the Air is indeed a difficult book to swallow and then keep quiet about once you have waded through its 408 execrable pages. It is the kind of book that leaves you seething in rage for days. A book that makes you indignant because a stupid, sub-literate American rams down your esophagus his vague, disjointed precepts of Vedantic philosophy—and then does a quick double-take to end up as a Jesus-freak. A freak Mr Brooke is, and quite unabashedly. He first freaks out on a distant land, India—without a clue as to what it is all about. He then sells his soul to the Mephistopheles of Indian spiritual thought, follows it up by selling off all his worldly possessions in distant Virginia, and then takes a cheap flight into India—to let his mendicant soul journey through the lush, spiritual landscape of our beautiful Hindu world, little realising that there are thugs, pickpockets and godmen lurking in every corner and waiting for the poor little firingee, lonely and waylost.



Though Mr Brooke is delightfully had, in more senses than one, by the sensual Sai Baba at whose feet he throws himself in humble obeisance, he quickly recovers—and like the true-blue American that he is, finds love, solace and spiritual sympathy at Reverend Ivan Carroll's, "where they all sang Christmas carols and made themselves at home in a genuine American household with chairs, tables, dressers, a couch or two, bric-a-brac, a piano, and regular toilets", thank heavens! So, finally, Mr Brooke finds his spiritual fulfilment in lustily croaking "Rock of ages cleft for me" and catches another cheap flight back to Uncle Sam —while the lonely, lustful godman waits like a praying mantis for his next firingee victim.

This story, typical as it is, replete with LSD trips, spiritual guilt, angst and naufrage, quotes from Yung, Blake, Emerson and Martin Buber, Carlos Castaneda and the perennial Timothy Leary, ambassador at large of the campus drug syndrome, references to Zen Buddhism, the Tibetan Book of the Dead, mystic cosmologies, Eleusinian initiates, Paul Tillich, and Nad Yoga, Deuteronomy and Donald Duck, and of course Tantra, the western man's ultimate mind-blower, would have been just another tale of a village bumpkin bumbling his way through the dangerous spiritual woods of India, where everyone of us is waylaid some day or the other. But Tal Brooke wrote a book thereafter—and a successful book if Vikas is to be believed—trying to expose not just the Sai Baba but to proselytise—and that is what makes all the difference between naivete and fortune-hunting. Among many other things in his tome, Mr Brooke tries to explain his view of Hinduism to us, to rationalise his sexual experiments with the Baba, justifying why precisely he allowed Baba's nimble fingers to zip down his fly in a moment of devotional bliss, and why he subjected himself to the somewhat unusual experience of making it out with a real life hermaphrodite, the Baba himself!

Tantric power, my foot! The poor firingee could not even successfully respond to Baba's sexual overtures

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

—and turned out to be almost as frigid as a block of ice in a tarantula's grip! At crowded darshans, Baba would apparently seek out his favourite acolyte, sneak up behind him along a crowded aisle of Indians, and then stand directly behind him with his legs and robe (and whatever else hermaphrodites have) pressed against Tal Brooke's bottom, "pretending it was just an accident as he scanned the mass of devotees outside"—this familiar gesture, the connotations of which would be transparent to even the most dumb-witted schoolboy, only "served to fuel a sense of spiritual purpose" in Mr Brooke. With similar Redneck logic, he saw an entire spiritual universe in Baba's mysterious eyes, when the godman grabbed him in a velvet-draped private suite during an intimate audience, hugged him extra-tight, panted heavily and "kept twisting his pelvis, especially in the region of the loins, nudging and twisting, twisting and nudging", cooing into his ears things like "What's wrong? You do not like to hug?" Tal Brooke, in his utter simplicity, perceived this as an initiatory rite, a kind of spiritual love test by the Baba to check if he had learnt to subjugate his libido.

Mind you, such incredible naivete comes from the same man who struts like a stuck-up peacock in his preface to the book, spreading out all his feathers of wisdom. He makes you feel like an insignificant worm as he flaunts his knowledge of Hinduism right before your eyes and tells you that he knows the inwards of the faith better than Jim Corbett knew Kumaon or Rana Pratap, Kumbalgarh. Brooke, you realise, is one of those rare specimens who had comprehended the kernel of Advaita even before he could exclaim "Gee, this is a wonderful place to be in!" His background was oh so different from the usual westerner. From his very early childhood he had experienced the stirrings of Kundalini Shakti and in his twenties he had undergone the Nirvikalpa Samadhi in its full magnitude!

"In India", claims Brooke himself, "I differed greatly from that so common westerner who just wants to take a peek and then get out. I was defensive on India's behalf before my own countrymen (though honestly critical as well) and should I ever detect arrogance on the face of my countrymen in regard to India, I would assail them bitterly". After all, he had travelled the globe "as the son of a highly gifted man of letters, who was also a diplomat". "I had tasted numerous cultures and climes and found areas in my soul that were able to absorb them all. My family was agnostic, so I had to seek out from scratch the spiritual answers for existence" A worthy reason to come out to India, true. One is further impressed when one is told that Mr Brooke even brought along with him a letter from one Sri Bhavyananda, who is supposed to be the head of the Ramakrishna Math in London, who wrote that in his opinion our hero was eminently ready for sanyas because he knew such intimate details about the lives of Ramakrishna's disciples—Turiyananda, Premananda, Brahmananda, Vivekananda and the rest! Apparently, sastris, pundits and swamis all over India found Mr Brooke a "young master", who had "true understanding" of everything Hindu.

With credentials such as these, and armed with all his spiritual wisdom, almost bursting at the seams with superhuman Vedantic power, our hero hopped into a jet plane and flew across the Atlantic to the land of Shankaracharya and the Buddha, to satisfy his passion to know the truth, to see for himself the fountainhead of knowledge. Significantly, he landed in Delhi on October 13, 1969—and somehow his luck ran out on him the minute he walked into the YMCA hostel on the outskirts of Connaught Place. He found the rates exorbitant and began despising the poor little clerk who sat behind the reception counter. And because our poor Mr Brooke, like any human being, was tired of jet lag and full of sleep he let the adrenaline in his blood get the better of his trained Vedantic mind. All that he could do, poor man, was to go to a cheaper hotel and watch a wise lizard make faces at him while he tried to desperately get his much needed forty winks.

While he cooled his heels in this sleazy joint, our hero continued his musings—and I quote here an example of his petulance and putrid prose. "The (hotel) room was so humid that it was like floating on a cork in a thermos bottle of hot bouillon. A life saver would have melted on a table in about three minutes. Not only that, but what must have been a good bed now sank right down to the floor like a hammock and if you tried to lie on your side it was like a sustained yogic posture on a bed of nails because the springs came through the mattress like burs, and made such a loud noise that they sounded like the day shift at an iron foundry. I watched the large blades of the ceiling fan spin around, and soon noticed the road maps of cracks networked across the whole ceiling and down the walls. I also noticed fleeting movements at the periphery of my vision. When I moved my eyes to catch the fluttering, it stopped. Suddenly from nowhere, I saw the source of the movement. Fluttering again, then freezing, I saw a large lizard. It ran along the ceiling with as much ease as most creatures move along the ground. I pictured it losing its grip at night right above my head, falling on my face, or worse, in my open mouth, where it might flutter for a while and leave an amputated tail to dance on my epiglottis." Such philosophising by our hero reveals three cardinal truths: one that he is prone to hallucinations in humid conditions; two, he writes staggeringly bad prose; three, he sleeps with his mouth open —and possibly even snores!

How sad, how terribly heartbreaking that our demi-god who had gone through the entire process of realising Kundalini Shakti while he was still hopping in and out of a Mothercare play-pen should send up such loud and long wails of disgust the very day he arrives in the country of his dreams!

From Delhi Brooke went to Rishikesh and was left unimpressed by the magnificence of the Himalayan range even as the other foreign tourists were going into full-fledged hysterics at the very sight of the snow-capped peaks. Even the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, who had swept the Beatles and Mia Farrow off their feet, could not make our friend budge even a single milimetre. And disappointed with the north of India, Brooke did precisely what every mixed-up American does—he headed straight for Goa, where he discovered that the local hippies were dirt beneath his delicate, well-bred feet. So he left Calangute beach and headed towards bustling Bombay, "in a last bid to search for a spiritual dynamo" that would recharge his soul batteries.

In the cosmopolitan hubbub of Bombay Tal Brooke realised that he was destined to see out Sai Baba, the miracle man of Puttaparthi, full time avatar and God incarnate, and so he promptly dropped his plans of shaking hands with Krishnamurthy (who must have been busier shaking the fragile hands of Parveen Babi), and abandoning hopes of landing himself at the Aurobindo Ashram at Pondicherry or even the good old, even if well worn, Ramkrishna Math at Calcutta, he decided to head for the south of India and the portals of Sai Baba's residence. But oh for this wise decision you would have never forgiven the young pundit, who schooled in a schizophrenic world of oriental metaphysics and occidental LSD trips was about to begin the most dangerous part of his journey through the spiritual landscape of this country. And despite the picaresque rumble-tumble, in and out of colourful locales, the sex interest, the villainy and the comic relief, the intrigues and the heartbreaks, Tal Brooke emerges as the vain effete peacock, a counterfeit tugboat trying to sail through the ocean of samsara True, the Baba gets off no better—but that is another story.

IN Bombay, at the plushest of hotels, the Taj a wily Indian ran away with our hero's money—mind you, Tal Brooke knew all the while that he was going to get rooked but was only trying to see if his yogic intuition was working all right — and so when the eternal vagabond arrived at Whitefield he fell at the feet of Shri Sathya Sai Baba with not a farthing in his pocket. But the Baba was all-knowing and all-loving. He gave him a beatific smile and chimed. "Hellooo Rowdeeee! What's wrong, some sickness in the stomach?" Our hero was much impressed by such an incredible demonstration of psychic power and smiled shyly before reply ing with some embarrassment, "Yeah, Baba!" since he had been having stomach trouble, despite his diet of Nirvikalpa Samadhis, switching from one brand of bacillary dysentery to another, with probably the occasional amoeba to boot.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

While he was trying desperately to recover from the traumatic experience of the all-knowing Baba predicting the precise state of his rather sensitive stomach, the psychic onslaught continued. The Baba waved a hand in the air and produced, as he is often prone to, vibhuti from apparently nowhere—and then radiated his much discussed magnetic force, thus reducing our hero to pliable plasticene in his divine hands. Once Mr Brooke was convinced that only Sai Baba, with his mellifluous voice and his raspy Eartha Kitt intonation, could redeem his soul and show him the straight and narrow path of righteousness, he went all out to be the Baba's beau. It mattered little how the other rival Yankees at the ashram, led by Gill, felt about Tal Brooke's intrusion into the inner sanctums of Sai Baba's ashram and heart. Our hero had already made up his mind to accept the Baba as his guru—after the stomach prediction and the vibhuti! And the crafty Sai, once he had convinced his newest and presumably the handsomest American bhakta with voodoo and magic, mellifluous voice and legarde-main that he was the greatest, "the only real, spiritual dynamo of India", set out stealthily to satisfy his long suppressed carnal instincts, if we are to believe Tal Brooke. For even as the magic man told his disciples by day that life was like an ocean of waves and to cross it we have to seek a lifeboat in God, by night he would grab the occasional shishya in the dark corridors of his ashram and pull down his fly.

For days now the tenderest part of Mr Brooke had been fortressed "like the wall of China around the Temple of Solomon" and almost no one was allowed into the cockles of his battered heart. But the Baba was different. He broke down all barriers with his simple playfulness and his Krishna-like charm. Brooke was swept off his feet by Baba's love and innocence.

"With quick bristling movements Baba's gown swept by me as he mounted the stage on tiny, child-sized feet. He sat on the floor on the platform, supporting himself with an extended arm, with feet curled up beneath him...Baba was an immortal flower. Stronger than anything on the continent, he didn't need to come-on-strong, yet could probably melt the centre of the moon with one single titanic thought...Baba spoke. 'God is love. God is everything', cutting to the core of everything in utter simplicity. 'God is like the sun and man is like a flower. The sun shines on the flower and the flower grows towards the sun, becoming beautiful and giving off sweet nectar. The nectar is prema—love—God's love. Love is one, love is God."

Having thus caught our hero in his magic web of allegory and saccharine talk, the Baba decided to accost him alone, during the course of a private audience. And despite all the previous love tests and bottom-pinching games that the guru and shishya had played with each other, Tal Brooke now realised for the first time what the Baba's actual intentions were. But let me leave it to Mr Brooke to describe the incident in his own words here.

"We embraced automatically. His wiry cloud of hair surrounding my face, I wondered what kind of deep soul-cleansing was going on. Then huge force surged from Baba to me, almost visibly sparking...

Baba reached out to embrace me again, pulling me in strongly. The musing voice pondered Baba's comment, 'There is no male or female'. The embrace of Radha-Krishna, the avatar of the Dwarka Yuga and his lover, was the highest resolution of two polarities. And since the avatar was trans-sexual, his embrace of Arjuna was roughly equivalent, with everything but the basics taken away...

Yet I couldn't quite tell who was in the male mode more, and who was in the female or passive. I always identified myself as distinctly and invariably male. And there was a feminine dimension to Baba, whom many devotees also worshipped as the divine mother. Yet he had an exceedingly strong male aspect as well. And avatars invariably came as males, after all.

Baba's nudging pelvis stopped. Then suddenly a hand unzipped my fly, with the facile smoothness of turning a doorknob, and went into my pants, as though it knew the location of each stitch of cloth and each zipper stub. Then, like an adder returning home at dusk, the hand burrowed into the mouth of my underpants...

Baba's hips continued to shift again as he squeezed a rather limp organ, that had about as much interest in rising up as it desired a bath in liquid helium. It was frozen out, and not even a legion of nude Arab women could thaw it out at this point in less than several days of total solitude.

Baba's rapid breathing did not exactly register lethargy or unexcitement. The voice of reason proposed, 'He's cooling your heat centre, taking on your sins, and purifying your lower chakra'. However Redneck logic also sat on the judiciary board, mumbling subsurface before I could censor the embarrassing thoughts from leaking out.

'Man, I sure hope all that squeezing is purification because if it ain't, Jack—and that's a strange way to be purifying it—you've picked the wrong guy. It'd be a lot easier if you'd just radiate the thing from outside my pants. Somehow it just looks bad the way you're doing it."

Anyone in his senses, instead of debating over the situation and its divine concomitants, would have kicked the Baba hard on the shin and run for his life. But our hero is made of much stronger stuff.

Having thus passed the initiation with flying colours, so what if the rooster refused to rise to the occasion, Mr Brooke began to slowly gather a lot of power in Sai Baba's ashram and before long became the Baba's very favourite disciple, much to the chagrin of the veteran shishyas. Brooke was one of those very few who were allowed a private audience any time he wanted it. He travelled with the Baba from Whitefield to all the major cities of India, watched millions come to worship the avatar, continued to be awe-struck by his miracles, and sat at his lotus feet, almost rubbing his cheek on the Baba's thigh, singing bhajans lustily.

He was able to also get an intimate glimpse into the down-to-earth business sense that this over-sexed godman displayed. He discovered that the Baba's material power was almost as great as his spiritual strength. He ran the entire operations at his ashram like a well-organised industry. The massive celebrations during Guruparav, Shivratri and other such festivals took poor Tal Brooke's breath away. He was overwhelmed by Baba's love and shackled to his charity. He withstood the petty wrangles and ashram intrigues plotted by Phil and Prem and Mark and Wendel and resisted the wrath of Raja Reddy, an old hand at the game, who was jealous of his intimacy with the Sai Baba. But once the dust of magic had settled, the hysteria faded and the sperms ran dry, Tal Brooke, poor devil, was not too sure of his devotion. The same man who had almost kissed Sai Baba's feet and hailed him lord and master was slowly turning into a selfish namakharam. "For a while I received extraordinary attention from Baba, but something inside me was slowly crumbling. Occasionally there were distractions...A deeper feeling of uneasiness swept through my soul. I knew that I was caught in an inner war of faith. And what I longed for more than ever was some kind of spiritual drama to turn my mind's eye from the eye of the hurricane."

It needed a series of secret planchette sessions, occult forays, nightmares and gory dreams, and the help of a fellow white-skinned yogi Surya Das, and the ever-faithful missionaries, the delightfully old-fashioned Carrolls of Bangalore, to finally drive into his muddled head that the Baba was only a passing phase and Jesus was the true guardian of his soul. Overnight the Vedanta of his childhood was forgotten. The Nirvikalpa Samadhi faded. And in the twinkling of an eye Hindu metaphysics gave way to his ever-ready Christian zeal. And the Baba, sadly, like a fading Shylock, became synonymous with Satan, as Jesus took over.

"Early that morning I resolved in my heart that I would break through to Baba...Mounting within me was that inner fire that stops at no barrier, this time to settle something once and for all, though I was not sure how yet... Within my heart I felt nausea, revulsion, a deep indignation of the spirit. As though the spirit that inhabited the bright-robed body was so putrid, so foul, so horrifying that if the crowd of disciples could for a second see it denuded, they would wail in horror, they would scream and run in terror... Suddenly he really reminded me of a diminutive aunt Jemima, a wrangling bitch who had lost authority over me and now had to bluff. 'Rowdie, complete spoil. Go, get out here...' I had seen this sort of thing crush people. Perhaps he thought that it would crush me but I began to smile inwardly."

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The final discovery that Baba was a closet queen—a hermaphrodite—snapped the last links. Patrick, an Anglo-Indian shishya with long hair and good looks, came for the Baba's darshan with a group of Americans on a dharma kick. One look at the sensual Patrick, and the Baba apparently called him in for a private interview session. After his usual materialising tricks and telling Patrick his inner secrets, the Baba apparently attacked his fly and took out whatever poor Patrick had to offer, little realising that he was no American on a brief visit but the boy who lived down the lane.

Patrick, only seventeen, horny and perhaps a little naive, was curious to see the whole thing through—and it was this liberal curiousity of his that finally exposed this most hidden secret of Whitefield. "Baba lifted his robe and inserted the thing. That's right. Maybe he's got a woman's organ and a man's organ down there. Yeah, a hermaphrodite. But he honestly inserted it. Patrick said it felt just like a woman's... Just at the moment before Patrick was through, Baba pulled him out and collected his semen in a little white handkerchief... Baba then told him that the whole world lay in the palm of his hand, and that everything Patrick wanted, he could have. That Baba was planning a special position for him, like Raja Reddy. That Patrick could move in and live there, and be with Baba to spread his mission throughout the world. Suddenly Patrick didn't give a hoot. He may have even laughed and told Baba that he was from just down the road, and that he wasn't even an American."

Patrick was apparently not alone. Other than our hero and Patrick there were many others similarly "purified" by the Baba, according to this book. There was Wendel and Phil; there was Alpine Schwartz, a tall dude with a blue ski cap, who described how Baba pulled his drawers down during a private interview, on the pretext of cleansing it of its "heat". There was Gordon, the jewel cutter from Los Angeles, who ran out of a private audience, screaming and panic-stricken when the Baba pulled down his fly and "started to go to town".

After all this, it is not surprising that our hero kept seeing 666 each time he looked at the Baba and started thinking of Satans and anti-Christs each time he watched the miracle man at work. He starts by quoting the twentyfourth chapter of Matthew and thereafter the barrage of biblical quotations continues unabated. With the hardcore devotion (and naivete) with which this simple-minded American had thrown himself at the Baba's feet, he does a quick double-take and finds himself at the feet of his new messiah, the lord Jesus Christ. What surprises one is the incredible speed with which he shifts the gears of his faith, from Sai bhajans to Rock of Ages in less than 48 hours of knowing that he was no longer the Baba's favourite stud!

Alas, again our hero has been had! From the Taj Mahal hotel to Whitehead ashram, Mr Brooke is waylaid again and again—at the very fountainhead of Vedantic wisdom. It is not surprising therefore that he catches the first flight homewards—but not before he sold a manuscript to Vikas, which they later published, profited from, and paid sizable royalties for. Sai Baba will perhaps survive this book, and carry on his trade. About Tal Brooke I am not so sure.

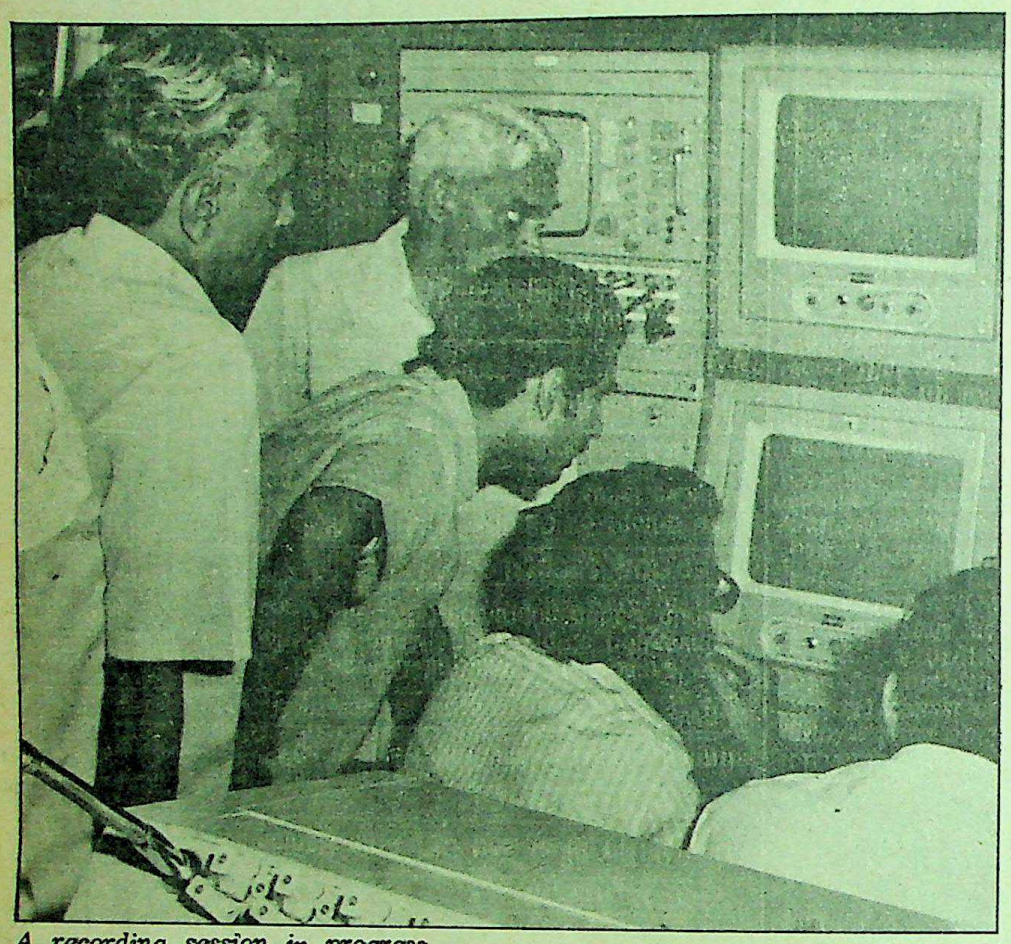
Sai Baba, Lord of the Air by Tal Brooke; Vikas Publishing House Pvt Ltd, New Delhi; Rs 75

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The censorship game

Calcutta TV is its new playground



A recording session in progress

ON August 31, Doordarshan Kendra, Calcutta, telecast their regular half-hour programme in Bengali, Drishtikon (Viewpoint), at 8.10 p.m. The participants : Mr Sankar Ghosh (Jt Editor, Amrita Bazar Patrika) and Mr Barun Sengupta (Political Correspondent, Ananda Bazar Patrika). Moderator: Mr Sudhangsu Dasgupta (law professor, Calcutta University). Subject: Mid-term polls. Unfortunately this half hour programme never completed its half hour. Towards the end of the discussion, halfway through Mr Ghosh's submissions, snip went the TV scissors — and with it, a major chunk of Mr Barun Sengupta's views, which followed, as well. The question had related to the possible results in the new Lok Sabha and to the possibility of inflation being made an issue in the forthcoming elections. Mr Ghosh had felt that the minorities' vote may go in favour of Mrs Gandhi and against Charan Singh. Mr Sengupta's views had been that Mrs Gandhi was likely to win, with Charan Singh coming in second only — and that, despite Left support. He felt that Mrs Gandhi would gain absolute majority unless Jagjivan Ram snatched away Harijan votes from her. He added that CPI(M) would do well in West Bengal. All this was deleted. Instead, confused viewers were fed with stills from lovely nature for some six minutes, before TV went on to a music programme. No regrets "owing to unavoidable circumstances", no apologies, no explanations, no nothing.

TV maintained that "what had been recorded, had been shown" and they had "nothing more to say" The next day, however, Miss Mira Mozoomdar, Director, Doordarshan Kendra, Calcutta, stated that she had an objection to Barunbabu's views and felt that if they were telecast they could create unhappy political reactions, from certain political Parties. Adding that she had obtained the permission of Barunbabu prior to the cuts she said that the cuts were of four minutes only. Unfortunately, they did not have the time to cut at the time of recording or before telecasting, so it had to be done while it was being telecast—but after considerable deliberation.

The participants, it has been verified, had met before the recording, at the TV centre, and had discussed the outline of the entire programme in the presence of Mr Debangsu Bandopadhyay, the producer of the programme. It has also been verified from the three participants that they were only asked to avoid abusive references to any person or institution, a normal TV norm : otherwise, there were no objections. The qustions to be asked and their serial order were also set out previously — and the programme had proceeded exactly according to the pre-set format, and was recorded between 4.30 p.m. and 5.00 p.m. the same day as the telecast.

Mr Sengupta states in his letter in Ananda Bazar Patrika (September 6) that, as far as he knows, Miss Mozoomdar was a witness to the entire recording (where retakes are ordered whenever necessary), and she also spoke to the participants for a couple of minutes after the recording — but no apprehensions were raised. At 7.45 p.m., however, Mr Sengupta received a call at his office from Mr Bandopadhyay, telling him that his references regarding Mrs Gandhi "violated TV norms", and could we cut that portion, please ? Mr Sengupta replied that he would prefer that the whole thing be telecast, but could not pressurize them if there were any problems with TV norms. He therefore permitted the offending line to be deleted. "Did they take my permission to cut my entire answer to the last question (which, according to him, constituted nearly 50 per cent of his entire discussion in the programme)?" asks Mr Sengupta.

Both Mr Sengupta and Mr Ghosh hold that all depended on the question asked—and this had been previviously set out. "The answers were only to be expected, and they couldn't have been anything but that," said Mr Ghosh. "It was obviously an afterthought," said Mr Dasgupta, the questioner, and clarified that questions were asked according to previous discussion. "Sankarbabu and I spoke on similar lines on TV in 1977, too", says Mr Sengupta, "and we had predicted that CPI(M) would win the Vidhan Sabha elections. No one objected to that, and that programme was not cut in the middle !" Mr Sengupta feels that if certain people are invited and asked for their opinions, they have to be honest about it — and censoring these opinions in the manner done can create problems. Mr Ghosh commented : "No special directives were given to us, and in my earlier programmes, too, I have been told that there are no restrictions except the usual TV norms." Asked whether his permis-

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

asian paints

Apcolite Superacrylic Emulsion

your natural way of expression

CASAP-85-244

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

sion had been sought, he denied it, saying that they rang him up only to apologize the next day though "Barun had rung me and told me about it" (both of them had not actually seen the programme). "Seeking permission before cutting it, is perhaps a question of propriety, not legality," he added. "They have the right to cut, they have their limitations; but as a journalist, I feel they should not invite people like us in such cases."

The moderator, Mr Dasgupta, too, was informed only three days later (Sept. 3) and admits that he has never seen a programme coming "to such an abrupt end" before. "Their stress to play down controversy is not unusual, and generally, the programme is not interfered with. I remember having spoken about unemployment on TV in '75, and the points were not in support of the Government, but nothing was cut".

Mr Dasgupta who has been abroad many times on sponsored study tours, on town planning and legal institutions, feels that it is his "personal belief based on what I have seen in European countries that the best way for the media to remain above politics is to give fullest expression to all political views—there, the Government is lambasted. I suppose things are not the same here. It will take our media a long time to adopt European standards." Prasar Bharati Bill and all that. What is clear is that Miss Mozoomdar censored the views of the participants—on whose instructions is not clear. Certainly, no directive could have come from Delhi, as the programme was recorded in the afternoon of the day it was broadcast, so perhaps someone at the State level had got upset.

ANIL GROVER, Calcutta

Convention stripped bare

Some liked it, some didn't

EIGHT students of Delhi University's prestigious St. Stephen's College were arrested outside the Miranda House gate on September 5, 1979. The charges were unlawful assembly and public obscenity. Some claim it was a touch of midnight madness, some say it was the soaring temperature during the day and some say that it was done in utter playfulness. So be it, but the eight students arrested under Section 147 and 294 of the Indian Penal Code, if convicted, cannot ever apply for any post in the Central Services. Since St. Stephen's College is reputed to produce 40 students annually who qualify for the Central Services, even eight seems a considerable number.

As there was not a single newspaper reporter present at the time of the incident, all eyewitness accounts have come from spectators. The Indian Express report about 'catching the St. Stephen's boys with their pants down' seems a little farfetched, as even S. M. Bhaskara, Station House Officer, Roshianara Police Station admitted: "There was only one boy when we arrived, who was unclothed, but that too, we only saw the silhouette." According to one of the St Stephen's freshers who participated in the midnight spectacle, 12 final year students dragged these freshers to the back gate of Miranda House, "which was a traditional rite, or so we were told". The students then began to sing the customary St Stephen's "blacksmith song" and dance. There was also a fair exchange of ghazals over the barbed wire. The Miranda House girls were an enthusiastic audience and in a sudden fit of bravado, one of the boys apparently began to strip. In strong contrast, the hostelites in the Post Graduate Women's Hostel were horrified and began to scream and plead with their warden, Mrs S. Sanwal, to put an end to the striptease.

Mrs Sanwal telephoned Dr A. S. Kukla, the Dean of Student Welfare, and informed him of the goings-on outside her hostel. Since this happened to be on Chhatra Road, which is a public road and does not come under the Delhi University, Kukla consulted Acting Vice-Chancellor Dr R. C. Mehrotra if they could call the police to intervene. If it had been within the campus area, Kukla added, he would have expelled them immediately. When the police arrived, the boys ran off in different directions. Only eight of the 60 who were present were arrested. Dr Kukla adamantly maintained: "It is beyond doubt that these students were indulging in something immoral, unethical and obscene. As University officials it is our duty to maintain peace in the campus. This is just a demonstrative action to ward off future incidents of the same nature." He added quickly: "I wish we could take stronger action, so no student would ever dare behave like this. One of the students arrested even had the audacity to threaten the Station Officer, as his father is a Commissioner. All these children of high officials think they can get away with anything."

When reminded that the Miranda House girls did not seem to express any disapproval, but were on the contrary displaying obvious appreciation, Kukla said they had told the Principal of Miranda House to carry out an internal enquiry "as the hostelites had misbehaved as much as the St Stephen's boys". The girls had gone so far as to taunt the police by shouting: "Police murdabad, Police hai, hai!" when they began to arrest the boys. After the boys were taken to the Roshianara Police Station, they were bailed out by the Vice-Principal, J. H. Hala, on a surety of Rs 2,000 and personal bonds per student. Curiously, Mr Bhaskara discovered this his brass nameplate was missing and had obviously been stolen by the boys since they were the only ones in the police station that night. When he spread the word, that he would charge the students with theft unless the plate was returned, it was safely deposited back at the police station the very next day.

The police admitted that since they do not have any evidence their case relies heavily on witnesses, but they hoped to put up the case in court in a few days. According to one of the freshers who was a participant none of the students were totally unclothed, in fact all the

The backgate of Miranda House where the incident took place

Mandira Purie

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

newspaper reports were "wildly exaggerated" he claimed. The freshers were appealing to their Principal, W. S. Rajpal, that since they were being ragged they could not be held responsible for the incident. Dr Kukla asserted : "Even ragging has certain ethics. I have been receiving these dirty stories for so many years but have never been able to catch them. Maybe, I am old-fashioned. In UK or America, if students walk around semi-clothed, it is not considered unusual by their wardens. It is a part of their culture, but here it is shocking."

Mr Rajpal, who is himself very British in his mannerisms said diplomatically : "This is a family affair. I do not want to criticise or support my boys in public. You are free, however, to gather whatever information you want from the boys themselves." According to one of the freshers, 12 of the final year students have already been suspended until further notice. And another student claimed, the Principal had also demanded a complete list of all the boys who were present, warning that more severe punishment would be meted out otherwise.

Meanwhile, the rest of the university students were occupied with the more serious matter of DUSU (Delhi University Students Union) elections in which 50,000 students would cast their votes. On the whole, the papers declared the voting extremely peaceful. No unseemly incident seems to have occurred in the university for the past six years. In 1973, however, the then joint secretary of DUSU, Prithpal Singh was arrested and convicted for raping a student. There was the Kuldip Narang case too in which a few people carrying an airgun would terrify girls returning to their hostel after dark. The police traced the car as belonging to the well-known industrialist Kuldip Narang, but could not identify the people driving the vehicle. There was loud discussion in Parliament on the matter, as Mr Narang is reported to be extremely close to Mr Sanjay Gandhi. The incident was hushed up after Mrs Narang came and apologised to the Dean on behalf of her husband.

The students' attitude on the whole seemed to be of total approval — a Stephenian mumbled: "It was a social affair. No bitchiness involved, you know. The girls loved it." A Miranda hostelite candidly stated : "Why are they raising such a hue and cry over the St Stephen's boys? It was all done in a playful manner and it was part of the ragging that they have had in their college for years. What if they did strip ?" she quipped. "I am not saying they did, but even so, it didn't quite take away our virginity. It couldn't possibly hurt us in any way. To arrest them for such a minor incident seems absurd," she added.

MANDIRA PURIE, New Delhi

Mohun Bagan supreme

The champions have reached their goal

MOHUN Bagan haven't had it so good in years. Starting out as a probable also-ran, the club swept all opposition aside to win the Calcutta Senior Division League and then the prestigious IFA (Indian Football Association) Shield to mark its second successive "double" in Calcutta. And this with a team, the only virtue of which was a set of players who had taken the field together for about three years. When the league started in May, the entire focus was on East Bengal. The club had recruited six outstation players in one year—something unheard of since the early Fifties. The reputation of each player was such that it was a problem to choose the first eleven. Most conspicuous was the forward line where nine players were vying with each other for the four berths available. Ultimately, the sheer force of numbers proved to be the bane of the club. Forces within the club were divided on what the final composition of the team should be. This was complicated further by the enforced absence of Harjinder Singh due to an injury. And, finally, confusion was confounded by the failure of some of the key players to click to form.

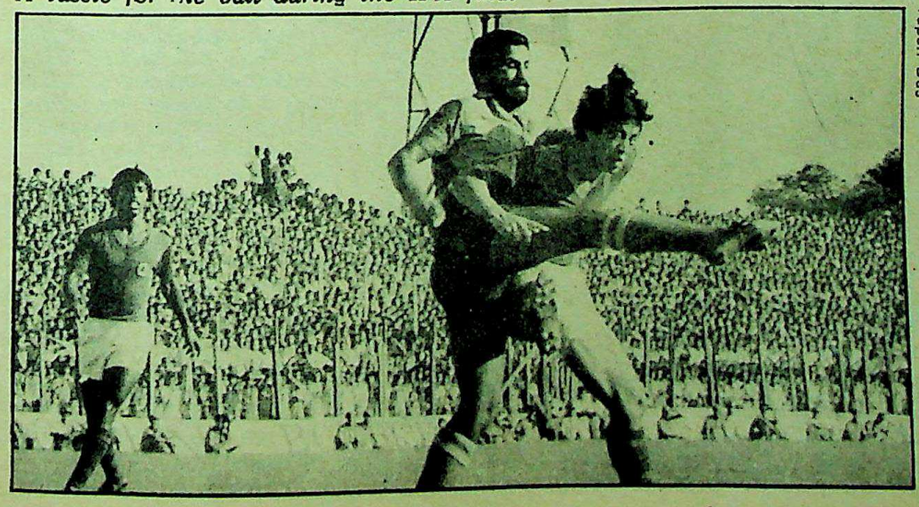
There was also an element of bad luck. The league issue could have been decided in East Bengal's favour on the day they met Mohun Bagan. But a tale of missed chances forced a draw. After Mohun Bagan had won their match against Mohammedan Sporting, East Bengal again floundered on the rock of marksmanship, failing to score against the latter side. Despite winning all their other matches, East Bengal had to be content with the second position in the league. Their supporters swallowed this disappointment in the hope that the IFA Shield would bring them joy. This hope soared to greater heights when East Bengal beat a tough South Korean outfit in the tie breaker of their semi-final match. Conversely Mohun Bagan, who were fortunate in winning the league, had an easy passage to the IFA Shield final. They encountered Kalighat in their first match and then made short work of Mohammedan Sporting with a display of speed and thrust that left the black-and-white shirts of the Mohammedan Sporting standing. The 3-1 result was not a true index of Mohun Bagan's superiority.

But better things were to follow for their fans. The final, on September 16, 1979, was expected to be a tough fight for supremacy. Instead, spectators saw the unfamiliar spectacle of East Bengal fumbling and sweating from the start and Mohun Bagan attacking in tremendous waves. If Mohun Bagan had succeeded in converting the 'sitters' they received, the result would have been closer to six rather than the lone-goal victory that they ultimately achieved. Such complete dominance has seldom been seen on the Calcutta maidan.

...And so, one more season has come to an end in Calcutta, a season which has seen the emergence of very few new 'stars' but has certainly consolidated the belief that football, today, is big business—with the three leading clubs reportedly investing nearly Rs 30 lakhs for player-recruitment alone. It is already clear that the "input" of players will be stepped up next year, with Mohun Bagan, East Bengal and Mohammedan Sporting stepping up their drive for recruiting new talent. While all this will undoubtedly result in good football, one wonders how good it will be for Calcutta soccer, considering that several talented young players of Bengal will thus be deprived of an opportunity to play for the 'Big Three'

ARIJIT SEN, Calcutta

A tussle for the ball during the IFA final



Tapan Das

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Limelight

The fallout of Oct 2

By M. J. Akbar

POLITICIANS never cease to amaze, particularly with their stupidities. It seems that all the three main contenders for power are doing their best to commit suicide. In Mrs Gandhi's camp, Sanjay Gandhi's fast-increasing (or should the word be omnipresent ?) influence in the selection of regional leaders and prospective candidates is becoming the most serious drawback to Mrs Gandhi's return to power. In the Janata camp, the pronouncements of Balasaheb Deoras and his RSS colleagues are helping to confirm the worst suspicions of the saner elements in our country (barring those, of course, who refuse to see). And in the Lok Dal, Mr Raj Narain's loud and exaggerated displays of his many personalities are strengthening the resentment that many people feel against his Party. Are the politicians in competition to help each other ?

Mr Raj Narain did enough to help others with his meaningless drama on October 2 in front of Gandhiji's samadhi. And the irresponsibility of his remarks, on Government media, on the date of elections, is reaching standards which even Mr Raj Narain in his glorious career has not reached. Of course, Mr Raj Narain does not always talk nonsense; it is just that when he does, he has no parallel. Later during the day on October 2, Prime Minister Charan Singh made it clear that he had no intention of tolerating foolishness, not even when it emanated from the mouth of his most loyal servant. But the bigger question is : is Mr Charan Singh. or anyone else for that matted, capable of bridling Mr Raj Narain ?

At the convention which formally saw the creation of the Lok Dal on September 26 (a day on which Mr Raj Narain made a very sober and responsible speech), Mr Charan Singh very specifically asked Raj Narain to do two things in the interests of the Party : first, try and control his tongue; second, give up his idea of washing Gandhiji's samadhi with ganga jal. The advice clearly had no impact on Mr Raj Narain and the PM had to couch his request in much stronger terms at the public function to launch the peasant oriented newspapers (Real India and Asli Bharat, in English and Hindi) on October 2, publications which will be under the control of peasants, not big industrialists. The inherent tensions between the PM and Raj Narain were visible on the stage, particularly when the PM curtly told Raj Narain "Don't argue".

There were predictable reactions to Mr Raj Narain's performance. Mr Surendra Mohan, the Janata's chief spokesman, wondered whether this was the India of everyone's dreams. This may not be the India of anyone's dreams, but it will still be a far better India than one dominated by the RSS. Indeed, the tensions within the Janata, though less vulgar, are far more serious.

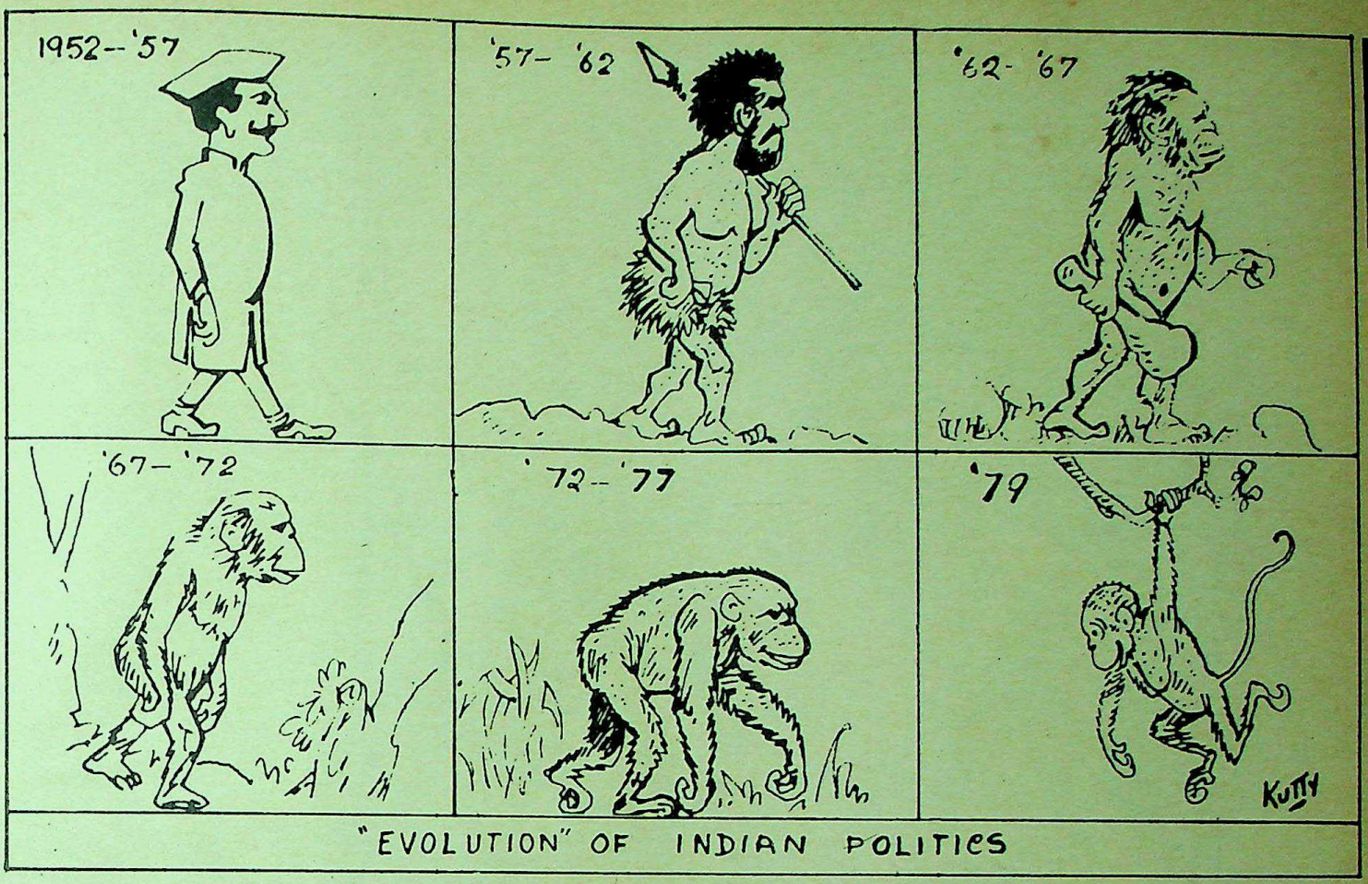
It is rather ridiculous, to begin with, to find the Janata Party defending the sanctity of Gandhiji's samadhi, when the man who assassinated the Mahatma, Nathuram Godse, is being publicly extolled by a Janata MLA, Dinanath Panday with cries of "Godse Zindabad !" The silence of the Janata leadership on this issue is revealing. Is this the stage that we have reached that a hooligan who shouts in praise of the Mahatma's assassin can get protection, assistance, and be quietly absolved by the "responsible" leadership of a national Party — a Party which, concurrently, has the audacity to call itself Gandhian? Could there be a worse insult to the Mahatma?

There were other problems for both the Janata and the Lok Dal — mainly the rumours that top leaders of their Parties were searching for ways to "honourably" join the Congress(I). With the Janata the problem was worse, because the rumours surrounded none other than the man they had nominated as their Prime Minister should the Party win the elections, Mr Jagjivan Ram himself. Finally, on October 1, Babuji told his Party categorically that he would not join Mrs Gandhi. On the other side, it was H. N. Bahuguna who was said to be negotiating a deal. During the last week of September, Bahuguna had the pleasing eperience of being wooed by everyone : Raj Narain, Devaraj Urs, and Sheikh Abdullah (on behalf of Mrs Gandhi).

Raj Narain could become a really explosive issue in the coming weeks, proving a serious embarrassment to the Government and the various partners in the alliance with his preposterous outspokenness. The Chaudhury may have to snub him even further, perhaps going to the extent

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



"EVOLUTION" OF INDIAN POLITICS

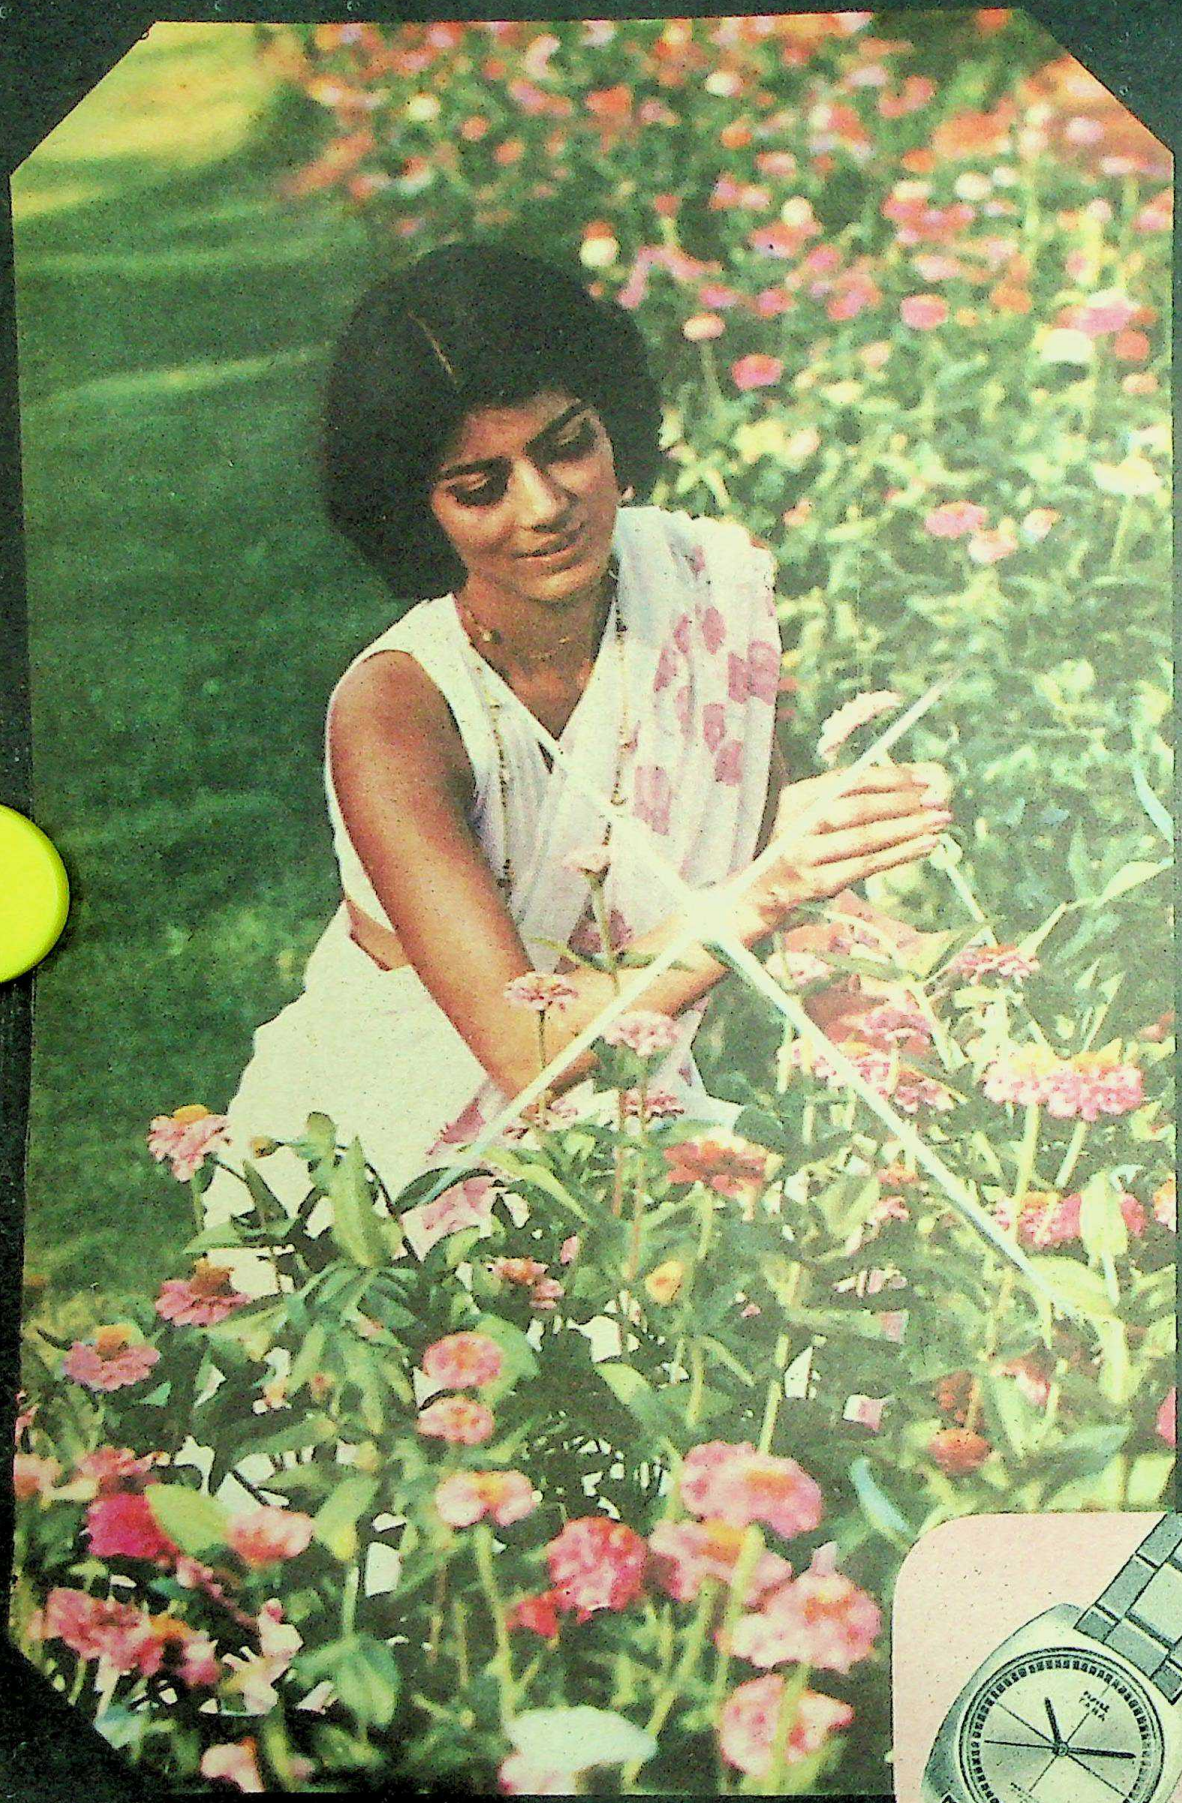
of taking away his job of "working president" of the Lok Dal. The repercussions cannot but be damaging to the Lok Dal, as Raj Narain does have a strong network of disciples, a cadre loyal purely to him. Charan Singh needs Raj Narain's active help to win, particularly in UP. The Lok Dal may have a solid percentage of votes, but what it sorely lacks is any organisation to help deliver the votes.

But if Mr Raj Narain is going to fritter away his energy and time making attacks at imaginary windmills, if he is going to go about searching for headlines of the kind he received in late September and early October, he can't be of much help to his cause. One has only to contrast the Lok Dal position in Bihar to its position in Uttar Pradesh. While the Bihar Party is energised, while even the Bihar Congress seems vibrant and enthusiastic, the condition of the allies in UP is far less confident—although they have the same extent of support, by and large. The difference is that Karpoori Thakur is a master at the game of electioneering, while the operators who can swing things around in UP on behalf of the Lok Dal and its allies are still fighting internal battles. Both the Janata and Mrs Gandhi have done more campaigning in the homeland of Chaudhury Charan Singh, Raj Narain and H. N. Bahuguna.

Photograph by Raghu Rai

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



A time for fragrance... and a time for flowers.

A time for HMT.

Sunshine hours. Times that will be long remembered. The sparkle of dew on the grass. The scent of a thousand flowers. And your HMT. With you. As always. Made like a beautiful piece of jewellery. Ticking away happily. For years to come.

HMT WATCHES

- 17 and 21 jewels
- parashock
- anti-magnetic

Marketing Division

hmt

TIMEKEEPERS TO THE NATION

IF YOU'VE THE INCLINATION, WE'VE THE TIME!

CC-0. In Public

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Mr Urs takes charge

HOW will the Congress face up to the challenge posed by the Congress(I) in the coming elections? This was perhaps uppermost in the minds of all who had been following the recent decline in the fortunes of the first political Party of the country—as it met in Bangalore on September 12-13—be they ordinary citizens, journalists, AICC members, delegates or even "invitees" (as the identity badges on many proud chests endearingly proclaimed). The huge banner behind the rostrum read: "Pre-split session of the AICC". Other banners around the Glass House proclaimed in stilted prose definitely not written by an adman: "Get united to retain democracy" and "Save the nation from anarchy". And when after a tuneless rendering of Bande Mataram a terribly slack-jawed speech by Sardar Swaran Singh greeted the assembled Congressmen who filled but two-thirds of the regulation mattress-and-bolster covered floor, spirits began to sag. Could this assemblage fight a resurgent Congress(I) riding the crest of a new Indira wave?

But a glimmer of hope appeared soon. Mr. Devaraj Urs, the Karnataka Chief Minister host of the session, took the floor and straightaway launched a broadside against Mrs Gandhi. Here was somebody who could at least muster enough decibels and deliver them with sufficient vigour to give notice of combat, equal or otherwise. He wasn't going to fight shy of what had been uppermost in his mind for the last few months. If it rankled then it was better that it were out. After a few paragraphs of the mandatory preamble on the state of the nation, etc., he came straight to the point: How Mrs Gandhi had treated him. "It is an irony of fate that the sincere efforts that I made towards the Congress unity should have culminated in my own expulsion from the Congress(I), and a person who risked everything for the sake of Mrs Indira Gandhi so soon got this reward. It is much more ironical that some people who totally shunned Mrs Gandhi after her defeat and for whom her very name had become an anathema are now on a rat race to her camp." He then described the Janata plainly as an "anti-emergency and anti-Indira, Sanjay polarisation." And following it up with a shrewd bit of electioneering, he said that the old Congress pluralism that tried to include both the rich and the poor had been given up and now "we shall stand by the poor and the downtrodden...the minorities, the scheduled castes, the scheduled tribes and backward classes in particular."

The speech was punctuated by frequent rounds of applause. The mood of the gathering was apparent. As the newspaper headlines in the last couple of days had anticipated, they were going to give themselves a new leader. The cue was the announcement by the returning officer, Mr. Muhammad Shafi Qureshi, a little later that "Shri Devaraj Urs" had been "unanimously elected" the new president of the Party, and there was a standing ovation. He invited, he opted, he conquered.

Towards the end of the session the next day Mr. Urs was to give greater evidence of the fight that was in him. In his concluding remarks he said that Mrs Gandhi did not believe in her own 20-point programme and the only two Chief Ministers who had tried to implement the vital programme of land reform (those of Andhra and Karnataka) were both now in the Congress. The Chief Ministers that she would get if she came to power would be "stooges". In a general search for positive election planks (at the session too many speakers for too long harped on Mrs Gandhi's misdeeds, and Mr. Urs was also guilty of this), he came out with three issues: implementing land reforms, tackling unemployment and fighting inflation.

APART from the personal leadership that he may provide, the most obvious advantage to the Party of Mr. Urs becoming the Congress president (the merger of the Karnataka Congress is a formality) is the presence the Party has established now in the south. Mrs Gandhi can no longer expect a cake walk there and with the Congress emerging as a credible alternative the Congress(I) will be facing straight fights. As the dominant Party this will be to its disadvantage, just as being the underdog, it will find three-corner contests in the north difficult. The Congress has moderately good hopes in Kerala where Mr. A. K. Antony is quite willing to face a midterm poll as demanded by the CPI(M). The crucial factor there will be whether the CPI will fall in line. From a radical ideological standpoint, the Congress can look on few States with as much satisfaction as Kerala. Its cadre and general level of leadership is committed and has been slowly inducted from the grassroots.

A considerable amount of interest was taken at the session on Maharashtra. There were many demands to invite Mr. Sharad Pawar. Mr. Tirpude lifted the spirits greatly by arriving on the second day. Hope was centred around Annasaheb Shinde, with his known powers of persuasion, being able to forge a front with the other two. In the east, among the major states, the prospects appeared the most desolate in West Bengal where it will have to be satisfied with whatever triflings the CPI(M) may decide to give. In the lobby Purabi Mukherjee blustered and pottered around inconsequentially, while a strangely despirited Saugata Ray kept in the background. Everybody had a regard for Das Munshi but didn't think that he would make a significant difference. There were bright hopes though in Assam.

For the Hindi-speaking north the other major decision that was formalised was the alliance with the Janata (S). By itself the 10-15 per cent popular support that the Party commanded in most of the area would simply mean its demise, but with this significant little push Chaudhury Charan Singh would be in as home and dry as he could ever hope to be. Most Congressmen now agreed that Mr. Charan Singh has brought about a remarkable articulation of the aspirations of the backward classes. With the parallel articulation of the harijans rural society was now fairly clearly divided into four groups harijans, backwards, muslims and the upper castes. The emergence of the backwards was seen by the more progressive among the Congressmen as a much needed blow against the feudal social structure of the north which has not known any significant social reformation in modern history. To this extent they saw Charan Singh as a historical necessity in spite of the reaction implicit in the open caste appeal that was the basis of his politics.

In early May Mr. Urs had told this reporter, "I must have timing. I do not want to be just another leader in Delhi." The other point that he had made then was he would only join hands with likeminded people. In what was the most positive line of electioneering uttered at the session, he told delegates, "Go to the villages and tell them, one of you, a villager, a son of a villager is the Prime Minister for the first time." So Mr Urs was eventually coming together with his peer.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

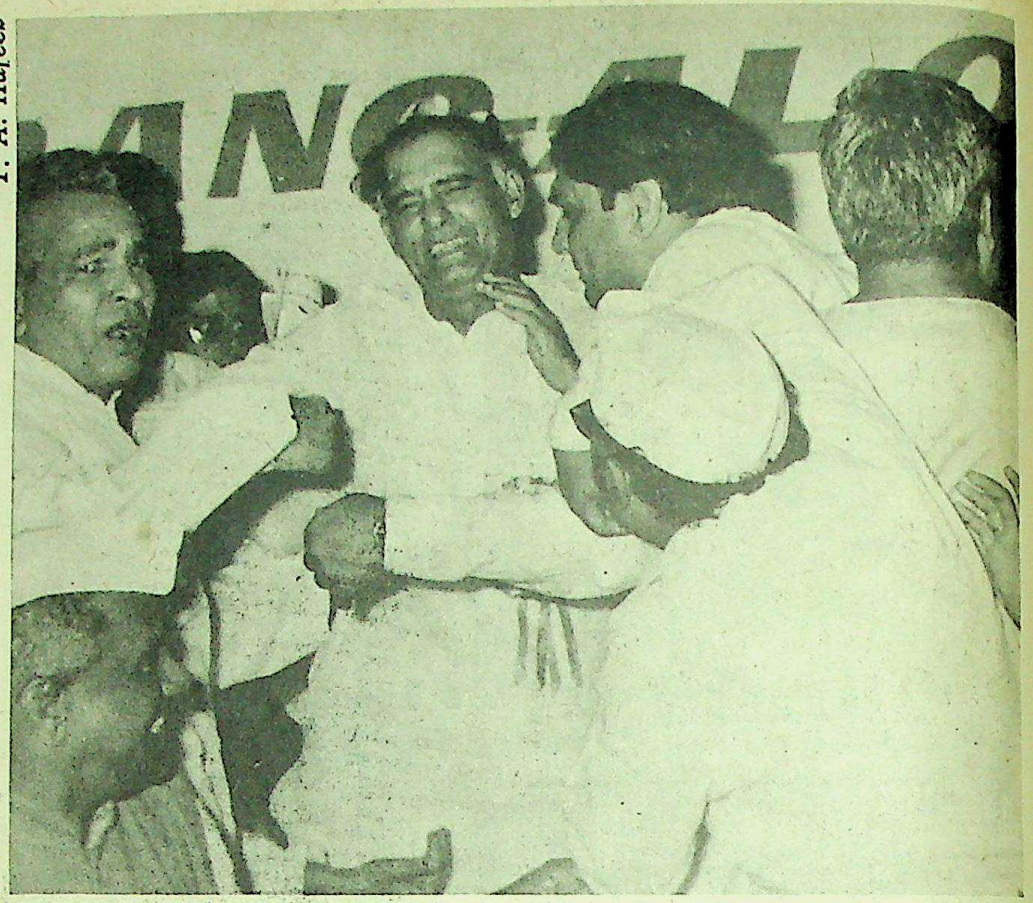
As far as the main strategy to fight the election was concerned, the Congress seemed to have decided to rely on an elaborate system of alliances and adjustments. Here Mr. A. K. Antony made a valuable suggestion born out of his experience in Kerala. First decide, he said, on the alliance partner for an area and agree with it on the division of seats. Then agree on which constituency goes to whom within the agreed total. After that each Party would decide on the candidates who would stand from the constituencies allotted to it. A few exceptions could be made in this procedure if there was a special candidate who would definitely stand from a particular constituency.

The AICC also resolved to fight the coming elections in alliance with the Janata(S) not only under the common leadership of Chaudhury Charan Singh but also with a common programme, under a common banner and symbol. That ancient pride dies hard was amply evident in the repeated references in speeches to the past glory of the Indian National Congress and the reluctance of members to give up the cherished old Party symbol. A compromise was made. The political resolution was amended to include the words "wherever feasible" before the sentence pledging the adoption of a common symbol. There were repeated and strenuous assertions that this was only an alliance and not a merger. Mr Chavan was at pains to point out that the independent character of the Congress would be maintained. This was made all the more necessary by Mrs Gandhi's statement on September 13 at the parallel AICC of the Congress(I) at New Delhi that just as the Congress(O) had committed suicide by joining with the Janata, so also was the Congress(S) doing by joining with the Janata(S) But the leadership was clear in its own mind and had the rank and file of the Party behind it about the closeness of the link that was being forged.

THE most noticeable ideological shift that has taken place in the Congress is its move to the Left. This was set out in forthright terms by Mr Devaraj Urs but was really confirmed in the results of the elections to the working committee in which seven vacancies were filled up. Of the seven elected five have a decided leftist image. Mr. Chandrajit Yadav, Rajni Patel, Bhola Paswan Shastri, Sarat Chandra Sinha and Vyalar Ravi. If the alliance with the left forces does come about then the Congress will certainly not be the odd



T. A. Hafeez

Chandrajit Yadav being mobbed on the dais after his victory in the CWC election

Party out. With Mrs Gandhi having declared that she was not against industrialists and the urban middle class tending to tilt towards her in the hope of stability, the Congress increasingly sees itself left with the role of playing the champion of the downtrodden. An attempt to secure the Muslim vote was apparent with the significant amendment, moved by Mrs Tarakeshwari Sinha, to restore the minority character of Aligarh University, being accepted. Among the many callers at Chandrajit Yadav's hotel room, who were there to congratulate him for winning in the GWC poll with the maximum number of votes, was Mr. S. A Hashmi, the respected Rajya Sabha member from UP. He was in turn hugged and thumped on the back for his victory in the contest for the four seats in the central elction committee. As Mr Hashmi sat down he was not politician enough to hide the fact that he was quite moved. With transparent sincerity and using ideological terminology that politicians seldom use in private conversation, he said, "The Congress is again becoming socialistic and secular." At least he wasn't playing to the gallery then.

This AICC session was different from others in many ways. There were no welcome arches on the way to Lalbagh. In the heart of coffee country the delegates went through the better part of the morning session the first day without coffee or anything. The journalists in the Press corner were more lucky. The transport arranged for the Youth Congress rally the day before the session did not arrive. Poor Mr. Gundu Rao of the State Congress(I), laid up with jaundice, got accused of sabotage. The hotel owners refused to take bookings for the delegates without cash payment in advance. Indian Airlines first refused to open a booking counter at the Glass House, saying that they didn't do it for political meetings. The counter came up eventually when a local travel agent MLC quoted them precedence.

But the greatest difference was that, after a long time, Congressmen again got a taste of inner-Party democracy through the elections to the working committee and central election committee. Congressmen had plainly got out of practice. Otherwise, how could Abdul Ghafoor lose by just two votes? His supporters were simply over confident. The most gladdening case, however, was that of Mr. Tulsidas Dassappa, the general secretary who was seeking election to the working committee. He is one of the old faithfuls who had stood by the Congress right through. Even during the 77 Assembly elections the Janata tried hard to get him to join them but he did not leave the Party. He was no one's candidate, not even Mr. Urs'. While munching snacks during lunch, he told two of us who were with him, "If the State leaders and the group leaders give the members lists and they stick to them totally in their voting then I will lose". He won, and that too tying at the top with Chandrajit Yadav, both polling 200 votes each !

SUBIR ROY

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Spot report

Andhra Pradesh

Raining support for Indira

"I HEARD that cinema collections went down during the Shah Commission hearings in Delhi," said Mrs Indira Gandhi, during her recent tour of Andhra Pradesh. But throughout her three-day tour of Andhra, she emphasised that she wasn't on an election tour, saying, "The election campaign will start when the election date is announced." During her tour she repeatedly sought to comfort the drought-stricken people by liberally doling out her opinions: she accused the Janata leaders of bringing shame to the nation, ruining the economy and accused Charan Singh of indulging in political skulduggery.

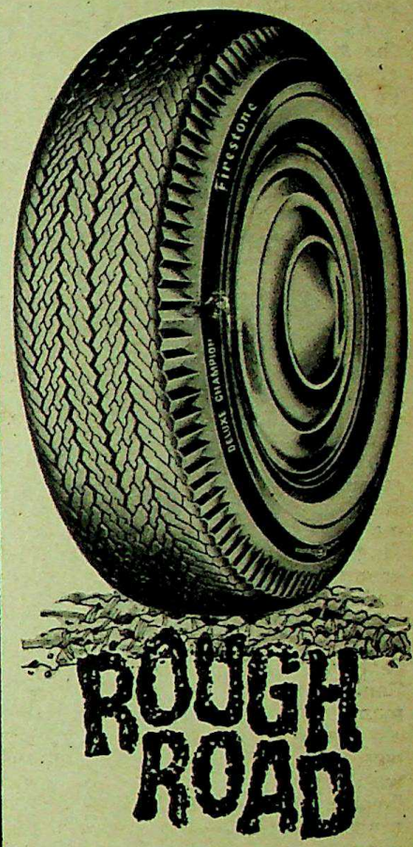
For a number of reasons it was expected that Mrs Gandhi would begin her election campaign in Andhra. First, it is the only state ruled by the Congress (I). It returned 41 Congress MPs in the March 1977 elections. The only Janata MP elected from that State was Neelam Sanjeeva Reddy. Even though a bitter feud persists between Dr Channa Reddy, the Chief Minister, and the Congress (I) dissidents, both factions swear by Mrs Gandhi. Again, it was fitting that with Dr Reddy's passion for religion and Mrs Gandhi's eagerness to use religious sentiments for her own ends, she should have started her campaign at the Tirupathi temple.

After landing in Madras on September 7, Mrs Gandhi drove to Tirupathi, 160 kms away. The next morning she attended the "suprabhatam" and witnessed the "abhishekam" (the bathing of the idol of Lord Venkateswara with turmeric, milk and water), followed by an hourlong session of meditation. A few hours later, addressing a big crowd at Pakala, Mrs Gandhi invoked Lord Venkateswara's benediction on the people, prayed for rain and delivered a political speech. All the while the crowd kept chanting: "Indira amma zindabad". Soon, Tirupathi and its surrounding areas witnessed mild rains for a few minutes and the next day everyone in Andhra was talking about Mrs Gandhi's "miracle".

In the course of her speech, she said that the Janata Party had no business to seek the people's mandate once again, and, as the interpreter was trying to imitate her emotional style, she began defending her 20-point programme. She ridiculed the Government for having wasted time setting up a plethora of commissions. "All the depositions in my favour were neglected and only those against me were recorded," she said. "There are several charges of corruption against Morarji Desai and Charan Singh. Why aren't commissions being appointed against them?" She was not at all interested in knowing who would contest against her. "But I hear they're putting up a mini Raj Narain against me," she quipped, obviously referring to B. P. Maurya, who was encouraged by Raj Narain to fight against her. "I am not an astrologer, I cannot tell you what really will happen in these elections: I am afraid they may not be free," she said in another Parliamentary constituency. On the outskirts of Kodur, a little drama was enacted. Mrs Gandhi got out of her car and forayed into a decrepit hut, and talked to a few women. As more women began surrounding her, a police constable tried to "protect" her, but Mrs Gandhi literally chased away the policeman, shouting loudly that she shouldn't be separated from her people.

As she kept moving through drought-stricken pockets in Chittoor, Cuddappah and Anantapur, she repeatedly told listeners how the Janata Government was dragging its feet in providing relief to the drought-hit areas of Uttar Pradesh, whereas the Andhra CM had sanctioned Rs 20 crores for the relief. Some people wanted to know why Rayalaseema remained one of the poorest districts in the country in spite of Mrs Gandhi's Party ruling the State for three decades. She had no answer. Instead, she began to emphasise, once again,

RADEUS/FS/CT-3/78



ROUGH ROAD

Another good reason to use Firestone tyres

For rough and rugged roads, Firestone tyres are the natural choice. Designed for fast traction, firm grip and cooler running, Firestone tyres also eliminate stone trapping. When you're on Firestone tyres the steering is effortlesss.

Firestone
78 YEARS OF INTERNATIONAL EXPERIENCE

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

that she had a clear vision regarding the nation's progress, and nobody could stop her: The Janata (S) attempt to stop her from contesting the election would be a futile bid, as people were solidly behind her. "Some say that I am going to contest from the South, there's no basis for such talk. If you just come to the North, you'll note how big crowds my Party is drawing...." Her three-day tour took her through seven Parliamentary constituencies, and local leaders vied with each other to invite her to contest from their own constituency.

Ridiculing the publication of the Gupta Commission report (the Maruti probe), Mrs Gandhi quipped that she never read such reports, and she was convinced that people had lost faith in commissions and probe reports. If she wanted, she could've helped Sanjay Gandhi in several ways, but she let him tackle things on his own, and at last people were realising that all that was said and written against him was part of a vindictive propaganda against her own family.

ARTHUR PAIS

How I am paying his college fees even before he begins school.

This is my little Rahul.

He's three and just about learning to say ABC, yet I have already planned for his future education.

I would not like him to work through college like I did.

So I have taken out 'Grow Your Money Scheme' with UCOBANK for 120 months and assured my son's college fees and other associated expenses.

After maturity the whole amount will be reinvested under the Fixed Deposit Scheme for meeting Rahul's monthly college expenses.

With UCOBANK saving for the future is as easy as learning ABC.

Just drop in at your nearest branch for details.

UCO/CAS-49/79

United Commercial Bank

the friendly bank round the corner

Uttar Pradesh

Two elections at the price of one

PEOPLE close to the UP Chief Minister believe that the UP Assembly is going to be dissolved by the third week of October and fresh elections would be held along with the Lok Sabha elections. This impression has gained ground due to the policy the UP Government has recently adopted empowering legislators to disburse more than Rs 20 crores under the drought relief project. Officers are also being transferred on a rather large scale, and it is believed that their transfers are politically motivated. Officers considered to be useful to the Government are being given charge of the district administration. Such decisions are being made on the basis of caste and and political leanings. A large number of transfer orders were issued, only three days before the August no-confidence motion was scheduled to be decided. To cite one example, the Collector of Farrukha-bad was transferred within minutes.

The Government in UP is a minority one. And in all probability, Mr Charan Singh would not like a Government that is dependent on others, for its survival Besides, Mr. Charan Singh, who did not hesitate in recommending the dissolution of the Lok Sabha, would stand to gain in case a midterm poll is held to the UP Assembly. Mr. Charan Singh does not have a well-knit organisation in the State and his support is based on caste lines.

For the Lok Sabha elections, UP is a very important State. Most important politicians are going to contest from this State. What is to be seen, however, is how many of them shift to new constituencies for the elections. After all they have done precious little for the constituencies which elected them. Raj Narain wants to contest from Aligarh. Again, Atal Behari Vajpayee is supposed to replace Nanaji Deshmukh from Gonda. Chandrashekhar is looking for an urban constituency, since Ballia is primarily a rural constituency. Even Mr Bahuguna appears to be in a fix. His constituency, Lucknow, is notorious for rejecting candidates. In case he chooses to contest from one of the hill constituencies, his opponents are sure to put up a relative as an opponent against him. In all probability Mr Bahuguna will contest from Phulpur, while Mrs Kamala Bahuguna may shift to another constituency. Even Mrs Indira Gandhi is said to be looking for a safer constituency. She is a bit hesitant about contesting from Rae Bareili as Sanjay Gandhi is thinking of recontesting from Amethi. She feels that Amethi, being a neighbouring constituency, may adversely affect her popularity in Rae Barelli.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

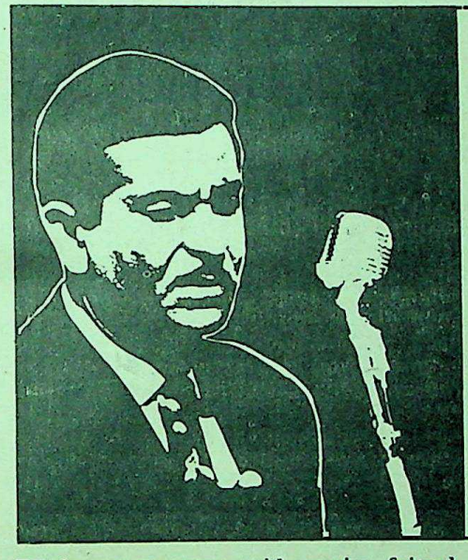
This time it may be difficult to judge the mood of the voters. Politicians are basing all their speculations on caste alliances and money power. But even these criteria prove illusory, and the voting may take place along different lines. One thing is certain —votes can no longer be won over by promises. The main question that will haunt the voters is: Who is going to become the next PM?

According to present indications, these elections are going to be fought more violently than in the past. Firearms are going to replace lathis and the possibilities of political murder cannot be ruled out. This is all the more likely, considering the number of transfers that have taken place, and the administration may turn a blind eye to all such incidents. While some political observers are apprehensive about the outbreak of large scale violence, prominent Janata Party leaders in UP feel that the members of the erstwhile Jana Sangh may get more tickets than the others. Even Mr Raj Mangal Pandey, the leader of the JLP, is expecting this. But all said and done, the voters have not been left with much of a choice. They have to choose between the bad and the worse.

SANTOSH BHARTIYA

Asides



Netas and abhi netas

IT is not strange, said a wise friend of ours, that the film industry should be in the running for a seat in the Parliament. After all, what is the real difference between a politician and an actor ? Just the prefix "abhi". Explaining, he said, the word for a leading politician is "neta" and the word for an actor is "abhineta."

The film industry has formed the National Party and according to Mr G. P. Sippy it "aspires to be the platform for all like-minded people from all walks of life — intellectuals, thinkers, professionals, businessmen, workers, farmers, housewives and the youth." Sippy, or rather the draft manifesto of the Party, claims that "for too long the real problems facing the country have been avoided by the professional politicians. It has been in their interest to create bogey issues, and thereby avoid taking drastic action or making sweeping basic reforms". The manifesto itself which runs into 13 pages of promises to everybody includes tax holidays for the blackmoneywallas and doing away with licences. It beats even the former Swatantra Party in propagating a laissez-faire economy.

The film industry is ambitious. It wants to provide an alternative to the opportunist politician—the professional politician. But is there much difference between the two? Not really. Says Basu Bhattacharya, the enfant terrible of the producers' world : "Both have their chamchas and middlemen, both allow images to be created for them, and both are unapproachable, except through their chamchas".

Nimai Ghosh

The institution of chamchas is what keeps the filmstar and the politician going. Recounting his experience during the shooting of Teesri Kasam in Madhya Pradesh with the mighty Raj Kapoor, Basu says: "We had to do a scene at sunrise and I told a chamcha of Raj that he should see that Raj is brought to the location ten minutes before sunrise. The chamcha nearly fainted and said, 'You expect him to come before sunrise? The sun rises for Rajji in the studio and it will stay there till he wakes up even if it's midday. The sun salaams Rajji and not vice versa. Don't ever think of asking him to appear on location before sunrise.' I was puzzled but determined to get Raj on the scene because I insist on shooting the actual sunrise. I went to Rajji's room where he was entertaining some of the top officials of Madhya Pradesh and I told him my plans and said he would have to go to bed shortly if he was to make it before sunrise. I also told him that my unit and I would have tea with him before that. And you know what he did? He told all his guests, 'You have heard what Basu Bhattacharya just told me. So goodnight', and he left. Next morning, Waheeda, I and others landed on location 20 minutes before sunrise and Rajji was already there waiting for us.

The whole business of the film industry entering the election fray is intriguing. Of course, the names associated with the National Party belong to the big banners, they are not busy filmmakers and can afford to spend time politicking. But what is the real reason? They are, of course, confused, disillusioned, and disgusted with professional politicians as most citizens of India are. But will, and can, they ever fill the gap? Of course, they solve major problems on the screen. Social revolutions of a low caste girl marrying a high caste man without paying dowry work out okay on screen, destitute mothers find absconding husbands in courtrooms either as judges or lawyers, the Gabbar Singhs take from the rich to give the poor. But can they do this in real life without any ideology? Or will they just be of nuisance value, adding to the cacophony of candidates that contest each year, thinking they are the only solution to India's problems. According to one observer, till now they supported candidates, but if they become candidates themselves they could be in a bargaining position. This would be their strength. They could make money if asked to retire from the contest at the last moment. The situation is full of potential for making money. Being neutral they will have a bigger price and if the candidate in whose favour they resign, makes it to Parliament they will be in an even better bargaining position. This may sound uncharitable. But this is life. If it's life for a "neta", it's the same for an abhineta." After all the difference is only in the prefix.

OLGA TELLIS

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

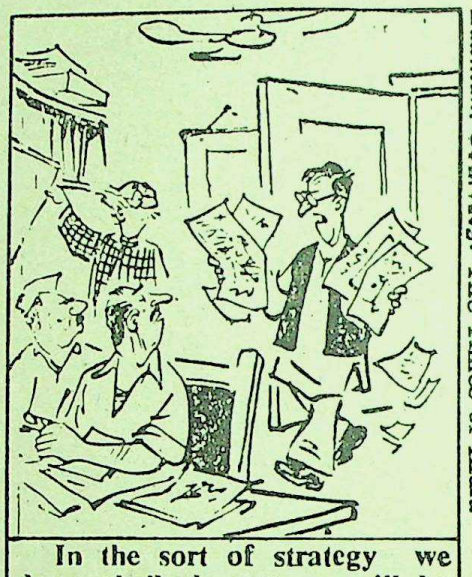
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Notes

NOBODY is happy about the coming elections, except the devotees of Mrs Indira Gandhi and they are laughing all the way to the bank. (Supposing the bank is empty, and somebody else has taken the goodies away? But that's another story). The elite in particular seems paranoid : what will happen if Mrs G comes back? Possibly, awful things; possibly, nothing much. In any case, we can't have selective democracy, a la Pakistan, can we? If the people want her back, Shah Commission, Maruti Commission and all, come back she will. And if the guardians of democracy have any battles to fight later on, let them fight it out later on, instead of beginning to weep copious tears just now. And maybe the urban intellectuals would not cry so much if they left their urban niches and took a look at the villages. PS : When I say the elite, I do not include industrialists. They are delighted at the very thought of Chaudhury Charan Singh being removed from power.

CAN I take the liberty of injecting some humour into the awful paranoia? Both the stories are dirty : the first is true and the second a product of an exciting imagination. Being a work of fiction, the second is naturally better, funnier and more dirty than the first. The first story I owe to Punch. Apparently, Walter Brown, the Labour Party's deputy national organiser, was canvassing in Surbiton during Britain's general election earlier this year. Brown knocked on a door and a man's voice said, "Come in, I'm in bed". Brown entered, and found the man in bed with a woman. "I've always voted Labour, you can count on me," the man said. Brown asked : "And your wife?" The man replied : "Oh, this isn't my wife, this is Mrs Jones from number 6".

To top this one, I have the other story of a Labour Party official who fell in love with and duly married a lady who was a very strong supporter of the Conservative Party. You know how it is with these political types, and hardly had they finished the wedding breakfast than they fell into a violent quarrel, and within minutes were not on talking terms with each other. The stiff upper lip of the British is famous, and neither would compromise. The time came to go to bed, but who would break the ice? So they turned their backs on each other and went to sleep on the new marital bed, back to back, on this most important of nights. Finally, the lady, who was, if you recall, a strong supporter of the Conservatives, could not restrain herself anymore, and whispered to her new husband : "Darling...darling...there is a split in the Conservative Party.... If the Labour candidate stood now I think he could get in quite easily". The husband turned around, and with a gruff voice, almost barked out : "The hell he would. He's already stood as an independent and lost his deposit!"



Laxman. Courtesy: The Times of India

In the sort of strategy we have chalked out we will be having electoral understanding with every party in the country except our own!

WITH election fever beginning to catch on slowly, the slogan writers of the various Parties have begun wracking their brains. The effectiveness of a good slogan was evident both in 1971 (Garibi Hatao; this was created by Shrikant Verma, the excellent writer and Mrs Gandhi loyalist who was rewarded for his contribution with a seat in the Rajya Sabha; he has remained with Mrs Gandhi through the trials and tribulations) and in 1977. The Janata Party's catchy slogans still ring pleasantly in the memory : what a time of hope it was! Khushwant Singh has provided the theory behind the key slogan in Mrs Gandhi's campaign this time. Indira Gandhi lao, desh bachao. His parallel is with France and De Gaulle : when France was in a mess De Gaulle was brought back to rescue the country. Let's see if Mrs Gandhi lives up to her slogan. The Janata's main slogan reflects its bitterness : it will be 'Defeat Defectors'. When friends fall out, the tendency to leave the door open for the common enemy is always pronounced. The Janata(S) slogan will be around this theme : Garib jagao, desh bachao. (Awaken the poor, save the country). The catchiest of the jingles has come from the Janata(S) camp. It goes : Sanjay, Kanti, Suresh Ram, Bech ke kha gaya Hindustan (Sanjay, Kanti and Suresh Ram, have sold the country down the drain).

THE other favourite parlour game — well, media game too — has begun : predicting who will win how many seats. The demand for astrologers is very high, and presumably they are extracting a heavy price from the anxious claimants to power. Reports say that even Mr Raj Narain's favourite tantric has deserted him and predicted a victory for Mrs Gandhi. Well, anyone who trusts astrologers too much might learn a lesson from the number who predicted a smashing victory for Mrs Gandhi in 1977. But more than astrologers are involved in this game. Most predictions at the moment are nothing but exercises in wish-fulfilment : the simple truth is that nobody knows as yet how this election is going to turn out. I mean, barring the simple fact that there could be one of four results : a victory for the Alliance, for Mrs Gandhi, for the Janata, or confusion. But Maneka Gandhi in her very own magazine Surya has decided to venture into the dangerous realms of predictions, and confidently states that her mother-in-law and husband's Party will win 370 seats. You never know : anything can happen. But I doubt if even staunch loyalists of the Congress (I) who work in the field would venture to predict such a victory. What I found most intriguing was that Mrs Maneka Gandhi had awarded the Congress($) with five seats. Now just who could five people be, who have had the honour of being recognised as potential victors by their fiercest antagonists?

SURPRISE, surprise. There are gentlemen still left in Calcutta politics. The walls of this city are a favourite target of slogan-mongers, at the quietest of times; around election time the virginity of no wall is spared. What is most interesting is that you will find quite a few walls newly whitewashed, and blank, with a legend on them : Space reserved for Congress(I), or, Space reserved for CPI(M). Apparently, this understanding is maintained, and no one poaches on anybody else's self-allocated space. The walls guarding the Birla residence in South Calcutta have been reserved by the Congress(I). Does that mean anything?

M. J. AKBAR

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

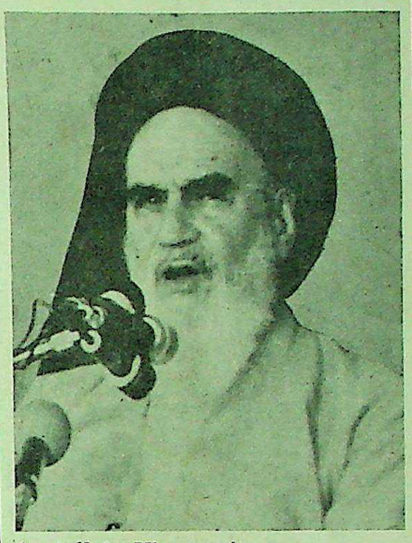
Iran's fascist Islam

The mullahs are without mercy, reports FRED HALLIDAY from Iran

IT does not take one long to sense the ferocious Right-wing Islamic fervour that grips much of Iran today. In the airport arrival hall, in front of the (unattended health controls, hangs a poster on which the dove of peace is being ripped open by a hammer and sickle. Underneath runs the simple message: 'The Mirage'. Along the walls on the way into Tehran the slogans 'Death to Communism' and 'Death to the Fedayin' can be seen, and amid the plethora of renamed streets none is called after any left-winger who gave his or her life in the 25-year struggle against the Shah. Huge placards show an Iranian revolutionary breaking through shackles imposed by both the Russian and US flags, and the walls of the massive Soviet embassy compound in the centre of the city are daubed with hostile slogans.

The second night I was in Iran I attended the first major public rally held by the Tudeh, or Communist Party, in the 30 years since it was banned by the Shah. A crowd of around 50,000 people had gathered to hear Ehsan Tabari, the party's leading theoretician and the grandson of an Ayatollah, who was now a candidate in the coming elections for a Council of Experts to discuss the constitution. Most of the crowd appeared to be students, but there was more than a sprinkling of older people, gnarled representatives of another age. As several hundred stewards with linked arms guarded the perimeter of the meeting, groups of right-wing youths, named 'Phalangists' by their opponents, roamed around shouting 'Death to the Tudeh and the Fedayis, Social Parasites' and repeating the most frequent rightist slogan heard in Iran: 'There is no Party but the Party of God, No Leader but the Spirit of God,' the latter being a reference to Khomeini. Thwarted in their main aim of disrupting the meeting, these Islamic militants turned on a hapless Iranian press photographer, and after chasing him across the campus grounds smashed his equipment and pummelled him to the ground amid chants of 'Allah is Great'.

This hysteria is not confined to Muslim activists on the street, but can be found at the centre of the Islamic Government from which it receives strong encouragement. Two of Khomeini's top advisers whom I interviewed, Foreign Minister Yazdi, Radio and TV Director Ghotbzadeh, had blamed the Left for Iran's present troubles and claimed that the



AP

Ayatollah Khomeini

Left had played no role in the revolution that overthrew the Shah. A similar view is held by Ayatollah Nuri, one of the key organisers of last year's anti-Shah demonstrations in Tehran.

For weeks, offices and bookshops belonging to left-wing organisations in the provinces have been attacked. On Friday August 10, for example, crowds coming out of the mosque in the Azerbaijani town of Urumieh burnt down the Fedayin bookstore, and this was followed by attacks on left-wing offices and bookstalls in Tehran on the following Monday. The new press law, which makes criticism of the Ayatollahs illegal and enforces wide-ranging censorship of domestic and foreign reporting, is another blow at those who criticise the policy of the Islamic government.

The attack on the Left by leading Government officials often takes the form of a rather crude scape-goating Bani-Sadr told me that the left was to blame for the standstill in industry, and both he and Ghotbzadeh blamed the unrest among Turks, Arabs and Turcomans on leftist interference, avoiding the question of whether the demands of these people were legitimate or not. Their defence of current policy towards the Kurds sounded like Ethiopian officials legitimating their repressive policies in Eritrea on the grounds that the regional opposition forces were also 'agents' of foreign powers.

In a tragic irony many of those who were in the forefront of the struggle against the Shah are now once again on the receiving end of Government repression and right-wing violence. Mohammad Reza Sa'adati, a member of the Kojahidin of the People guerrillas, who spent years in jail under the Shah, has now been arrested on charges of being a 'Soviet spy' and has the dubious distinction of being the first of the new political prisoners known to have undergone torture. Slogans calling for his execution have been written on walls in Tehran. Over a dozen members of the Socialist Workers Party, arrested weeks ago in the southern town of Ahvaz, still await trial, as does the poet Nasim Khaksar, who earlier spent eight years in the Shah's prisons. A lawyer I met had spent three years in jail, had been tortured by hanging on a cross — 'like Spartacus and his poor friends' as he put it to me — and had then had both his legs broken by SAVAK agents after his release. He was recently kidnapped by unknown assailants and taken up into the hills north of Tehran where he was badly burnt on his back and chest.

Mossadeq's grandson, lawyer Headyat Matin-Daftari, who was flogged and thrown over the side of a mountain in 1967 and imprisoned by the Shah last year, had to flee last week into hiding in order to escape arrest after the National Democratic Front, of which he is one of the leaders, organised the demonstration to protest the closure of opposition papers. A few days earlier I had lunched with him and had found him, despite the evident tension in the country, to be quietly optimistic. He sensed, as other opposition members did, that the akhunds or religious leaders were overreaching themselves by interfering in so many areas of public life and by their apparent inability to run the country. Many people felt that despite the current Government onslaught, the Left, allied with the movement for regional autonomy, could in the longer run establish a democratic system. One Azerbaijani poet I met went so far as to argue the daring thesis that events in Iran would mean 'the end of Islam', as popular revulsion against the akhunds led to a backlash in the months ahead.

Some signs of such resistance can be seen on the streets of northern and central Tehran. Music banned on the state radio is available in cassette form, and even though this is the month of Ramadhan when all-day fasting is obligatory, stalls selling soft drinks are open. People were smoking and playing music in public, and hosts proudly produced the odd bottle of whisky or champagne. In the oilfields, so I was told by a reliable source, the Government is taking no chances with the oil workers who demonstrated their power so effectively last year: there the workers' canteen remains open all day, Ramadhan or not.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Yet the power of the Islamic right must not be underestimated. Its appeal is not just an ideological one, since its strength rests on a set of institutions that retain great power at the neighbourhood level. Ayatollah Nuri, for example, explained how he could call on thousands of people all over Tehran who had been students at his lectures over the past few years, and the new anti-Left tone of Khomeini's regime is transmitted not just over the radio but in the Friday sessions at the mosque and through local Islamic associations.

THE position of women illustrates the uncertain status of the new Islamic regime. Khomeini's claim before his return to Iran that Islam guarantees equality of the sexes was never true given the theory and the practice of all Islamic societies. But the attempt to impose Muslim clothing, whether the cloak-like chador or the scarf-like hejab, was successfully resisted by the women's demonstrations of last March. Since that time, there has been no marked increase in the wearing of Muslim clothing by women in the centre and north of Tehran, and many women even in government offices remain without it.

However, Khomeini may well try to enforce the hejab in the future and he is reported to have told a woman poet who visited him that he would do so after the Islamic Constitution becomes law. In the mean time other factors are eating away at women's position. Although there are still women announcers on the radio, all solo women singers have been taken off the media—and Director Ghotbzadeh tried to tell me this was because they had all been connected with the Imperial Court. Women's sports have been virtually stopped, and the few women judges serving in the courts have been reallocated to their evident disgust that once Muslim law is imposed in the courts the Islamic prescription that one man's testimony as a witness must be considered equal to that of two women will come into force. One woman was elected to the 73-person Council of Experts now discussing the draft-constitution, but she was a nominee of Khomeini's and her election poster was a tragi-comic one, showing two eyes and a nose emerging from behind a black chador.

Probably the gravest attack on women's position has come in the realm of employment, where discrimination, as in other countries, is justified on grounds of economic constraint. Additionally, the organised feminist tide that was so successful in March has not continued. Most left groups seem to regard the question of women as a secondary one, but while I saw no women at the Fedayin headquarters wearing headscarves the Mojahidin told me that all women who join their organisation must wear one. One change the Government will find hard to put through is the segregation of schools, since only 15 per cent of primary school teachers are men and an almost reverse situation operates in secondary education. But the everyday pressures on women continue and it is easy for the demagogues of the right to talk of women's emancipation as part of some 'alien' imposition on Iran. Even the late Dr Ali Shariati, supposedly the theorist of a new enlightened Islam, argues in his Omat va Imamat that woman's liberation is a plot by the western cosmetic monopolies to boost their exports to the third world. Here again, the power of Islamic reaction over women must not be underestimated and one has only to see the phalanxes of chanting black-cloaked women on right-wing demonstrations to realise that Khomeini and his people can mobilise large numbers of women for their cause, such as fascist movements in Europe did in the 1930s.

Ayatollah Khomeini being greeted by followers in Qom

UPI

The position of the urban working class is, as yet, uncertain. Many factories are idle or running at a reduced level of output, and the masses of migrant workers who flocked to the cities to work in construction have been dispersed by the standstill in this sector, evident in the lines of unmoving cranes along the Tehran skyline. In the factories some of the workers' committees set up during the last months of the struggle against the Shah have continued to operate. But it seems that many of these have been taken over by the akhunds or by the Revolutionary Committees and no substantial organisations linking different factories have yet emerged to form the basis of a new trades union structure. The Islamic forces have been quick to see the need to pre-empt any threat from this source. While he fulminates against the left, Khomeini appeals to the workers in the name of Islam and a widely distributed poster depicts an industrial worker holding an Islamic banner beneath a quotation from the Koran promising a speedy victory.

The rhetoric of the regime places great emphasis on what it is doing for the mostazifin, a neologism based on the Arabic word for 'week', and usually translated as the 'deprived'. A classic populist concept, it is designed to appeal to the working class without thereby scaring off the other class allies of the Islamic movement. Yet it would seem that despite the immense sums of money available from oil, the new regime has not brought tangible benefits to these people. Loans for housing of up to £12,000 (300,000 Tomans) are available but only to those who can make a deposit of one-tenth this amount. The economics correspondent of one pro-Islamic paper told me that apart from providing electricity of under 100 Kilowatts free of charge nothing had been done to benefit the poor in the six months since Khomeini came to power. Meanwhile inflation runs at over 30 per cent.

The standard themes of Islamic theorists are those familiar to right-wing populist, and indeed, fascist movements elsewhere. Bani Sadr's 'Unitary Economics', a farrago of Islamic and socialist ideas, is little more than confusionist rhetoric, laced with some religious allusions, and has so far led to no concrete programme that could begin to solve Iran's economic problems. When I met him, Bani Sadr laid great emphasis upon how Iran remained a dependent country in which imperialism still played a major role, but neither what he told me, nor what he had previously written, led me to believe that he has a coherent grasp of the Iranian economy. Earlier, he told me that the spirituality of Khomeini had an important consolatory role to play given the serious material privations to which the people would be exposed.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The oft-heard slogan that 'There is no Right nor Left in Islam' and Khomeini's appeals for Islamic unity are the conventional fare of overtly fascist regimes, coupled as they are with attacks on all opponents as being 'enemies of Islam' and with a facile attribution of links with imperialism to all who question his views. Although he hardly ever mentions Iran, much of Khomeini's Islamic rhetoric is very nationalistic and his favourite ploy is to attack the Left for being western-influenced and alien to Iran's traditions. His denunciations of the intelligentsia especially writers and lawyers, and his attacks on the Press, indciate a willingness to stifle all critical discussion on the grounds that they are part of an 'imperialist conspiracy'. Yet so devalued have such accusations become that more than one Iranian I met was able to argue at great length how Khomeini himself has been installed by the CIA...

IT is as yet hard to evaluate the forces opposed to Khomeini, but they certainly go beyond the organised Parties of the Left. While Ayatollah Taleqani seems to have fallen into line behind Khomeini's rightist crusade, Ayatollah Sharriat-Madari, who called on his followers to boycott the recent elections, remains a powerful force, specially in his native Azerbaijan and among the estimated 1.5 million Azerbaijanis who live in Tehran. The other non-Persian nationalities are also resistant to the centralising tendencies of the Islamic Government, and the Kurds in particular are well-armed and should be able to resist the central Government for a long time. While they stress that they do not want to secede from Iran, the Kurds do want some form of substantial regional autonomy, and the draft constitution, offering only some ill-defined local councils which bear no relation to the nationalities themselves, is clearly inadequate to their demands.

The Left itself, based in Tehran but with substantial provincial support, comprises a number of competing groups. The National Democratic Front, which broke away from the National Front in March, comprises a number of liberal and socialist groups. Although not a Party, and formally nearer the centre than other Left organisatoins, it has so far been the most consistently critical of the Khomeini Government. Not only did the NDF call for a boycott of both the referendum on the Islamic Republic and the Council of Experts elections, but it took the initiative in organising the protests against censorship that sparked the recent clashes.

The two main former guerrilla

UPI

Supporters carry casket bearing body of Haji Mehdi Eraqi, a close aide of Ayatollah Khomeini. He was murdered along with his son by an anti-clergy group of terrorists in August

A Government firing squad executing Kurdish rebels

UPI

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

UPI

Kurdish guerrillas in battle-readiness hold the key town of Sardasht on the Iran-Iraq border groups, the Fedayin and the Mojahidin, enjoy substantial support among young people and could probably mount some kind of armed resistance to a Right-wing onslaught. But their leadership, drawn from people who have spent much of their adult life in jail, is inexperienced and they have been indecisive in their attitude to Khomeini's regime, trying to conserve their militant following while not breaking completely with the Government. Like the Peronist guerrillas who emerged into the open after the fall of the Argentinian military dictatorship in 1973, they have found it difficult to turn their undoubted prestige as militant fighters against the old regime into a durable political movement.

The oldest and wiliest of the Left groups is the Tudeh, in effect the Communist Party. Founded in 1941 their leadership is much older than that of other groups, and they evidently have a substantial organisation. They have chosen to back Khomeini without major reservation at this time: 'We consider him on balance progressive, and since we cannot lead, we have to choose,' was how one Party leader explained it to me. They remain in the most traditional sense a pro-Soviet Party, something that must do them immense harm in the current Iranian situation where anti-Russian feeling runs high. It is unlikely that their concessions to Khomeini will in the end spare them from the force of the rightist onslaught, and their paper is among those closed this week. Indeed, on Monday the authorities sealed the office of the Party.

The core of Khomeini's support lies in the poorer, southern districts of Tehran and in the cities running southwards from there along the edge of the great desert that forms the core of Iran—Qom, Isfahan, Kashan, Yazad Shiraz. The second main holy city after Qom, Mashad, may also favour him and the resistance to his consent of an Islamic Republic in the rest of the country is still fragmented. But with the economy in a major recession, and unrest in the regions, the initiative is slipping from the Government's hands.

It is in these circumstances that the state of the army and other repressive units becomes of major importance. Most estimates I heard indicate that about half of the pre-revolutionary army, say upwards of 150,000 men, remains in existence and there certainly seemed to be plenty of soldiers in the barracks I saw in Tehran and in the mountains to the north. The air force is still flying missions, although Foreign Minister Yazdi categorically denied the reports put out by Opposition papers that some dozens of US technicians had been brought back to the country. The army and air force have, however, lost most of their top commanders, and it will certainly take time to rebuild the esprit de corps and the command structure previously reliant on the Shah which were shattered in the revolutionary period.

An extremely ominous development is the growth of irregular military units, recruiting young unemployed men to carry out vigilante duties. Security Chief and Deputy Premier Mostafa Chamran is said to command a force called the Regiment of Youth, and a group named the Black Shirts has been growing in south Tehran. The Jamshidabad barracks in Tehran are centre of another semi-official force called the Army of Guards, and then there are both the Guards of the Islamic Revolution organised by the Government, and the Committee Guards, under individual mollahs and district chiefs. Ill-trained and divided as these units may be, and incapable of facing seriously armed foes like the Kurds, they are nonetheless a formidable force for urban repression and can be sure of further expansion in a time of high unemployment. In late July up to 60,000 of such irregulars paraded through the streets of Tehran. In a clampdown on the Left it would be to these elements, as much as to the regular army, that Khomeini would be likely to turn. Equally sinister is the rise of a new secret police organisation called SAVAME-SAVAK with one word altered ('Country' changed to 'Nation'). According to one man who recently came out of Evin jail, the imprisoned members of the former Counter-Espionage section of SAVAK were summoned to the central office there some weeks ago and asked to start working again, for SAVAME. Some of the indictments against Left-wingers now in jail are based on old SAVAK files.

Amid the clamour and confusion of contemporary Iran, it has become obvious, more quickly than was generally expected, just how incapable Khomeini and his associates are of running Iran and how quickly they are falling back, turbaned akhunds and western-educated Ministers alike, on demagogy about 'foreign plots' and on repression. Unwilling to guarantee basic democratic rights to the Press, the opposition of the nationalities, or to implement a serious programme of social change, they are dragging the country towards a bloodbath, the outcome of which no one can predict. Khomeini may believe that Allah is Great, but it certainly seems to be the Devil who is working overtime in Iran today.

(By arrangement with "New Statesman")

I'm a woman,

a woman whose skin is the mirror of the deserts and whose hair smells of factory smoke.

I'm a woman—

hands full of wounds,

from the cutting blades of giant pain.

How shameless of you to announce that my hunger is an illusion, my nakedness

a make-believe.

These lines have been taken from the poem, I'm a Woman, by Marzieh Ahmadi Oskooii who fought against the gross injustices and social imbalances within Iranian society. She was shot dead in May 1973 by the imperial forces. The poem is one of the many from the book—Echoes of Iranian Revolution—Poems of Revolt and Liberation edited by Nasira Sharma and published by Vikas Publishing House Private Limited. The book is priced at Rs 45.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Drought!

ARUN RANJAN finds out whether the disaster that struck Uttar Pradesh and Bihar was man or nature's doing

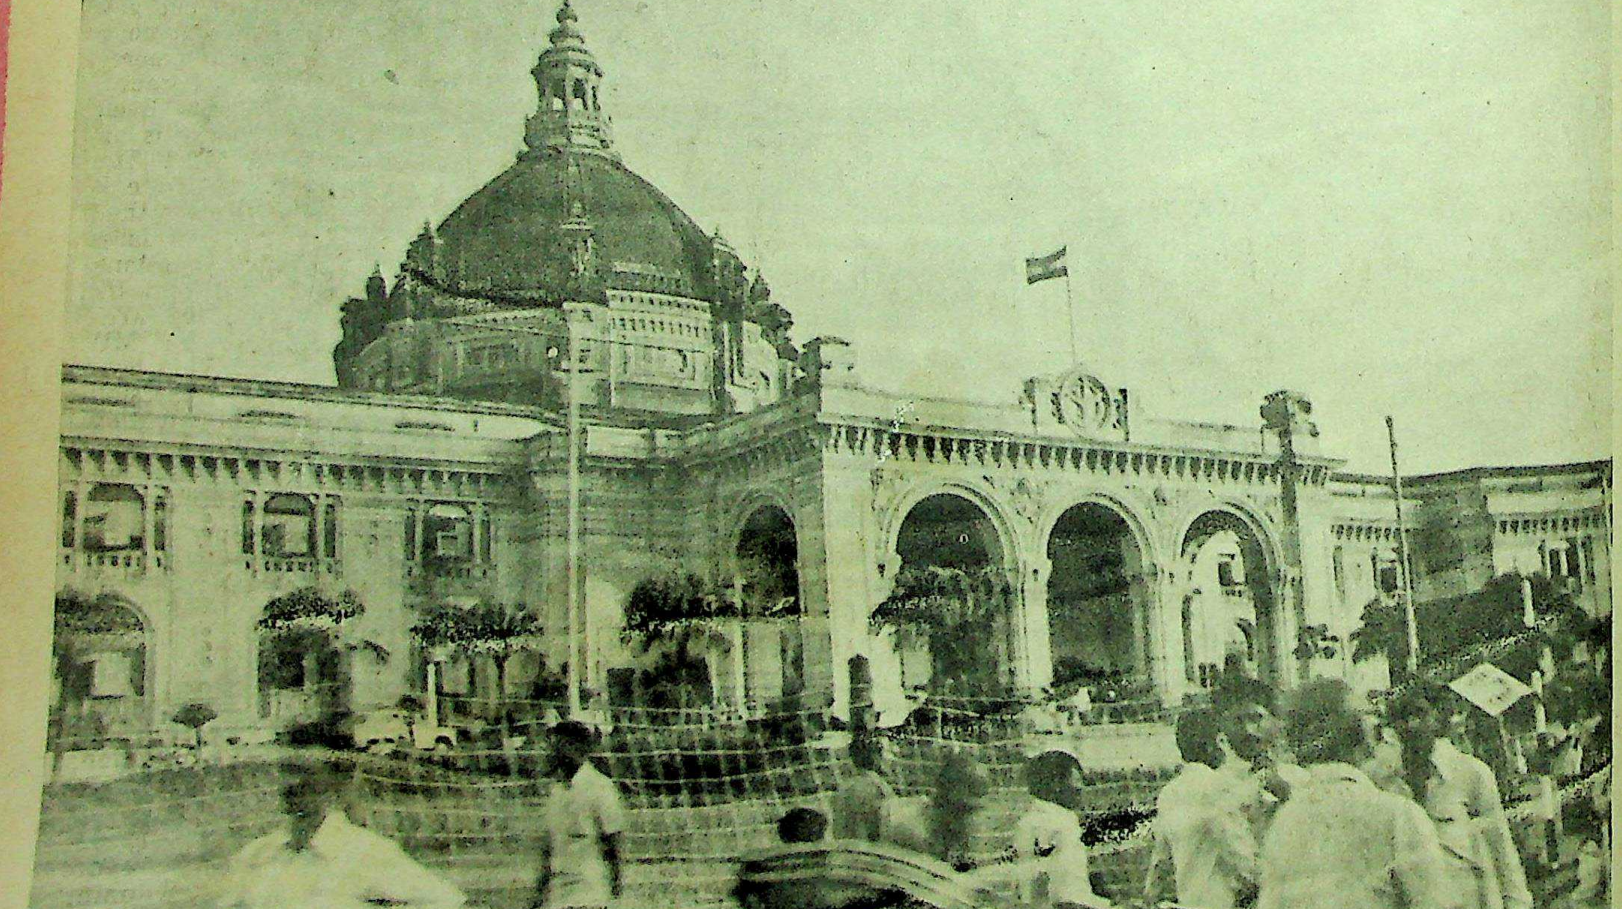
THE general view of the drough, that has gripped Uttar Pradesh is that it is the worst the State has witnessed in the last 40 years. Fifty of the State's 56 districts have been affected, of which the worst-hit are Jaunpur, Mirzapur and Banda. The State capital Lucknow has received reports of six deaths in Jaunpur, acute scarcity of water in Mirzapur, and an exodus of labourers from Bundelkhand. Only six of the State's hill districts have escaped the ravages of the drought.

With some rainfall only in the first week of July, the scarcity of water has badly affected large areas under cultivation. There was no more rain till the first of Augus , and on September 7, Varanasi, Jaunpur and Mirzapur had nothing more than light drizzles. This brought some respite for the crops. The target area for the kharif season was 102 lakh hectares, including crops such as paddy, jowar, bajra, maize, sugarcane, and til. Of these 102 lakh hectares, the condition of 65 lakh hectares of crops is particularly bad, the area having been rendered almost uncultivable by the lack of rain. Of the remaining 35 lakh hectares, irrigation facilities exist for only 23 lakh hectares, mostly in the form of tube-wells and pump sets. Besides this, there are 230 small and 10 big pumps. Water for irrigation in UP and Bihar is drawn from the upper Ganges, lower Ganges, Sarada, Ram Ganga, and the Gandak. Posses of Home Guards keep vigil on their banks to ensure that there is no unauthorised diversion of water for irrigation.

Last year the production of rice stood at 52.6 lakh tonnes. The target this year is 64 lakh tonnes, but owing to the drought, the final production figure is not likely to exceed 30 lakh tonnes. The loss in rice production alone is around Rs 400 crores. The estimated production of macca, was 10 lakh tonnes, bajra 7 lakh tonnes, jowar 5 lakh tonnes, dal, hang, urad and moong 1.5 lakh tonnes, and for coarse grains like kodon, sawa and kakun 2.5 lakh tonnes. But due to the dry conditions this season, as much as 40 to 70 per cent of these crops have suffered, which accounts for a total loss of about Rs 200 crores. The target for production including the kharif crops was around 90 lakh tonnes. But the farmers would be lucky if they can manage even to produce 50,000 tonnes. Under the circumstances, it is doubtful if farmers will be able to harvest 40 per cent of the targeted crop production. Official estimates for production are based on the availability of irrigation facilities, power, and recorded rainfall. But owing to an acute shortage of all these aids, the State authorities estimated total crop losses at around Rs. 900 crores.

All of Bihar's 31 districts have been hit by the drought. But officially the situation has only been described as "drought-like". In official jargon, only areas where 75 per cent of crops have been damaged come un-

UP Assembly House



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

der the category of a proper "drought". Where 50 per cent of crops have suffered, the areas would be termed "drought-hit". Going by this definition, all the 31 districts are "drought-hit". In Palamau, Hazaribagh, Dhanbad, Giridih, Rohtas, Aurangabad, Nawadah and Monghyr the situation is particularly acute. The targeted production of foodgrains in the State was 112.5 lakh tonnes and for jute, around 11 lakh tonnes. The target for foodgrains included 90 lakh tonnes of rice and 11 lakh tonnes of maize. Bihar normally has some pre-monsoon rain, but this year it was scarce. There was little or no rain in June which resulted in losses in the production of jute, maize and pulses. Sporadic rainfall in the beginning of July was followed by sufficient rainfall later in the month. However, some southern districts remained comparatively dry. Till August 20, Singbhum, Dhanbad, Katihar, and Giridih had only half of the average rainfall they get in the period every year. There was approximately two-thirds of the normal rainfall at Aurangabad, Rohtas, Palamau, Madhubani, Begusarai, and Purnea.

Excessive rainfall in North Bihar even caused floods. Both floods and drought hit the State together. The sowing of crops suffered due to the scarce rainfall, and even where sowing was possible, seedlings could not sprout. While the target for paddy cultivation was 53 lakh hectares, crops were almost completely destroyed in 8.5 lakh hectares. Eventually, cultivation of paddy was possible only in 34 lakh hectares. The target for maize cultivation was 9 lakh hectares, but the drought reduced the figure to four lakh hectares. Of the 1.6 hectares normally under jute cultivation, 16,000 hectares remained barren. According to official estimates, 20.5 lakh tonnes of rice valued at Rs. 410 crores, 6 lakh tonnes of maize valued at Rs 90 crores, 2.5 lakh bales of jute worth Rs 70 crores and other assorted crops worth Rs 10 crores were damaged, bringing the total damages to Rs 580 crores. The situation is equally bad in Uttar Pradesh.

It is evident that in UP and Bihar, 70 per cent of the kharif crops have been damaged. Those which remain standing are fighting a grim battle against the drought. The plight of the farmers would not have been so bad had the loss been restricted to Kharif crops, but under the present circumstances it seems that the rabi harvest too would be very seriously affected. The cultivator's fate will be decided by the rainfall in October. It is probable that in the event of scanty rainfall in the coming months, drought could even lead to starvation. The villages in the interior could well reach starvation point in the near future. The Centre has declared that it has at its disposal 23 million tonnes of foodgrains in storage. The country produces around 130 million tonnes of foodgrains annually. Therefore 1.01 million tonnes are required to meet the emergency situation created by the drought. The kharif crop production normally amounts to around 60 lakh tonnes. According to official estimates, the kharif produce will be 20 million tonnes in spite of the drought. This means that after the kharif harvest, the warehouses will have around 43 million tonnes of foodgrains. If we forget the rabi crop for the moment, we will require 52 million tonnes of foodgrains for the next 6 months, of which only 43 million tonnes seem to be available. Officials believe that the amount available will at least save the people from starvation. This can only be achieved by organising an efficient system of distribution. Blackmarketeers are bound to have a field day as soon as the foodgrains reach the cities. Only the comparatively affluent city folks will be able to buy the foodgrains at inflated rates. The villagers will be the worst sufferers. In the face of this grim situation, one wonders how soon and how well the distribution system can serve the villages.

A trailer waiting to be towed: even the fuel shortage is evident

Of the 180 lakh hectares under cultivation in UP, only 8.2 lakh hectares are irrigated. Ninetyeight lakh hectares have to depend on rain. In Bihar, only 22 lakh hectares out of a total of 80 lakh hectares of arable land is under irrigation. Faulty tubewells and insufficient power limit the irrigated areas to around 10 lakh hectares. In UP, for the same reasons, the benefits of irrigation are limited to about 60 lakh hectares.

In Bihar, the Gandak, Kosi, Sone and Kyol Chandan Barua canals constitute the principal arteries of irrigation. The Gandak and Kosi canals are not dry at the moment but they may cease to function in the coming months. The Sone canal may soon become totally useless due to scanty rainfall. Out of a total of 10,000 tubewells installed by the Government in the State, not more than 6,000 are functioning properly. Private tubewells number around 1,26,000 in the State, and 10,000 among these are out of order. Shortage of power and diesel is a constant headache for the farmers. On an average, the machines are not able to irrigate more than a hectare against their capaciy of two hectares. In UP, there are three major irrigation canals, over 200 smaller canals fed by pumps and 10,52,454 tubewells, which are privately owned. The State Government has installed as many as 15,000 tubewells. Forty per cent of private tubewells and 60 per cent among those owned by the Government need urgent repairs.

The State Government has issued a rule that power will be available for tubewells only from 10 p.m. to 4 a.m. An irrigation official who returned from a tour of Ranchi, Nawadah and Hazaribagh told this correspondent that farmers do not get power for more than half an hour during the night! Power is generated in Bihar at Patratu and Barauni. Patratu has eight thermal units. Even if one unit is shut down there is an immediate shortfall of 60 MW. The total power demand of the State is around 720 MW. But not more than 200 to 250 MW are generated daily. This figure, too, is not constant. Bihar also buys electricity from UP and Orissa to the tune of 55 MW. Therefore, not more than 300 MW are available daily. With this level of power production it is impossible to cope with the drought situation. In UP, the thermal units are expected to produce 3,182 MW of power but the actual generation is only between 1,500—1,600 MW. (This is the production figure for 4.9.79). In UP only 36,000 villages out of a total of 1,12,000 have electricity. Let us consider the situation prevailing in some of UP's power centres: Obhira is plagued by low quality coal and defective machinery but is somehow functioning. Rihand, a hydel power station, is closed. Ram Ganga may soon be shut down due to unavailability of water. Harduangaj, Panki and Jamuna are functioning. The hydel power station at Chilla is running smoothly. Suhawla is only producing 3 MW daily against its installed capacity of 13.

According to available statistics,

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

If you were born before 1949 read this advertisement fully 9 out of 10 people over the age of 30 have falling hair ...and don't know it!

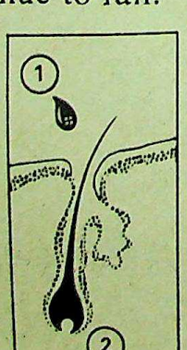
If you are one of the 9, start today with Pure Silvikrin

Run your comb vigorously through your hair. If any tell-tale hair comes off on your comb, you suffer from falling hair. The time to act is now, before thinning hair shows up in your mirror. Lack of vital amino-acids, the hair's natural food, leads to thinning, unhealthy, hair. Unless this deficiency is corrected, hair will continue to fall. That is why you need to start using Pure Silvikrin today.

What Pure Silvikrin contains.

1. A drop of Pure Silvikrin magnified.



Pure Silvikrin is a unique combination of 17 amino-acids that make up the body's supply of natural hair requirements.

How Pure Silvikrin works.

2. Penetrating action.

Thoroughly massage Pure Silvikrin into the scalp, to help it reach hair roots. Pure Silvikrin's scientifically researched formula now goes into action, bringing hair growth back to its healthy condition. Use Pure Silvikrin every day, twice a day, until your hair returns to normal.

Pure Silvikrin

OBM/4351/A

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

only 25 per cent of the arable land in UP and Bihar is under irrigation. Inadequate supplies of power and diesel have made a mockery of irrigation in these areas. The remaining 75 per cent is left to the whims of nature. Successive Governments must be held responsible for this sad state of affairs.

An official of the irrigation department told this correspondent : "The power siuation has been always alarming. And we have always had poor irrigation facilities. But we have been hit by drought only this year. Why ? Perhaps you can tell me." This statement reflects the official stand regarding the drought. The concerned Ministries have developed the habit of blaming nature for drought and in the event of a bumper crop, they bask in its glory. A bumper crop is also exploited by Minister for political ends.

It is possible that the Government is using the drought to cover up its failure on the agriculture, irrigation, and power fronts. Before the drought set in, cities in Bihar and UP were plagued by power-cuts. When the drought began, the Government declared that the countryside would enjoy priority in the allotmen of power. Bu as things stand at the moment power is not adequately available either in the villages or in the urban areas. In Bihar too irrigation officials blame the electricity department for the mess. The Governmen must accept the blame for the drought compounded by the failure of irrigation.

Politics of disaster

People in the cities are apathetic, leaving politicians to exploit the situation, finds ARUN RANJAN

THE train was on its way from Lucknow to Jaunpur, the district in UP worst hit by drought. When the train stopped at Ayodhya a large number of pilgrims entered it among whom was a sizable crowd of Marwaris. Further down at Shahganj station another group of people entered. But they were different from the faces inside the train—ill-fed and dark with vacant looks in their eyes. A 'compassionate' passenger's voice was heard: "Since you are from the drought affected regions, go to the Government for relief. Do not come and disturb us." The men did not receive a single paise from any passenger inside the compartment. A young man suddenly asked: "How many persons have died of hunger there?" That was all the passengers could spare for the affected people—false sympathy and rude questions. Just outside Jaunpur station a dead bullock was seen. Comments were immediately heard: "Did it die for lack of fodder? No, yaar, it doesn't look starved."

Almost every other year the villagers in these areas put up with great hardship — floods, fires and drought—and the city people never realise their difficulties. First, bold headlines appear on the front pages of newspapers like: "Drought feared in State" or "State Government worried". Very soon everything seems to disappear into oblivion and the news about the drought finds its place in an obscure corner. Leaders begin issuing statements. Wherever we have gone in Bihar and UP—in the MLA hostels, coffee houses and newspaper offices the only discussions we have heard were about the coming elections. The intellectuals in the cities ascribe the drought to the power crisis. In the Central secretariat in Lucknow I had a glimpse of the Government's attitude to the situation. The information department could only give me the figures of the affected districts, the agriculture department could only provide me with the figures of foodgrains destroyed while the figures for power and irrigation seemed to be in possession of only the heads of these departments It was clear that the administration did not have a clear picture of the situation itself. Apart from the chief secretary and the agriculture secretary, no one else, perhaps, had any idea about how much land in the State was irrigated and how much was affected by the drought, what the capacity of the State's power stations were and how many pumping sets and tubewells were working. These two officials on the other hand were closeted in continuous meetings between themselves. The total damage due to the drought was officially put at Rs 600 crores. All I wanted to ask was what the break-up of damages were. Since nobody could or was willing to answer my queries I was pushed from one table to another. During my futile search for answers I met the MLA from Faizabad, Mr Shyama Prasad Pradip.

According to Mr Pradip, official statistics show that in 18 blocks of his district 86 to 99 per cent of land area is under irrigation, which is almost as good as the figure for Punjab. Statistics also show that in July 96.4 and in August 47.7 millimetres of rainfall were recorded in the area. In reality, the rainfall was no more than one-third of this amount. 99.28 per cent of land area in Baskhari, 86.29 per cent in Ramnagar, and 93.4 per cent in Bhison, in the Faizabad district are under tubewell irrigation, according to official figures. Since these figures are exaggerated, not much reliance can be placed on the figures indicating damages too. Statistical estimates are drawn up in cosy Government offices, and relief measures and compensation are planned accordingly. Mr Pradip looked contemptu-

A lady surveying the parched fields in Jaunpur

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

ously at the official chart showing damages in various districts he was holding and threw it down.

There is a curious connection between drought and devious politicians. First, the people of an area press politicians to declare their regions as "drought-affected" in order to avail of relief. When this is done, politicians enjoy the kick-backs from relief measures. Here is an instance. Every year, the worst affected area in the Jharkhand district, one of Bihar's most backward regions, is Palamau. And every year there is a recurring campaign to have Madhubani, an area less severely affected by drought, declared a "drought-affected" area. The reason is that Madhubani is a Brahmin stronghold, and the Brahmins there are resourceful: the headlines of two papers controlled by the community make the 'drought in Madhubani' their daily subject. The starvation deaths in Palamau make obscure inside-page stories. Droughts have this habit of bringing politicians into the focus, in fact, they provide a fine opportunity to gauge politicians' popularity. Sibu Soren, Bihar's adivasi leader from Jharkhand, along with three of his colleagues, has threatened that if the Santal Parganas are not declared drought-affected, no adivasi would cast his vote in the coming Parliamentary poll. Politicians spare no pains to exaggerate the extent of the drought in their own areas in order to gain support, and since they are the leaders of the masses, MLAs pretend to think about the "welfare" of their constituencies. They have a lot to gain for this, more than popular support: the more they pretend to be concerned, the more facilities they are given. At least this is what happened in Uttar Pradesh. And the grant of special facilities to politicians, believe it or not, happened to be the first instance of any relief doled out by the UP Government in the wake of the drought. The MLAs' daily allowance was increased from Rs 15 to Rs 30, and they received this amount while the legislature was in session. Now they are to get the allowance for two more days—one prior to the sitting of the Assembly, and for the day after it has concluded. Along with this, they are to be granted an allowance for four days' leave. Until now, UP's MLAs were entitled to free railway travel for 15,000 kms on coupons. If they do not avail of these travel coupons, they will be paid Rs 3,000 as compensation towards travel. Each MLA and his companion is entitled to a maximum of eight free first class passes for a month. In addition, all legislators who wish to travel second class, shall be entitled to free travel for 25,000 kilometres, or compensation in cash. Ordinarily, each MLA is entitled to two first class passes for travel by train or bus. Under a recently enacted bill, legislators are favoured in the allotment of telephone connections — telephones shall be installed wherever they reside or work.

"The fields are the landowners', and whatever relief comes is their's too," said a shrivelled farmer in the harijan village Gajna in Jaunpur district. "We manage to survive on earnings from clay pots," he added. An older harijan said, "We always migrate from these drought-prone areas, and are getting ready to move out of here." How far had the sowing gone? "There were no rains, so the farmers did not sow. Now the only work left for us is carting dead animals," remarked a younger harijan. "All the Government officials visit the bigger villages. Who would care to visit a village of landless harijans? Who bothers about whether or not we have had a square meal a day? It is apparent that relief does not percolate to the lowest levels. Whatever little relief we receive is in the form of alms. So the only option left is to migrate," another young harijan of the village said.

Bihar's Agriculture department has blamed the Irrigation officials for not making adequate arrangements for providing water to the farmers. The Irrigation department has in turn blamed the Power department, which is facing the problem of water shortage itself. What these three departments — Agriculture, Irrigation and Power — have in common, however, is an inability to deal with the situation within their limitations. As for the Power department, this is evident from the manner in which the Lucknow Electric Supply Undertaking's (LESU) directives are being flouted: an LESU ad signed by the resident engineer Mr S. Mazumdar says that under its fourth and fifth clauses aircondition ers and neon ad signs are not to be used in Government offices and State undertakings. But there are no signs of this order being complied with anywhere in Lucknow itself. The people in cities continue to look at the drought with detached nonchalance. When I told him that I would like to ask the agricultural produce commissioner the reasons for the drought, a city-bred journalist in Lucknow remarked : "The only reason for the drought is that there have been no rains. What is there to ask?" This is the impression being encouraged by the Establishment. Did my journalist-friend know — if in an area of 1,000 acres, 700 acres were arable, out of which 500 acres were without irrigation facilities, and 200 irrigated, though with less power and water than it actually needs, who was to account for the future of the farmers? The fate of the non-irrigated 500 acres was at the mercy of the rains; who would account for that of the remaining 200 acres — god or the Government? And who then is ultimately responsible for this scorching disaster? Is it an apathetic and negligent Government, or god? These are questions that strike every thinking person, questions to which there can be one stock answer : the drought was man-made. There is no one, even after all this, to ask the Government why it has not provided irrigation facilities in all the arable land in the State in the last three decades. Instead, people are sponging the Government for relief. This is what encourages politicians to deceive people. The Rihand Dam in UP has been closed down ostensibly for lack of water. It is to be opened during the elections, obviously as a vote-catching device. Apart from destroying thousands of homes, one thing the drought has certainly done is to reveal politicians in their worst elements.

Relief runs dry

APART from some of the finest perfumes in the country, the district of Jaunpur is famous for its vegetables, tobacco and a special variety of rice. Most of the crops this year have dried up due to the lack of rainfall which has brought nearly 75 per cent of the population, for whom agriculture is the only means of livelihood, to the brink of starvation. Having already destroyed the kharif crop, the drought now poses a grave threat to the rabi crop in the area. The farmers for their part, are trying their best to irrigate their land manually with water from the Sharda canal. The level of the Gomti, which runs through Jaunpur, has fallen steeply. There is a shortage of water in the Sharda canal too; the water takes as long as 20 to 22 days to reach the land, and in the process more water dries up. Though the Sharda canal and its sub-canals can irrigate 25 per cent of the arable land area, only rich and prosperous farmers are left to benefit from this because of the sale of the water at the exorbitant rate of Rs 5 to 10 per hour. A majority of the peasants who are extremely poor and cannot afford to buy the water, are forced to make a living themselves with whatever they can grow. Their families are migrating to the cities in search of jobs.

Bejapur village, which is situated 10 miles east of Jaunpur city has hardly any facility for modern irrigation. The agricultural holdings are scattered far and wide, and this makes it difficult for a single pump to distribute water to a number of plots together. But despite the sorry lack of irrigation facilities, not only maize but also sugarcane is produced in the area in abundance, according to a rich landholder Mr Rajendra Pratap. "When it started raining between June 16 to 18, the peasants saw hope and began planting seedl-

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

GOLD has both— smoothness and satisfaction

Are you looking for smoothness without having to give up satisfaction?
Then the brand for you is GOLD FILTER.
A rare combination—of both smoothness and satisfaction.

CHARMINAR
GOLD
FILTER

Rs. 2.25 for 20
(Local taxes extra)

Smoothness has never been so satisfying.

MAIN DEALER : SULTAN SALEEM & SONS, WARANGAL

STATUTORY WARNING: CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

CASVS-196-244

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

ings from June 23. But the lack of rainfall after the sowing, and the shortage of electricity and diesel for the pumps, brought everything to nought. The crops dried up. This meant losses for me of upto Rs. 4,000 to 6,000 for the seeds and labour. If the crops were produced, they would have fetched me as much as Rs 10,000. So I have effectively lost around Rs 20,000. This is also the lot of every other 'prosperous' peasant in Bejapur."

Speaking about the drought, the sub-divisional magistrate of Kerakat said that all the 450 villages in Jalalpur, Muftigang, Kerakat and Domi, under the Kerakat sub-division, have been hit by the drought. Water barely reaches the pumps from the various canals becaues the sub-division is situated at the tail-end of the irrigated area, the point farthest from the water-source. Even crops in the command area are therefore drying. There are 85 public tube-wells, of which 12 are permanently defective, and 13 are not working because of minor defects. A number of private tubewells provide the much-needed relief. Last year there were 300 millimetres of rainfall till August, and this year the rainfall for the same period was 93 milli-metres only. On September 2, the rainfall recorded was 2 millimetres and September 3 it was 6.5 millimetres. This was hardly sufficient for the kharif crop, and there is no hope of any more rainfall now, because the rainy season is almost over.

According to Ramashray Yadav who owns ten acres in Gajna, and Belkhara, there are about 250 families in the two villages which till roughly 450 bighas of land. Apart from a few Yadavas, the rest till no more than 5 to 10 acres each. Among them are harijans, Thakurs, Koiris and Lohars. There is a public pump near the harijan basti in Gajna. Though there are about 16 to 17 pumping sets in the village, this does not appear to help: this is evident from the sight at the maize plantations, where despite the presence of tubewells and pumps within close reach, the crops have dried. The pumps are not working for the lack of diesel.

The former Minister and MP from Kerakat, Ram Sagar Singh, is more worried about the rabi than the kharif crop. According to him, the drought poses a grave threat to the rabi crop, since the farmers have no seeds to plant due to the crop-failure, And Government help has also not been forthcoming.

Mr N. A. Vishwanathan, Jaunpur's young and enthusiastic DM, said that crops worth Rs 16 crores were damaged in the area. A food-for-work programme involving a 49-km stretch of road has been started. Of the 501 public tubewells only 423 are working. We heard a strange complaint in the DM's office: of the 600 cusecs of water earmarked for Jaunpur and Sultanpur, only 300 are being received. Of this Jaunpur's due share is 40 per cent but it is only receiving 25 per cent. On September 8, the DM wrote in protest to the State Government, against the inadequate arrangements made for the district. The DM confessed that only 17 per cent of the arable land in his district was irrigable. Mr Kedar Nath, a peasant in Kerakat complained that the lift irrigation technique was not working. Most private tube-wells have stopped working for lack of power or diesel.

The Government has announced that the consumption of electricity in cities will be restricted to save more power for the villages. According to the new roster, power cuts are to be effective on one day from 12 noon to 6 pm and on the next from 6 am to 12 noon, and so on, on alternate days. Villages are supposed to receive power for 6 hours every day. But farmers complain of receiving power for not more than two to three hours every day, and this too between irregular intervals. Power cuts result in problems in operating electric pumping sets. There is another problem. Power for irrigation is supplied at night, but the peasants are unwilling to work at night because of the fear of snakes which abound in the fields. The inconvenient hours of power supply have angered the villagers, who allegedly beat up the electricity executive engineer, Mr R. N. Singh, on September 4-5.

Hanuman Prasad Singh

Mr Birendra Pratap Singh of Sakhoi village, talking about a fellow farmer, Kedar Nath Singh, who owns a foreign tractor, said that besides ploughing 20 acres of his (Kedar's) land, the tractor was being used to plough hundreds of acres of other farmers' land at a rate of Rs 15 to 40 per acre. (The differing rates were due to the different uses the tractor was put to). Mr Birendra Pratap Singh said that he had asked Kedar babu if he could use his tractor for ploughing four bighas of his own land, to which the latter replied that he would lend it only if given the diesel. "For the last 10 days my men have been looking for diesel in the city but in vain." According to the local Janata(S) leader Mr Hanuman Prasad Singh, the ten to 12 petrol pumps in the city have not been able to obtain sufficient diesel, and whatever little they have is being sold at the exorbitant rate of Rs 3.30 per litre in the blackmarket whereas the actual cost is Rs 1.68 per litre. Says Mr Hanuman Prasad Singh, "The Government has announced that diesel will be supplied on production of ration cards, but why has nothing been done about it?" The racketing in diesel has already given rise to tension among the farmers. Sometime back the pesants and their leaders gheraoed a petrol pump on the Allahabad Road in the Naigang municipality. According to a statement by a Government spokesman, diesel permits shall soon be issued in the Jaunpur district under which 30 litres per week are earmarked for pumping sets, 40 litres per week for tractors, 40 litres per day for trucks and buses and 20 litres per day for jeep taxies. This means a total of 577 kilolitres of diesel will be supplied to Jaunpur every month, while the actual demand in Jaunpur is for 1,600 kilolitres every month. The gap between actual demand and the amount promised is obvious. With prospects of relief in the villages declining a massive exodus has started towards towns and cities and an increasing number of people are taking to pulling rickshaws and working on construction sites as labourers. Only those who still have the courage and determination to survive on their land have stayed back.

The exodus from the villages can have serious implications for the agricultural economy since when the time comes for the rabi crop to be sown, there will be few hands around. The position of foodgrains is yet to be ascertained. The Government has opened some fair price foodgrains shops which are to sell wheat at a rate of Rs 138 per quintal. The market price of wheat has meanwhile shot up to Rs 145 per quintal from Rs 120 per quintal a few days back. This shows the enormous profiteering in wheat prices. The Government harps on the fact that there are large stocks of wheat in godowns, but has this helped check prices? As for loans to the peasants, the radio and newspapers announce that the Government has decided to stop temporarily the process of recovery of loans. But according to an ex-MP Ram Sagar Singh, the Government circular to this effect insists on the repayment of loans where it would be easy to recover them, while not pressurising the others. The language being ambiguous, the circular is interpreted according to convenience, so that non-payment of loans would appear in some cases to be acts of default, and in others, condonable.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

According to Mr Ram Sagar Singh, ten persons were arrested in Macchli Shahar for alleged default on September 3 and 4.

The farmers are also worried about not getting the right variety of fodder for their animals. According to a note issued by the Government's Animal Husbandry department the fodder being given to the animals is unhealthy since it has not been able to grow fully, and contains an acid (hydrocyanic acid) that is poisonous for the animals and can cause death within an hour if consumed. The effects of the acid can be seen in ten minutes: the animal develops breathing trouble, shivering and soon falls unconscious. Animals can also develop a skin disease, whereby the skin starts peeling off on consuming a poisonous plant Lantana Camara. This causes death within 24 to 48 hours. The Animal Husbandry department has advised farmers to keep their cattle under the shade and inform vets on discovering such symptoms. The Government has not informed the farmers where such poisonous plants can be seen. Besides, which poor peasant would take the pains to have the plants in and around his grazing area tested in a laboratory? Where are the laboratories in the first place? Meanwhile animals are fast dying and milch cattle are being sold cheaply. One of the reasons for the increasing number of animals dying is the lack of drinking water. People and animals are being forced to drink dirty water from wells and ponds. No one feels the need to use bleaching powder to disinfect the water.

The Government, while not denying the news of cattle dying, refutes the claims of human deaths due to starvation. Government officials continue to challenge such claims, even going to the extent of asking for the deceased persons' names and addresses. Some influential people say the deaths are due to cholera. It is a pointless controversy. For the common man, however, this makes no difference: for him, death due to starvation would mean death caused by malnutrition, unhealthy drinking water, etc. These are the reasons for the deaths in Kerakat. Do words matter?

Arun Ranjan

We want drought

NOT all villages in UP and Bihar want rain. Surprisingly, there are some which do not—precisely four of them. "Yes, we want drought. We don't want rains. We want the canals in our area closed. If it rains, we are finished," said Mr Rajpati Singh, a resident of Sakhoi village of Kerakat tehsil in Jaunpur, and continued. "If you want to know the reasons come and visit our village." And so we did. Kerakat tehsil is 25 kilometres away from Lucknow. Pressmen from the State capital had reported six starvation deaths.

A strange spectacle greeted us when we reached Sakhoi: the mud houses had developed cracks and about 25 of them had collapsed. The fields around the village were covered with water and the soil was marshy. Dry land was not visible anywhere. The ground under our feet was soft and we soon realised that the legs of the chairs we were sitting on had sunk into the earth.

Rajpati Singh told us the reasons for this "artificial flood". Some years back there were plans to construct the Jagdishpur canal, which was supposed to be 8 kilometres long. It was meant to irrigate the fields with water from the Gomti around Shivpuri village. But when in 1968-69 the canal was inaugurated, only 6 kms were completed. The last two kilometres—the storage area from where the unutilised water was to be channeled back to the Gomti—was never completed. As a result the unutilised water, instead of being channeled back to the Gomti, spread over an area of three to four square kilometres around Kerakat. Over the years, the irrigation canal scheme brought in crores of gallons of water of which only one-fifth was used for irrigation purposes. The rest just covered the ground saturated the soil and made i marshy. In August 1978, Rajpati Singh's house, which cost Rs 60,000 to construct collapsed. In four villages around that area—Shivpuri, Sakhoi, Keshpur and Saidpur—nearly 125 houses have collapsed. In Shivpuri about 25 houses belonging to harijans and the backward classes have collapsed.

No crops are grown around these four villages. There are two reasons for this. The water accumulated at the roots of the plants causes them to rot and the salty minerals which are under the ground come to the surface with the water. This has eroded the fertility of the soil. In some places in the villages little pools of water could be seen. The stagnant pools have become breeding-grounds for mosquitoes and the attendant diseases they bring: filaria, malaria, etc. Drinking water, too, is a problem, since the water in the wells has been polluted. Bleaching powder is hard to get. Cows and other animals cannot graze anywhere since there is mud all over. The total crop production has been reduced by three-fourths. Women have been evacuated and men sleep in the open for fear that their houses might collapse at any moment.

An October 5, 1978, the District Magistrate of Jaunpur visited Sakhoi after a lot of persuasion. A report on the situation was given to him. It is said that the DM had wryly remarked that the villagers did not need pails to draw out water from the well (since the water level had risen). When the Government thought of helping out with relief to the tune of Rs 100 to Rs 200 per head, the people refused to take it. The amount of damage suffered was nearly Rs 25,000 to Rs 50,000. Following the report of the District Magistrate, Rs 1.75 lakhs was spent on raising the walls of the canals flowing through the villages. Rajpati Singh said that the canals should be closed for a long time. According to him nearly Rs 30 lakhs had been spent on the Jagdishpur canal scheme and it still remains incomplete. This year the drought has brought some relief to the people of Sakhoi and the surrounding villages.

AR

Photographs: KRISHAN MURARI KISHAN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Beginning October 7

This week the Sun alone is in Virgo. Venus, Mercury and Uranus are in Libra, Neptune is in Scorpio, Kethu is in Aquarius and Mars is in Cancer. Jupiter, Saturn and Rahu are conjoined in the Sun. The Moon will be moving through Taurus and Gemini from Aries.

ARIES (March 21 — April 20) An unexpected journey is probable. Keep away from quarrels and erratic actions. Exercise caution and circumspection in all your dealings. If you proceed carefully, luck will favour you in subtle ways. This week is good for romance and matrimony. For people in the field of arts, success seems imminent. Letters are likely to bring good news. Good dates: 7, 8, 9 and 12. Lucky numbers: 3 and 6. Favourable direction: North-east.

TAURUS (April 21 — May 22) Progress on the business front will surely lead to financial gains. Your bad days are about to come to an end. Don't lack self-confidence. Employers and those in authority will prove very helpful in the coming days. Womenfolk will buy expensive clothes and ornaments. This week is favourable for courtship. Domestic and social problems must be solved peacefully. Good dates: 7, 8, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 3 and 9. Favourable directions: South-east. and West.

GEMINI (May 23 — June 21) Your financial front will prosper to no end. You may have to do a fair bit of travelling too. Some extra expenditure is probable this week. Those in service may be promoted or transferred. Mixing business with pleasure may prove fatal in the long run. Your friends will inspire you. The domestic scene will be a source of joy. Good dates: 8, 9 and 12. Lucky numbers: 7 and 11. Favourable direction: South.

CANCER (June 22 — July 22) This will be a happier and more successful week. The stars promise a good time for romance and matrimonial affairs. An elderly relative will prove helpful to your new ventures. It is likely that employers will favour you in many ways. Womenfolk will show great cooperation. Do not be extravagant. Speculation will surely pay. Social engagements will keep you busy. Good dates: 8, 9 and 11. Lucky number: 6. Favourable direction: South

LEO (July 23 — August 22) Your intuitions and business acumen should help you to surmount problems on the financial front. Soon, many of your recent problems will cease to bother you. Help from elders and secret sources will be forthcoming. Forge ahead on all fronts. You are, however, advised against making impulsive changes. Be discreet in all your dealings. Do not feel shy to ask friends for help. Good dates: 7, 9, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 2 and 7. Favourable directions: South and West.

VIRGO (August 22 — September 22) Employers and those in authority may prove to be very hostile. Attend to business. It would be really foolish to neglect your profession. The heart should not rule your head. If you are careful and discreet in your dealings, luck may favour you. You will make new friends this week. The domestic scene will remain peaceful. Do not undertake dubious love adventures. Good dates: 10, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 1 and 5. Favourable directions: South-west and North LIBRA (September 23 — October 22) Your health will show signs of improvement. On the financial front, things are bound to brighten up. Utilise hidden reserves of energy to further your plans. Your ambitions are within your reach. For property matters, this week will prove lucky. Exercise caution in romance. Good dates: 7, 8, 10 and 12. Lucky numbers: 3 and 5. Favourable direction: South.

SCORPIO (October 23 — November 21) Exercise circumspection and caution in your speech and writing. All correspondence must be read thoroughly. Examine all documents relating to business very carefully. Guard against deception and theft. Important paper should be kept in safe custody. An unexpected event beyond your control may put all your plans into disarray. Keep your temper under control. Good dates: 9, 11, 12 and 13. Lucky numbers: 4 and 7. Favourable direction: West.

SAGITTARIUS (November 22 — December 22) Despite small problems, this week will prove to be a happy one. Luck will favour you in more than one way. Those in authority will encourage your new ventures. The financial front will prosper and your family will have a comfortable time. Intellectual pursuits will prosper. You are, however, advised against making erratic changes. A short journey is indicated. Good dates: 7, 8, 9 and 11. Lucky numbers: 4 and 11. Favourable direction: North-west.

CAPRICORN (December 23 — January 20) Your indomitable willpower and perseverance will help you to negotiate all obstacles placed in your path. Push all your business affairs to the utmost. Seek favours and make changes to achieve your goals. An old friend will render invaluable service. Keep away from gambling and doubtful love adventures. Meditation will ensure mental peace. Good dates: 7, 8, 11 and 13. Lucky numbers: 3 and 9. Favourable directions: North and South.

AQUARIUS (January 21 — February 19) You will achieve a fair measure of success. Influential friends and relatives will extend all possible help and cooperation. Artistic and intellectual pursuits will prosper during this week. This is the right period for entering into new contracts and business deals. Letters will bring good news. Romance is indicated. Good dates: 9, 10 and 13. Lucky numbers: 3 and 6. Favourable direction: North.

PISCES (February 20 — March 20) This is a period of trial for you. Patience and courage should, however, see you through this long and dark period. Exercise caution in all your dealings. You may have to undertake long journeys. Devote time to business affairs. The domestic scene will be a source of joy and happiness. Good dates: 8, 9, 10 and 12. Lucky numbers: 3 and 9. Favourable directions: North and North-west.

M. B. RAMAN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Come alive with freshness

Totally different LIRIL. Rippled green with the exciting freshness of limes. Tangy, tingling LIRIL ...makes a fresh new woman of you.

Liril
THE FRESHNESS SOAP

with the exciting freshness of limes

LINTAS-LR. 27-2416

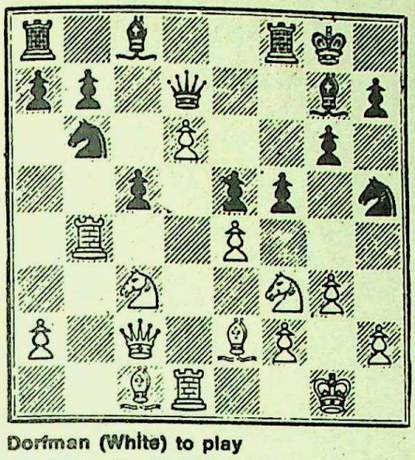
A Quality Product by HINDUSTAN LEVER

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

chess

Grigorian (Black)



Dorfman (White) to play
Position after Black's 16th move

Chess fever

CHESS is not a great spectator attraction. Relatively few people have a sufficiently deep knowledge of the game to understand the ins and outs of a five-hour grandmaster struggle, and even for the fortunate minority the temptation to nod off half way through can be overpowering. Yet popular interest in chess is undoubtedly high. Viewing figures for BBC-2's 'The Master Game' are good and would in fact seem to exceed the number of people in this country who actually do play chess. It is this interest among people who presumably have only very little knowledge of the game which is particularly fascinating.

The strangest example is that of the Philippines, hosts to the recent World Championship Match. Chess is officially the second most popular game/sport on these islands, first place going to, believe it or not, basket-ball. (The height of the average Filipino does not rise far beyond the level of Ronnie Corbett's kneecaps). Chess coverage in the media is extensive, and Eugene Torre, their first grandmaster, enjoys the same level of popularity as a Bobby Moore or a Henry Cooper in this country. But, and this is the intriguing bit, precious few Filipinos understand the first thing about chess. I can best illustrate this by the following conversation which occurred when an ardent Korchnoi supporter phoned the playing hall during one of the World Championship games to find out how her hero was getting on: 'Who is leading in today's game?' she inquired. 'Er – Mr Korchnoi, he is leading, Ma'am', came the reply after some deliberation.

'Oh good! By how much is he leading?' This follow-up would have stumped all but the greatest authorities on the game: 'Er – well, Ma'am. Mr Korchnoi, he has played 32 moves and Mr Karpov, he has only played 31!'

Today's game is from a country where the people really do know what they are talking about – when it comes to chess anyway – the USSR.

White: Dorfman. Black: Grigorian
Soviet Championship 1977
King's Indian Defence

1. P—QB4, N—KB3; 2. N—QB3, P—KN3; 3. P—K4, B—N2; 4. P—Q4, P—Q3; 5. B—K2, O—O; 6. N—B3; P—K4; 7. O—O, QN—Q2; 8. Q—B2, P—B3; 9. R—Q1, Q—K2; 10. P—Q5, P—B4; 11. P—N1, N—R4; The knight does not stand so well here. Better 11. . . N—K1.

12. P—KN3, N—N3; 13. P—QN4, P x P; 14. R x P, P—B4; 15. P—B5, An inspired sacrificial breakthrough.

15. . . P x BP; 16. P—Q6, Q—Q2; (DIAGRAM) Losing by force. Relatively best was 16. . . Q—Q1.

17. R x N! P x R; 18. B—QN5, As Nimsowitch used to say, the queen is not a good blockader.

18. . . Q—Q1; 19. P—Q7, R—R4; 20. Q—N3+ K—N1; 21. N—N5! R x B; 22. N x R, and Black resigned. His position has fallen apart at the seams. On 22. . . B x P most accurate is 23 N—Q6! Q—K2 24 N(Q6)—B7+ R x N 25 N x R+ K—N1 25 N—R6++ mating.

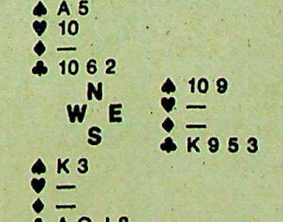
MICHAEL STEAN

bridge

A SERIES of articles by the veteran Hungarian Géza Ottlik in the American Bridge World created a big impression, because many of the positions he described were extremely unusual and seemed to belong to the world of problem-setters. The achievement of Adventures in Card Play, by Ottlik and Hugh Kelsey (Gollancz, £7.95), is that it establishes the practicality of these difficult plays. It is a book ahead of its time, but techniques improve; the Vienna coup, once the wonder of cafe society, now seems quite simple. I remember this deal from the Bridge World.

South plays in 3NT after East has opened One Spade. Spurning his partner's suit, West leads the 9 of diamonds, which is covered by the Jack and King. East returns a heart, won by the King, and a second diamond enables the defence to take the first four tricks. East exits with ♠ J.

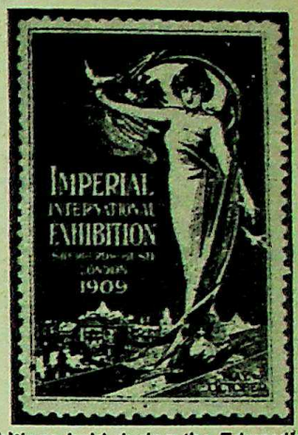
South, on the surface, has nine tricks —three spades, three hearts and (at least) three clubs, but there are entry problems. Declarer reaches this position:



South may play the King and Ace of spades, but what next? The heart 10 squeezes him, and if he doesn't lead the heart he can make only three clubs. But try overtaking ♠ K with ♠ A and leading ♥ 10: now East is the sufferer!

TERENCE REESE

stamps



Exhibitions held during the Edwardian era at Earls Court and in the Great White City at Shepherd's Bush were not commemorated by the issue of special postage stamps but several were advertised by stamp-like publicity labels. Having no postal validity, these labels were neglected by Edwardian collectors and some types are now very scarce, costing towards £1. The Imperial International Exhibition publicised by this embodiment of 'Peace and Commerce' was opened on 20 May 1909 by the Duke of Argyll.

C.W. HILL

quiz

QUESTIONS

1. What is white noise?
2. What is degaussing?
3. What is economic warfare?
4. What was Festung Europa?
5. What is concrete poetry?
6. What is a Skinner Box?
7. Who coined the phrase 'Theatre of panic'?

ANSWERS

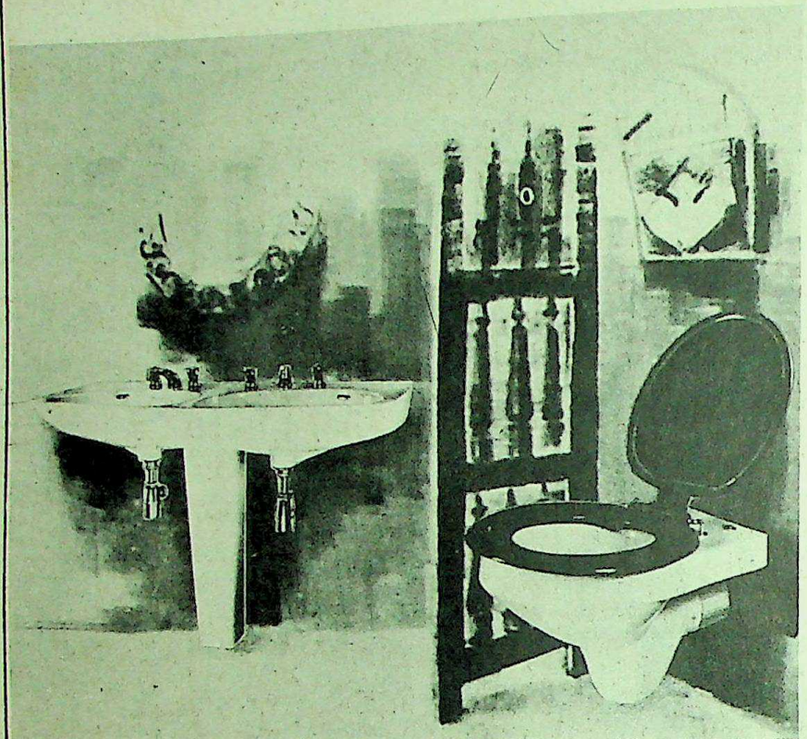
1. An incoherent combination of frequencies over a wide band.
2. Process of neutralising the magnetisation of ferromagnetic objects.
3. The disorganisation of the enemy's economy as a prevention against carrying on war, especially through economic measures, like denial of imports.
4. Fortress Europe, as it was known, was a Nazi propaganda symbol for enforced European unity and strength against invasion by Anglo-American forces in 1943.
5. A concept of poetry formulated and launched in 1958 by Brazilian poets and designers.
6. A device developed by B. F. Skinner for training animals to learn appropriate responses.
7. French dramatist Fernando Arrabal, to describe a type of cerebral theatre coined the term in 1926.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Basic to a beautiful bathroom!

Neycer's exclusive range of designs and colours- and your exclusive touch



Gracious homes not only in India but overseas as well, use Neycer's lovely and durable collection to advantage.

For your bathroom, too, choose nothing less than Neycer. Add a personal touch with your own decorating ideas.

The Neycer range and your imagination produce truly exclusive results!

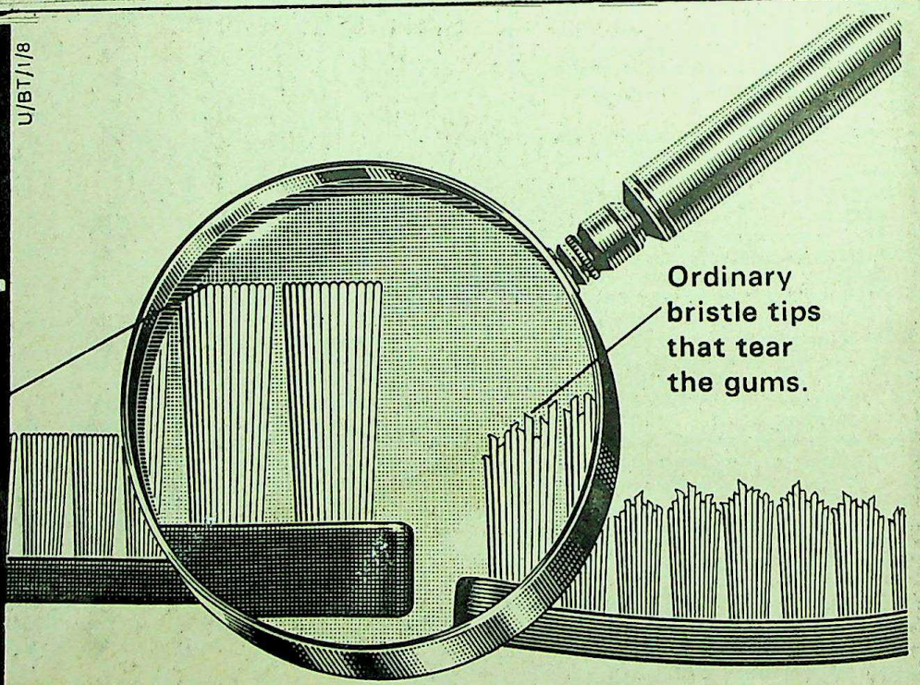
OBM 4965

Neycer

Beauty in your bathroom Beauty that lasts

U/BT/1/8

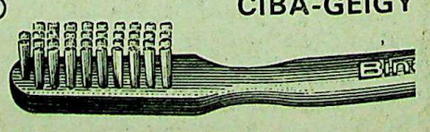
Binaca Toothbrush. Its safe 'rounded bristle tips' do not tear the gums.



A Binaca Toothbrush for all ages, all preferences.

CIBA-GEIGY

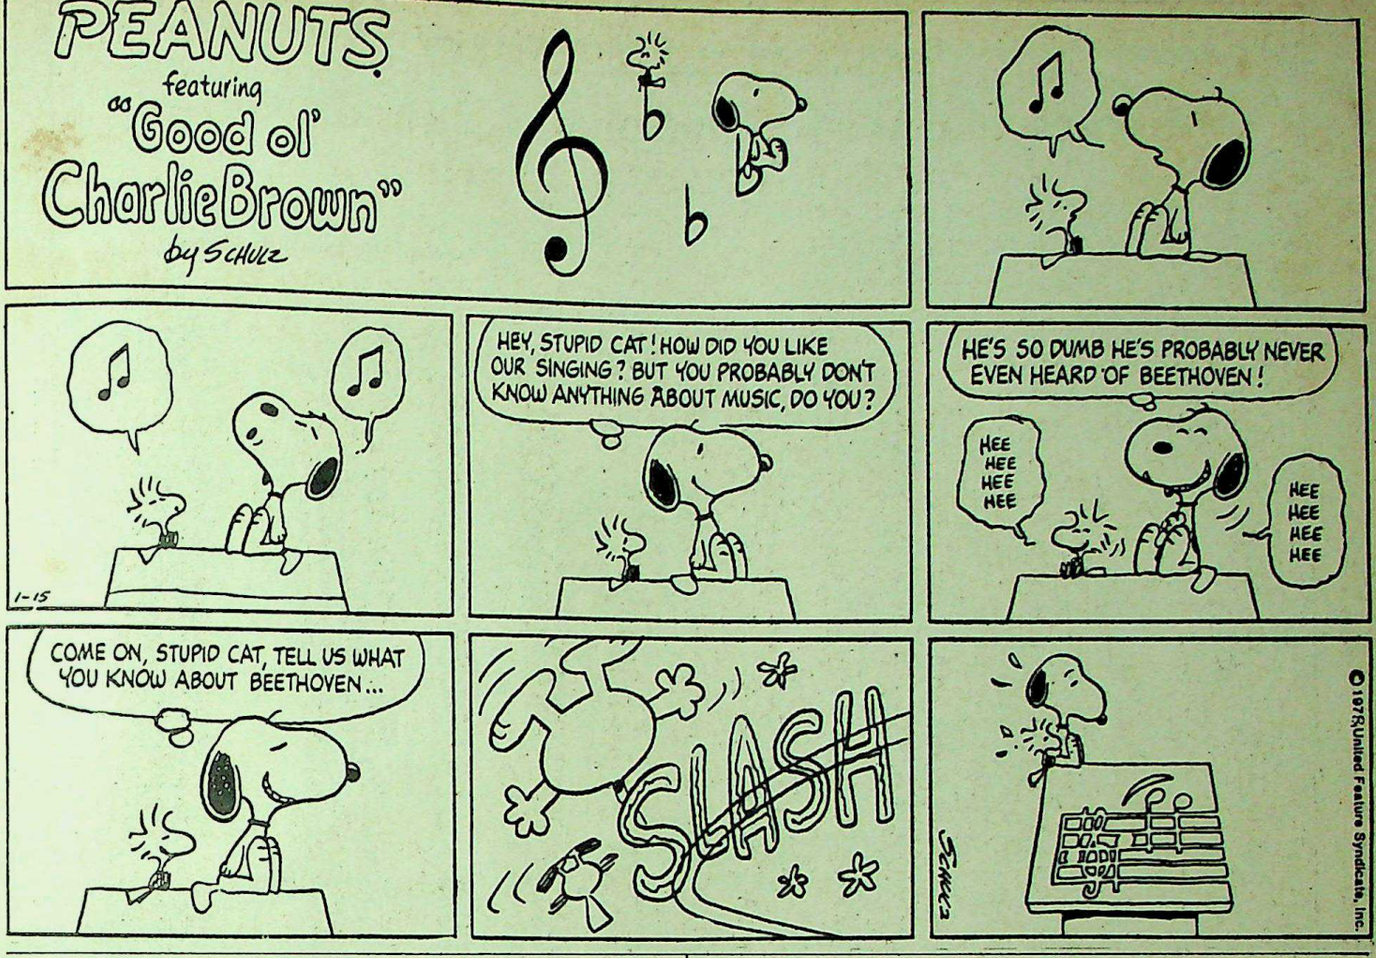
Binaca®



India's largest selling toothbrush

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



An explosive & startlingly candid study of the life & world of high priced Sex Girls

The Indian Call Girls

Dr. Promilla Kapur

Based on years of research and hundreds of interviews, the book penetrates the secret, murky underworld of Indian Call-girls, college girls, single girls, married women, divorcees and widows, who rarely enjoy their "business" but are willing partners for anyone who can pay their price.

"Fascinating, stark reality...The author has not let prudery inhibit her presentation of the sexual details...each case plunges us into an alien world of compelling reality."

—The Illustrated Weekly

"...a fascinating book on the murky underground world of call-girls in India. It explodes the traditional myth of the SATI SAVITRI Indian women."

—India Today

Rs.14/-

AVAILABLE AT ALL BOOKSHOPS & BY VPP

Write for a FREE copy of Orient Literary Review

ORIENT PAPERBACKS

Madarsa Road, Kashmere Gate, Delhi-110006

B.T.'s Director Greets K.E.Seetharam 4th in India in IIT-JEE'79

1979 BRILLIANT'S YEAR OF TRIUMPH IN IIT ENTRANCE

Dhabaleswar Kumar Panda Placed second among 460 declared successful in the East Zone is BRILLIANT'S CANDIDATE D.K. Panda is 12th in India

Rajvardhan Duphare of Delhi (1) Amitdas of Dhanbad (2) First in India and Second in India among the Selected SC CANDIDATES are BRILLIANT'S Students.

6 MORE OF BRILLIANT'S STUDENTS WERE RANKED AMONG THE FIRST ALL-INDIA HUNDRED

Datar-Madras	31
A.P.Kacker-Lucknow	42
A.P.Anantharaman-Palghat	45
V.S.Somayajulu-Hyderabad	53
T.Ravishankar-Hyderabad	68
R.Arvind-Madras	83

54 of the 152 selected from Madras City are BRILLIANT'S STUDENTS

BRILLIANT TUTORIALS

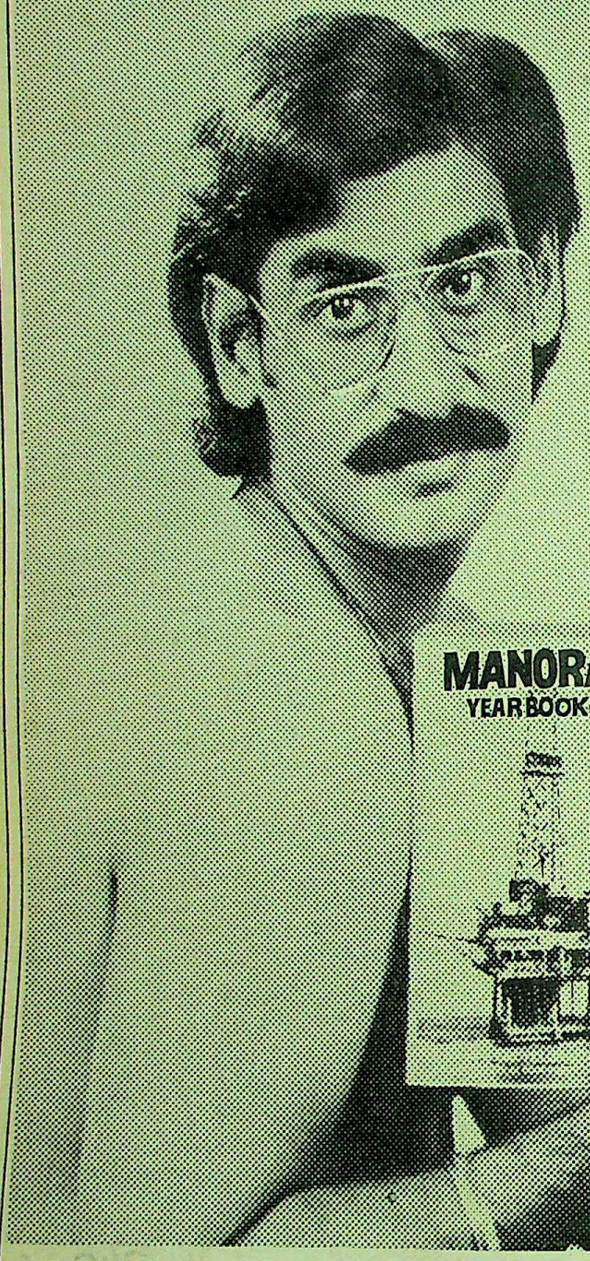
12, Masilamani Mudali St., T.Nagar
Madras-600 017. Phone: 442099

5 Month Postal Tuition for IIT Entrance 1980 Commences October 1979

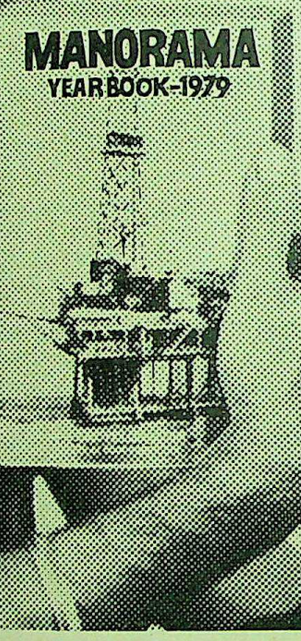
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

My shirt, yes...but my Manorama Year Book...No!



MANORAMA YEAR BOOK 1979



The indispensible reference Book.

920 Pages
Rs. 20/-
Postage Extra

There are some books that you would rather keep for yourself. Manorama Year Book, for example. Take the 1979 edition. It's a first rate reference book. Up-to-date. Accurate. And lucid. You wouldn't like to part with it for anything!

Science & Technology: Essential information on space, medicine and health, progress of science, inventions and discoveries etc.

History & Culture: The World—from prehistoric times—and India from 4000 B.C. upto the present days. Sketches of eminent men who have moulded human culture.

The World: A review of all countries.

India: Includes a new feature on all states.

Special Feature: An authoritative article on the Marine Wealth of India.

Manorama Year Book—the fountain of knowledge. Get your copy today!

Now available at all leading bookstalls.

A prestige publication of

MALAYALA MANORAMA

Kerala's largest circulated daily, published simultaneously from Kottayam, Calicut and Cochin.

90th year of publication.

Circulation nearly 4.5 lakh copies a day.

Readership nearly 70 lakhs. Lowest mille-rate.

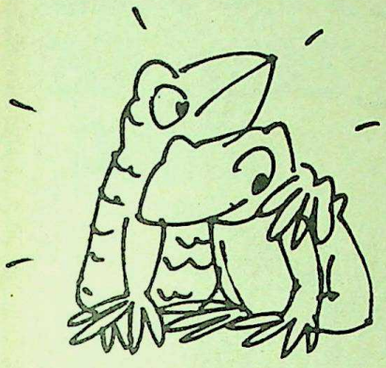
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

VARIETY

his india

prize rs. 30 for the entry given first



RAIPUR : It was a strange marriage — to please the God of rains, Indra in a village 30 km from Mahasamund in the drought-hit Raipur district. The "bride" and the "bridegroom" were kept in separate pots. They were toads. The marriage was performed with all the formalities in a special "mantap" at an auspicious time workd out by pundits. The wedding ceremonies were conducted by women — men were allowed only to watch—amid chanting of mantras followed by a community feast for all the villagers. The bride was named "Machli Rani" (Queen of Fish) and the bridegroom "Meghraj" (The King of Clouds). The two toads were then ceremoniously let into a tank — Deccan Herald (Arasu, Bangalore)

NEW DELHI : Two young men fond of lively conversation with young girls on the phone found that they had dialled the "wrong" number. The girl, a schoolteacher in north Delhi, they had been dialling, proved too smart for them. She not only taped their love talk on the phone but also invited the young men to come over. As the two reached the teacher's house, they found to their chagrin, policemen and not their "love" — The Hindustan Times (Dunder Raman, Delhi).

JAIPUR : One kilo of hair was taken out from the stomach of a boy during an operation performed by a doctor at the Mahatma Gandhi Hospital in Jodhpur recently. The 18-year-old boy, Ram Kishore of Government Higher Secondary School, Nagaur, had been fond of eating hair for the last 16 years, it is said. He gradually developed a tumour and had frequent stomach ache. Last year, Dr Singhvi operated upon a woman, also of Nagaur district, and took out a bunch of hair weighing 750 grams — Deccan Herald (P. S. Rao, Udipi).

NEW DELHI : About 50 to 60 boys of St. Stephen's college stripped themselves neked sang and danced on Chattra Road, in between the Postgraduate Women's Hostel and the Miranda Girls' College Hostel. On a telephonic message from Dr Kukla, Dean of Students Welfare, Roshanara police rushed to the spot at 11.30 p.m. and found the complaint to be true. They managed to arrest eight of the boys while the others ran away—The Hindustan Times (Rajesh Karnik, New Delhi).

NEW DELHI : A 16-year-old son of a resident of Ramkrishnapuram, New Delhi, literally tied himself in knots while trying to pull a fast one on his parents. It is stated that his parents went shopping leaving him in the house. When they returned they found him gagged, and tied to a chair. They found that a cupboard had been ransacked, and Rs 950 and a necklace were missing. The boy told them that someone rang the doorbell in their absence. When he opened the door two men attacked him, and tying him to a chair, they ransacked the cupboard and escaped with "something". The parents reported to the police. However during the interrogation the boy broke down and confessed that he had concocted the story. The Statesman (Nandita Bhandakkar, New Delhi).

dia abroad

NEW DELHI : Australia's first Hindu temple was formally opened at Sydney by Swami Ranganathanada of the Ramkrishna Mission on September 1, according to reports received from Sydney. The funds for the Sri Mandir temple, situated at the Sydney suburb of Auburn were raised by the Sri Mandir Society, an association of Indians in Australia. The images for the temple are expected to reach Sydney shortly. According to Dr Anand, the society's president, Sri Mandir aims to hold language classes and religious seminars. Mr L. N. Birla is the president of the Sri Mandir—The Hindu

SEOUL : Hot pepper, worth 1.5 million dollars, imported from India was burnt to ashes by South Korean officials on September 2, according to the Agriculture and Fishery Ministry. This was part of 2,500 tonnes of hot pepper the Korean Government imported from India last year which turned out to be inedible because of harmful colouring matter, antiseptic and other alien substances mixed in the commodity, the Ministry said. Mr Nam Wook, vice Agriculture and Fishery Minister said the burning was made at the request of importers who did not want their pepper returned to save freight charges. He added that the Indian exporters promised to compensate for the destroyed pepper—The Hindu

without comment

THE President Mr Sanjeeva Reddy will have to go if the Janata Party got an absolue majority in the elections—A. B. Vajpayee

I AM a simple man. All my dependants are in service, not business—Charan Singh

TARKESHWARI SINHA was the most undignified woman Parliament has ever had—M. O. Mathai

LIKE tuberculosis, Mr Sanjay Gandhi, destroyed the backbone of the Congress—Devaraj Urs

THE CPI is the country's political invalid. It has so far stayed in the Congress(I)'s pocket but we don't want to have that situation any more—C. M. Stephen

I WILL chase Raj Narain like a torpedo through the constituency... My aim is to become the Prime Minister, ultimately—I. S. Johar

Mr Devaraj Urs is the new star of the south. After rising like a meteor, he is certain to plunge into the sea—S. K. Patil

IT IS a good thing that we did not agree to India's suggestion to restrict the number of bouncers to two per over otherwise Karsan Ghavri would have been in trouble —Bob Merriman, Manager of the touring Australian team

humour in real life

THE LONG delay of the Indian Airlines flight had thoroughly exasperated the passengers. So when they were finally aboard and the air hostess was serving fruit juice, one particularly nasty passenger said: "Haven't you got something more hot to offer?" The air hostess replied: "Would you like to try my temper, sir?" —Teju Pagedar, Calcutta

ADVERTISEMENT at a lottery corner: "Buy one ticket and you become Muqaddar ka Sikandar"— M. Baruah, Dibrugarh

strations/Ahi Bhusan Malik

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Bazigars made a precarious living.

The Bazigars of Khanna in Punjab were professional acrobats. Who risked life and limb to keep body and soul together.

Today they face nothing more dangerous than the kick of a cow being milked. Because Bank of India has financed the Bazigars for purchasing milch animals.

Today they live in pukka houses set in a colony resembling a co-operative dairy farm. The income from their dairying has brought to them a prosperity they never knew.

Just another instance of Bank of India's concern for the weaker sections of society.

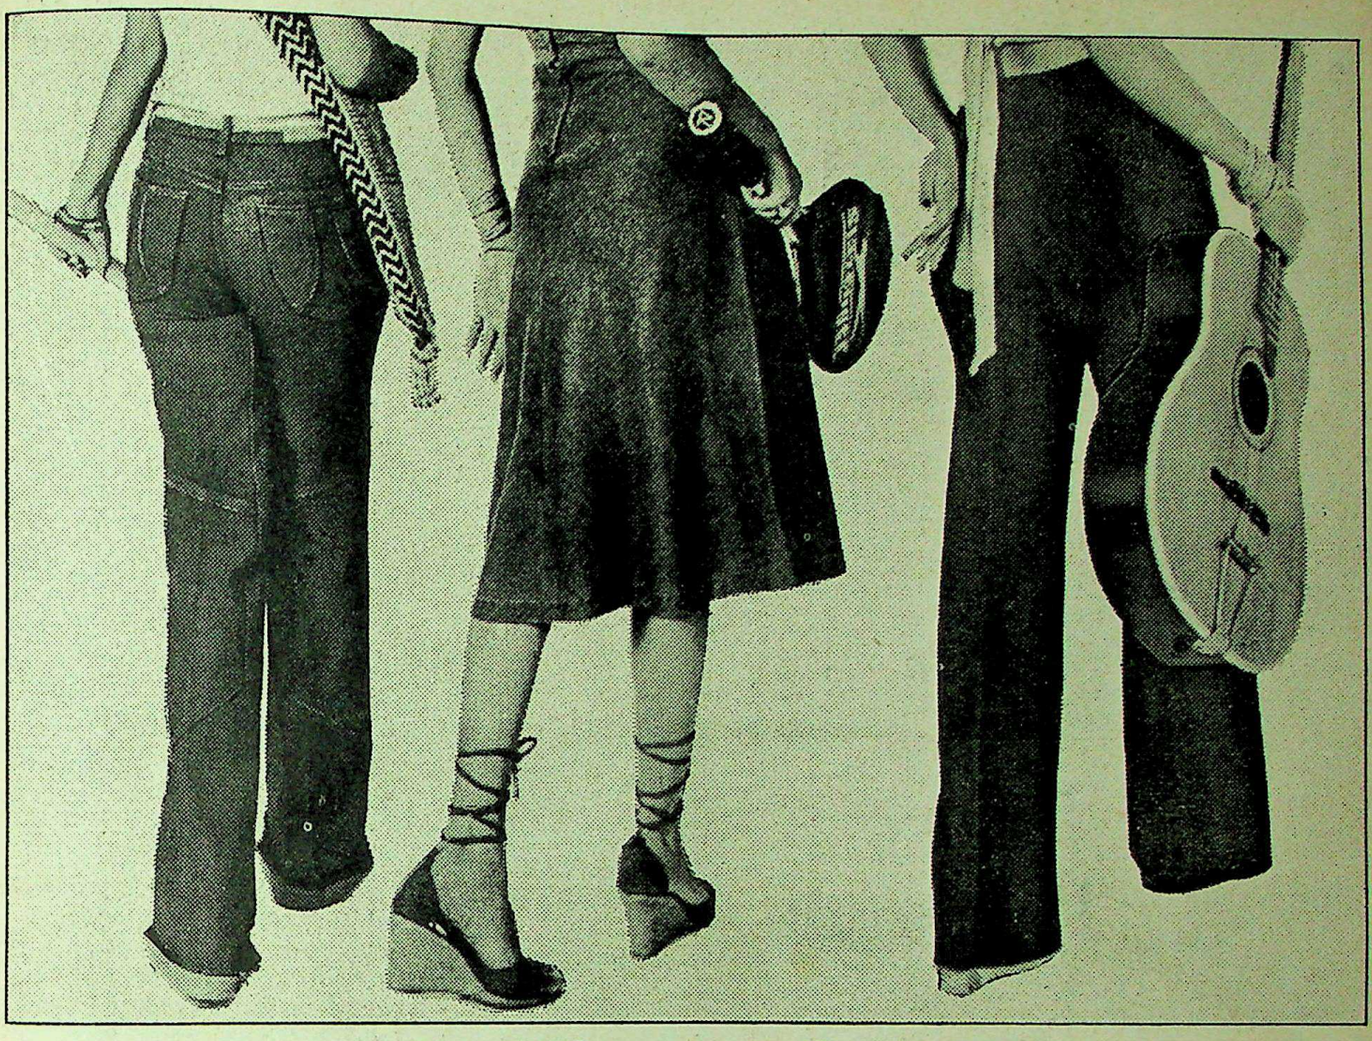
Secure your future with India's largest nationalized bank.

Bank of India
(A Government of India Undertaking)
Where service makes the difference.

daCunha-BOI-68

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

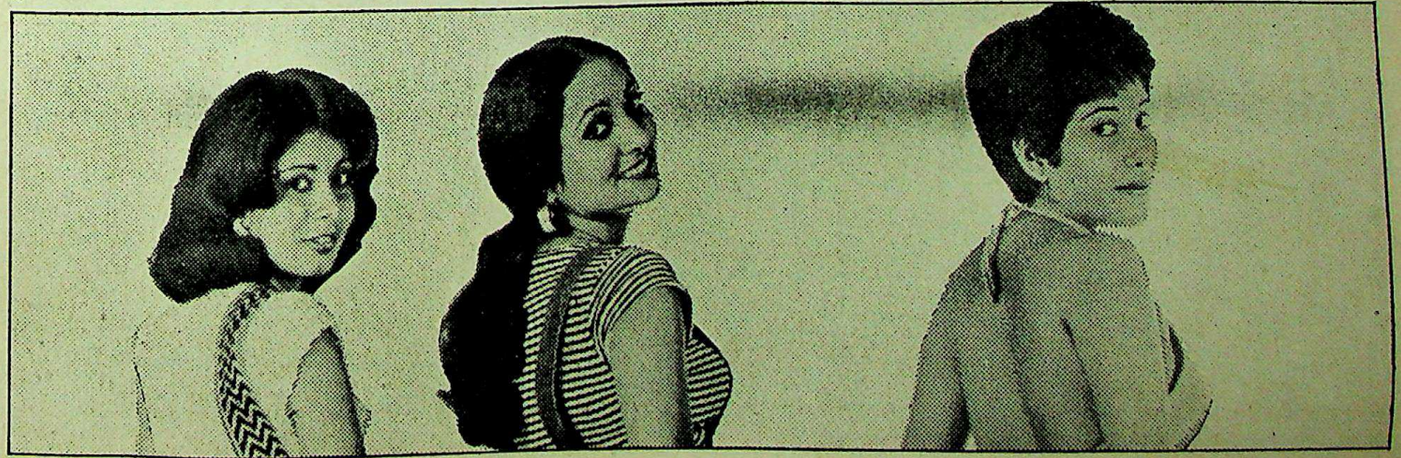


Calling girls who like the liberated look

NAGDA PROMISES TO MAKE HEADS TURN YOUR WAY.

NAGDA SUITINGS SHIRTINGS

Adroit-1293



See the latest arrivals in Top Dyed, Terrywool, Texturised, Summerlene Suitings and Party Shirtings.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

All colourful festivals begin at home with Bombay Paints

Give your house the festive look.

With Bombay Paints your walls resound with mirth, your windows breeze in good cheer, your doors swing light-heartedly and you hit the ceiling with our vast range of colours. Making your entire house celebrate the ritual of colours.

Bombay Paints are easy to apply, cover greater areas and last longer than any other paint.

Bombay paints

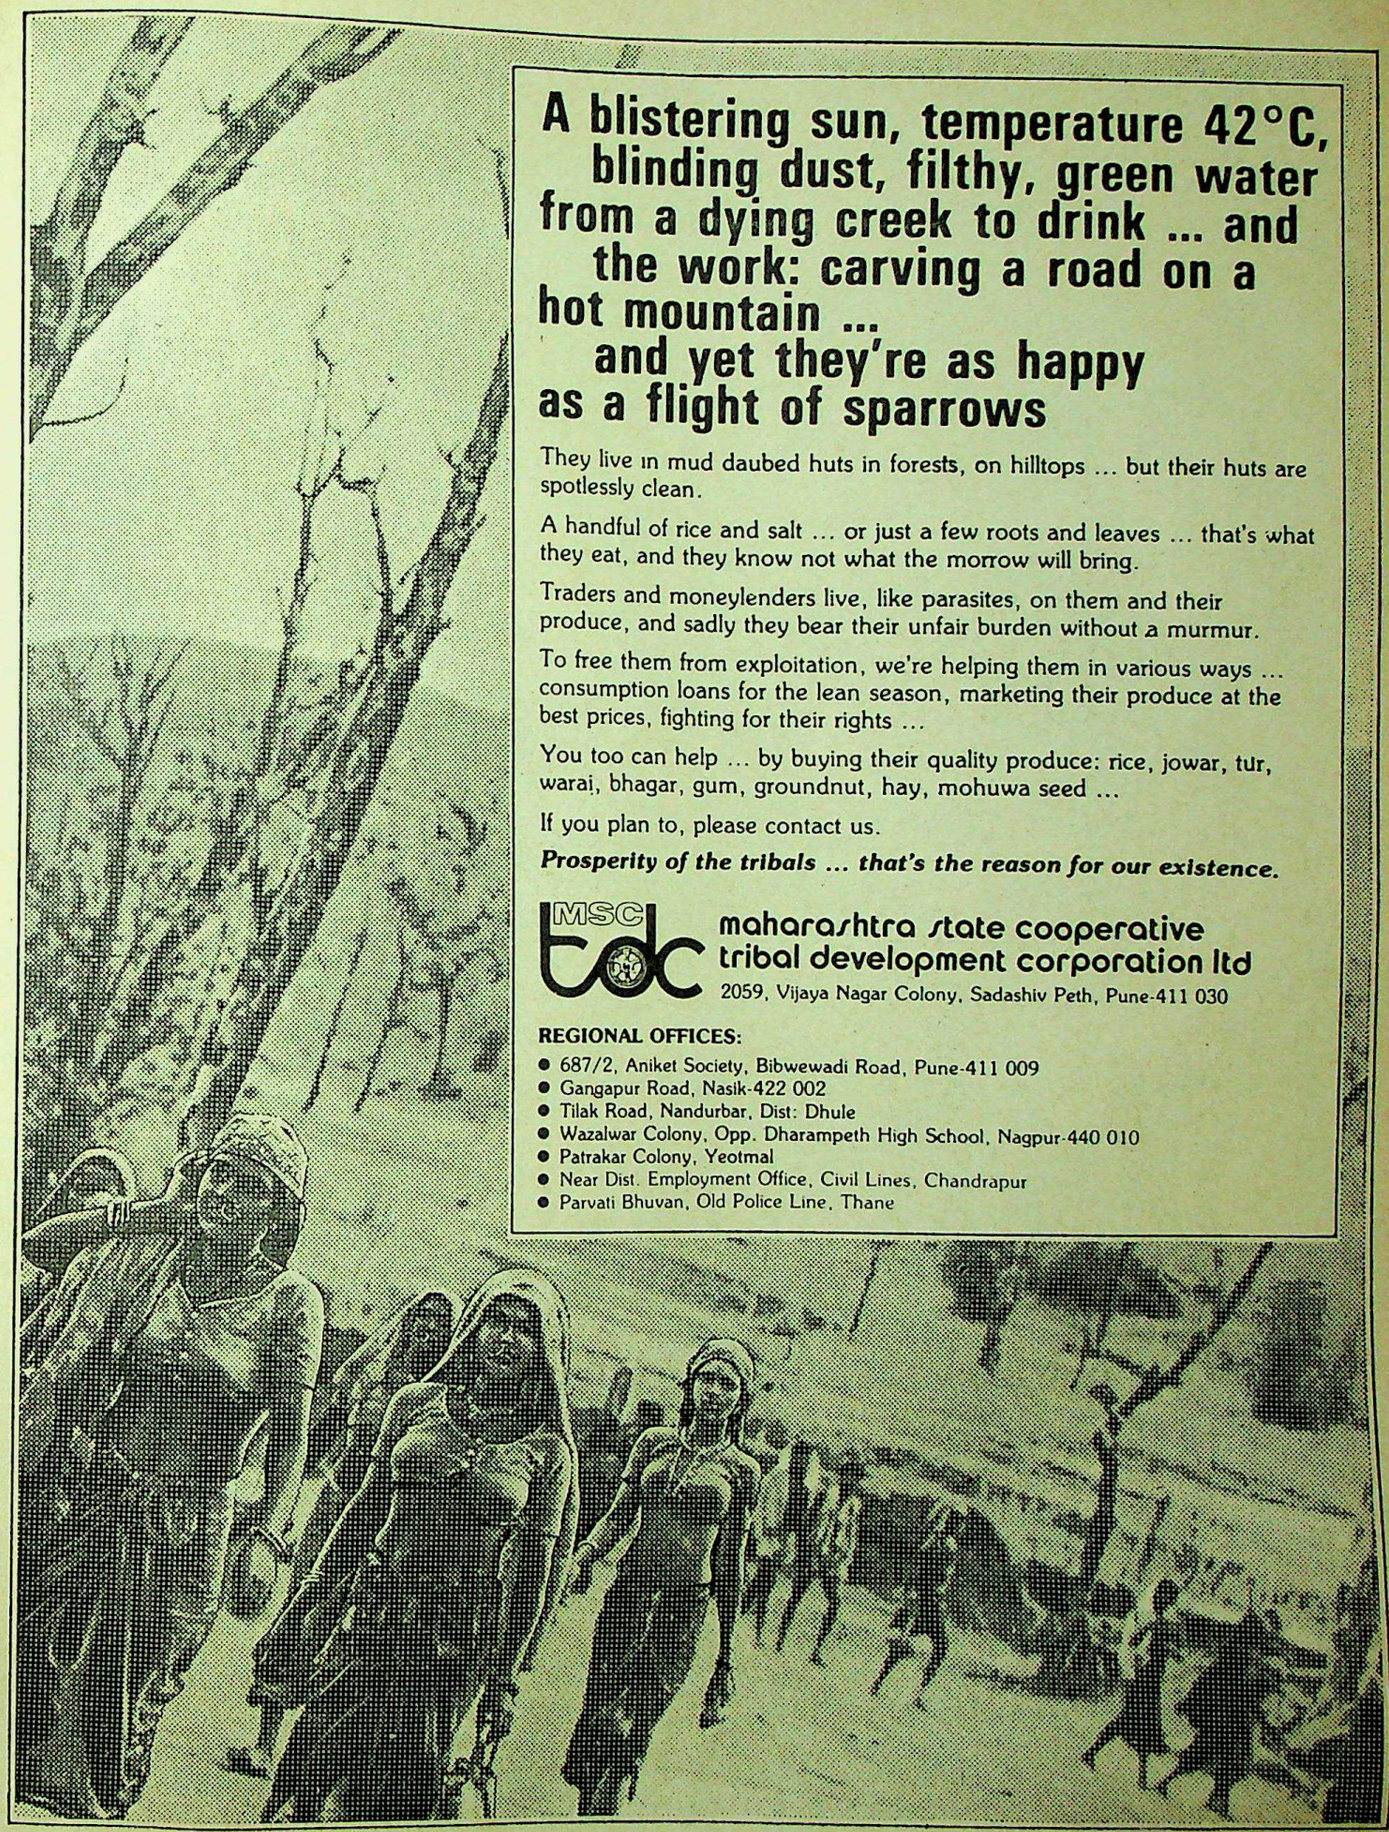
& ALLIED PRODUCTS LTD.

Kangaroo Paints-best in the long run

ARMS-BP-30-270

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



A blistering sun, temperature 42°C, blinding dust, filthy, green water from a dying creek to drink ... and the work: carving a road on a hot mountain ... and yet they're as happy as a flight of sparrows

They live in mud daubed huts in forests, on hilltops ... but their huts are spotlessly clean.

A handful of rice and salt ... or just a few roots and leaves ... that's what they eat, and they know not what the morrow will bring.

Traders and moneylenders live, like parasites, on them and their produce, and sadly they bear their unfair burden without a murmur.

To free them from exploitation, we're helping them in various ways ... consumption loans for the lean season, marketing their produce at the best prices, fighting for their rights ...

You too can help ... by buying their quality produce: rice, jowar, tur, waraj, bhagar, gum, groundnut, hay, mohuwa seed ...

If you plan to, please contact us.

Prosperity of the tribals ... that's the reason for our existence.

MSC tdc

maharashtra state cooperative tribal development corporation ltd

2059, Vijaya Nagar Colony, Sadashiv Peth, Pune-411 030

REGIONAL OFFICES:

- 687/2, Aniket Society, Bibwewadi Road, Pune-411 009
- Gangapur Road, Nasik-422 002
- Tilak Road, Nandurbar, Dist: Dhule
- Wazalwar Colony, Opp. Dharampeth High School, Nagpur-440 010
- Patrakar Colony, Yeotmal
- Near Dist. Employment Office, Civil Lines, Chandrapur
- Parvati Bhuvan, Old Police Line, Thane

PRATIBHA 79-159

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

We are more than just Flashlight manufacturers... ...and it was time our name reflected it.

From Electroplating to flashlights...miniature bulbs... dry cells

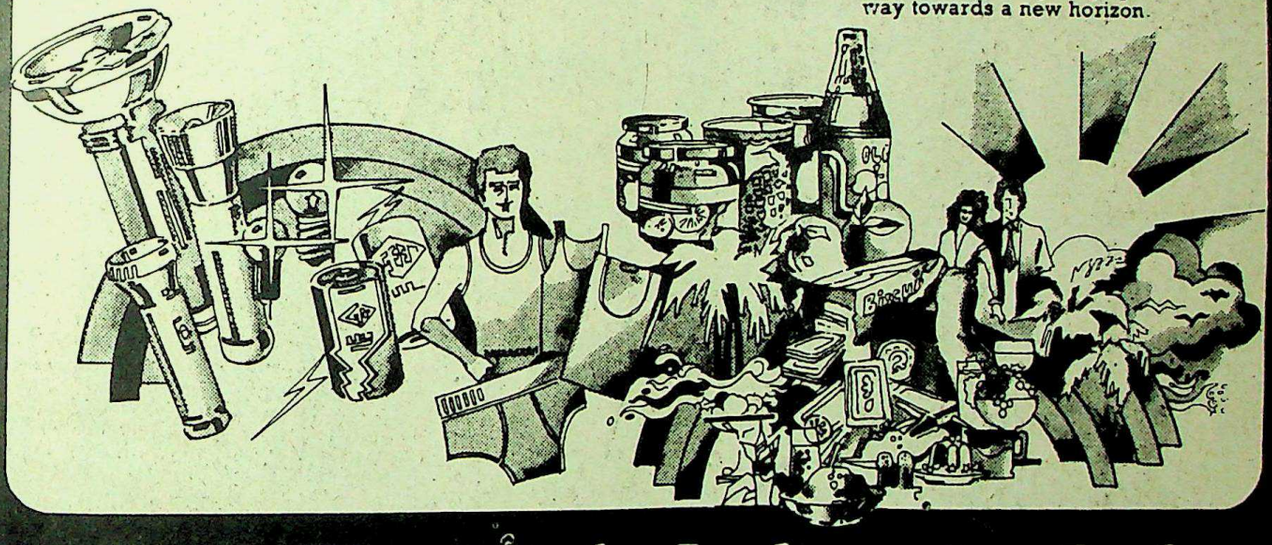
We started off as electroplaters. Then came Flashlights & miniature bulbs and close on their heels came dry cells. And today Geep is the second largest manufacturer of dry cells & flashlights in the country with a range of 18 different types/sizes of flashlights & 5 varieties of cells. And yet our name reflected only flashlights.

Soon hosiery & food products

Soon, Geep will mean even more. Like hosiery—a range of vests and briefs that will bear the stamp of Geep's consumer marketing expertise will come to you through our vast retail network. And in as divergent a line as food products, that will combine economy with excellence of quality.

A new dynamism...a new name

With all this activity, a change in name was really inevitable—a name that reflected the diverse fields of Geep's current activities & future plans—Geep Industrial Syndicate Limited. But beneath this new name will be the same irrepressible quality, the same finesse, the same dynamism—all symbolised by the same brand name that today is a household name—Geep. And thus begins a significant era with a bright, successful past lighting up the way towards a new horizon.



Geep Flashlight Industries Ltd. now becomes

Geep Industrial Syndicate Limited

Regd. Office : 28, South Road, Allahabad GEEP (A Shervani Enterprise)

STERLING/GISL/78

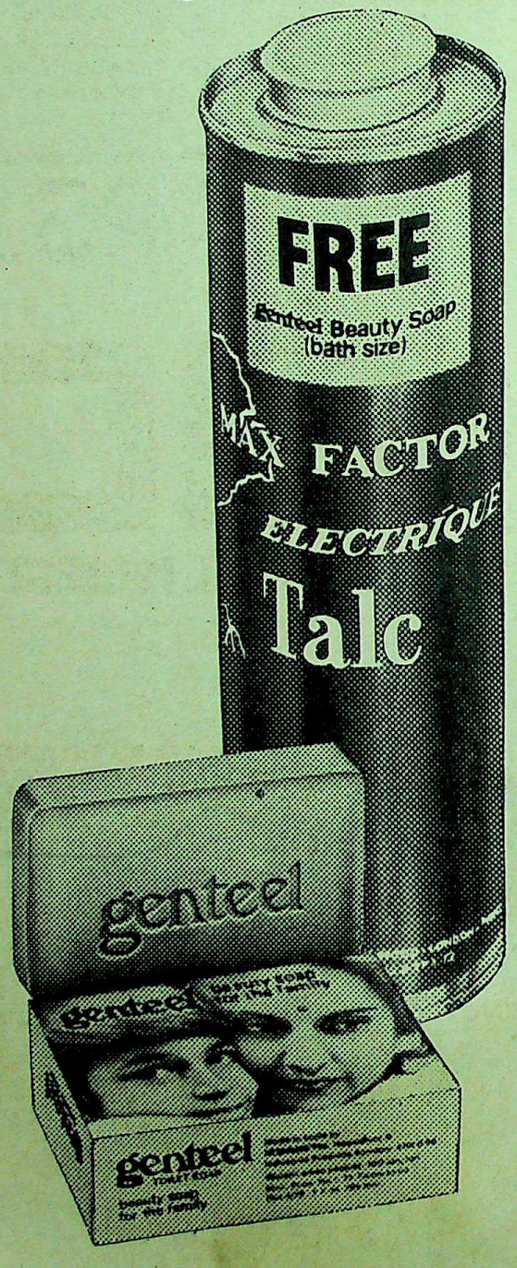
NS-CAS-1/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

FREE
with ELECTRIQUE talc

Regular size
genteel Beauty Soap
with 400 gm.
ELECTRIQUE Talc



Mini
genteel Beauty Soap
with 100 gm.
ELECTRIQUE Talc

Shilpi DM 20/79

From the beautiful world of Max Factor...naturally

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Cosmic brings another Dependable and Sophisticated model for your Stereo System, the Cosmic Co-100 Solid State Amplifier. It synchronises accurately with any low voltage signals to magnify them to the desired degree with low Distortion and can be combined with Stereophonic or Monophonic Systems. The Solid State Circuitry gives instant warm up, and helps keep down heat generation, and consumes less current and has a wider Frequency Response. Additional Phonographic inputs enable Record Players equipped with Magnetic or Ceramic Cartridges to be played with it. Also incorporated are some special features like Balance Control, Loudness Control, Main & Remote Control for Speakers, Microphone input and others. The full complement of Controls helps smooth operation and sound technical perfection. And all this comes to you enclosed in a sleek veneered cabinet that matches superbly with any Stereo System and blends with any decor.

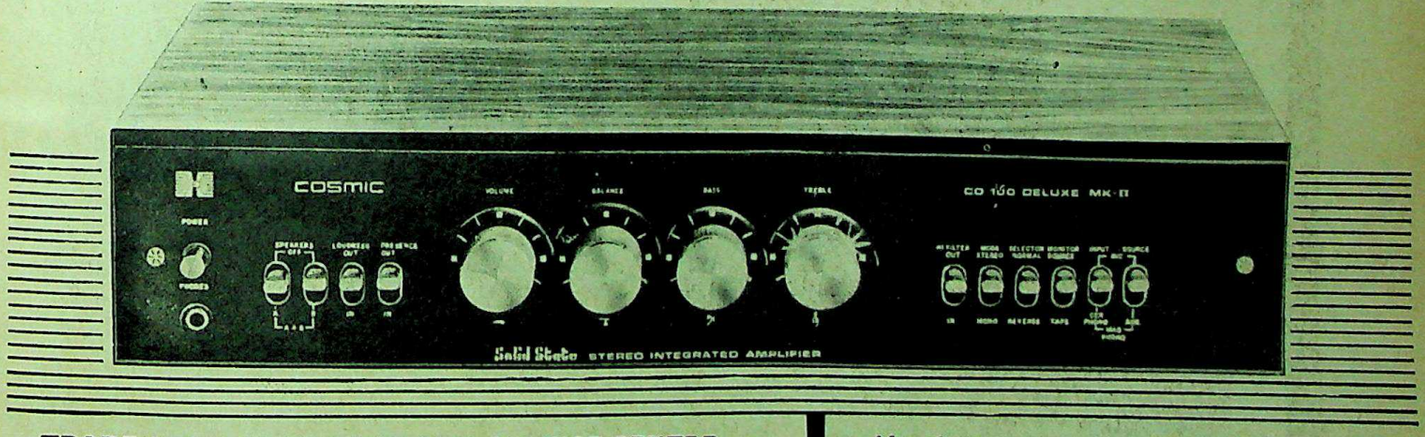
WE REACH YOUR HEART THROUGH YOUR EARS...

COSMIC

CO-100 DELUXE MKII AMPLIFIER



TRADE REPRESENTATIVE AND SERVICE CENTRE

TAMIL NADU :
STEREO SOUND CENTER,
7, Woods Road, Mount Road,
MADRAS-600 002. Phone : 82599

KARNATAKA :
NUSOUND, 42, Narasimharaja Road,
BANGALORE-560 002. Phone : 24048

EASTERN REGION :
DUNICS, 128/18, Hazra Road,
CALCUTTA-700 026 Phone : 481338

NORTH INDIA :
HIMSONS ELECTRONICS,
12, Angoori Bagh Market.
DELHI-110 006. Phone : 269105/278228

MADHYA PRADESH :
MUSIC PALACE, 82, Kothari Market,
M. G. Road, INDORE. Phone : 38857

GUJARAT :
MUMTA TRADERS, Joglekar Building,
Anandpura, BARODA. Phone : 63593

Manufacturers:
COSMIC RADIO
Bombay-400 093. *Tel: 573361/62
*GRAMS: "SOLIDSTATE"

Distributor:
COSTRONICS
P.B. NO. 9402 BOMBAY-400 093.

ADVERTS/CR/10/J8/C

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

DELHI DIARY

INDIA'S KINGS

INDIA KINGS is the most expensive brand of cigarettes manufactured in the country. Lately because of the squeeze on the imports of tobacco, India Kings remains the only cigarette which uses ten per cent of imported tobacco. ITC cut down manufacture of this brand and has more or less stopped its sale within the country. But there are some VVIPs who are prosperous and resourceful enough to smoke the best cigarettes in the world, and because they feel impelled to project their "swadeshi culture", have to settle for the Indian brand which comes nearest to the foreign one. India Kings choose themselves.

ITC has been manufacturing about 5,000 special India Kings packets a year for the Indian President. The cigarette is the same as the ones ordinary mortals get, except for the Ashoka emblem stamp on the packets and a label which says "specially manufactured for the Rashtrapati Bhavan". However, in order to avoid the additional costs involved and also the problems of producing a small number of cigarettes for exclusive consumption, ITC has not been too enthusiastic to earn the honour of making cigarettes for India's Head of State. Incidentally, sometime ago, when the President Mr Sanjeeva Reddy was in Hyderabad he felt like smoking and demanded India Kings. But they were not available. This created panic among the President's minions, who in turn took it out on the ITC. Now it is learnt that ITC will manufacture specially-made-for-Rashtrapati-Bhavan India Kings for Mr Reddy once again.

TROUBLE

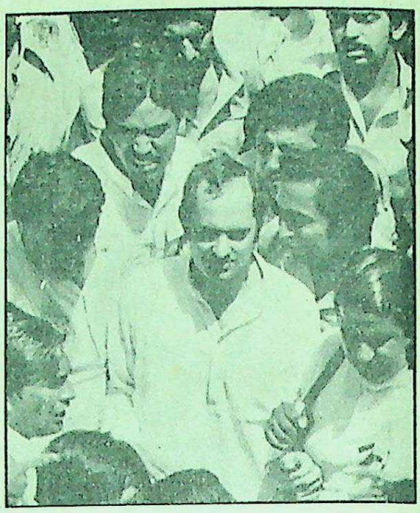
MR SANJAY GANDHI, as usual, is behaving as if he is above all the law courts. And lately his behaviour, which was never anywhere near being gentlemanly, has crossed all limits of accepted codes of good conduct. The way he and his Youth Congress hoodlums stormed the Dehra Dun Court last month and ransacked the august premises is a reminder of the stuff Mrs Gandhi's enfant terrible is made of. The Sanjay marauders tore off the clothes of the CBI counsel and even went for the presiding judge, who managed, in the nick of time, to take shelter in an ante-room. The Sanjaysena was looking for the records of the road-rollers case, but fortunately the court 'munshi' had the sense to save them before the hoodlums could lay their hands on them.

For the same flagrant violation of decorum, any other person would have been summarily imprisoned, but Mrs Gandhi's Sanjay got away. For much lesser crimes —for example for the violation of Section 144 — people have been thrown into jail but Sanjay can go scot-free even with the grossest desecration of the judiciary, without so much as a warning.

MORE TROUBLE

FOLLOWING his brave and heroic act in the Dehra Dun Court, Mr Gandhi, on his way back to Delhi, knocked down a villager somewhere in Meerut district. The victim's arms and legs were broken. Sanjay after one look at the man, who was bleeding profusely, flung two ten-rupee notes at him without getting out of his car. In the meantime, a passerby pleaded with Mr Gandhi to at least drive the victim to hospital. But Sanjay couldn't care less, flung another tenner and drove his blue Matador away. The poor victim who came under Mr Gandhi's wheels, lay helplessly on the road for over four hours before the police arrived on the spot to take him to the hospital. The X-rays reveal that the victim sustained multiple fractures all over his body that would take months to heal.

Incidentally the national Press, specially the chain that sees nothing wrong in corruption amongst politicians, just did not give a dime for these two stories. One para was written about the accident, and a couple on the court-ransack story.



TROUBLE AGAIN

ON AUGUST 8, listeners of the Gorakhpur Station of All India Radio were rudely jolted when, in the midst of a programme, they heard raucous slogans of "Indira Gandhi zindabad", "Sanjay Gandhi zindabad" and "Desh ki neta Indira Gandhi". The slogans came on the air while a programme for farmers, "Gram Jagat", was being broadcast. Who shouted the slogans? Who else but Brij Narain Sharma and Umesh Tiwary, two of Mr Gandhi's proteges, who had barged their way into the small AIR studio, taking everybody by surprise.

The authorities have kept the incident a secret and the Press, of course, is not concerned. The thought of Sanj and his pet "durbaris" forcing their way into a prohibited area should alarm anyone entrusted with the security of the country.

TRADITION DIES

TWO cases of choice varieties of imported liquor' and 'Indian made foreign liquor were seen being carted out of Shastri Bhavan on the September 17 afternoon. Apparently these were stocks kept in bond in the PIB for being served to foreign correspondents whenever the principal information officer met them. This was an old practice, but was stopped when the Janata came to power. So these bottles of whisky, gin, brandy, etc., were gathering dust in a PIB room. They were being sent back to the Excise Department, since the PIB had no further use for them.

D. E. NIZAMUDDIN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

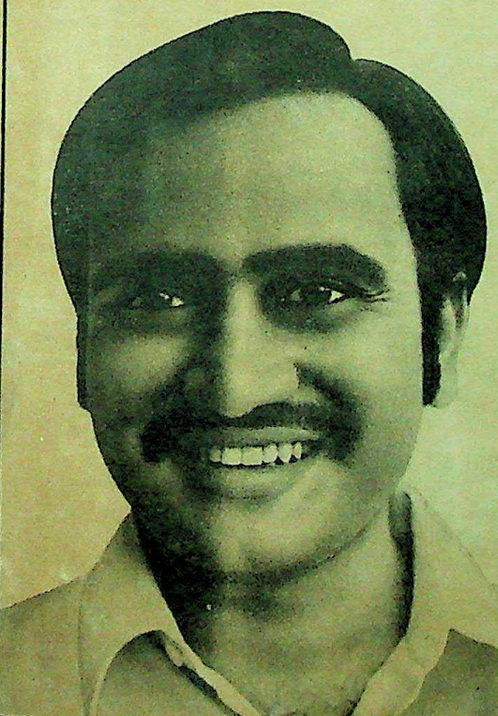
FREE expensive gifts with Leonard

While stocks last. Offer limited to Western, Eastern and South India

Contact your nearest dealer. Eastern U.P. only

Leonard preserves butter in Bangkok

Leonard keeps chicken fresh in Chikmagalur



Leonard keeps Prashant smiling in Pathankot

Leonard serves millions of families around the world. Its dependable compressor and new ingenious defrost system guarantee you long, trouble-free service.

When Leonard owners are asked about their refrigerators, they just smile. After all what more need we say about a friend of the family.

Leonard

Since 1881. Trusted the world over.

Another quality product from BLUE STAR®

Leaders in refrigeration

Bombay • New Delhi • Calcutta • Madras • Ahmedabad • Pune • Kanpur • Indore • Chandigarh • Jamshedpur • Bangalore • Cochin • Secunderabad • Visakhapatnam.

BSLDES/85/83A/71

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Regd No WB|CC|256. TN|MS-(C)|376
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

THE SPECIAL AGENT

WADRENE
POLYESTER SUITINGS

BOMBAY DYEING

ULKA-BDM-40

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNDAY

A HOPE IS DEAD

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Sista's-MS-185/79

The good taste of Mangharam wafers. You can hear it loud and clear.

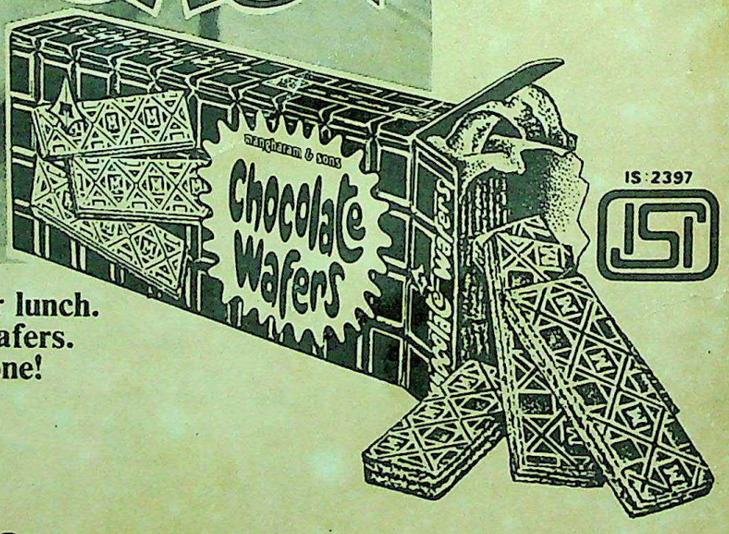
CRUNCH!



IS:2397

Munch two for breakfast. Crunch two for lunch.
Nightcap with two more. Mangharam Wafers.
The taste is so good you can't stop with one!

In eight yummy flavours —
★ Pineapple ★ Raspberry ★ Mango ★ Lemon
★ Coffee ★ Chocolate ★ Orange ★ Honey

mangharam & sons
Bangalore

Makers of the finest biscuits, wafers & cookies

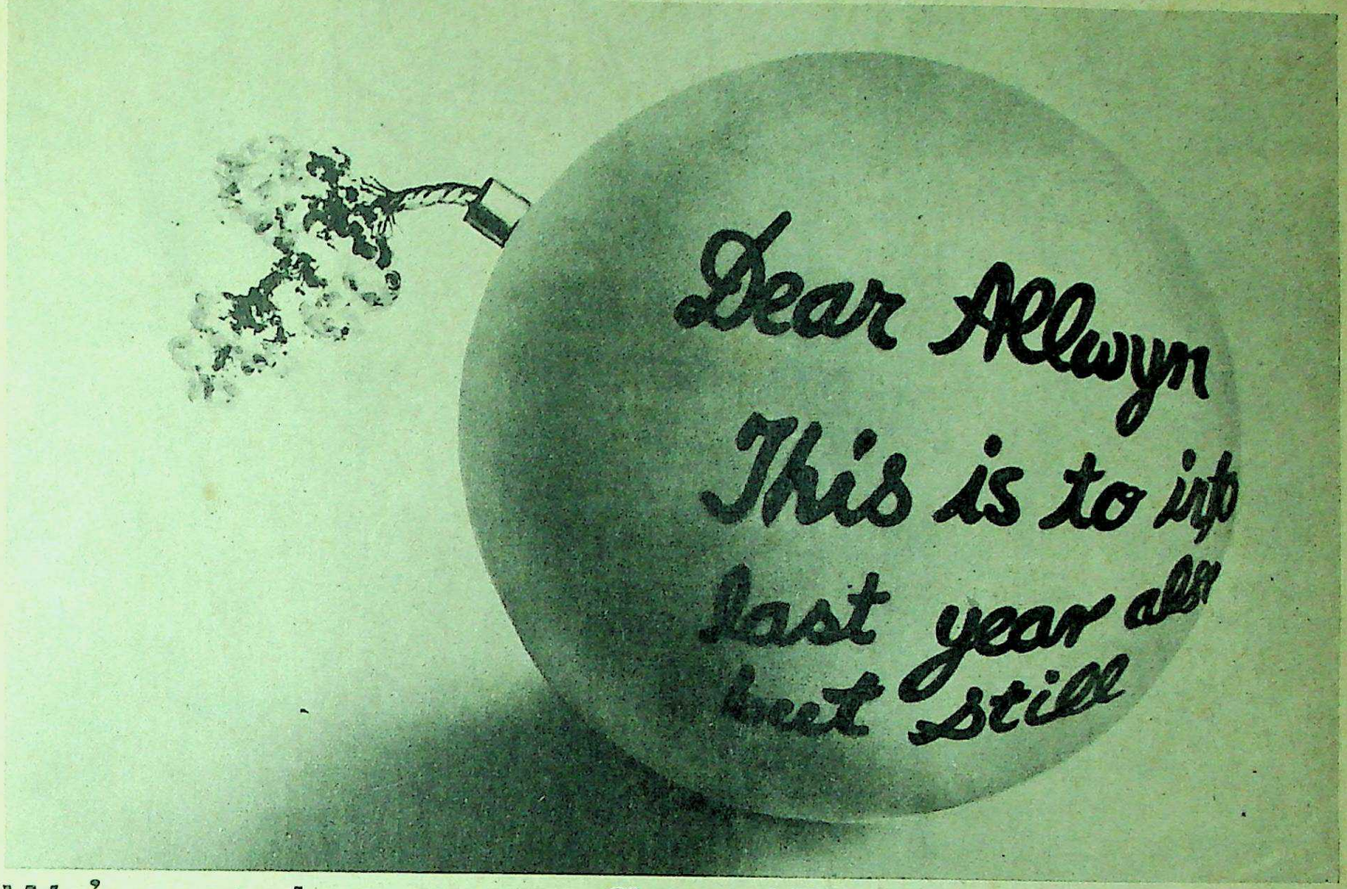
Mangharam wafers. The taste that sounds good.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Sista's-MS-185/79

In the past, we got a few letter-bombs from a handful of our customers.



We've cooled all that fire with our technical knock-out. The 'high-impact' polystyrene liner.

The 'high-impact' polystyrene liner. Now, that's a sound way of sealing the temperature inside the fridge. Because it doesn't chip. Doesn't rust. Doesn't discolour. And doesn't smell.

Well, we'd really like to thank all people who wrote letters to us. You see, it's helped make the Allwyn better.

A whisper-smooth compressor

To be really frank, some of our older models started developing a few snags. Some people told us their fridge was too noisy. So we developed a super-compressor that runs whisper-smooth. On 30% less power.

Auto-defrost with outside drainage tray

Other people said that water from the freezer dripped inside the fridge. Today's Allwyns have Auto-defrost, with a self-draining system. Something you should insist on when buying any fridge.

The defrosted water drains to a special outside drainage tray. No dripping. No mess inside the fridge

The Roll-Bond freezer

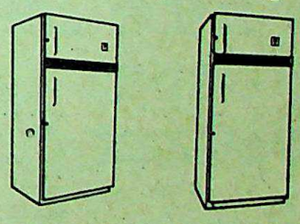
Today's Allwyn has the Roll-Bond freezer where the cooling tubes are integrated into the walls itself. So you get first rate cooling and quick freezing. Which means increased operating efficiency of the compressor. In fact only Allwyn offers you the Roll-Bond freezer in India.

Of course most of the improvements are a result of continuous research and development. But we do give a great deal of attention to customer feedback.

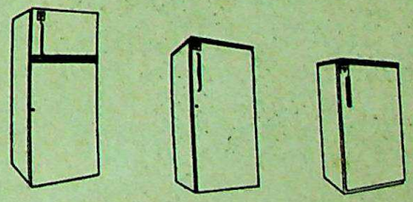
That's how you got the second door in the Allwyn 300. India's only 2-in-1.

And today, Allwyn offers you the widest range to choose from. The fact is, Allwyn was the first Indian refrigerator to come on the market. To a lot of people it's still Number One.

The Allwyn Range



Allwyn 380. Allwyn 300.



Allwyn 298. Allwyn 165. Allwyn 85.

Take a look at today's Allwyn.

HALLWYN

Better living starts with Allwyn

THE HYDERABAD ALLWYN METAL WORKS LIMITED

HA/106A/79 3

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Your dream of living in your own nice little house will come true... If you act now.

"Celebrate a wedding, construct a house. You will know what you are in for" This is an old saying—to emphasise and remind you that you will have to meet these big expenditures sooner or later-warning you to be prepared.

Syndicate Bank makes these big expenditures sit lightly on your shoulders. The easy way, without any strain. All that you have to do is to commit yourself to a definite, time-bound saving plan at Syndicate Bank. We have several schemes to help you meet your needs.

Act now, today, for a better tomorrow. Call at the nearest branch of Syndicate Bank. We are waiting for you. Rest assured we will take care of your money problems now or in the near and distant future.

OUR SPECIAL SCHEMES

SWAGRIHA YOJANA

Deposit Rs. 100 every month for 63 months. You can get a loan of Rs. 16,000. Invest more for higher sums.

AROGYA CUMULATIVE DEPOSIT

This is a regular Cumulative Deposit and you can get a loan equal to twice the amount standing to your credit for meeting the medical bill at the time of illness. Maximum loan Rs.5000 at concessional rate of interest.

SURAKSHA DEPOSIT

A deposit of Rs.500 only for 61 months gives you interest plus Personal Accident Insurance Cover.

maa SB 102

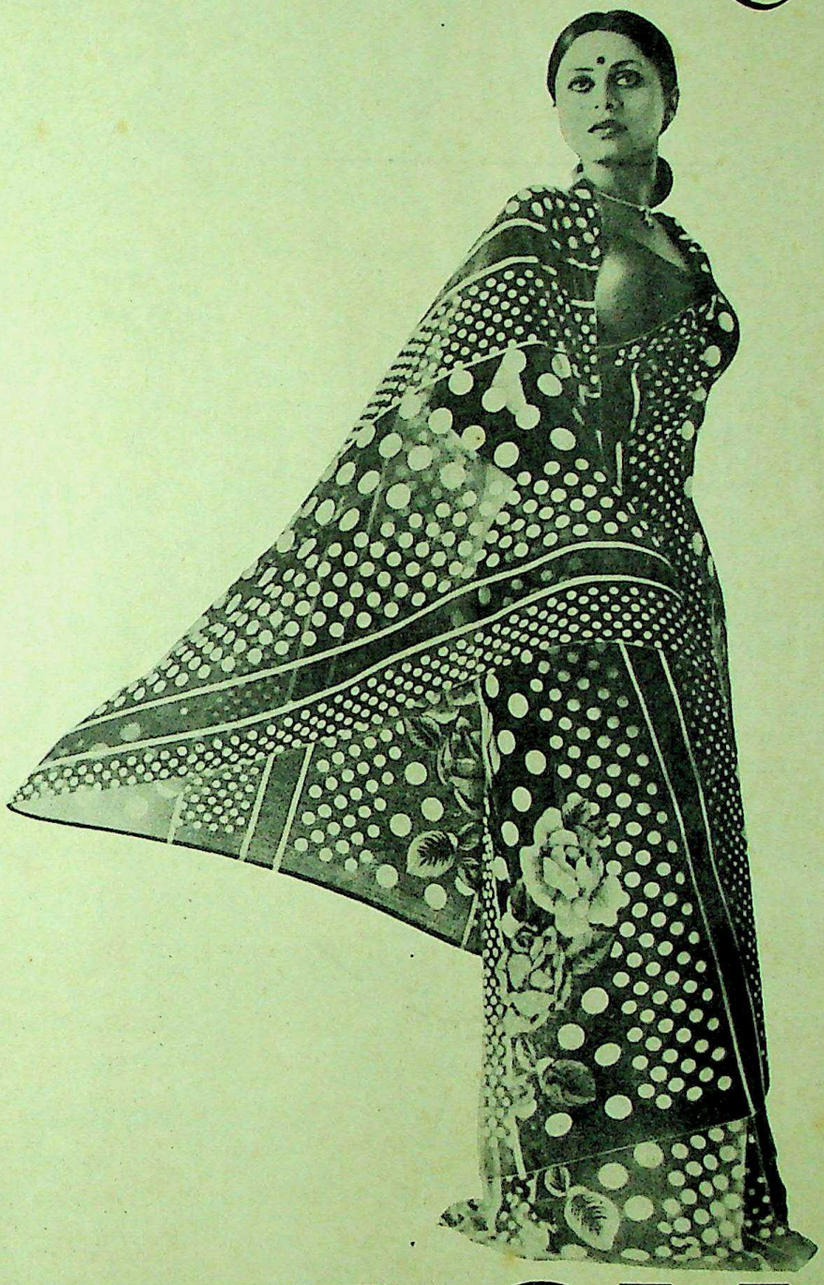
SYNDICATE BANK

Where your welfare and happiness is our concern

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

THE EYE-CATCHERS



HINDON

SUITINGS, SHIRTINGS, DRESS MATERIALS, SAREES.

HINDON RIVER MILLS

Fabrics from the Most Modern Mill

DCM TEXTILES

There are more than 600 Retail Showrooms throughout the country— one close to you.

asian HRM/3

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Freshness you can feel Proof you can see

Sprinkle charcoal powder on water. Pour a drop of Binaca Top solution in the centre. See how fast Binaca Top spreads in all directions, clears the dirt and leaves a pure, clear surface behind.

This is exactly how Binaca Top's special dispersing agent spreads to every corner of your mouth—clears out tooth decaying bacteria and prevents bad breath.

CIBA-GEIGY

BINACA TOP

FOR TOTAL MOUTH PROTECTION

ARMS/CBT-1-78

Offer valid till 31st December, 1979.

GIVE SOMEONE YOU LOVE A YEAR OF SPAN

People who love reading
love reading SPAN

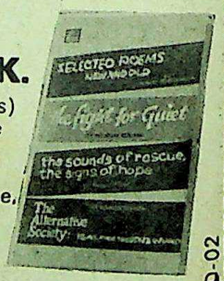
MAPP 1125

Mail with remittance of Rs 21 to SPAN Magazine Subscription Service. Post Box 213, New Delhi 110 001.

Festival Gift Offer

FOUR-IN-ONE BOOK.

Give SPAN at Rs 21/- (for 12 issues) to someone you love and get a unique Four-In-One bestseller free. It contains: 1) Selected Poems—Warren, 2) The Fight For Quiet—Berland, 3) The Sounds Of Rescue, The Signs Of Hope—Flynn, and 4) The Alternative Society—Rexroth.



SD-02

Please send SPAN as my gift to:

Name (Mr./Mrs./Miss) _____

Address _____

_____

State _____ PIN CODE _____

I enclose Postal Order ☐ Bank Draft ☐ Money Order Receipt ☐

Date _____ Signature _____

SPAN AN AMERICAN MAGAZINE FOR INDIA.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Murphy 5503. The all-new 3-band radio cassette recorder with crystal clarity. The Murphy 5503 is encased in a tough plastic cabinet. It costs about the same as any other 2-in-1, but with Murphy sound.

It can switch off automatically.
A sleep switch that switches off in the amount of time it is adjusted for. So you can fall asleep listening to your radio. You don't have to stay awake to switch it off.

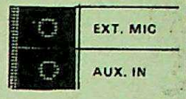
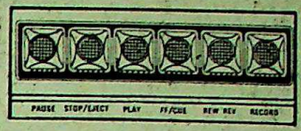
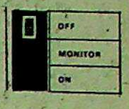
It can record off the radio or a live performance.
There are facilities for internal and external recording The built-in microphone can be conveniently used for voice and sound recordings. The microphone is sensitive enough to pick up sound even from a distance of 10 metres. There's a plug for an external microphone that can be used to reinforce the strength of the recording.



It can tape a telephone conversation.
You can record a whole telephone conversation by using a pick-up coil!





Finally, the 5503 can also be used with an external loudspeaker.

Listen to the 5503 through its built-in loudspeaker or through an external loudspeaker: the choice is yours.

The best buy at the price. On mains or batteries, you'll thrill to the richness, tone, texture of its truly professional sound.

murphy

You'll love the Sound.

Only from Murphy

The great new 2-in-1: Murphy 5503.

SIMOES/MU/7A/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The 7 a.m. Experience.

Shave with the extra-thick, rich foam only Williams Shaving Cream* can give. Do it lazily, pleasurably. Indulge yourself.

Then splash on a cold, thrilling palmful of Aqua Velva aftershave—that clean, sophisticated and boldly masculine fragrance.

Ahhh...

Aqua Velva & Williams Shaving Cream.

For the sheer, manly pleasure of shaving...

*Available in luxurious Lanolin Regular. And super-cool Menthol Lanolin.

LDS-1572

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

FREE
with ELECTRIQUE talc

Regular size
genteel Beauty Soap
with 400 gm.
ELECTRIQUE Talc

Mini
genteel Beauty Soap
with 100 gm.
ELECTRIQUE Talc

From the beautiful world of Max Factor...naturally

Shilpi DM 20/79

LDS-1572

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

At the end of the winning game...

Thirsty minds drink alike!

RADEUS/PE/L-16

is veri veri lime'n' lemoni

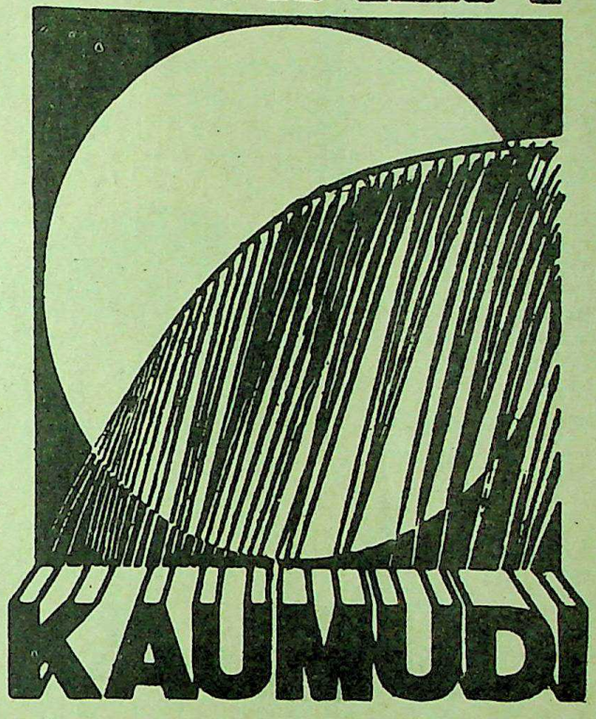
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

For millions in Kerala the day begins...

the morning tea the morning bath and Kerala Kaumudi

KERALA



...now with a new monogram.

"Kaumudi" means moonlight in Malayalam. The Kerala Kaumudi has been a rising moon over the Kerala sky for nearly 40 years now...throwing light on happenings in Kerala and the rest of the world. And now, the Kerala Kaumudi has a new meaningful monogram that depicts what a great newspaper should always be doing—filtering of news. Yes, the Kerala Kaumudi believes in filtering the news for newsworthiness and presenting you the grain sifted from the chaff.

The Kerala Kaumudi. Its objective analysis, unbiased editorial stance and search for truth put it in a class by itself.

And now, things are happening at the Kerala Kaumudi. It is going through another phase of modernisation and expansion. Ultra-modern printing machinery and equipment will be installed. Photo composing, web offset, and other latest techniques will change the appearance and readability of this popular paper. It will soon have facsimile printing facilities to bring out a new edition from Calicut.

Get to know the Kerala Kaumudi—the informative one! You will then know what is happening in Kerala and the rest of the world.

KERALA KAUMUDI

Kerala Kaumudi

The leading Malayalam daily published from the capital of Kerala

B.P. No. 77, Pettah, Trivandrum-695 024. Telephone: 62020

RADEUS/PE/L-16

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Give your children love and affection and CORPORATION BANK'S VIDYA YOJANA DEPOSIT

The highest form of wealth and riches is education—the most important tool for the progress of man in today's civilised society.

The twin needs of your child are health and education—which is the theme of the International Year of the Child 1979.

Corporation Bank's Vidya Yojana Deposit is exactly what your children need today. An ideal scheme to help your children prosecute higher studies.

Meet the Manager of the nearest branch of Corporation Bank—today.

—Where friendliness is a tradition

Corporation Bank Limited

ESTD. 1906

Regd. Office: Udupi

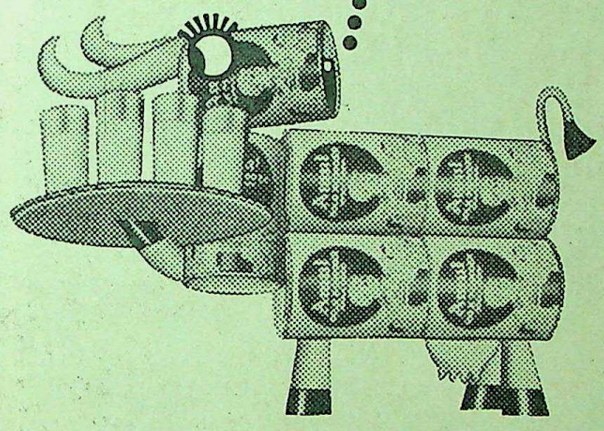
Administrative Office: Mangalore.
Chairman: N.N. Pai

maa CBL 82

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

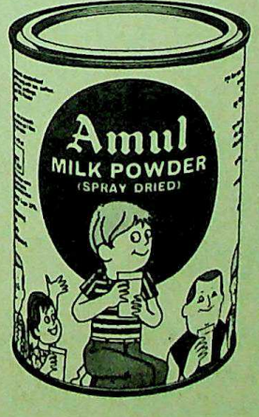
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Here's Amul Milk for your family



Put 2½ heaped tablespoons of Amul Milk Powder into a ¼-litre tumbler. Stir into a smooth paste with a little warm water. Add hot water up to top and stir. Milk is now ready for drinking. Good for use in tea and coffee, and for making curds and desserts. Makes you thankful for its convenience. Guaranteed pure.

Amul
MILK POWDER
It's like having a dairy in your home



Marketed by:
Gujarat Co-operative Milk Marketing Federation Ltd., Anand.

Y.G. FILE

Y.G. FILE is No Mystery document - No Mahamantra-No Hocuspocus - No Abracadabra

Y.G. FILE is just an assemblage of the most assiduously sifted problems in Physics. 250 of them seemingly impossible, but will crack open if you hammer at them deftly enough.

Y.G. FILE is a collection of 250 intricate innovative problems in Physics, appended to our Postal Tuition papers for the IIT Entrance Exam '80. 250 problems solving which you will feel you deserve the "All India Number One" crown.

Y.G. FILE is for Young Genius

Y.G. FILE is an integral part of

BRILLIANT'S POSTAL TUITION (in all subjects) for IIT Entrance '80

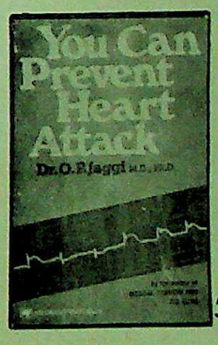
BRILLIANT TUTORIALS
12, Masilamani Mudali St, T.Nagar,
Madras-600 017. Phone: 442099

5 MONTH POSTAL COURSE FROM Oct
ENROLMENT NOW ON

You Can Prevent Heart Attack

DR. O. P. JAGGI
M.D., Ph.D., FCCP

An eminent physician discusses the why, when and how of, an heart attack, spells out practical and preventive do's & don'ts to keep your heart in mint condition.



5/-

By the same author
MENTAL TENSION AND ITS CURE Rs. 5/-

"It is a little pocket Bible on stress and strain. It tells us what not to do without hurting our ego .....a product of specialist's professional experience, wisdom, research and conclusion".
—NATIONAL HERALD

Available at all Bookshops & by V.P.P.
Write for a FREE copy of Orient Literary Review

ORIENT PAPERBACKS
Madarsa Rd., Kashmere Gate, Delhi-6

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

VOA, BBC, Radio Sri Lanka, Radio Moscow, Radio Deutsche Welle, Radio Australia, Vividh Bharati

All at your fingertips. Plus a sturdy 2-speed record player.

swinger

TRANSMAINS RADIOGRAM

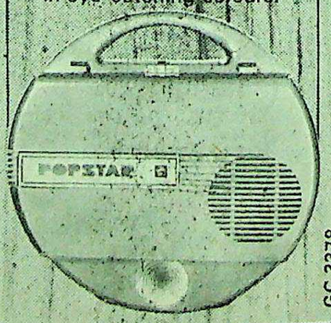
The Swinger Transmains is probably the kind of radiogram you've been looking for. Something compact, portable and stylish!

A 3-band radio – MW, 25 and 31 metre bandspreads – puts your favourite stations at your fingertips. No overlapping. Crystal clear reception. The player offers you a choice of 33 and 45 rpm's and now has an integrated steel deck ensuring minimum wear and tear of internal parts. Take a look at the Swinger Transmains – you'll find it smashing inside out. Rs 597.*

The largest range of quality sound equipment – Fiesta, Popular, Calypso and Popstar record players; Safari and Swinger radiograms; Tenor cassette recorder and Consort II radio cassette recorder.

HMV POPSTAR Rs 508*

The Popstar Transmains is the 2-speed record player without the radio. Portable, light and it comes in eye-catching colours.



GC 3378

*Max. rec. retail price incl. excise. Taxes extra.

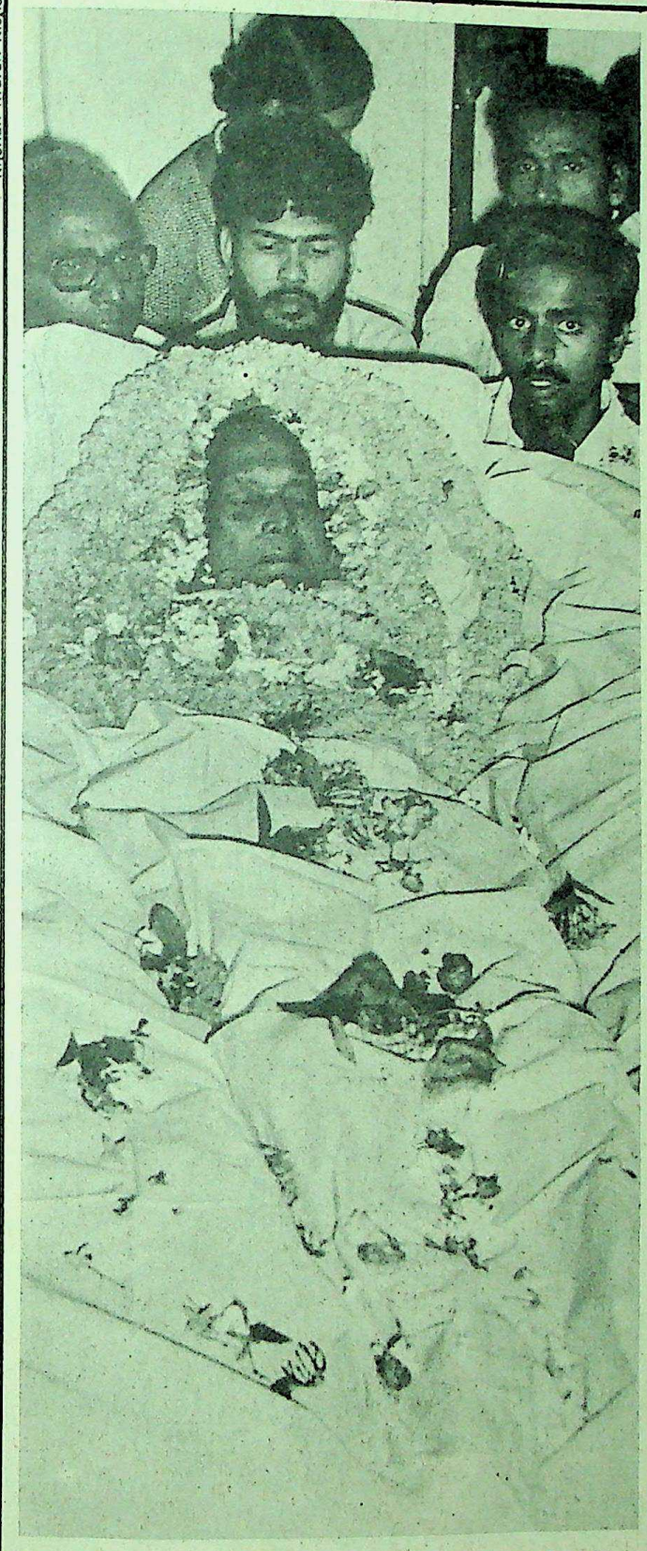
His Master's Voice HMV

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNDAY VOLUME 7
ISSUE 19
RUPEE ONE
AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

October 14, 1979



Krishan Murari Kishan

As we were going to press for our issue dated October 14, we learnt of the passing away of one of India's greatest figures: Loknayak Jayaprakash Narayan, a leader who by his work had already secured his place in our history, but during the last decade indisputably put himself among the handful of truly great sons that our nation has produced. We decided to change the contents of this issue, and bring out a special number in a small homage to a selfless genius.

COMMENT

Opinion 13

COVER STORY

The last goodbye|Photographs by Raghu Rai and Krishna Murari Kishan 20

Loknayak Jayaprakash Zindabad!|M. J. Akbar 26

Chandrashekhar's homage|M. J. Akbar 28

Politics over JP's body|Udayan Sharma 29

The last days|Santosh Bhartiya 30

The last hours|S. P. Sagar 31

The man I loved|Chandrashekhar 32

Last of the founding fathers|Madhu Limaye 34

JP the revolutionary|Bhola Chatterjee 38

JP the politician|Ranajit Roy 44

JP's nearest and dearest|Arun Ranjan 48

Morarji: "Nothing came out of JP's movement"|Santosh Bhartiya 55

JP and Marxists|Tarun Ganguly 57

Mrs Gandhi snubbed JP 58

How the people felt|SUNDAY correspondents 61

A sad Sitabdiara|Saumitra Banerjee 60

Extracts from 'Prison Diary' 90

Cover transparencies by Krishna Murari Kishan and Bipul Guha

Editor M. J. Akbar

Assistant Editor Subir Roy Editorial Staff Nirmal Mitra, David McMahon, Saumitra Banerjee, Tirthankar Ghosh, S. N. M. Abdi
Delhi Correspondent Ajoy Bose
Art Director Bipul Guha Asst Art Director Amiya Bhattacharya

Published from 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001 and printed at Ananda Offset Private Ltd., P-248, C.I.T. Scheme No. VI-M Calcutta 700054 by Bappaditya Roy for Ananda Bazar Patrika Limited.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust. Delhi and eGangotri

Thackersey bridges the generation gap

Fashion fabrics, family fabrics. Worn, used and proudly displayed Thackersey Fabrics. Designs, textures and colours unlimited in voiles, linos, cambrics, poplins, two x two, dhotis, jacquards, furnishing, CRONOLIZED (pre-shrunk) and TEBILIZED (for tested crease resistance) cottons. And polyester blended suitings, shirtings, dress materials and sarees.

since 1873 TF HINDOOSTAN SPG. & WVG. MILLS LTD.

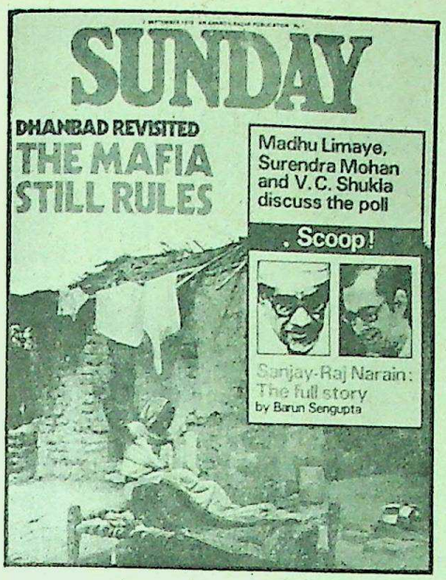
symbol of a rich textile tradition

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



An eye-opener

TIRTHANKAR GHOSH's article "Dhanbad revisited: The Mafia still rules" (September 2) was bold and persuasive. It has opened our eyes since he has acquainted us with the nasty goings-on behind the curtain. A moral emerges: Our trade union leaders and politicians organise strikes for their personal aims and gains. When there is violence it is the innocent labourer who is often killed. Indirectly, the leader is responsible for the poor worker's death. Hence, the leader is a murderer.
Jagannath Oleti, Bhubaneswar.

MR GHOSH's article clearly indicates the stage we have reached when there is no respect for the law or its keepers. A strong man can take the law into his own hands and dominate a certain area at his own will and pleasure. Even top officials cannot set him right because he has a cosy relationship with the politicians. If this process continues the day is not far off when everybody will be afraid to walk on the street in broad daylight.
Bhupendra, Jamshedpur.

'THE mafia still rules' amply demonstrates Mr Ghosh's hollowness of mind and lack of proper understanding. He seems to have a special fascination for Mr Karpoori Thakur and justifies all the misdeeds perpetrated by a prejudiced and biased mind, against a section of the people whom he calls a mafia. A man's failure cannot be justified by blaming others. There is nothing wrong for an MLA to follow the leader of his choice and nothing unprecedented about a common man being wealthy. Even Mr Karpoori Thakur, the ideal hero of the author, can be cited as an example. Being a poor barber's son he managed to come to the top of the State's affairs and even went a step forward in directing the State's policy in such a way that it not only demoralised the administration but also caused the death of innocent people.
Prahlad Singh, Jamshedpur.

THE article on the mafia was superb. In fact, the mafia controls the Press too. Two English and one Hindi daily published from Patna have a large circulation but they don't dare to print even a single line on the atrocities committed by the mafia. Now that the ball has been set rolling they should come forward and start a campaign against it.
Asit Kumar, Dhanbad.

THE cover story on the mafia in Dhanbad pointed out the comfortable relationship between the public sector organisation, Bharat Coking Coal Ltd, and the mafia. That a trade union leader is more powerful than the officers of the administration is only possible due to political interference. Dhanbad displays yet another instance of law and order falling a prey to politics and corruption.
Maharaj K. Koul, Srinagar.

AFTER going through the issue dated September 2, one is tempted to re-christen the issue 'Violent SUNDAY'. I presume that you have developed a sudden taste for violence. You are deviating from our Gandhian policies.
Arup Roy Choudhury, Calcutta.

Mis-read

PERHAPS because of an error in reading the proofs a statement has been attributed to me, "Marcuse may be heard yet" (September 2), which makes me appear silly and ill-informed. I did not write that Marcuse had proclaimed the establishment of a socialist republic in Bavaria in 1918 after the defeat of Kaiser Germany in the First World War. I only wrote that when Marcuse was young, a socialist republic had been proclaimed in Bavaria.
Rajendra Mathur, Indore.

YOUR tribute to the great philosopher, Herbert Marcuse, was timely. His death went almost unnoticed in our country. However, it should have been a little more profound. Marcuse was a Marxist but never an uncritical one. It is said that a member of the Conservative League of his university pinned a button with the legend 'To Hell with Communism' on his coat. When he entered his class he explained to the shocked students that he had not resisted the pinning of the button because he agreed with the sentiment it expressed. He said he would rather go to hell with Communism than stay in the US without it. His admiration for Communism, however, was not for the corrupt version practised in Russia and his Soviet Marxism is an "immanent critique" of the Soviet version of Communism. His greatest contribution to social theory, in my opinion, is his expose of the totalitarian nature of the societies of the so-called free world.

Lastly, a word about Mr Mathur's "flippant thought". I want to disabuse him of the belief that Marx was a Jew crying for Israel only to find it in the proletariat. Marx was not born a Jew but a Christian. Much of Marx's system was anticipated in the works of Hegel, Feurbach and even Ricardo. Were they all Jews? The Bolshevik revolution succeeded because it went against the course prescribed by Marx. The Mensheviks who interpreted Marxism literally wanted to wait till a bourgeois state was developed to the full. Lenin revised Marxism and brought it up to date to suit himself. If Mr Mathur still thinks that Bolshevism was a Jewish idea, I recommend E. H. Carr's volumes on the Bolshevik revolution. Marcuse's thought is in no way influenced by his Jewish pedigree.
G. N. Phani Kumar, Cuttack.

No collusion

THE report entitled "The Old Lady and the Law" (September 2, 1979) is obviously a one-sided story. It is unfortunate that you have thought it fit to publish the same without checking up with us.

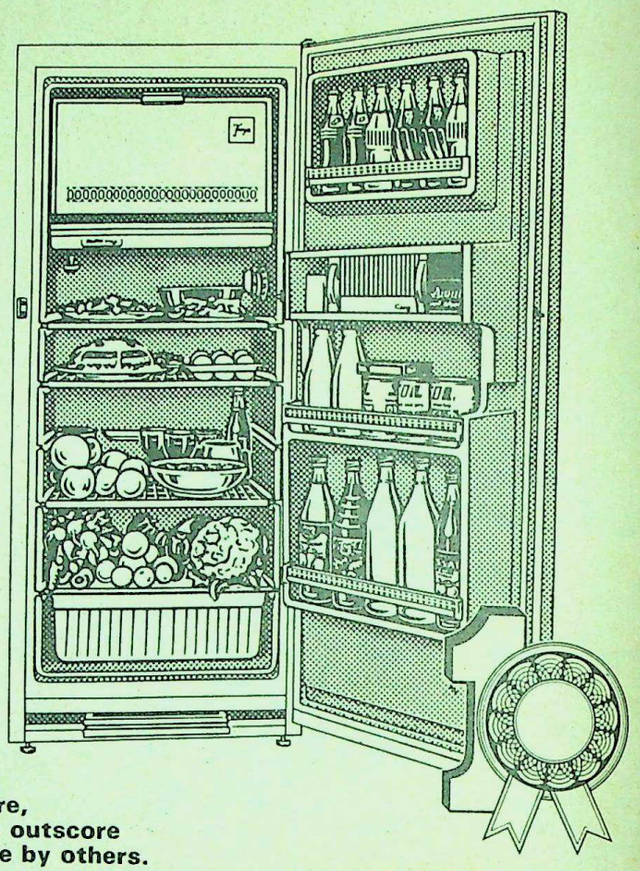
In the report you have referred to "some shocking facts about the attitude of the top brass of Bennett Coleman and Company, publishers of The Times of India, have been brought to light." This is an obvious reference to the alleged collusion between the management and the workers' union for the strike. We do, hereby, categorically deny that there was any collusion on our part with the striking union.

The company had put up various notices for stopping the strike and had pointed out that the strike was illegal. The company did not initially choose to go to court for declaring the strike as illegal and compelling the workers to come back to work since it is well known that the employees, in such circumstances, do not come back to work. Even if the complaint had been made, it is very doubtful that it would have resulted in anything useful. The strike was in the key sections like Rotary,

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

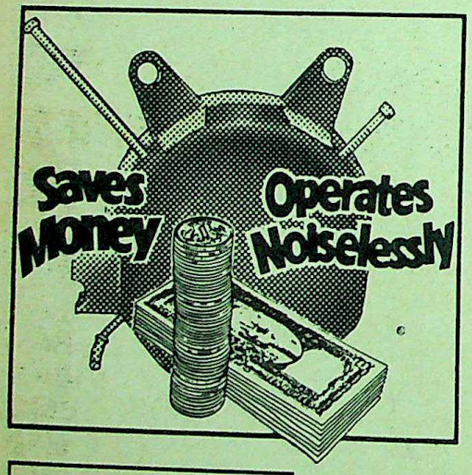
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Excellence is the ability to perform well in all conditions.



Gem refrigerators perform best even under the most hostile conditions.

That's because they incorporate the world's most advanced and perfected Compressor that has the lowest heart failure rate in the world.



Food waste is a national loss.
Preserve it.

Feature for feature, Gem refrigerators outscore refrigerators made by others.

Tests prove that Gem refrigerators have the lowest cabinet temperatures, even under adverse outside temperature conditions. Some brands of refrigerators do not provide even the minimum temperatures essential to preserve perishables at test conditions of 43°C – a temperature so common in our country.

Gem's highly advanced Polarsphere Compressor technology cools better and faster too ! At 27% lower power consumption. Withstanding a wider range of voltage fluctuations than others.

The practical design of the Gem crisper retains 90% moisture vs 40% by some others, even in the coldest of inside temperatures. This keeps vegetables and fruits garden fresh longer in a Gem.

Gem gives you 33% more freezer chest storage capacity, constantly lower freezer temperatures and 21% more ice – faster !

Gem refrigerators have all other features you expect in a first rate refrigerator:

A single piece high impact polystyrene liner without ugly metal joints or openings through which water can leak into the walls and corrode them. No question of food contamination too.

Low conductivity, fibre glass wool insulation to prevent moisture from condensing on the exterior surface.

Tough quality control standards to ensure technical excellence and fewer service calls.

A range of 5 sizes. Plus 3 sizes of Deep Freezers.

A five year warranty for the hermetically sealed-in system and one year for the entire refrigerator.

Prompt after-sales-service should you ever need it.

See a Gem at your nearest dealer. Today.

GENERAL EQUIPMENT MERCHANTS LIMITED

Regd. & Head Office : 2/90, Connaught Circus, New Delhi-110 001. Ph : 343008, 343038, 344713.

Delhi, Bombay, Calcutta, Madras, Bhopal, Ahmedabad, Bangalore, Chandigarh, Cuttack, Dhanbad, Cochin, Jaipur, Lucknow and Bokaro Steel City.

GEM®

REFRIGERATORS — forever yours !

Mutual-2209 B

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Stereo, Binding, Process and other departments and production could not be carried out and therefore, the company proposed to declare the lockout. The Industrial Court held that the lockout notice was legal and the strike was illegal and the High Court did not interfere with this part of the judgement.

The company had filed an appeal against the order of Justice Pendse but in view of the settlement effected in the meantime, the company withdrew the said appeal. All that had happened in the company's offices was the result of inter-union rivalry. You know that it is usual for rival unions to allege complicity on the part of the company with the other union. In fact prior to the commencement of the strike, although there were certain negotiations with Mr Kolhatkar's union on interim relief, no agreement could be reached with them as the company wanted that whatever the agreement, it should be placed before the Palekar Tribunal.

It is unfortunate that notwithstanding the company's keenness to stay aloof, the rival unions have alleged complicity on the part of the company with the other union. As regards the High Court's observations, we have only to say that the court came to the conclusion "that the allegation of collusion was not without foundation" on the ground that the company had not filed a complaint against the striking workmen in the Labour Court, without appreciating that such a step would not have resulted in a solution to the problem. If the appeal was proceeded with before the Division Bench, our position would have been properly vindicated.

Ram S. Tarneja, Bennett Coleman & Co. Ltd., Bombay.

Wrong call

SOME reports have appeared in the Press in recent months about the TV receiver project in which my family is financially interested. One of them appeared in your magazine ("Amritraj family in big business" by P. Devarajan, August 19). Normally I would have ignored such reports. In fact, anyone who reads them would know for certain that they are inspired reports. If I have to say anything about our project, I will do so at the appropriate time. Unfortunately these reports contain many incorrect statements, factual errors, halftruths and untruths.

For instance, the following: "Everything about the project seems to be wrong. To start with, the unit styled Orient Vision does not have a valid industrial licence..." Wherever Mr Devarajan got his information from, it is wrong. We not only have a valid industrial licence but also all other licences required for our project. Another incorrect statement made is that Mr K. V. Srinivasan is thinking of withdrawing from the project. Instead of leaving the project he continues to be the deputy chairman of the company.

What I cannot countenance is the correspondent making factually incorrect and damaging statements about my family. I quote: "It is contended that even if the banks pull out, the Amritrajs can foot the whole bill as the total assets of the Amritraj family are placed at well above three crores. All the three brothers are non-residents of India. Ashok is a US citizen, while Anand and Vijay stay at Bermuda..." On what authority is the writer saying that our assets are above Rs 3 crores? How can you allow such a statement to be published? The difference between being a non-resident Indian, which Ashok is, and being a US citizen, which Ashok is not, is great.

At another place, the writer makes a serious allegation. "His wife ran a corrugated box unit behind their residence in Madras. The unit is still in operation and its entire output is absorbed by the Railways, thanks to Mr Robert Amritraj's connections with his former employers". We do not have any connections whatsoever with the Railways and my wife does not do even a single paisa worth of work for the Indian Railways. I decided to treat this false allegation with the contempt it deserves, knowing that the writer of this article is a tool in the hands of interested persons. The writer, unfortunately, does not have the moral courage to withstand the pressure tactics of influential persons in the TV industry who are scared that the success of our project will spell their doom. This is so obvious from the article: "The portable TV set, if sold indigenously, will be priced at around Rs 1,300 per TV set and provide effective competition to the existing units in turn forcing them to cut back their prices". So this is the crux of the matter! The reason behind the tirade against my family is that the existing TV units will be forced to cut down their prices once our TV receiver set comes into the market. Assuming that such a thing were to happen, it is for the good of the consumer and the country. However, if the writer thinks that by publishing such a damaging and totally uncalled-for article and forecasting doom for our project he is going to deter me from proceeding with it, he will realise pretty soon how his calculations have misfired.

Robert Amritraj, Madras.

Karpoori helped Urdu

MHASHIM KIDWAI's letter (Opinion, September 2) deserves some comments. Mr Kidwai asked: "What status did Urdu enjoy in 28 months that Janata Party was in power?" I do not know what happened in other States, but a process had started in Bihar in 1978 during the Janata rule under Karpoori Thakur (who is now with Lok Dal). Every school in Bihar is to select text books published by the Bihar Textbook Committee and that State Government controlled Textbook Committee did not publish textbooks in Urdu and Bengali in the previous ten years. As a result, hundreds of Urdu and Bengali medium schools had to select Hindi textbooks for their students. When Mr Golam Sarwar (now with Lok Dal) became the Secondary Education Minister in 1977, he reconstituted the Textbook Committee with Urdu-speaking and Bengali-speaking members, who arranged the writing and publication of Urdu and Bengali textbooks from 1978. Mr Sarwar had a plan to allow private publishers to publish Urdu and Bengali textbooks for school students if the Bihar Textbook Committee failed to publish all the textbooks in two languages.

Mr Kidwai should not overlook this fact for political reasons. May I point out that the left Parties are also not free from anti-Urdu bias? The predominantly Urdu-speaking Topsia ward came under the Corporation of Calcutta in 1954. But the area is yet to have a primary school run by the Corporation or the State Government. Though the area elected two CPI(M) MLAs (one of them is an Urdu-speaking person) in 1977, the Corporation or the Government is yet to start a primary school.

By solely blaming the RSS for riots in Jamshedpur, Mr Kidwai like others is underestimating the communal forces in the steel town. In October 1978, the mini-riot in Jamshedpur was started not by the RSS but by Congress(I) elements.

Niranjan Haldar, Calcutta.

I WOULD like to highlight the fact that the Minorities Commission report (published after its visit to Jamshedpur and Aligarh) clearly states that the riots in Jamshedpur and Aligarh were not engineered by the RSS nor was there any evidence against the RSS. It is sad to note that even learned persons like Mr Kidwai are guided by political propagandists. In fact the RSS has done good work and continues to do so. In the recent disaster in Morvi, Gujarat, the RSS workers collected the dead corpses for cremation. The RSS is also constructing houses for victims of Morvi. Is the RSS not a social organisation?

Mahendra Prasad, Patna City.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

THE LAST GOODBYE

Photographs : Raghu Rai, K.M.Kishan

Krishna Murari Kishan

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The end came quietly, peacefully, in his sleep, on October 8, 1979. They put it at 5.45 a.m. And JP was where he had always wanted to be in the end, in his beloved Patna, at the modest house in Kadam Kuan owned by the Mahila Charkha Samiti which his wife Prabhavati helped organise.

Janki his adopted daughter was there soon with her son, only a few months old. The ladies of the Mahila Charkha Samiti were there as well in half an hour. The one who had sung bhajans for him regularly was doing so again. Now for the last time.

He was taken out of the Kadam Kuan house at 11 a.m., down the narrow staircase by the doctors (C. P. Thakur and Uma Kant Sinha) and his personal staff and a priest from the Takth Har Mandir.

To the Srikrishna Memorial Hall and there to lie in state till mid-day the next day for the high and the lowly to pay homage.

There was a lathicharge at Kadam Kuan to control the crowd which had gathered like an expanding torrent. Among those who came to pay their last respects on October 9 at the Srikrishna Memorial Hall were the President, Charan Singh, Raj Narain, MGR, Y. B. Chavan (who could not hold back his tears), a cripple and countless others.

After 11.30 when all the leaders had paid their respects JP was put on a truck and taken round the Gandhi Maidan which had been the scene of the launching of his Bihar Movement in 1974. Then began the last journey. On a gun carriage, with full military honours, along routes lined by lakhs of mourners.

At the end of the two-hour journey to the Bansghat the body was taken down by pall bearers from the Armed Forces and carried to the pyre by the side of the "Mother Ganga".

S. N. Sinha

Krishna Murari Kishan

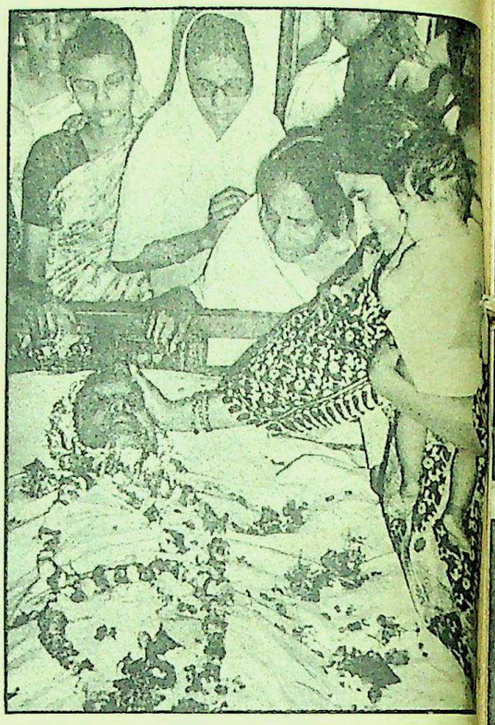
Krishna Murari Kishan

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

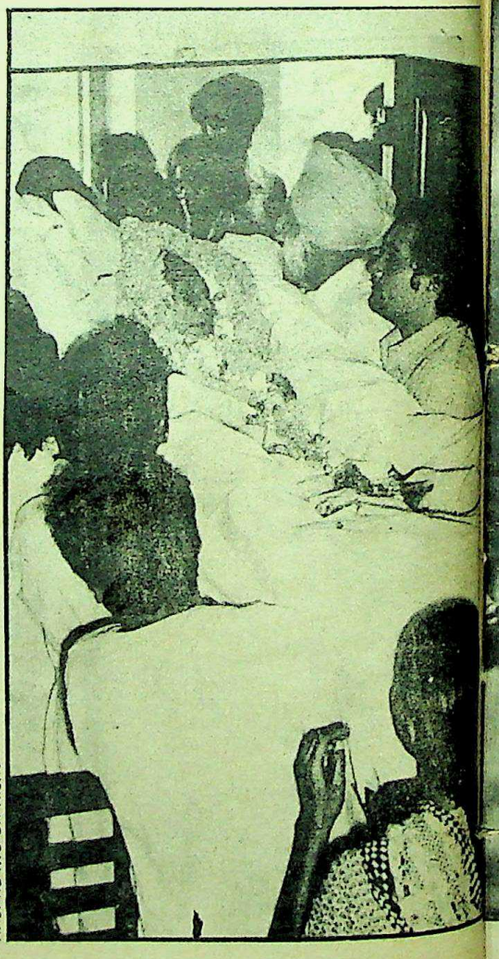
Krishna Murari Kishan

The most touching was frail Acharya Kripalani hobbling in, helped by the President, come to bid goodbye The body was bathed in the Ganga and Pandit Vishnu Kant performed the last rites. Then with the sounding of the Last Post and a 21-gun salute JP's nephew. Ratneswar Prashad, lit the pyre at 2.05 p.m. and as the flames and smoke rose into the air, it was all over.



Krishna Murari Kishan

Krishna Murari Kishan



Krishna Murari Kishan

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Acharya
d by the ye The anga and rmed the unding of un salute ashad, lit
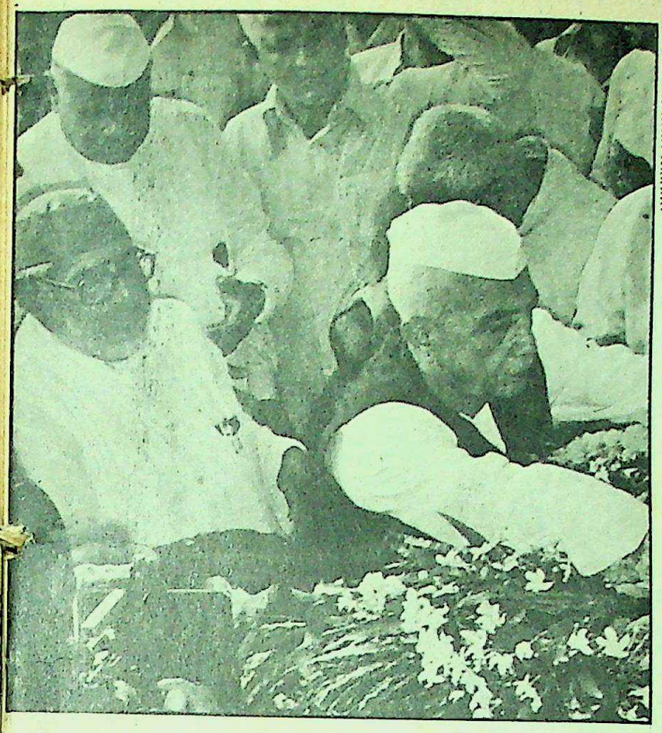
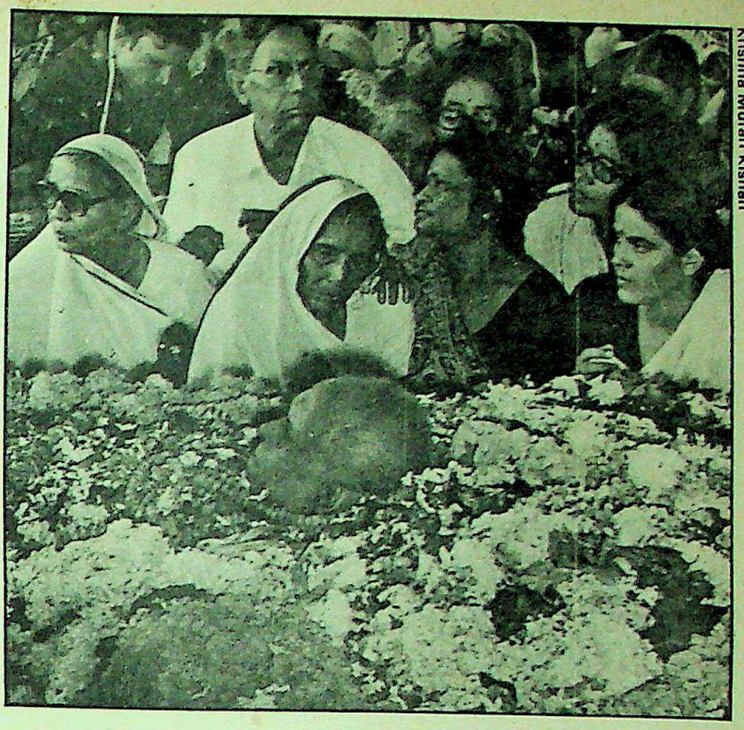
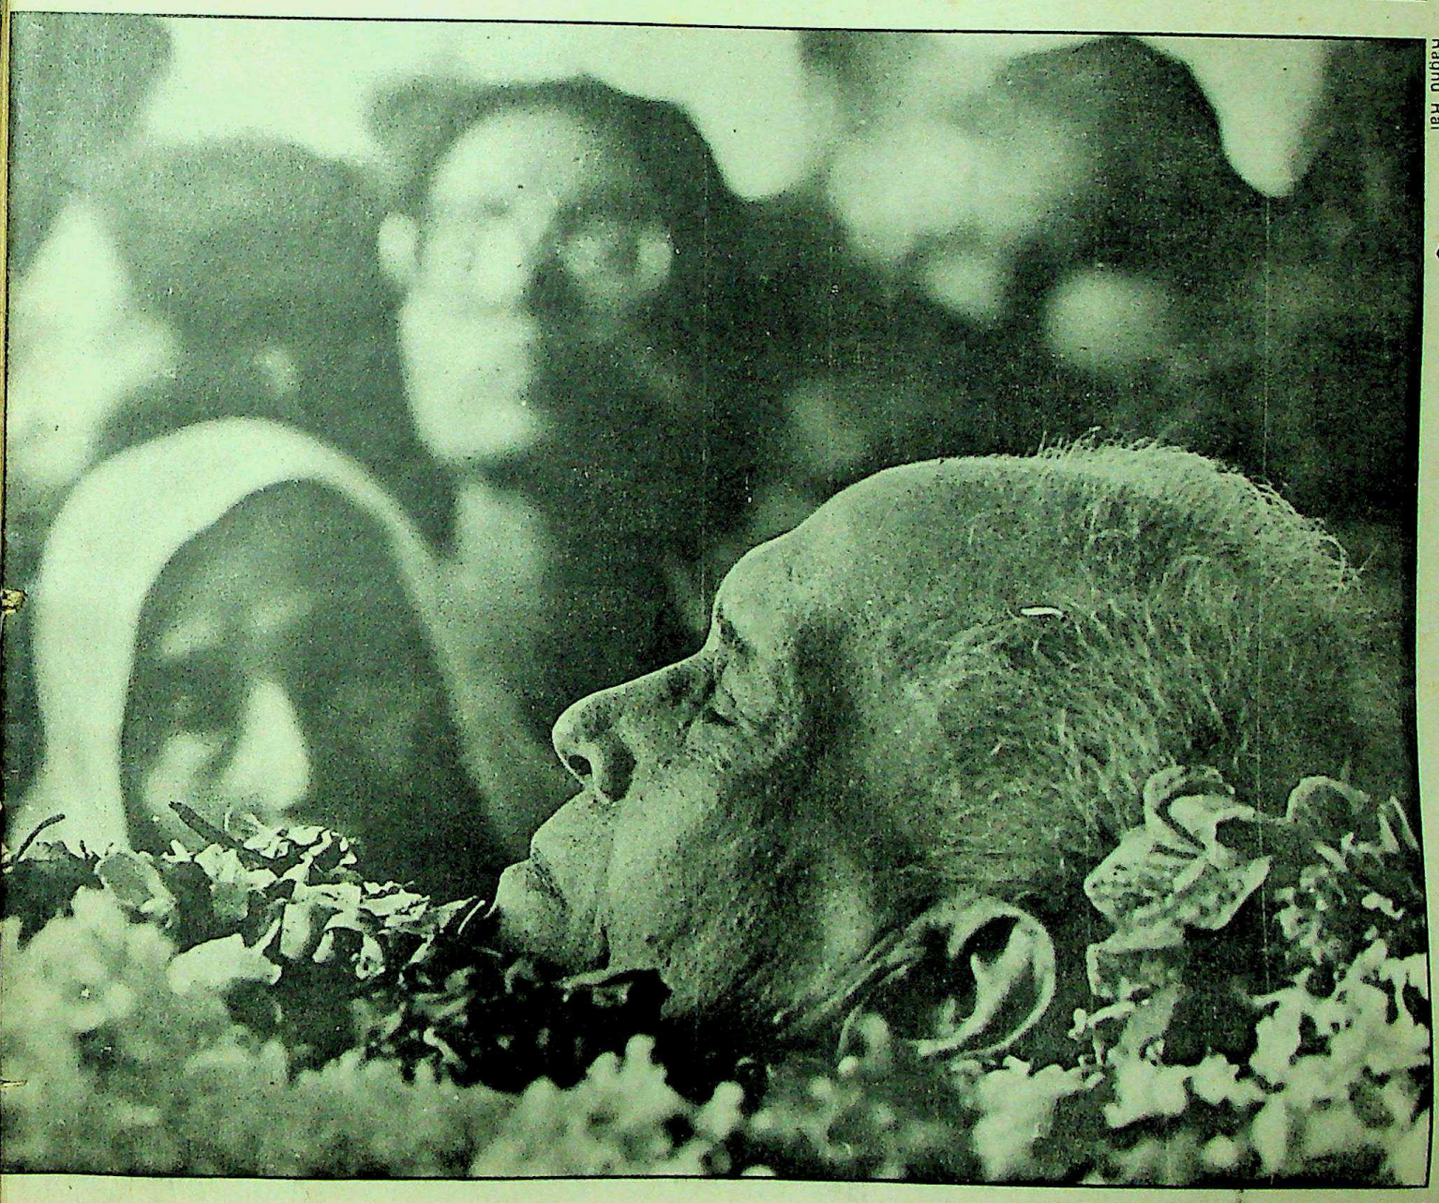
d as the
the air,



Krishna Murari Kishan



Krishna Murari Kishan



Raghu Rai

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Raghu Rai

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Raghu Rai

Raghu Rai

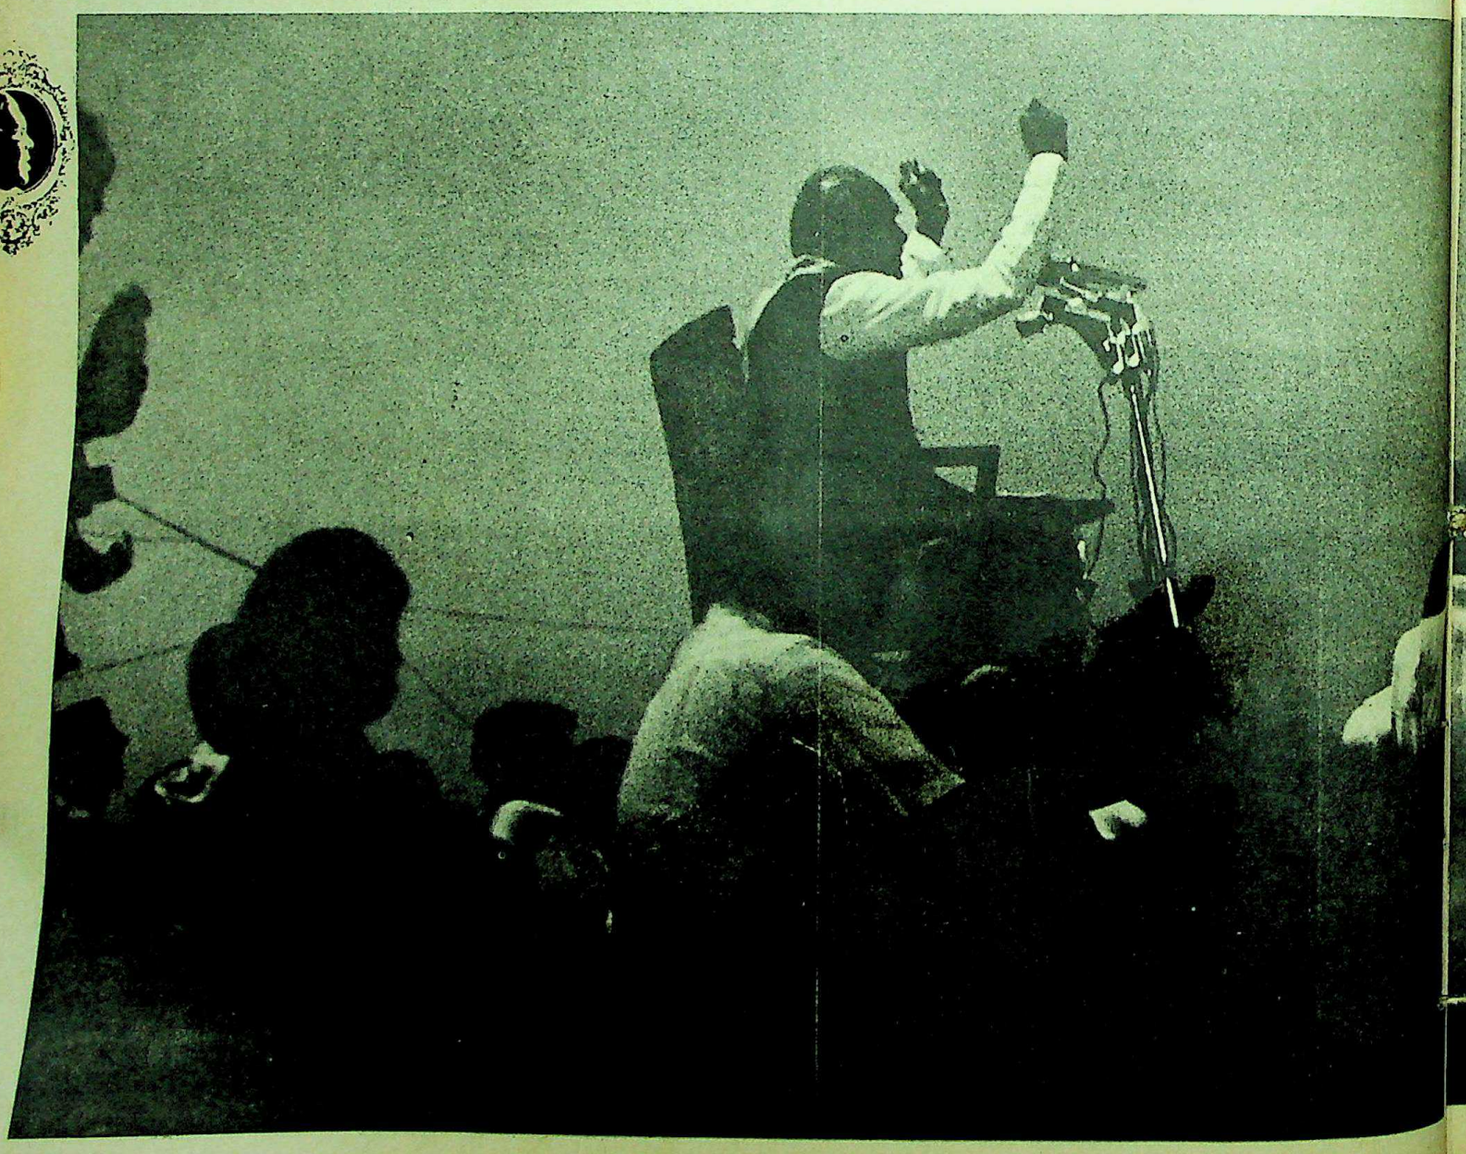
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Loknayak Jayaprakash Zindabad !

Patna and Bihar said a passionate goodbye to a man they had loved more than any other

By M. J. AKBAR



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

LIKE a beloved but painfully ill member of a family, who had just died, Loknayak Jayaprakash Narayan, Bihar's greatest son, was laid to rest. While a deep sense of loss echoed on every lip, there was still a subdued sense of relief that a man's personal physical tragedy was over. There was sorrow, but no tears; there was enormous sentiment, but no spontaneous passion. Everyone had been waiting too long for the death of the hero.

And Bihar gave its beloved JP a hero's funeral. When in the mellow bright light of the early morning, news first began to spread that JP was no more, many people did not believe it, considering this as yet another rumour in a city which is full of them. But soon, very soon as the news began to percolate from official channels, doubt became certainty, certainty became mourning, and the crowds began to collect at the simple house at Kadam Kuan which JP had lifted from obscurity into a national edifice. The people began pouring into the narrow streets which had seen so much history, particularly in the last decade; and the leaders who owed their current fame and position to the selfless struggle of one man, one flickering candle in the darkness, one voice in the fearsome silence, one truth in the marketplace of lies, began gathering there, tremulously walking into the house which they had ignored, or, worse, manipulated, to such cost to the country.

Finally the pressure of the crowd forced the people in charge of JP's death to take his body to the Sri Krishna Memorial Hall, just opposite the historic Gandhi Maidan which has seen the inauguration of so many causes. The Sri Krishna Memorial Hall has an interesting history. It is ironic that JP's body should lie there. All through the Emergency Mrs Indira Gandhi's dictatorial armed forces used that as a haven, and one of the demands JP had made was that the armed police should be removed from this memorial to one of Bihar's greatest Chief Ministers, Sri Krishna Singh. And of course soon enough Mrs Indira Gandhi herself came to pay homage to JP there. She had done everything to destroy him when he was alive. Still, one could understand her presence: she had as much right as Jagjivan Ram or Y. B. Chavan to be there. But what was impossible to take was the presence of the young Sanjay Gandhi, the Crown Prince and brutal authority during the Emergency. What was Sanjay Gandhi trying to prove that he suddenly acquired respect for a man who stood for everything that Sanjay Gandhi tried to destroy.

All through the day, all through that quiet night, the lights kept burning over JP's body, and the faithful sang bhajans in his memory, and never for a moment was there a pause in the queue of mourners who wanted to take a last look at the man who had given them so much in inspiration, in idealism. And if the response seemed a little muted on the first day, the day of the funeral cleared all scepticism about what the people of Bihar felt about their moral leader. They participated in a funeral the like of which had never been seen before, and was not likely to be seen again in the foreseable future. After the death of this internationally renowned who could Bihar boast of? In fact, Bihar is leaderless today: the only figure of national fame from Bihar is Karpoori Thakur.

Raghu Rai

AND yet a shiver of disillusionment was running through Patna, particularly among those people whom JP had elevated from the battles of the streets into the cool and spacious corridors of legislative and executive power. In the innocent period of the Janata wave, around 30 young men who had been blooded during the JP movement became MLAs in the Bihar Assembly. They had been sent to change the world; and if the world had not changed them into corrupt and heartless professional politicians yet, it had certainly stripped them of any illusions that they might have harboured. There was only one profound regret in their hearts: if only JP had been well enough to provide the moral and practical leadership he had shown during the movement, if only JP could have still been able to talk to the masses who he loved and who gave him their affection and trust in return! The country would perhaps not have been going through the political uncertainties of today. The RSS will surely and with typical RSS sophistication begin to claim JP as its godfather, but the record shows that JP had clearly wanted the RSS to disband itself and merge into the Janata Party—and what a fundamental difference that would have made. JP had indicated that he would join the people in their protest against the Janata Party if it remained inactive and uninspiring: JP would have spoken out and stopped the rot. In an age when old politicians seem never to die did JP, the honest JP, have to be treated so cruelly by destiny? One young MLA told us that he refused to avail of the legislator's quota in buses or trains, because if he did so he would immediately be recognised by the people as an MLA—and how could he face them without cringing in shame at the performance of the Janata Government? This MLA is still in the Janata Party.

WHEN you leave the fog and blindness of a city and go into the villages, the stars of the night become luminous. From one end of the horizon to the other they are scattered, in dense clusters, like twinkling jewels pasted into a bowl by an extravagantly generous monarch. Like the haze of a light white veil the Milky Way stretches across the brilliant sky. The air is clean and caresses you with a healing touch. Darkness and silence stretch away on either side of the road, occasionally interrupted by a lonely wandering torch, or a faint voice.

We were travelling through the beauty of the night and the countryside, from Patna to JP's ashram in Nawadah district. The highways were, occasionally, dotted with small towns: one-street towns, rows of brick and cement buildings that provided the stations for trade and transport to the villages that radiated away into the unmapped distance. Trucks and buses were the only other vehicles on the road—apart from the stray police jeep, full of armed guardians of the law, searching for dacoits, on the highway, who infest rural Bihar. The buses were always overcrowded, with people piling on the roof, clinging for safety to each other's garments at the back. This was a day after JP's funeral. We were nearing JP's ashram, deliberately situated by JP at the edge of nowhere, two hundred kilometres away from Patna. We saw a bus, loaded with young people. And as we passed, quite unexpectedly to our ears came the cry which had shaken the nation and destroyed the Nehru kingdom—at least for the moment. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Chandrashekhar's homage

He didn't make speeches. He remembered that JP had built an ashram

By M. J. AKBAR

THE pyre had been lit; the massive crowds had dispersed quietly; JP had now become an inspiring memory in the hearts of a generation coming into its own. Even as the embers still glowed, and the black tunnel of smoke angled away into the sky, young people from the bursting crowd which had tumbled over into the Holy Ganga, charged towards the funeral pyre to pick up some ash, or a still burning piece of wood, to remember their beloved hero by. Upstairs, their duty done, the politicians hurried away into the waiting cars. There were a handful of Great Leaders of course who were genuinely upset, at the passing away of this genius, but most had been putting on an act over a man who they had ignored, insulted, beaten with lathis, arrested and tortured. But today they sat there under the shamiana, with hypocritical frowns on their faces—one or two even tried wiping a nonexistent tear from an eye. They had come by special flights: even Sanjay Gandhi and Mrs Indira Gandhi, whose brutal Emergency finally put a temporary lid on JP's national movement, came with wreaths and faces which had lies written all over them. And then there was Morarji Desai, who had never had any respect for JP, and was willing to say so (he has, more or less, said that in the interview published in this issue). And so on; the litany could be endless, and totally non-partisan.

They had come because they were all in queue to claim JP for themselves: ignored and humiliated in life, most tragically by petty men like Morarji Desai whom he had sent to power in 1977, JP had become a valuable asset in death. Just as the politicians had done during the last two years of his painful illness, they were queueing up to exploit him after he had gone. A couple of hours after the funeral, a man with a loudspeaker went around parts of Patna announcing that a "shok sabha", a condolence meeting, would be held in the Gandhi maidan at six in the evening. Who the organisers were was left vague, but it was clear that some politicians had already decided to make the first claim to JP's legacy. And the people showed their disgust at this: very, very few, hardly a hundred, turned up. There was a generator to illuminate the faces of the leaders who would address the multitudes: but there were no multitudes. Ramanand Tiwari, the Janata leader, was there; there was Hansraj Gupta, the RSS chief of Delhi with his Bihar counterpart, and Vidyarthi Parishad leaders like Sushil Mody. Seeing the absence of response, the "top leaders" left in their gleaming Ambassador cars.

The next day, there was a squabble among the JP loyalists over when the condolence meeting should be held: some were in favour of holding it that very evening (on October 10), and others thought the next day, October 11, which was also JP's birthday, would be a better occasion. And while these squabbles were going on, one of the key persons in the organisation of the arrangements, a man who could claim the closest relationship with JP among the politicians, suddenly revolted: he could not take this sordid business of using JP's name any more. Without informing many people, Chandrashekhar got into a car, and accompanied by a few close friends, drove off to Sokhodeora, about two hundred kilometres away from Patna, in the interior of Nawadah district. Here, touching the hill range which separates Nawadah from Hazaribagh, in the quietness of one of the poorest areas in the country, Jayaprakash Narayan had started an ashram after he had left Party politics and given his life for social work. While the other politicians fought to make speeches, Chandrashekhar ran away from them, at least at this moment, and went to a place which was an important symbol of JP's life and achievement. It was an act which said a great deal for Chandrashekhar, the man.

Everyone had forgotten about the students and the workers of this living legacy of JP, and had been thrown into uncertainty. Chandrashekhar's visit restored their confidence and spirits. As long as JP was alive, they knew, enough people would be interested in this successful 70-acre experiment in co-operative agriculture (the profits are shared by the works on the land). Sushila Sahai, who had also come with Chandrashekhar, was among the first people to work on the ashram when it began in the early Fifties: then it was merely a piece of donated land on which nothing had ever grown, full of snakes, particularly the vicious and poisonous krait; there were scorpions, there was malaria, there was kala azar, and there were only simple huts (which still survive). But there was also one couple's will: JP and Prabhavati's; and there was the tremendous dedication of a handful of dedicated young people. Sushila's husband, Dayanand Sahai, now a prosperous MP, was also one of the first people to come: he had exchanged his comfortable job in the planning department of the Bihar Government for the ashram in response to JP's call. And he met his wife there: JP and Prabhavati Devi organised their marriage. There were no roads then, recalled Dayanand Sahai—only a kutcha path, which was serviceable only during summer and winter, but totally waterlogged during the rains.

Chandrashekhar avoided going to Patna even on JP's birthday: he wanted no part in the speechmaking that would inevitably take place on that day. Instead, he was on his way to Gaya district, to inspect a spot in Rajgir which he felt would be suitable for the building of a hospital. That hospital, to be called Jayaprabha, would be another important memorial to JP and Prabhavati Devi; and it would be far more valuable than all the speeches in the world. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

JP's last days: The wounded soldier

By SANTOSH BHARTIYA

ON October 11, 1978, many of the friends and admirers of Jayaprakash Narayan who had come to Kadam Kuan to celebrate his birthday thought that this would be his last. There weren't many VIPs in the gathering. The great politicians were busy with their games in Delhi: even Chandrashekhar, who was the nearest to JP among the politicians, sent only a telegram. JP used to celebrate his birthday on two days: on Vijayadashami according to both the Indian and the Roman calendar. (He was actually born on Vijayadashami.) This year JP did quietly celebrate another year of his now increasingly sad life: and in every respect so, both in broken health and broken dreams. But he could not reach his birthday by the Roman calendar.

The worst thing was that people had begun to feel in the last two years that JP was no longer their leader but the leader of only other leaders. This impression is largely due to the statements made by the various leaders who have tried to exploit JP's name to further their narrow ends. The truth was that JP never knew who was angry with him and why.

I reached JP's house on the morning of September 27, at around 8.15. The house was deserted. On the ground floor, except for a plainclothes security man smoking a Charminar cigarette, there was nobody. Suddenly the contrast with the turbulent days of 1974 and 1975 hit me. I had participated in that movement myself, and during that glorious moment in our lives JP's house was always crowded as in a carnival. And the roads on either side used to swarm with activity. The young revolutionaries, from every corner of the country, would simply not budge until they had seen JP at least once. Who knew, particularly after March 1977, that once again very soon, JP's house would be as silent as it was during the long days when JP had renounced politics. When I reached the upper floor, on which JP lived, I found Taki Rahim, the top leader of Bihar's Marxist Coordination Committee, reciting a few ghazals to JP. JP saw me approaching, watched me silently for a while, and then reacted. "Acha Santosh, baitho, baitho (Oh, is that Santosh, sit down, sit down). After Taki Rahim had recited another ghazal and left, JP beckoned me to come nearer and sit with him. I had come from Lucknow, where I was based. I told JP about UP politics, in response to a question from him. He wanted to know the prospects of the various Parties. I had hardly finished answering when Sachidanand, JP's secretary, felt that JP was tired now, and needed some rest. I was trying to get up quietly when JP said, "Come inside for a chat."

Mandira Puri

JP was very weak. He had to be helped up, and half-carried to his bed. It was not long ago when one simply could not conceive of spending so much time with JP. There was always a queue of visitors. And now here I was spending so much time with him. JP was very eager to know what exactly was happening all over the country. His secretary used to read out the newspapers to him every day. But nobody would tell what he really wanted to know: The truth behind the wheeling and dealing of politicians, the background that he was sure existed, because he knew the pygmies of Delhi only too well. When, illustrating with specific incidents, I told him that people were angry with him, he was astonished. "Why? why are people angry with me?" When I told him that the end result of two years of Janata rule was that a lot of people were beginning to look positively at the Emergency and suggest that things were better then, JP sadly looked up at the ceiling and kept staring at it. When I added that the self-confidence of the people which the movement had built had been, to an extent, destroyed by the performance of the Janata, JP turned towards me. Suddenly, a flash of the old fire lit his eyes, and he asked, "Should I say anything to the people now?" His secretary, Sachidanand, interrupted and told JP, "You had told Ataljee (Vajpayee) that you would think about this". I protested that the question was not of JP supporting any political Party: JP should tell the people that he belonged to them and not to any political Party. JP looked intently at me. I left after saying this, adding that I would return in the evening.

My heart was heavy and I kept remembering a part of the conversation which had taken place earlier, where JP had described himself as a wounded soldier. I had told him that only he had been successful, and the others had failed, and JP had replied,

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

"No, even the leader has failed, will history ever understand that I was never among those people who provided leadership from inside a closed room?" Downstairs it was still deserted. And that same security man was now listening to Vividh Bharti.

In the evening, there was the same silence. In his room, a retired officer of the Bihar Government, Ranchhor Babu, was sitting. I waited outside. JP's nurse came and sat by me and told me that JP could not sleep well at night. He could hardly sleep for more than two hours at a stretch. He was less weak these days, he kept pressing his right hand. She became emotional, and she sounded as if she wanted to cure JP with her love. On three days a week, Monday, Wednesday and Friday, JP used to have his dialysis, which would last for six hours at a time. Every drop of blood leaving the body, one at a time, being cleaned and returned to the veins. One day, in utter pain, JP began crying like a child. "Am I not a human being? I too feel pain!" he shouted.

I did not wait for Ranchhor Babu to come out, and went into the room. After he left, JP commented, "Ranchhor Babu is very clear in his mind about planning". The doctor came in and began checking JP's blood pressure. On the wall above JP's bed, over his head, was a framed couplet: Malik teri raza, aur hi tu rahe, baki na main rahoon, naameri arzoo rahe. (God only you and your will survives, neither I nor my desires.)

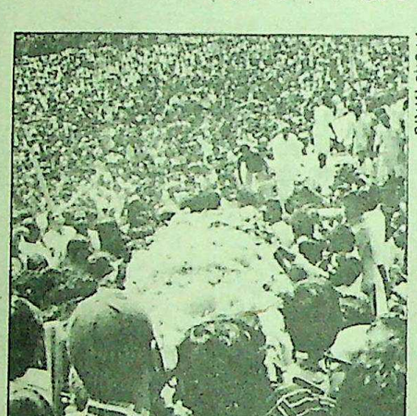
There were pictures of Gandhiji and Prabhavati (JP's wife) together, and JP and Prabhavati together. To the right of the bed was the dialysis machine, and the room had a strange smell, partly of a hospital, partly of a home. JP turned towards me and began saying something when I stopped him, "I have not come to talk", I said, "Just to sit here". Sachida Babu began reading from the day's newspapers. JP was cynical about news. But became visibly agitated about a report from Amnesty International about the number of political murders that had taken place in this decade. The political developments in Delhi elicited only one response from him: "I take my strength from the people. If only I could meet the people again..." The sentence was incomplete, but the meaning could not have been clearer.

JP again looked at the ceiling. Perhaps he was remembering that he was the man who made the promises to the people. I said, "the people you had bailed out (from political oblivion) have jumped bail now". JP smiled in reply. Suddenly, he wanted to go out onto the small terrace and we began walking together. He became tired. His room, bathroom, verandah and that small roof: that was the sum total of JP's world now. JP could not get out of that. It was Sachida Babu's belief that if JP, even now, could go back to the people, he would become all right. I laughed to myself. None of JP's young workers were allowed to meet him these days. But this dying old man could be made to sit for an hour, by those around him, to wait for Sanjay Gandhi to come and see him (Sanjay Gandhi, as it happened, did not meet him). Glamour boys could meet JP, not ordinary workers. Now, even the Sarvodaya people had more or less stopped meeting JP. JP had unintentionally done them the last favour with the Amrit Kosh Fund, and now perhaps they would return only when a fund would be raised in the name of a dead JP.

September 28—that was dialysis day. I reached Kadam Kuan around seven in the morning. JP asked me about the attack on boys of the Sangharsh Vahini at Bodh Gaya over the math's land issue (SUNDAY September 9). After narrating the incident, I suggested that what we were passing through was a crisis of faith. People were giving up hope in the Government. And in its ability to do anything for them. "What do you think will happen?" I asked JP. Tears welled up in his eyes. And he replied, "Dekho, Kya hota hai (See what happens)". My heart welled up too, and suddenly I bent down and touched his feet. JP gave me his ashirvad and said softly, "Phir aana (come again)".

Downstairs, I met Sachidanand. There was another kind of anger in him. And he was also waiting for his opportunity to tell the world the truth about JP being isolated from the people. His other secretary, Abraham, said that there was a great deal in his diary, but he would not publish it. History will remember JP as a man who only gave all that he had. And took nothing, absolutely nothing, in return. ■

JP : "They have lost a wonderful opportunity"



Aloke Mitra

I MET Jayaprakash Narayan on September 25, at his residence at Kadamkuan in Patna. He had undergone dialysis on the previous day and he looked feeble but cheerful. When I asked him about his health, he said: "These days I have to undergo dialysis every alternate day." I could see a lurking smile on his face when he added: "The doctors spare me on Sundays." Yet it was on a Sunday that he had to undergo an emergency dialysis and he died in his sleep early on October 8.

I found JP unusually alert. When I talked about my friend Professor Raj Krishna, he asked me: "Why did he resign from the Planning Commission?" Later when I told him about Raj Krishna's spirited interview to SUNDAY magazine, he immediately asked one of his secretaries (Shri Sachidanand) to get a copy of SUNDAY and read out the interview.

I switched on to national politics and referred to the distressing state of affairs in the country. JP was sad and silent. After a long pause he said: "They have lost a wonderful opportunity." I could see in his tragic eyes his total disillusionment with our political leaders.

I moved on to rural health. I informed JP that I was trying to study the working of the new rural health scheme based on Community Health Volunteers. I also told him that I was planning to visit a Primary Health Centre and some Sub-Centres, and introduced to JP the officials from the Ministry of Health of Bihar Government. JP asked me: "Which place are you planning to visit?" I replied: "Maner Primary Health Centre". At this JP did not look happy at all. He observed: "But Maner is half urban". I felt very guilty and added rather nervously: "But the Sub-Centres are in the interior." JP was right. My quick field work confirmed that even Sub-Centres were not in the interior villages.

It was remarkable that JP could remember not only the names of the villages but also the type of villages. I started discussing the details of the rural health scheme and JP seemed deeply interested. I did not want to tire him out and soon I parted saying: "You are the last of the great men of India." Quick came his reply: "I make no such claim."

I knew I would not meet Jayaprakash Narayan again. I did "pranam" in the Indian style and touched his feet. He took both my hands in his and bid an affectionate farewell.

ASHISH BOSE

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The last 24 hours

How the end came

By S. P. SAGAR

SUNDAY, October 7, 1979; the time : around 6 a.m. On the first floor of the Mahila Charkha Samiti building in Patna's Kadam Kuan area, JP — the untiring fighter against authoritarianism and revolutionary extraordinary, now a frail old man afflicted by serious kidney trouble — had woken up to another dawn. It was a quiet morning, with no traces of the tension and anxiety that had gripped the place six months ago when JP was last seriously ill. Of late, in fact, he had been keeping "very fine, in the best of health, and showed a much better memory", as Dr R.V.P. Sinna, his resident physician, would often say.

As the ailing leader lay in bed, waiting for Gulab, his trusted attendant, he wore a look of relief. There was to be no dialysis that day, and the old man must have felt relieved at being spared the agony of the painful exercise. Gulab arrived with a glass of water, JP washed his face, gargled. Gulab led him to the bathroom for his morning ablutions, and he returned feeling relaxed.

In a short while breakfast was ready. There were corn flakes, eggs, plantains and an apple. He ate his fill, and then listened to Mr Sachidanand, one of his secretaries, read out selected items from the newspapers. He relaxed in bed for some more time and then asked Gulab to prepare him for a bath, as usual, in lukewarm water. Soon, JP was back in his bedroom, bathed and shaven looking refreshed, to face a familiar audience : Secretary, Mr Abraham, Jagdish babu. They got talking.

Not much later, JP began showing signs of discomfort. At about 11 a.m. he complained of breathing difficulty, and uneasiness in the abdomen. Such complaints were not unusual, but when Dr C. P. Thakur, another of JP's personal physicians, examined him, he decided to administer oxygen to give JP immediate relief. While the old man continued to complain of pain in various parts of his body Dr Thakur advised him to drink as little water as possible. Gulab was told to prepare JP's meals with less salt, and Dr Thakur ordered dialysis in case JP's breathing trouble continued. For lunch, which was served at noon, the leader had rice and mutton liver curry, his normal food, and curd. Not satisfied at the quantity of liver curry, JP asked Gulab : "Kyon ? Itna kam kyon laye ?" (Why have you brought so little?)

Meanwhile, he continued to have difficulty breathing. At about 3 p.m., an old friend of his from the socialist movement, Achyut Patwardhan called. "Hullo, how are you?" he asked, to which the leader—strangely pessimistic about his fate — replied . "Lingering on, waiting for death." After that, they talked heartily, and not about politics. Since the breathing trouble, bodyache and uneasiness in the abdomen continued, it was decided to conduct an 'emergency' (meaning unscheduled) dialysis. Patwardhan and JP hugged and kissed each other on the forehead, and hoped they would meet again before the former left.

By 4.15 p.m all was set for the dialysis. Janaki Bahen, JP's adopted daughter, and Mr Abraham started the dialyser. Two needles were inserted into the grafted region of his right hand to begin the process of cleaning his blood, which lasts for five hours. JP was brought under local anaesthesia. While he persistently complained about the pain, the operation continued and in two hours about two kilos of the excess fluid his blood contained were eliminated. Towards the end of the operation, Mr Abraham, momentarily losing his patience, asked : "How much longer ?" "Ten minutes," came the reply. Actually it lasted another 15 minutes. Dinner — with the same menu of rice and mutton liver curry — was served during the dialysis, and this time, as the normal practice was during dialysis, JP was spoonfed by Gulab. The process finally ended by 9.39 p.m., after which the frail man looked relieved but exhausted.

"That night he seemed better," Mr Abraham said, remembering his moments with JP. While Gulab gently pressed the portions of his body where he complained of pain, he began dozing to sleep, and told both Gulab and Mr Abraham to go away. Mr Abraham left by about 11 p.m., assured that he was asleep. A round-the-clock vigil was kept on the ailing leader by a team of six doctors and three nurses. The persons on duty that night were nurse Kanti Mishra, from 11 p.m. to 1 a.m, a Chhatra Sangharsh Samiti member from 1 a.m. to 4 a.m. the next morning and Amrit, an office staffer, from 4 a.m. to 5 a.m. After 5 a.m. Jagdish babu, whose room is on the same floor as JP's, took over till 6 a.m., when Gulab relieved him. The doctor on duty that night was a child specialist, Dr U. K. Singh, who lived on the ground floor of the building.

At 4.45 a.m., says Amrit, JP asked him to bring a glass of water. Having been given the water, he told Amrit to leave, saying that he was again feeling sleepy. Amrit left, and on his way informed Jagdish babu. The latter woke up to find JP sleeping with his body inclined to the right. This was around 5 a.m. Around 5.40 a.m., Jagdish babu returned to JP's room, peeped in through the door and found him in exactly the same position : head and torso bent to the right at a curious angle. Unsuspectingly Jagdish babu went to the bathroom. At about five or seven minutes to six, when Gulab, who had left JP's room at 11.30 p.m., was on his way to the room again, Jagdish babu told him to switch off the airconditioner since it was "somewhat cold". Gulab entered the room, and by what he saw, was almost petrified. The battered figure was upcurled, the knees almost touching the abdomen, the back arched, and the whole body tilted to the left, balancing on the edge of the bed. It was a horrid sight, but with something strange about it : his right hand was reaching out across the body to the left, where the calling bell press button lay fixed to the side-table. Gulab stood transfixed. He walked up to the bed and touched JP's sullen face, which was turned downward, the nose pressed against the edge of the bed, and turned it upward. JP's eyes were shut, but his mouth was agape.

Gulab ran out of the room screaming. Jagdish babu rushed to the room, and straightened the curled body. Gulab ran down the stairs and brought the doctor. The doctor hurriedly examined the body. He felt and massaged the chest, and found no sign of life any more.

Gulab demonstrated to us the leader's last posture : a kneeling, prostrate figure, the back curved up and the right hand reaching out left, in the direction of the calling bell button. While there was no sign of a struggle, could it just be that the dying man had wanted to ask for help that did not come ? ■

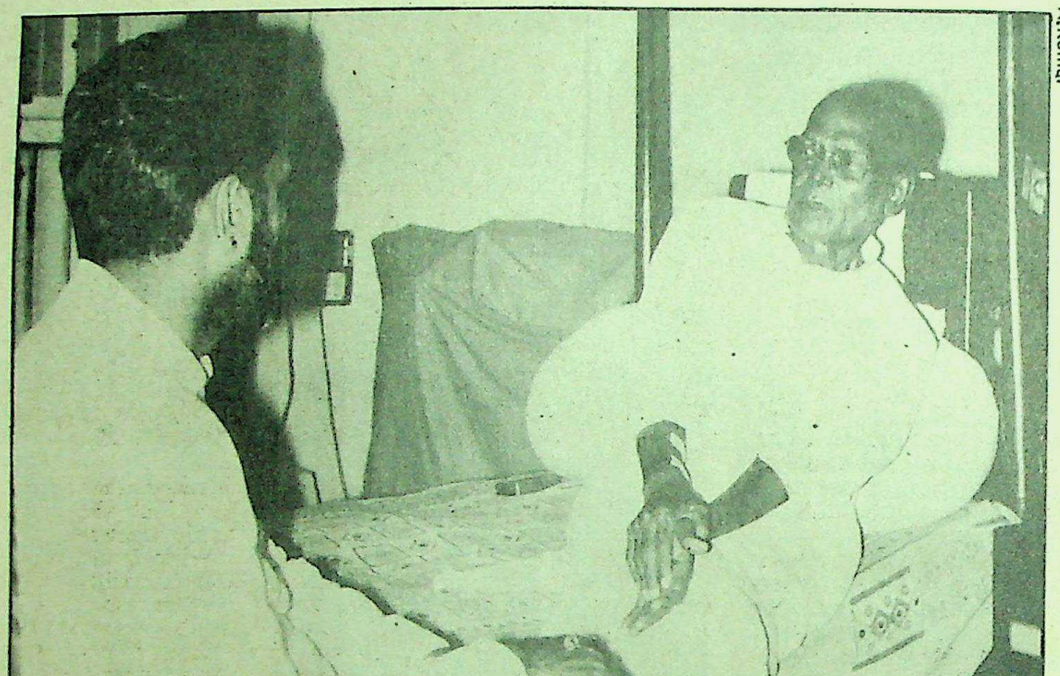
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The man I loved

He was a second Mahatma

By CHANDRASHEKHAR



A.Kumar

I HAD seen JP for the first time soon after he was released from jail in 1946 from a distance. But I personally met him first in 1951 soon after I passed my MA from Allahabad University. He had gone there as a socialist leader to tour Allahabad district. At that time the Socialist Party in Allahabad was in a very weak position. I was asked by the Socialist Party headquarters in Lucknow to organise his programme. He had a hectic programme for a day. After the programme was over in the night he asked someone he wanted to see me, the person who had organised the programme. That was the beginning of my close contact with him. After that it became a very intimate personal equation. And later, all the time, even when I differed with him politically, the personal touch was so overpowering that I could never desist from coming close to him. His affection and consideration for me remained the same even when I was strongly opposing him on many political issues.

It is very difficult to remember all the past incidents. But some very sweet memories come to my mind when Prabhavatiji and JP were together in the early days in their home village of Sitabdiara. I, as a socialist worker, used to be present at the village whenever JP visited it. I remember he looked after every worker. In the night, if it was winter, he would personally see whether everybody had been provided with adequate coverings. If any worker was sick, he would make enquiries about his health and make arrangements for his treatment. I remember one incident when Mahanand Mishra, who was a hero of 1942 in Ballia district, was suffering from serious eye trouble. JP was in Ballia. Friends told him that Mr Mishra needed good treatment. JP took him to Patna with him. On the (Patna) railway platform, Mahanand Mishra in his usual style could not catch JP in the crowd because his legs had weakened due to torture in the 1942 movement. When JP was going out of the station, he immediately remembered Mahanand Mishra and came back searching for him. In the whole crowd, people were amazed how JP was searching (for someone) and they were surprised to see that JP caught hold of Mahanand Mishra and asked him why he was left behind. Then he realised that Mr Mishra had weak legs. He told his Party colleagues to take special care of Mr Mishra, to take him to hospital.

I remember another incident. There was a friend of mine, Mr Mustafa, a student hero of the 1942 movement. After Partition many of his relatives went over to Pakistan. But this young man simply refused to go to Pakistan even though he was offered very high positions by that country. In the university he was a hero. After the examinations were over, Mustafa wanted a job but he could not get any job. I met JP along with Mustafa and for a few moments JP was dumbfounded to learn that Mustafa was unemployed. He said that "if free India could not provide a job to a person like Mustafa, I do not know what freedom is for." He immediately wrote a letter to Lal Bahadur Shastri, who was then the Railway Minister. Mr Shastri forwarded the application to the railway authorities but nothing happened for six months. After that JP was on a by-election tour in

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

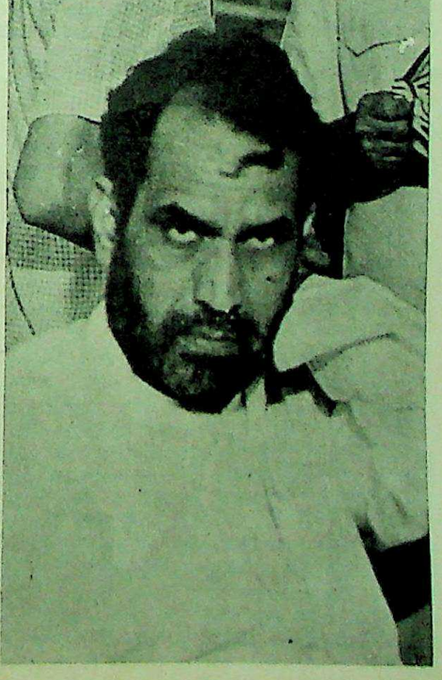
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Azamgarh District. And Mustafa and myself met JP and he immediately wrote a letter to Rafi Saheb. I still distinctly remember the wording of JP's letter. "My dear Rafi Sahib, if we cannot provide a job to men like Mustafa, we should feel ashamed. If you cannot do anything, I will write to Bhai Saheb (he meant Jawaharlal Nehru)." Rafi Sahib provided some job to Mustafa. That is a long story. But this shows how careful JP was about ordinary persons.

When the Emergency was declared and JP was arrested I immediately rushed to the Parliament Street Police Station where he was taken. Only there did I learn that there was a warrant of arrest against me. I informed JP and he just smiled and said "You too are being arrested. They have gone mad." Then a UNI correspondent asked what was his reaction. He gave the famous reply "vinas kale viparit budhi" (when one's ruin is near, one's mind loses its balance). After my release from jail when I went to meet JP, he told me, with tears in his eyes, that he pleaded with the Government authorities that he was feeling very lonely in Chandigarh and he should be allowed my company and I should be transferred to Chandigarh. But the authorities did not concede his request. He remembered the days of 1932 in the Lahore fort and said that "even the British Government allowed Ram Manohar Lohia and myself to meet. I do not know what was so serious about you. They did not allow me your company."

I remember another incident. Soon after the Janata Government was formed, JP was a bit annoyed. He sent a message as to why I did not become a Minister. I went to Bombay and told him my views about joining the Government. He said he did not consider it from that angle. He immediately said : "You have done the right thing." Then after a few days, he suggested to some friends that I should become the president of the Janata Party. When I was informed of it, I went along with my friend Brahmananda to Jaslok Hospital and I pleaded with JP that he should not give advice on such matters because people at the helm of affairs may ignore his advice. Moreover, I told him that if I was made president of the Janata Party on his recommendation I shall feel humiliated and "if your request is not accepted it would be derogatory to you also." JP said : "No, why should they not accept my advice?" I remember Brahmananda and I narrated a story. In 1947 when freedom came, Gandhiji suggested to Jawaharlalji that Acharya Narendra Dev should be Congress president. But Jawaharlal Nehru could not accept that advice. I told JP that "neither am I Acharya Narendra Dev nor are you Mahatma Gandhi and the present leaders are also not Jawaharlal Nehrus. This is a power game and you should keep aloof from this power game." Since that day I always insisted that JP should not be brought into any political controversy, whether that of internal politics of the Janata Party or outside. But unfortunately sometimes JP's name was used by some people. But JP, all the time I met him, was anxious about the work being done for the poorer sections of society. Last time when I met him, he was so worried about the impending disaster because of the drought. He was always thinking as if a calamity was falling on the country and he was not able to do anything to come to the help of our people. He never discussed the affairs of the Janata Party but always talked about national problems.

Krishan Murari Kishan



When I met him last, he was in perfect health. He was in the same condition as he was before going to Bombay for treatment last time. I thought that JP was going to survive for a longer time. All his associates were pretty sure that there was no problem for JP now. But his end has come all of a sudden. This is too much of a shock. But sometimes I feel that for a person like JP the sufferings he had undergone during the last three or four years were too much for him. He had died in peace. That should be a matter of solace for us. JP has contributed something to Indian history which the nation can never forget. The grateful nation will always remember JP as the protector of democracy in this country.

I feel that after Mahatma Gandhi, JP was the person who gave a new inspiration to our masses and could make them realise that they were the real masters of this country. They are the arbiters of the destiny of this nation. It is not the politicians and not the few people at the helm of affairs who would determine the future of this country, but young men, the peasantry and the toiling masses. They are the determining factors. This was the message of hope and confidence that JP wanted to impart to his colleagues and all those who came in touch with him. He could inspire the nation, not from the seat of power. I hope his ideals and his dreams will be fulfilled by the coming generation. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Last of the founding fathers

He never wavered on his principles

By MADHU LIMAYE

I AM stunned by the sudden death of Loknayak Jayaprakash Narayan. He was the last of the great national figures, the tallest among whom was Mahatma Gandhi, followed by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Netaji Subhas Chandra Bose and Sardar Patel. I met JP when he visited Poona after the outbreak of World War II. I was then a graduate student of Ferguson College and was also the secretary of the local Congress Socialist Party. I was tremendously impressed by his pleasant personality. He was very handsome and had a very charming manner. I always felt at ease in his presence. JP was considered by us the third most popular leader after Mahatma Gandhi, that is after Jawaharlal Nehru and Netaji Subhas Bose who was then affectionately called Subhas Babu not Netaji.

His public speech on the Shaniwar Wara ground in his deep husky voice was very inspiring. JP was married to the daughter of a leading disciple of Mahatma Gandhi who worked as his lieutenant in the great Champaran struggle. Prabhavatiji was a Gandhian and for many years JP was a confirmed Marxist. Prabhavatiji deeply influenced him in her own way. JP took an active part in the non-cooperation movement in the Twenties. Later he went to the USA for continuing his studies. But unlike most other students from the well-to-do families, JP's education was not financed by money orders or cheques coming from home. JP worked on plantations, on farms, washing dishes and as a waiter. He was a believer in the dignity of labour. He practised it himself. In his last year in the USA he was gradually drawn towards the Marxist doctrine and the Great Depression finally convinced him that capitalism was on its last legs and that only a socialist transformation of property relations would solve the country's problems.

When JP returned to India, the country was in a great ferment. On the banks of the river Ravi, the Congress had passed a resolution on complete independence under the presidentship of Jawaharlal Nehru. JP came in close contact with the young Congress president. Jawaharlal had a weakness for foreign educated young people and among these young leaders were Jayaprakash Narayan and Dr. Ram Manohar Lohia. JP worked as the labour secretary of the AICC, was himself arrested and spent long periods in jail. When the AICC was banned JP also worked as the general secretary of the Congress. He was imprisoned in the Nasik Central Jail in the years 1932-1933. With him were many other future leaders of the Congress Socialist Party like Minoo Masani, N. G. Goray and Asoka Mehta.

After his release from jail the conservative leadership of the Congress Party again turned to constitutionalism and to the parliamentary path and the younger Congressmen who in their long terms of imprisonment came into contact with Marxist ideas were disappointed with the course that the Congress Party had taken. They had reservations about Mahatma Gandhi's constructive programme. They felt that it was necessary to organise the workers and peasants on class lines and bring them into the freedom movement. Those who thought alike met together in Patna and Bombay in 1934 and so the Congress Socialist Party was launched with Jayaprakash as its general secretary. Acharya Narendra Dev, Dr. Ram Manohar Lohia, Kamala Devi Chattophadhyay, Yusuf Meherally, Minoo Masani, S. M. Joshi and other comrades were his colleagues. There were also young people—E. M. S. Namboodiripad, P. Ramamurthy, Sundarayya and others. They later on left the Congress Socialist Party and founded the Communist Party. Later JP continued to have excellent relations with the CPI(M) because of its leaders' close association with the Congress Socialist Party and the freedom movement.

In the beginning Jayaprakash was a fierce critic of Mahatma Gandhi's philosophy. He was then an orthodox Marxist and in his booklet Why Socialism he had not only attacked Mahatma Gandhi's ideology, but also strongly criticised the traditional Hindu thinkers like Bhagwan Das. In the Ferozpur document of the Congress Socialist Party he persuaded the Party to declare itself as a Marxist Party. JP thought it was necessary to heal the breach between the Congress Socialist Party and the Communist Party, both of whom professed Marxism. The main dispute between the Congress Socialist Party and the Communist Party at the time was that the Congress Socialist Party leaders regarded the Indian National Congress as the anti-imperialist national front and believed that all socialists, Marxists and leftists, should work through the Indian National Congress. The policy of the Communist Party was different. They regarded the Congress as a bourgeois Party and denounced Mahatma Gandhi as a bourgeois leader. The Communist Party stayed away from the great civil disobedience campaign of the years 1930-34 although many individual comrades joined this movement.

But by 1936 a change had come in the policy and outlook of the communists and they decided to work with the Indian National Congress. After this change JP felt that the main difference that divided the Communist Party and the Congress Socialist Party had disappeared. So he suggested that there should be a united front between the Congress Socialist Party and the Communist Party which was then a proscribed political organisation. As a first step towards unification, JP opened the doors of the Congress Socialist Party for Communist Party members and many members joined the Congress Socialist Party and also became members of the AICC. The socialists and communists also worked together in the AITUC. JP played a leading role in restoring unity to the trade union movement and he also played a prominent part in organising the Kisan Sabha. Both the socialists and the communists pressed for collective affiliation of these class organisations with the Indian National Congress. The issue was discussed at the working committee from time to time and in spite of the deep sympathy which Jawaharlal Nehru felt for the viewpoint of the socialists and communists, the Congress never accepted the principle of collective affiliation.

Jayaprakash Narayan was an opponent of the federal scheme under the Government of India Act of 1935 and he believed that a mass struggle would have to be organised to fight this reactionary scheme and achieve complete independence. Since Subhas Bose was also a strong critic of the Government of India Act, and had decided to contest the election for Congress presidentship, Subhas solicited the support of the socialists. At that time there was a division in the socialist ranks. Men like Dr. Ram Manohar Lohia were sceptical. They felt it was only under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi that a mass struggle could be launched. "We should not pursue any policy that would divide the Congress." At the same time Dr. Lohia felt that the socialists and communists should try to influence the policies of the Congress and try to make them more radical. Subhas Babu won the presidential election but Mahatma Gandhi treated it as a vote of no confidence in his leadership. At the AICC meeting in Tripuri a resolution was introduced by Gobind Ballabh Pant reiterating faith in the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi and directing the new president to appoint the working committee in consultation with Mahatma Gandhi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Mahatma Gandhi had then undertaken a fast at Rajkot and Subhas Babu had taken ill. We young people, I distinctly remember, were very angry with Mahatma Gandhi for using the Rajkot fast to create an opinion in the Congress Party against Subhas Bose. We expected our Congress Socialist leaders to back Subhas Bose to the hilt although we all felt the preserving of the unity of the Congress was also essential. After Tripuri, because JP had excellent relations both with Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Subhas Bose, at the Calcutta AICC meeting JP played the role of mediator and tried to bring about unity not only between Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Subhas Bose, but also between the conservative wing of the Congress and the radical wing, of which Subhas Bose and he himself were the acknowledged leaders. However, JP did not succeed and Subhas Bose and the Indian National Congress drifted apart. Subhas Babu organised anti-compromise conferences and attacked the official leadership of the Congress for which action was taken against Subhas Bose and he was expelled from the Congress Party. We were naturally very unhappy about these developments and I remember the heated discussions we had with the Congress Socialist Party leaders in Pune. However all these controversies were pushed to the background because of the outbreak of the World War II.

It was after the outbreak of the war that JP came to Pune. I remember that JP's main concern at that time was to organise mass resistance against the war effort. He continued to press Mahatma Gandhi and the Congress leaders not to cooperate with the war effort and hence launch a mass struggle against Britain's effort to drag India into the war. He went round the country making anti-war speeches and rousing the people against the British Government. The British Government took action and arrested Jayaprakash Narayan under the Defence of India Rules and sentenced Dr. Lohia to two years' imprisonment. In spite of the differences between Gandhiji and JP, gradually Jayaprakash was coming under the influence of Mahatmaji. But it was not a one way relationship. After the war JP had several discussions with

If JP and Lohia had not drifted apart after the 1952 elections, I do feel they together would have been able to forge a really progressive and formidable alternative to the Indian National Congress.

Mahatma Gandhi and wrote him a letter on the eve of the Ramgarh Congress. Mahatma Gandhi responded in the columns of the Harijan and said that if the Socialists accepted the creed of non-violence, he would go along with them. In subsequent years, not only did Mahatma Gandhi influence socialist leaders like JP, but leaders like JP, Lohia and others also influenced the thinking of Mahatma Gandhi.

If you read Pyarelal's memoirs of that period—The Last Phase—this will become clear. During the 1942 movement JP made a daring escape from Hazaribagh jail with colleagues like Ram Nandan Misra and joined the ranks of the freedom fighters. At that time Achut Patwardhan, Aruna Asaf Ali, Dr. Ram Manohar Lohia, Sucheta Kripalani and others were operating under the name of the underground AICC and trying to widen the scope of the mass struggle. They stuck to the position of non-killing and non-injury. When JP came out, I remember that JP differed from these leaders and felt that only armed resistance could achieve the objectives. He organised squads which operated in Bihar. Nepal was used as a base of operations.

However, the British were able to arrest both JP and Dr. Lohia and gradually both the peaceful and the armed resistance collapsed except in areas like Satara where a parallel Government was set up. JP's thinking underwent a basic change during 1943-46 and when he came out of jail, he had renounced his faith in Marxism, although he continued to subscribe to the ideal of an egalitarian society. However, the Soviet experience and the role of the Communist Party in the 1942 movement alienated JP both from Marxism and from the Communist Party. He increasingly fell under Gandhiji's influence, especially after the assassination of Mahatma Gandhi. So JP came to accept Gandhiji's creed of non-violence.

JP was the founder of the Socialist movement. As the general secretary of the Party, it was he who organised the Party units. After the socialists left the Congress in 1948, JP played an outstanding role in making the Socialist Party a mass Party. He also prepared for the first general election held on the basis of adult franchise. The election results came as a shock not only to other Socialist leaders but also to JP who had played a large part in organising the Party. Although the Socialists polled more than 10 per cent of the popular votes, they won very few seats in the Lok Sabha and the State Assemblies. JP never reconciled himself to this result. Gradually he felt that electoral politics would not bring salvation to the country. More and more he began to explore the potentialities of the Gandhian method and came very close to Vinoba Bhave. Vinoba Bhave at that time launched his Bhoodan movement and JP enthusiastically joined him. Sometimes he went to the other extreme. From his early Marxism he swung to enthusiastic championing of the Sarvodaya cause. JP thought that Bhoodan and Sarvodaya would bring about a basic social transformation; it would solve the land problem, the agrarian problem and it would also bring about a basic change in the social order.

By 1954 JP had practically withdrawn from active participation in the socialist movement. In 1952, the Socialist Party and the KMPP had merged to form the Praja Socialist Party. After the formation of the Praja Socialist Party a discussion and dialogue had been held between Jawaharlal Nehru on the one hand and JP on the other. Jawaharlal had made vague suggestions about co-operation between the Indian National Congress and the PSP. He had not defined the scope of this co-operation, whether he meant co-operation at the governmental level or co-operation in non-governmental work. In the course of this dialogue JP formulated his 14-point programme and this became very controversial among the ranks of the PSP. Leaders like Dr. Lohia felt that the Congress Party enjoyed more than two-thirds majority in Parliament and there was no point in an opposition Party which didn't have a large representation in Parliament in offering co-operation to the ruling Party. These controversies also affected JP deeply, and it strengthened his resolve to retire from Party politics.

I remember Dr. Lohia was very unhappy about JP's drift into Sarvodaya. In 1954 he wrote a very moving letter to JP. In fact, Dr. Lohia was prophetic as he wrote: "Only you can move the country, provided you do not vacillate." Discussions were held subsequently between JP, Dr. Lohia and several of us. Till his death, Dr. Lohia made several efforts to persuade JP to return to active politics. By active politics, Dr. Lohia of course did not mean power politics because both Dr Lohia and JP had never been after power. They have been mass leaders and revolutionaries whose goal was not to win power somehow but to bring about a basic change in the social system. Both of them felt a deep affinity for young people. I have not come across any other

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

JP felt a deep affinity for young people. He encouraged them and put them to the fore. That is why when the Nav Nirman movement broke out in Gujarat and the Bihar students started a movement they naturally turned to JP for guidance and leadership.

leaders who have shown such sympathy for younger people. JP encouraged several young people to play an active part in politics. In fact he pushed them to the fore. I am myself a reserved type and I am not pushy by nature but JP reposed great confidence in young people. In 1947, one day S. M. Joshi received a telegram from JP saying that he had chosen a young man of 25 to represent the Indian socialists at the International Socialist Congress. When JP was general secretary of the Party after he left the Congress, he not only forced me to become secretary of the foreign relations department with Dr Lohia as chairman but also made me a joint-secretary of the Party. This affection for young people was a distinctive feature of JP's life. That is why when the Nav Nirman movement broke out in Gujarat and (when) the Bihar students also started a movement they naturally turned to JP for guidance, for leadership.

BETWEEN 1954 and 1971 JP played an active part in the Sarvodaya movement but gradually he began to realise that the Bhoodan movement or the Sarvodaya movement was not the answer for the country's needs. He felt that Vinoba's movement was a status quoist movement, leaned heavily on the ruling classes and powers that be, and that Sarvodaya in its existing form could not become a potent instrument for change. In 1969 the Congress Party split, and Mrs Gandhi established her ascendancy both in the Government and in the new Congress and the drift towards authoritarianism began. Between 1969 and 1971, Mrs Gandhi introduced a number of radical measures like bank nationalisation and abolition of the Privy Purses. But soon we had begun to have doubts whether she did it out of conviction or whether she did it to whip up mass support for her authoritarian type of functioning. The CPI held a contrary view and they cooperated with Mrs Gandhi during this period, but the socialists and even the CPI(M) came to the conclusion in 1969-70 that Mrs Gandhi's radicalism was a gimmick, that all she was interested in was establishing her dynastic rule in this country.

I used to meet JP from time to time and exchange ideas. What JP did subsequently, I know, was not a sudden development but a gradual evolution of his thinking. Some leaders lay great store by consistency; but really great leaders are not consistent as far as details or tactics or secondary things are concerned. JP travelled from Marxism to Sarvodaya and back to the leadership of the struggle for democracy, struggle against the Emergency, struggle for civil liberties. Throughout this period he was inconsistent as far as secondary things were concerned, as far as the details or the tactics employed were concerned. But I make bold to assert that as far as adherences to fundamental principles were concerned, JP had been consistent throughout. JP accepted Marxism because he was totally against foreign rule, he was against the iniquitous social order and he wanted to establish a society based on social and economic justice. As far as these principles were concerned JP had been absolutely consistent. JP was a great believer in national independence as well as in the cause of suffering humanity.

That is why he was moved by the sufferings of the common people in Bangladesh when that country suffered under Yahya's military dictatorship and I persuaded JP to come out of his Sarvodaya shell and take the lead in organising world opinion in favour of Bangladesh's liberation. JP not only undertook a world tour in support of the cause of Bangladesh's liberation, he also organised an important international conference in Delhi. JP's effort played a big part in persuading liberal, progressive, democratic socialist world opinion to support the cause of Bangladesh. JP was also a great believer in national unity and he fervently held the belief that only Mahatma Gandhi's belief in communal harmony and secularism could hold the country together. It was because of his belief in national unity and the cause of secularism, that he supported Sheikh Abdullah in his efforts to make use of his services to bring about the integration of Kashmir with the rest of India. He supported the Sheikh's cause because he believed that as Kashmir was a part of India, India would remain a non-denominational secular State.

He also championed the cause of the Naga people and played a big role in organising a peace mission. JP was aware that Nagaland was a Christian majority area. JP was aware that the tribal people were fiercely independent and he wanted the people of Nagaland to enjoy their freedom as part of the Indian Union. I remember during the communal holocaust in Bihar of 1946 following the riots in Calcutta and Noakhali, JP and Badshah Khan (Khan Abdul Gaffar Khan) risked their own lives in order to reestablish communal peace in Bihar. JP continued to work for communal harmony — during the last days of Mahatma Gandhi and thereafter. Those who hold Jayaprakashji in great esteem must remember that Jayaprakashji was an ardent supporter of the ideals of communal harmony and secularism. To talk of loyalty for JP and to work against communal harmony — these two things cannot go together.

But to revert to the point that I was making, after 1971 JP felt increasingly concerned over two problems — the country's growing drift towards authoritarianism and the failure of the Sarvodaya method to solve the agrarian problem or bring about a revolutionary change in the country's social structure. He was seeking a way out and while he continued to shun power, he felt that he could not keep away from the political structure. That is the reason why he extended his sympathy and support to the Gujarat Nav Nirman agitation and advised students to leave their colleges and universities to devote themselves at least for one year to constructive work. "Go to the villages and organise the people." Then in his own State of Bihar, a struggle broke out and the Bihar Government tried to suppress it. JP finally came out of his shell, so to say, to lead the Bihar movement. Although the Congress Government rapidly lost public support, it was kept in office by applying force. The whole power of the State, the power of the Central Government besides the para-military forces like the Central Reserve Police and the Border Security Force, Industrial Security Force and so on were diverted to Bihar and ordered to suppress the agitation.

At that point of time I remember I had an interesting meeting with him in Allahabad. I asked him a direct question — If he succeeds in getting the Bihar Assembly dissolved and a fresh election was ordered, what would be his role in the ensuing electoral struggle? To that he said : "I cannot keep out because the Assembly would be dissolved because of my insistence, because of my movement. It would be my duty to provide an alternative Government." I said if you are going to take part in the electoral battle, what would be the instrument, who would be the candidates, how would they be selected? Then he said: "We shall have to bring the Opposition Parties together. But the candidates must be sponsored by the popular committees." They may be candidates belonging to the Opposition Parties but they must win the approval of the people's committees which he proposed to set up. I said if your candidates win a majority, will you form a Government? He said yes. I said a Government will imply formation of a United Legislative Party. He said yes, it will have to be done, there will have to be a common programme, there will have to be discipline. Then I asked him that means you are going to form a Party. JP was taken aback and he told me

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

"you are asking me too many questions. I'll answer them. I'll cross the bridge when I come to it." I remember this conversation because after that JP decided to extend the Bihar movement to other areas and organised a convention in Delhi in 1974 and a national committee for peoples' struggle was formed. Out of these discussions came the idea of a great march on Parliament. A drafting committee was set up to formulate the demands and I remember one discussion where I raised th question of Emergency, the Bangladesh Emergency. I said Mrs Gandhi had not withdrawn her that Emergency as yet and it was very likely that she would use the Emergency powers, clamp down authoritarian rule so we must include the demand for the revoking of the Emergency in our charter of demands, and this demand was finally included. The march was a big success and thereafter, JP took an active part in the discussions centering around Opposition unity. Then came the dissolution of the Gujarat Assembly and the Gujarat election and JP persuaded the Opposition Parties to come together and the Janata Morcha was formed. JP actively campaigned for this. All these developments finally led to the decision to bring about Opposition unity. As far as we people were concerned we were not prepared to go beyond a federal Party; in fact, some of the socialists were not even prepared to have a federal Party. They were not prepared to go beyond a United Front. They wanted to preserve their identity.

It was Chaudhury Charan Singh, fully backed by Jayaprakash Narayan, who continued to insist on the formation of a united Party. However the other Parties were not prepared to accept this and after the Allahabad judgments and the Gujarat elections a joint meeting of the National Executive of the four Opposition Parties was held in Delhi. JP attended that meeting and it was at this meeting that a decision was taken to start a civil disobedience campaign. Mrs Gandhi made this her pretext for her massive attack against democracy and popular freedom. JP and others were arrested at midnight and packed off to prisons. Large scale arrests were made and for several months we lost all contact with JP.

JP travelled from Marxism to Sarvodaya and back to the leadership of the struggle for democracy. He was inconsistent as far as secondary things were concerned but as far as fundamental principles were concerned he was consistent throughout.

AS soon as elections to the Lok Sabha were announced on January 18, JP took the lead in organising the electoral struggle and the true sign of greatness is that great men always simplify complex situations into simple slogans. Lenin talked of peace and land to the peasants, and bought about a revolution in Czarist Russia. Similarly JP simplified the issue and said that the issue was democracy versus dictatorship. This slogan so powerfully influenced the people, who had suffered during the Emergency months that they splendidly rallied round the banner of the Janata Party and its allies and a crushing defeat was inflicted on Mrs Gandhi.

JP came to Delhi and administered an oath to the newly elected members of the Janata Party at Rajghat. It is well to remember what oath was administered by JP. JP asked us to work for a fundamental transformation of political, economic and social relations. He wanted us to defend popular liberties. He wanted us to work for the upliftment of the lowly and the oppressed. In the 27 months that the Janata Party was in power did we fulfil the pledge that we took at Rajghat? Any honest person will have to admit that the Janata Party did not carry out the pledge which it had taken at Rajghat.

I was saying that any honest person will have to admit that we have badly let down the people. Everybody knows that JP was extremely unhappy about the performance of the Government, but many times he said that since he was tied down to this dialysis machine and could not play an active part he would not like to say much about what was happening in the country. Attempts were made by some people to exploit his name or to involve him in controversies which in the perspecetive of history have no significance whatsover. I used to have long discussions with him but I always desisted from using his name in current controversies.

Apart from Mahatma Gandhi whom I never knew intimately at the personal level, the two leaders who profoundly influenced my thinking and my life are Jayaprakash Narayan and Dr Lohia. I always feel that if the two of them had not drifted apart after the 1952 elections, if JP had not left the socialist movement, if he had not drifted into Sarvodaya, if he had continued to organise the socialist movement and the mass organisation and the organisation of youth and women, scheduled castes, scheduled tribes,I do feel JP and Lohia together would have been able to forge a really progressive and formidable alternative to the Indian National Congress.

I am acutely aware that Dr Lohia's tactical line of electoral adjustments among non-Congress Parties or JP's policy of uniting the Opposition Parties — disparate Opposition Parties with their conflicting ideologies — these tactics have arisen out of a fundamental weakness. The absence of a strong socialist movement backed by a powerful organisation of the peasants, industrial workers, agricultural labourers, students and youth.

I am not saying that JP should have taken an active role in power politics. Neither Dr Lohia nor JP, as I said at the very outset, were after power. But one question needs to be squarely faced. What is the role of State power in social transformation? What is the role of Raj Shakti and Lok Shakti ? Ultimately the use of State power is an important ingredient in bringing about a social revolution. I know that there is great danger of this State power, of this coercive power, becoming an unfettered tyranny. That danger has always been there in all revolutionary changes. The problem to my mind was how to use State power for bringing about fundamental social changes and at the same time tame that State power in the interests of the people through organisations of popular will or popular strength.

I don't know what the solution is. to this problem. If JP had not been paralysed by ill health, maybe he would have been able to organise the popular will and to take the Janata Government and the State power and would have compelled it to implement the promises made in the election manifesto. Maybe I am only dreaming. But if I have learnt anything from JP and from Dr Lohia and Mahatma Gandhi, it is this lesson that you cannot be indifferent to the question of State power. To run away from this question would be tantamount to escapism. At the same time by having recourse to Parliament, parliamentary methods, and electoral majorities and formation of governments, we are not going to achieve much. After all, people have to be organised. Their desires and aspirations have to be articulated. And pressure of popular opinion has to be generated to force the weilders of power to implement their promises. This is an unfinished task that JP has left behind. And those of us who agree with this fundamental proposition have to accept the challenge.

We are all small men confronted with great problems. With humility and faith in the ideals which JP held dear to his heart we should try to contribute our mite in the necessary task of bringing about social transformation in this country. For more than 3,000 years large numbers of our people have been denied even the basic rights. More than 40 per cent of our population continues to live below the poverty line. Unless we create a new social order, where the common people would occupy the centre of the stage, we cannot be said to have paid a real tribute to JP. I feel that all of us should re-dedicate our selves to the ideals of Jayaprakash Narayan which were also the ideals of Mahatma Gandhi, the ideals of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Netaji Subhas Chandra Bose. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

JP the Revolutionary

His thoughts live on

By BHOLA CHATTERJI

THE curtain has been rung down on the century's most controversial Indian who for nearly five decades occupied a unique place in the life of the country. No Indian in the post-Independence era, with the obvious exceptions of Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi and Jawaharlal Nehru, came anywhere near to stirring the feelings of the people as Jayaprakash Narayan did. But after the homages and the tributes are over and myth and reality start their interplay with the memory of his life, the crucial assessment will have to follow. But what do we make of him? Whatever may be the final verdict of history — one may not agree with his ideas, dialectically one may make mincemeat of his concept of the total revolution, one might even be tempted to conclude that his thoughts and ideas were woolly and he was a muddle-headed theoriser who often deserted what he had earlier considered the only path that could lead to the promised land of peace, progress and prosperity — that would not detract from the fact that through his intensely lived and eventful political life, this man had consistently been in search of an idea that might trace a new path for the country.

First, how did the man himself look at the result of his life's work? When in his last days he contemplated the impending failure of his most cherished creation — the Janata Party — was he at peace with himself? He told me in July 1978, "Well, I don't claim to be entirely at peace with myself. In a personal sense, I am. But when I look at what is happening around me I feel very unhappy, then I am surely not at peace with myself. I would like to do something about what I think is going wrong, but, unfortunately, partly because of my illness and partly because of other limitations I am unable to do very much. That adds to my dissatisfaction with myself and the situation that obtains over which I can't have complete control."

Was this the same man who had only the other day, so to speak, raised the nation from the dead? Quite so, said the Janata Party president, Chandrashekhar, when I asked him what his assessment was of Jayaprakash's role in rescuing India from authoritarianism. "Bhola, you know my opinion about Jayaprakash Narayan. His role in saving democracy in this country was assessed by me as early as in 1974. It was for the first time after 1947, if I may say so, after Mahatma Gandhi, Jayaprakash was the only person who enthused the masses to assert certain values in our public life. At that time the prestige of our parliamentary institutions, our democratic institutions were slowly being eroded and Jayaprakash tried to draw the attention of the nation to that problem. Corruption in high places, favouritism, nepotism, in fighting for power — these were some of the maladies eating into the very vitals of our democracy. Jayaprakash started his movement on these issues.

"I feel that if JP had not started the movement at that time perhaps we would have been caught in the trap of authoritarianism. Though I was in the Congress, I tried my best to save the country and the Congress from being driven to the wall. I have no hesitation in admitting, however, that it was of little avail. Most of the time it was just a cry in the wilderness. But when JP took the lead in the movement people were enthused, they were involved.

"No sooner had we come out of jail than we saw what JP had done during 1974 and 1975 did not go to waste. People remembered all that was responsible for the demoralization in the nation; and they also remembered the sacrifice JP had made. I think that the Janata Party could win the elections only because JP had sown the seeds of courage and determination among the people. That contribution cannot be forgotten. Mahatma Gandhi gave us freedom, JP gave us the will to survive as a democratic nation."

In reply to my question during the same interview in July, 1979 as to what he thought of the accusation that he had often gone off at a tangent, Jayaprakash said: "Going off at a tangent would suggest that doing something which is completely different from what one had been doing before or trying to achieve. In my case it is not going off at a tangent but making various kinds of experiments. When one did not succeed I tried to find something better which could answer the needs of the situation. Because of frequent breaks in the journey due to either my health or imprisonment or something else there has not been a continuous thread. But I have never felt that I am going off at a tangent. I am pursuing something which is a fixed and worthwhile objective; and if one path to it ends up nowhere, then another path has to be found". This evidently overlooked the point that a claim could not be substituted for logical exposition. It would therefore be necessary to go into his long and complex political life to find a satisfactory answer.

THE concept of democratic socialism, unlike communism, appeared rather late on the Indian political scene. Consequent upon the failure of the 1932 civil disobedience movement, a sizable section of Congressmen looked askance at Gandhi's leadership, convinced that he had left them in the lurch. If some Congressmen were eager for some form of constitutional politics, some others, numerically small though, emphasised the need for a left of centre orientation of the freedom struggle. Foremost among them were Yusuf Meherally, Rammanohar Lohia, Achyut Patwardhan, Asoka Mehta and S. M. Joshi, and Narendra Deva and Jayaprakash, the Indian socialist movement's two confirmed Marxists. In a manner of speaking, Nasik Road, Central Prison, where they had been lodged after their arrest for participation in the civil disobedience movement, was the birth-place of the Congress Socialist Party (CSP). In this Jayaprakash acted the part of a midwife. The CSP was formally established as a group within the Congress in 1934 with Jayaprakash as its secretary.

It is during his stay in the USA that JP took to communism. The Marxist Jayaprakash was "persuaded" by M. N. Roy's "writings of those days ... to believe that Gandhiji was against the social revolution and would at a moment of crisis hasten to uphold the system of exploitation and inequality". On his return to India in November 1929 Jayaprakash met Jawaharlal Nehru at Sabarmati Ashram. Common interests formed a bond between the two men and Nehru invited him to join the AICC (All India Congress Committee) Labour Research Department as its secretary. He accepted the offer. For two months in 1930 he also worked as private secertary to G. D. Birla, the Marwari businessman who had shot into prominence as one of Gandhi's hosts. Two things that marked him out were, on the one hand, his affectionate relationship with Nehru and dislike of Gandhi and, on the other, complete disillusionment with the Moscow-oriented communist movement, in this case the Communist Party of India (CPI).

He gave a wide berth to the CPI as it dissociated itself from the mainstream of the nationalist struggle. His argument was that "the communists in India were only following, of course, the policy laid down by the Third Communist International which by then had come completely under the leadership of Stalin. The patently mistaken policy that the Comintern had been following since 1928 and which had resulted in the division of the labour and the socialist movements throughout the world and in the isolation of the communists from the national movements in all the colonial countries, appeared to me, as indeed it was later acknowledged to be, contrary to Marxist theory generally and specifically to the famous colonial policy enunciated by Lenin. "My differences with the CPI thus marked the beginning of my ideological alienation from

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Dulux's international stamp of quality works wonders at your address

Join home-makers around the world who specify Dulux

It makes sense.

Because Dulux's international reputation is backed by actual laboratory tests which prove that it is the best paint for your home.

That's because it gives you greater economy right from the start by covering more square metres per litre. When Dulux's coverage was tested against that of three other brands, Dulux was the clear winner : covering the same surface area as the others —but with much less paint.

Dulux means better value in the long run too, by standing up to more wear and tear than other paints. This was proved when Dulux's resistance to abrasion was tested against that of other paints. The surface painted with Dulux stood up to much more rough treatment, keeping its fine finish when the surfaces painted with the other brands had begun to chip and peel.

No wonder Dulux is at home here and in so many countries around the world. So next time you paint your home—specify Dulux.

Dulux paints. Now and for years ahead

'DULUX'—made and marketed in India by The Alkali and Chemical Corporation of India Limited.

The ICI roundel and 'Dulux' are registered trade marks of Imperial Chemical Industries, Ltd., London. Licensed users : The Alkali and Chemical Corporation of India Limited.

OBM—63148

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Soviet Russia itself, which to me was till then the paragon and exemplar of all communist virtues ..... I naturally kept away from the CPI and joined the ranks of the soldiers of freedom".

It was generally recognised at that time that Jayaprakash was the moving spirit behind the Party's emblazoning "Marxism" on its banner. Carried away as he was by his idealistic faith in Marxism, he failed to take cognisance of the basic contradictions in his approach to the question either of unity with the CPI or of relations with the Congress. Elaborating the policy and programme the CSP should adhere to, Jayaprakash said: "The immediate task is to develop the national movement into a real anti-imperialist movement aiming at freedom from the foreign power and the native system of exploitation. For that it is necessary to wean the anti-imperialist elements in the Congress away from its bourgeois leadership and to bring them under the leadership of revolutionary socialism ... The party's own programme must be Marxist, otherwise it will fail to fulfil its task and leadership. Marxism alone can guide the anti-imperialist forces to their ultimate destiny. Party members must, therefore, fully understand the technique of revolution, the theory and practice of class struggle, the nature of the State and processes leading to socialist society."

Since Subhas Chandra Bose and Jawaharlal Nehru were at that time generally looked upon as the most devoted champions of "leftism" in the Congress, an appraisal of their attitude toward the socialists would be in order here. Not long after the formation of the CSP Subhas Bose stated that "though the Congress Socialist Party has, in some respects, been barking back to the ideas and shibboleths that were popular forty or fifty years ago, it does stand for a radical tendency in the nationalist movement and the formation of such a party is a very hopeful feature of the times".

This was not greatly comforting to the socialists, nor did they have reason to appreciate Subhas's comments on the observation Nehru had made on December 18, 1933: "I do believe that fundamentally the choice before the world today is one between some form of communism and some form of fascism, and am all for the former, that is communism." This prompted Subhas to say that "the view ... is ... fundamentally wrong. Unless we are at the end of the process of evolution or unless we deny evolution altogether, there is no reason to hold that our choice is restricted to two alternatives Considering everyhing, one is inclined to hold that the next phase in world-history will produce a synthesis between communism and fascism. And will it be a surprise if that synthesis is produced in India?"

Jayaprakash's attitude toward Gandhi changed distinctly well before the Gandhi-Subhas conflict came to a head. The defence of his neutral stand on the Gandhi-Subhas dispute at the Tripuri Congress was that since "a grave situation has arisen" threatening Congress unity, "no effort should be spared to maintain that unity". And he assured "Mahatma Gandhi of the fullest support of the Party in maintaining this unity". Refuting the accusation that the CSP had surrendered to Gandhi, Jayaprakash said that "the effective leadership of the Congress is in the hands of Gandhiji ... If a national struggle as opposed to a sectional, factional or partial, can be launched by Mahatma Gandhi alone, it is suicidal to fight him. It is necessary to lend him our fullest support". In this it would be hard to detect even a faint trace of the acerbic anti-Gandhi idiom that until recently had been an inseparable item of Jayaprakash's ideological baggage. Yesterday's crusading "Marxist" had already come quite close to someone he once called "a bourgeois reformist". The change in his thinking could be traced to a combination of factors — his growing disenchantment with Marxism; opposition from his non-Marxist colleagues in the Party; Nehru's influence and, last but not the least, Prabhavati, who was both a friend of Nehru's wife Kamala and a devout Gandhian.

If the socialist movement spent the pre-Independence years in persistent endeavours to get itself simultaneously accepted as a Marxist critic of the Communist Party and a radical challenge to the Congress, its efforts since Independence were to project itself both as the Party of socialism with an Indian face and as a viable alternative to the Congress. Jayaprakash had already started casting himself in the Gandhian mould. Notwithstanding his reference to Marxism, he made it clear at the 1949 Patna conference of the Party that "when I talk about the principles Gandhiji stood for, his teaching and practice and the lessons these have for the socialist movement, I am quite serious". He did not consider this incompatible with his eagerness to render all assistance, from cladestine arms procurement to collection of money, to the Party-sponsored anti-Razakar armed resistance movement in the then Nizam's Hyderabad. He also gave unreserved support, in terms of weapons as well as money, to the Nepali Congress-led 1950-51 armed struggle against Rana autocracy. And he defended this in the name of Gandhi.

By the time the Socialst Party and the Kisan Mazdoor Praja Party (KMPP) merged, in 1953 to form the Praja Socialist Party (PSP) (a section of the Subhasist Forward Bloc joined it subsequently) sharp differences of opinion between Jayaprakash and Lohia had surfaced. They differed on a wide range of issues — the Party's ideological foundation, relation with Vinoba Bhave's Bhoodan movement (with which Jayaprakash had already identified himself) and the attitude toward Nehru. If Jayaprakash brusquely dismissed Lohia's opposition to his talks with Nehru, in early 1953, in order to explore the possibilities of Congress-PSP cooperation at both Party and Government levels, he also emphasised that Vinoba had picked up the threads where Gandhi had left them. The announcement of his "final break with Marxism" in 1952 was soon followed by his decision "to give up politics" in late 1953. Of course he retained his formal membership of the PSP until the intra Party conflict split it down the middle, compelling Lohia to establish his own Socialist Party in early January 1956.

Jayaprakash plunged himself into the Bhoodan-Sarvodaya movement, being convinced that "the philosophy of Bhoodan ... the noblest of ideas ... is the first step toward a total revolution — social, political and economic". He had also come to believe that "the Party system ... was seeking to reduce the people to the position of sheep ... the Parties ... rule in the name of the people and create the illusion of democracy and self-government ... For my part, it is not the Party system that is the main culprit, but parliamentary democracy itself, which gives rise to it".

The emphasis was on Lokaneeti (politics of the people) as opposed to Rajaneeti (politics of Party and power), on Lokashakti (people's power) as distinct from Rajashakti (State power). In all this the guiding spirit was Gandhi who, in the words of Jayaprakash, "did not take power into his own hands, which was a very extraordinary thing for a leader to do. After every successful revolution, the leader takes power into his hands. Washington became the first US President, Lenin became the first Prime Minister of Soviet Russia. But Gandhiji neither became the first President nor the first Prime Minister of Free India. Why? Because he was thinking of grassroots democracy, of going to the people and showing them how to run their affairs themselves".

BETWEEN then and June 25, 1975 some 30 years had rolled by. On the following morning India woke up to be told by Mrs Gandhi that democracy had been put in the deep-freeze in order to foil "an attempt by Fascist forces to subvert the democratic system". And she had no use for euphemism when it came to identifying the source that gave sap to the evil forces — Jayaprakash Narayan. That doubtless was one of life's great ironies.

The forces of authoritarianism had seemingly been made to bite the dust and the Janata Party was installed in office with the 82-year-old Morarji Desai as Prime Minister, thanks once again to Jayaprakash. We can depend on him to testify to this. In his own words, "I helped them to come to power because I had hoped they would yet write a new chapter of India's history". But Morarji Desai did not particularly care for JP. Prime Minister Desai not only took umbrage at Jayaprakash's criticism of the Government, he also insisted on rubbing the point in that it was his job to determine how the show should be managed.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

That was not all. Lest anyone should get ideas into his head Prime Minister Desai made it clearly understood, particularly when infighting had almost made the Janata Party a caricature of itself, that "Jayaprakash Narayan is not the arbiter in Party affairs". For that matter, Premier Desai emphasised, "Mr Narayan may tell many things, but that does not mean I am going to accept them". Maybe that was why Prime Minister Desai, in reply to my request last July for his assessment of Jayaprakash's role in rescuing India from authoritarianism said : "I do not think it is a task which I can perform. It is not fair to assess a living personality and measure it because it can lead to all kinds of interpretations which are never meant. I therefore refrain from doing it. And that's why I am sorry I can't give you any assessment about it beyond saying that he did perform a significant part in that movement. Beyond that I won't say anything." The conclusion may not be wide off the mark that Jayaprakash, who had been branded as a rebel by both the colonial and the indigenous rulers, had also become a thorn in the flesh of the men (one of the notable exceptions being the Janata Party president Chandrashekhar) whom he had lent a helping hand to climb up the ladder of power.

According to Jayaprakash, he "had always believed that Mrs Gandhi had no faith in democracy, that she was by inclination and conviction a dictator". If this is taken at its face value the question naturally would arise : What did he do to meet the situation?

Even as late as December 1973 Jayaprakash stated in the course of his inaugural address to the All India Radical Humanist Conference in Calcutta that "Party democracy, that is, democracy based on and manipulated by political Parties is a most unsatisfactory and defective system of democracy. The people, by and large, are fed up with all political parties and the present form and practice of democracy." Five months later he said, on June 5, 1974, that "the Bihar movement was no longer a students' movement restricted to the 12 original demands plus the few others that had been added since 18th March ... but that the movement's or struggle's ultimate aims were nothing less than total revolution." Before another five months passed he stated on November 5, 1974 that the Bihar movement was no longer "between the people of Bihar and the Gafoor Ministry but between the people of India and the Prime Minister." In between he had come to the conclusion that "if the (Bihar) movement had been confined to the Sarvodaya workers alone and its principle was to keep away all political Parties including the ruling Party, it would have been possible to keep them away. But, then, there would have been no people's movement." Raising the question, "is the involvement of the political Parties in a Bihar-type people's movement an unmixed evil?" he said : "My unhesitating answer is No. Its first result, too obvious to be argued is that it lends strength to the movement."

If Jayaprakash had reasons to believe that democracy had all along been an anathema to Indira Gandhi (an entry dated July 22, 1975 in his Prison Diary would confirm this), he also recorded (entry dated August 28, 1975) that "from all that she has been doing since 1971 at least, it appears that she is afraid of democracy because then she is not sure if she would remain in power." But why was he hesitant to speak out against Mrs Gandhi before 1974? First, he had not yet ruled out the possibility of achieving "a politics of consensus" that might facilitate certain radical socio-political changes without damaging the basic democratic structure. Also, he still believed that "whatever might be Mrs Gandhi's personal inclination, it would not be possible for her to become a dictator ... that the people would not allow it and she would have no courage to go ahead ... that the Congress Party ... would not let that happen." Then, although he realised that the Bhoodan-Sarvodaya movement, with which he had completely identified himself, was not the instrument that could serve his purpose. he had still to make up his mind to abandon it. Thirdly, he was in search of an instrument that could meet the challenge of the Indira regime. In the given context he settled on a course of limited struggle- compromise- concession- consolidation and the same process all over again until he was able to muster the "leadership and organization ... necessary to bring out of the revolutionary situation a revolutionary movement" which could "complete the revolution that Gandhiji's assassination had abruptly left unfinished," that is, the unfinished tasks of the bourgeois democratic revolution. And this was absolutely necessary (it might have been his argument) in order to realise the objective of "total revolution" — "revolution in every sphere and aspect of society" and thus pave the way for the establishment of "a casteless and classless" society.

Fourthly, there were his personal relations with the Nehru family. It is well known that he had enjoyed a special rapport with Nehru, even though he opposed the latter on many issues. As Jayaprakash put it some days after Indira Gandhi's meeting with him in August 1977, "I always regarded Panditji (Nehru) as my brother and he also treated me like that. My wife Prabhavati regarded Kamala Nehru as her closest friend. We always treated Mrs Indira Gandhi as our daughter and that relationship exists even now" Indeed it was inconceivable that Prabhavati would be happy to see Jayaprakash and Kamala's only daughter Indira locked together in a mortal combat.

Be that as it may, it did not take him long to realise that the Janata Party with which he had identified himself was not the instrument that could be depended upon to realise even a minimum of the much needed basic changes in society, not to speak of the concept of "total revolution". Much to his regret, he found out that it was not commitment to an ideology but a combination of other factors, such as personal prejudices, caste and personality equations, that determined the Janata Government's approach to men and events. And he did not elect to be silent about it.

It is certainly not an easy job to knit the various threads of JP's life into a picture that can shine in all its hues and colours. But the foundation of his life was his sincerity; he meant it when he said that "a fire has been continuously burning in my heart. I have always felt a great urge to change the present society which is based on injustice and exploitation. We will have to build up a new society where there would be equality and fullest freedom."

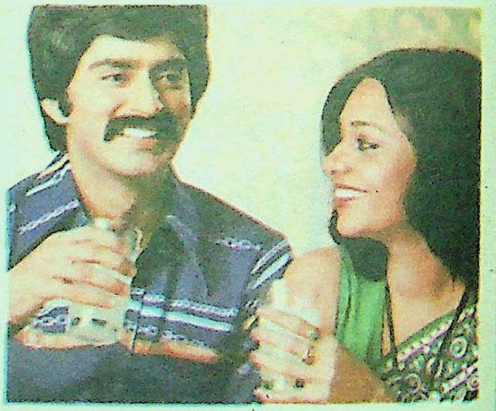
The hard-core of his philosophy remained constant — to create a society where man would be the measure of everything, where the right to dissent and to protest, if necessary to raise the standard of revolt against oppression and injustice would not send a man to jail. He was not an escapist, whatever else he might have been. If he stayed away from Rajashakti it was because he realised early enough the limitations of State power. However, he was aware that even Gandhi's "own high authority", as Louis Fischer succinctly put it, "was no match for the power of a Government born of his efforts and whose members touched his feet in obeisance". That is why his emphasis was on building up mass power which alone could compel State power to act in the right direction. He was convinced that the build-up and exercise of mass power became necessary whether for abolishing laws and institutions that would refuse to respond to the legitimate grievances of the people, for changing what was felt to be an immoral law (even if that law enjoyed the authorities' sanction), or for implementing declared programmes of the Government. More important, mass power was necessary to initiate basic changes in society. This could not be accomplished alone on the basis of politics of Party and power. For this politics of the people would have to be cultivated. He firmly believed that "the people cannot move unless there is a catalytic agent and this catalytic agent is the selfless servant who goes to the people, not for any reward or return not with the idea that the people will vote for him, but to create revolution in the minds and hearts of the people". That was precisely what he kept on doing even as his life was fast ebbing away. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust. Delhi and eGangotri

It's time for an extra twist of taste

A time to taste – *lemon and lime like it's never been. More tangy, more punchy, more everything.*



A time to 'freshen' – *with tongue-tingling lemon and *lime Fresh and icy cold.

A time to switch to Campa – *lemon and lime Any time from nine to nine – or before and after. Today – or now.*

*Artificial flavour

It's Campa time with the flavour of lemon* and lime*

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Prayagraj Collection

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CHRYSAL

Wonderful that anything so useful can look so good!

A touch of glamour. A look of class. In a choice of sets and designs to suit your taste.

Chrysal is the name for beauty and utility in your home. We call it beautility ware. And it comes in a choice of combinations—you can proudly own one or more sets and keep building up your collection. Because once you own a set, you'll want to buy more.

Chrysal is styled with several coats of decorative inks to keep it looking good as new for years.

Chrysal is made from material specially selected for optimum thickness and temper so that each container, from the smallest to the largest, is built stronger to last longer.

Chrysal containers come in sizes to suit your needs : 1 kg, 2 kg, 5 kg and 10 kg. In addition, there are smart little spice cans, plus an attractive refreshment tray and cork-backed table mats to match.

Chrysal sets come complete with matching shelf-stickers and self-adhesive labels for your containers.

Chrysal is white-coated inside and topped with many layers of FDA approved, scratch-resistant lacquer so that it stays rustproof— and your food stays fresh.

Chrysal offers you "full satisfaction or your money back" —that's how sure we are of its performance in your home.

Chrysal beautility for your home from Metal Box.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

JP the politician

Unlike so many others he showed no appetite for power

By RANAJIT ROY

JAYAPRAKASH NARAYAN devoted nearly 50 of his 77 years to the service of the nation and endeavoured to promote the cause of the poor and the downtrodden. The first 18 of these 50 years he spent in the Congress, fighting for Independence and at the same time trying to turn it into a Party for socialist transformation of the country. During the last five years of his life he was the most powerful enemy of the Congress, as led by Indira Gandhi. He succeeded in bringing down her dictatorial and cruel regime, thus making the Congress lose the monopoly of power it had enjoyed since Independence. This was the most significant achievement of his long political career.

The instrument he forged for this was the Janata Party. Whether as a Congressman or as a Congress socialist or, after Independence, as a plain Socialist outside the Congress, he never made a mark as a Party organiser. Those were his younger days, and he was physically fit to do hard work and move up and down the country for the cause he espoused. If he failed to make of the Socialist Party and, later, the Praja Socialist Party, powerful political organisations in those days, it stands to reason that, even if his health had not failed him, he would not have been able to hammer out of the Janata's five disparate constituents a solidly united Party working for a set goal.

Because of grave illness, he could not even make the attempt. He was ailing when he was arrested by Indira Gandhi in June 1975 even before the country had known that she had imposed on the country a second Emergency on top of the one that had been in force since December 1971. In detention his health broke down completely. He developed kidney trouble from which he never recovered and which ultimately caused his death. Even though seriously ill, he exerted himself and was able to bring the five Janata constituents on a platform to give fight to the Congress in 1977. His health deteriorated further. Over a long period he hovered between life and death. In March this year the rumour spread that he was dead. Parliament made a fool of itself by passing a condolence resolution on the basis of this rumour.

There were conflicts within the Janata even when the Party was formally inaugurated at Mahatma Gandhi's samadhi in 1977. These flared up publicly in June 1978 but were partially patched up. The end of the Janata, as JP had forged it, came in July 79. The political edifice he had built in his old age crashed, and this at a time when Indira Gandhi was again on the scene, bidding for a return to power. What could be greater mortification for him than that a section of the Janata, out to capture power, colluded with her to break the Party and its Government? His death may have been hastened by this turn of events.

JP himself had a wholesome dislike for office and parliamentary life. He never chose to become a legislator or a Minister. In this he was so different from the general run of Congressmen and leaders and, as events later showed, many of his one-time Socialist colleagues and followers. By 1936, when he was 34, he had acquired such fame as a political worker that Jawaharlal Nehru included him in his working committee. The year before the British Parliament had passed the Government of India Act, providing for provincial autonomy. In 1937 the Congress formed Governments in several provinces. If JP had so desired, he could easily have become a legislator and a Minister in Bihar or UP. He not only kept himself aloof from legislatures and Ministries, but also clashed with Mahatma Gandhi and Nehru on the issue of acceptance of office. In the years after the first general election, Nehru tried to draft him into his Government, but JP spurned his offers. He proposed a 14-point programme which Nehru was not in a position to accept. Even if the programme had been accepted, it is doubtful if JP would have joined the Government.

JP was by then under the pressure of the Bhoodan movement which Vinoba Bhave, the 'nakal Gandhi', had begun in Telengana, and the Congress had begun beating Bhave's drum. The Socialists, JP included, had exaggerated ideas of their hold on the people, especially in UP and Bihar. They believed that they were a match for the Congress. The General Election of 1952 shattered their illusion. In the Lok Sabha election the Socialists put up 295 candidates among whom no more than 12 won. Its future mate, the KMPP, won even less—10 seats. On the other hand, the Congress got no fewer than 363 seats. Even the Communists, then hated by nationalist opinion because of their opposition to the Quit India movement of 1942 and their collaboration with the British during the war after Hitler's invasion of the Soviet Union, did better. With 70 candidates in the field, they won 27 seats, five more than the combined strength of the Socialist Party and the KMPP. In the assemblies also, even in Bihar and UP, these two Parties fared very poorly. Neither the Socialist Party nor the KMPP ever got over this shock, not even after jointly forming the PSP.

NEHRU, more than any other senior Congress leader, had before Independence propagated the need for land reforms. In power he was face to face with the truth that his Party itself was the biggest stumbling block to these reforms. He did not fight it out with his reactionary opponents in this vital sphere, as in so many other fields, but yielded to them. The reforms were stalled. In the late Sixties, a Planning Commission team recorded that "lack of political will" stood in the way of these reforms. This lack of will was a legacy of Nehru's days. About the time of Independence the Communists began a movement to force land reforms which caught the imagination of the poor and the landless on a wide scale in Telengana in Andhra. Landlords, backed by governmental power, marshalled their forces to frustrate this movement. Clashes occurred at many places. In the name of restoration of law and order the Government let loose a reign of terror on the Communists and people hungry for land. The movement was crushed.

At this stage the old frame of Vinoba Bhave with his slogan of bhoodan (gift of land) appeared on the scene. Since the Congress would not carry out the promised reforms, an illusion had to be created that the avaricious landlords could be made to undergo a change of heart and give land to those who did not have it. JP, shocked by the failure of his Party in the General Election, now began seeing in bhoodan the "revolution beautiful." By 1954 he had fallen so much under the spell of the bhoodan movement that he decided to devote himself entirely to it and quit politics altogether. In course of time, bhoodan spawned gramdan, shramdan, and jivandan. It is now beyond dispute that the bhoodan movement was a colossal failure. It was indeed a hoax perpetrated on the country.

There came a time when Bhave and JP quarrelled, and quarrelled publicly. The quarrel took the shape of Bhave's opposition to JP's frequent forays into politics. JP, essentially a political being, could not ignore the effect of political activities of the conventional Parties, particularly of the Congress under Indira Gandhi.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

By 1974, the breach between JP and Bhave over the former's anti-Government agitation in Gujarat and Bihar became unbridgeable. JP was back in politics with a vengeance against Indira Gandhi and the Congress while Bhave, sitting in the comfortable Paunar Ashram, continued to back obscurantist causes. Bhave is now propping up Indira Gandhi and all she stands for. JP's two decades with Bhave were a total waste. Indeed, the objective outcome of bhoodan was reactionary. It enabled the Congress, as a Government, to ignore responsibility for honouring its promise in so vital a sphere. More, it gave the Congress a weapon with which to assail the radical forces which continued to agitate and mobilise the masses for land reforms.

JP was drawn to Marxism while he was a student in the United States, but he never became a full-fledged communist himself. Back in India in 1929, he joined the Congress as secretary to its labour research department at Jawaharlal Nehru's request. During the civil disobedience movement, he, along with several others who became prominent as socialist leaders in the years to come, was in the Nasik jail. There, in 1932, the idea of forming a socialist bloc within the Congress was mooted. Such a bloc, named the Congress Socialist Party, was formally inaugurated in 1934. The CSP, with JP as its leader, and Nehru made great contributions to popularising socialist ideals. The communists were then a tiny group trying to organise small pockets of resistance among labour, peasants and students outside the pale of the Congress which they characterised as a bourgeois reactionary Party which had to be fought. This policy underwent a change in 1935 when the communists began campaigning for a national front. JP was now prepared for cooperation with the communists and invited them to join the CSP individually, which many did. The war that began in 1939 brought this cooperation to an end. Almost the entire CSP group south of the Vindhyas walked over to the CPI.

Even though he had done so much to popularise socialism during the Thirties and the Forties, during his involvement with Bhoodan, there was not much evidence of it in his speeches and writings. In 1974, to fight the Congress in general and Indira Gandhi in particular, he sought to forge an instrument more or less like the Congress itself and not a socialist organisation. Once the limited objective of ousting the Congress and Indira Gandhi from power was achieved, the instrument began disintegrating.

JP's fight against the Congress was occasioned not only by Indira Gandhi's dictatorial methods but also by the extent of corruption that had come to exist in the administration and the country under the Congress. As early as 1952, he had said that in the administration the British had "maintained a certain high standard of honesty and integrity which are absent, generally speaking, in the Congress administration." This was an attack on Nehru. At any rate, Nehru thought as much. He replied by saying that if JP's accusation was even partly true, "then surely I am the guilty party because I am more responsible than anyone else for the Government's activities during these four years." Nehru was of course personally honest, but it was under him that corruption on an increasing scale became a feature of the administration. Under his daughter, corruption not only engulfed the administration but entered the vitals of her family, too. Sanjay Gandhi is the product. JP sought to fight corruption with forces more or less analogous to the Congress, politically and socially, and that too within the parameters of parliamentary politics as defined by the Congress. Being in bhoodan he had lost the urge to break the system the British had built in this country and which had been ramified and strengthened over three decades under the Congress.

JP became a legend during the Quit India movement in 1942. When it began he was in the Hazaribagh jail as a detenu. The Congress Working Committee passed the Quit India rssolution and Mahatma Gandhi gave the call to "do or die." The Committee members thereafter quietly walked into jail without giving any concrete directive as to what the people should do. There was an outburst of mass anger following the arrest of the leaders, and violence broke out in several provinces. The Government suppressed the outburst with even greater violence.

By November that year the agitation had petered out. There had been no one to give it direction and people acted on their own volition. On November 8 JP with a few of his comrades escaped from prison. They tried to revive the movement. It was by way of reference to his activities during this period that he said "non-violence is not my creed." Ideological leadership of the movement at the stage was provided by JP whose letters from hiding found their way to the people occasionally. But it was too late for a massive all-India movement, violent or non-violent, to be organised by a few daredevil leaders from underground. For whatever he could do until his arrest in Lahore in September 1943, he became the hero of the movement. He was pained beyond measure when, in 1944, Mahatma Gandhi disowned the movement and some Congressmen called those who had secretly led it "enemies of India's freedom." Curiously, at the same time, the Congress leaders did not fail to make political capital for their Party of the activities of JP and his comrades during this movement.

These very Congress leaders had hounded Subhas Chandra Bose out of the Congress for his crime of unequivocal opposition to the federal scheme under the Government of of India Act, 1935, and denounced the activities of his Indian National Army while the war was on. If I remember right, some Congress leaders declared that if Bose entered Assam at the head of the Japanese army they would fight him with guns—obviously at the head of the British army. Once the war was over and the British began talks with Congress leaders for transfer of power, the Congress leaders took up the cause of the INA prisoners as if the INA was their own creation. No one, not even Bose's Forward Bloc, could make political capital of the INA. The Congress alone did.

Having been installed in power as a result of a compromise with the British, the Congress had no need for the Leftists any more, not even the Congress socialists. The socialists had become too critical of the Congress leadership for it to suffer. Early in 1948 Vallabhbhai Patel issued a public warning to the CSP to either accept Congress discipline, which meant acceptance of whatever the leadership did, or get out of the Congress. The formal parting of ways came in April 1948 when the CSP became an entity outside the Congress and named itself the Socialist Party. The communists had been driven out of the Congress in December 1946. This was supposed to be the punishment given to them by the Congress for their activities during the war. With the ouster of the CSP no solid Left bloc existed in the Congress. Nehru notwithstanding, the Party fell wholly into the grip of the Rightists with Patel at their head. It was at this stage that JP called Congressmen "carpetbaggers" and the Congress "the Kuomintang of India."

One undisputed fact of JP's life was his concern for the economically and socially exploited and depressed. He was a pilgrim in search of a way to achieve his objective. He moved from one path to another. For nearly two decades he thought he had found a way outside the realm of Party activity. This was his bhoodan phase. Even there he developed doubts pretty early. He gave the call for a Partyless democracy, a democracy of good, incorruptible people. Nothing produced the result he was looking for. In an atmosphere stinking with corruption and debasement of values, he kept himself free of such contamination. He thus acquired the moral right to give a call for a fight against corruption in the Congress and the administration it ran. The instruments he could lay his hands on were unfortunately not all pure.

His name will be invoked in future by diverse people for diverse and palpably contradictory purposes, just as Mahatma Gandhi's name is. When Indira Gandhi touched the feet of JP lying in state in Patna, was she praying to be forgiven by him for the crime she had committed by imprisoning him in 1975 or was she merely making a public show with the coming election in view? ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

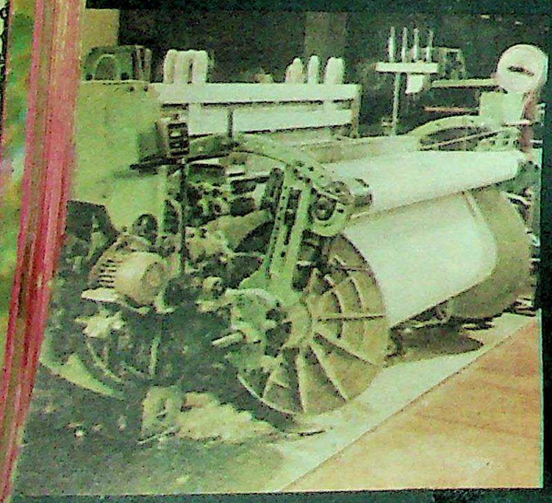
ONLY VIMAL

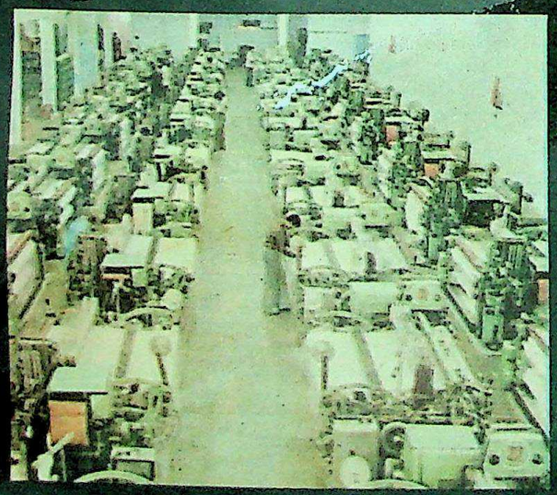
Only Vimal offers you over 6 million metres of Suiting each year.
In 100% Polyester, Polyester/ wool & various blends.

Triwol –
Vimal's Polyester – wool Suiting for the season.
Over 200 new design and colour combinations. In qualities that wear well.

VIMAL®
A RELIANCE PRODUCT

Suitings

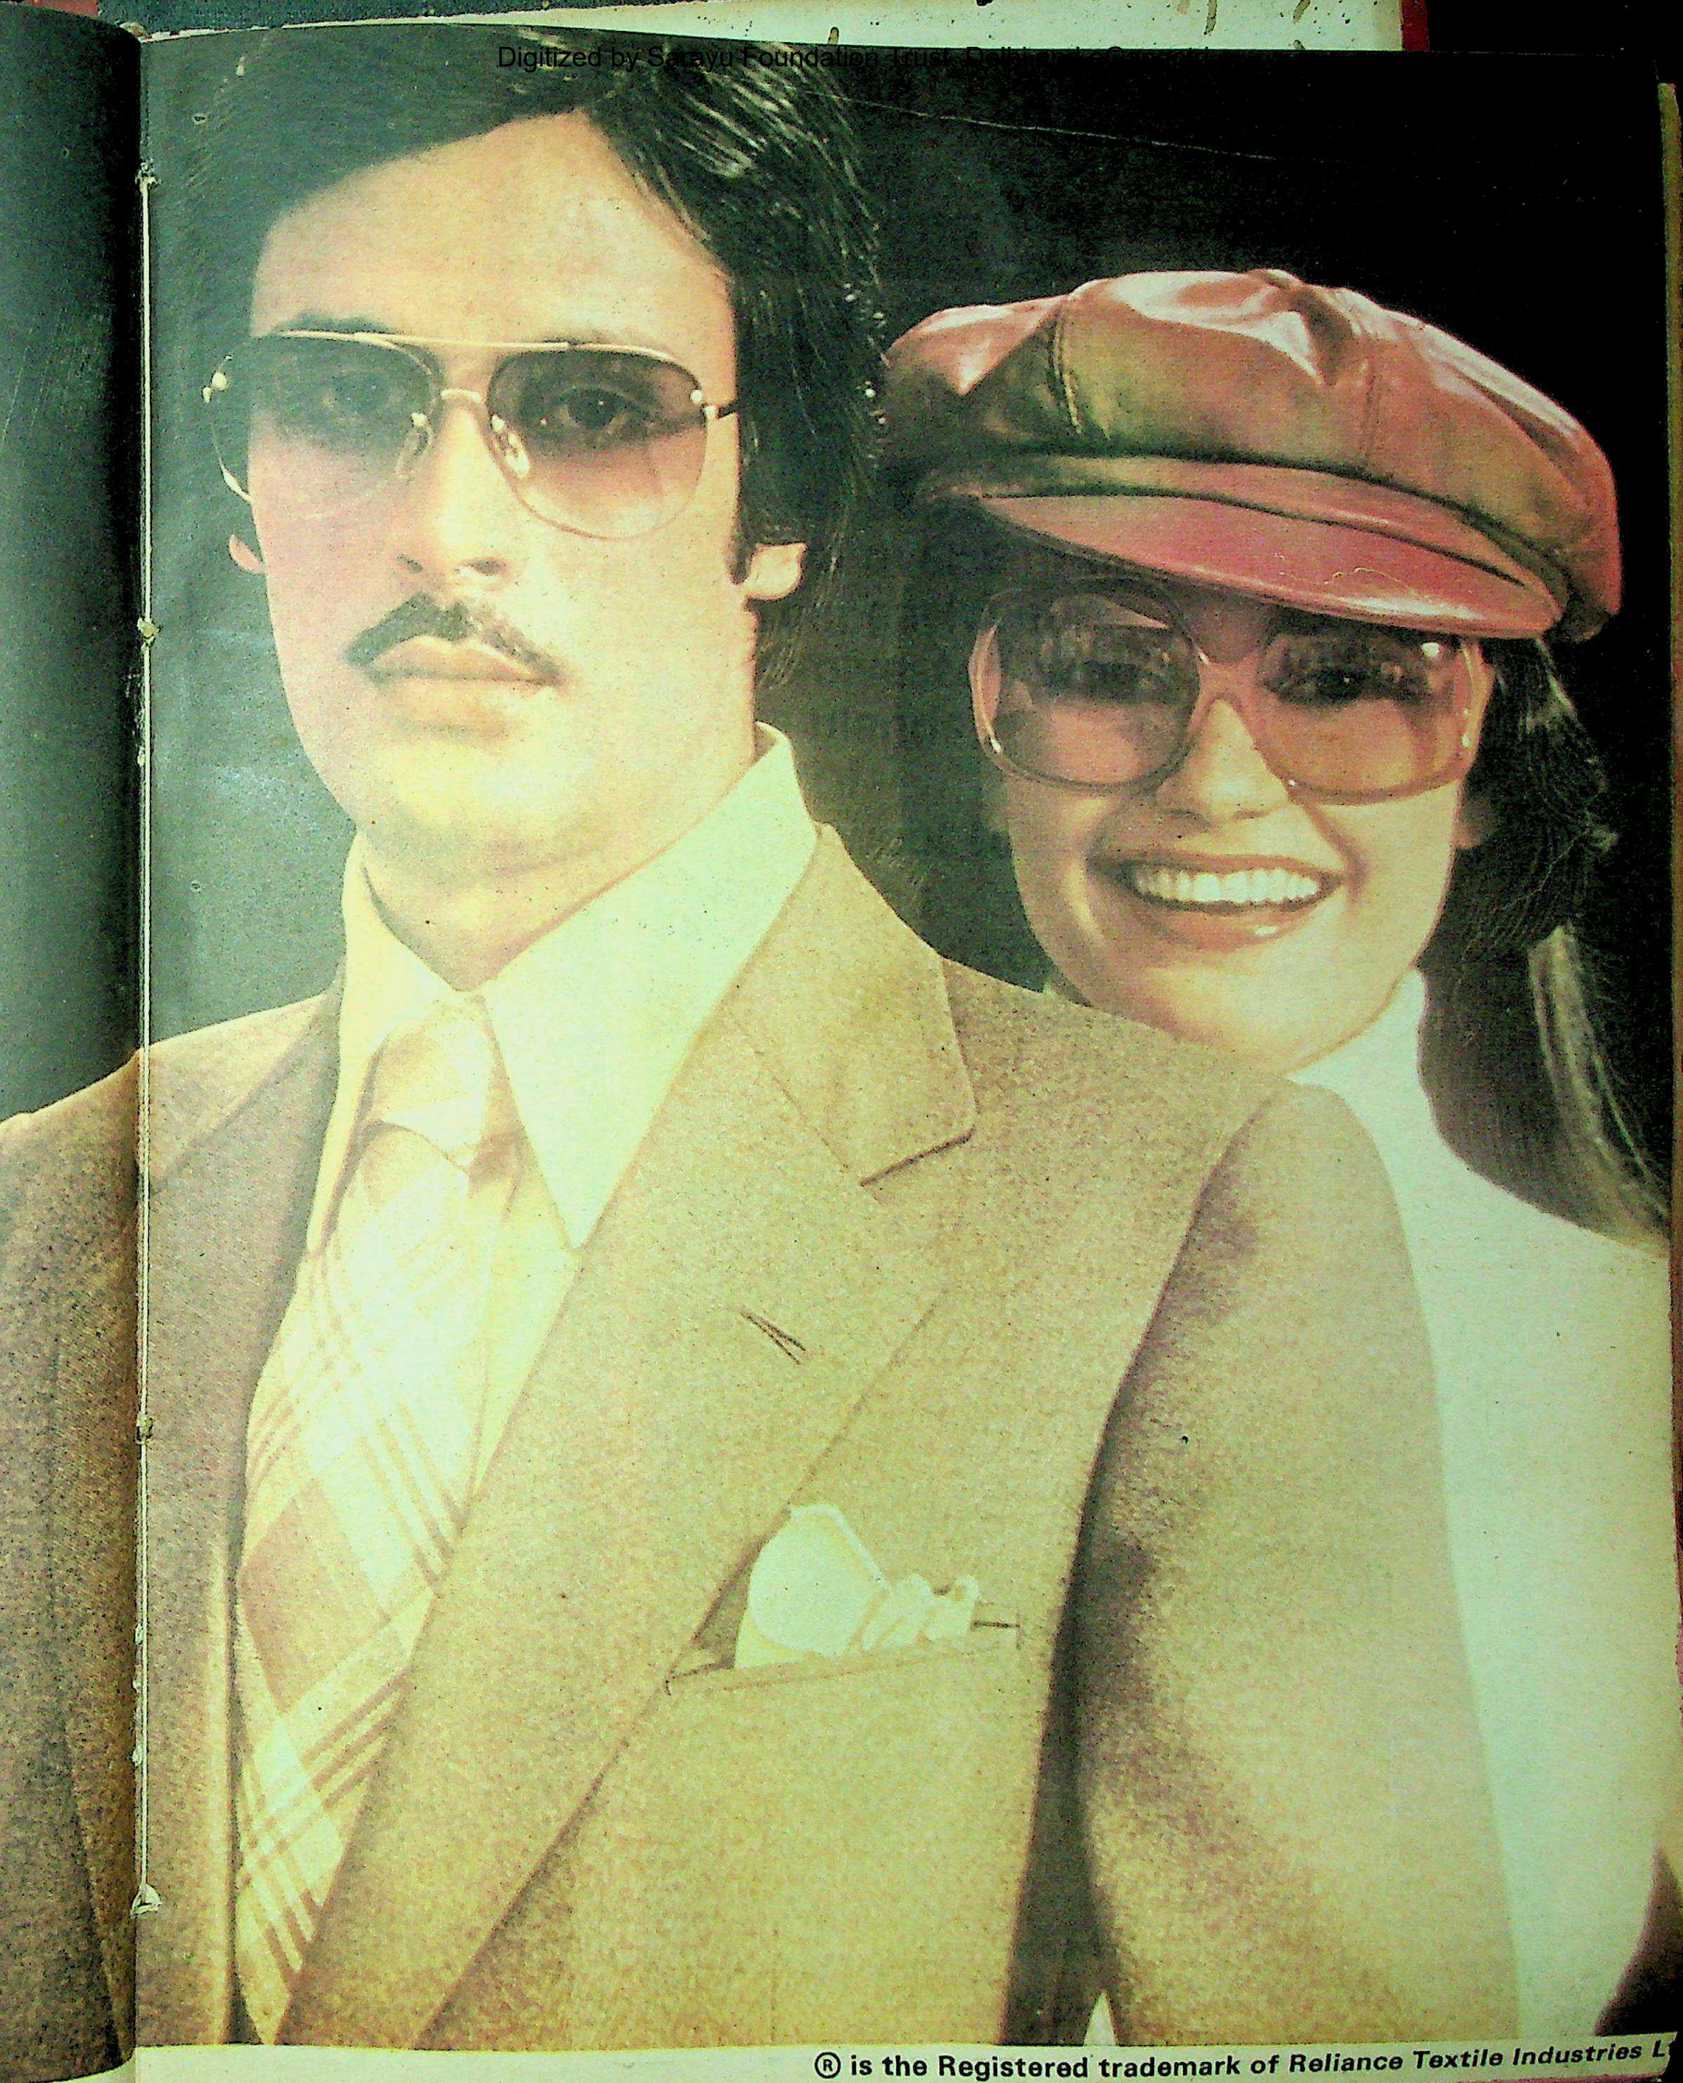




From India's most modern textile plant

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



® is the Registered trademark of Reliance Textile Industries L

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

JP's nearest and dearest

They feel orphaned today

By ARUN RANJAN

SACHIDANAND

SACHIDANAND, JP's personal political secretary first heard the Loknayak's name in 1942. "But I met him only in 1949 when JP visited Belhat during his tour of Bhagalpur district". He read out a welcome address for JP. He says: "I was not introduced to JP, but inspired by JP's personality. I decided to join the socialist movement. I remained a member of the Party for nine years. During this period I organised many meetings for JP, but we did not get to know each other. I was shy, and I never made an attempt to introduce myself. When JP turned to the Bhoodan movement, I did likewise. In 1953-54 when JP 'donated' his life (jivandan) to the Sarvodaya movement I decided to become an active worker. My first role was that of a journalist. Dhirendra Majumdar and Dada Dharmadhikari had started a weekly called Bhoodan Yagya. I was appointed as an Assistant Editor and I began to live in Patna. Here, though I did meet JP a few times on official work, we were yet to get close. That finally happened in Gaya district. Since then, 1956, I developed strong ties with him. In 1957 he had asked me to join him as his personal secretary. When I made myself available he said that for the time being another person had been appointed and he would call me later. He told me that in the meantime I could work in the Sarvodaya Mandal in Patna. I did exactly this. At that time, the Sarvodaya Mandal's office was situated where the Bhoodan Yagya Samiti is now housed. I would meet JP frequently, and receive instructions from him. After some time the Sarvodaya Mandal was dissolved. In its place, the Sarvodaya Prakashan Samiti was set up under JP's chairmanship. It was decided to bring out a weekly called Gramoday. I was made the Chief Editor.

JP with (left to right) T. Abraham, Sachidanand and Janaki

A Kumar

"For the next six or seven years, this publication successfully propagated JP's thoughts and the ideals of the Sarvodaya movement. In 1969, JP asked me to join him as his personal secretary. Since then I have remained in this post. At that time JP told me clearly that I would have to work as his "political secretary". During the 1974 movement I played a crucial role in bringing the students close to JP. When JP was arrested in Delhi during the Emergency I was also arrested in Patna. The Government knew that I had very close links with the students and this made my arrest necessary. Of course, I would rarely go out of my office at Kadam Kuan. From this office, I tried to direct the movement on JP's behalf. I am proud that during this movement I played the role of a political secretary with all the strength and intelligence at my command. After the Emergency I tried my best to bring together the different constituents of the Janata Party. My attempts in this direction made the leaders of various factions often misunderstand me. In view of JP's delicate physical condition I had to be careful.

"During the Lok Sabha elections JP did not interfere in any way with the distribution of tickets. He was not interested in any individual getting the nomination. All that he wanted was the victory of the Janata Party in the interests of democracy and liberty. During the elections I organised JP's rallies and tried my best to help all the Janata Party candidates. During the elections for the State Assemblies, JP fell ill and was flown to Seattle for treatment. In his absence I encouraged and helped the Janata Party candidates to the best of my ability.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

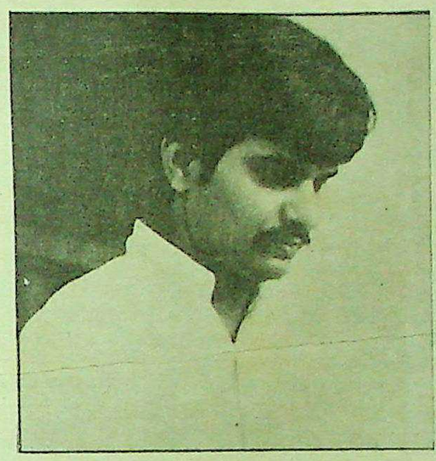
"Here I would like to mention that under the pressure of some friends and the requests of my family I had agreed to contest the Vidhan Sabha elections. My decision was influenced by the desire to see such men in the Bihar State Legislature who could carry out JP's total revolution. After all, the dissolution of the Bihar Legislature was one of the slogans of the Bihar movement. Now a new Assembly was about to be established and it was necessary that it had men who could translate JP's ideas into actions. For these reasons I expected that the Janata Party would let me contest from Patna or from my village but I did not approach any of the leaders. I simply filled up a candidature form and presumed that the Janata Party would surely accept my candidature. This did not happen. I am not a member of any group and as such I do not enjoy the support of any group. The constituency I had in mind in Patna was eventually given to a Jana Sangh candidate and the rural seat I had in mind went to the BLD. Some friends advised me to contest the elections from some constituency as an independent. But I said that would not be the right thing to do. I must add here that I had sent a telegram to JP informing him of my decision to contest the elections and JP had gladly permitted me to go ahead. He also wished me all the best for the elections. Today I realise that it has been good both for me and for JP that I did not become a member of the Vidhan Sabha. When the leaders of the Janata Party saw that I did not get a ticket, many of them began to say that I would be made an MLC. I was however not interested. Later, a prominent member of the Bihar Janata Legislature Party mentioned before JP that he wanted me to join the legislature. I immediately retorted that I did not want to become a member of the Parishad. I suggested that loyal workers like Mr Ahat Fatmi should be inducted into the Parishad. But this leader did nothing in that direction. I plan to devote the rest of my life to the propagation of JP's ideas."

T. ABRAHAM

MR ABRAHAM, JP's medical secretary who has stayed near JP all through the last few years, is short, wears spectacles and is a straight-forward person. He lives in a small flat in Rajendranagar. In his words : "In December 1965 I came to Patna. I went to sleep after dinner. Next morning the servant came with the tea. The sugar in the tea was exactly to my liking. Later I learnt that after dinner JP had enquired from the servant whether I had eaten the sweets. When he was told that I did not have the sweets he instructed the servant to put only a small amount of sugar in my tea next morning. This was something very small but it showed how JP cared for everyone around him. At Madras, some Sarvodaya workers expressed disapproval of the terelene clothes I used to wear. I replied saying this was my personal business. When JP heard about this he supported me saying : 'He is a hard working youth. I will not interfere in his personal life'. That very evening I changed to khadi clothes."

What are his plans for the future? He has served JP for the last 14 years. He says : "I will return to Kerala after a fortnight. What will I do here after this irrepairable loss?"

GULAB YADAV



GULAB, 24, has been JP's personal attendant since March, 1971. Gulab's father, Girdhari Yadav, was a Sarvodaya worker who went to jail with JP during the 1942 movement; he now lives in Barachatti in Bihar's Gaya district and gets a freedom fighter's pension. Gulab first used to stay at the Samanyavay ashram at Bodhgaya. In Gulab's own words: "Once, Didi (Prabhavati Devi) and Dada (JP) came to the ashram. They saw me there. My father was already well-known to them and when the Loknayak's personal attendant Shiv Shankar fell ill, Prabhavati ji sent word to the ashram to release me for a few days. The ashram's director, Dwarka Bhai agreed, and on March 18. 1971. I reached Patna. Didi showed me what I had to do, how to look after him ... From her deathbed, Didi asked me never to leave JP's side. There was no question of any salary. Whenever I went home Didi would give me some money, or sometimes send money to my parents. I was not a servant, but a member of the family. Now Dada is also dead. I don't know what I will do. If the Charkha Samiti is made into a memorial for JP, I might stay on if I am allowed to by these people. I would continue to serve JP. If this doesn't work out, I will be forced to think about earning a living in some other way".

Gulab remembered his days with JP : "I would live on the first floor which JP occupied. JP loved me like his son. Once my father fell ill and the doctors ordered an operation. I asked JP for 15 days leave. JP told me to call my father over to Patna and promised to get everything done he wouldn't let me go away from him. He told me, 'You are indispensable to me'. My father was operated upon in Patna and then sent home with him (JP). JP would take me along everywhere. When JP travelled by plane, I would accompany him to the airport. He would share his food with me. I generally accompanied JP on all his rallies and processions."

Gulab showed me a watch which Prabhavatiji had given him six months after he came to Kadam Kuan. Recently, JP had given him a transistor. Gulab's parents live in the village but his wife and children stayed with him in Patna. He has a baby son, Manoj. However, before JP returned from Jaslok this year, he sent his wife and son to the village so that he could serve JP without distraction. JP's younger sister in fact reprimanded him lightly because he had sent away the child even before JP had seen him.

The theft of JP's HMT wristwatch angered Gulab to no end. He said he had the keys to JP's room and the almirahs, but had decided to give them to Shivnath Babu, JP's brother-in-law. JP's personal effects, oil, soap and clothes were also lying with Gulab. Gulab's personal trunk is also lying in JP's room.

JANAKI

JANAKI, JP's adopted daughter, is now married to Kumar Prashant, one of the young men closest to JP during the movement. She comes from Patthorgarh on the Indo-Tibetan border. She first saw JP when working with Acharya Vinoba Bhave. She says : "At that time I did not realise how great JP was. Later, during the Sarvodaya movement in Saharsa district, five of us selected Radhopur village for our programme. On January 1, 1974, we invited JP to Radhopur. He spent a night with us in a small hut. I reminded JP that while escaping from Nepal he had taken refuge in Radhopur, and this was remembered by the people of Radhopur. I still recall the open meeting which we organised in Radhopur.

"My mother had died some time ago. JP was almost like a mother in his affection and care. Once I had a dream—JP, Prabhavatiji and I were climbing a mountain and Didi told me to take JP's hand in mine. I came really close to JP, and he gave me a lot of love. I don't know how to describe everything now.

"During the 1974 movement we met again. JP loved songs and bhajans. For this reason I would go to his meetings. When JP was released during the Emergency I was in Dal-

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Now and then, Alberto da Vinci takes time off from la dolce vita to design a $5000 cocktail dress for a swinging princess, a scarf for a Milan house of fashion... and two bedsheets for New Great Mills.

Ah...the good life! Senor da Vinci and his collection of cars, speedboats and horses, and his wine cellar and his kennel full of pedigree Borzois. A most life-loving man. And so wealthy. After all, he is one of the finest avant-garde designers south of Paris.

Dreamsheets and Pillowcases by new great mills

Designed by people who love life and show it in their work.

THE NEW GREAT EASTERN SPINNING & WEAVING CO. LTD, Dr. Ambedkar Road, Bombay-400 027

TRIKAYA-NG-23

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A little sweetness goes a long way

A little Kissan jam goes a long way in turning eats into exotic treats. Don't stop it at bread and butter. Pamper a pudding, layer a cake, top a trifle, stir it in ice cream or shake it in milk.....the wholesome fruity goodness of Kissan jam works wonders on your family appetites. A dollop of jam just invites the bites. Try it.

The Kissan Range

Mixed fruit, pineapple, strawberry, raspberry, mango, apple, apricot, Goldenmist orange marmalade and guava jelly.

Kissan

maa KPL 13e 79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Bring out BRITANNIA MARIE

Teamates: the cup that cheers and the biscuit that goes with it, Britannia Marie! Just the thing to serve when guests drop in. The crisp, light tea-time bite— Britannia Marie. Keep a pack handy.

BRITANNIA MARIE Biscuits
the crisp tea-time favourite

BRITANNIA
Britannia biscuits are the best

LINTAS-BBC-M-4-2417

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

tonganj jail. As soon as I was free I went to Bombay. There I learnt how to operate the dialysis machine. Everyone was against this, except JP. He tried explaining to me, though, that I was a young girl and might develop strong ties with an old, sick man. However, I did not budge and finally JP agreed".

JP later adopted Janaki as his daughter. People became jealous of her and spread rumours about her. When I asked her how she felt now, she broke down and said tearfully: "My mother has left me. Now it seems everything is finished. There is no one now who can keep a hand on my head. I don't know why I feel very afraid now, especially of the people here. In a way it is good that JP died. Dialysis was very painful. He was fed up with the dialysis machine and he would say : 'Why do you put in the needle, beti. It is very painful to me. I shudder at its sight'. One could not expect a more peaceful death. He would say that like pieces of wood floating on water, Prashant (my husband), I and he had come together to become a family. JP got me married. Even while hovering between life and death at Jaslok, he smiled when he heard that I had given birth to Pyoli. I don't intend to stay in Patna anymore. All my activities were devoted to JP. When JP was alive. I would feel the rush for time; today, time has become impossible to spend".

KUMAR PRASHANT

KUMAR PRASHANT, 29-year-old, is JP's adopted daughter Janaki's husband and the publisher of Samagrata. JP began this magazine when he was ill, but, according to Prashant, JP could not however put Samagrata to full use because of his illness.

Prashant says : "I was casually introduced to JP in 1960. My family was influenced by Sarvodaya. JP had appealed to the youth when the Musahari incident occurred in 1969 : a few of us responded. Then we laid the foundations of the Tarun Kranti Sena in Muzaffarpur.

"I again met JP at Saharsa during the Gram Swarajya campaign in 1973-74. At Radhopur village, Janaki, Subhmurti and myself worked hard for the success of this campaign. During this campaign, JP stayed with us for a night. Ever since, I came very close to JP. During the 1974 movement I came to Muzaffarpur from Saharsa. On March 19, I was arrested, and released on March 27-28. After that JP summoned me and said that he needed me in Patna. On April 15, 1974, I began to bring out the Tarun Kranti Samagrata Patrika and its publication continued even when I was underground."

What will you do now? Prashant replied ruefully : "It seems that the publication of Samagrata will have to be suspended. I will have to close it. As long as JP was alive. I had no worries. There were problems even earlier — allegations were raised against us — but we carried on. I don't think it is possible to publish the magazine any longer. We will take the final decision at the next sitting of the magazine trust. A great void has been creating by the passing away of JP and I don't know what to do."

SARJU BHAI

SARJU BHAI, 79, is from Siwan district. He has been in politics since he was 21. In 1934-35, he was in the Congress Socialist Party. JP wanted to bring about some changes in the methods of agriculture but his associates did not have any practical experience in this field. So. JP would take the advice of Sarju Bhai. In 1942, both of them were jailed. After JP was released he once came down to meet Saryu Bhai. In those days, the entire area was ravaged by floods. JP saw his condition and asked Sarju Bhai to look after his (JP's) land at Sitabdiara. Sarju Bhai did not agree then. JP met him again during a meeting at Fatua in 1953. Ever since, Saryu Bhai has been looking after JP's house, fields and garden at Sitabdiara. He does not take any fixed salary. Sarju Bhai told me: "I was jailed twice during the 1974 movement. I have no complaints against JP but I am not satisfied with his friends. His friends think of me as a servant and not a political colleague. JP never thought on these lines. I don't know what will happen now". ■

Krishna M. Sharma

The birthday after death

ACCORDING to the Hindu calendar, JP's birthday falls on Vijayadashami. This year JP celebrated his birthday on that day, and many people prayed for a long life for him. Exactly seven days later, JP died. On October 11, JP's birthday was again celebrated, this time in accordance with the Roman calendar.

On October 11, at 10.30 a.m. the Chatra Sangharsha Vahini took out a silent procession, which ended with an oath at the Shahid Samarak. The Vahini leaders did not permit outsiders to join the procession. The Vahini boys did not participate in the celebrations organised at JP's Kadam Kuan residence because bhajans and prayers were on the agenda. JP loved the Gita and the Ramacharitmanas and his favourite bhajan was Tulsidas' "Tu dyalu deen bandhu, tu dani hai bhikari". He would often hum this bhajan. Ironically , the Vahini which he founded, boycotted the function at Kadam Kuan because bhajans were sung there.

Another function was organised by the Chatra Sangharsha Samiti. Different political groups also celebrated JP's birthday by organising meetings in Gandhi maidan. At JP's house, a big shamiana was pitched in the compound and JP's portrait was placed on the right side of the stage. The prayer meeting here began exactly at 5 o'clock. Shanti Jain read out the shlokas from the 11th chapter of the Gita. When JP was alive, Shanti Jain would recite bhajans from the Gita and the Ramayana for JP every evening. The disciples of the Japanese guru, Fuji, also joined in and prayed for the peace of JP's soul.

Janaki, JP's adopted daughter tried to sing Kabir's bhajans but she was so overwhelmed with grief that she could not : she began to cry. After this, Vibha, one of JP's close disciples, sang "Tu dyalu deen bandhu, tu dani hai bhikari". Janaki tried to sing again and this time she rendered Kabir's "Kar le shringar chatur albeli, sajan ke ghar jana hoga". When she came to the last line she broke down once again and a section of the audience also wept with her. The last bhajan sung was "Raghupati Raghav Rajaram" and everyone joined in the chorus.

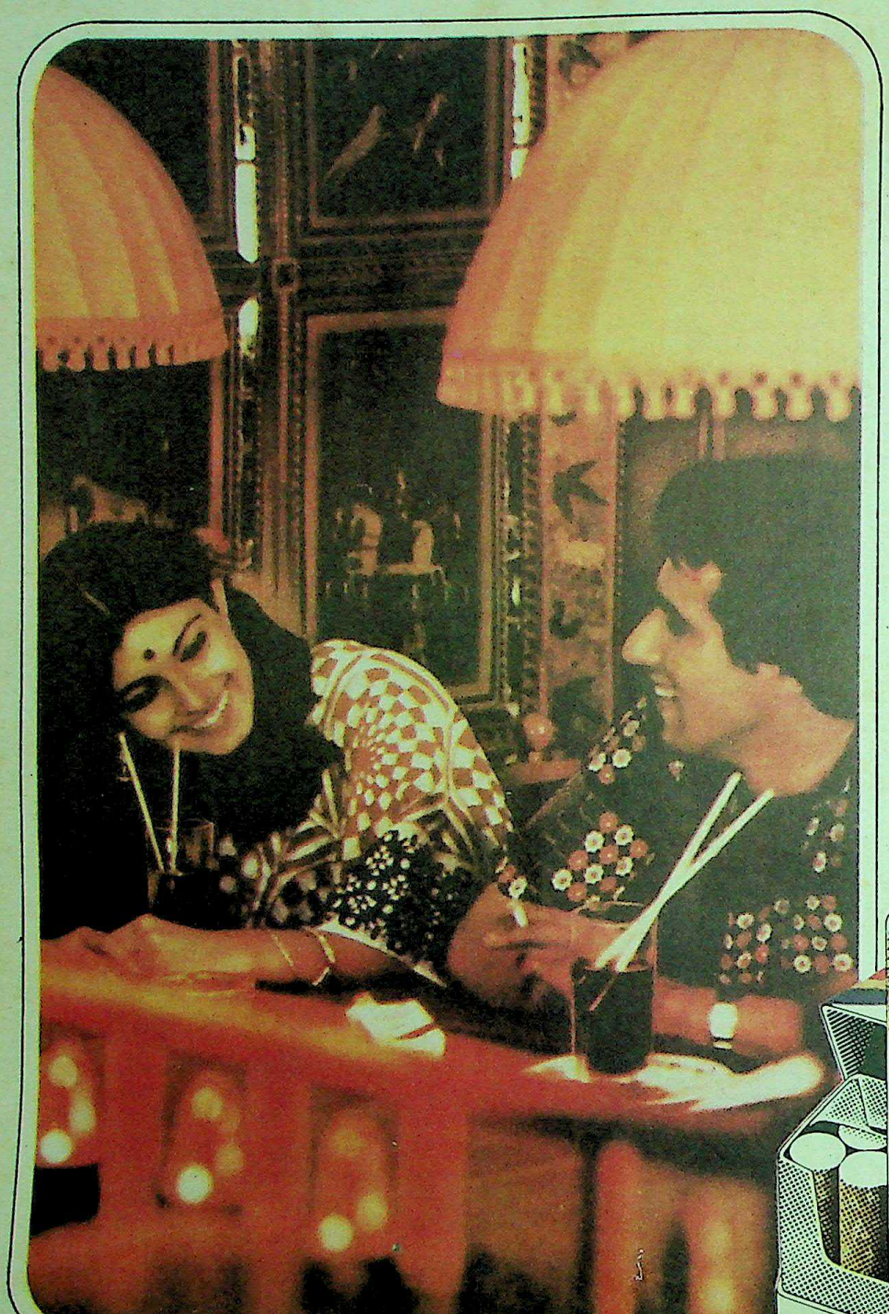
When the celebrations ended, I climbed up to JP's room on the first floor. His portrait was lying on his bed. On the table near the bed, lay two books which were with JP in his last moments. One of them was Gulab ki pankhuriyan and the other, Razi Ahmad's Jayaprakash. The other books lying there were Dinkar's Rashim Rathi, Priya Prawas and Saket. Rashim Rathi was one of JP's favourite volumes.

SANTOSH BHARTIYA

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Moments of happiness...



Make your happy moments happier with Regent King. An exclusive blend of choice Virginia tobaccos especially selected for rich flavour, smoothness and subtle taste. Brought to you in an exclusive pack.

REGENT KING

A happy blend of taste & freshness moments for Regent King

Maximum price
Rs. 3.50 for 20
Rs. 1.75 for 10
Local taxes extra.

SAA/FD/19A1

STATUTORY WARNING: CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Morarji: "Nothing came out of JP's movement"

Wearing his inevitable beautifully starched khadi, and accompanied (inevitably) by his middle-aged son Kanti (wearing a glistening white kurta and pyjama, his eyes shaded by square dark glasses), Morarji Desai was among the first top-level leaders to come to Bansghat: a little after 12.30 p.m. Babu Jagjivan Ram came almost simultaneously. Morarji and Babuji sat beside each other, and while Babuji was flanked by Morarji on his right, he had Kanti Desai on his left. To the right of Morarji sat Raghukul Tilak, a friend and contemporary of JP. Soon, Kanti Desai would have very interesting companions beside him in that very special row: just to the left of him would sit Satyendra Narain Sinha, the Bihar Janata chief, and beside Satyendra Babu would sit Mrs Indira Gandhi. Right behind Mrs Gandhi, Sanjay Gandhi would take a chair. It was an interesting sight : made even more interesting by the fact that Satyendra Babu (who has been the subject of continuing rumours that he will join Mrs Gandhi), Mrs Gandhi, Sanjay Gandhi and Babu Jagjivan Ram had met only a couple of hours ago for twenty minutes at the Bihar State Guest House in Babu Jagjivan Ram's room.

Morarji Desai did not seem sad on this occasion; he looked his normal self. SANTOSH BHARTIYA went up to him with a taperecorder and asked him some questions appropriate to the occasion. The former Prime Minister's answers were brutally honest. And if they sounded a trifle unfortunate at a moment when the five maunds of sandalwood were waiting on the bank of the holy Ganga to consume the physical body of a great man, at least they had the merit of honesty: Morarji was not going to be a hypocrite like so many of the other netas hanging around there with especially elongated faces.

> What was new in Jayaprakash Narayan's movement? After all it was only a copy of Gandhiji's movement...After all what did JP's movement achieve?

> Will the death of JP make such a difference? Whoever may die in this world, the world does not stop; we should n't give too much importance to anyone.

> Whatever change took place in the country was because of the Emergency and the zulum; if we say that it is because of us, then it is wrong.

Q: The void that has been created in our politics by the death of JP—how do you think it will affect the nation?

A: Will the death of JP make such a difference? Whoever may die in this world, the world does not stop; we should not give too much importance to anyone's death. The country will go ahead. Even if we all die, the country will progress. That is why, saying things of this sort is not good. What happened after Gandhiji left us? The country survived. Moreover, JP was not in a position by now to do anything. Indeed, many people had begun exploiting him; people were taking advantage of JP's condition, and (this) I think was not good at all.

Q: When you first heard the news about JP's death, how did you feel?

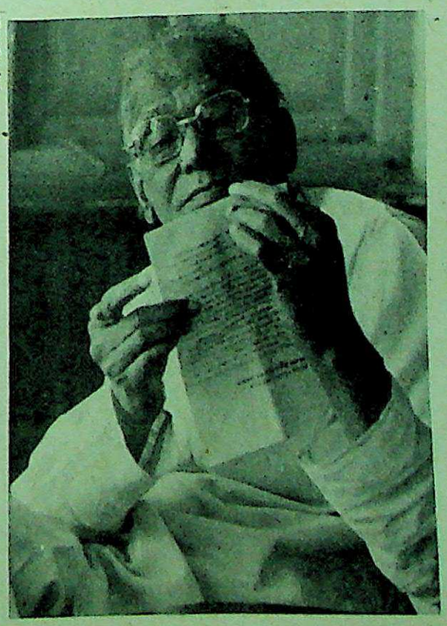
A: The news of anyone's death does not affect me. This is a command from God; we should accept it. I did not feel any shock (when I heard the news).

Q: I was there when JP told you, while you were taking the oath in March 1977, that he would leave the world before you, and you would have the responsibility of leadership...

A: Nahin, woh sab theek hai... (All that is all right...) Nobody is immortal. We should remember that anyone's death does not stop the world. Gandhiji left us. Now what Gandhiji said will not be forgotten. Chalta rahta hai (Things go on). But this country will now progress, that is my belief.

Q: How do you assess the historic importance of JP's movement?

A: What was new in Jayaprakash's movement? After all, it was only a copy of Gandhiji's movement. The JP movement will survive only if the people remember it. After all what did JP's movement achieve? Whenever there was a movement in Bihar what did it achieve? Nothing came out of (JP's movement). There was only a lot of publicity that the Bihar movement played a vital role, but if there had been no Emergency, then nothing would have happened. The Emergency came, and then only the country understood—understood much better than from our speeches. Whatever change took place in the country was because of the Emergency and the zulum; if we (Morarji included JP in this category) say that it was because of us, then it is wrong. And whatever has happened today, the impact of this too will be good. The people will understand better, they will have more courage and therefore I think that this (JP's passing away) will be of profit.



A. Kumar

Q: You were among the last major leaders to meet JP, during your recent tour of Bihar. What did you discuss?

A: We discussed ordinary things; we did not discuss politics. We discussed his health and other things. I was there for 15 or 20 minutes. He looked in good shape to me. His mind was clear. Just as a lamp burns brightest just before expiring...he looked much better than I had seen him before. He looked much improved, but in my mind I could not understand how this improvement had taken place. JP has now been rescued from his pain; he used to live in extreme pain—dialysis is a terrible thing. I am not saying that it is good that he was thus relieved of his pain, that would be wrong; but his end was peaceful. He had to face many disappointments in his life, but in his last days he found some happiness. All through his life he worked for the country, he never thought about himself; that is the greatest thing about him. If people can learn this from him, it will be good. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

JP and Marxists

They held him in high esteem

By TARUN GANGULY

TWO stalwarts of the CPI-(M), Mr E. M. S. Namboodiripad and Mr P. Ramamurti had long associations with Jayaprakash Narayan early in their careers. Both belonged to the Congress Socialist Party, and till 1945, they remained under the umbrella of the Congress along with JP. Mr Ramamurti, now a top trade union leader and a member of the CPI(M) politburo, has fond memories about JP. When I met Ramamurti in his Talkatora Road residence, he was reclining in his bed wearing a simple dhoti draped in the South Indian fashion.

Ramamurti, who is generally critical of all the leaders of the establishment, looked visibly moved. In a reminiscent mood, he started describing his association with JP, which started as early as in 1932. Along with the late C. D. Jagannath Das of the old Madras presidency, he looked after JP when he visited Madras in 1932 during the days of the civil disobedience movement. Ramamurti at that time was a member of the AICC and also a member of the working committee of the Madras Congress. His first reaction was strange. He said: "I still feel guilty for the arrest of JP in Madras Central Railway Station in 1932. The police were after me and I had gone to see JP off at the station. The police went to the station and they found JP there and arrested him. I can never forget this."

After the formation of the Congress Socialist Party at the Patna session of the Congress, JP toured Madras presidency. Ramamurti says, "I was JP's official translator. He would address the meetings in Hindi or English, and I would translate this into Tamil for the public." Now a sedate 71, Ramamurti chuckled when he remembered the ouster of the Communists from the Congress fold in 1945. He said, "We left the Congress at that time. JP was surprised to find out that we were cardholders of the undivided CPI. JP did not know that we were Communists."

What attracted him most about JP? Ramamurti thought for a while and then replied, "JP's humanism attracted me most. I feel he played a historic role in unifying all the forces opposed to the Emergency." Ramamurti has no rancour about the various twists and turns in JP's tumultuous political career. He said, "JP parted with us because he drifted from socialism and went over to the Sarvodaya movement." Even then, he clarified, "Our personal relations were exceptionally good. This much I can say about JP that he harboured no ill-will towards anybody." Ramamurti did not want to go into the political differences. He said, "I

March : Morarji's obstinacy

BY March 22, this year the doctors of Bombay's Jaslok hospital had virtually given up any hope of JP's survival. In fact, people were being asked to take their "last looks". On the morning of October 23, Chandrashekhar, Madhu Limaye, Nanaji Deshmukh, along with their friend Ramnath Goenka and other Janata leaders, decided that Prime Minister Morarji Desai should be told that if the worst came, then he should declare national mourning in the country. Chandrashekhar himself refused to talk to Morarji Desai as he was very angry that despite JP's health being in such a bad shape, the Prime Minister had still not found time to see JP in Bombay.

George Fernandes, who among this lot, had the best relations with Morarji, was asked to convey this view of the group to the Prime Minister. George duly met Morarji and reported the view, adding that he too was in full agreement with this sentiment. Morarji Desai got angry upon hearing this. He said that he refused to create a bad precedent by declaring national mourning for JP, as he had no official status. He asked what was so special about JP, anyway. And if he had to declare national mourning for JP then he would have to do the same when Acharya Vinoba Bhave and Acharya Kripalani died.

Upset, Fernandes left Morarji's presence without a word. He phoned Bombay to convey to the younger Janata leaders what Morarji had said—the immediate reaction of Chandrashekhar, Madhu Limaye and Goenka when they heard this was tears of shock and anger. Chandrashekhar immediately asked Nanaji Deshmukh to send a message to all the Chief Ministers and executive heads of union territories whether they belonged to the Janata Party or not, in his name, requesting them to declare mourning in their areas. Nanaji began phoning around the country, and everywhere the response was the same: the regional leaders would take the initiative and declare a period of mourning.

On March 24, Madhu Limaye wrote an official letter to the Prime Minister (reproduced below) pleading that there be national mourning. Of course, JP stayed alive; Morarji's Prime Ministership, which was a gift from JP to Morarji, went, and Morarji was never tested on this issue—though it will be recalled that although Morarji had told Parliament about JP's death in that shocking mistake, he had not declared national mourning, or given any indication that national mourning would be declared.

15-AB Pandara Road,
New Delhi—110003.
24th March 1979.

Dear Morarjibhai,

JP's condition is still grave. We all hope that he will pull through. But—God forbid — if anything untoward happens?

All sorts of nasty stories are being circulated by the Press. I ignore them, but I am disturbed to know that you have told some of your Cabinet colleagues that you would not set up a wrong precedent by ordering national mourning for JP.

I hope the information is false. I pray, please do not do anything that would hurt the feelings of our countrymen. Whatever be your private opinion of him, he has been our leader, and millions regard him as the last of the popular leaders in the line of our great national figures, (at whose head is, of course, the Father of the Nation, followed by Pandit Jawaharlal, Netaji Subhas, Sardar Vallabhbhai and so on).

With good wishes.

Yours sincerely,
Sd/ Madhu Limaye

Shri Morarji Desai,
Prime Minister,
New Delhi.

SANTOSH BHARTIYA

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri visited him when he was in Vellore Hospital and later when he was treated in Jaslok Hospital in Bombay. But then I never discussed all this with the Press before."

If Ramamurti is eager to pay respects to a departed fighter for human freedom, Mrs Aruna Asaf Ali, who had a legendary career of her own during the 1942 movement, was somewhat reticent when I asked her to recollect those times. She said, "Why delve into the past. In 1942, JP was in the vanguard of revolution, but then we parted company".

The hour that made the Janata Party

Raghu Rai

ON January 19, 1977, with the country still gloomy in the darkness of the Emergency, Loknayak Jayaprakash Narayan received word in Patna that the leaders of the various Opposition Parties wanted to fight the coming elections in an alliance, and not under the flag and symbol of a single Party. JP got upset, and his dream of defeating dictatorship began to dim. Accidentally, S. M. Joshi, the veteran Socialist leader from Maharashtra, was in Patna on that day, and he came to see JP. JP told him and others there that he would remove himself from the electoral battle if the Opposition Parties were unable to form a single Party, and if Delhi's leaders continued to behave in this petty manner. S. M. Joshi pleaded with JP not to take any final decision until he went to Delhi and made a last effort to bring about a single Party.

The next day, S. M. Joshi went to Delhi and spoke to the various leaders. But after talking to all of them, even he became disappointed. He phoned JP to say that there seemed little chance of a single Party being created, but he was continuing his efforts. He again pleaded with JP not to make any statement yet.

But JP again became very upset. After thinking for a while, he called his secretary and prepared a statement in which he registered his anger with the leaders in Delhi, and expressed his wish of leaving the election scene. That night, around eight, the agencies released that statement.

That agency report reached the Indian Express, and such was the gravity of that report that Express owner Ramnath Goenka was immediately informed about it. Goenka got into his car at once and went to Morarji Desai's house; soon, he had met many leaders and told them about JP's decision. Everyone was stunned: they could see themselves losing once again in the elections if JP did not support them. Very quickly, the decision was taken to form the Janata Party, with Morarji Desai as the chairman.

The next day, newspaper readers saw both JP's statement and the announcement creating the Janata Party. When JP learnt about this in Patna that morning, he breathed a long sigh of relief and contentment.

SANTOSH BHARTIYA

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Mrs Gandhi snubbed JP

And he destroyed her authoritarianism

EVENTS, men and the social situation, and their interplay make contemporary history. But their outcome is hedged about by so many 'ifs' and 'buts'. Such was the interaction between JP and Mrs Gandhi. There was always a certain coolness between them though, perhaps, no two public figures of India were better placed for a positive relationship. He, an elder statesman and she, a daughter of a friend, who was the Prime Minister of the country. JP had for long remained a personal friend to Pandit Nehru, his 'bhai', and JP's wife, Prabhavati, was that rare being with whom Kamalaji shared her confidences.

Mrs Gandhi did not receive the same affection from JP as did Panditji but there was a certain pride for her in both Prabhavati and JP. This was more so after the Bangladesh war. In 1971, on the morrow of the Parliamentary elections, the crisis in the erstwhile East Pakistan had begun to simmer dangerously, and JP was among the first to argue the case for the new Bangladesh Government in exile. Mrs Gandhi did not want her hands forced. But she went along when JP wanted to canvass support for its recognition: he travelled to various capitals of the world, met presidents and prime ministers but found little response forthcoming. This, coupled with the successful leadership provided by Mrs Gandhi during the crisis laid the basis of a cooperation which JP wanted to extend.

By late 1972 the national consensus built during the Indo-Pakistan war had broken down. This was, first, because the non-Congress Parties felt that Mrs Gandhi by forcing the Assembly elections, had shortchanged them. Added to this was her supersession of Supreme Court judges, the nationalisation of coal and the takeover of the foodgrains trade which provoked widespread resentment. Besides, the country's distressing economic situation following the burden of the war and refugees, had put the Government under great pressure. Coming out after a year of voluntary retirement, JP met Mrs Gandhi and offered to work for a national consensus, which she welcomed.

As was his wont, JP tried to repair the national consensus. He met all the country's top leaders and found a response from them which was favourable enough to continue his discussions with Mrs Gandhi. It was then that JP felt slighted by Mrs Gandhi—perhaps due to no fault of her own, or, perhaps, her deliberate doing. As was usual with him, JP met her by appointment, but on this occasion, even before they met, she informed JP that she was "very tired" and she had to be in Parliament. JP's last hopes of evolving a national consensus were dashed. But why did Mrs Gandhi ignore him? Even if her presence in Parliament was essential, she could have kept the line for further talks open. This she did not do. She did regret the lapse later, and the misunderstanding it had caused, but the opportunity was lost. JP took the incident as a rebuff and came away. This incident provided leaders like Nanaji Deshmukh the opportunity they were seeking when, week after week they tried to persuade JP to rise against Mrs Gandhi. The persuasion bore results: by December 1972 JP had taken a public stance and in early 1973 was persuaded to go to Ahmedabad to give sustenance and moral cover to a movement which had developed from a completely different motivation.

Prabhavati's influence on JP, however, prevented him from mounting a withering political attack against Mrs Gandhi. When Prabhavatiji was nearing her end, she and JP were in Delhi en route to Patna. They decided to stay back in Delhi for a few days. Knowing about her condition, Mrs Gandhi wanted to visit her but since they had put up with Ramnath Goenka instead of at the Gandhi Peace Foundation, their usual rendezvous, Mrs Gandhi could not see her. She could only make a telephone call, but this too not without hurting JP. Prabhavati and JP were together when the call came through and the two women spoke to each other. Mrs Gandhi, consciously or unconsciously, ignored JP. Coming after their previous encounter, the incident drew the two leaders further apart.

By April 14, the JP-inspired students' movement caught up in Bihar. In one of her speeches attacking the movement at Bhubaneswar, Mrs Gandhi made a scornful attack on JP which the latter took as aspersion on his personal integrity. Some people, who stood to gain from a confrontation between the two, incited them against each other. Soon the situation reached flashpoint. At this stage, some others tried to bring JP and Mrs Gandhi together and resolved their differences, but they failed. In June, 1974 Chandrashekhar wrote to Mrs Gandhi and JP requesting them to end their confrontation. He said it was damaging the entire edifice of the Indian State. Being close to JP and sharing an emotional involvement with him, Chandrashekhar, then a member of the Congress Working Committee, was in an excellent position to act as the bridge between the two. But for some reason or the other, Mrs Gandhi never trusted Chandrashekhar. The latter's efforts at bringing about a reconciliation thus failed. In May 1974, however, Mrs Gandhi wrote an affectionate letter to JP after a meeting with Chandrashekhar while he was at Vellore Hospital and Uma Shanker Dixit apologised on her behalf for the hurt caused to JP by her statement in Bhubaneswar. There seemed an outside chance of a compromise. But this was not to be. The same instigators who had misled JP earlier once again besieged him when he came back to Patna. Volunteers were methodically mustered to keep the movement going. The goals of the movement changed to direct confrontation.

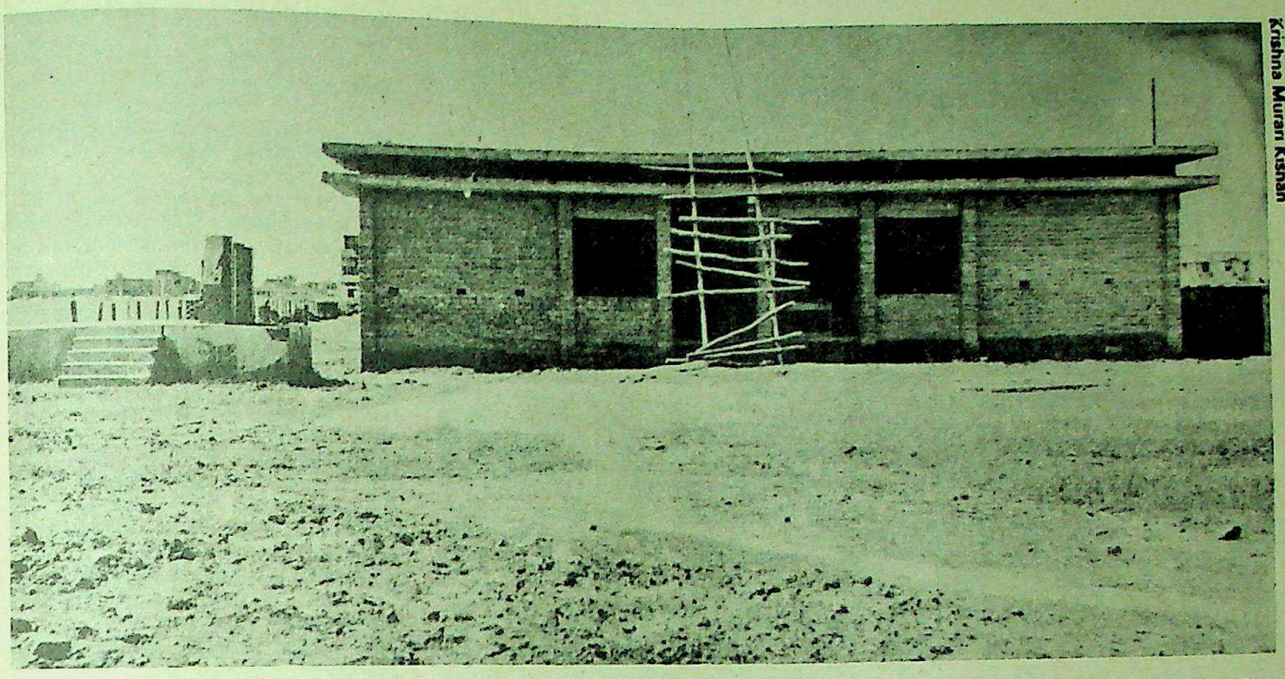
Yet another attempt was made at arranging a compromise. In September-October 1974, talks were held at various stages. During the movement JP had called on all members of the Bihar Assembly to resign. With the confrontation between the two personalities starting to take its toll, the two sides were anxious for an honourable solution, if it could be found. JP was willing to settle for the dissolution of the Bihar Assembly and agree not to spread his movement, while Mrs Gandhi agreed to hold byelections for the resigned seats earlier. Once again the people around Mrs Gandhi dissuaded her from reacting favourably to an agreement. The point of no-return had been reached. On June 26, 1975, the infamous Emergency was promulgated. Free India sent one its most clamourous freedom-fighters to jail again. The promulgation of the Emergency and his arrest did not, of course, solve any problem for Mrs Gandhi. She took decisions, shrewdly, after considering JP's state of health. Elections to Parliament were due in March, '76, but in late 1975 and in early 1976, when JP was hovering between life and death at Jaslok Hospital, Mrs Gandhi did not want to take the risk of an election campaign. Hence the 1976 elections were postponed. Excuses were found to explain the postponement, but it was the overwhelming fear of JP's death which solely accounted for the decision.

Was it possible that JP and Mrs Gandhi could work together? Maybe. But essentially, JP and Mrs Gandhi both had different ideas. They were not only two different personalities but had different views of society. And that, perhaps, was the reason for their clash. But at what expense? ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

JP's last dream



Krishna Murari Kishan

BY THE main road in Kankarbagh Colony, to the south of Patna, is a plot of land on which is coming up a small house, with three or four rooms. If all goes well, the building should be the proud bearer of the banner "Jayaprabha Hospital", the construction of which was one of JP's last dreams which remained unfulfilled in his lifetime. JP's wife Prabhavati had died of cancer, and there was talk of setting up a centre for research on the dreaded disease. The result was Jayaprabha ('Jaya' from Jayaprakash and 'Prabha' from Prabhavati).

A hospital-cum-research centre on the lines of Bombay's Jaslok could be of great use in Patna, considering that Bihar and UP are both favourite hunting grounds of a number of dangerous diseases. Besides JP could be saved the trouble of flying to Bombay everytime he fell ill. Came the Janata Party, and the idea got a favourable backing. Thanks to the respect JP commanded, many leaders from Delhi were eager to associate themselves with giving the idea concrete shape. The project boasted of big names: On the board of trustees were such luminaries as Gangasharan Singh and Ram Nath Goenka; on the board of management were Chandrashekhar, Karpoori Thakur and Jabir Hussain; among its patrons were Jagjivan Ram, Raj Narain, Nani Palkhivala and Parkash Singh Badal; and the chief patron, Morarji Desai. The chairman was S. M. Joshi and the director and secretary Dr. R. V. P. Sinha and Dr. C. P. Thakur, two of JP's old physician-friends, respectively.

Jayaprabha was to be a nine-storeyed structure built at a total cost of Rs. 4.5 crores. Another Rs. 4.5 crores was to be spent on acquiring medical equipment, and a fixed deposit of Rs. one crore was to be made in a bank, the interest on which would be spent on free treatment for the poor. The Karpoori Thakur Government donated a plot of seven acres. About Rs. ten lakhs more came from various other State Governments and organisations. Appeals were made to the public for donations, to which the response was Rs. 5,000.

Soon, hopes that this was all good work began shrinking. On May 11, 1978 when the President inaugurated the hospital, the ceremony was accompanied by some ugly incidents. The police destroyed a number of huts in the Kankarbagh Colony, and members of JP's Yuva Vahini went into action immediately. One night the hospital's foundation stone was found missing. The rumour spread that residents of the neighbourhood who were angered at the recent incidents, or people opposed to JP had stolen the stone. But a clarification later followed that the management had itself removed the stone for safekeeping.

People opposed to JP began talking about the whole project as an all-too-ambitious plan that would never materialise. To prove their point, they could cite the attitude of persons like Morarji Desai. On a visit to Patna, Mr. Desai was handed a memorandum from the chief patron of the centre asking for central aid, but he refused to commit himself. He all along remained cold towards the idea, quite in keeping with his attitude to JP, though the original plan had envisaged central aid for the project to the extent of more than 50 per cent. To the Centre's unhelpful stance was added the hospital's own problems: A great deal of money was involved, and so, inevitably, corruption. The Amritkosh Trust, which was meant to collect funds for the centre collected as much as Rs. 90 lakhs, Not a paisa was spent on Jayaprabha. But others still tried to help: TELCO gave a mobile equipment car and an ambulance.

JP is now dead, and his idea of Jayaprabha may also be dying People and Governments have forgotten JP's last dream. Doubtless, some people are still keen to see the hospital built. Karpoori Thakur has now appealed to the Central and State Governments to shoulder at least a third of the hospital's costs. The hospital's chairman S. M. Joshi said that its outdoor clinic would start functioning from January, 1980. The small structure has not even been plastered and the doors and windows have not been set on the walls. The unfinished building, where labourers live and cook their meals and dogs bark and defecate, is a sad testimony to the people's and Government's unconcern for the wish of a man they should be grateful to.

ARUN RANJAN

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A sad Sitabdiara

A visit to JP's home village reveals he was one 'prophet' who was honoured by his own folk

By SAUMITRA BANERJEE

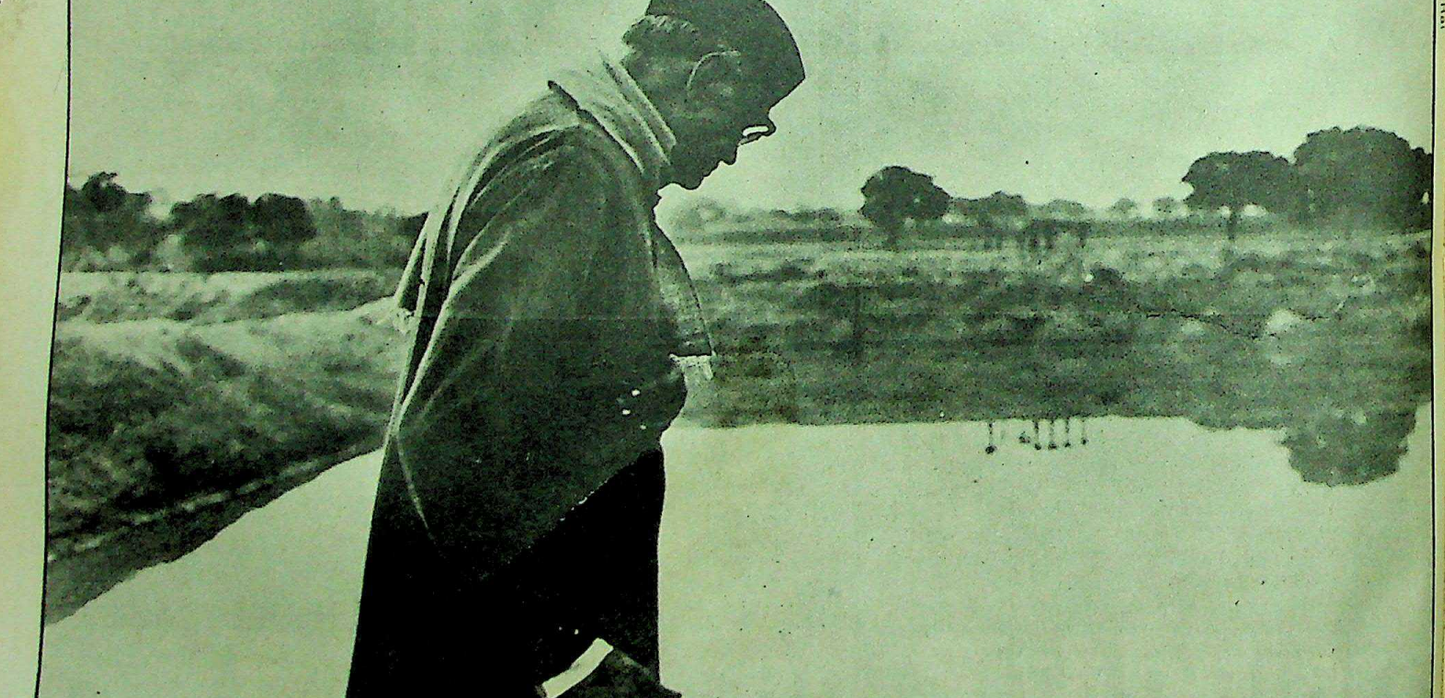
"ARE you going to JP's village?" a man asks us at Sinha Ghat in Arrah, from where we walk to Sitabdiara. All along the way we are asked the same question by anyone we meet. It is roughly a two-hour walk — through fields, a stretch of sand, a ferry ride across the Ganga and finally another stretch through the fields till we reach a small hamlet of about 600 people called Jaya Prakash Nagar in Sitabdiara, Ballia, UP, the place where JP was born.

The approach to the village is a small clearing — the site where the helicopter carrying JP on his last visit to his village on October 5, 1978, landed. From here JP's house is a short walk. It is a rectangular house with a courtyard at the centre and stands amidst a group of thatched huts. It wears a desolate and empty look. In one corner of the corridor are pictures of JP and his wife, Prabhavati Devi. A garland now hangs around JP's picture. The rooms are musty and covered with dust. Portraits of JP's parents hang in one of the rooms. In the middle of the corridor lies a table with a telephone on it. It had been installed at the time of JP's last visit to his village and is now disconnected. Sarju Ram, 79, popularly known as Sarju Bhai, the caretaker of JP's house since 1953, escorts us through the house. We are taken to his bedroom. An old uncovered wooden takhat lies there. There is no other furniture. On the wall hangs a picture of JP taken in his early thirties. The room faces the courtyard. In contrast with the rest of the house the courtyard looks bright; there are flowers growing there. Kamala Ram tells us that JP liked the sight of flowers outside his bedroom. "He told us that we should see to it that the flowers never die. The sight brought him peace," he says.

Sarju Bhai remembers JP as "my brother". "I am both sad and happy that JP has died," he tells us. "I am sad because I loved him and had been with him for so long. He was a true, sincere leader, not like the others. But in a way I am happy that he has died. Politicians had been exploiting him for too long. Especially with the coming elections, they had already started asking him for help. Now they cannot bother him any longer," he said and continues, "I was tilling the soil when I heard the news. It was about eight in the morning. Someone had heard the news over the radio and came over and informed me. I came home and quickly rushed to Patna. By the time I reached Patna, his body had been removed to the Sri Krishna Memorial Hall."

Along with him had left JP's younger brother, Rajeshwar Prasad's wife, and some 25 other villagers. As soon as the news of JP's death spread to Sitabdiara, all shops and schools were immediately shut down. Those who remained in the village huddled around the stray transistors, listening to every announcement being made about JP. And the Gandhi Smarak Nidhi decided to hold prayer meetings for seven days. Recalling his days with JP, Sarju Bhai says, "I had first met JP in Chapra after his return from America. I remember that during a kisan sammelan

JP in Sitabdiara



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

meeting he said that anyone who could not plough the land had no right to be a leader. From then on he became an inspiration for me. JP used to stay in Sitabdiara only for short stretches, say for three or four days at a time. During the 1974 movement JP had come to this village and given speeches. He gathered people around this house and tried to arouse their conscience. On his last visit to Sitabdiara, he expressed the wish that he could come back again, but he said that the end of his time had come."

Next to JP's house is a temple, which had been built in memory of his mother, on the spot where JP's mother had prayed for his life, when, as a child, he was critically ill. Pointing to a well next to the temple Sarju Bhai says, "This is the spot where JP was born. This was a jungle then. But now things have improved." Near the well a few children are playing. I ask, a boy pointing to the house, if he knew whose house it was. "Jaya Prakash-ji's house," he replies. I ask if he knows who he was. "No," comes the reply.

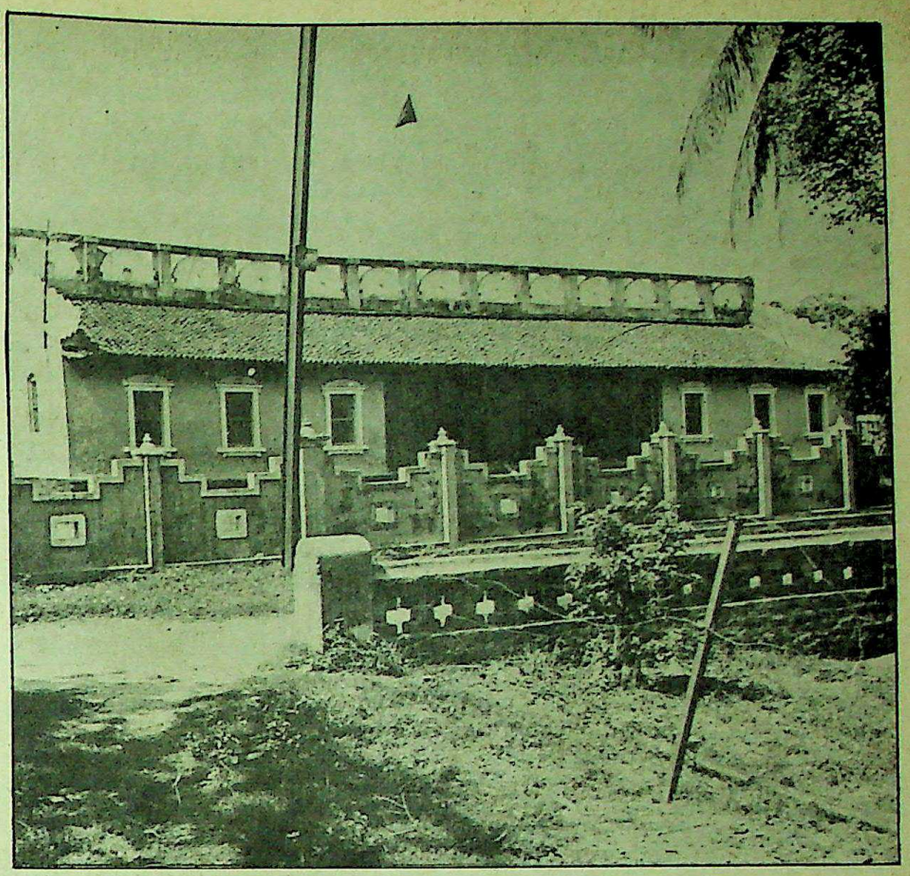
Under a tree sits Kailash Singh, 82, who has spent his entire life in Sitabdiara. In a broken voice he says, "When I heard of JP's death I wanted to take a last look at him. But that was not possible. I am so old and so weak that I just could not manage it. So I went home and thought of him, of the days when he was a child. Let me narrate one incident. When we were both children, JP's father took us to a baba in Lala Tola. As JP was about to touch his feet, the baba stopped him and said, 'Why do you touch my feet? One day the world will touch your feet.'

"I remember the last time he paid a visit to this village. There were so many people crowding him that I could only do namaste to him. This is one of my greatest regrets." Kailash Singh stops speaking and stares in front of him. Then without looking at us he says, "I wish I could have had one last look at JP."

A minute's walk from the temple is the Gandhi Smarak Nidhi, built on land donated by JP. At the gate stands Sukhdeo Singh, watching us approach. "You have come to JP's land. But you should have come last year when he had come here, when he spoke to us. He was our leader. He has given us land, our food," he says. It is evident that JP is loved and respected here as much as anywhere else. Inside the Gandhi Smarak Nidhi we meet Baleswar Prasad Yadav, who looks after the place. "We are feeling his loss. Whenever he came here he visited this place. During his last visit a meeting had been held here. JP has set an example for all of us. It had been decided that a school for girls would be inaugurated here, on his birthday but now that has been postponed," he says.

Walking along the dust track we find a small group of people assembled around a man, narrating the events during JP's funeral. He has just returned from Patna and everyone is anxious to hear what he has to say. We wind our way past JP's house again, on our way back to the city. A man beckons to us. "Have you seen what JP has done for us? He has given us land and we even have schools here. Even though he is not there now, we will all remember him here in Jaya Prakash Nagar." We listen and then carry on. We walk to an embankment which marks the beginning of Jaya Prakash Nagar. Sarju Bhai, who has been walking with us, stops and says, "You go now. You have a long walk ahead of you." Then, as an afterthought, he mumbles to himself, "I wonder what is going to happen to JP's house now. Is it going to be placed under a trust? Is it going to be sold? I wonder if I will remain its caretaker..." ■

Krishna M Sharma



JP's house in Sitabdiara

How the people felt

MR A. G. NOORANI who met JP regularly during the dark days of the Emergency recalls vividly the scene of JP's hospitalisation at the Jaslok Hospital during the Emergency. On the balcony of the 16th floor just outside JP's room there were two typewriters, one telephone and a posse of policemen. Dr Shantilal Mehta, who was head of Jaslok at the time, was in constant touch with Mrs Gandhi about the state of JP's health. On the ground floor Rajni Patel, who was still Mrs Gandhi's right-hand man before Sanjay Gandhi took over, used to hold court in the Registrar's room that was specially vacated for him. His son was being treated at the hospital at the same time. The son of a Minister of Maharashtra was also there for an operation and commenting on the situation, the wife of the Minister with a gesture of her hand described the gathering in Rajni's room as the Diwan-e-Khas and pointing upwards

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

to the 16th floor, where JP was, she said that it was the Diwan-e-Am. The reference was to friends and ordinary people, who came to see JP during the Emergency. JP was never alone, remembers Noorani, and people always came to see him. E.M.S. Namboodiripad came. And so did Sheikh Abdullah — the Sheikh had rung up in November 1975, and said he wanted to see JP. He came, kissed JP's hand and left in the evening. Mrs Gandhi never came though she was advised to do so.

GEORGE FERNANDES recalled how, though it was Peter Alvares who brought him into the Socialist movement, it was "JP who sustained me in the movement. And JP was a pillar of strength to me ever since. During my underground days, when even the Socialists attacked me, it was JP who gave me courage to go on. After the 1977 Elections were announced it was JP who sent me a note in prison insisting that I should be a candidate. He said the youth of the country was with me. During the railway strike when I was in Tihar Jail, JP who was then in Nellore Hospital for an operation, extended support to the strike. He even sent a telegram to Mrs Indira Gandhi asking her to come to some settlement with the striking railwaymen."

NAROTTAMBHAI of the Sarvodaya Mandal has seen JP in various stages of his political development. The first time was during the Bhoodan movement in 1962, then during the crisis of the Bihar famine and finally during the Bihar Andolan in 1973 when JP took an active role again. JP was very excited at that time, remembers the soft-spoken Narottambhai. "He told me during one of our evening walks: 'I see in people's eyes and people's minds a new awakening' In 1973 from the Paunar Ashram itself, he started the Youth for Democracy after which came the pulsating Nav Nirman movement in Gujarat followed by the Total Revolution movement in Bihar. JP treated everyone equally, says Narottambhai.

RAMNATH GOENKA, the newspaper tycoon, was too distraught for words. He was making preparations to go to Patna and when contacted he said: "My problem is I am leaving just now. And what can I say. Just leave me alone. I'm not up to the mark" and his voice trailed off in despair which one does not usually associate with the man-of-steel Goenka.

OLGA TELLIS, Bombay

AS AIR flashed the incorrect news of JP's death on March 22, 1979, restaurants on Mount Road, Madras, switched off their radios anticipating mournful music. Some played records. Others hoped that their jukeboxes would be kept busy. People standing in the queue to see Mackenna's Gold at the Devi cinema were worried that the show would be cancelled.

The reaction on October 8, was not very different. By ten in the morning as the news of JP's death was confirmed, moviehouses got frantic calls; book-sellers hastily displayed books by JP.

One of the persons who really made JP's name better known is Kumari Ananthan, sometime Janata MP, whose mustard-sharp sense of humour and wit had won a sizeable support for the Janata Party in the Kanyakumari district. "In November when we heard that JP was critically ill, some of us held a day's fast on the Congress grounds", Mrs Krishnamoorthy said. "And we invited the so-called friends of JP. Many of them didn't have the courtesy to say, no. They said, they'd come and didn't keep their word. On the other hand, around that time, many young people belonging to the now much-maligned RSS staged a satyagraha along with Sarvodaya and Congress (O) workers on Mount Road and were brutally treated by the police".

ARTHUR PAIS, Madras

"WE KNEW JP was going to leave us very soon, but we did not expect him to die so quickly. However, it is good that he died in his sleep peacefully and did not suffer any more", said Rashbehari Das, a young student.

"Amid all this talk about the Lok Sabha elections this news is shocking. It should be a lesson to our politicians. While they are fighting among themselves, the man who did so much to bring them together is no more" said an elderly gentleman.

Some cinema halls downed their shutters and this caused many, whose offices and institutions had declared a holiday, to grumble. Although there was an air of grief, the mourning was not universal. A young draughtsman, S. Ghosh, working in an engineering firm was vociferous about his lack of feeling: "What has JP done for us? Indeed, he made us realise what democracy means but what has he given us in return? A bunch of politicians who are even more corrupt than the past regime". "You're wrong" retorted a young student, Naren Chakrabarty. "What he gave us was not a bunch of corrupt politicians but a method of mass protest".

TIRTHANKAR GHOSH, Calcutta

PEOPLE in Punjab heard the news of JP's death for the first time over All India Radio's eight o'clock news bulletin.

October 8 was declared a holiday by the State Government and it turned out to be like any other holiday. Shops in Chandigarh pulled up their shutters after a few hours and did brisk business. Cinema houses continued with their routine shows. The civil secretariat hummed with activity with scores of people drafting condolence resolutions. Schools and colleges were declared closed after the students had observed silence and prayed briefly for the Loknayak's departed soul.

Jayaprakash Narayan had spent four months and 12 days during the Emergency in Chandigarh's Post Graduate Institute of Medicine. It was here that JP reportedly developed kidney trouble and later this ailment reached a chronic stage necessitating dialysis. JP's death was the topic of discussion among those doctors who had treated him at the PGI in 1975. After his release JP had admitted that he was well looked after at the PGI but was starved for company.

A CORRESPONDENT, Chandigarh

A Kumar

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

THE Loknayak's death has shocked the people of Orissa. The shock was so profound that people put up JP's photographs in houses and shops and garlanded them profusely. Some people were seen weeping bitterly. Shops pulled down their shutters as a mark of respect. Indeed it was ironical that JP passed away only hours after the Orissa unit of the Janata Party merged into the Lok Dal at a convention in Bhubaneswar in which Mr Biju Patnaik had announced that the Lok Dal was the Party of the Loknayak.

The people of the State fondly remember JP's visit to Orissa on April 1, 1975 which coincidentally was the formation day of Orissa. About two-and-a-half months after his Orissa visit he was jailed by Mrs Indira Gandhi. Orissa hangs down her head in shame when the people remember the heinous attempt to assassinate him at Dhenkanal by those in power. Orissa also remembers with gratitude the young men who saved him from certain death at that time. Many of those young men are now MLAs and one of them left by road for Patna to have a last darshan of the departed leader.

All the events are history now. Perhaps, the saddest man in Orissa is Mr Biju Patnaik. On hearing the news he was stunned and it was only after he had overcome the initial shock that he blurted out: "A great soul has passed away". Dr H. K. Mahatab, the veteran leader, fumbled for words when he was informed by a news agency man of the death. He only said: "I am very sorry."

A CORRESPONDENT

WHEN at breakfast-time the news of JP's death was broadcast over radio, people accepted the news as sadly and resignedly as they endure the unchanging pattern of their own lives. Truly, there was none of the shock and disbelief which had given a dimension of near-desperate hysteria to the sorrow in evidence when Gandhi and later Nehru died. Demoralising as JP's death was, nonetheless, it was only expected. Indeed in the common man's reckoning it was a merciful end—not only because it brought to an end his harrowing dialysed survival but much more because to the minds of the frustrated proletariat, JP's greatest achievement—the Janata Party's victory in 1977—was brutally converted into the greatest ever betrayal of the people. "A good man died" was the honest if bland refrain in towns, villages and their marketplaces. Life went on perhaps a trifle more morosely than usual, with a sense of inexorability.

At bars and pubs which is the one place where the Goan mind uninhibitedly expresses itself, the common remark was "God might as well have spared JP and remembered other older men who have ruined us."

MARIO CABRAL E SA, Goa

DESPITE reacting unenthusiastically to JP's call for Total Revolution in the troubled times that preceded the Emergency, and giving him a none too pompous reception when he last visited Trivandrum the people of this palm-fringed State showed their feeling by joining other mourners throughout the country.

Sadness engulfed political circles as the news of his sudden demise broke soon after the Assembly had adjourned sine die in the wake of the resignation of the PKV Ministry. With spontaneous expressions of sorrow, leaders of various political Parties reacted emotionally to the news as K. Chandrashekharan of the Janata Party went around informing people. Formal condolences followed. The last time JP's "death" was erroneously announced, the Assembly was in session and did not care to call a condolence meeting. But this time the people of the State were themselves quick to react.

As for tributes, there were many: The Governor, Mrs Jothi Venkatachellum, hoped in a message that the "evergreen" memory of JP would continue to inspire the country; the void created by his death would remain unfilled, said the former CM, Mr P. K. Vasudevan Nair; he synthesised Gandhism with Socialism, said the new CM Mr C. H. Mohammad Koya of the Muslim League; free India would remember him with gratitude, was an unlikely remark from the Congress (I) leader and former CM, K. Karunakaran; a great karmayogi who gave moral and political leadership to the people, was how Chakkeri Ahmed Kutty described JP; his death removed the last of the national stalwarts, commented K. M. Chandy of the Congress (I); the greatest of Indian leaders after Gandhi, said K. Chandrashekaran of the Janata. The Marxist leader E. M. S. Namboodiripad recalled how the departed leader had reminded him on his last visit to the State, of the fact that they were the first socialists in the country, and how they had worked together and also in opposite camps. One particularly sad comment from an elderly person was. "JP was one of the few leaders who did not pursue power."

G. S. KARTHA, Trivandrum

The mysteries of JP's will

JP wrote his will thrice. By way of property, JP had a house and some land in Sitabdiara which he inherited. JP's younger brother, Rajeshwar Prasad, had sold his portion of the land and bought a house in Bombay. JP received the Magsaysay award and from this sum he had put aside Rs. 50,000 in the bank.

The first will had said that his properties in the village would go to his nephew, Anil, and the cash distributed among the various organisations which JP founded. This will should have come into effect immediately after Prabhavatiji's death because during her lifetime she exercised exclusive rights over the property. This will was prepared in the presence of his wife.

Time passed and Prabhavatiji died. Then came the Emergency and JP was sent to jail. During his detention at the Post Graduate Institute of Medicine at Chandigarh, JP wrote his second will. By this time he had given away Rs. 15,000 to different people as was his habit, and only Rs. 35,000 was left with JP. In this will he left some money for Gulab, his personal attendant, some for his sister and the rest for organisations he had started.

JP wrote his third and last will in 1978. By this time, his savings in the bank had earned some interest and on April 30, 1978, he received Rs. one lakh as an award from Chagla. This money was used for JP's treatment in Seattle. What remained was in the bank. The third will earmarked certain amounts in cash for Gulab, JP's sister, and the organisations which he began. A few bighas of land and the house at Sitabdiara are left to Anil, his nephew. JP's properties which are not mentioned in the document will be controlled by trustees named in the third will. They are- Ganga Singh, Jainarayan Sahay and Shivnath Babu.

Apart from the will, JP had written to the then Chief Minister of Bihar, Srikrishna Singh in 1957 saying that "no memorial should be built after my death". In 1972, on the occasion of JP's 70th birthday, Sarvodaya workers had planed to collect money for "Jayaprakash fund" and to use the money for the Sarvodaya movement. When Jainarayan Sahay communicated this plan to JP who was at that time resting in a guest house at Bangalore JP's reply was: "Please do not collect any fund in my name. If the fund is meant for good cause I can help with the collection. I am strongly opposed to collecting funds in my name".

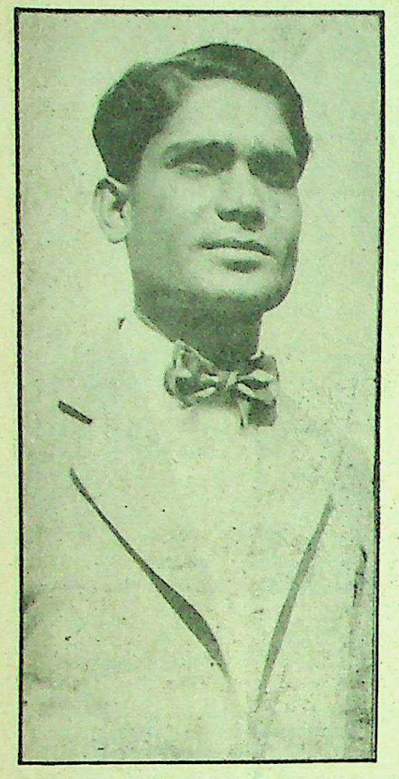
The first two wills stand cancelled and only the will which JP wrote in 1978 is valid.

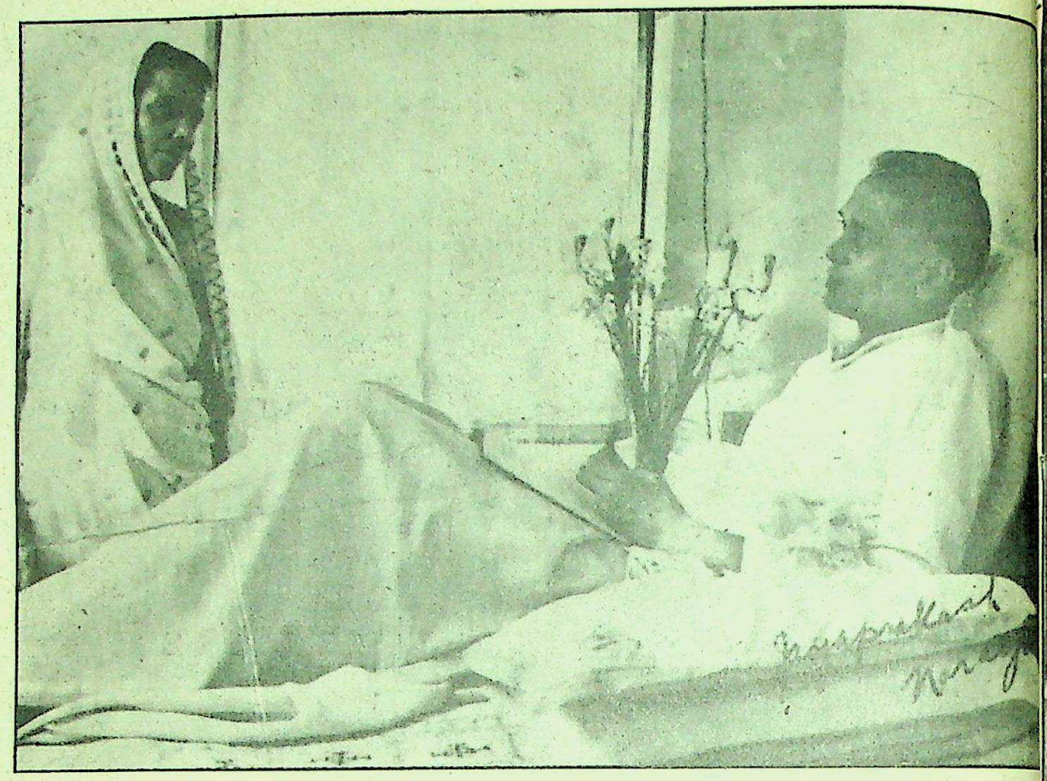
SANTOSH BHARTIYA

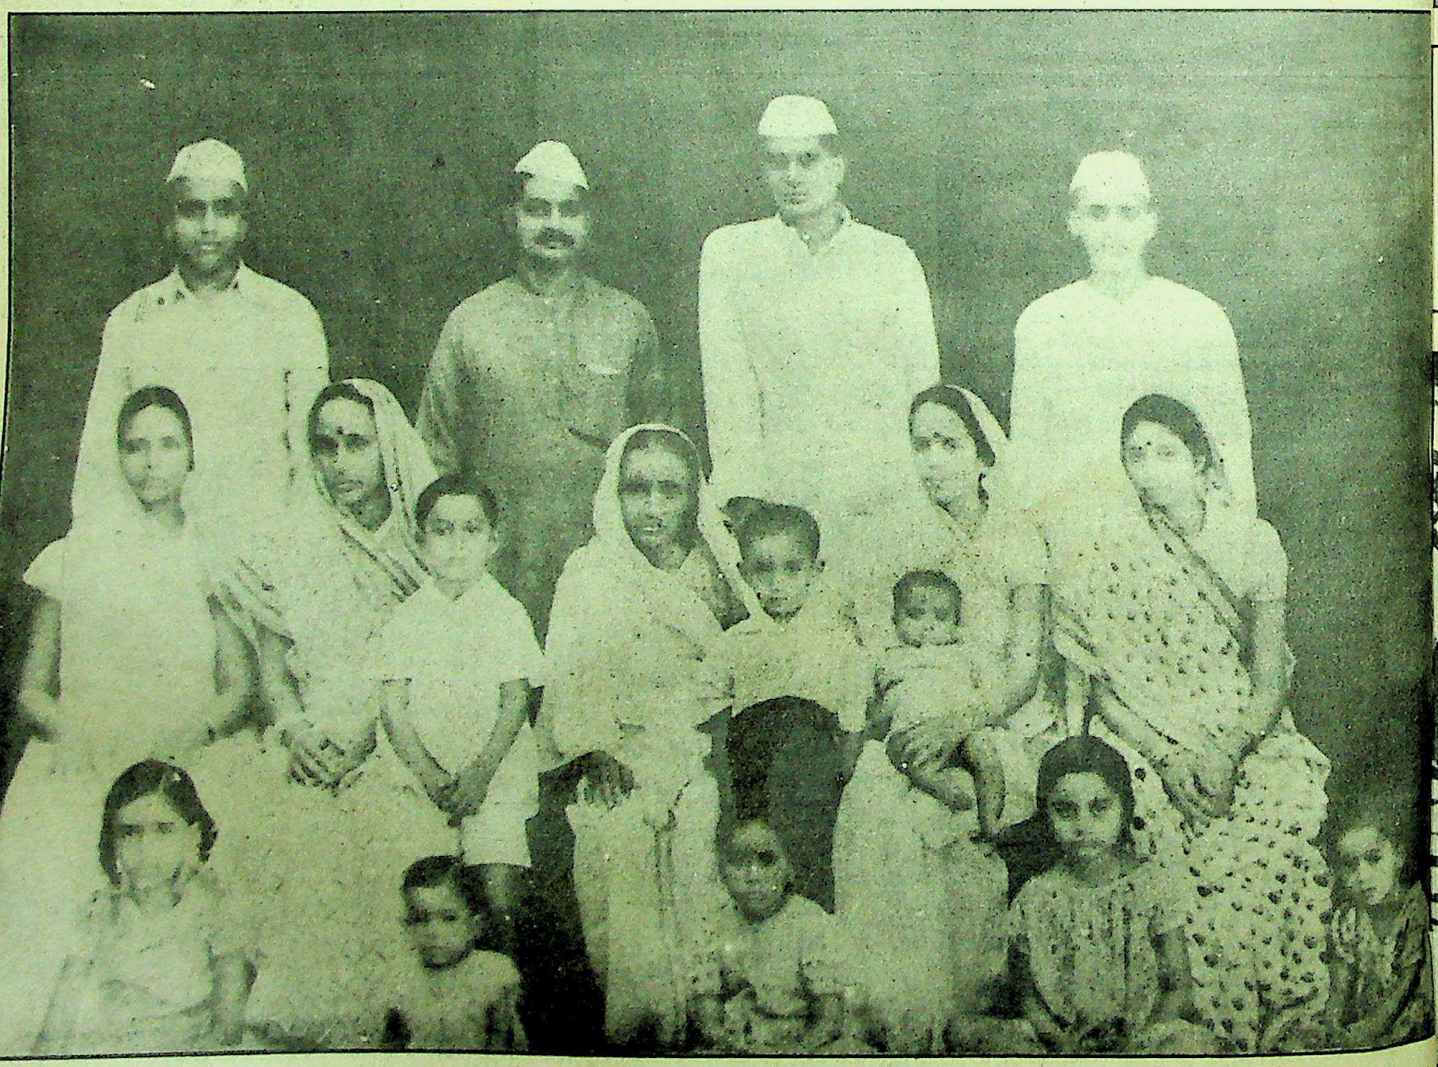
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

A great man's life





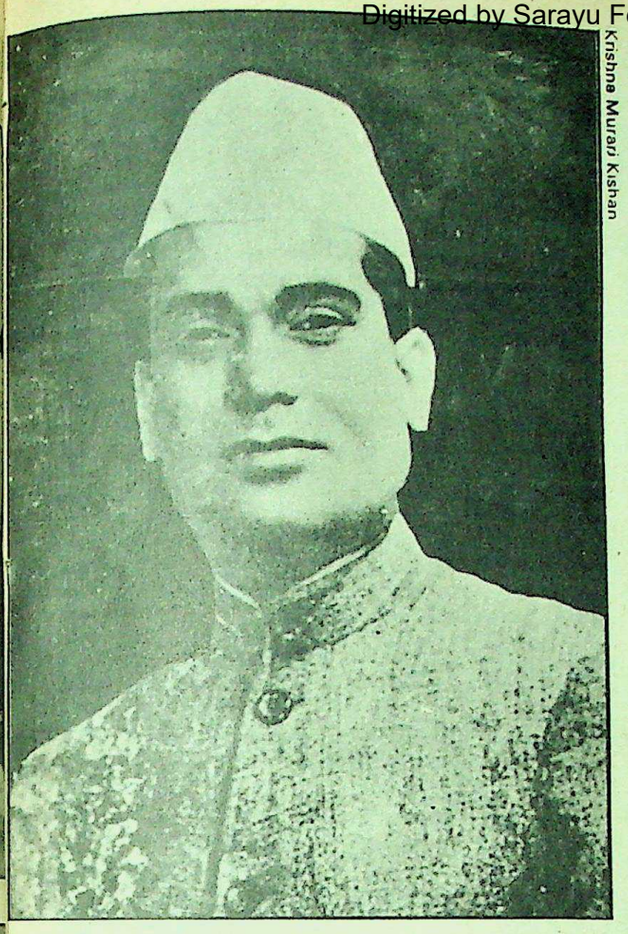


Krishna Murari Kishan

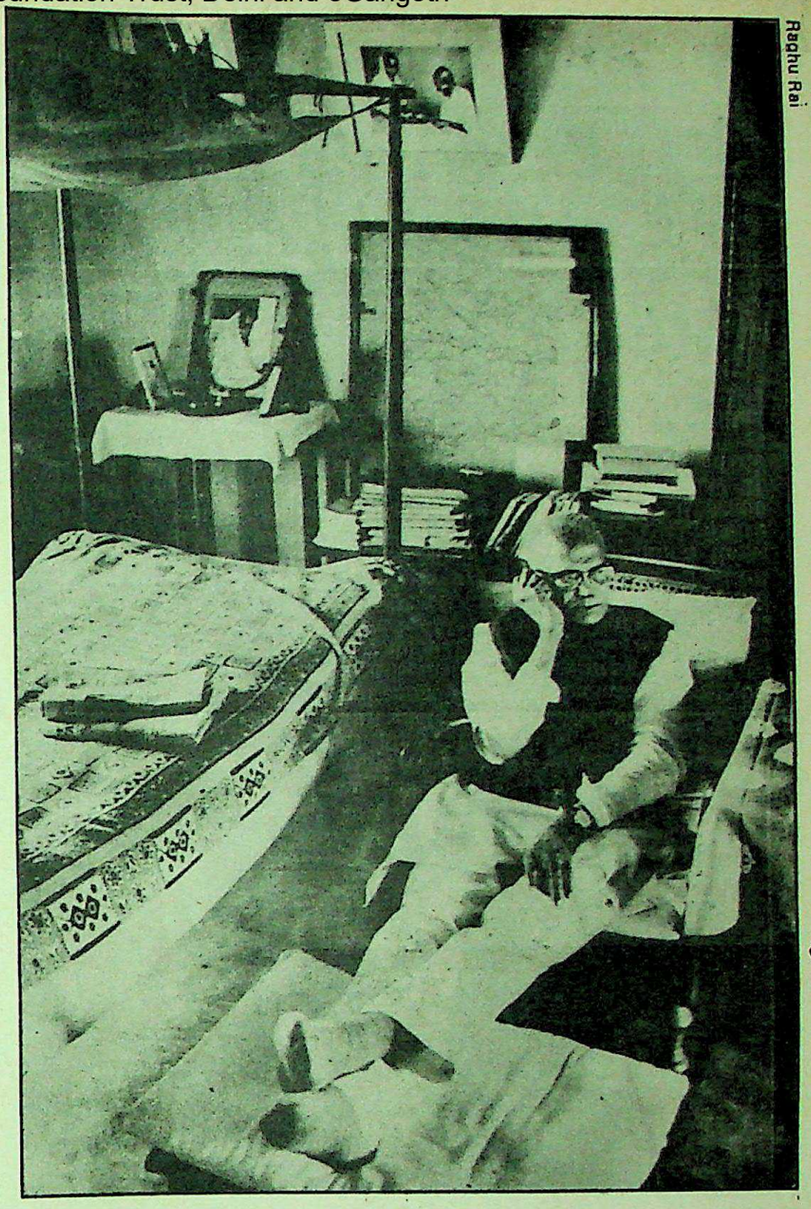
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

ife

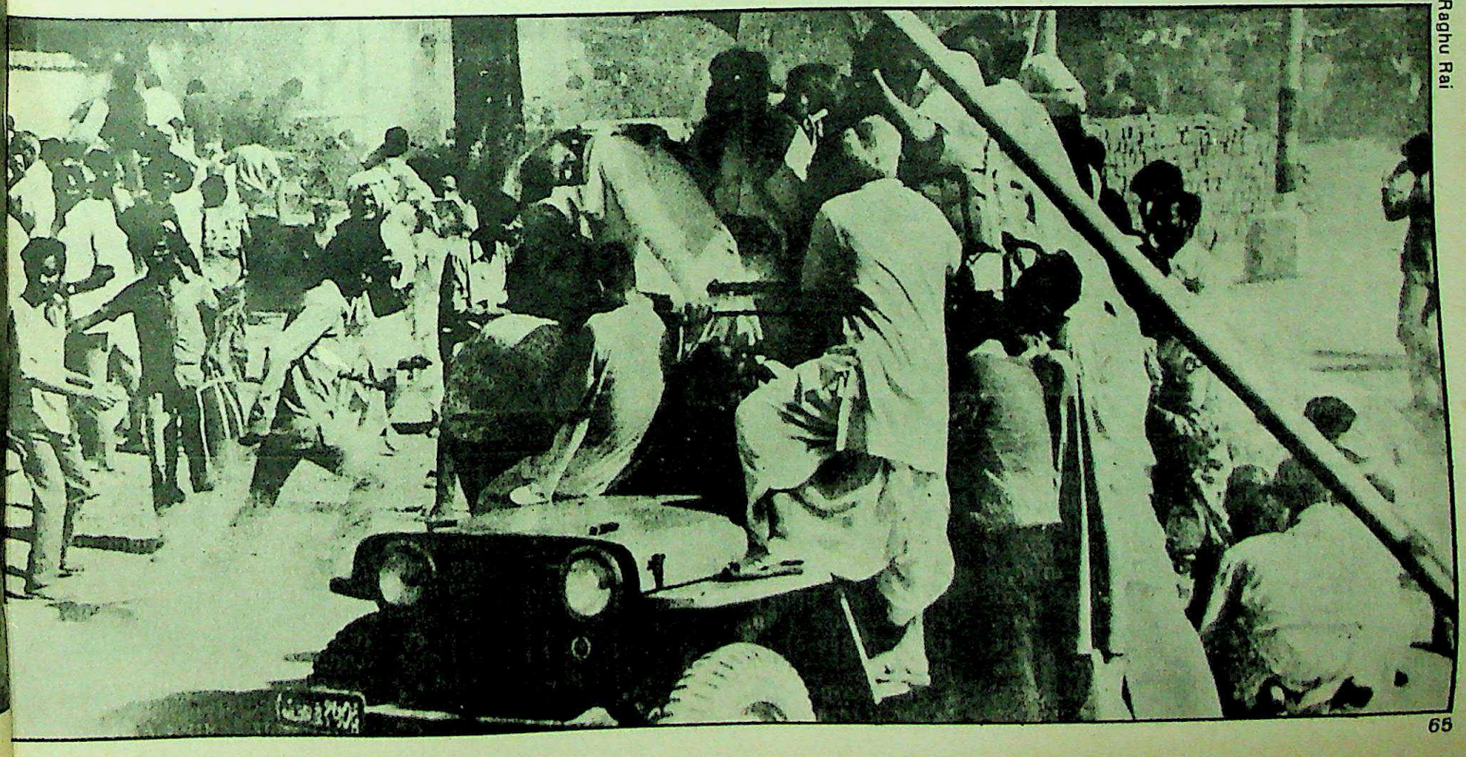


Krishna Murari Kishan



Raghu Rai

Clockwise (from far left, top): JP after his return from the USA; the final break from Marxism: at the end of the 21-day purification fast, 1952 with his wife in Poona; as a nationalist leader; in a pensive mood in his room in Kadam Kuan; covering his face after being teargassed during the 1974 Bihar movement; with his family.

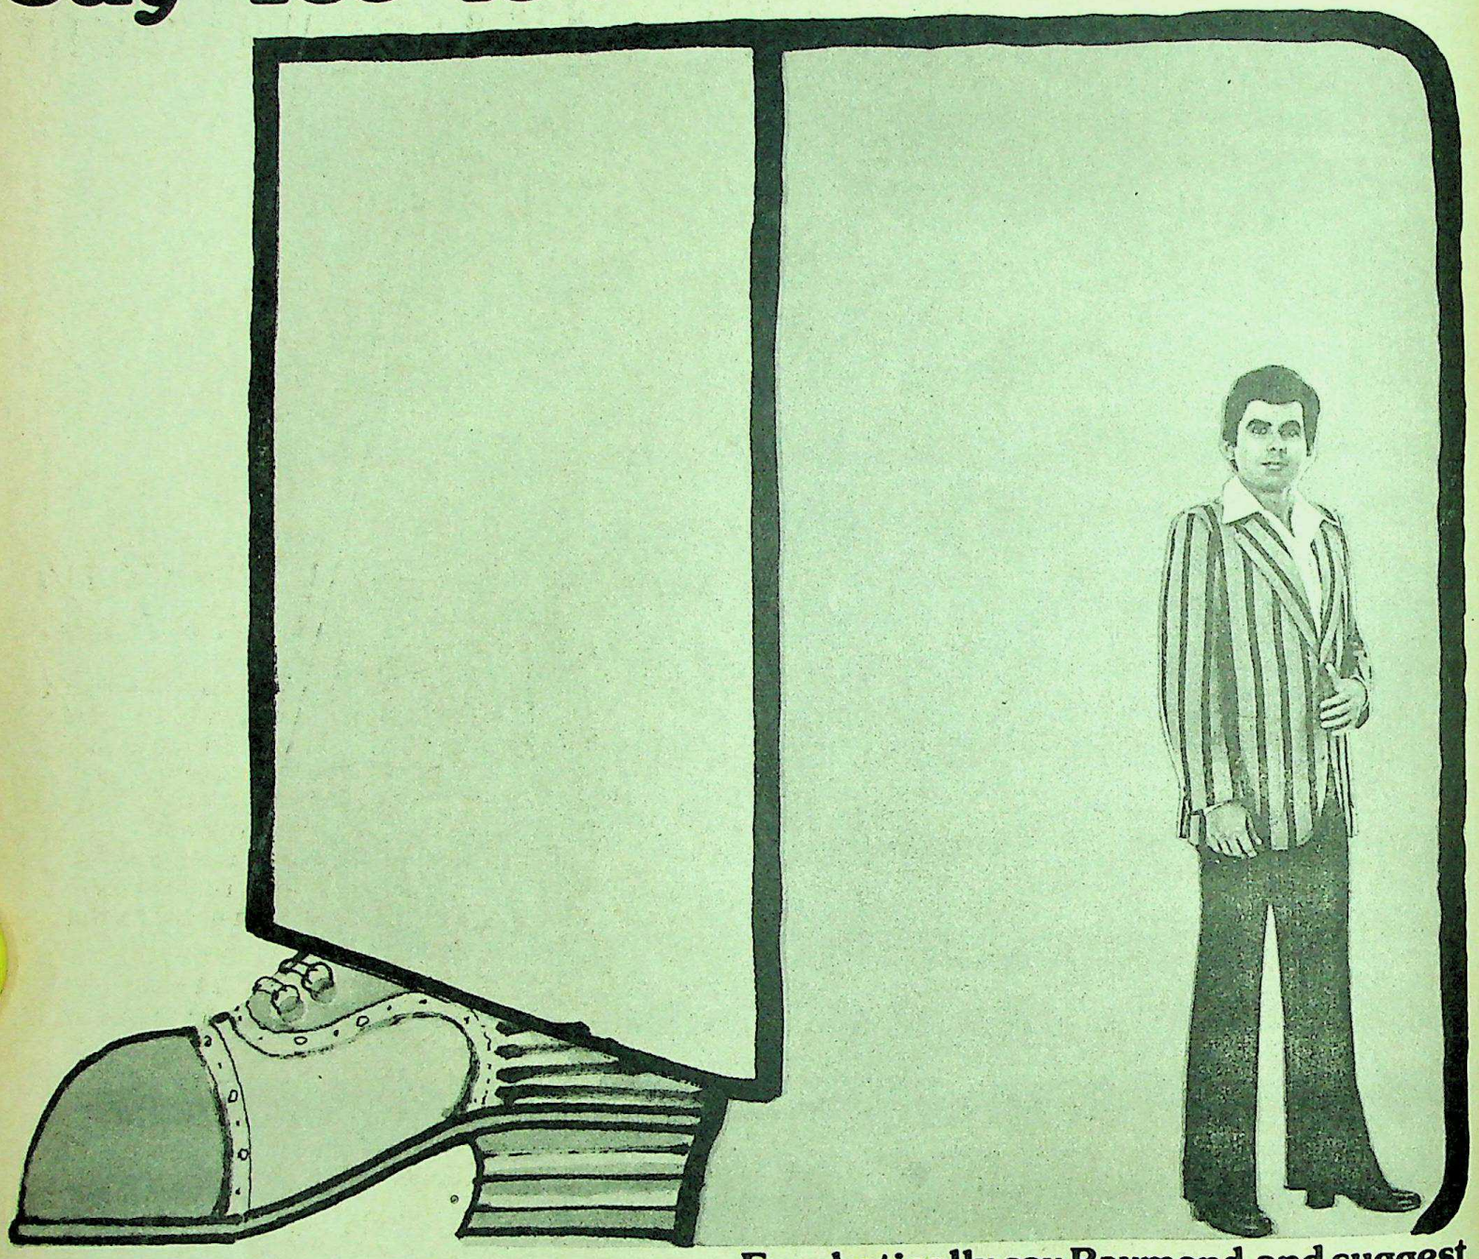


Raghu Rai

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Should a short man say 'Yes' to a tall heel?



Emphatically, say Raymond, and suggest other areas where 'Yes' is right.

The high heel adds inches, but the world needn't know. Your trousers should be long enough to conceal the tall heel. Cut for slimness, shaped about the calf. The jacket distinctively striped . . . and the short man soars to imaginative new heights.

79's fashions aid and abet.

Narrower lapels complement the straighter tie and squared-off collar. The tall elegant silhouette has come into its own. Be very careful, though, about the fabric.

We are. Raymond's superb quality is ensured in every metre by 250 (that's right, 250!) 'perfect-fabric' processes. Value woven right into the warp and the weft. It wears well through the life of the fabric. Remember the name, Raymond's — the fabric that gives you true value. This year or next.

Raymond's Suitings

A Guide to the Well-Dressed Male

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

All colourful festivals begin at home with Bombay Paints

Give your house the festive look.

With Bombay Paints your walls resound with mirth, your windows breeze in good cheer, your doors swing light-heartedly and you hit the ceiling with our vast range of colours. Making your entire house celebrate the ritual of colours.

Bombay Paints are easy to apply, cover greater areas and last longer than any other paint.

Bombay paints

& ALLIED PRODUCTS LTD.

Kangaroo Paints-best in the long run

ARMS-BP-30-270

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

3000 year old recipe for total health

Dabur Chyawanprash builds family health in four ways

Vitamin C rich, tasty sweet-sour compound in its natural form

1. Keeps body tissues young
Dabur Chyawanprash slows down the wear of body tissues.

2. Builds body immunity
Dabur Chyawanprash raises the total body resistance, and is also indicated in coughs and colds.

3. Builds alertness
Dabur Chyawanprash helps build alertness in children and develops the faculties in old age.

4. Has anabolic properties
Dabur Chyawanprash helps in the upbuilding of the body.

Recipe of the gods
The recipe for Chyawanprash dates back over 3000 years, when, it is said, the physicians of the gods prescribed it for Rishi Chyawana to restore his youth. Although the oldest health tonic in the world, it is today manufactured by Dabur in a modern, hygienic and fully automated factory.

An Ayurvedic health tonic

Dabur CHYAWANPRASH

Available at all leading chemists and medical shops

Saving... not peculiar to man alone. But man perfected it.

Beavers – of the hundreds of rodents, the most superior is the beaver. It is known for its efficiency and technical skill in organising its domain. An expert architect it is probably the beaver that taught man to build dams.

And Andhra Bank has further refined it.

There are many examples of savers in nature. The beaver for instance saves and stores food for the needy day.
Man, with his superior intelligence, has extended the range of saving.
Saving quite a few essentials.
And money, most important of all.
Helping him save money for all his needs, is Andhra Bank. Through a range of schemes tailor-made to suit everyone in the family.

Our Schemes :
- Kalpatharuvu • Bhagyalakshmi
- Kiddy Bank • Samraksha
- Samkshema • Janasahaya
- Gruhakalpa • Karshakasahaya
- Social Security Scheme for Women • Cash Certificate.

Andhra Bank
– the bank responsive to people's needs.

The Andhra Bank Ltd.

Regd. & Central Office:
Sultan Bazar, Hyderabad-500 001.

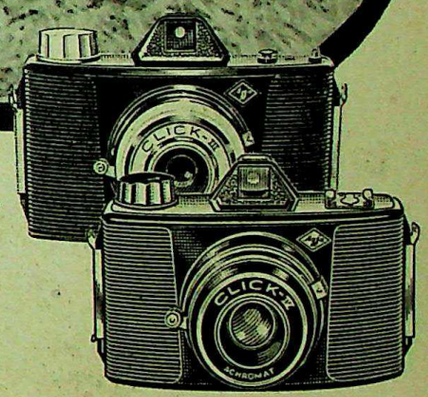
Chairman: O. SWAMINATHA REDDY

KIRON/AB/79-2

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation

The fun never fades with Agfa Click



The aim-and-shoot cameras.

Snap up all the fun coming your way at picnics, parties, birthdays, holiday trips. It costs less than you think. And it's fun all over again, when you've kept it all with just a "Click". Keep a Click handy. Contact your nearest Agfa-Gevaert dealer.

Distributors:
Agfa-Gevaert India Limited
Regd. Office:
Merchant Chambers,
41, New Marine Lines,
Bombay 400 020.

Agfa Click III and Click IV

® Registered Trademarks of Agfa-Gevaert, Antwerp/Leverkusen.

SIMOES/AG/6/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

"Our tastes are simple. We only wear the best."

Te-i-Tex

TERENE

Suiting/Shirting

They're the best

The Technological Institute of Textiles, Bhiwani.

MAPP/TIT/1146

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Nature's secret discovered!

makes you noticeably fairer ...in Nature's own gentle way.

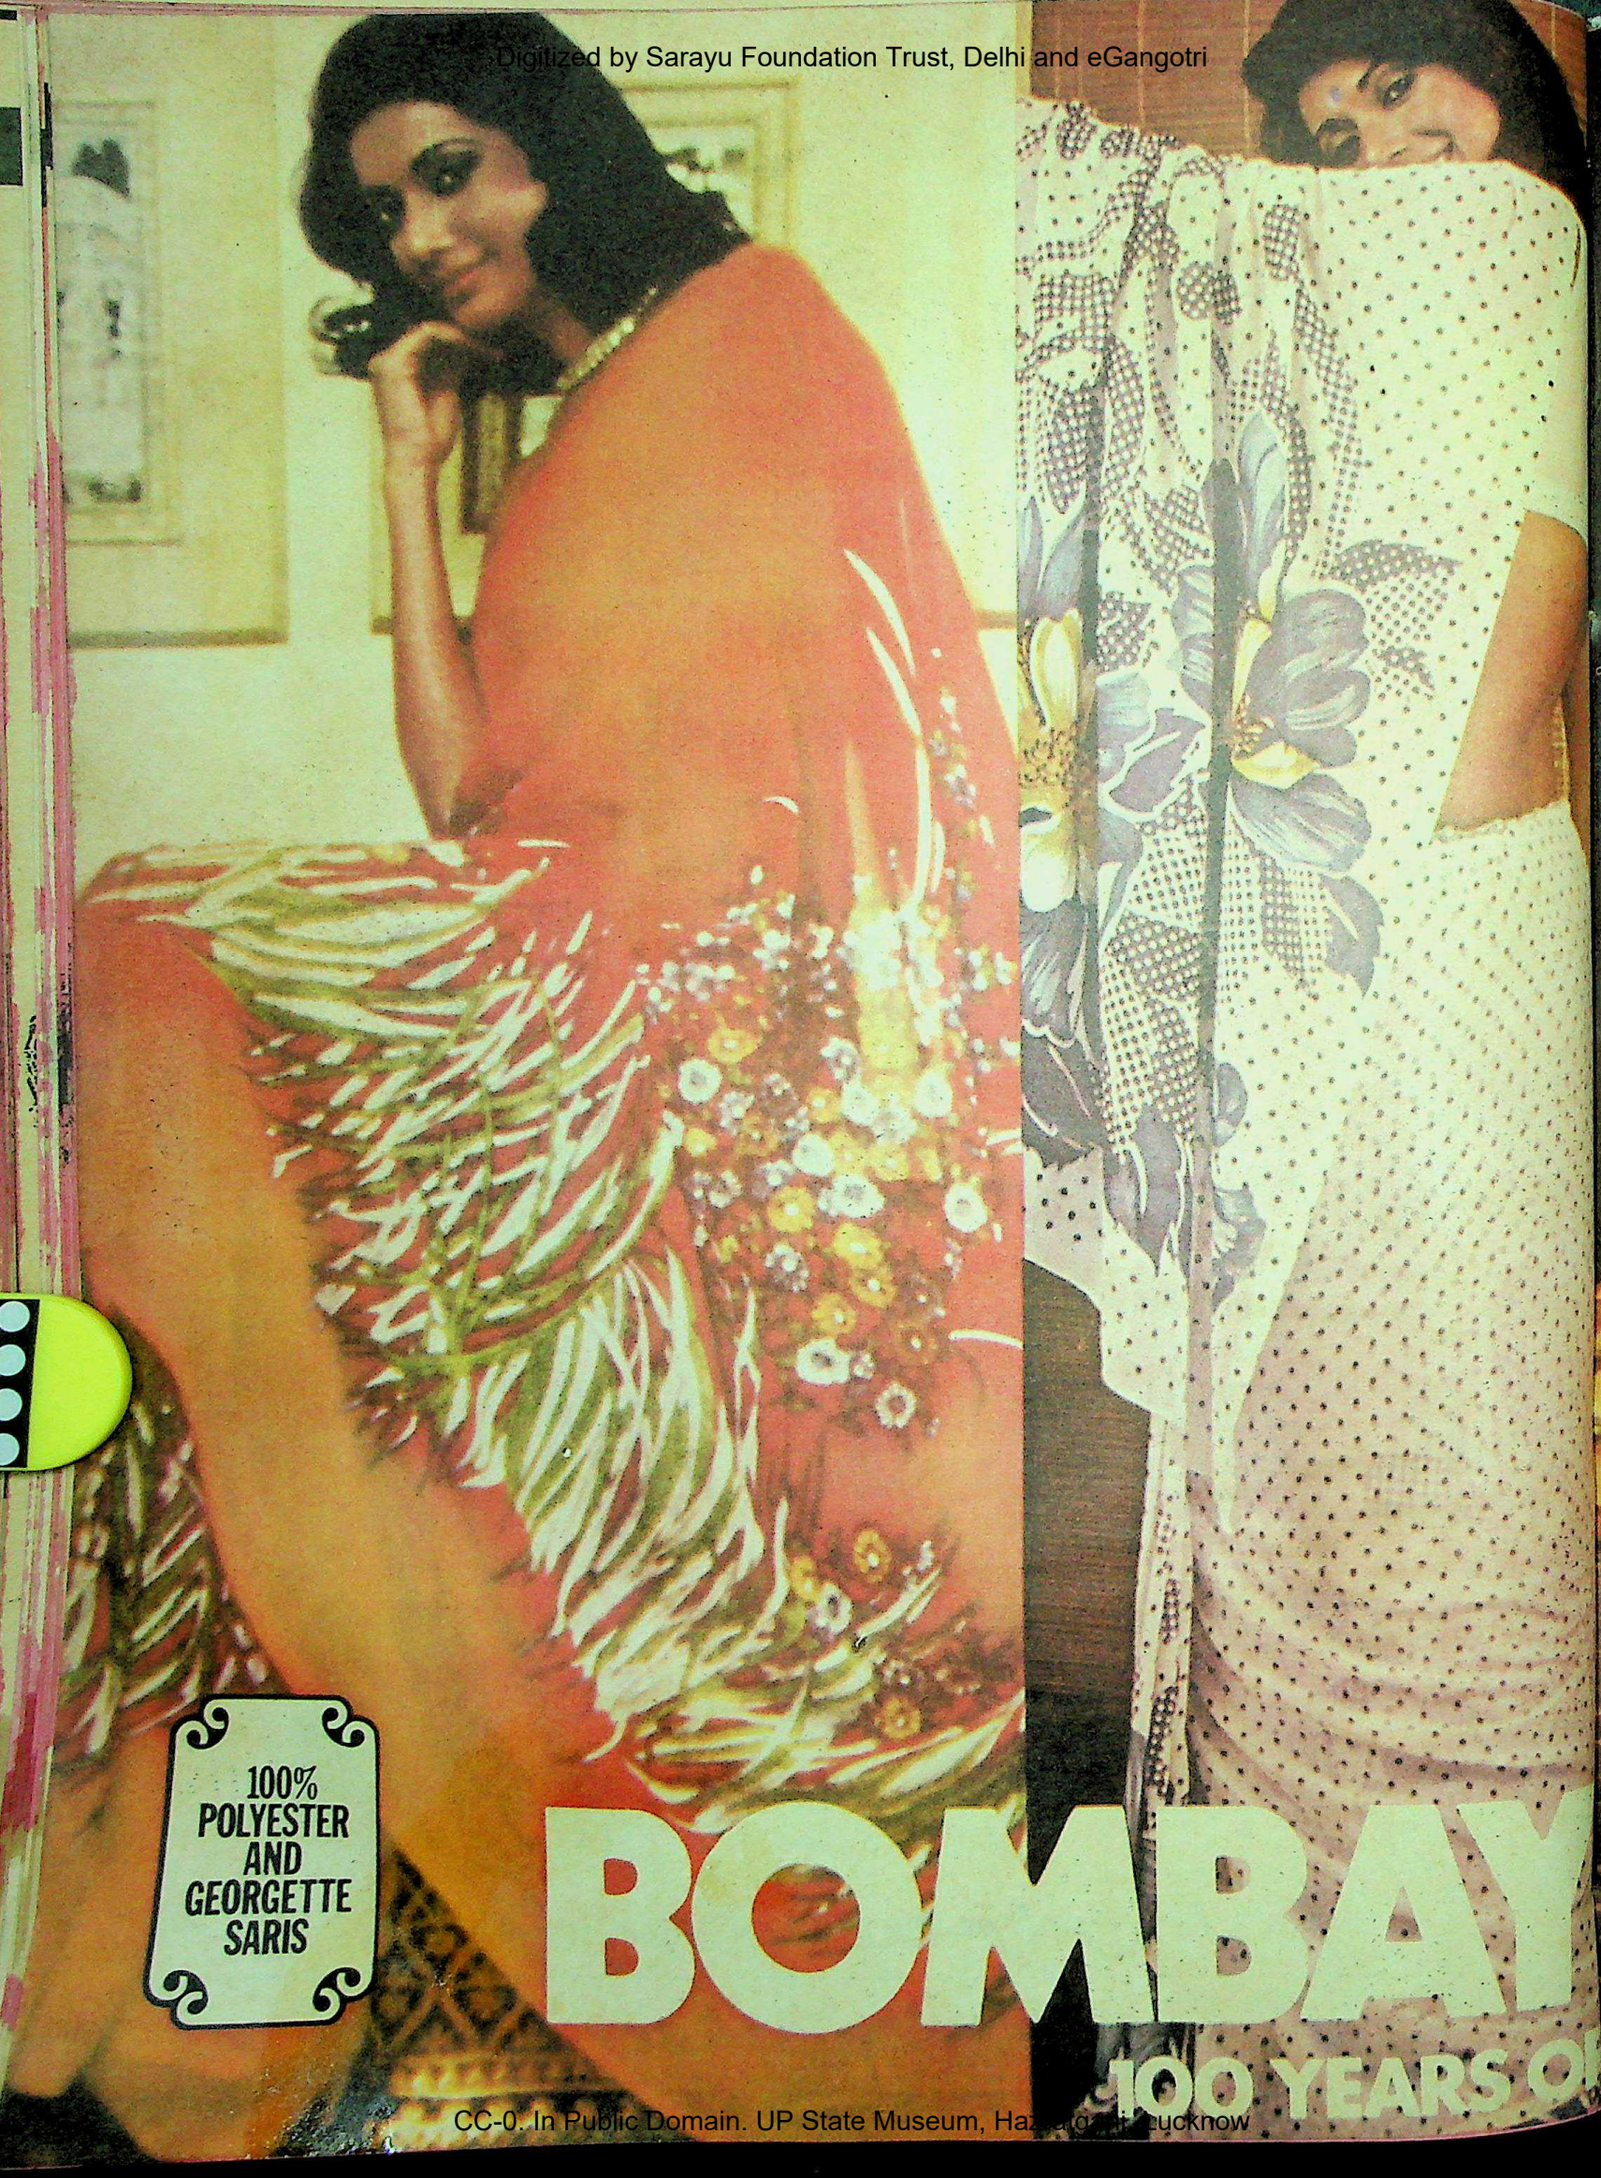
Fair & Lovely contains a unique ingredient that works within your skin to reverse the process of darkening—naturally, gently, safely. It thus makes you noticeably fairer in 6 weeks of daily use.

Fair & Lovely – the gentle way to a fairer skin.

LINTAS-FALOV-9-2415

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Haz[illegible] Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation

PALLAV TALK. AND HOW TO USE IT.

DYEING

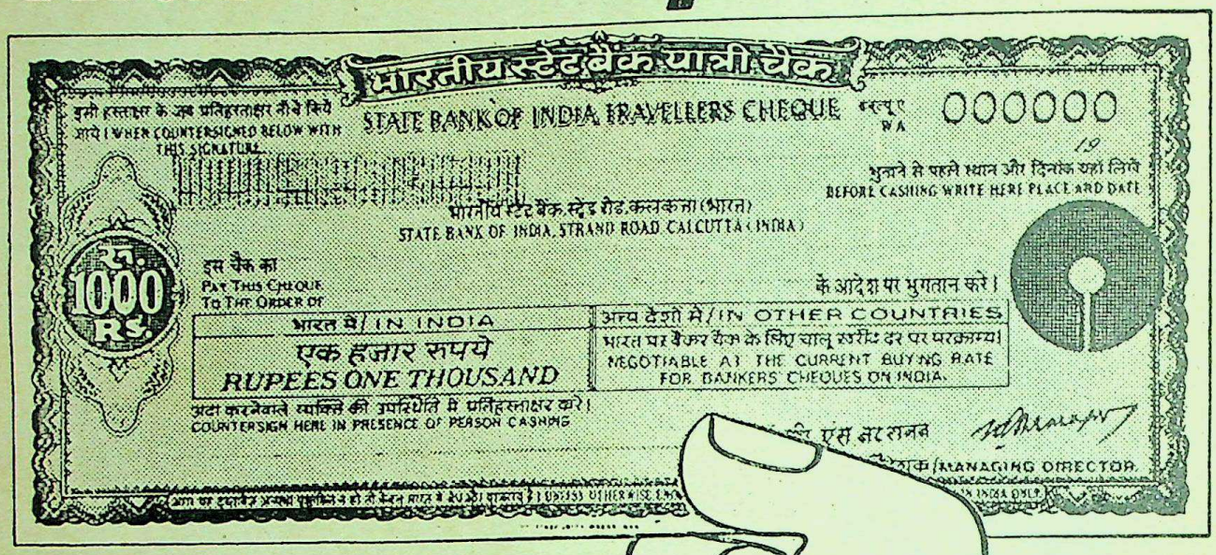
FASHION EXCITEMENT

COTTON AND POLYESTER DRESS FABRICS

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

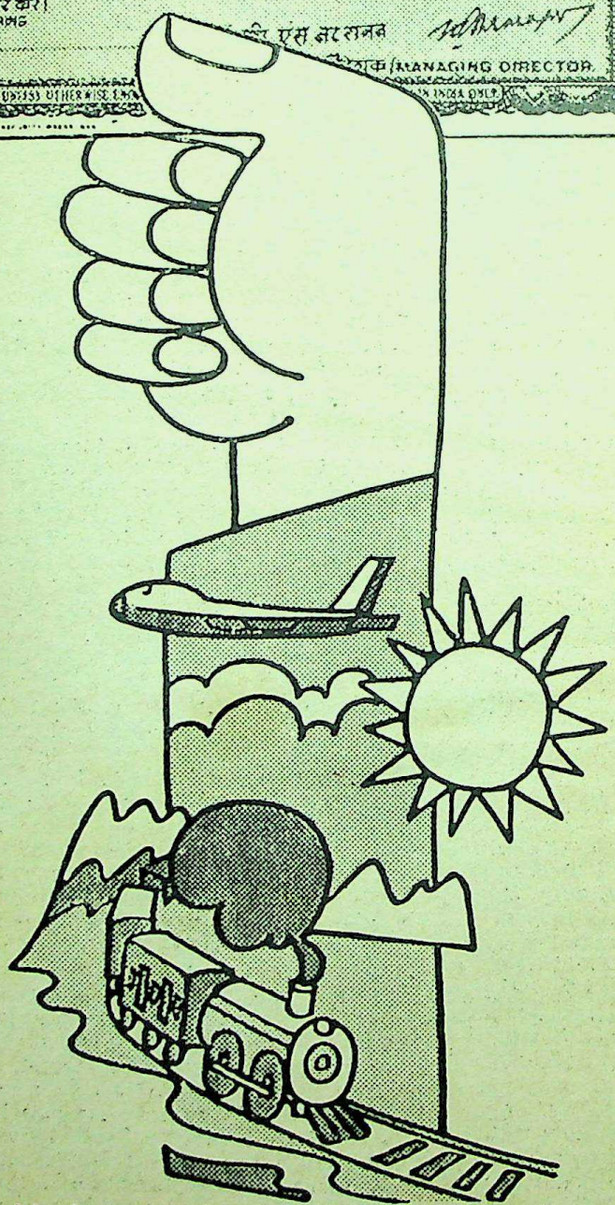
Now, the 1000 rupees that nobody can rob!



State Bank's new Rs. 1000/- Travellers Cheque.

- Also available in denominations of Rs.50, Rs.100 and Rs.500 from over 7300 offices of State Bank of India and its Associate Banks.
- Issued and encashed free of charge.
- Money back guarantee (if lost or stolen) from the offices of issue.
- Simple to use: no identification required while encashing.
- Valid for an indefinite period.
- Cashable at over 25,000 outlets all over India.

State Bank Travellers Cheques The money you simply cannot lose.



SBI/4933

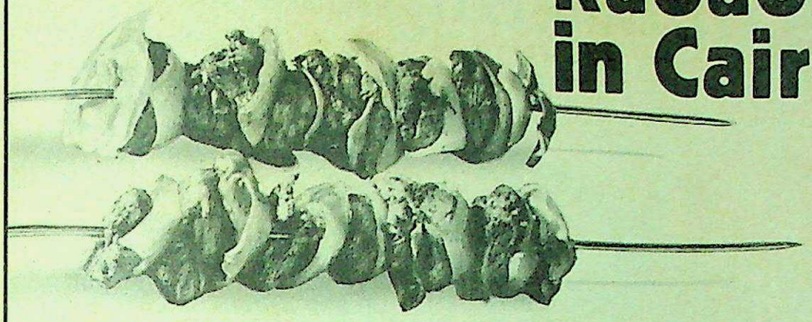
State Bank
Let's come closer

Rajaji Centenary celebration coupons are available at all our metropolitan and urban branches.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

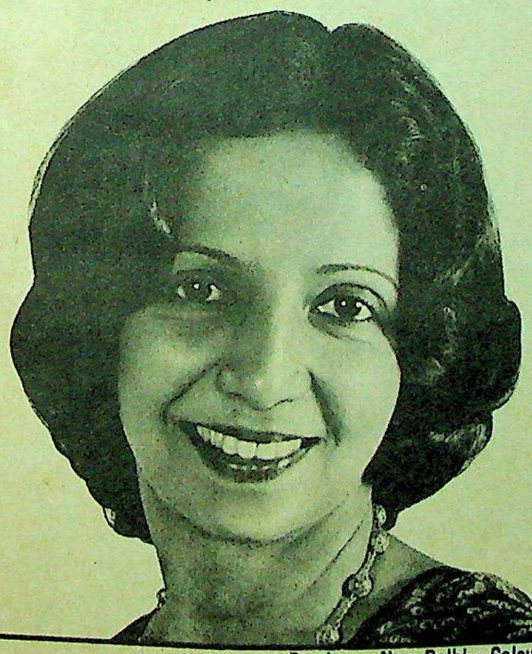
Leonard keeps kababs succulent in Cairo



Leonard chills masala milk in Madurai

FREE expensive gifts with Leonard while stocks last! Contact your nearest dealer. Offer limited to Western, Eastern and Southern India and Eastern U.P. only.

Leonard keeps Gracie smiling in Goa



Leonard serves millions of families around the world. Its dependable compressor and new ingenious defrost system guarantee you long, trouble-free service.

When Leonard owners are asked about their refrigerators, they just smile. After all what more need we say about a friend of the family.

SIMOES/BS/7A/79

Leonard

Since 1881. Trusted the world over.

Another quality product from ★ BLUE STAR®

Leaders in refrigeration

Bombay • New Delhi • Calcutta • Madras • Ahmedabad • Vadodara • Pune • Kanpur • Indore Chandigarh • Jamshedpur • Bangalore • Cochin • Secunderabad • Visakhapatnam.

SBI/4939

branches.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The night Kishore Kumar brought the house down at Los Angeles!

A Kishore Kumar show is an experience. He sings. He acts. He entertains. Above all, he thrills his audience.

His show at the Pasadena Civic Centre, Los Angeles was one of his best. HMV has captured this exciting performance on a multi-track stereo double album to take you right into the concert hall.
You're sure to give Kishore Kumar a standing ovation!

Kishore Kumar. The first Indian artiste to be awarded the coveted gold disc in the USA.

Featuring

Mana Janab Ne Pukara
Nahin (Paying Guest)
Mere Sapnon Ki Rani (Aradhana)
Chingari Koi Bhadke (Amar Prem)
Dukhi Man Mere (Funtoosh)
Mera Jeevan Kora Kagaz (Kora Kagaz)
Ghunghroo Ki Tarah (Chor Machaye Shor)
Mere Naina Sawan Bhadon (Mehbooba)
Meri Pyari Baheniya (Sachaa Jhutha)
...and many more

Kishore Kumar Live at Los Angeles now on a multi-track (SUPREME) stereo Double Album. At your HMV dealer.

EMI Great artistes, great music.

HMV The Gramophone Company of India Limited

GC 3388

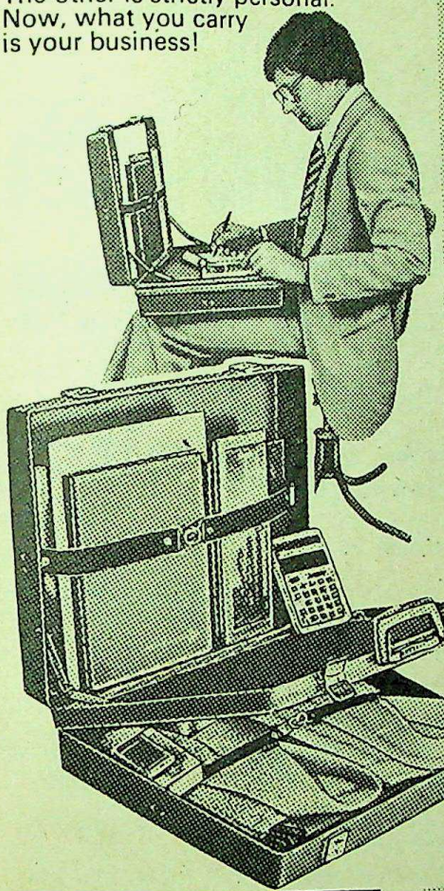
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

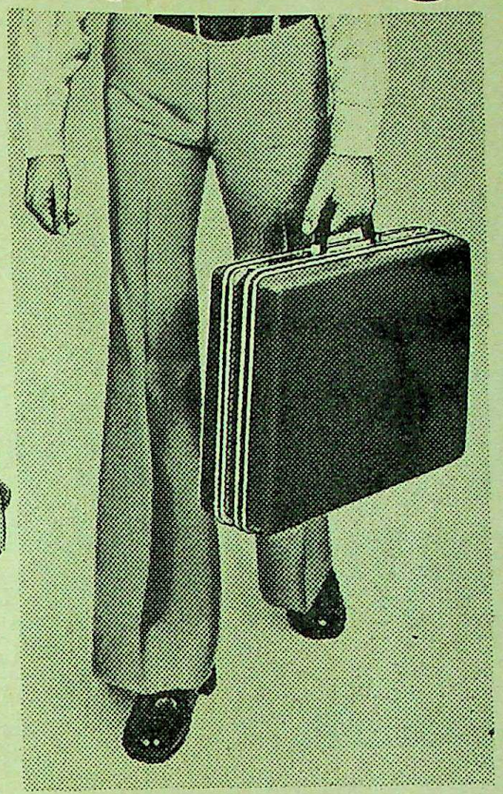
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

'V.I.P.' Carry-ons. They carry on. Regardless!

That one-day business!

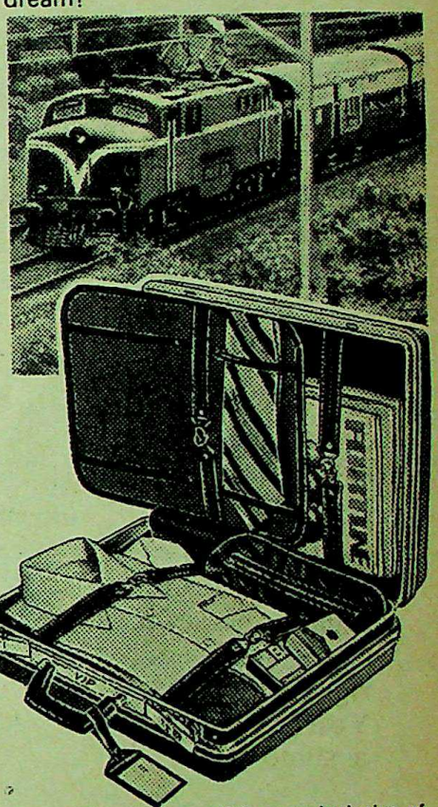
For a hectic day's work, the 'V.I.P.' Executive Twin.
A briefcase cum overnighter with two completely independent compartments. The price? Just Rs. 205. The hinged divider cleverly doubles as a writing shelf. One side is for files, papers, calculator...the works.
The other is strictly personal.
Now, what you carry is your business!





When it's got to be done...overnight!

If you're a night-bird, rush out for the 'V.I.P.' Overnighter. (Now that's a decision you don't have to sleep over!)
It makes a strong case for style as well as convenience.
There's a useful divider... stay-put straps...even a handy toilet case. For all the value you'll get, at Rs. 280, it's a dream!

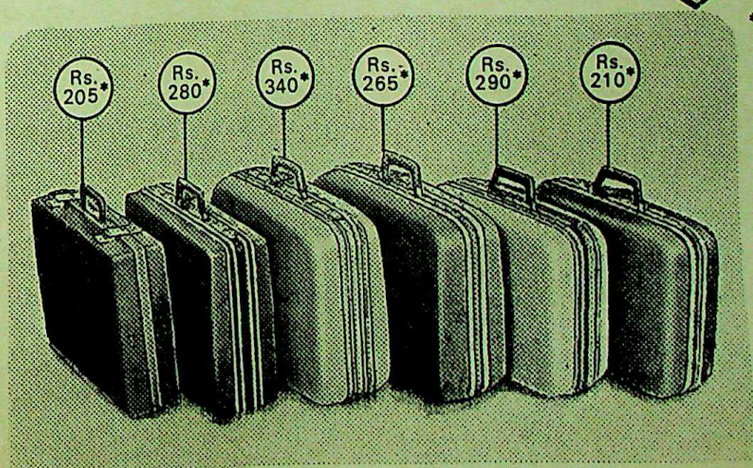


For every short trip, 'V.I.P.' has a long-term answer!

*Prices are inclusive of all taxes and duties.

It's the widest range of Carry-ons!

'V.I.P.' offers you the largest choice. Six exciting shapes and sizes. Twelve lovely colours. Beautiful styling. Each model is compact enough for an Airbus flight. Or a quick car or train trip. All are made of tough polymer. With sturdy locks and hinges. And have the exclusive 'V.I.P.' quality of being able to carry on . . . and on . . . Regardless!



V.I.P.™

spells class. Anywhere in the world.

BLOW PLAST LIMITED,
P.O. Box No. 9145,
Bombay 400 025.

Sista's-BP-639/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

FROM THE START
Amulspray—India's most popular baby food

More mothers using baby food, choose Amulspray, than any other baby food.

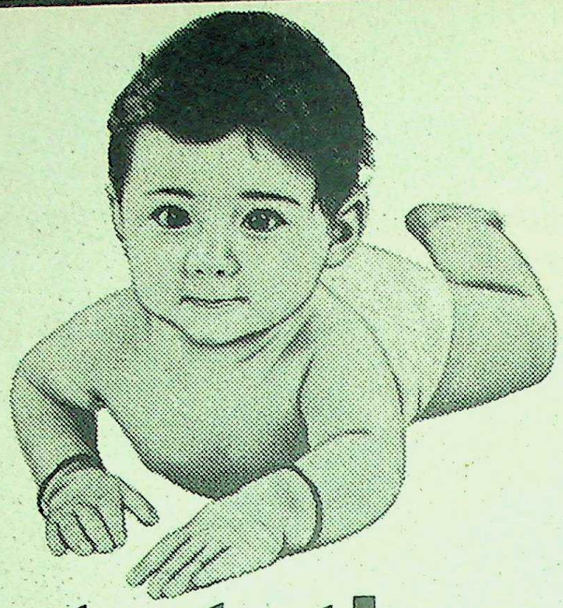
Because Amulspray is • perfectly balanced • vitamin-enriched • easy-to-digest • dissolves easily

Breast-feeding is Natural...

Remember, mother's milk is by far the best for baby. It is extremely difficult to substitute for breast milk.

All mothers, therefore, should feed their infants at the breast as long as the quantity of milk remains adequate.

However, if your breast milk is not sufficient for baby, start him on Amulspray.



Amulspray starts the growth only Balamul helps continue

ASP-AB-5/79

3rd MONTH ONWARDS
Balamul as well

No other solid food is good enough for your Amulspray baby.

Why a specially prepared, balanced, solid food after 3 months?

Because your baby is growing so fast!

He doubles his birth weight in 6 months—his brain is 80% developed by three years. Milk alone is not enough. Your baby needs proteins, vitamins and minerals in a balanced form—that only Balamul ideally provides.

Balamul—specially created for the Indian baby

Balamul has been specially formulated with the help of the Central Food Technological Research Institute, Mysore and tested at the Christian Medical College, Vellore!

Balamul—more nutrition, more value

- at least 25% more protein than other branded cereal foods
- more calcium, Vitamin A and C
- fortified with balanced quantities of fat, iron and Vitamin B Complex
- pre-cooked in milk. Easy-to-digest
- delicious, mixes easily with: dal, mashed fruits, puddings

Balamul gives TWICE the value for your money than any other branded cereal foods

FREE Informative Amul Baby Book and Balamul Growth Record Booklet in English. Baby Book also in Hindi, Marathi, Gujarati, Bengali, Tamil, Telugu and Malayalam. Write to Post Box No. 10124 Bombay 400 001 with your complete address and Re. 1.00 postage stamps.

Marketed by:
Gujarat Cooperative Milk Marketing Federation Limited, Anand.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Like father, like son!

"I knew it by a different name. But Maltova has been my old favourite - ever since my first 'league-football' day."

Says Chuni Goswami, India's legendary football skipper. Olympian, soccer's unvanquished hero.

"Baba gives me the practice. Maltova gives me the energy. Deliciously!"

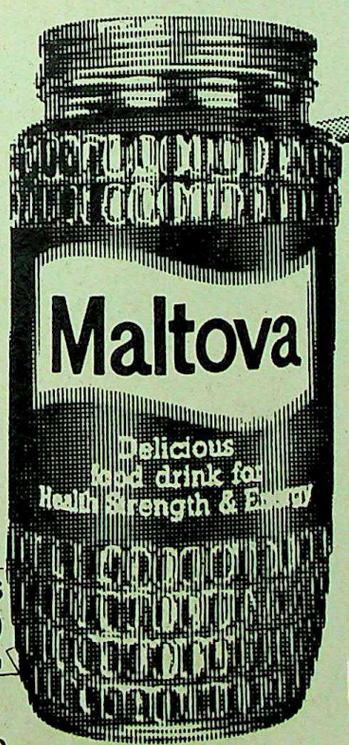
Adds Sudipta Goswami. Chuni's illustrious son. school-soccer star. India's promising new hope.

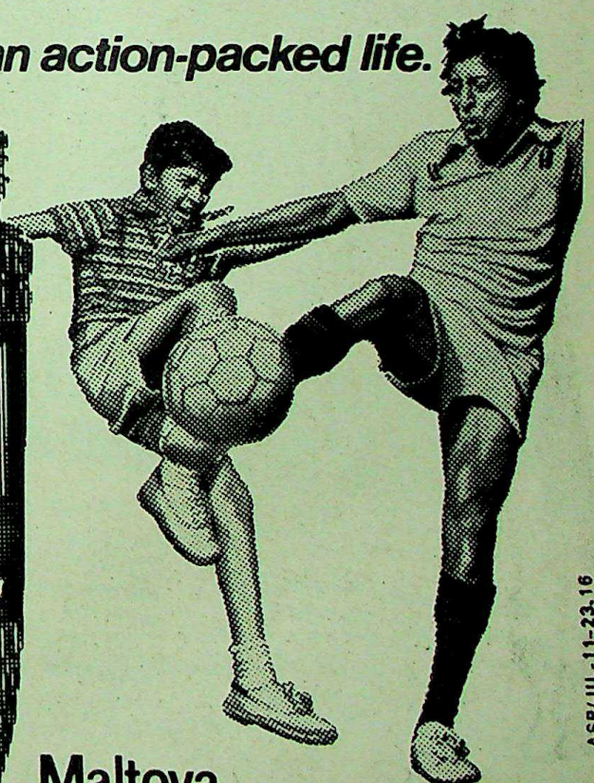
Maltova

The delicious energy drink for an action-packed life.

Chuni Goswami, Sudipta Goswami. Illustrious father, illustrious son. Generations bound together by undying family traditions like love for football, zest for action, that special taste of what is now MALTOVA.

And, like Chuni, Sudipta too knows that Maltova's body-building proteins, health-sustaining vitamins and minerals make for an active body. Give that extra burst of energy to succeed. And emerge the winners. No wonder, Chuni has a record of leading his home team to victory in every major tournament, representing India in over 80 international matches, and captaining India Olympics ! And Sudipta is on the threshold of an exciting tomorrow.





500gms
Rs.13.99
Local Taxes Extra

JiL
JAGATJIT INDUSTRIES LIMITED

Maltova
for that special taste of success

ASP/JIL-11-23.16

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The top-flight tyre for top-flight men

SAA GY/1316

Goodyear Power-Drive

nylon car tyre

Here's why Goodyear Power-Drive is becoming increasingly popular with top-flight men like you:

1. Longer tyre life -thanks to TRACSYN, a synthetic tread rubber exclusive to Goodyear.

2. Maximum resilience and strength of the nylon cord body for additional comfort.

3. Unique computer-designed tread pattern for a surer grip, total safety.

4. Built-in tread wear indicator— India's first and only—to tell you when it's time to change your tyre!

Get Goodyear Power-Drive today!

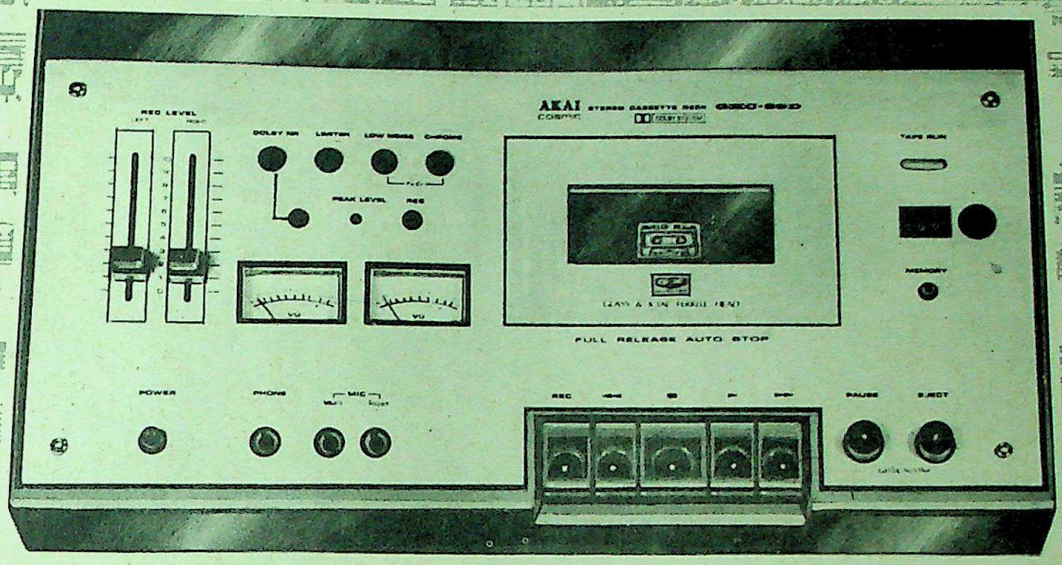
GOODYEAR
So good on the road

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

COSMIC

YOUR SOUND FAVOURITE



BRINGS YOU GLASS & X'TAL FERRITE HEAD CASSETTE STEREO DECK

GXC FOCUSSED RELD

GLASS & X'TAL FERRITE HEAD

* 'No Hiss' noise reduction system.
* Any kind of tape can be used-Low Noise, Cr-O_2 or Fe-Cr
* Superior S/N ratio and wide dynamic range GX head * Added convenience with memory rewind
* Peak level indicator responds immediately to input * Tape run indicator lamp * Tape end safety feature and full release automatic stop mechanism
* Self-lock pause button
* Limiter circuit prevents overlevel recording

Tape speed $1\frac{7}{8}$ Ips.
Frequency response 30Hz to 14,000 Hz (± 3 d B) using Low Noise Tape: 30Hz to 16,000 Hz (± 3 d B) using Cr O_2 Tape 30Hz to 17,000 Hz (± 3 d B) using Fe-Cr Tape

Wow & Flutter Less than 0.19% (DIN 455000) Less than 0.07% WRMS (NAB)

Distortion Less than 1.5% (1,000 Hz'0'VU) using Low noise Tape

Heads (2) One GX Recording/ Playback head. One erase head

COSMIC
AKAI
GXC-39D
STEREO CASSETTE TAPE DECK

Manufacturers:
COSMIC RADIO
Bombay-400 093. *Tel: 573361/62
*GRAMS: "SOLIDSTATE"

Distributor:
COSTRONICS
P.B. NO. 9402 BOMBAY-400 093.

For mirror-image sound reproduction

TRADE REPRESENTATIVE AND SERVICE CENTRE

TAMIL NADU:
STEREO SOUND CENTRE,
7, Woods Road, Mount Road,
MADRAS-600 002.
Phone: 82599

KARNATAKA:
NUSOUND
42, Narasimharaja Road,
BANGALORE-560 002.
Phone: 24048

EASTERN REGION:
DUNICS,
113/4, Hazra Road
CALCUTTA-700 026.
Phone: 481338

NORTH INDIA:
HIMSONS ELECTRONICS.
12, Angoori Bagh Market,
Delhi-110 006.
Phone: 269105/278228

MADHYA PRADESH:
MUSIC PALACE.
82, Kothari Market,
M. G. Road, INDORE.
Phone: 38857

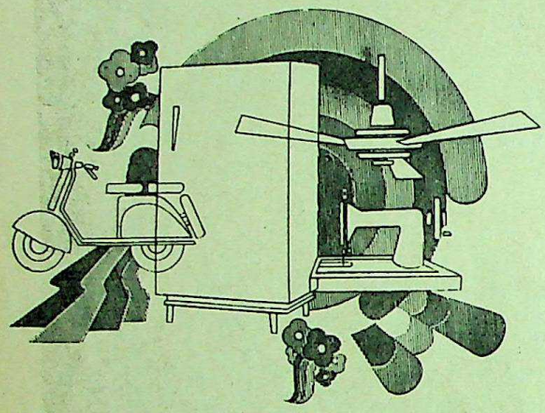
GUJARAT:
MUMTA TRADERS,
- Joglekar Building,
Anandpura, BARODA.
Phone: 63593

ADVERTS CR/15 I9

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Save a little regularly, and everything you've always dreamt of is yours.



Allahabad Bank's Recurring Deposit Scheme makes it possible.

The best thing about this Scheme is that you can choose your own monthly deposit sum. From a minimum of Rs. 10/- to a maximum of Rs. 1,000/-, over a period of 1 to 10 years.

So you save and earn with no great effort. And what you finally get back could be as much as 50% more than what you've deposited... perhaps more ! Making it possible for you to buy what you've always dreamt of.

For details, drop in at your nearest Allahabad Bank branch.

ALLAHABAD BANK

Your Own Bank

(A Government of India Undertaking)

U-AB-3

LEARN ART THROUGH POST

The art of drawing can be learnt in just 2 years time, sitting at your home, through post, at the cheapest rate with attractive lessons.

It is being taught in 5 languages namely English, Hindi, Tamil, Malayalam & Telugu.

For all details please contact.

SANTHANU'S CHITIRA VIDYALAYAM

C/o. CHITIRAKULLAN (S)
CHiNTADRIPET
MADRAS-600 002.
Phone : 846188

STRENGTH & ENERGY in every 20-day pack.

Only OKASA, with a high-powered combination of 6 bio-chemicals, 6 minerals, 10 essential vitamins and rare herbal extracts like Ashwagandha and Yohimbine helps you get the most out of life. Start on OKASA today and feel the difference yourself.

Now in a handy new pack

OKASA

Available at all leading chemists.

For a free booklet on OKASA write to:
OKASA CO. PVT. LTD.
Post Box No. 396, Bombay 400 001.

028

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Shirtings, dress materials, suitings and sarees. In 100% 'Terene', cotton and blends. Minimum-care, maximum-elegance fabrics for people on the move!

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

What colour of ink should you use?

The brave and the bold

Red is warm and courageous, denotes a love for adventure and a capacity for endurance. (And indeed, accountants need lots of endurance when red shows up on their books.)

Black is beautiful

Formal and dignified, black is a tower of strength and the accountant's favourite colour. When deep and glossy, it can be a very beautiful colour.

True blue

The ideal executive mixes sensitivity with fervour, a desire for pleasure with an ability to perform. That's true blue. Chelpark's Permanent Blue.

Authority and enthusiasm

When blue and black combine, the result is both responsible and responsive. Blue-Black denotes a man who is clearly his own boss.

Green is gorgeous

Emerald Green is deep, rich, passionate and unshakeable. Denotes an easygoing person, slow to anger and fond of companionship.

Impetuous and daring

Nothing is more unconventional than a blend of blue and green. Turquoise is full of quick enthusiasms, rapid decisions and has an open, honest personality.

The regal touch

Truly royal tastes are always reflected in Royal Blue — the choice of unselfish, high-minded people all over the world.

Captain's colour

Crimson is for the true warrior, violet for the wise leader. Chelpark's new Crimson Violet marks the captain who leads men in times of both peace and war.

CCL-1109

Discover easy-flow, non-clog Chelpark. In eight magnificent colours.

Chelpark with Cleen-X is manufactured to international standards by Chelpark Company Limited Bangalore 560 044.

Behind our new name is the same great ink indigestion?

---

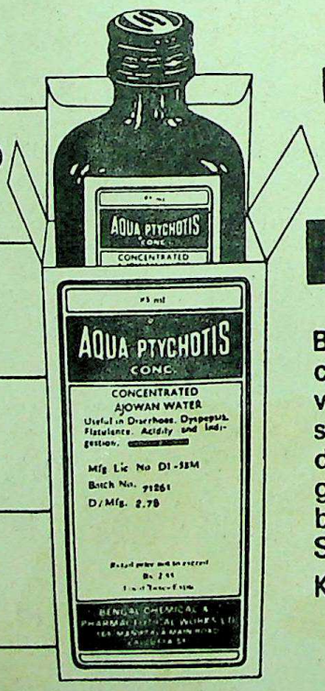
diarrhoea?

acidity?

flatulence?



Use Bengal Chemical's

AQUA PTYCHOTIS

Bengal Chemical's Aqua Ptychotis contains concentrated Ajowan water. It works right through your system and helps to cure diarrhoea, dyspepsia, flatulence, acidity, indigestion etc. Absolutely safe. Can be used regularly as a preventive. Suitable for all ages.

Keep a bottle handy.

BENGAL CHEMICAL (Management under Govt. of India)

A FAMILY FAVOURITE FOR OVER 60 YEARS

naa-BC-7835A

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Agha's tried and tested love.

"I discovered Nippo's perfect. Only one in a million Nippo batteries can go wrong because their quality testing is accurate. And, Nippo's top-seal intrigued me. Imagine being 100% sure the super power is all there, fresh and unused. Some Nippo batteries are metal-clad and all have the research backing from National of Japan."

—Agha

National NIPPO

Top-seal batteries

Super power backed by technology from National of Japan.

The Nippo range: batteries to suit every application... every pocket.

everest/79/INL/144

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

High-protein health
Body-building goodness
Vital nutrition
A taste your family will love...

NEW

Try

Mealmaker

today!

Pep up your health!

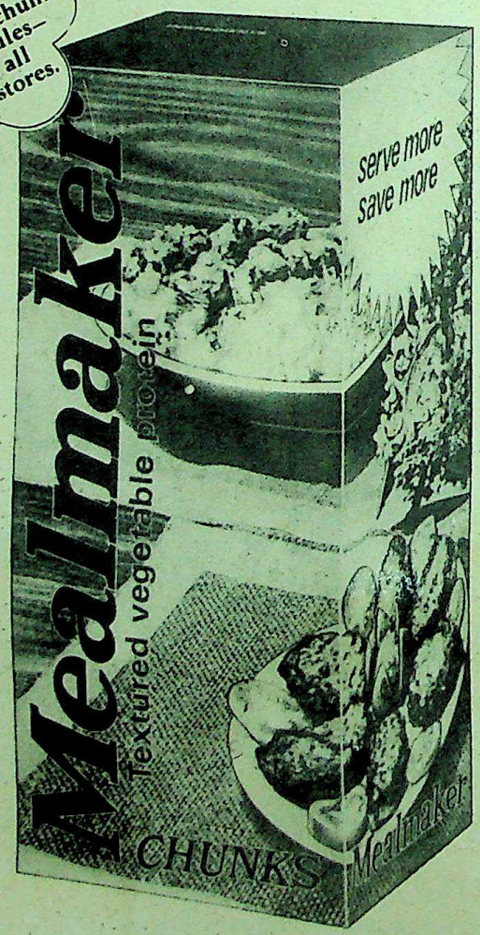
Mealmaker is rich in soya protein—the best and most efficient source of vegetable protein. It fills the vital protein gap in a normal Indian diet.

250 gms of Mealmaker contains as much protein as 3.9 litres of milk or 1 kg of mutton or 24 eggs.

Only Mealmaker can give you such nutrition with such economy!

And low in fat. Mealmaker has practically no fats, cholesterol or saccharides, which makes it the ideal food for the whole family.

Available as chunks and granules—now in all leading stores.



It's completely vegetarian!

Mealmaker is 100% vegetarian. When added to any dish, because it is high in protein, it makes every Mealmaker dish a highly nutritive one.

Great for meat-eaters too!

Though vegetarian, Mealmaker blends perfectly with meat. Extend meat dishes with Mealmaker—serve it every day and stay within your budget.

...and tasty, tasty, tasty!

Your family will love the taste of Mealmaker. Remarkably versatile, Mealmaker absorbs the spicy flavour of any dish. Mealmaker makes a delicious variety of vegetarian and non-vegetarian dishes—and sweets, too. Look for the recipe leaflet in every pack.

Mealmaker

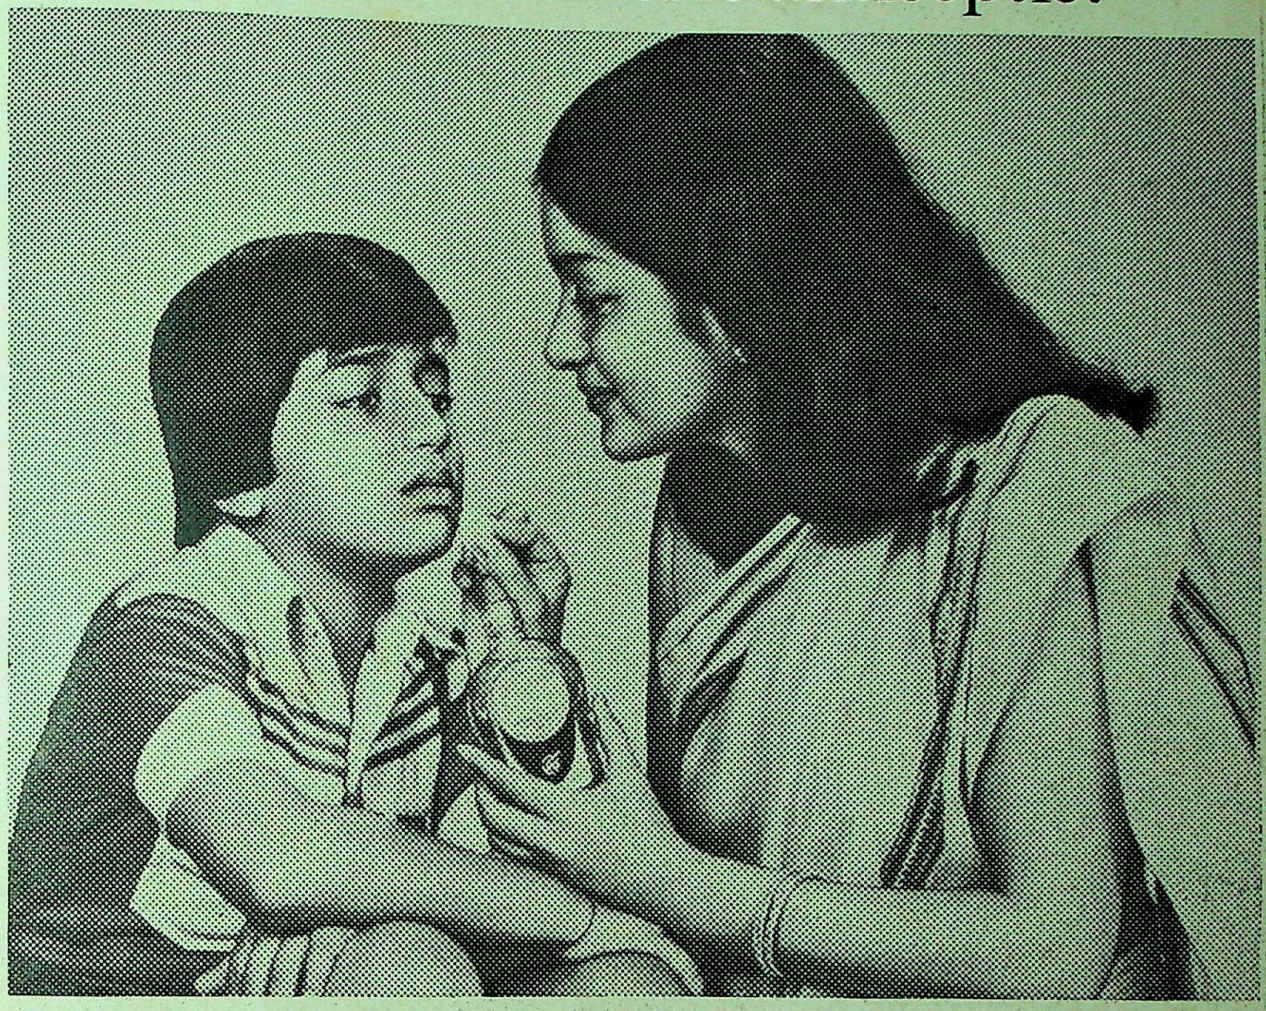
for great-tasting nourishment.

maa VL 4E

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

For mothers who care a little more, the more effective antiseptic.



® ICI Savlon

kills more germs_more kinds of germs-more effectively.

When your child has a cut, burn or abrasion, protect him with today's most effective antiseptic-Savlon.

Because Savlon destroys germs which others don't touch. Savlon kills the dangerous Gram-positive type of germs and even the resistant Gram-negative germs, thus preventing sepsis and disease.

Change for the better. Change to Savlon. Gentle, soothing and powerful Savlon.

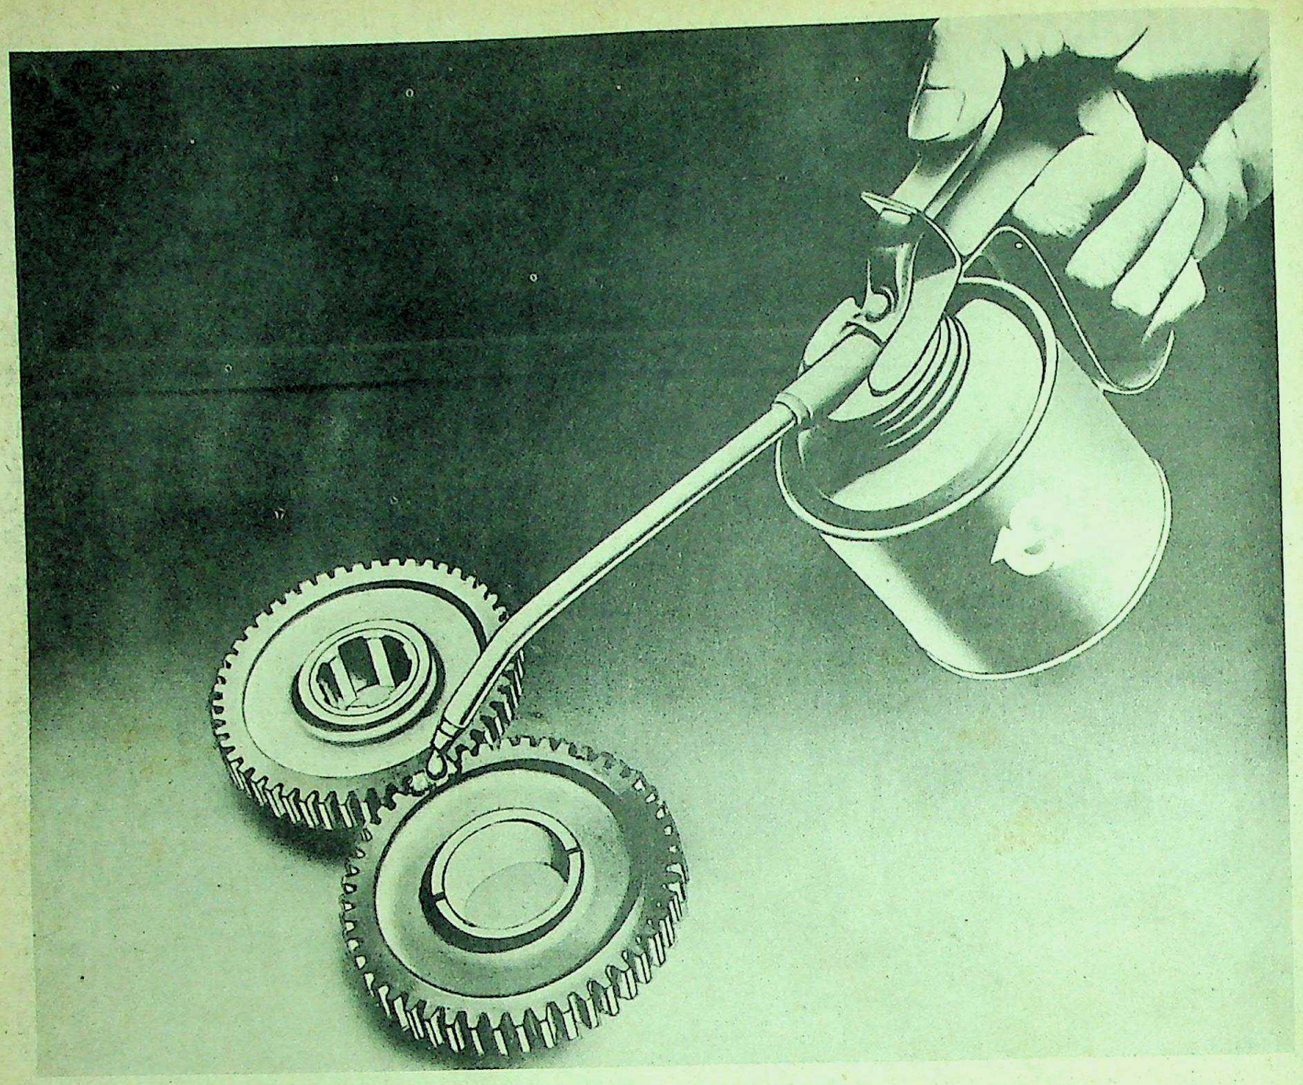
Today's most advanced antiseptic

® Registered Trade Mark of Imperial Chemical Industries U. K.
Licensed Users: The Alkali and Chemical Corporation of India Limited.

CAS ACCI 1G/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Assisting twice the number of small scale units than others, proves we aren't just another bank!

It is a fact that, on an average, our branches support twice the number of small scale units than other banks. Or, more precisely, our figure is 36 small scale units per branch, compared to 18 for others.

Taking Small Scale Industries on the double!
Between 1975 and 1976, our small scale units account almost doubled—from 12,381 to 23,706—on to 27,886 in 1977—to 32,175 in 1978.
A remarkable jump from only 750 at the time of nationalisation.
The number of retail trade accounts, too, almost doubled from 11,715 in 1975 to 21,333 in 1977—on to 24,433 in 1978.

1/8th: our big credit
Today, 1/8th of our credit goes to the small scale sector alone.

In fact, from the time of nationalisation to the end of 1978, our outstanding advances have recorded a phenomenal increase of 539.43%.

We aren't just another bank
As you can see, the small scale sector is a big scale operation with us...On the other side of the coin, we happen to be one bank that's having well over 62% of its deposits on long term duration—a sure proof of customer loyalty.
All of which explains why we are not just another bank.

Indian Bank
H.O.: 31, Rajaji Road,
Madras-600 001

Buy Rajaji coupons, available at our metropolitan, urban and rural branches (rural branches in Tamil Nadu only).

Indian Bank
Helps build your fortune

SAA/IB/1447/C

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi

In Search...

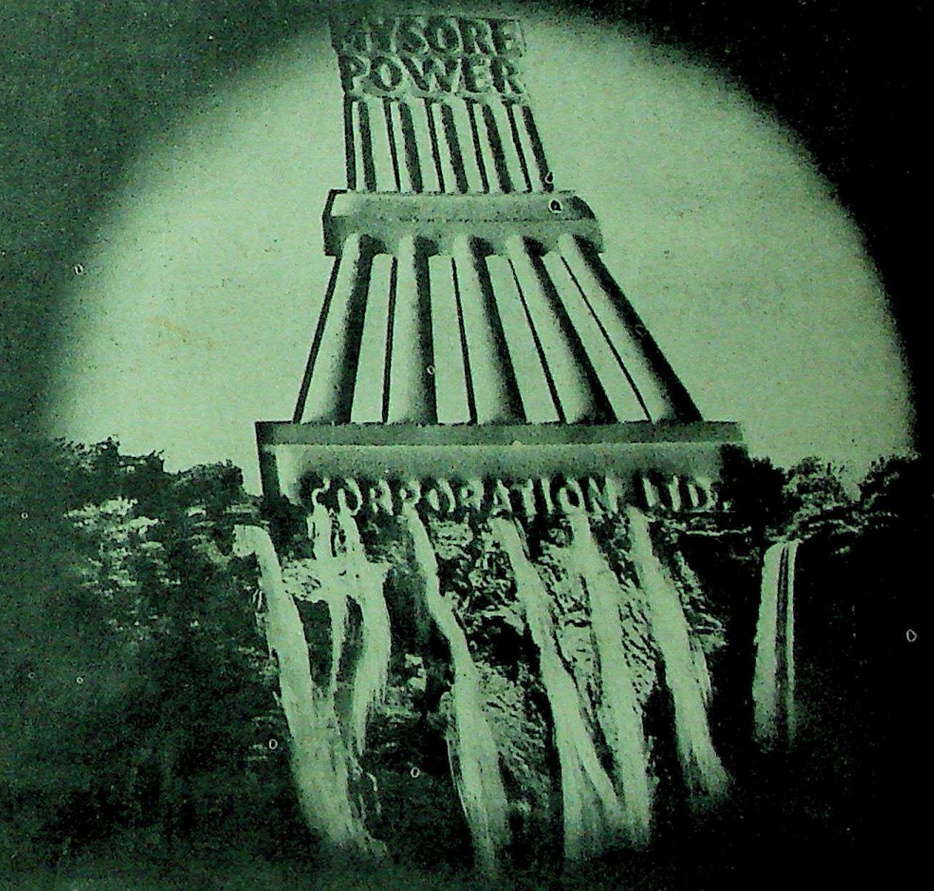
Of Energy.... Power.... Life. All visible in the Sun. Man's sinews. The gushing wind. The roaring waters. All linked together. All part of man's dreams towards prosperity.

Prosperity and Power. In quest of which man has scaled new heights. Power for his machines and homes. Power from Nature. From the depths of the mighty rivers that flow through Karnataka.

As far back as 1898.... Karnataka became a pioneer in hydel power. In 1902 the Shivasamudram Power Station was the largest of its kind.... Power travelled 147 kms. to Kolar–the largest transmission line in the world. Also in 1902.

In 1970, the first Corporation in the country to construct, own, operate and maintain Power Projects in Karnataka was born– Mysore Power Corporation Ltd. To accelerate the process of development. To put Karnataka on the threshold of a new prosperity ! it any wonder that there is now a new way of spelling Progress– MYPOWER!

Which again speaks of our philosophy..



MYSORE POWER CORPORATION LTD.

Mysore Power Corporation Ltd.

Regd Office:
Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan,
Race Course Road, BANGALORE-560 001.

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Extracts from "Prison Diary"

MY world lies in a shambles all around me. I am afraid I shall not see it put together again in my lifetime. Maybe my nephews and nieces will see that. Maybe.

Here was I trying to widen the horizons of our democracy. Trying to do it mainly by involving the people more intimately and continuously in the processes of democracy. This in two ways. One, by creating some kind of machinery through which there could be a measure of consultation with the people in the setting up of candidates. Two, by providing a machinery—the same machinery as in One above would have done—through which the people could keep a watch on their representatives and demand good and honest performance from them. These were the two drops of essence that I wanted to distil out of all the clang and clamour of the Bihar movement. And here I am ending up with the death of democracy. Where have my calculations gone wrong? (I almost said "our" calculations, but that would be wrong. I must bear the full, the whole, responsibility.) I went wrong in assuming that a Prime Minister in a democracy would use all the normal and abnormal laws to defeat a peaceful democratic movement, but would not destroy democracy itself and substitute for it a totalitarian system. (July 21, 1975).

"TOTAL Revolution is our slogan; Future history belongs to us." Will this now remain an irony of history? All jee huzurs, cowards and sycophants must be laughing at us. "They dared to get at the stars but descended into hell", this is how they may be ridiculing us. But only those who sought to get at the stars have achieved anything in the world, maybe at the cost of their lives.

Instead of total revolution, we find today the dark clouds of total counter-revolution encircling us. It is a feast day for the owls and jackals whose hoots and growls we hear on all sides. But, howsoever dark the night may be, the dawn is bound to follow.

But will the dawn follow all by itself? And shall we simply wait, arms crossed? If social revolution were just to follow the revolutions of nature, there would have been no place for human effort, for social progress and change. What then are we to do? The answer is: "They who raised that slogan and sang that song must offer to sacrifice themselves. And the first to kiss the altar must be the one who was their leader." Doubts have been set at rest; the decision has been taken. (August 7, 1975)

IN one of her statements Mrs Gandhi, speaking obliquely about me and my colleagues in the movement, said that for us the students could do no wrong; they could burn down buses, commit other kinds of violence and scenes of rowdyism, but (for us) they were sacred, nothing could be said against them, etc. etc. Now I have decided not to comment any more on Mrs Gandhi's sayings, but on this point I must say something because the students have played a vital role in both the Gujarat and Bihar movements and they are likely to play a greater part in the future...In most cases of violence, police provocation, sometimes in extreme and indecent forms, was the spark. Be that as it may, the bulk of the students participating in the Gujarat movement believed in and adhered, to peaceful methods. (September 1, 1975)

IF India and the Indian people have to be put through totalitarian rigours in order to be taught the virtue of discipline, that virtue would be found at the first test to have been a mere veneer. Discipline is a quality of individual and group behaviour which has to be inculcated and nurtured in an atmosphere of freedom, i.e. in a condition in which there is a choice of action. In this process, especially in a society like ours in which political power and politics occupy such a dominant position (which is but a fact regrettable) the inculcation of discipline depends, more than on anything else, on the behaviour of those in power and Government. (October 1, 1975)

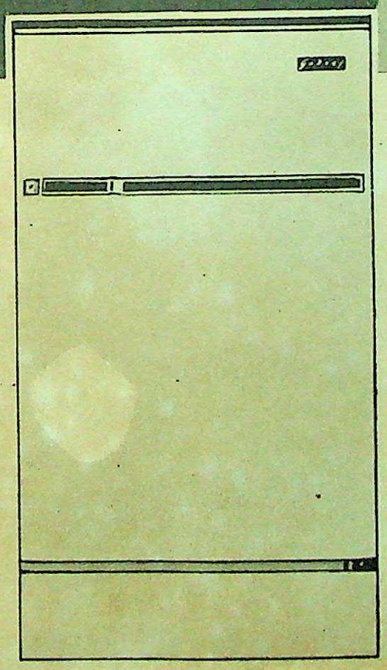
VINOBAJI did something miraculous for some years. It appeared as though a new Gandhian process of social change and reconstruction has emerged. But after his stormy Bhoodan experiment, not even mild breeze blew, not to speak of mighty "storm" of Gramdan, Gram-Swarajya or any other constructive experiment. Later, he withdrew into his inner self, and started the experiment of 'action' in the form of 'inaction'. To date this does not seem to have borne fruit. But what is a period of 10 or 20 years in history? Meanwhile, the country is heading for a downfall, not only moral but also the economic, social and cultural degradation of at least 40 per cent of the Indian people who live below the poverty line. One is reminded here of a statement of Bapu who, while defining democracy, had said that it did not only mean a Government established by the people's vote; it also meant that the people had the power to oust their rulers when found unworthy to rule. Democracy has almost ceased to exist in India today. The pyramid of the political structure still stands on its apex. The same is true of the educational and almost all other spheres of public activity. It is a tragic story that beggars description. (October 2, 1975)

I HAVE been saying that total revolution is a combination of seven revolutions — social, economic, political, cultural, ideological or intellectual, educational and spiritual. This number may be increased or decreased. For instance, the cultural revolution may include educational and ideological revolutions. And if culture is used in an anthropological sense, it can embrace all other revolutions. But what we understand by culture in the context of a primitive society is not generally the same as in the context of a civilised society. Likewise, social revolution in the Marxian context covers economic and political revolutions and even more than that. This is how we can reduce the number to less than seven. And we can add to this number by breaking up each of the seven revolutions into different categories. Economic revolution may be split up into industrial, agricultural, technological revolutions, etc. Similarly, intellectual revolution may be split up into two — scientific and philosophical. Even spiritual revolution can be looked upon as part of the cultural. And so on. The important thing is that the technical words that we use must be clearly defined. As we know, the main difficulty in understanding the Gita is semantic. The Gita has used certain words giving them its own meaning; for instance, the word 'Yajna'. (October 7, 1975)

WOULD you listen to the advice of such a man? Please do not destroy the foundations that the Fathers of the Nation, including your noble father, had laid down. There is nothing but strife and suffering along the path that you have taken. You inherited a great tradition, noble values and a working democracy. Do not leave behind a miserable wreck of all that. It would be put together again. I have no doubt. A people who fought British imperialism and humbled it cannot accept indefinitely the indignity and shame of totalitarianism. The spirit of man can never be vanquished no matter how deeply suppressed. In establishing your personal dictatorship you have buried it deep. But it will rise from the grave. Even in Russia it is slowly coming up. (From a letter to Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, dated, July 21, 1975).

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



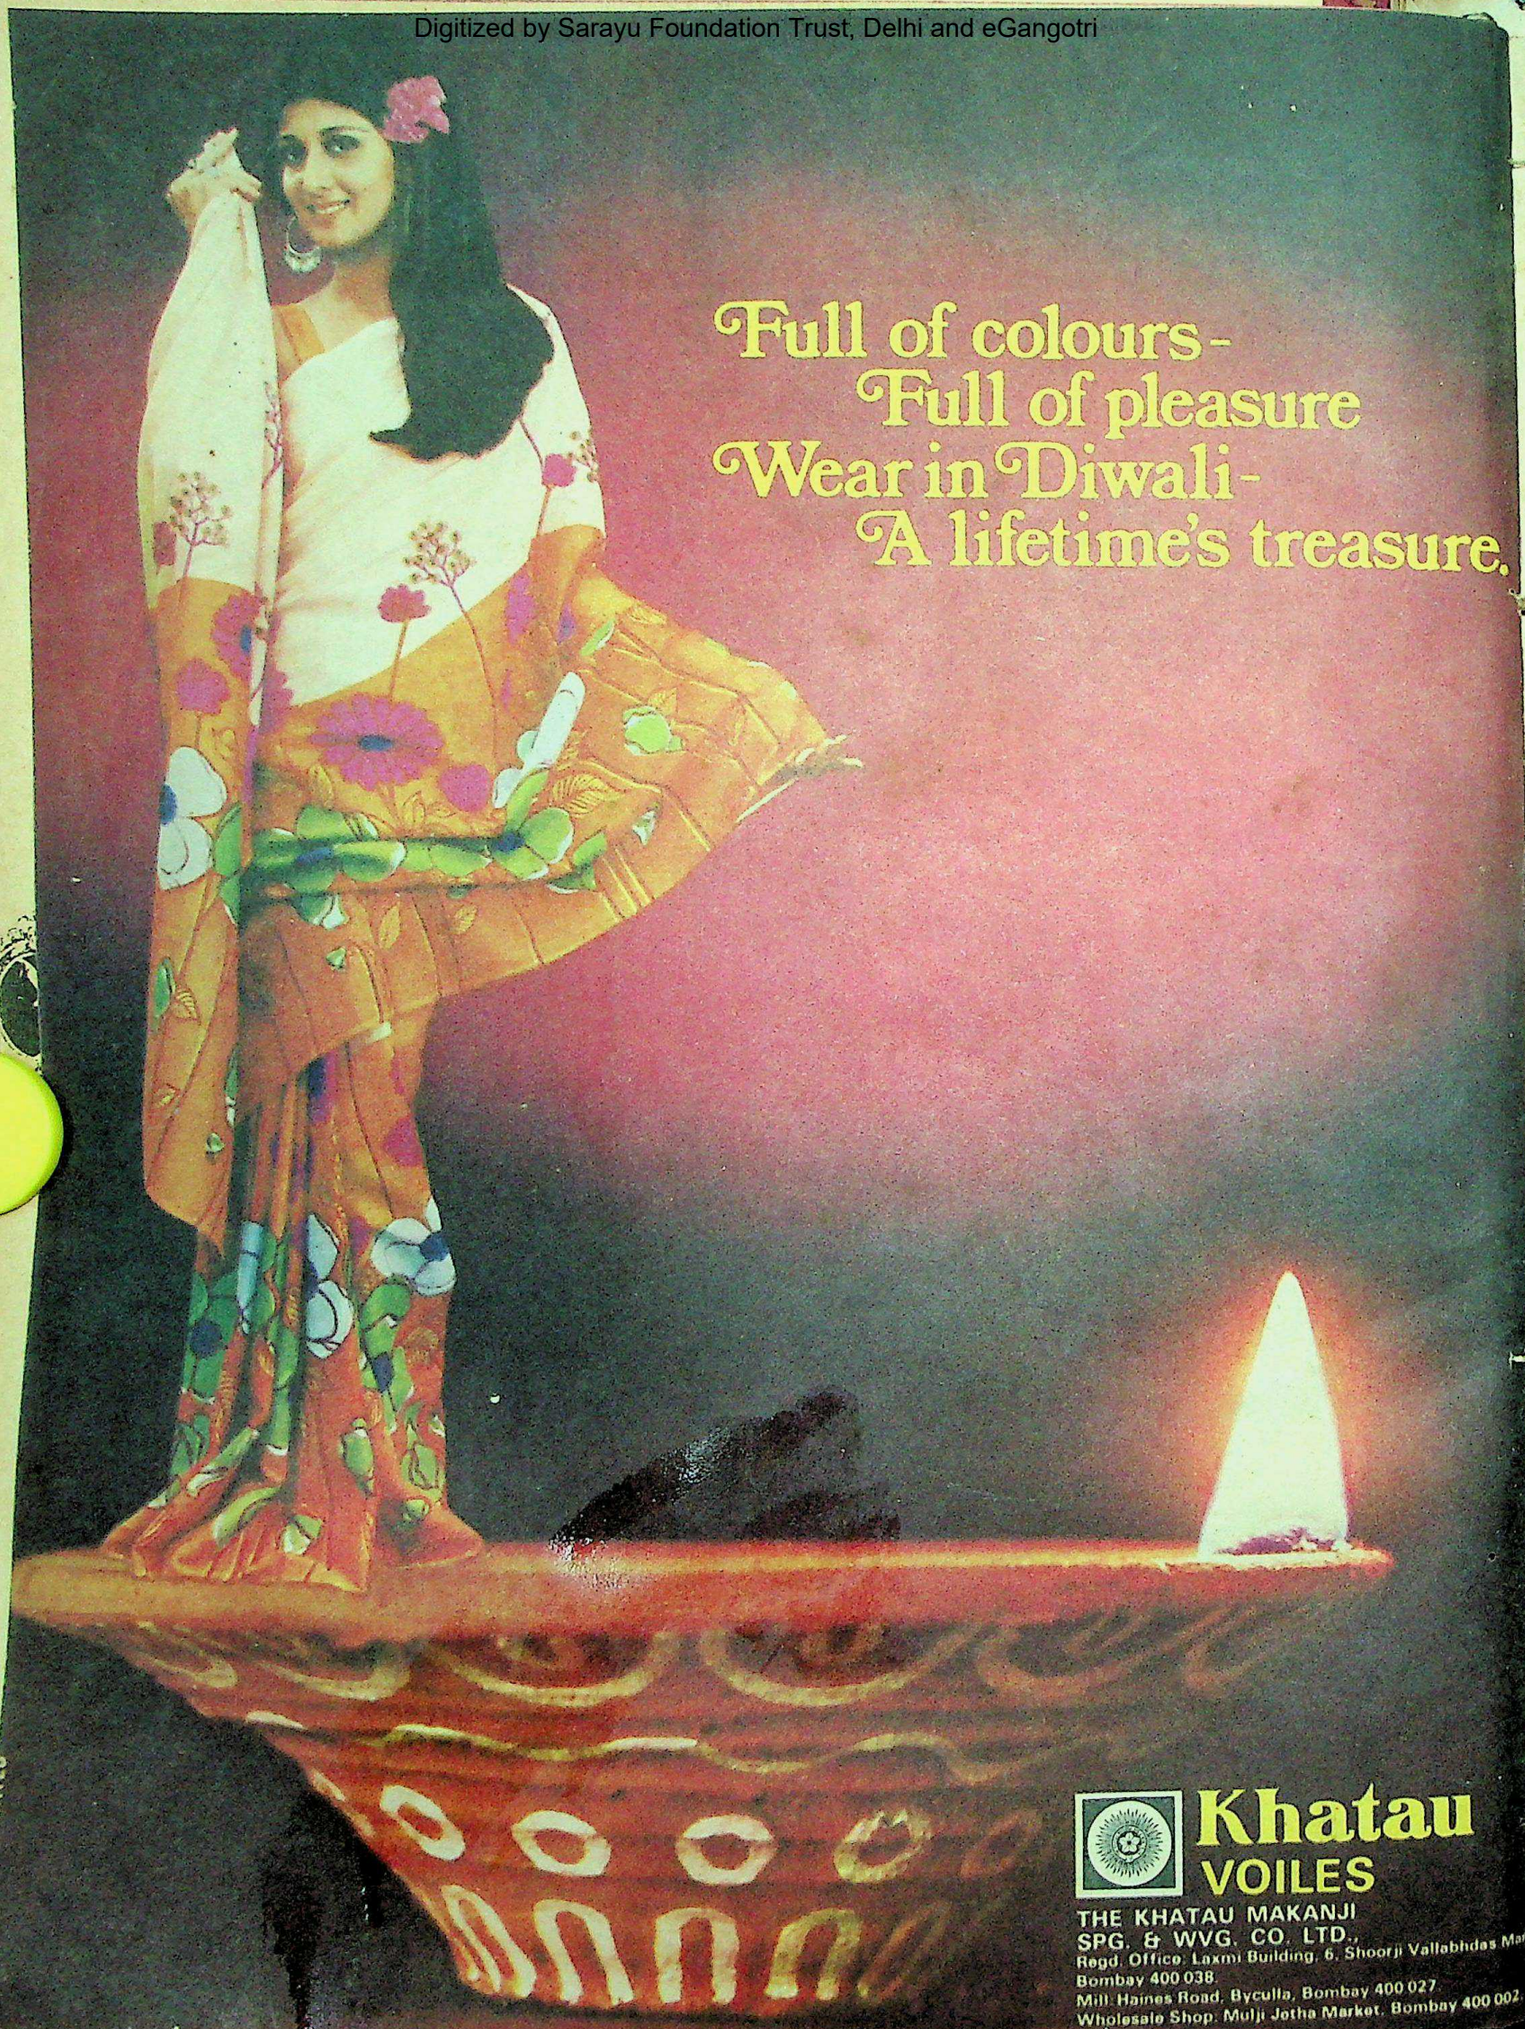
"Oh, these salesmen say each and every refrigerator has some good, some excellent features. Maybe. But I don't want to take chances. All my friends say that Godrej is the best. I'll play safe and buy a Godrej."

People trust the Godrej

Godrej®

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



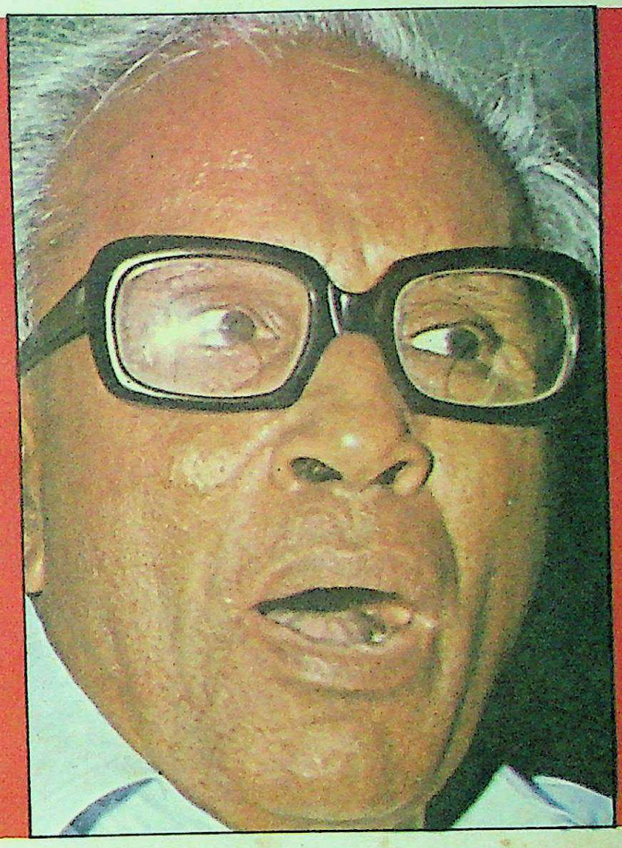
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

4 NOVEMBER 1978 ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION Rs 1

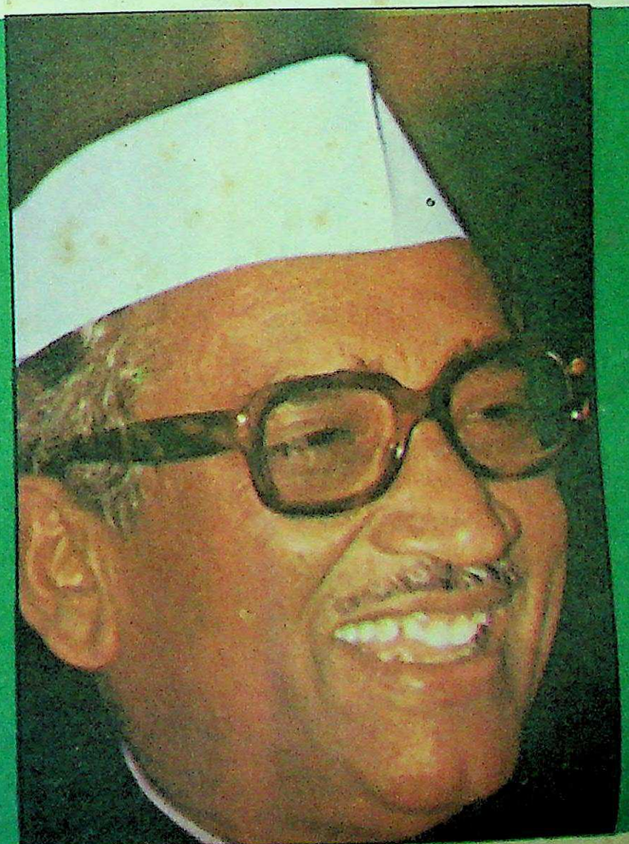
SUNDAY

Is a red sun rising?



Comrade E.M.S. Namboodiripad

The Bahuguna story



H.N. Bahuguna

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Ah! TAJ

TASTE PLUS STRENGTH

BB 9925R

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Discover the world of VIKAS paperbacks

BELL BOOKS BELL BOOKS BELL BOOKS BELL BOOKS BELL BOOKS

Cricket Books

1 Doug Wright CRICKET SKILLS & TECHNIQUES – A Comprehensive Guide to Coaching & Playing Rs 6

2 Narottam Puri CRICKET QUIZ Rs 6

3 Peter Walker CRICKET CONVERSATIONS Rs 9.50

4 Partab Ramchand GREAT MOMENTS IN INDIAN CRICKET Rs 7.50

5 Raju Bharatan INDIAN CRICKET: THE VITAL PHASE Rs 9.50

6 Vijayan Bala INDIAN TEST CRICKET : A Statistical Digest Rs 8.50

7 Narottam Puri SPORTS QUIZ Rs 8.50

8 Dicky Rutnagur TEST COMMENTARY A Diary of India Vs. England Rs 9.50

Sports & Games

16 Max Euwe & Walter Meiden CHESS MASTER V. CHESS AMATEUR Rs 9.50

17 Norman Squire CONTRACT BRIDGE – HOW TO BECOME A CHAMPION Rs 6.50

18 Richard Aultman LEARN TO PLAY GOLF Rs 6.50

19 James Allen LEARN TO PLAY TENNIS Rs 6.50

20 Chris Landers LEARN TO SKI Rs 6.50

21 Mike Krein LEARN TO SWIM Rs 6.50

22 Ben Cohen & Rhoda Lederer THE ABC OF CONTRACT BRIDGE Rs 8.50

23 K O Bosen THE COMPLETE GUIDE TO POLE VAULTING Rs 7.50

24 John Goodbody JUDO: How to Become a Champion Rs 7.50

Self-Help Books

9 Ajay Rai INTELLIGENCE & GENERAL KNOWLEDGE QUOTIENT Rs 5

10 S K Sachdeva SECRET OF SUCCESS IN INTERVIEW Rs 6.50

11 Ajay Rai VIKAS OBJECTIVE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE 1980 Rs 20

12 S K Sachdeva VIKAS GENERAL KNOWLEDGE OBJECTIVE TYPE 1980 Rs 7

13 S K Sachdeva VIKAS ENCYCLOPAEDIA OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE 1980 Rs 22

14 C S Bedi VIKAS GENERAL KNOWLEDGE REFRESHER 1979 Rs 12

15 S K Sachdeva VIKAS OBJECTIVE TEST IN GENERAL KNOWLEDGE 1980 Rs 22

Your Horoscope 1980

Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, Virgo, Libra Scorpio, Sagittarius, Capricorn, Aquarius, Pisces.

Ramakrishnasarathy, the world famous astro-palmist consultant at the Ashoka Hotel, New Delhi, predicts 1980 for you. This is an astrological ready reckoner that also gives your :

- General character with cues for improvement
- Compatibility patterns in marriage
- Fruitful dates
- Astrally propitious stones
- Beneficent colours

Included also is an initiation into Pranayama, the science of breathing, and an exciting forecast of the trends in world politics.

Rs 3 each

VIKAS NEWS

Begin an adventure into the world of knowledge by subscribing to VIKAS NEWS, our highly readable monthly magazine

Annual Subscription Rs 6

Tick the title (Serial Nos _____) and post the coupon to us. Books worth Rs 15/- or more VPP Post Free

Name _____

Address _____

_____

Available with all leading booksellers including M Gulab Singh & Sons, A.H Wheeler, Higginbothams bookstalls and Vikas Model Bookshop, Chhatra Marg, opp Institute of Economic Growth, Delhi. Ashok Rajpath Chouhatta, Patna, or write to

Vikas Publishing House Pvt Ltd

VIKAS HOUSE, 20/4 Industrial Area, Sahibabad, Distt. Ghaziabad, U.P. Phone : 205290

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

HER PRECIOUS POSSESSION

sudershan SUITINGS & SHIRTINGS

Sudershan Silk Mills
399, Kalbadevi Road,
Bombay-400 002.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Top Positions! Not Just Success!

Here is what IAS Toppers say

This is to acknowledge the help I have derived from your magazine in the course of my preparation for I.A.S. ..... credit for this success of mine goes to Competition Success Review.

Hrusikesh Panda
I.A.S. TOPPER 1978

Extremely thankful to your magazine for my getting into I.A.S. this year. I, being a regular reader of Competition Success Review, found it very useful.

Syamal Kumar Sarkar
II POSITION IN I.A.S. 1978

To Win Top Positions In All Competitive Examinations, Read This Month And Every Month

competition success review

SINGLE COPY Rs.3
ONE YEAR Rs.28

Now Selling Over 1,00,000 Copies Every Month

On the occasion of crossing sale of 1,00,000 copies, we offer SENSATIONAL DISCOUNT OF Rs.26 on 1 year subscription (Free Books worth Rs. 18 plus discount of Rs.8 on annual subscription)

FREE

BOOKS WORTH Rs.18

to the subscribers of COMPETITION SUCCESS REVIEW — DIARY 1980-Rs.12, General Knowledge Today-Rs.6.

DISCOUNT COUPON

Please enrol me as subscriber for Competition Success Review at a concessional rate of Rs. 28 instead of regular news stand rate of Rs. 36. I have sent Rs. 28 by M.O. No_____ Date_____ to Competition Review Pvt. Ltd., 604, Prabhat Kiran, Rajendra Place, New Delhi-110 008.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

_____

_____

Kindly add Rs.2 for despatch of Free Books by Recorded Delivery.

Valid Until DEC. 4, 1979

Available at all leading news stalls or from

COMPETITION REVIEW PVT. LTD.

604, Prabhat Kiran, Rajendra Place, New Delhi-110 008. Ph : 582898

TRENDS

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

FROM THE START
Amulspray—India's most popular baby food

More mothers using baby food, choose Amulspray, than any other baby food.

Because Amulspray is • perfectly balanced • vitamin-enriched • easy-to-digest • dissolves easily

Breast-feeding is Natural...

Remember, mother's milk is by far the best for baby. It is extremely difficult to substitute for breast milk.

All mothers, therefore, should feed their infants at the breast as long as the quantity of milk remains adequate.

However, if your breast milk is not sufficient for baby, start him on Amulspray.

Amulspray starts the growth only Balamul helps continue

ASP-AB-5/79

3rd MONTH ONWARDS
Balamul as well

No other solid food is good enough for your Amulspray baby.

Why a specially prepared, balanced, solid food after 3 months?

Because your baby is growing so fast!

He doubles his birth weight in 6 months—his brain is 80% developed by three years. Milk alone is not enough. Your baby needs proteins, vitamins and minerals in a balanced form—that only Balamul ideally provides.

Balamul—specially created for the Indian baby

Balamul has been specially formulated with the help of the Central Food Technological Research Institute, Mysore and tested at the Christian Medical College, Vellore!

Balamul—more nutrition, more value

- at least 25% more protein than other branded cereal foods
- more calcium, Vitamin A and C
- fortified with balanced quantities of fat, iron and Vitamin B Complex
- pre-cooked in milk. Easy-to-digest
- delicious, mixes easily with: dal, mashed fruits, puddings

Balamul gives TWICE the value for your money than any other branded cereal foods

FREE Informative Amul Baby Book and Balamul Growth Record Booklet in English. Baby Book also in Hindi, Marathi, Gujarati, Bengali, Tamil, Telugu and Malayalam. Write to Post Box No. 10124 Bombay 400 001 with your complete address and Re. 1.00 postage stamps.

Marketed by:
Gujarat Cooperative Milk Marketing Federation Limited, Anand.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

On toasts

Between breads

Over crackers

With desserts

Inside

puffs...

We're getting ourselves into a lot of jams to please you

NOGA

Mixed fruit jam
The choicest fruits get themselves into this jam.

Orange M-m-marmalade
Made from fresh-picked Nagpur oranges. A delicious way to enjoy an orange.

And 4 other fruity ways to toast yourself at breakfast

Pineapple jam
Mango jam
Strawberry jam
And Guava jelly

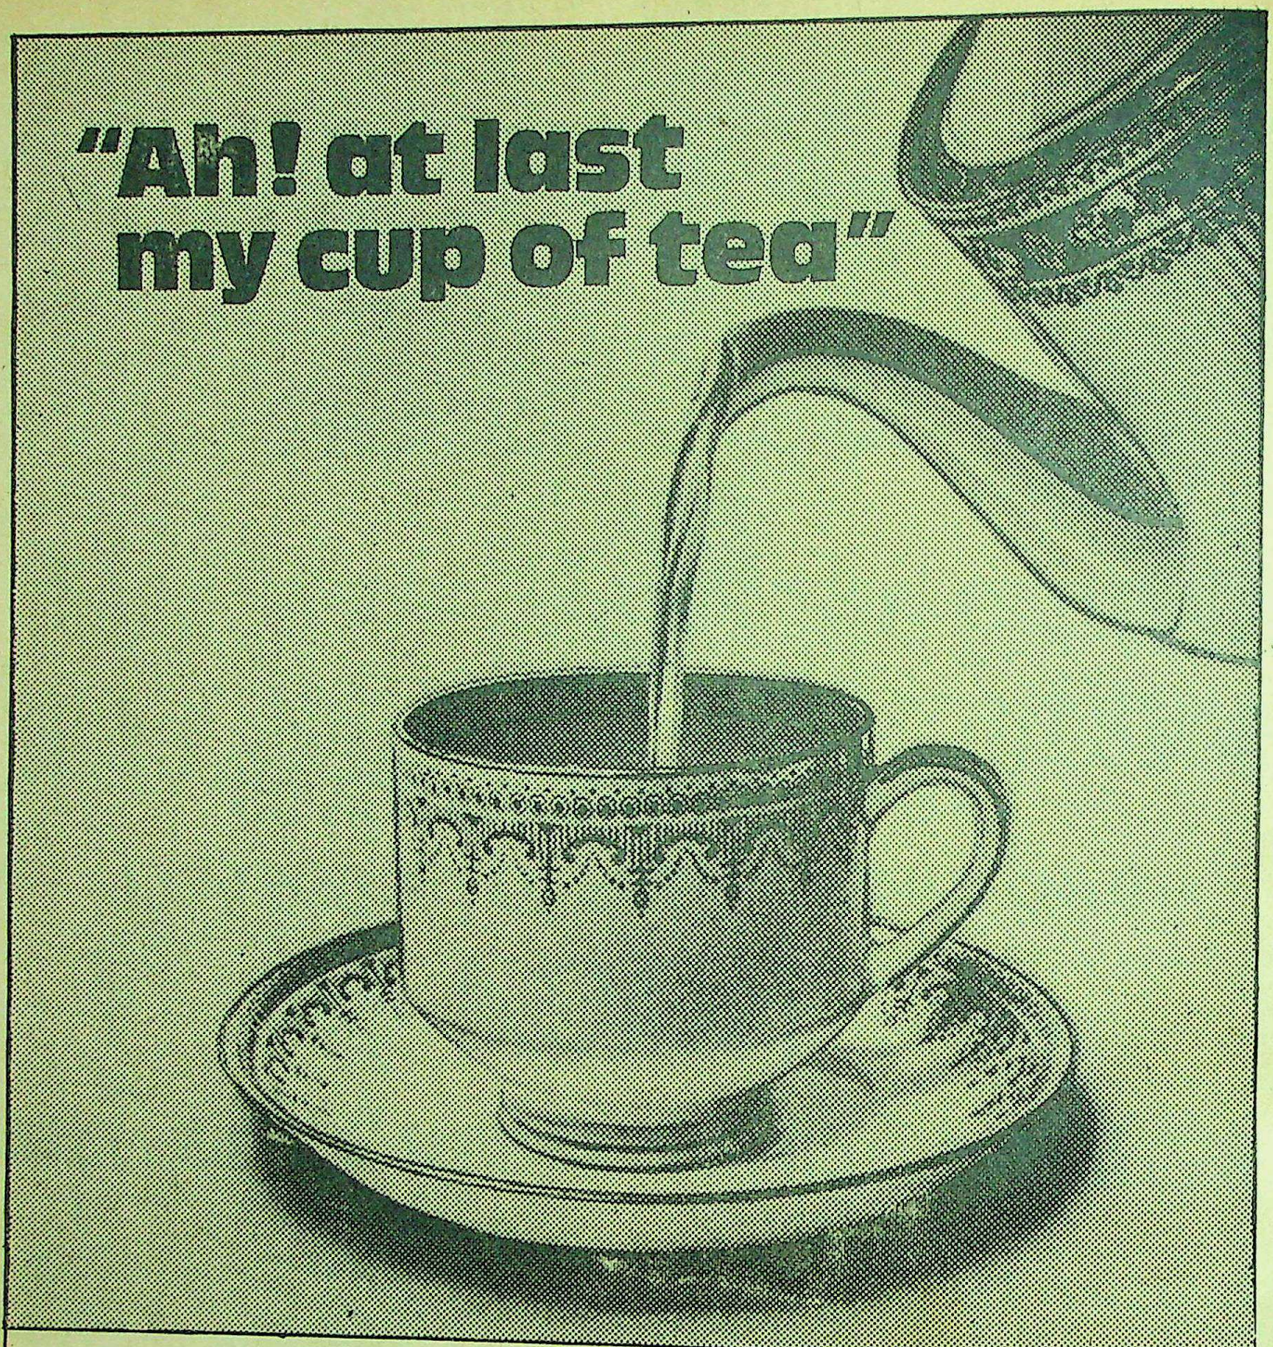
NOGA - IT'S ONLY NATURAL!

Maharashtra Agro-Industries Development Corporation Ltd. Noga Unit, Nagpur.

MAID 6/79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



Thank you for bearing with us.

We are together once again as one family continuing our tradition of eighty years—blending and delivering to your satisfaction—the finest quality Lipton teas.

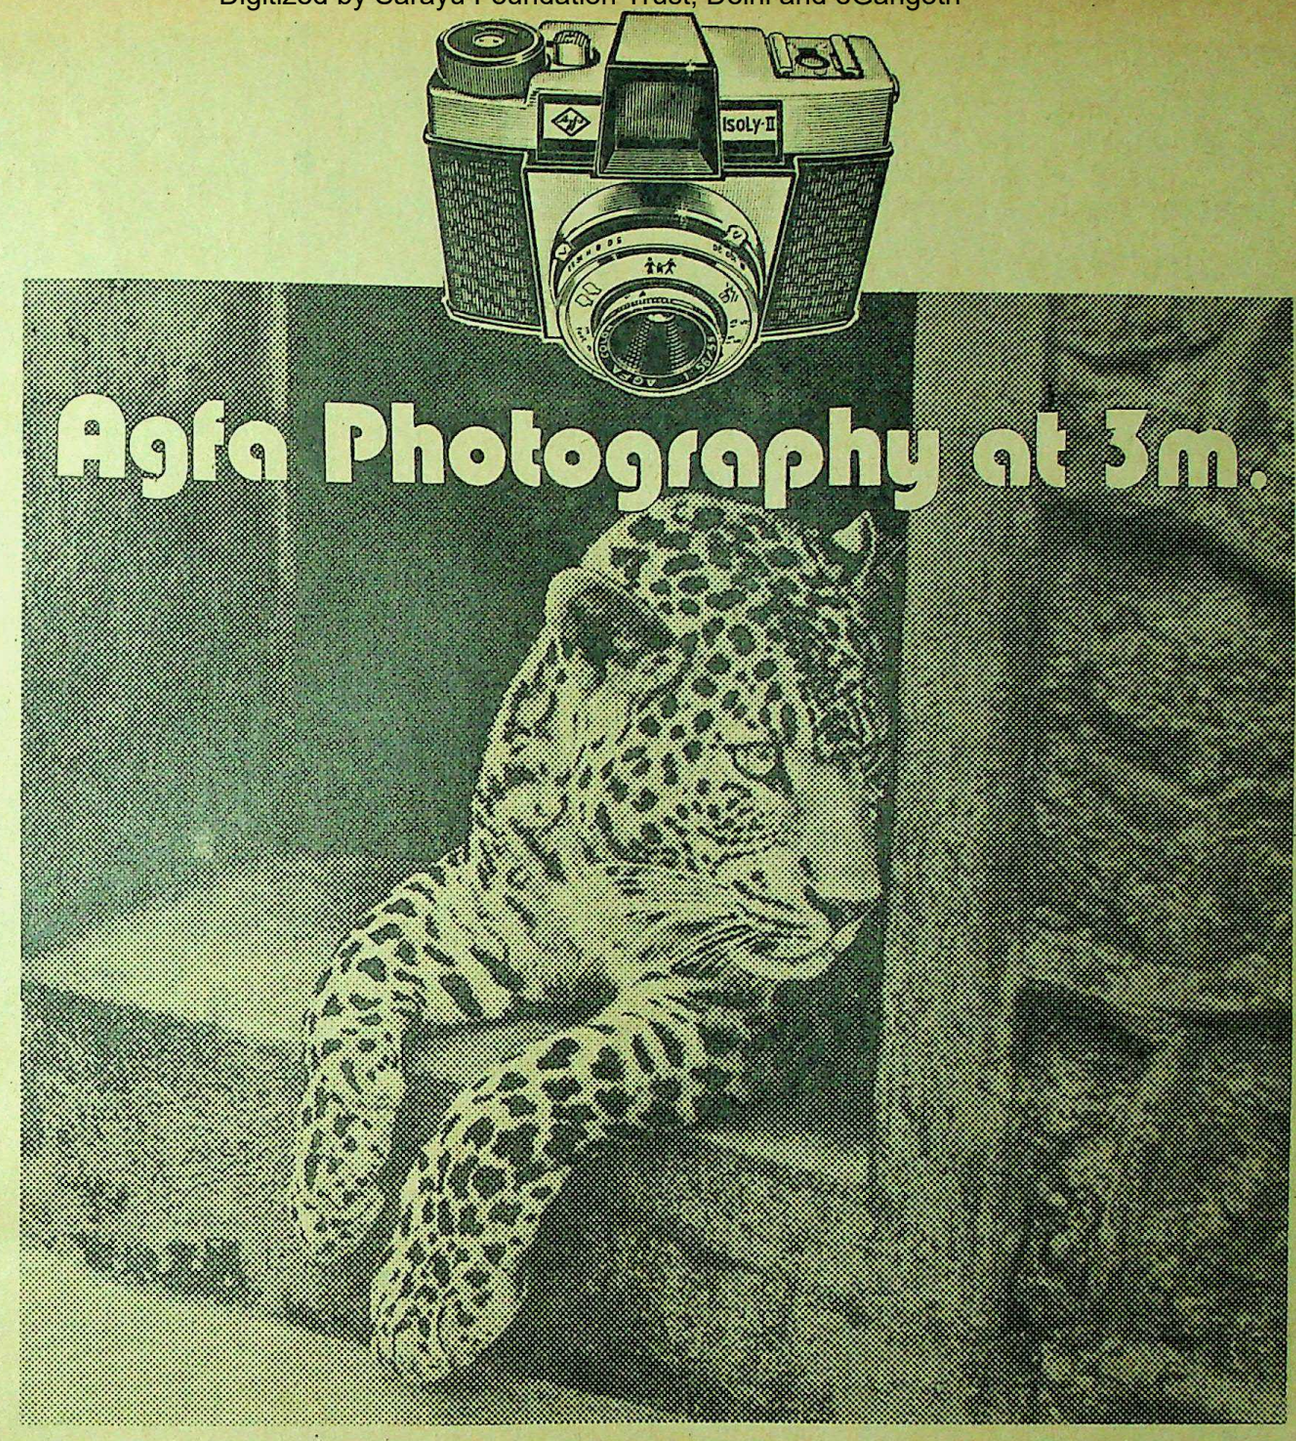
And now that we are back, you will find that Lipton tea was worth waiting for.

The tea that was worth waiting for LIPTON

LT/PR/CAS-3179

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



The Agfa Isoly-II takes perfect snapshots at close range. Set the aperture to f/8 to get just the right amount of light to the film. Set the shutter speed at 1/30 second, just fast enough to avoid camera shake. Shoot from a distance of 3 m. on slow film—125 ASA—for greater sharpness. The result? A perfect close-up every time.

The Agfa Isoly-II is a great all-round camera. You simply adjust settings, distance and film to freeze a sports scene forever, capture every detail, near or distant, of a landscape or take a perfect picture in dim, soft light.

The Agfa Isoly-II is built to German specifications and undergoes over 100 exacting tests. See this fine camera soon at your friendly Agfa dealer.

AGFA

Distributors:
AGFA-GEVAERT INDIA LIMITED
Branches: Bombay • New Delhi
Calcutta • Madras
®Registered Trademark of Agfa-Gevaert, Antwerp/Leverkusen. Manufacturers of Photographic Products.

Agfa® ISOLY-II
for professional results.

LT/PR/CAS-3/79

SIMOES/AG/A/78

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

NS/CAS—2/79

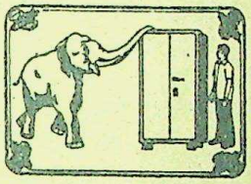
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

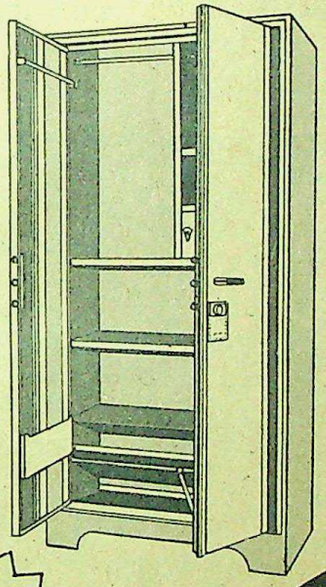
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

When you think of SECURITY of valuables at your home

Remember

Safe-Deposit Almirah





Guaranteed for 5 years

RAJ & RAJ

18, Rabindra Sarani (Poddar Court) Calcutta-700 001.
Phone : 26-9443

OTHER SHOWROOMS :
28/3A, Gariahat Road,
Calcutta-700 019. Ph. : 46-9539
Kamani Centre, Bishtupur,
Jamshedpur

iaa 808

KARNATAKA STATE LOTTERY

BUMPER PRIZE Rs.10 LAKHS

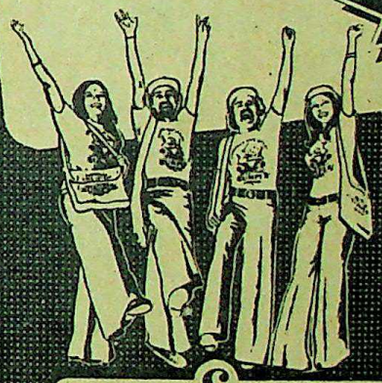
6 First Prizes
Rs.1,00,000

1,56,433 CASH PRIZES
WORTH Rs. 27,34,000

Rs. 2 per ticket



FESTIVAL BUMPER DRAW

10·11·79

Ⓜ MYSORE SALES INTERNATIONAL LTD Bangalore-560052

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Suvega: still at the top – in mopeds

Only from Suvega: "balanced" design for greater stability and front/rear suspensions for a smoother ride.

SAA/MIL/434

MOPEDS INDIA LIMITED
Tirupati, Andhra Pradesh

Suvega
Everything a moped should be

Suvega is the only Moped that offers a specially balanced, internally reinforced, frame design. And the result? Extra safety, stability and road gripping power. Even with extra load or a pillion rider on!

What's more, Suvega's unique front and rear suspensions absorb road shocks—which means comfortable ride everytime.

Plus all these star features:

- Hard-chromed aluminium alloy cylinders for longer life and extra Kms.
- Automatic clutch for ease and economy.
- Needle roller bearings for smoother movements and longer lives of parts.

And Suvega is backed up by the widest after-sales-service network and all-India availability of spares.

If even Saridon can't relieve your headache, consult a doctor.

One Saridon quickly eases headache away. Leaves you relaxed and refreshed.

Sometimes however, a headache can be so severe or stubborn that even Saridon may not help.

At such times consult a doctor. Let the doctor prescribe what's right for you.

Saridon TRADE MARK 'ROCHE'

The strong one. The safe one. Just one is enough.

RP.4160

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

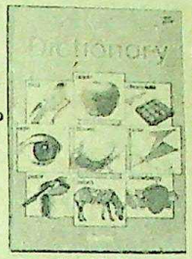
Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

HAMLYN BOOKS

books for pleasure. gifts to treasure

1 MY OWN COLOUR DICTIONARY

A lively book, suitable for young children who are beginning to read for themselves, but who need the help of really first class art work to recognise some of the most common words they meet in their everyday life.
64 pages
350 illustrations.



Rs. 32.20

11. YOGA 28 DAY EXERCISE PLAN

Robert Hittleman has distilled the essence of Yoga wisdom into a unique 28-day system. Over 500 superb black & white photographs illustrate movements in a way everyone can understand and practice Yoga the perfect way.
224 pages.

Rs. 82.80

14. THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF MODERN HISTORY

A new popular illustrated encyclopedia of the history of the modern world—the period of two centuries following the American and French Revolutions, during which the world as we know it to-day took shape. The movements, crisis, political changes and influential persons are described in straight forward terms. 352 pages. 250 colour and 250 black and white illustrations.

Rs. 164.68

2 1,000 GREAT LIVES

A companion volume to 1,000 Great Events. This is an exciting junior history of the world, told through the life stories of one thousand famous people—a children's who was who.
320 pages. Full colour and two colour illustrations throughout.

Also in the series :
3. 1,000 GREAT EVENTS

Rs. 59.80 each.

12. ART TREASURES OF THE WORLD

A deservedly popular survey of the most outstanding master pieces in the evolution of painting, sculpture and architecture, from primitive times to the 20th century.
288 pages. 286 colour plates. 253 Black & White illustrations

Rs. 146.28

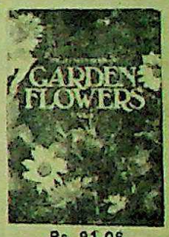
Rs. 91.08

13. HUMAN ANATOMY FOR THE ARTIST

A superb book of lasting value to Art students and those interested in Art. Full of specially commissioned drawings of the very highest quality.
192 pages. 180 black & white illustrations.

15. HAMLYN BOOK OF GARDEN FLOWERS

This highly illustrated and comprehensive book explains the aesthetic principle underlying successful flower gardening and suggests many effective planting schemes as well as giving full cultural details for hundreds of plants.
224 pages.
Over 450 colour illustrations.



Rs. 91.08

4 HERE'S MORE TELL ME WHY

A new volume in the successful TELL ME WHY series. An entertaining work of reference which provides in simple form, concise answers to hundreds of questions that children ask.
336 pages.

Also in the series :
5. TELL ME WHY
6. MORE TELL ME WHY
7. STILL MORE TELL ME WHY
8. LOTS MORE TELL ME WHY

Rs. 51.92 each

Available at all book shops.
For VPP Post Free supply write to :

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY OF INDIA LTD.,

- Mercantile House, Magazine Street,
- Reay Road (East), Bombay-400010
294, Bepin Behari, Ganguly Street, Calcutta-700012
- 21, Patullo Road, Madras-600002.
- 2/10, Ansari Road, Daryaganj, New Delhi-110002.

Also at BANGALORE, HYDERABAD, LUCKNOW and TRIVANDRUM

16. ALL ASIAN COOK BOOK

This superb, profusely illustrated Hamlyn cookbook contains more than 500 tempting recipes from 14 Asian countries.
208 pages. 36 colour illustrations.

Rs. 91.08

Rs. 46.00

17. WOMAN'S OWN BOOK OF CAKE DECORATING & CAKE MAKING

This beautiful book is on the fascinating art of Cake Decorating. Over 150 exciting cake designs, 200 inspiring photographs, helpful sketches and more than 50 photographs in full colour 128 pages.

Rs. 27.60

9. EVERY GIRL'S HANDBOOK

Packed with accurate and up-to-date information about everything that interests Girls; Health & Hygiene, Home-making, Handicrafts, Hobbies, Nature Study etc.
256 pages. Illustrations through out.

Also Available:
10 EVERY BOY'S HANDBOOK

ORDER FORM

Please supply
the following by V.P.P. POST FREE

1	2	3	4	5	6
7	8	9	10	11	12
13	14	15	16	17	18

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
_____

18. NEW LAROUSSE GASTRONOMIQUE

An alphabetically arranged encyclopedia of cooking, wine and food. Recipes are given for both classic and more unusual dishes. 1,152 pages. 47 colour and over 1,000 Black and White photographs.

Rs. 184.00

• Prices subject to change without prior notice.

TULIKA/188.79

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Happy bathday to you !

naa H51.794

Hindustan Sanitaryware

Soma Metal Fittings

Somany-Pilkington's Wall Tiles

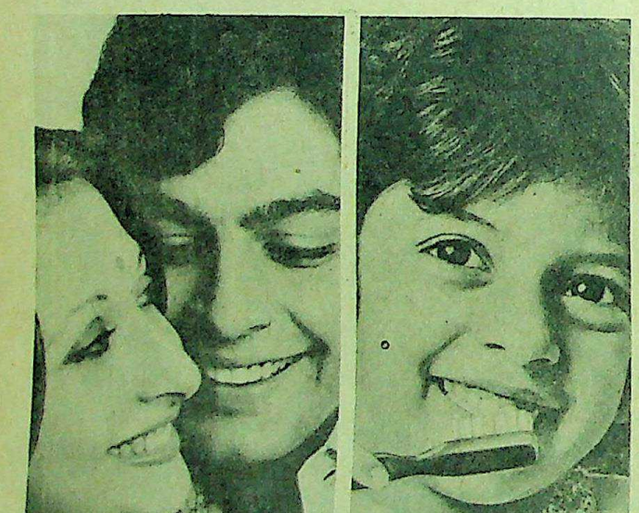
Hindustan Sanitaryware come in exciting colours. Soma Metal Fittings with international precision. Assures no-leak, no-drip service.
Elegantly styled. Guaranteed for 5 years. Somany-Pilkington's Wall Tiles— in enchanting designs and colours Easy to clean.

VITREOUS HINDUSTAN SANITARYWARE & INDUSTRIES LIMITED
Makers of India's largest selling, largest exported bathroom equipment

Soma Plumbing Fixtures Limited
A wholly owned subsidiary of Hindustan Sanitaryware

SOMANY-PILKINGTON'S LIMITED

2, Red Cross Place, Calcutta-700 001



Stop bad breath... fight tooth decay with Colgate Dental Cream

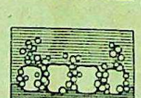
Brush your teeth with Colgate after every meal. It protects you just the way dentists recommend all over the world.

Bacteria grow in food particles left between your teeth. These can cause bad odour, and later— painful decay.

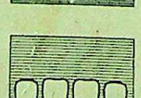
So always brush the Colgate way right after eating. It's proven most effective to freshen your breath, whiten your teeth and fight decay.

How Colgate's trusted formula works

Odour and decay causing bacteria grow in food particles trapped between your teeth.



Colgate's unique active foam reaches deep to remove dangerous food particles and bacteria.



The result : attractive white teeth, fresh breath confidence, protection against decay.

For cleaner, fresher breath and whiter teeth more people buy Colgate than any other toothpaste in the world!

Only a dentist can give you better dental care.

For complete dental care use Colgate Trigard Toothbrushes. They guard tooth enamel, guard against dental plaque and guard gums. 8 varieties to suit everyone in your family.

DC.G.64.78

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

An anchor for the future.

Your future security could depend a lot upon how resourceful you are today.

Bank of India extends loans to a number of self-employed people to create a living for themselves. Help them buy fishing boats, and other accessories for the fishing industry in India. Which has resulted in an improvement in the fishing trade, a better way of life and more foreign exchange.

Besides assisting with loans repayable at a low rate of interest, Bank of India has a number of savings schemes to suit your every requirement.

Visit your nearest Bank of India branch today. Secure your future with India's largest nationalised bank.

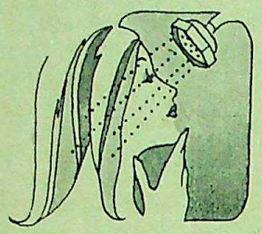
CONCEPT-BOI-4379

Bank of India
(A Government of India Undertaking)
Where service makes the difference.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Must you suffer chapped skin and cracked lips every winter? Protect yourself these four ways!



1 All those hot, steamy baths you have every winter morning don't help a bit. You end up losing vital moisture and your skin becomes scaly and dry. Bathe in tepid water if you can't stand the thought of cold baths.

2 If you don't have the time to oil yourself, try this quick, simple alternative. After your bath, put in a few drops of olive oil—even coconut oil will do—into a mug of warm water and splash it all over your body. Then just pat yourself dry with a towel.

3 Those winter winds raise a lot of dust. And dirt and cracked skin are a dangerous combination. A good home remedy is a 'maida' and milk paste rubbed into the skin. Just see the dirt come out and your skin glow.

GD 9910

4 Boroline is a must in winter.

Massage the gentle, nourishing cream into all the affected areas—your face, lips, arms, neck, hands, elbows, waist and feet.

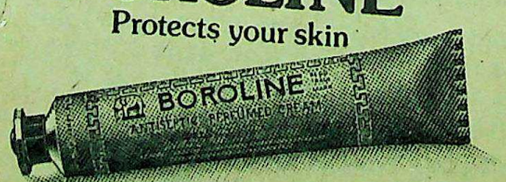
Boroline helps prevent chapping, peeling and rashes.

It also works as an antiseptic for minor cuts and abrasions and protects cracked skin from infection.

ANTISEPTIC PERFUMED CREAM

BOROLINE

Protects your skin



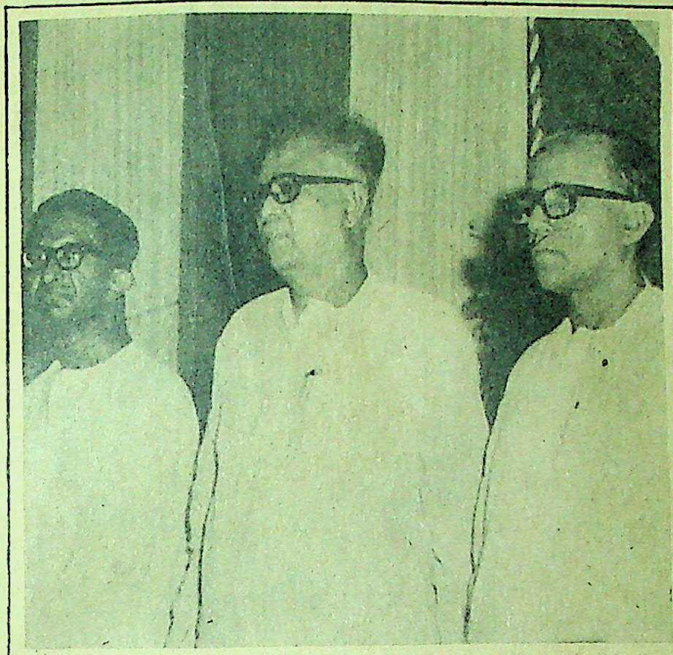
G. D. Pharmaceuticals Limited
Boroline House Calcutta 700 003

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SUNDAY VOLUME 7 ISSUE 21 RUPEE ONE AN ANANDA BAZAR PUBLICATION

November 4, 1979



These are crucial times for votaries of dialectical materialism. The Left movement in India having passed through some very difficult stages, often looking as though it would never survive, the unexpected change of circumstances following the announcement of mid-term elections must appear as a splendid opportunity to all Left Parties to improve their standing in national politics. SUNDAY correspondents assess their ratings in the national and regional arenas to find how they plan to tackle the elections, and how good their chances are.

The hope of a grand alliance of the Lok Dal, Congress and Left Parties received a severe jolt with the resignation of H. N. Bahuguna from the Government. In a detailed exclusive interview Bahuguna outlines his differences with Charan Singh. Also an assessment of Bahuguna the politician : Was he too clever ?

GUNTER GRASS, German novelist par excellence decided to give himself a novel present for his fiftieth birthday. He wrote : "The Flounder". We publish extracts describing his visit to Calcutta where he imagines himself as a Vasco da Gama reincarnate. He finds, he most wants to visit the goddess Kali and see her stick out her tongue. Destruction obsesses him; his only solution for Calcutta is to wipe it out.

COMMENT

Opinion 19

COVER STORY

Is a red sun rising ?|Kewal Varma 24

SPECIAL REPORT

The Bahuguna story|Udayan Sharma 37

SUNDAY SPECIAL

Dirty Calcutta|Gunter Grass 66

ELECTION SPECIAL

United we stand a chance|S. P. Sagar 52
It's Mrs Gandhi or Biju|Swarup Jena
Notes|M. J. Akbar

NEWS

Scream of Silent Valley|Arthur Pais 44
Janata routed in Sikkim|Tapas Mukherjee
Rendered speechless|Anil Grover
Jaslok on dialysis|Ashish Rajadhyaksha

CINEMA

Khaas Baat 64

VARIETY

Sundayweek 75
Comics : Peanuts 77
Chess|Bridge|Quiz|Stamp 79
This India 81
Humour in real life 81
Without comment 81

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Book review : Why did Pakistan attack|A. G. Noorani 60
Asterix 62
Delhi Dairy|D. E. Nizamuddin 82

Cover transparency of E. M. S. Namboodiripad by Biswaranjan Rakshit and of H. N. Bahuguna by Kamal Sahai.

Editor M. J. Akbar

Assistant Editor Subir Roy Editorial Staff Nirmal Mitra, David McMahon, Saumitra Banerjee, Tirthankar Ghosh, S. N. M. Abdi
Delhi Correspondent Ajoy Bose
Art Director Bipul Guha Asst Art Director Amiya Bhattacharya

Published from 6 Prafulla Sarkar Street Calcutta 700001 and printed at Ananda Offset Private Ltd., P-248, C.I.T. Scheme No. VI-M Calcutta 700054 by Bappaditya Roy for Ananda Bazar Patrika Limited.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Come alive with freshness

Totally different LIRIL. Rippled green with the exciting freshness of limes. Tangy, tingling LIRIL ...makes a fresh new woman of you.

Liril
THE FRESHNESS SOAP

with the exciting freshness of limes

LINTAS-LR. 27-2416

A Quality Product by HINDUSTAN LEVER

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Uncovered

THE cover story "The Film Underworld" (September 16) was a wonderful expose of whatever goes on behind the scenes in the industry. It is true that the Hindi film environment is polluted by unscrupulous people to the extent that it cannot maintain a high standard. In helplessness, we have been forced to accept this as something that will never be changed. And we are in no position even to hope for changes until the luminaries of the industry do a quick bit of revaluation.
Shirsanka, Calcutta.

THE article was an eye opener, literally and metaphorically.
C. Jagannatham, Hyderabad.

IT is really unfortunate that SUNDAY is losing its sophisticated flavour by switching over to the style adopted by some of the film magazines.
Ashish Saha, Calcutta.

THE story as well as the highly provocative cover just go to show that your moral depravity is unlimited. It was none of your business to delve into the quagmire of Indian cinema, which should be the exclusive prerogative of the film magazines. Although we know full well that your attitude towards the three W's (wine, women and wealth) cannot be changed, we persist in writing this even though we strongly suspect it will be consigned to the waste paper basket.
Jahar Das and Kartick Chandra Das, Calcutta.

YOUR cover picture was straight out of Khajuraho. I told my daughter that as she had seen the cover, she was lucky to have seen all of Khajuraho—at the concessional rate of just one rupee.
L. A. Ramanathan, Mysore.

I DO not think your cover pleased many people and I hope such obscenity will not be repeated. The cover would have been widely appreciated if you had shown Sunny executing his favourite stroke instead. However, the article made up for the lapse on the cover.
Disha Kartik, New Delhi.

I TORE up the cover in disgust. Couldn't you have put a less suggestive photo on the cover and shifted the one of Rajesh and Tina into an inconspicuous place inside the magazine where it would not have been so offensive? It is astonishing that an esteemed weekly like SUNDAY should publish such alluring covers. But I must add that I enjoyed reading the articles.
Mitrojeet Bose, Ranchi.

THE COVER smacked of vulgarism and vulgarity and bad taste. Why must you vie with other magazines on the subject of obscenity? SUNDAY has already established itself as a journal of very high standing and any attempt to increase your circulation by publishing such obscene pictures may even prove counter-productive.
N. N. Sen, Calcutta.

THANK YOU for publishing that photograph of Rajesh Khanna and Tina on the cover. I am sure that other Rajesh Khanna fans must have been equally delighted to see the photograph of their guru on the cover of such a popular magazine.
Samit Kumar, Calcutta.

Deserted, by George!

A GREAT deal of credit must go to Mr George Fernandes for organising a mass railwaymen's strike for the first time in India. But he should face the brickbats at the same time he receives the kudos.

Propriety demanded Mr Fernandes' taking charge as Railway Minister when the Janata Government was installed in 1977 but he not only skipped taking the railways portfolio, he also stripped himself of all responsibility to the P&T department as he was obviously not able to face the working class, whose champion he had once been. Perhaps he thought that by becoming the Industries Minister he could maintain his image of a popular leader instead of running the risk of incurring the dissatisfaction of the railway and P & T workers who were at loggerheads with him. Again, morality called for the resignation of Mr Fernandes from the Government in the event of his failure to give bonus to railwaymen or his failure to persuade the Union Cabinet to give them bonus. Yet he clung to power instead till he felt it was unsafe to do so on political grounds.

One feels that Mr Fernandes championed his own cause in 1974 rather than that of the railwaymen. He has rightly said that the Railway Trade Union leadership is corrupt, but it is no more corrupt than the railway administration itself. And Mr Fernandes has to admit that his contribution to the eradicaion of this evil was nil.

Mr Fernandes has also made some errors in his article. It was not at the insistence of the Railway Board that there was a mushrooming of category-wise trade unions as he argues. This was inevitable as the AIRF and NFIR, the two recognised federations, failed to deliver the goods. The firemen of Southern Railway, disgusted and disappointed about their working conditions, low salaries and the inhuman treatment meted out to them by the railways formed the Firemen's Council in 1966-67. It was afterwards that the drivers, motormen, assistant drivers, shunters etc. joined the bandwagon which later emerged as the All-India Loco Running Staff Association.

Likewise, Mr Fernandes' contention that the Loco Running Staff Association resisted the strike move due to a psychosis of dwindling militancy but joined later is also incorrect. Mr Fernandes should have honestly admitted the fact that had the CWC of the AILRSA at its meeting at Vijayawada on April 12, 1974 not decided to join the strike, things would have been different today.

There was no attempt by the AIRF for regrouping and maintaining the unity of railwaymen after the strike as Mr Fernandes says. Instead of keeping the NCCRS (National Co-ordination Committee for Railwaymen's Struggle) intact, the AIRF broke it. As a result of this there was no proper machinery to look after the victimised employees. Many of them starved; many lost their jobs permanently, many died or committed suicide.

The sincerity and good intentions of Mr Fernandes are at stake. The railwaymen have lost faith in his leadership as also in other political personalities. If at all he organises another strike, it will again be to champion his own cause and not theirs, the railwaymen think. And any other strike move with the leadership of any other political dignitary will evoke exactly the same feeling from them.
V. K. Srikumar, Palghat (Vice President, All India Loco Running Staff Association).

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

It is not for the run of every mill. Only the more profit-conscious ones.

Nirester texturised polyester filament yarn. It is a unique combination of strength and softness. Strong enough to withstand the rougher handling of even older cotton mill equipment. Yet soft enough for the finest fashion fabrics.

Nirester texturised polyester filament yarn undergoes a very special manufacturing process. One that includes twisting and re-setting the individual filaments in the yarn. This causes the yarn to fluff up. The result is a tremendous increase in tensile strength. Better performance during the weaving process. And a unique 'softness' to the touch.

Nirester texturised yarn. It feels better. It falls better. It takes dyes better. Naturally, consumers like its more sophisticated-looking finish.

Weave the magic of Nirester texturised filament yarn into your fashion fabrics. And add to its fashion appeal. And your profit margins.

Nirester
texturised polyester

At last! A fashion filament yarn that isn't flat!

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

What a letdown!

IN HIS long article "The fateful days" (September 16) George Fernandes, in the section entitled "Opposition unprepared", blasts the youth, students and general public for their lack of interest in the railwaymen's movement. He also chastises them for their lack of support but perhaps he is not aware of the hardships the general public suffer at the hands of railwaymen. With the image of the Indian railways as bad as it is, how does Mr Fernandes expect to get any public sympathy?

He also seems to be ignorant of the magic powers of railwaymen, who outdo Gogia Pasha and P. C. Sorcar Jr in sheer terms of magic. Apples change to bricks and pebbles enter stitched gunny bags containing rice during transportation by rail.
R. C. Goel, Solan.

ONE fails to understand the relevance of publishing an account of the railway strike of 1974 five years after it took place, except maybe to build up the image of Mr Fernandes, which has been tarnished recently.
Aditya, New Delhi.

THE ARTICLE made illuminating reading, although certain portions bring to mind the question "Is Mr George Fernandes loyal even to his trade union comrades with whom he has so sacredly associated himself in the past?"
Siddharth Chaturvedi, Pilani.

IN THE face of such inefficiency, negligence and mismanagement, the railways owe us, their customers, an explanation. Is this the manner in which they serve the public?
Dr S. K. Gupta, Kumardhubi.

AS A passenger who has a longstanding complaint against the railways —which the authorities have not had the courtesy to reply to—I stand convinced that inefficiency is the only criterion for an administrative post in the railways.
P. K. Mitra, Lucknow.

Vanishingtrix

IT WAS wonderful to hear that SUNDAY will be printed from Madras as well. Glad news indeed. It is a thoroughly enjoyable magazine which has become a habit, if not an addiction, with me. But why have you discontinued Asterix? The absence of this popular comic strip definitely dampens my enthusiasm, so won't you please resume Asterix?
Mohammed Nadukkandy, Calicut.

Asterix has in no way been banished from the pages of SUNDAY. The wait was just to ensure that our readers get a brand new adventure. Asterix returns with this issue. We are sure that the wait was worth it. Editor, SUNDAY.

Wool over your eyes

THE REPORT by S. N. Wagle on Fr. Bede D'Costa, "Smuggler or Blackmail Victim" (September 16) is so full of lies and mistakes that I wonder how it got past the editor. There is reference to me, as the father of Allwyn Fernandes, that says I am on the Committee for Truth, Justice and Peace "based in the ashram itself" and opposed to Fr Bede. That this is an utter lie will be evident from a pamphlet on which my name appears. A perusal of the pamphlet will make it obvious to anyone that this committee is opposed to the Agnel Ashram Fathers to whom Fr Bede is opposed. Further, this pamphlet was printed by Father Bede himself and given to me. It was he who put my name on it.

Fr Bede has either succeeded in fooling Mr Wagle who swallowed everything he said without asking for proof, or your correspondent got everything mixed up and produced the hotch-potch article he did that does not make sense to us here in Bombay who are better informed about these things. God save SUNDAY from such correspondents.

The least I would have expected of your correspondent is that he cross-check the malicious allegations and insinuations made. I have never been a devotee of the ashram at any time in my 63 years, nor have I stepped in there or met any of the priests who run the establishment, or been associated with it in any way. Your correspondent's claim therefore is simply absurd.

I hope you will print this letter in fairness to me.
Lawrence Fernandes, Bombay.

A denial

THE ITEM "Harijan Muslim riot in Bihar Cabinet" by Arun Ranjan (September 16) is purely a figment of the author's imagination. The reported fighting between me and my esteemed colleague, Mr Mohan Ram in the Department of Tourism is very far from the truth.

It is an open fact that can be verified from the records of the Bihar Department of Tourism up to the date of Mr Ranjan's report that there has been not even one Muslim appointed in the Department of Tourism, Government of Bihar, with the exception of one peon, in whose appointment I had absolutely no hand. In fact, not even a proposal for the appointment of a Muslim has been sent either by me or from my personnel office during this period. So, the charge that I am trying to pack the department with Muslims is entirely unfounded. After the date of this report, that is September 22, one more Muslim has been appointed as a cook in Bodhgaya, which appointment I only learnt about when I asked the Department's officers to clarify after seeing Mr Ranjan's report.

The report of the "open war" between my esteemed colleague and myself and the report of its spillover amongst the officers of the two communities are equally baseless. It is a fact that I wanted to charge the Director of Tourism who was appointed during the time of my esteemed colleague Mr Mohan Ram. However, this had neither to do with the caste of the incumbent nor with his having been appointed in the time of Mr Mohan Ram. Even before I became Minister for Tourism during the tenure of my esteemed colleague Mr Mohan Ram, Mr Ram himself had requested the Chief Secretary to take back the Director's services. The very fact that the replacement has been (a) by a non-Muslim and (b) by a person from outside the State of Bihar is sufficient to establish the falsehood of the allegations of Mr Ranjan's report.

May I also take the opportunity through the Opinion column of your esteemed magazine to contradict the above referred report sentence for sentence and place on record that relations between Mr Mohan Ram and myself are as deferential and cordial as befits two members of the Bihar Cabinet.
Md Sayeed, Patna (Minister of Tourism, Bihar)

Mountbatten reconsidered

THE INDIAN Press and leaders were over-enthusiastic about Lord Mountbatten's "place of honour" in Indian history (September 16). Lord Mountbatten was undoubtedly a charming personality but was he our true friend? He was a good friend to the Nehru family and also to all Gandhian politicians, but he was neither a friend to the late M. A. Jinnah to whom Mountbatten was forced to surrender. He cannot be treated as a true Indian patriot.

Lord Mountbatten's role during the transfer of power was most disastrous for the Indian subcontinent. Leonard Mosley, a British historian, had written in his book "The Last Days of the British Raj"—"within a month of Lord Mountbatten's arrival in India, Jawaharlal, the firm opponent of Partition, had become if not a supporter, at least acquiescent towards the idea". Azad added "I have often wondered how Jawaharlal was won over by Mountbatten". Mosley further wrote—"There are many who believe that they were victims of a salesman's trick which won them freedom but cost them the unity of the country. A little patience and all the troubles might have been avoided".
Bidyut K. Mukherjee, Calcutta.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

CHRYSAL

Wonderful that anything so useful can look so good!

A touch of glamour. A look of class. In a choice of sets and designs to suit your taste.

Chrysal is the name for beauty and utility in your home. We call it beautility ware. And it comes in a choice of combinations—you can proudly own one or more sets and keep building up your collection. Because once you own a set, you'll want to buy more.

Chrysal is styled with several coats of decorative inks to keep it looking good as new for years.

Chrysal is made from material specially selected for optimum thickness and temper so that each container, from the smallest to the largest, is built stronger to last longer.

Chrysal containers come in sizes to suit your needs : 1 kg, 2 kg, 5 kg and 10 kg. In addition, there are smart little spice cans, plus an attractive refreshment tray and cork-backed table mats to match.

Chrysal sets come complete with matching shelf-stickers and self-adhesive labels for your containers.

Chrysal is white-coated inside and topped with many layers of FDA approved, scratch-resistant lacquer so that it stays rustproof— and your food stays fresh.

Chrysal offers you "full satisfaction or your money back" —that's how sure we are of its performance in your home.

Chrysal beautility for your home from Metal Box.

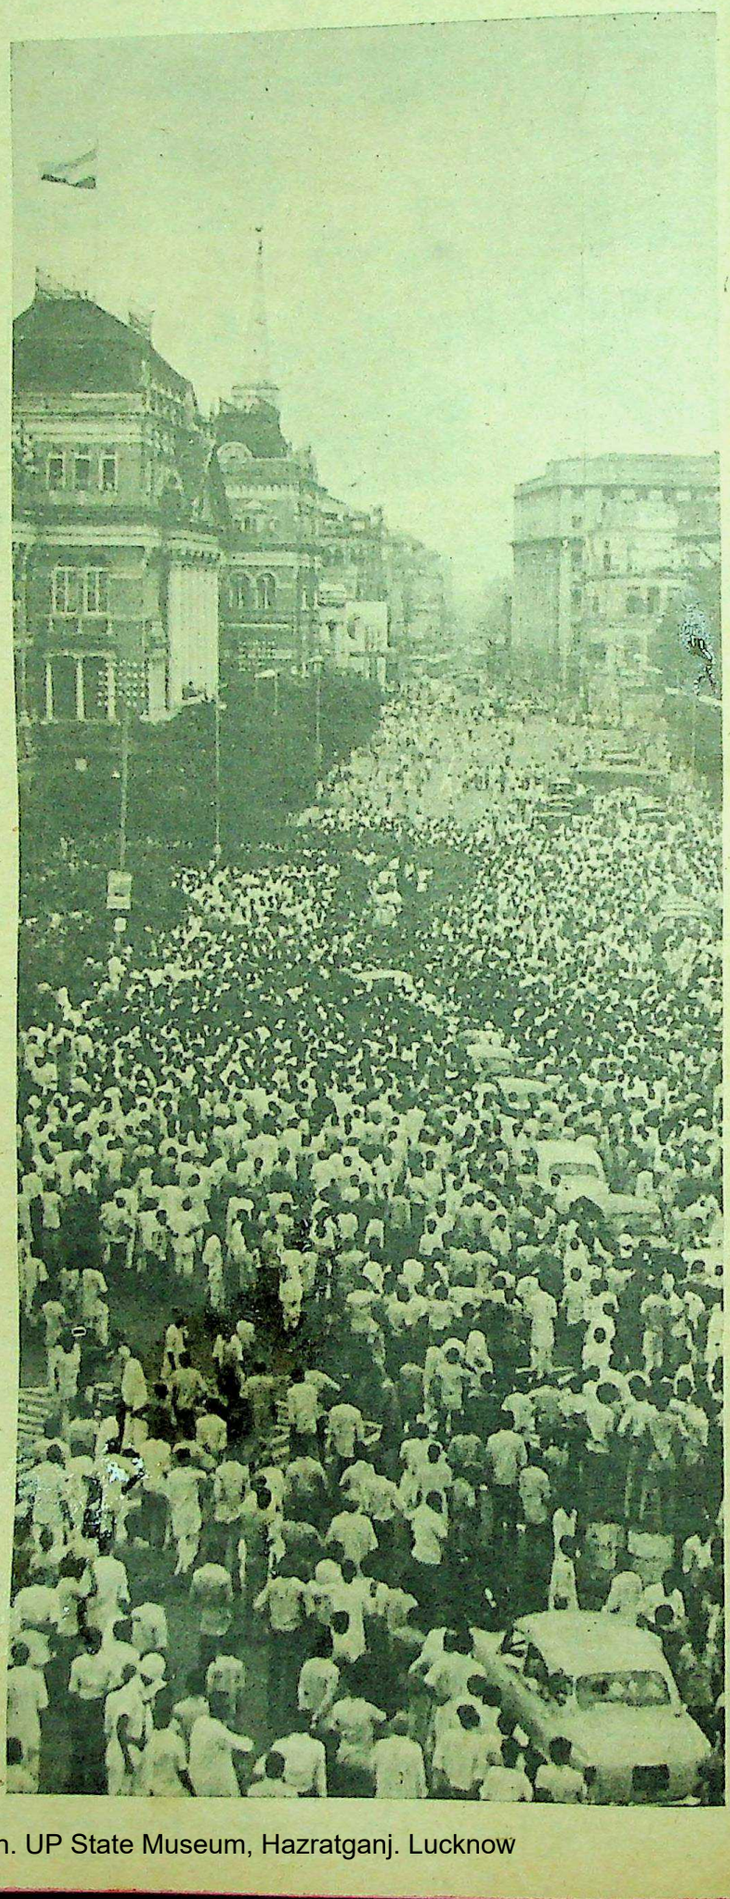
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Is a red sun rising?

The history of the Communist movement in India is a history of painful mistakes. But they are now getting a new opportunity to become an important factor in national politics. Will they rise to the occasion?

By KEWAL VARMA



COMRADE X: "What's this comrades? For the last three days we have only been discussing this or that mistake we have made. This breast-beating will take us nowhere." Comrade Y: "Comrade, don't you know Lenin said that Communists must honestly own up their mistakes." Comrade Z: "But comrade Lenin said this only for those Communist Parties who rarely made mistakes and not for those Communist Parties who have always been making mistakes." That was the enlightening discussion this reporter overheard in a coffee stall at the Bhatinda Congress of the CPI last year. This history of the Communist movement in India is a history of mistakes. After 50 years of the movement, the two Communist Parties put together are only a marginal factor in national politics. The Communists were the main Opposition till 1962 but since then they have been progressively backsliding, yielding the role of the main Opposition to others. Like a frog in a well, the CPI(M) is trapped in a world of self-contentment, smugness, complacency and arrogance, within the walls of West Bengal and Kerala.

A most simplistic explanation for all this is that Communism is a foreign ideology and thus cannot take roots in the soil of a tradition-bound country like India. But if it could strike roots in China and Vietnam, why not in India? Similarly, the stigma of being pro-Soviet (the CPI(M) has of late become as much pro-Soviet as the CPI) is not a serious political handicap in India. After all, till the Revolution, Mao was called a Soviet agent and Ho Chi-Minh a Chinese agent. These spicy epithets are only good enough for newspapers. Politically, they become harmful if blind labelling leads to the sacrifice of national interests. In fact, this is precisely what happened with the Communist movement 35 years ago. In 1942, at the time when the national and patriotic upsurge was at its height, the Communists isolated themselves from the national mainstream. There is no denying the fact that in its infancy the Communist movement all over the world, China included, was guided by Comintern. At one time Comintern made a wrong assessment and concluded that the bourgeoisie in colonial countries had gone over to the side of imperialism and thus Gandhiji was dubbed a reactionary. It was Mao who opposed this line of the international Communist movement. The Comintern corrected its position. But M. N. Roy, who was then in charge of the India desk at the Comintern, was personally of the view that the bourgeoisie had become an ally of imperialism. He thus distorted the Comintern policy in the course of its implementation in India. The net effect was that Communists could not integrate fully with the national movements. Thus, despite the fact that a large number of Communists made tremendous sacrifices in the freedom struggle and fought many a heroic battle, crowned by the Royal Indian Navy strike in 1945, Communists could not adequately share the fruits of the freedom movement. The Congress carried away the bulk of this heritage, and the Communists missed the bus.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

After Independence, the biggest socio-economic battle was fought against feudalism. The Communists did fight bitter struggles against feudalism in pockets like Telengana, the Tebhaga struggle in West Bengal, Maradar, Punjab, etc. But the main credit for the battle against feudalism was again taken by the Congress. With the abolition of zamindari, 20 million cultivators were freed of feudal exploitation. The secret of the Communists' success in Kerala and West Bengal is that they carried out the second stage of the socio-economic battle against semi-feudal relations in the form of tenancy and sharecropping. Kerala is the only State where absentee landlordism has been completely abolished. West Bengal is closely following Kerala's footsteps and Devaraj Urs is also going along the same lines in Karnataka. That explains his as well as the Communists strength in Kerala and West Bengal

The tragedy of Indian Communists has been that on the political plane, wherever there is a spontaneous national upsurge, they have a knack of remaining out of step with the mainstream. After 1942 the second biggest political upsurge was the demonstration of democratic sentiments in 1977. The CPI clearly played a treacherous role. The CPI(M) played a passive role and did not join actively in the struggle against dictatorship. None of its important leaders was arrested during the Emergency. The result was that whereas the CPI was badly mauled, the CPI(M) could barely retain its strength in the 1977 elections. The main beneficiaries of the Congress collapse at the national level were the Rightist Parties. Between 1942 and 1977 whenever there were mini-upsurges, the Communist movement was found wanting in enthusiasm. Even in 1978-79 the national campaign against Hindu communalism was articulated and led by Raj Narain and company and the Communists are latecomers in this campaign. The CPI(M) till the eleventh hour, was wavering about whether or not to break with the Jana Sangh-dominated truncated Janata.

The most serious setback to the Communist movement resulted from its 1964 split. Differences had existed in the united Communist movement on the question of whether there should be a tactical alliance with the Congress or not in carrying out certain socio-economic reforms. However, these internal differences alone could not have led to the split, but for the split between Moscow and Peking. Precisely at the time the Indian Communist Party split, many other Communist Parties in the world got split between Moscow and Peking. In India, it was not an accident that all those who in the National Council of the united Communist Party voted against the resolution declaring China as an aggressor, later formed the CPI(M). The only dissenter was Sohan Singh Josh. But it must be said to the credit of the CPI(M) leaders that after the 1967 elections they acquired self-confidence and began to assert their independence. This annoyed Peking which shifted its patronage from the CPI(M) to the Naxalites. The CPI-(M) for its part, also slowly drifted closer to Moscow. In 1968, while the CPI was sharply divided, the CPI(M) wholeheartedly supported the Soviet troops' march into Czechoslovakia. In ideological terms, the CPI(M) is still sticking to Stalinism whereas the CPI associates itself with post-Stalin trends in the international Communist movement. The CPI(M)'s attachment to Stalinism is evident from the fact that it celebrates Stalin's birthday more enthusiastically than even Moscow does.

"EMS"

THE split in the Communist movement was compounded by the divergent routes taken by the two Communist Parties between 1969 and 1977. The CPI aligned itself with Mrs Gandhi with the object of fighting the challenge of feudal and relatively Rightist forces. Meanwhile, the CPI(M) adopted an overbearing and big-brotherly attitude towards its smaller allies in West Bengal and Kerala. In the period between 1967 and 1969 some brash upstarts among the CPI(M) cadres resorted to politics of physical assault and murder of even their allies. The CPI, which had taken a different political course, overreacted and snapped its alliance with the CPI(M). Objectively, the CPI played into the hands of Mrs Indira Gandhi and sabotaged Left unity. The CPI said that it was following a unity-struggle policy but in practice it remembered only unity and forgot about the struggle. It continued on its sliding downhill course till it bit the dust pathetically during the Emergency.

In the name of fighting Right reaction, the CPI supported authoritarianism and lost its credibility in the process. In this game of self-delusion, some sections began to see Mrs Gandhi as a harbinger of socialism. New Age once pleaded: "Mrs Gandhi alone cannot bring Socialism." But S. A. Dange in his note of dissent at the Bhatinda Congress asserted that "Mrs Gandhi was bringing democratic reforms with Socialist orientation." Yet, all the CPI's labour from 1969 to 1977 did not go to waste. The CPI's politics did contribute to the radicalisation of a large section of Congressmen, making them stand against Mrs Gandhi. They are now prepared to accept an alliance with Leftists, including the CPI and CPI (M).

Theoretically, there is nothing wrong with the policy of unity and struggle. In fact, that is the only course open to the Left Parties to grow from strength to strength. But unity and struggle is like a double-edged sword. You must have a keen sense of timing, that is the knowledge about when to unite and when to break. Mao joined hands with Chiang Kai-shek thrice and broke with him thrice. The CPI lacked that sense of timing. Its judgement was also clouded by an extraneous consideration, namely the strong support the Russians were giving Mrs Gandhi. The CPI(M)'s record in this regard is only a shade better. It entered into an alliance with the Janata, but did not take the initiative to break this alliance when the time came. The initiative was entirely Raj Narain's and the CPI(M) was only confronted with a fait accompli. Instead of setting the pace, the CPI (M) timidly followed the events leading to the isolation of Jana Sangh-RSS forces. Now the wheel has again come a full circle, and the two Communist Parties have come together to ally with Charan Singh. In 1967 too they had done the same

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Classic
Filter Kings.
Created and perfected from selected virginia tobaccos.
For those who value taste.

Classic by ITC

Maximum Price Rs. 10 for 20
Subject to local taxes

STATUTORY WARNING CIGARETTE SMOKING IS INJURIOUS TO HEALTH

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

when together they joined the anti-Congress front. But unless they develop the art of deciding when to make and when to break alliances this politics of alliance may not benefit them.

One difficulty with Indian Communists is that they are rather recent converts to democratic politics. There is yet no international experience to bring about socialist-oriented reforms without force within a democratic framework. In a democratic framework, a broad base of popular support is essential for carrying out reforms. This is more true when these reforms are effected at the State level and the Central Government is not wholly helpful in its attitude. The broad-based support in crude arithmetical terms should mean active support from 50 to 55 per cent of the population. It is precisely with the aim of winning over such a base of support that the Italian Communist leader Berlinguer is pursuing his policy of Historic Compromise. In a sense his Indian counterpart is E.M.S. Namboodiripad. When the first Communist Government was dismissed in 1959, in the face of the liberation struggle and the Communist Party later lost the Assembly elections, EMS opted for the Berlinguer way. He neutralised and won over the support of the Church and Muslim communalists for the socio-economic programme. The EMS-led United Front swept the polls in 1967. But his blind spot was the Congress whom he would not touch with a pair of tongs. His unfinished task was completed by Achuta Menon and the Congress joined the alliance. The land reforms were implemented with the Congress as a partner in the Government. In the process a huge chunk of the Congress was also radicalised and A. K. Antony is the product of that phenomenon. Unfortunately the latest turn of events indicates that sectarianism has resurfaced in EMS.

In West Bengal also one has to keep one's fingers crossed. In the short term there is no threat to the CPI(M). But this is because the CPI(M)'s detractors are disunited at present. The moment they unite, things will hot up for the CPI(M). Unlike EMS, who is trying to expand the area of his support the CPI(M) in West Bengal is most reluctant to accept new allies, let alone take the initiative to enlarge its base of support. Even limited reforms generate hostility among those who are adversely affected by them.

APART from acquiring the skill of forming united fronts and accepting the compulsions of working in a democratic framework, the Communists have to learn many more things to become a national force. Their alliance with the Lok Dal and Congress will, perhaps, help them get a few more seats. But they will still not become a decisive force at the national level. One of the biggest failures of the Communist movement is that they have trained the Indian working class to become a class for itself instead of a class which feels a responsibility towards its other allies. The two Communist Parties along with the other Left Parties have been competing with each other to encourage economism among the working class. As a result, the organised working class fights only for increases in wages, irrespective of the consequences of these demands for other sections as well as for the national economy. In the process, its own monetary gains are also liquidated. In fact, during a critical economic crisis, when the working class presses wage claims that are hard to concede they give the impression of holding the country to ransom. Thus, unconsciously, the working class facilitates the work of authoritarian forces. Since the Communist movement is linked with the working class, it must be educated to temper its economic demands and ensure that it is in no case alienated from other toiling sections of society.

In the final analysis the success of the Communist movement will depend on its intellectual, political and organisational capacity to respond and adapt to the changing socio-economic realities of India. The most crucial aspect of this change is the abolition of the zamindari system, which has made 20 million tenant-cultivators owners of land. But still about 25 per cent of land under the plough is cultivated by tenants and sharecroppers. Communists should naturally be in the forefront of a drive to make these tenants and sharecroppers owners of the land. But when a tenant becomes a landowner, he very soon develops the capitalist's psychology. As a result he begins to get alienated from the Communist movement. This is the experience of both China and Vietnam. Even in India, in those pockets where Communists fought for tenants in their struggle, they began to lose the support of the tenants. There is a strong impression that in the Malabar area of Kerala, tenants who for long stood solidly behind the CPI(M) have now become cold towards the Party after becoming owners, even though their struggles were led and fought by the Communists. In India, unlike in Europe and Japan at the comparable stage of economic development, the weight of the peasantry among the total population is not declining. In Europe and Japan, poor and marginal farmers either sold their land or were forcibly deprived of it and they migrated to cities to become industrial workers. In India this process is not operating. There are a number of reasons for this. First, the pace of industrialisation is slow and as such, better alternative opportunities are not available to poor farmers. Second, because of the land-ceiling there are not many takers for agricultural land. Third, because of the price-support mechanism, the thrust of market forces against poor farmers is being blunted. Fourth, there are not many instances of poor farmers alienating land in favour of money-lenders.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Notwithstanding these factors, poor and marginal farmers are increasingly falling below the poverty line because of demographic pressures leading to the fragmentation of land as well as their failure to gain access to inputs, institutional credits and new technology. Obviously, the Communists cannot wait endlessly for the composition of the population to change in favour of the industrial working class. But if they have to win over this mass of poor peasantry, they must present before them a perspective for reorganising agriculture on the lines of service co-operatives growing into cooperative farming without losing the title to land. Simultaneously, they have to make concerted efforts to win over the rural proletariat. Right from the days of Gandhiji, when he fought for social equality among them, landless agricultural workers have, by and large, been with the Congress. But the most difficult Indian riddle which the Communists have to solve is the intertwining of castes and classes, of deciding how far to carry their fight against casteism and how to make use of the castes as a short-cut. This is no doubt contradictory.

Yet a fine balance can be struck. The Communists' failure to grasp Indian peculiarities was evident at the birth of their movement. When the Communist Party was founded, there was an intense debate over whether it should be called the Communist Party of India or the Indian Communist Party. There was a feeling among Indian Communists that if the Party was called the Indian Communist Party, it would mean that there was an Indian variety of Communism. (Ironically, in Hindi they agreed to call themselves the Bhartiya Communist Party). But unless Indian Communists discover an Indian road to socialism and adapt socialism to India's peculiar conditions they will fail, notwithstanding their success in one or two States. Like Euro-communists, Indian Communists must develop the perspective of Indo-communism essentially as a response to the peculiar situation developing here. In Europe with the growth of technology and automation, out of every five new persons who join the work-force, three are whitecollared and two are bluecollared. As a result, the demographic composition of Europe is changing in favour of whitecollar employees whose cultural value-system is different from that of bluecollar workers. Hence Euro-communism has renounced the concept of dictatorship of the proletariat. As against this the CPI(M) here is clinging to the corpse of Stalinism and refusing to do any rethinking.

However, what is most heartening is that Communists are coming together again and extraneous factors, such as the Moscow-versus-Peking issue (both the Communist Parties are pro-Moscow) no longer exist to divide them. The bitter experience of stagnation in the Communist movement following its split, has strengthened the sentiments of unity in the two Communist Parties. The two Parties together will have confidence in themselves and even when they join an alliance, they will be able to retain their identity and gain from this alliance. The Communists will continue to have relevance and even bright prospects in India since there is no other Party on the political horizon which can solve the problem of Indian poverty and undertake urgent socio-economic reforms. What assurance is there that instead of solving these problems some forces may not impose an authoritarian regime and the Indian people may, in the bargain, have neither bread nor liberty? Thus, the Communists do not have all the time in the world.

The CPI: Left alienated

Who are the Party's "Left and democratic" friends and "revisionist" foes?

By RANAJIT ROY

THE Congress(I) slogan for the Lok Sabha election in January will be "Indira bulao, desh bachao". The CPI's central organ, the New Age, of September 9, commented: "The return of Indira Gandhi to power means the restoration of the scum that is the caucus with Sanjay, Bansi Lal, Dhawan, Yashpal Kapoor, et al, to the positions of authoritarian power, undoubtedly a forbidding prospect for the nation. Sanjay, let it be said, is more powerful in the Indira high command today than at any time in the past. The Sanjay phenomenon, it must be added, is not just an offspring of an indulgent mother's affection; it is born in the wedlock of authoritarianism and dynastic ambition."

The editorial, which is the handiwork of Mr Bhupesh Gupta, is the CPI's strongest attack on Mrs Gandhi so far. It reflects the current stand of the Party's dominant leadership represented by Mr Rajeshwara Rao, the General Secretary, and Mr Gupta. These two leaders have travelled far indeed from Bhatinda where the Party had its Eleventh Congress in April 1978, a year after Mrs Gandhi had been ousted from power and her Emergency regime had come to an end. At Bhatinda the Party described the victory of the Janata in these words: "Reaction has been able to capture power... This is a serious reversal, though temporary, for the democratic forces in the subcontinent. This suits well the global designs of the imperialists." Mr Biswanath Mukherjee and several others fruitlessly tried to have this formulation of the election results changed. Mr Mukherjee said that the Party, in this formulation in reality described the Janata Government as "more reactionary, as it the previous Indira Government was progressive. Or, in other words, if a choice is forced upon us, the (Indira) Congress is preferable to the Janata. This is essentially the same old line."

Clearly, the CPI was keeping its options open about Mrs Gandhi's Party. In this matter the view of Mr S. A. Dange, the Party's Chairman, prevailed. The task the CPI set before itself then was to "direct the sharpest blows against the RSS-Jana Sangh-BLD combine", not against Mrs Gandhi, and break the Janata Government.

It so happened that the BLD itself became the main force who could break the Janata. The CPI, the CPI-(M) and some other Leftists added grist to the BLD mill. So did Mrs Gandhi who, without showing the least repentance for what she and her son had done during internal Emergency, had managed to occupy the centre of the political stage once again. The new Government formed by the BLD under the name Lok Dal and the Congress is only a caretaker one. The Lok Sabha election being in the offing, the question of a Left and democratic alliance which both the CPI and the CPI(M) have since long been propagating has assumed immediate importance.

Mr Gupta's editorial notwithstanding, the CPI and the Congress-(I) had struck a deal to avoid mutual contests in Kerala's panchayat and municipal elections and a day after the editorial appeared Mrs Gandhi met Mr Dange in Bombay. Mr Dange had returned home after a long sojourn to the Soviet Union for medical treatment. In recent days the Congress(I) had made overtures to the CPI for alliance in the Lok Sabha election but these had been spurned by the Party's dominant leadership. Mrs Gandhi, being uncertain of what the coming election has in store, was is looking for allies. Mr Dange would be of help in making the CPI change its stand, she must have imagined.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Mr Dange's admiration for Mrs Gandhi and her Party remains as profound as it was before the 1977 Lok Sabha election. As late as April 1978, a year after her defeat, he wrote what amounted to a panegyric on her "complex personality" and urged the Party to realise that "the fall of Indira Gandhi in reality puts an end to a whole period of taking some very basically progressive steps in the political and economic history of the country". This, despite the fact that Mrs Gandhi had in 1976 called the CPI an anti-national Party.

After the Chikmagalur byelection last November Mr Dange publicly gloated over Mrs Gandhi's victory and made abrasive comments on the CPI(M)'s support to the Janata candidate. This was too much for the Party's central executive which publicly censured him Such grave violation of Party dispicline, as Mr Dange was held guilty of, usually invites expulsion from Communist Parties. He had gone against the Party's policy decided at Bhatinda which spoke of "the supreme importance of exploring all possible areas of agreement between the CPI and the CPI(M)". Even the censure was resented by Mr Dange's followers who constitute a very substantial section of the Party. Stronger action might have caused a split.

More, a disease of the Party noted by its Seventh Congress in Bombay in December 1974, remains uncured. The "organisational report" adopted there said: "In the all-India centre. as well as State centres, the leaders who have committed big blunders continue to be eternal leaders. Only in exceptional cases they are removed from key positions but kept in the leading committees. In the past, if one made self-criticism and purified himself, like a sinner bathing in the Ganga to wash off his sins, it was sufficient to get a new licence to commit more blunders. Nowadays even that type of formal self-criticism is not needed because we have thrown this weapon of criticism and self-criticism into the dustbin."

Mr Dange has no love for Mr Rajeshwara Rao's and Mr Gupta's stand to treat Mrs Gandhi as an enemy of the CPI. It is reported that Mr Vasudevan Nair, the then Chief Minister of Kerala, recently called on Mr Dange on his way back from Delhi to Trivandrum. The CPI(M) had demanded that the Kerala Assembly be dissolved and a fresh election called as preconditions for forging a new united front. Mr Nair was reluctant to do so. He wanted the CPI(M) to join the existing Front. Mr Dange's approval of Mr Nair's stand may be taken for granted. But the CPI's presently dominant leadership is prepared to strike an agreement with the CPI(M) on the latter's terms. It is possible that the Kerala leadership will ultimately be persuaded to do so. Otherwise, the CPI's effort to be back among the Left Parties after its prolonged subservience to Mrs Gandhi may not bear fruit. Mr Rao has sought to belittle the political significance of the Congress(I). He says that there has been no understanding between the two Parties as such but that in some areas agreements have been reached between candidates of the two Parties at a personal level. It is open to question whether agreements covering most parts of the State would have been arrived at if the Party itself did not like it.

In 1964 the group that got the name CPI was admittedly bigger than the one that assumed the name CPI(M). Today, the CPI admits that the CPI(M) is the largest Left Party. Indeed, in July, when the Janata was breaking up, Mr Rao made a formal appeal to the CPI(M) to take the lead in building Left and democratic unity, an appeal that must have galled Mr Dange. The two Parties together formed Governments in West Bengal and Kerala in 1967. They were together again when they fought Mrs Gandhi's Congress early in 1969 in the midterm election in West Bengal and won a resounding victory. From around July 1969, serious trouble began in the United Front Governments. It so happened that in June that year Moscow had lined up 75 Communist Parties, including the CPI, at a world Communist conference. The CPI's representatives returned with the lesson that they must "carry further forward the ideological, political and organisational offensive against revisionists of both 'left' and 'right' varieties".

This offensive brought down the Kerala .Government headed by Mr E. M. S. Namboodiripad of the CPI-(M) in October 1969. The CPI struck a deal with Mrs Gandhi, and Mr Achutha Menon of the CPI became Chief Minister with her Party's support from outside. In the midterm election there, in 1970, the CPI and some other Parties entered into a formal alliance with Mrs Gandhi's Party and defeated the CPI(M), which was indeed the Front's sole enemy. The same Front contested and routed the CPI(M) in the Lok Sabha and Assembly elections that were held simultaneously there in March 1977.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Mr Karunakaran of Mrs Gandhi's Party became Chief Minister but within a few months he had to quit because of disclosures about the murder of the student in police custody during Emergency when he was the United Front's Home Minister. Mr A. K. Antony took over from him. The Congress was split by Mrs Gandhi for a second time in January 1978. Mr Antony joined the Swaran Singh Congress. He resigned in protest against his Party's decision to support Mrs Gandhi in Chikmagalur, and Mr Vasudevan Nair became Chief Minister. When Mrs Gandhi split the Congress, half of the 38 Congress MLAs in the State joined her Party and left the Front. The Front, however, continued to function as a Government.

In West Bengal, Mr Ajoy Mukherjee, of the Bangla Congress, fully backed by the CPI, resigned in March 1970 and handed the State over to Central, that is Mrs Gandhi's rule. In 1971 there was an Assembly election along with the Lok Sabha elections. Mrs Gandhi's Party and the CPI came to an electoral agreement against the CPI(M). Even so, the CPI(M) emerged as the single largest Party and, with its Front partners, took 125 seats in an Assembly of 280. The CPI backed the Congress which formed a Government. This Government fell within a few months. The Governor did not give a chance to the CPI(M) to form a Government. The Centre put the State once again under its rule. In 1972, when the State was called upon to elect its Assembly for the third time in three years, the CPI was in open alliance with Mrs Gandhi's Congress. The country had not yet witnessed an election like this one. There was mass rigging and the CPI(M) and its allies were reduced to small groups in the Assembly. Mr Siddhartha Ray became Chief Minister and functioned as Mrs Gandhi's Gauleiter in the State. The two Parties worked in close cooperation in the 1977 Lok Sabha election also.

THE period from March 1970 to March 1977 was tragic for West Bengal. The administration, the police, the CRP, the BSF, armed intelligence agents and hired gangsters called "resistance forces" were deployed on a large scale to crush the CPI(M) and the Naxalites. Thousands of political workers were murdered by the guardians of law and order in a planned manner. Barbarities were perpetrated in jails and police lock-ups, too, where some 75 Naxalites were killed and about 700 maimed. With the CRP and the BSF protecting them, Congress stormtroopers moved from area to area to drive away Mrs Gandhi's opponents. This was the period when, under Mrs Gandhi's patronage, monopolists and other propertied people had full freedom to loot the country. The history of West Bengal of this period is written in the blood of young people drawn by Mrs Gandhi's forces, official and non official, open and clandestine. Undiluted fascism was in operation. No other State experienced anything of the kind not even during the internal Emergency.

Promode Dasgupta

The CPI imagined that its main foe, the CPI(M), was being effectively crushed and that this would enable it to fill the political gap that was being created. It used Communist jargon to provide justification for Mrs Gandhi's terroristic regime which was said to be fighting revisionists of both the Left and Right varieties. How valuable this support was from a Party which calls itself Communist to Mrs Gandhi's fascism! The same support was extended to her from distant Moscow, too.

In the early Sixties Mr Bhupesh Gupta had warned the undivided CPI of "an exaggerated or alarmist appraisal" of the growth of communal and Right reactionary forces because, he said, it "may lead to tailism behind the Congress and bourgeois leaders". This is precisely what the CPI reduced itself to between 1969 and 1977, and Mr Gupta himself bore no small responsibility for it.

The 1977 Lok Sabha election gave the CPI a severe jolt. Many, but not everybody, in the leadership and ranks realised that the Party had committed a grave crime against the toiling people and against Left and democratic unity which it had never ceased to mouth. At its Seventh Congress in Patna in 1968, it declared its aim to forge "a common democratic platform as an alternative to Congress policies". Within a year and a half it tied itself firmly to Mrs Gandhi's Congress and remained there for eight crucial years. At Bhatinda it recorded that "our Party's independent image was blurred and it became identified with the then ruling Congress Party". It confessed that it should not have supported internal Emergency. But, it maintained that the Party's record upto 1974 was "glorious" and that the mistakes it committed "do not invalidate the basic analysis and the main conclusions of the Party programme". Was the CPI's alliance with Mrs Gandhi a mistake? No. "The example of Kerala", it said at Bhatinda, "would call for special mention because our line of Left and democratic unity, which had been assailed by the CPI(M), stood once again vindicated by the splendid results of both the Lok Sabha and Assembly elections that took place there simultaneously (in 1977)".

This leaves the road open for the Party to an alliance with Mrs Gandhi in the future. The CPI has now taken what appears to be no more than a tactical move to be back among the Leftist Parties whose company it had given up. The documents adopted at Bhatinda were the result of a compromise between conflicting views. The Party was united only so far as bringing down the Janata Government was concerned. That objective had been achieved. In this matter the CPI can rightly claim that the CPI(M) had been forced by circumstances to become hostile to the Janata Party which it used to describe as a "friendly Party." Even when the no-confidence motion was being debated, the CPI(M) was undecided on the stand it should take.

While every group in the CPI professes to stand by the slogan of Left and democratic unity, there are sharp differences on who should be regarded as Left or democratic. These differences exist in the top leadership also. One section is represented by Mr Rajeshwara Rao and Mr Bhupesh Gupta and the other section by Mr Dange. At this moment, Mr Rao and Mr Gupta both seem to be the winners. They would have no truck with Mrs Gandhi. But Mr Dange is not a small force in the Party. The internal fight continues. What shape it will take in the future is anybody's guess.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The CPI(M)'s realpolitik

Maybe the Party should tackle its own problems first, but the polls are important

By TARUN GANGULY

THE CPI(M) is at crossroads. The traumatic experience, following the fall of the Morarji Government, has suddenly raised the Party to the national pedestal from its regional groove. The change has resulted in stresses and strains within the Party. But in the process the CPI(M) has come out of its ideological straitjacket. The question is, can the Party adjust to the new situation?

In the election strategy spelt out by the Central Committee, the CPI(M) has promised full support for the Lok Dal–Congress combine, knowing full well the "class limitations" of the coalition partners. It has also shown an eagerness to win over the anti-authoritarian and secular forces still remaining within the Congress (I) and the Janata Party. Though the Party is still sore about CPI's role in the past decade, it the is willing to accommodate that Party within the framework of Left unity if certain conditions are fulfilled. All this indicates that the Party is ready to show enough flexibility to adjust to the changed political situation at the Centre.

This softening of its attitude towards the landlord-bourgeoisie combination of the Lok Dal–Congress and the reformist line of the CPI has already given rise to murmurs of protest within the Party. The West Bengal unit of the Party, though it has fallen in line with the national leadership, still has reservations about the Lok Dal, Congress and CPI, and this will certainly be reflected in its adjustment of seats with these Parties in the Lok Sabha elections from that State. Similarly, the Kerala unit is still sore about the CPI, which contested panchayat polls there with the support of the Congress(I). The Tripura Party is still unwilling to accommodate any CFD candidate in the allocation of seats there. I mention only these three units because the Party is well-placed in these three States.

No doubt, the CPI(M) has come a long way to make compromises with a section of the ruling class, that is the Lok Dal–Congress combine, to defeat the two major evils of authoritarianism and communalism as represented by the Congress (I) and the RSS-Jana Sangh-dominated Janata Party.

In the background of these dilemmas, the Party has a membership of 157,000. Its trade union wing CITU is 1.5 million-strong, the All-India Kisan Sabha (its peasant wing) has 2.3 million members and its student wing SFI has 400,000 members. These figures are quoted from the Salkia (Howrah) Plenum document of December, 1978. The figures show that the strength of the Party is not formidable in a country of a population of more than 650 million.

In the last Plenum, the Party found that its main problems were those of growth — "of how to draw out and enrol thousands of people who follow us and our mass organisations in daily battles". It found that there was a tendency in the Party "towards federalism" which is really the antithesis of democratic centralism, the cardinal principle of Party organisation. In the Salkia Plenum, it was admitted that the Party's growth was "severely handicapped by the Party centre's failure to fight against all alien ideologies". It found to its chagrin that there was "an abandonment of criticism and self-criticism inside the Party, depriving it of one of the important weapons of constantly rectifying itself and improving its understanding and practice". The Salkia document maintained that in a "large number of State committees there is lack of collective functioning, division of work leading to individualistic functioning. Instead of the committee, the secretary functions, leading to concentration of power, inefficiency and bureaucratism". The same document goes on to say, "rank and file members do not feel that they have a role in shaping and reshaping the Party's line and policy, they do not feel that their initiative, understanding and experience are being given proper weight." The document laments that the class composition of the Party has not changed." "Our mass leaders are not conscious of their responsibility and our Party as a whole has failed to develop the elementary class consciousness of the proletariat into socialist consciousness and attract large numbers to the Party organisation."

I have quoted copiously from the CPI(M) document to show that there is an awareness inside the Party of its shortcomings. The self-criticism made in the document is unique. But the question is, has the Party improved itself in the past ten months since the publication of the document? The answer is an emphatic "no". More so because the Party has taken up a new course without properly rectifying its past mistakes. The leadership of the Party, which came in for sharp criticism in the document, remains the same. In addition there is now the tension that has grown over the realignment that the Party has agreed to. The CPI(M) knows that the organisation is weak "except in a few pockets of the country". As late as last December, the Party observed that the sad state of the organisation was mainly because of the failure of "the central leadership of the Party, the Politburo and the Central Committee though part of it should be shared by the State committees and their secretaries as well." These candid confessions indicate that the Party is willing to rectify its position. It wants to involve the rank and file more in the decision-making process and wants them to be creative organisers rather than robots who only follow dictates.

LET US examine the position of the Party in the States. West Bengal is the main base of the Party, where it has about 40,000 members and the largest number of followers among trade unions, students and peasants. But all is not well there. In its largest unit in the State — that in 24 Parganas — nearly one-fourth of its members is sharply divided. The district committee leaders there have sharp differences with the State committee. Similar differences exist, though to a lesser extent, in other districts. All this was evident from the speeches made at the last Plenum. All this, the Party believes, can be solved if inner-Party democracy is restored.

There is a feeling in the Party that its membership is lagging behind the actual following it commands. Moreover, only five districts account for 50 per cent of the membership, while the workers for only 20 per cent.

In Kerala, though the CPI(M) is the single largest Party, it is not in a majority, according to a Party document. The document admits that political campaigning has not made any significant change in the correlation of political forces in the State. One indication of the Party's weakness there is that its mouthpiece People's Democracy sells more in Karnataka, where the Party is much smaller than in Kerala. In Tripura the Party has had a spectacular growth in the past two years. But the Party there has not been able to solve the Bengali-tribal conflict. In Tamil Nadu, it has failed to cope with Dravidian nationalism and in Andhra, it is still to overcome the "right revisionism" of the CPI and

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

modella

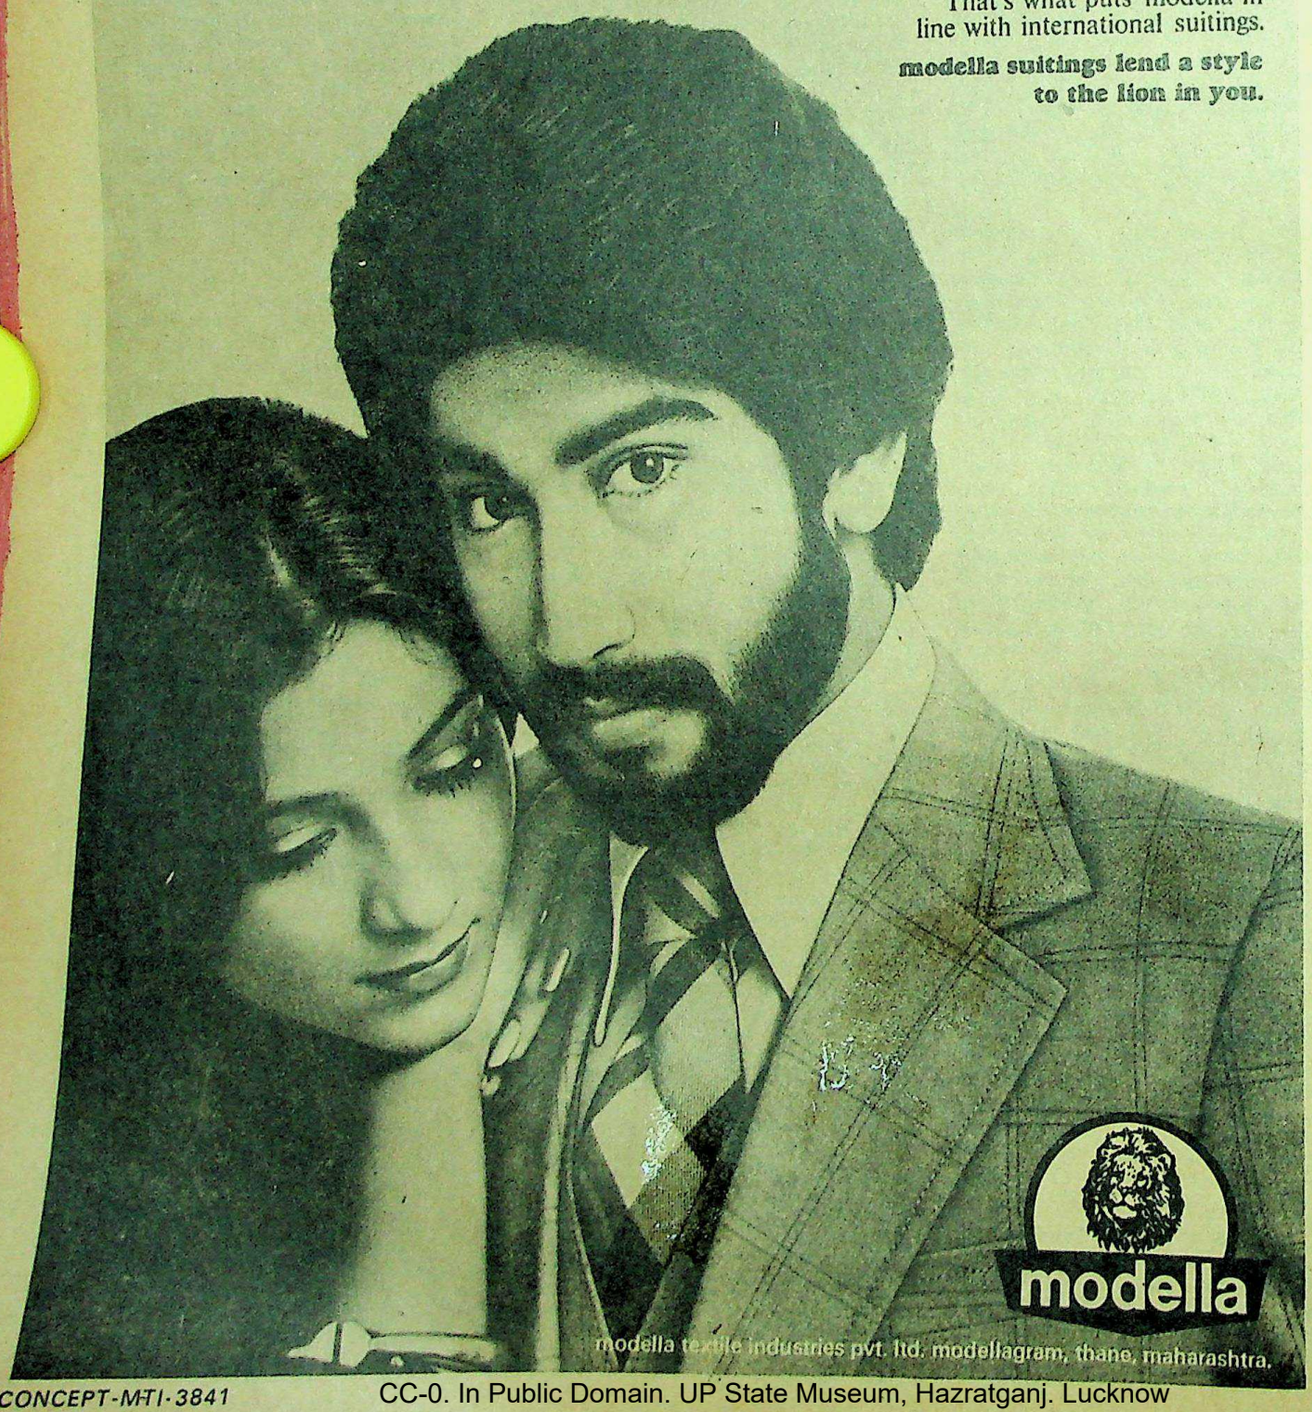
CREATES A PERFECT BLEND of elegance and comfort

When it comes to your suitings, it's the blend of worsted wool and 'Terene' that really matters.

In a man's world of fashions, where trends are fast changing from conventional to casual, modella keeps pace, with a selection of shades, designs and softer finishes.

That's what puts modella in line with international suitings.

modella suitings lend a style to the lion in you.



modella textile industries pvt. ltd. modellagram, thane, maharashtra.

CONCEPT-MTI-3841

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

the "Left adventurism" of the Naxalites. In Punjab, the CPI(M), but for its association with the Akalis, has failed to win over the landless labourers. For instance, the Party depends more on individual contributions for its funds. It is a victim of the landlord-bourgeoisie combine there. In the Hindi belt, the Party is almost non-existent. That is why the Party depends more on the united movement of Left and democratic forces to consolidate its position in the States of UP, Punjab, Bihar, Haryana and in Delhi. The Party frankly admits that in Bihar the CPI is a stronger force. The Bihar unit of the Party suffered from a "sectarian attitude to the movement of growing resistance to Indira Gandhi's authoritarianism".

The CPI(M) is fully aware of its weaknesses and its strength. It knows that despite an electoral adjustment with Janata (S) and Congress, it can only make marginal inroads into the Hindi belt. In the western States, Gujarat and Maharashtra, the Party is small; in Maharashtra the Party is yet to withdraw its support from the Sharad Pawar Government, which has Jana Sangh Ministers. In Rajasthan, though the Party has made some inroads into trade union movement, in electoral terms, this amounts to nothing much. The CPI(M), by extending its support to the Charan Singh camp, has taken a calculated risk. It knows that it is not strong enough to fight authoritarianism and communalism singlehanded. But it now has the stature to lead the Left Parties in a campaign to gain concessions for the masses from a section of the ruling class. In the process, the Party has lost its pristine purity, but in the bargain, it is now in realpolitik.

It is for political pundits to argue whether the CPI(M) committed a breach of trust by withdrawing its support from Morarji Desai or not. But in practical terms, the CPI(M) now can expect to gain handsomely in the elections. The Party, accordingly, has decided to field candidates who can win and in the bargain, increase its strength. The only imponderable is how the new alignment will affect the morale of the Party in States like West Bengal and Kerala, where the Party has a long tradition of anti-capitalism. Will not the cadres find it a quirk of fate to have to sell the same hated landlord-bourgeois Party candidates along with their own, to the electorate? In the next few months, the picture will be clear, but by then for the first time in Indian politics, the CPI(M) will be a major factor in electoral politics.

The Marxists' second gamble

Their first ploy failed. Will this succeed ?

By BARUN SENGUPTA

THE left and the so-called progressive forces of the country have gambled again. They had gambled quite the same way in 1969 and were completely befooled. The 1969 gamble could have sealed their fate for a long time but for a miscalculation by Mrs Indira Gandhi in 1977.

In 1969, during the great battle all the Left and so-called progressive forces of the country, except the socialists, were with Mrs Gandhi. All of them declared that the Syndicate was the biggest danger. All of them worked for the victory of Mrs. Gandhi's candidate for the Presidential post. And all of them rejoiced when he won. But for the votes of CPI(M), CPI, Forward Bloc, RSP Mrs Gandhi's political career would have received a severe jolt in that year of (dis) grace 1969.

Of course, the Leftists did not support her out of affection or love. They all expected rich dividends. They all calculated, Mrs Gandhi would have no other alternative but to depend on them for her Government's survival in Parliament. They all hoped that never in the future would the bourgeois leadership be able to rule the country alone—they will have to share power with the leftists and give major concessions to the Left movement. They were all sure that by supporting Mrs Gandhi they were furthering the cause of the Left movement in India.

How she treated the Leftists after the victory is well known. Further narration would seem unnecessary. Except for the CPI, who remained with her till she lost the 1977 election, all the Leftist Parties were completely cornered. The working class movement was brutally suppressed. And ultimately came the internal Emergency which took away the Fundamental Rights as well. The CPI, of course, remained with her in spite of all this. But alas, she made a miscalculation. She went in for a snap poll—and lost power. The Leftists, along with all the other forces of the country again got a chance to come out in the open. After that, everything went against her. The CPI and the so-called progressive forces deserted her. Even tyrants of the States started saying that she and her son were solely responsible for all the excesses of the Emergency. Most of the senior Congress leaders went over to the rival faction. Even when she won a by-election, Parliament expelled her. Devaraj Urs also turned sour and finally broke with her. The continuous series of commissions and cases was giving her hell. In the end came the Special Courts. She could see it all clearly—so long as the Janata Party and the Government remained in the saddle there was no

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

BATA AND MAFATLAL APPAREL BRING YOU

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

AN EXCITING RANGE OF SHIRTS

DESIGNER'S COLLECTION

ta and Mafatlal Apparel, two great names in the world of fashion, quiet sophistication d elegance, join hands to bring you a whole new range of exciting, exclusive shirts.

Made of the best fabrics, the Designer's ollection shirts have special features which make them unique.

These Designer's Collection shirts are onl vailable at selected Bata Stores wh you a warm welcome to come and try the products of the new venture.

Bata Bata Bata Bata

ilable at Bata Shoe Store, Grand Hotel Arcade, Lindsay Street and Hindusthan Park, Calcutta; ba, Bombay; Commercial Street, Bangalore; Mount Road, Madras; Chandigarh Sector 17; Abid Road, way out.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

to wrigg
Party mu
Janata
Nothing
midterm chance to big sectio
her. An with the and lead rity in th ring 40 p

So, she power on Janata P
poll by a cial Cour and she ner—just her one-p Sanjeeva dicate be their pos
President

And, a the Left gressives could n
Reddy w tists; she Janata P
the Mora help of Bloc, R
George F
(M) not no-confid not dese stage the not have Governm stalled a have loo tists, go ment to about a thought Morarji able to progressi calculate Charan S
ment and depend o forced to
to them.
it would lure awa
Party an Singh fo were sur
Charan
lean on more. T
ted in
"Don't s no other now".

Alas, h their cal went aw to do wh clamourin
a midterm

Last ti Syndicate of the Ja
the Lefti
sives wou
the great moment.
might be

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

way out. She knew that if she had to wriggle out of it, the Janata Party must be smashed and the Janata Government pulled down. Nothing would suit her better than a midterm poll. That would give her a chance to go to the electorate. A big section of the people still adored her. Another section was fed up with the Janata Party, Governments and leaders. She might get a majority in the Lok Sabha even by securing 40 per cent of the votes cast.

So, she concentrated all her firepower on one object—to split the Janata Party and force a midterm poll by any means before the Special Courts concluded their sessions and she was pushed to a tighter corner—just what she did in 1969. Then her one-point programme to defeat Sanjeeva Reddy and outwit the Syndicate before they would consolidate their position by having their own President.

And, as in 1969 so also in 1979—the Leftists and the so-called progressives willy-nilly helped her. She could not have defeated Sanjeeva Reddy without the help of the Leftists; she could not also have the Janata Party riven and brought down the Morarji Government without the help of the CPI (M), CPI, Forward Bloc, RSP, PWP, Madhu Limaye, George Fernandes, etc. Had the CPI (M) not decided to support Charan's no-confidence motion and had George not deserted Morarji at that early stage the Janata Government would not have fallen, the Charan Singh Government would not have been installed and a midterm poll would not have loomed large. But, did the Leftists go against the Morarji Government to help Mrs Gandhi and bring about a midterm poll? No. They thought that by bringing down the Morarji Government they would be able to strengthen the Left and progressive forces of India. They calculated that after Morarji's fall, Charan Singh would form a Government and he would largely have to depend on them. Thus he could be forced to give a lot of concessions to them. Their expectation was that it would not be difficult at all to lure away MPs from the Janata Party and Congress (I) once Charan Singh formed a Government. They were sure that after a week or so, Charan Singh would not have to lean on Mrs Gandhi's crutches any more. Till the last day, they persisted in exhorting Charan Singh: "Don't surrender to her. She has no other way but to support you now".

Alas, how wrong they were! All their calculations and expectations went awry and ultimately they had to do what Mrs Gandhi had been clamouring for the last two years—a midterm poll.

Last time, it was the cry of the Syndicate. This time it was the cry of the Jana Sangh-RSS. I am afraid, the Leftists and so-called progressives would soon realise what spells the greater danger for them at the moment. But, this time their gamble might be far too expensive. ■

Maharashtra's Marxists

The smaller groups lead the way

By OLGA TELLIS

THERE are two very distinct Left groups in Maharashtra. One is that of the traditional Left Parties like the two Communist Parties and the other is represented by Leftist groups. There are over 30 Leftist groups functioning in various parts of Maharashtra, most of them working in rural areas, who believe in the Marxist ideology and work at the grassroots level. In the context of the dynamic situation prevailing in the country today, the Leftist groups are gaining prominence over the traditional Left Parties that have become conservative and almost status quoists. In this context the small Leftist groups are acting as a catalyst for change and people's struggles.

A classic instance is of the five groups—Bhoomi Sena, Plot Dharak Sanghatana, Kashtakari Sanghatana, Kranthi Sena and Gram Swaraya Samithi. The first operates in Manor in Plaghar taluka, the second in Wada, the third in Shisne in Dhanau taluka, the fourth in Veuji in Talasari taluka and the fifth in Jawahar taluka. All these talukas are in the Thane district which has a large tribal population. The district has an area of 3.6 million hectares under forest cultivation. Poor tribals and other landless peasants driven by poverty and lack of an alternative source of income have occupied forest lands and brought it under cultivation in their effort to eke out a meagre existence. Even so, the land occupied by the landless peasant tribals is in the majority of cases, not effectively forest land, but land in the deforested zones where no thick forests exist. Thousands of such landholders who have been in possession of forest land are being cheated by the Government which went back on its promise to regularise all encroachments on forests before March 31, 1978. The divisional forest officer's office in Dhanau under whose jurisdiction tribal areas fall, refuses to release any list of persons whose encroachments have been regularised and so the future of thousands of poor peasant tribals is uncertain. The five groups wanted the Government to regularise all lands that were encroached upon at least one year before March 31, 1978.

The traditional Left Parties like the CPI and CPI(M) were content with having all land occupied till 1974 regularised. The Government too was agreeable but ever since the Left groups took the initiative, the traditional Left Parties have had to fall in line and join the struggle for land for the adivasis and tribals.

Speaking about his group, the Kashtakari Sanghatana, Nicki Cardoza says: "We started after we were disillusioned with religion and politics. We stand and struggle with the poor. Most of our members who were once in the Janata, Congress and CPI(M) realised that in all cases the Party came before people and the people were sacrificed to Party norms. During the Emergency, for instance, innumerable atrocities were perpetrated by the police, departmental people and vested interests on the adivasis and landless and the latter could not complain because any voice of protest was dubbed as defiance of authority and crushed. We were priests and we were disillusioned by the way the religious heads claimed to work for the poor but their activities helped only vested interests. For instance when we organised a strike at the Dapchari Milk Project, people went to the church to protest and the church, instead of taking up our cause, were afraid to confront vested interests and kept quiet at injustices thereby. The three principles on which we work today are swatantra, swalambi and swabimani which means freedom from exploitation, selfreliance and self-respect. Our basic functional principles are (1) janashikshan—education of the masses, which most political Parties miss (2) jana jagruti—the awakening of the masses by making them conscious of their needs, (3) jana karya—the action of the masses and (4) jana shakti—the power of the people. We have about 25 activists among whom are Rambhau Gharat, Gopal Bodle and Mrs Gulab Shanda and all adivasis, and our members and sympathisers number about 25,000."

Among the traditional Left Parties, the CPI's strongholds are in the textile, hotel, engineering and pharmaceutical sectors, spread over Bombay, Ahmednagar, Sholapur, Kandesh and parts of Kolaba and Bhir districts. In Bombay they have been working in the textile unions for 51 years and there has not been a single textile strike that has not been led by the CPI. As Mr Sardesai says, "We are not a majority force but we are the single biggest force of the working class movement in the State."

NEXT WEEK
Interviews with prominent Leftist leaders

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

SPECIAL REPORT

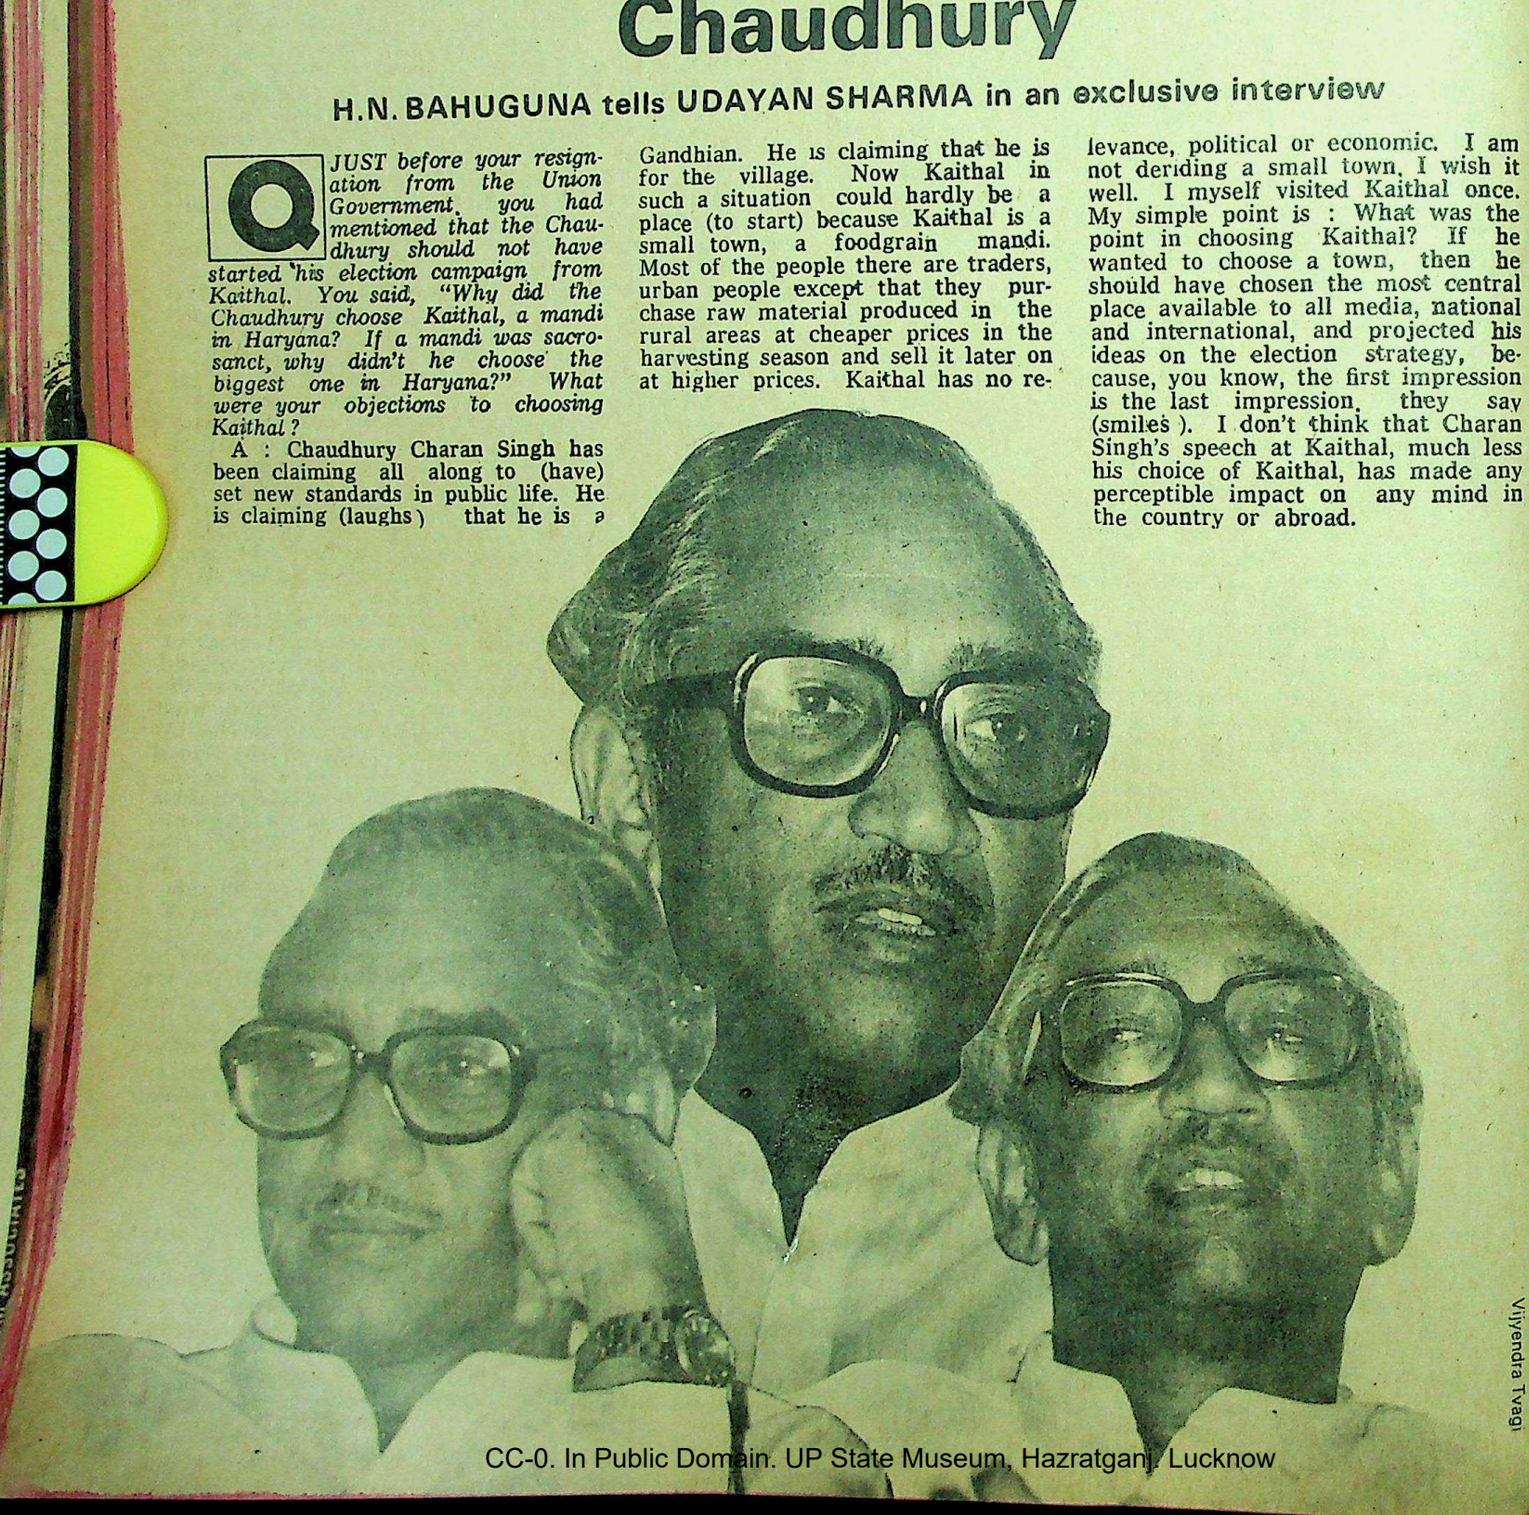
The Bahuguna story

Remaining in power is more important to the Chaudhury

H.N. BAHUGUNA tells UDAYAN SHARMA in an exclusive interview

Q JUST before your resignation from the Union Government, you had mentioned that the Chaudhury should not have started his election campaign from Kaithal. You said, "Why did the Chaudhury choose Kaithal, a mandi in Haryana? If a mandi was sacrosanct, why didn't he choose the biggest one in Haryana?" What were your objections to choosing Kaithal?

A : Chaudhury Charan Singh has been claiming all along to (have) set new standards in public life. He is claiming (laughs) that he is a Gandhian. He is claiming that he is for the village. Now Kaithal in such a situation could hardly be a place (to start) because Kaithal is a small town, a foodgrain mandi. Most of the people there are traders, urban people except that they purchase raw material produced in the rural areas at cheaper prices in the harvesting season and sell it later on at higher prices. Kaithal has no relevance, political or economic. I am not deriding a small town. I wish it well. I myself visited Kaithal once. My simple point is : What was the point in choosing Kaithal? If he wanted to choose a town, then he should have chosen the most central place available to all media, national and international, and projected his ideas on the election strategy, because, you know, the first impression is the last impression, they say (smiles). I don't think that Charan Singh's speech at Kaithal, much less his choice of Kaithal, has made any perceptible impact on any mind in the country or abroad.



Vijyendra Tyagi

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

In this context, I'd like to illustrate (my point with) an example. When Gandhiji decided on the individual civil disobedience movement, he chose Vinobha Bhave as his first satyagrahi. He didn't choose the Congress president, Jawaharlal Nehru, Sardar Patel or even Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan. He chose Vinoba Bhave. And his argument was that in choosing Vinoba Bhave, Gandhi was choosing a person who was perfectly non violent, who had no political interest whatsoever except the good of mankind. Now this difference a choice of person or place can make. If the Chaudhury had any use for my advice and he'd asked me how he should start, I think he should have made a start in the election campaign from an altogether different angle. Now the Chaudhury could have chosen Haryana as a start, of course, he could have even chosen a simple village — he should have chosen a simple village — and collected the first batch of thousand people — young — with whom he could sit for a day and give them the whole concept of India's, future dreams. Each movement in this country has ended in disillusionment. Each election has made the people more or less disillusioned. What have you and I watched during the last few years? People getting disillusioned about the establishment, ringing for a change. finding no change possible, then reverting to where they had committed a mistake — that is all. Therefore he could have told the thousand young men to go around the villages and canvass on foot, (on a) Padaytra, as they say. They will carry the message of the new India of his (Charan Singh's) dreams. But the whole point is whether he has his dreams. His dream is limited. his horizons are limited, his views are limited to almost the climax of antiquated, anti-village type of economic relationship. Now, that could be a new style for a Prime Minister who calls himself a Gandhian.

A village to him has primacy. I think that's one point where he is not wrong. The village has to have a primacy not because, unlike in my belief—I do not believe that there is a conflict of interest between the village and city—but because the weakest child has to be spotted out. The weak link in the chain is the village, therefore, we choose it. That public meeting in the village would have had a new type of reverberation. Going to Kaithal is like going to a sabzi mandi. Going to a village would be different, and going to a village would regenerate in the hearts and minds of villagers a hope that an era has dawned. There are, first, (things) to be decided for a public meeting. It should have been properly organised. Second, the content of the speech should have been proper. What type of society does the Chaudhury want? What type of village does he want? What type of land relationship does he want? What tvpe of education does he want to have? What type of socio-economic structure does he want to have? What type of relationship between the producing class and the rest does he envisage? What type of economic order does he want to usher in? We have all talked of new education, but what is new education has yet to be defined.

The Chaudhury should have tackled science and technology. For example, even upgrading of cattle today without proper, artificial insemination is an impossibility. It will take at least a thousand years if you have to change your cows, buffalos and milch-yielding cattle, or beef cattle—I won't say beef, but meat cattle. Somebody would take objection to that. If you want to change that progeny, if you want to change their naturalised pedigree then you would have to depend on having semen samples, properly built, having artificial insemination, and therefore having cylinders carrying liquid nitrogen which will be able to keep the sperm alive in the semen, kept for being injected into various animals. Because taking one cow, a she-buffalo to a bull or a he buffalo does not produce all superior types. Similarly, artificial insemination does not. But in the case of artificial insemination six efforts may succeed out of ten. The dose of semen which issues once from a bull is enough to inseminate hundreds of she animals. Now, the Chaudhury should have talked of what he is going to do about animal husbandry, of how he is going to remove rural poverty. He should have been able to tell how he is going to upgrade. (the animals). It's not enough to say that artisans must be helped. He must have been able to say how he is going to help the fisherman, how he is going to help the kumhar, the village potter, who today does not find even earth to make his earthen pots. During the Zamindari (system) the kumhars were allotted land by the zamindars—that you can pick up your earth from here, subject to sanction of the village. After the abolition of zamindari, everything rests with the Gaon Sabha. Its head is interested in money or sometimes charges so exorbitantly that there is poor demand. Then he should have said that in our colleges for art and craft whether the selection will be made from among the sons and daughters of the rich people who are interested in art and craft or from among the sons and daughters of those who had kept to the traditional arts of India, as it is done by the kumhars, the potter man, the prajapati, as we call him. He should have been able to say what he is going to do—whether Union Carbide will continue to have the licences for processing prawns which it had got earlier or whether the fishermen who helped to get these prawns will by the process gain something.

He should have been able to say whether he will allow continuance of these banks to lose money and get bad debts. I will give you an example. I was studying a paper on Bengal. I found out that in Bengal all banks together distribute Rs 700 crores annually as credit to the industrial sectors. In terms of the policy and social objectives laid down by the Government, one per cent of this money must go for (loans on) differential interest rates. That means loans upto Rs 200-300, or a maximum of Rs 1,000. Now, who are the people who gain by this money—the pheriwallas, the small shopkeepers, the small fruitseller who today gets loans every morning from the money lenders at exorbitant rates. This three per cent differential interest rate was created for these poor people in the hope that they will get it. Now, in Bengal I have found out that the bad debts of banks is more than Rs 8 crores every year from the industrial sector. Rs 8 crores every year can be tolerated by the banks as bad debts from the industrial sector. but they are scared to distribute Rs 7 crores to the proorer sections of the people. I think Rs 7 crores can be absorbed by Calcutta's small peddlers. The vegetable, fruit and meat peddlers, provided the banking institutions have the will or the courage or the direction or, if I may say so, if we could generate in them the will, give them the vision, and the Government kept a very vigilant eye on these big people who have become the chairmen of the banks to see that they do their jobs, that have not been dutifully done. They will lose Rs 8 crores, but not distribute Rs 7 crores where recoveries are 98 per cent. If that Rs 7 crores would have been distributed, it would come back to the exchequer to the extent of 98 per cent and the bad debt would have been two per cent, which will be hardly anything. Two per cent of Rs 7 crores is not even Rs 20 lakhs. They are afraid of losing Rs 14 lakhs, they are not afraid of losing Rs 7 crores.

Has the Chaudhury been able to explain and spell out these ideas or any new ideas about the new society? He keeps on simply talking about the correct human style. Now, what was his intention? How did he try to meet this hostility of the Press? I would agree the Press is hostile at times. But, like the administration, the Press is also managed by human beings, and as it goes wrong, the administration can go wrong. The Press also may go amiss sometimes. You cannot, therefore, say that the whole Press is bad. He could have made a speech saying that what he said to the Press was to fan out more and more into the rural areas, study the people's ideas, project the Government's weaknesses, say where the policies have gone wrong, say where the promises to the weaker sections of the people have not been realised, made an in-depth study of the life—like in the USA—to root out corruption. to go deep into it, to get into the job. After all, the whole Nixon affair was found out by the study and reports made by some journalists. Now the Chaudhury claims to be the crusader of a faction. Will he invite the Press to join in that crusade? The Press will be a very, very good help to him in that crusade. Of course, the Press may get a bit wild. The Press may go off on a tangent but that doesn't mean that he shouldn't do his job. He could have said, I appeal to the Press to help me in my crusade for this. But he said that the BLD was being squeezed out of the power structure, 'my friends were being squeezed out of the power structure, I was being squeezed out of the power structure'. What does that mean? He places more importance on this notion than the nation's malady. His remaining in power is more important than the setting of the national scenario in the context of the international scenario. And to that extent I disagree totally with the Chaudhury's choice, of place, of words and of scene at Kaithal. It is uninspiring.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Q: You were a member of the caretaker Ministry for about two months. How could you say that the Government did not know the signs of its very existence?

A: Well, all I said was that the attribute of the Government is that it should be able to command. Now I leave it to your judgment of whether we made any perceptible change in the sliding disease which this Government had with regard to its capability to govern. It didn't take any step or do anything to make people feel that we are capable of governing this country. A number of steps could have been taken, a number of areas could have been identified. Did the Chaudhury take the decision? Was the decision available to the Cabinet? Did the administration ever change? Really speaking, from my personal experience—I am not letting out a secret —but I am telling you that I have been witness to, Secretaries telling me frankly—not in my department, but a number of Secretaries—that this Government was a quirk of the latest political situation in the country. They never looked upon it as an authentic will of the people of India to go in a direction. However, it was helpless. Nobody could have given it the legitimacy that it needed to assert itself. But at the same time the Chaudhury could have taken a number of steps if he acted effectively in the matter of curbing the inordinate delay, or, if I may say so, mismanagement which the Government is responsible for. If he had done something good with regard to the history text books immediately on his appointment as Prime Minister, the history books withdrawn by the Janata Government, which gave India a perspective of composite culture. If he had thought of appealing to scientists and technocrats and got them together to help us in this energy crisis. It he had moved into directions new, and even talked to the editors of newspapers, journalists, senior journalists— I wonder if he had a single Press conference since he joined as Prime Minister. I have my grave doubts. I would say there is no substitute for a Press conference, here you come face to face, meet the real media.

If he had given a lead to students for the future, or even to the villagers. Look, he could not even have a committee on drought. Any wise Prime Minister would call every political Party leader and say, friends, we are facing an unprecedented drought, what are your suggestions? With great difficulty, he called a Chief Ministers' conference and all that he did was to quarrel with the Chief Ministers and tell some of them that though you talk of revolution, you have done nothing in this heartland. I don't say that he should not have said what he said. My point is a Prime Minister at a conference does not quarrel. Prime Ministers create consensus, not conflict. Therefore, he didn't appear to govern at all. the semblance of Government which had withered away during the Janata rule could not be restored.

Q : After your resignation, you made a strange allegation against the PM, by raising the questions of Kampuchea and Israeli cows. I presume, when you joined the Chaudhury's Government, you already knew about the limitations and basic approach of the PM. You joined the Government without forcing any programme but started to bargain after some ime. Wasn't this unfair?

I will not give up my basic value system for the kingdom of heaven

A: Well, though those that have come to power to bargain see in everybody a bargainer, I would not like to remind the people I never bargained for any position with the Chaudhury when I helped him to upset the applecart of Hindu fanatics from the Central administration. My witnesses are the Chaudhury's own men. I am willing for a confrontation with anyone, but I would like to say clearly that be it Devi Lal, be it Karpoori Thakur, be it S. N. Mishra, be it Raj Narain, if any of them is willing to make a public statement on the nature of the bargain that I was making all along the line. I was helping them to overthrow communalism.

Of course, this is not a standard for the Chaudhury for public behaviour — he bargains before he does something. But I did not do so. After that, all that I was bargaining for was principles, ideas, and programmes. Did I, at any point of time, ask the Chaudhury or his friends to give me some more seats in the Cabinet? Did I, at any point of time, say that unless they gave me those seats I would quit? I only said that I will not merge with you and the condition for my merger was exactly what you have said in the earlier part of your question. It was becoming clearer and clearer that Chaudhury Charan Singh had neither the comprehension, nor the will nor the political philosophy by which the socio-economic changes taking place all over the world, as understood by him, was being made relevant to the efforts of the Indian polity moving towards a new direction. When I joined him, I joined him on a limited question — let nobody be in doubt — recall the early August joint statement of Charan Singh and Bahuguna in which we said our differences with regard to national issues are too well-known to be repeated. That indicates we joined hands to fight the common enemy as the common enemy has been identified.

I think at that point of time the paramount duty of any patriot was to do this minimum basic thing of throwing away the communal impact on the Central administration. It would be unfair to say that I joined them in spite of knowing them. It was as good as Gandhi joining all hands, or the Congress in the struggle for freedom (when) all factions of the people loved to join in (the fight) against a common enemy. So that was all. The limited purpose of our alliance was this. I wanted to expand it into the social, economic and foreign affairs fields. There was resistance and that's why came the break. Because I wouldn't then merge.

Q : Don't you feel that your political sharpness has become the bane of your career?

A : Well, that's what some people tell me but then I say that it is not the ideal for me to keep on angling for position by blunting the edge of my views, or ideas or ideologies. If having ideas and ideologies is called political sharpness or manoeuvrability, I'm afraid, I cannot help it. I will not give up my basic value system for the kingdom of heaven.

Q : Now, what do you have to say about the so-called Bahuguna formula regarding Congress unity?

A : I must say I never gave any formula. It's true, I will not hide it. Long ago, sometime in September-October 1977, the idea was mooted by many of us. I won't name all the friends — some of them are in Janata today, some of them are outside Janata today. When we thought that all the Congressmen elected on the Congress ticket — 150 may be brought into the Janata fold. And my belief was that this would be a polarisation in which all those people whose origin was in the freedom struggle, who belong to that stock, not only Congressmen, be it Socialists, be it the BLD people, be it the CFD people or other types of people, all of these people would join. Our basic premise was : a very good theoretician friend who is still in the Janata, his basic theory was that let the basic stock from the freedom struggle combine today to give viability to this country because (people were) disillusioned with the Janata because it became a northern Party, because the communal element in the Janata Party was becoming dominant. The people of this country had never accepted the Janata Government as (having legitimacy) beyond the Vindhyas. So we saw that if these people who are also trying to fight certain elements within the Congress, if they could join then a new type of political force could merge. Having come to a dead end because of the unwillingness of the people that were in power at that point of time, we stopped talking about it.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

This clamour for (the rights of) backward classes originates from the misconception that a few services here and there will yield the results. Has corruption lessened in the administrative apparatus with the influx of other castes than the upper castes getting into the services? Wherever reservation has been made, has that made any perceptible change? I am not opposed to reservation, let me not be misunderstood. What I am saying is unless the basic value system changes, we cannot wish away corruption by a change of men. Unless the basic approach or the class character of the Government changes — and this doesn't mean caste character of the Government but the class character of the Government. Which is the class you want to serve? Which is the type of society you want to build? Unless these ideas are clear nothing will happen. Similarly, a gang-up of men has never won. It is not the number that has made the difference in the world. It is always ideas, the ideologies which have made the difference. Now, nearer home, in the 1971 and 1977 elections do you think organisation won it? Do you think gang-ups of men won the elections? In 1971 the entire range of stalwarts was on one side. There was no organisation, I was general secretary of the Congress at that time and I know what organisation we had. Therefore, this uniting Congressmen will be another empty dream.

We have to unite on ideas and nobody is willing to spell out those ideas. Now today's (October 28) morning papers carry a story of some thought emerging in the mind of the Prime Minister for calling on his alliance partners to start working on a common minimum programme. A thing which should have been done, a thing I have been asking for, a thing which I asked him (for) in writing, orally. All our alliance partners, let us sit together. A leadership which can't even think of calling friends for a common poll strategy can hardly be expected to form a common minimum programme. This country needs a basic change, a basic break with its past feudal and capitalist character and if that can come, if those ideas can emerge not just talking of revolution, not merely saying that the sharecroppers shall not be dispossessed of the land he is tilling. The land relationship has to be finally settled, land goes to the tillers. Therefore I have told Chaudhury Sahab when he asked me to merge that it will be a gang-up bereft of basic ideological orientation. I talked of a number of things in land reforms. I thought, the Prime Minister till (this) day has talked of tardy land reforms. Did he go beyond that? What would, according to him, be the correct type of land reforms? I just spelt out that. He excels in in negativism. I identified the tardiness in land reforms and I told him what he should do. Beginning with imparting rights in Bihar, conferring full rights of possession of the sharecroppers in Bengal, conferring full rights of ownership on the landless people who have been given land under the ceilings act in Karnataka. I have been telling him about weeding out these cooperative societies, these so-called cooperative societies, and distributing land to the real landless people or forming cooperatives of the real landless people. I told him, make your Government implement the Vishwanath Committee's recommendations which I had started but failed to discharge, no doubt because I was elbowed out by vested interests by carrying all sorts of stories even to the (former) Prime Minister, telling her that I was a challenge to her power. Essentially, I was a challenge to the vested interests. Therefore positivism is the need of the hour. Gang-up Congressmen, unite Socialists, for what? For which objective? Unless that is clear, nothing will happen. Therefore I have no formula but a formula of unity of minds.

Charan Singh excels in negativism

Q : Don't you feel Devaraj Urs' negative approach of uniting all Congressmen against Mrs Gandhi will only help Mrs Gandhi?

A : The more we gang up without clear ideas, beliefs and set out basic objectives, the more advantage will accrue to anyone who is opposed to the establishment. Since she happens to be the one opposed to the establishment, the advantage is bound to go to her.

Q : What is the basic difference in approach between Babu Jagjivan Ram, Chaudhury Charan Singh and Mrs Indira Gandhi?

A : One knows how to talk politics, the other knows how to talk and use politics, the third one doesn't know how to talk politics and, much less, how to use politics.

Q : At the moment it seems you will not merge with either the Lok Dal or the Congress. What are your options?

A : Well, I have to think of it. Yes, I will not merge with the Lok Dal. But there have been talks, discussions, negotiations recently between the Congress, CPI(M), CPI and myself. I am waiting for those results before taking my time to plan. But I must tell you, I will work for ideas, not merely ideas but for the implementation of those ideas. And for the remaining part of my life — which I treat as five to seven to ten years, at most — I will crusade for those ideas and the implementation thereof rather than seek power and position.

Q : Suppose CPI, CPI(M) and Congress don't accept your 31-point programme, and all of a sudden Mrs Gandhi says okay, I'm ready to implement your programme, what will you do?

A : Well the first point, I have been a little shocked by reading this morning's newspapers : Mr Devaraj Urs has offered publicly that he will choose the good points out of the 31 points. To me, each of the 31 points is a cardinal principle of my faith. Those 31 points find their origin in the past promises of the Congress while it was struggling for freedom. Therefore it has a national sanction. It is a sanction much higher than the normal Parliamentary sanction. It was a promise sanctified by the blood and sacrifices of millions of our brave people. No, I do not know if Mr. Devaraj Urs has read all the 31 points because there is nothing bad in those 31 points. The 31 points are an integrated picture of the Indian economy, its polity and its foreign connections. They barely state the principles, not the body. Each one is a direct thesis. It appears to me that Urs has not liked some of them, obviously, that's why he doesn't support some of them. Gandhiji used to say, I am willing to join hands with anyone if he serves the national purpose. But this is a hypothetical question that you have raised and I don't think it's time for .....I will have to see the background, the nature of the offer made in the light of past experiences, find out the worthiness thereof.....I can come to any conclusion.

Q : How do you see Devaraj Urs' politics in Delhi. The president of the Congress is trying to fight against communal forces. He is aligning with Charan Singh's Lok Dal, CPI, CPI(M) and Socialists against the Janata Party dominated by the RSS, In the south he is clandestinely adjusting with the Janata Party in Karnataka.

A : I share the anxiety which is inherent in your question. I have made these points plain to Mr. Devaraj Urs. My fears and their basis have already been conveyed. I'm convinced that opportunistic alliances are bound to fail. I'm not saying that he is doing so. Let me make that very clear. It is not that he has told me that he's doing so. The stories emanating from the Press remain uncontradicted till they die. That there might be local adjustment of seats with the Janata in a number of States beginning with Kerala right up to Maharashtra and Gujarat. In Kerala and Tamil Nadu it is already there now. In Andhra, Karnataka and Maharashtra...and now has come the story of Bengal also. All this is going to happen. That would embarrass the alliance partners not only in those States but also in the rest of the country and the balance of advantage will go to one who is fighting at least clearly in the battle. ■

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

In pursuit of excellence...

Onida and Nature

Sunflower - one of the endless perfections of nature looks to the sun for energy. So does Onida Solar which is powered by the sun.

Other exclusive features

Over 22 sensibly priced models from Rs. 395/- to Rs. 875/-

Never to rust stainless steel case.

ONIDA
THE MICRO TIME COMPUTER

Manufactured in India by MONICA ELECTRONICS PVT. LTD. 87DSIDC Okhla Phase II New Delhi-110020

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Too clever by half?

By TARUN GANGULY

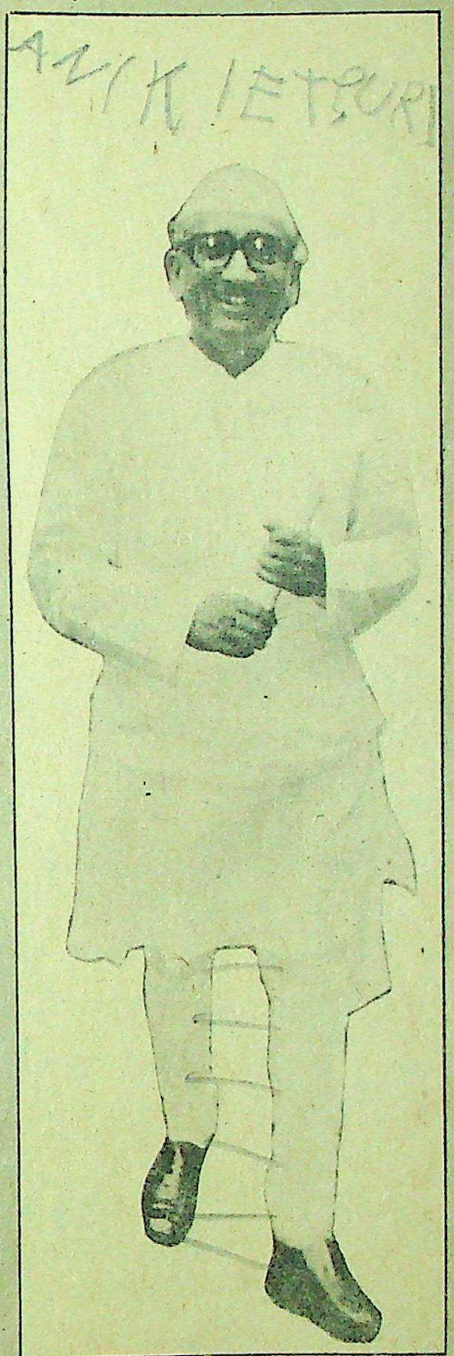
MR Hemavati Nandan Bahuguna has come full circle. By severing links with Mrs Gandhi on the fateful morning of February 3, 1977, he took a dramatic place upfront in national politics. But call it an irony or a quirk of fate, on October 19, 1979, the second non-Congress Prime Minister, Mr Charan Singh, asked him to quit the Central Cabinet.

Mr Bahuguna, whom his political detractors prefer to call Natwarlal, is generally considered too sharp both by his political foes and friends. And this cleverness according to his critics has become the bane of his career. So far, he has been able to hitch himself to various bandwagons to remain in political limelight since he knows that left to himself he is not a winning force, at least in Parliamentary elections. He flourishes in the company of a stronger force. Mr Bahuguna, a shrewd judge of himself and those around him, cleverly convinced Babu Jagjivan Ram of the necessity of leaving Mrs Gandhi in 1977. And that sealed the fate of Mrs Gandhi.

But it appeared that Mr Bahuguna was losing his sure touch when the disintegration of the Janata Party started in the monsoon session of Parliament last July. After initial dithering, Mr Bahuguna, against his better judgment, joined Charan Singh. He was certain that he would be able to outfox his old rival in UP politics, Chaudhury Charan Singh. But the tension was visible all the time. Things almost came to a crisis point when despite pressure from Madhu Limaye, Raj Narain and Biju Patnaik to merge his CFD with the Lok Dal on September 26, Bahuguna refused to do so.

Bahuguna survived the September tussle by asking for some more time. He told Charan Singh's emissaries that his name had not been cleared by the Prime Minister, who had termed him a KGB agent. In the process he cleverly forgot that he had also described the Prime Minister as unsound of mind. Charan Singh immediately said that he had been misinformed by Morarji Desai, but of course the Chaudhury did not fully withdraw the allegations.

In the next phase Bahuguna convened a stage-managed meeting of his CFD. Three groups in his own Party, which had neither a flag, nor a constitution nor any ideology, proposed three different things. One group suggested merger with Lok Dal, another with Congress (I) and a third one preferred to go it alone. This indecision amply suited Bahuguna, and he kept the final word pending. All these goings-on in Bahuguna's camp only angered Chaudhury Charan Singh and made him doubtful about Bahuguna's intentions. Through Raj Narain, he opened a dialogue with the Shahi Imam to gauge Bahuguna's much vaunted support among the Muslims.



Vijyendra Tyagi

But the National political scene was becoming clouded all the time. The CPI(M), which had almost got the Kerala Government on a platter, over-reached itself and in the process became isolated in Kerala politics. Meanwhile, Mrs Gandhi's camp was gaining strength. She had successfully manoeuvred the DMK into her fold in Tamil Nadu. In Karnataka, Devaraj Urs fort was showing signs of wear and tear and Maharashtra and Gujarat had become ripe for her to pluck.

Bahuguna now started assessing his position. The situation took a weird turn when it was reported that the Russians considered that only Mrs Gandhi could provide a stable Government in the country. The story goes that a senior leftist leader, who had been to Moscow, found the Russians very warm about Mrs Gandhi. Did that tilt Bahuguna towards Mrs Gandhi? Sources close to the Bahuguna camp say that he had made up his mind to ditch Charan Singh on the Diwali day. Charan Singh too was becoming doubtful about Bahuguna's ulterior motives. So before Bahuguna could jump off the Chaudhury bandwagon, Charan Singh asked him to resign. And that left Bahuguna no choice but to leave.

It will remain a mystery for some time to come whether Bahuguna really had made up his mind to quit at the instance of the Russians or not. But protagonists of this theory say that in the Russian assessment Mrs Gandhi is likely to secure 200-odd seats on her own and with Bahuguna's support the figure could considerably increase. Regarding the CPI's alliance with the Lok Dal, the propounders of the theory say that the CPI is the Trojan horse in the Lok Dal camp, destined to bolt out towards Mrs Gandhi after the elections. But then these are the imponderables in politics about which there cannot be any clear-cut answer at this stage.

After his removal from the Union Cabinet, Mr Bahuguna tried to persuade Mr Fazlur Rahman, Labour Minister and the only other CFD minister, to resign. Rahman however did not agree to the idea. He says, "where is the CFD? It died with the merger of the Party with Janata Party on May 1, 1977." Some of the CFD Ministers in the UP cabinet tried to persuade Rahman at Bahuguna's behest but they also drew a blank. When Bahuguna called for a meeting of the CFD, Rahman left for Calcutta to avoid the meeting.

Mr Bahuguna knows that the Congress (I) is now more under the grip of Sanjay Gandhi than ever before. And Bahuguna's bitter relations with Sanjay need hardly be recalled. Secondly, people like Kamalapati Tripathi and N. D. Tiwari of UP do not want Bahuguna in their own backyard. That means Bahuguna will find it difficult within the Congress (I) at present even if be goes there.

Realising the tight corner he is in, Bahuguna floated the idea of bringing all Congressmen together, including Babuji. Jagjivan Babu has already spurned this suggestion. Bahuguna could conceivably get out of the mess by joining the Congress, but will that be good enough for Bahuguna?

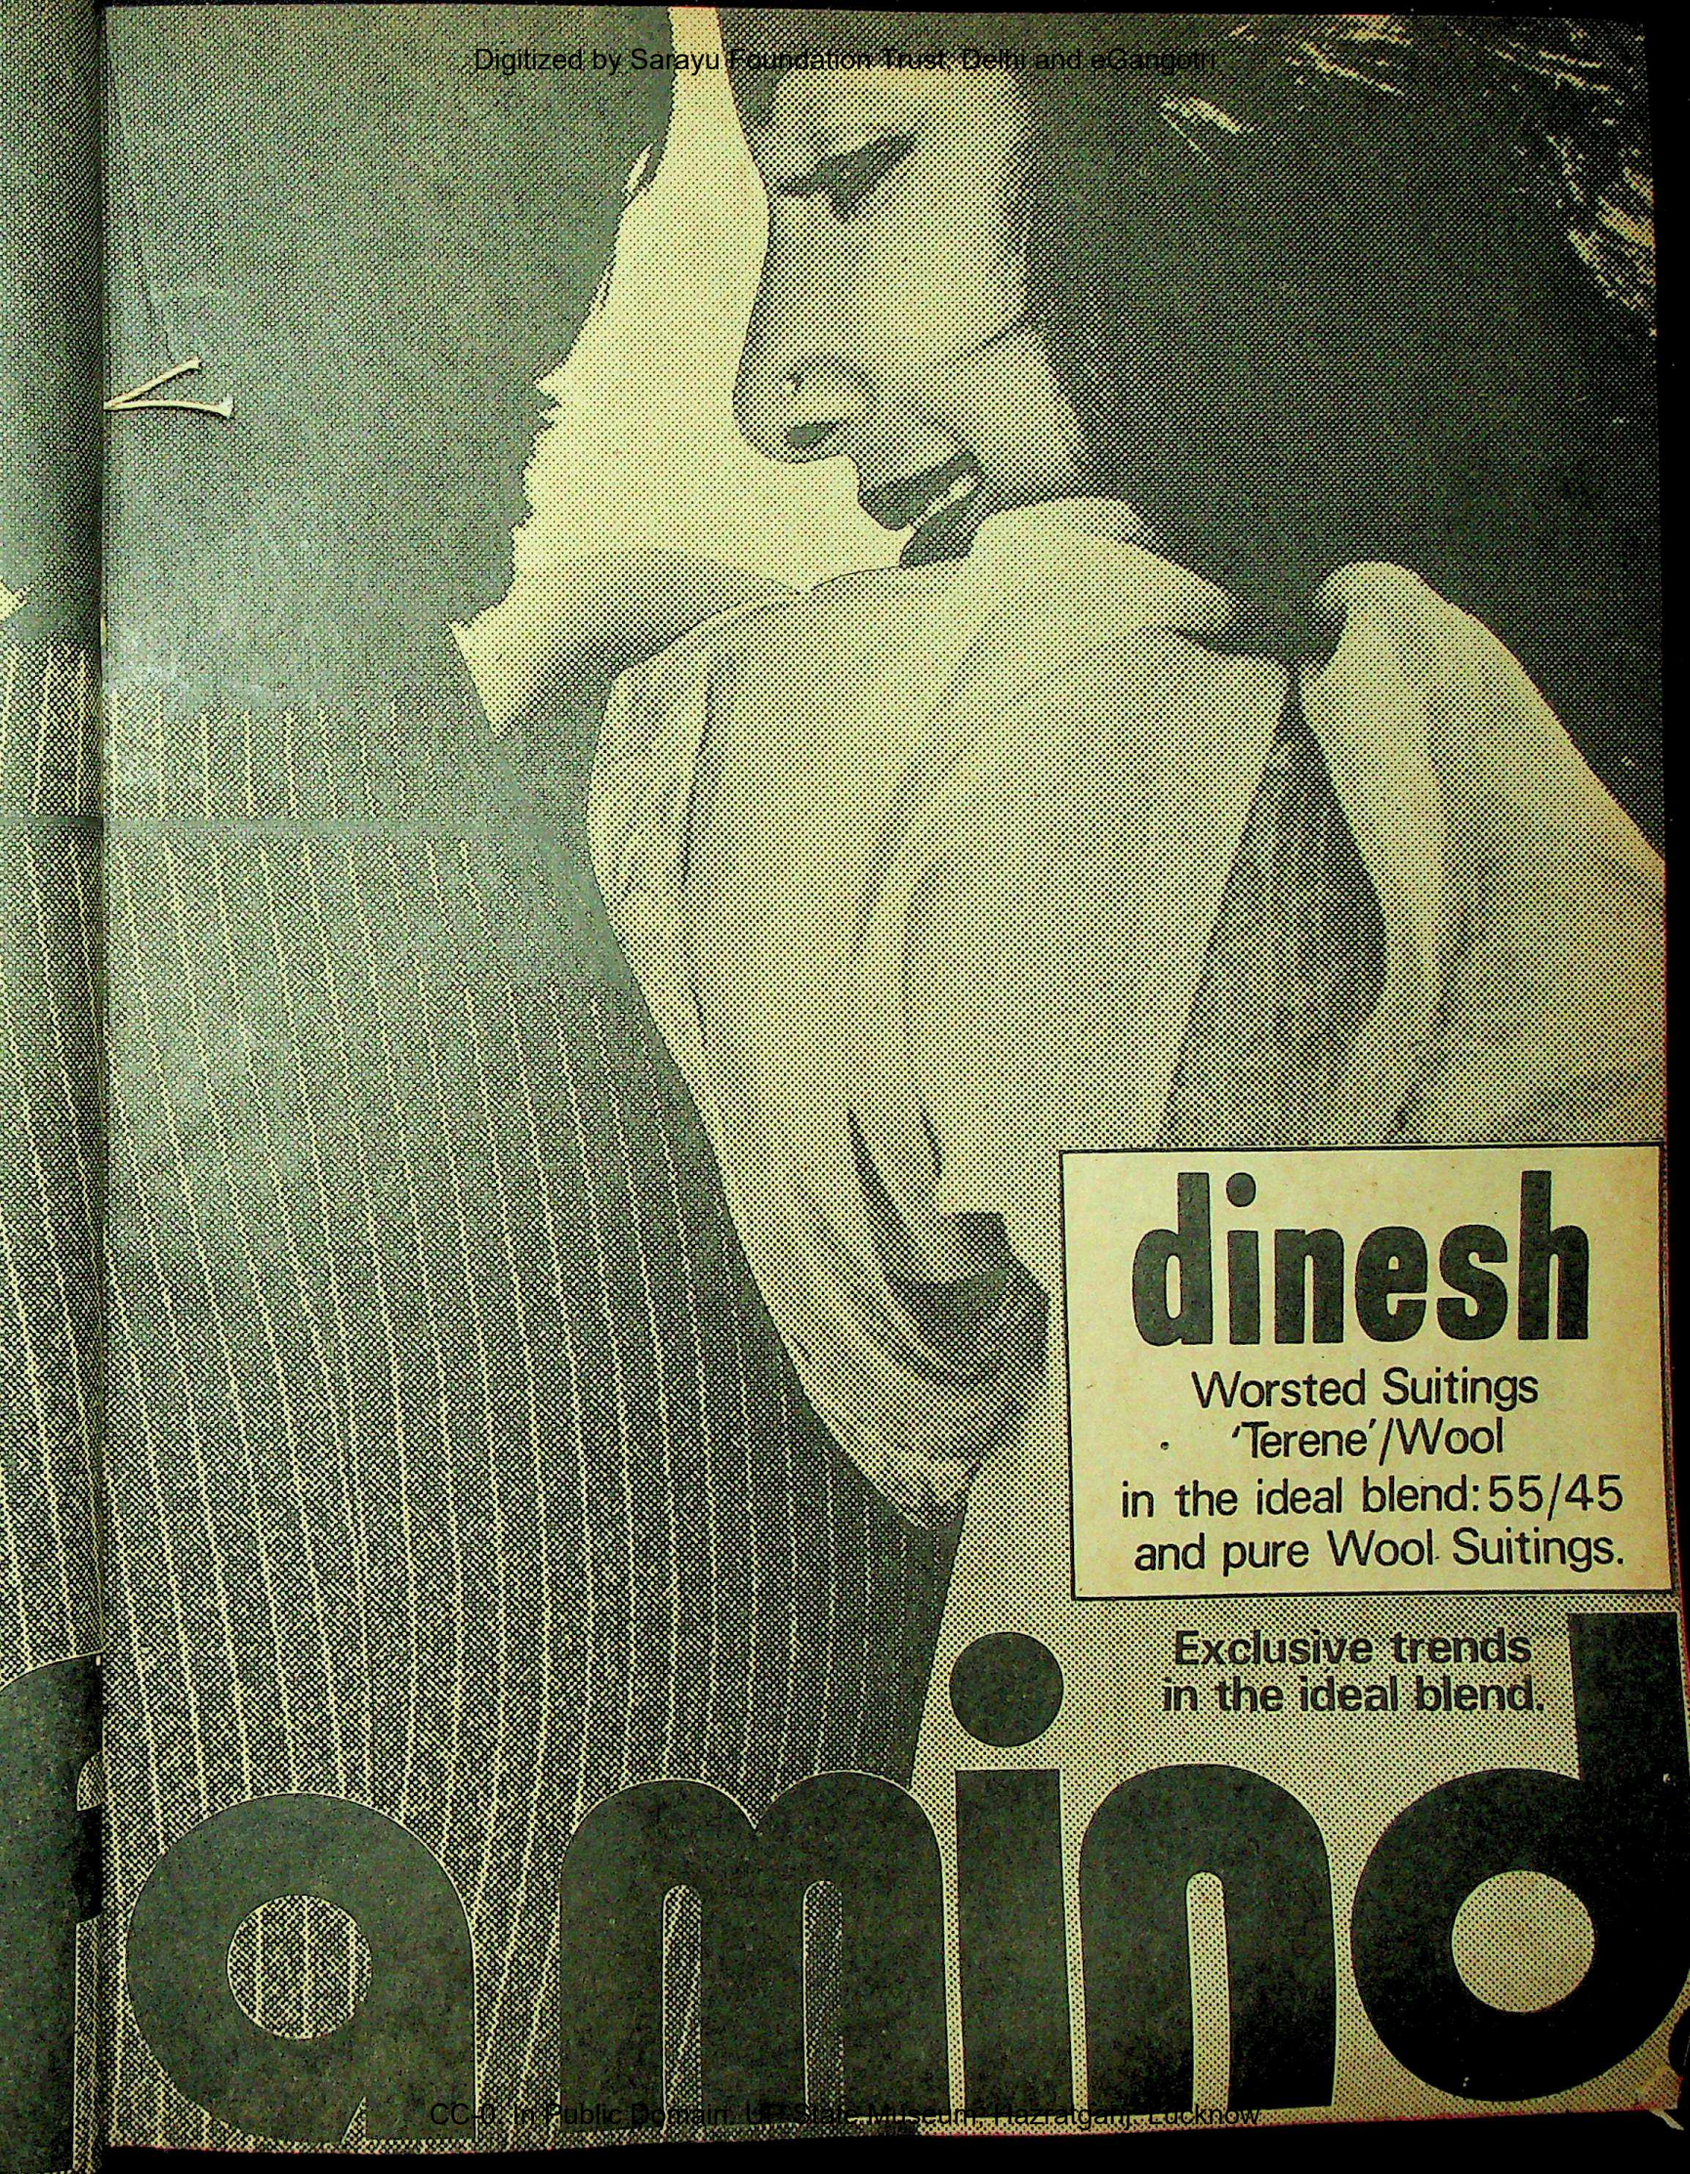
CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

It takes two to blend.
wo of a mind.
Like 'Terene' and Wool.
ow fashionably together
the perfect blend.
5/45.
In a variety of checks,
tripes, herringbones,
r striking plains.
utspoken or subtly
ubdued.
Enough variety, in fact,
o put you in two minds
xcept on one point.
Dinesh.

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri



dinesh

Worsted Suitings
'Terene'/Wool
in the ideal blend: 55/45
and pure Wool Suitings.

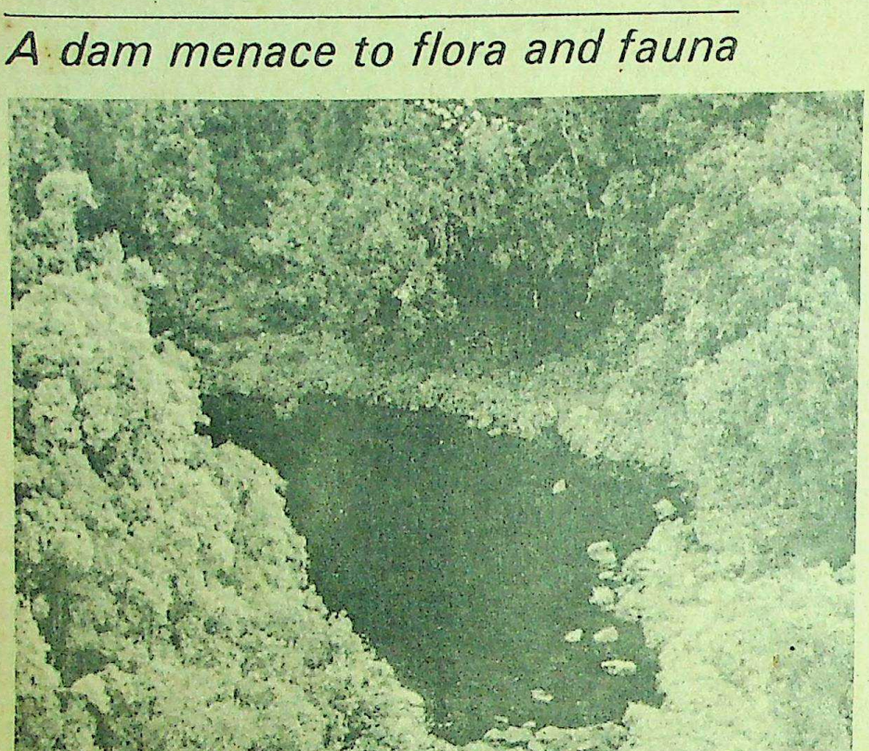
Exclusive trends
in the ideal blend.

CC-0. In Public Domain. U.P. State Museum, Hazratganj, Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

Scream of Silent Valley

A dam menace to flora and fauna



T. M. Rangarajan

A view of the Silent Valley

THERE is good news for those who have been fighting for the scrapping of the Silent Valley project, since the Centre has decided to ask Kerala to abandon the project totally, keeping in view the ecological danger it poses and the negligible benefits it is likely to provide. The Central Government is said to be willing enough to finance an alternate project for the needs of power of the State. This decision has thus brought to an end the struggle by some ecology enthusiasts which took concrete shape on August 30, when the Kerala High Court accepted a rather unusual plea by Mr Joseph John of the "Friends of the Trees" organisation, and issued a stay order on the implementation of the controversial Silent Valley project. This Rs. 50-crore project, though the costs are likely to escalate rapidly, is expected to produce 60 MW (522 MU of energy) of electric power and irrigate 10,000 hectares of land in the backward region of Malabar in Kerala. The hydro-electric project will require 1,022 hectares of land, including 950 hectares of evergreen forests. The 430-metre long and 130-metre high concrete arch-dam will create an artificial lake with a head of 857 metres, the highest in Kerala. The project will generate power at minimum cost.

Though the project was first mooted in 1940, genuine interest was taken since 1965. The Kerala Electricity Board, however, kept delaying it as it was already involved in another multi-purpose project at Idukki. Meanwhile, ecologists and conservationists, led by such experts as Salim Ali, Zafar Futehally and Romulus Whitaker began campaigning against the proposed rape of the Silent Valley, also described as the "50 million year old biological cradle."

"We cannot afford ecological luxury", commented Vasudevan Nair, Kerala's ex-Chief Minister when he received a note from David Munro, director general of the International Union For Conservation of Nature, requesting the State Government to "save the Silent Valley". A number of organisations like World Wildlife Fund and Natural History Society, have also registered their protests. Recently "Friend of the Earth Society" of Malaya made a request through its Government, asking Prime Minister Charan Singh to pressurise the Kerala Government to give up the project. But as the State Government has reportedly already spent about Rs. two crores on this scheme, it is unlikely that the project will be given up. Mr Nair, Kerala's CPI Chief Minister made it abundantly clear that regardless of aid from the Centre, his State will implement the project as early as possible.

To the "power-starved", agriculturally backward community in Malabar, the project appears to be a boon; the farmers of this region have been agitating for it for the last two decades. All political Parties have supported the idea of a hydro-electric project in this region. Objections raised by well-known ecologists and conservationists have been often interpreted as irrelevant pleas to save the ecological balance for purely aesthetic reasons. And for the Communist Party of India, the project has become a prestige issue. CPI leaders in Malabar openly laugh at the idea of "putting-up-monkeys-before-men", and elsewhere CPI workers are threatening to rouse public opinion against ecologists. "If they can collect one hundred signatures against this project in a week, we can collect one lakh signatures for it within three days", a CPI spokesman told this correspondent. Some students of Palghat who have been trying to educate the public to fight against the project, are frustrated. "They want to become rich overnight. They don't realise that the project is intended to be completed only by 1985 if everything moves smoothly." This is due to "Dubai mentality", according to a student leader. "All of a sudden in Kerala, we have a new class, the 'Dubai' or 'Kuwait' class. And everybody has become crazy after the fast buck".

"Some of the politicians know that we ecologists are not just concerned about animals and birds", says M. K. Prasad, biologist and activist of the Kerala Sastra Sahitya Parishad (KSSP). "But they're scared to face the truth. What if the next generation is going to suffer? By then, most of them would've retired from public life. They don't realise that the damage done to ecology can never be repaired. And some of the scientists too, seem to be as ignorant about ecological balance. And they seem to think that the controversy regarding the Silent Valley project is unnecessary."

CC-0. In Public Domain. UP State Museum, Hazratganj. Lucknow

Digitized by Sarayu Foundation Trust, Delhi and eGangotri

The Silent Valley contains India's only substantial stretch of tropical evergreen forests, the habitat of many complex and botanical species. Most of the animals living in the interior forests depend on vegetable food reserves: among the mammals, the arboreal species (living on tree-tops) are more abundant than terrestrial ones in this region.

"The lion-tailed macaque (monkey), the Nilgiri, langur (ape) and the giant squirrel are so acclimatised to the environment of the valley that tampering with the ecological balance will force them into extinction", says Mr M. K. Prasad. "The lion-tailed macaque is of extreme importance in understanding the biological and social evolution of man. It is a rain-forest dweller which can't adapt itself to any new environment. Its extinction will mean the loss of one more link in the chain of evolution. Some politicians have suggested the removal of rare animals from the valley to a well maintained zoo", moans Mr Prasad. "When I was trying to impress upon a politician about the rich reserve of medicinal plants here, he at once said, 'can't you sow the seeds in a number of gardens and have many more such plants?'

